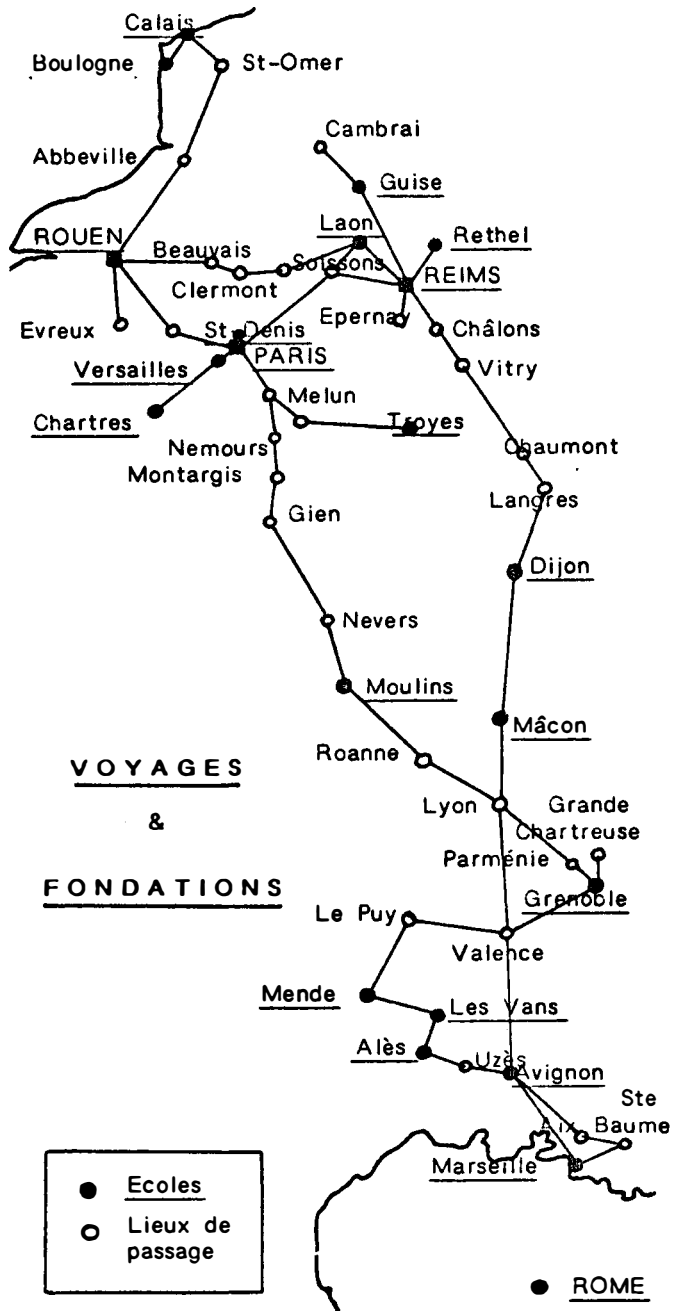
Contrary to popular opinion people travelled a lot in 17th Century. Despite strict controls frontiers were crossed. Journeymen still did the "Tour de France" to improve their professional skills. Traders went to Holland and Italy to find customers. News was brought by travellers. Newspapers had just begun but sound waves were still utterly silent.



Travellers used the mail coach. Transport of goods was organised by the towns, the universities, by coach and carriage companies. Each system had certain privileges. There was constant rivalry and prices varied widely. In Rheims it cost 25 sols a day to hire a horse.

Horses were changed at every posting house. Public coaches covered about 100 km. a day and charged about 15 livres for the journey. That was the equivalent of a month's salary for a schoolmaster. It was 10 times cheaper to hire a horse.

Between Paris and Rheims horses were changed 18 times; between Paris and Rouen there were only 14 changes but between Paris and Marseille there were no less than 93! Taking into account stops at hostelries, a schoolmaster wanting to travel from Rheims to Paris would have to sacrifice 3 months' salary if he went by coach or one month's salary if he went on horseback.

To avoid jolting, rich people went by "water coach." It was much more comfortable but very much dearer.

It is easy to understand why de La Salle and the early Brothers practically always travelled on foot.

A NEW BIOGRAPHY OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

Charles LAPIERRE, Brother of the Christian Schools, "WALK IN MY PRESENCE" - John Baptist de La Salle (1651-1719), Caluire.

The Book: Format 21/24 — 200 pages. — The first page contains, as well as the title, a fine portrait of de La Salle, attributed to Pierre Léger, and the signature "De La Salle." On the back cover page there is a "portrait from life" of de La Salle by his nephew, François Hély Maillefer. (Life of M. De La Salle, 1740, Ed. 1980)

The Author: Brother Charles Lapierre, 69 years old, at present provincial secretary at Caluire (Rhone). Born in Chambéry, Savoy, Brother Lapierre taught in several schools both primary and secondary. He played an important part in the formation of the Brothers as sub-director of novices and director of scholastics. Charmed by the Founder, he studied his life and writings, absorbing thoroughly his spiritual doctrine and educational ideals.

Documents: The book contains numerous documents which enliven the text. A new map of the postal routes of France, 1738 — an outline map of the journeys of de La Salle showing foundations and stopping places — nineteen pages of documentary illustrations (list of illustrations is given on page 8) — an explanatory list of technical words and an account of people mentioned — a chronological table of the life of de La Salle paralleled by contemporary events. A bibliography is given on pages 199 to 200.

The Text: Printed in clear characters on quality paper, the text is very easy to read. The titles and sub-titles serve to give a sense of space as well as guiding the reader.

The Preface: p. 25, explains the choice of title taken from Genesis, 17,1. Like Abraham, de La Salle was an indefatigable traveller in the literal sense. He was even more so in the spiritual sense for, in obedience to God's call, he covered an immense distance from the Hotel de la Cloche to the final meeting in Saint Yon. The quotation from Genesis, given in full, is eminently applicable to him, "Walk before Me and be perfect."

Since we are talking about a journey it may be more natural to divide it into stages rather than chapters. As stage follows stage the reader discovers the characters encountered on the way, the travelling companions, faithful and unfaithful, friends and enemies.

First Stage: Earliest Steps (1651 to 1679) pp. 29 to 44

The reader makes the acquaintance of the de La Salle family. John Baptist is the eldest of eleven. He sees him living and working. He follows him to the seminary of Saint Sulpice in Paris. He sympathises with him on the untimely deaths of his mother and father. He admires his gentle guardianship of his younger brothers and sisters.

After the death of his spiritual director, Nicholas Roland, the young priest, already a canon for several years, of the cathedral of Rheims, takes charge of the Sisters of the Child Jesus. Then begins:

The Second Stage: The Unknown Road

A meeting with Adrien Nyel, lay apostle and founder of schools for the poor, set de La Salle on a road which led him where "he did not wish to go" or rather where he never thought he would go. "One commitment led to another," he writes, "without my having foreseen it from the beginning." In four progressive stages, the young canon, well bred and well provided for, finds himself poor among the poor, at the service of the poor and surrounded by schoolmasters whom he had formerly considered as inferior to his valet". 1682. Soon he is a brother among brothers. Even though he is superior, he wants to enforce nothing by authority.

We next follow de La Salle to Paris for his new foundations. 1688. There we share his trials: law suits, illnesses, betrayals. Nothing prevents him from following his path, his eyes fixed on the goal of giving the Brothers control of their "Society" which will be composed only of laymen as it is to this day.

Third Stage: Storms (1700 to 1714) pp. 89 a 124

The author carefully describes the school desired by de La Salle: a useful school; a school where the human person is respected; a school of good manners; a nursery for Christians. Such a school will be conducted by committed religious teachers to whom no development will be forbidden provided it be for the service of youth and particularly the poor. That the wheat may grow the grain must die in the ground. De La Salle is attacked on all sides: parish priest, archbishop, writing masters, schoolmasters, preceptor of Paris, all combat this "priest from the diocese of Rheims who calls himself Superior General of the Brothers of the Christian Schools of Rheims." To these trials are added the death of his sister and especially the defection of Nicholas Vuyard and several others.

Fourth Stage: Journey through the night

For the holiday makers of to-day it is the road to the sun but for de La Salle it was a nightmare journey through Mende and Avignon to Marseille. The "holy priest" knows the "dark night of the soul": doubts about his mission and abandonment by not a few of those he trusted. He remains steadfast in his faith thanks to prayer in a retreat which he wishes to prolong. The poor drag him from his retreat to teach them himself in Grenoble. He finds peace in Parmenie. From his disciples comes an appeal or rather an order to resume his functions as Superior. "I must obey the Brothers" writes de La Salle, and he returns to Paris.

Fifth Stage: Towards the final meeting (1714 to 1719) pp. 157 to 193

Many more "troubles" arise: from ecclesiastics, his own family, the Brothers. They cause him great suffering but they do not prevent his preparing the election of Brother Barthélemy as Superior General of the Institute he founded and over which he discreetly watches from Saint Yon, near Rouen, where he now lives.

Here he writes the admirable "Meditations for Time of Retreat" and the "Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer." The founder and the man of prayer are here clearly revealed.

On Good Friday, 7 April, 1719, John Baptist de La Salle meets, at last, the God in whose presence he has so faithfully walked.

As a concluding note Brother Lapierre writes "An open letter to de La Salle." In it you can sense the filial love, the respectful admiration and the lively humour of the disciple who can make the Founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools known and loved.

Appreciation: Written in a lively style, well researched, and clearly presented, this book is intended for all Christian educators whose patron is St. John Baptist de La Salle; for students and their parents and for every Christian anxious to know the life of the Church.

The moderate price (60 FF) should assure a wide readership. For many people this work will form a useful introduction to the writings of de La Salle himself and to the more important works cited.

AN IMAGINATIVE LIFE OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

It is difficult to deal, at one and the same time, with the early history of the lasallian family and its present day achievements. Brother Alberto Croce of the District of Argentina succeeds in doing just this in his little book of two hundred pages, entitled, "Nos Tendran Siempre." (Stella Editions, Buenos Aires)

LITERARY FORM

The book is conceived as an exchange of letters between two correspondents, both Brothers of the Christian Schools, but belonging to very different times and social backgrounds. One is Brother Alberto, himself, The other is Jean Partois, Brother Anthony, companion of the Founder and one of the twelve who made the first perpetual vows with him on 6 June, 1694.

In a very vivid manner each describes to the other his experiences of three hundred years ago and those of to-day. This exchange of letters helps to explain certain episodes in the life of the Founder and of the early Brothers while at the same time it allows the writer to present the life of a Brother of the Christian Schools to-day in a clearly defined situation, the District of Argentina - Paraguay.

It is not a book to suit all situations. You would not dream of translating it nor even of presenting it, without changes, to other regions of the Spanish speaking world. As it is, it is marvellously evocative and could help to stimulate similar efforts to make known to a wider public both the life of the Founder and the living tradition which perpetuates his work to-day.

CONTENTS

The historical content shows a deep knowledge of the life, work and thought of the Founder. Brother Alberto has a wide knowledge of the earliest biographers of de La Salle and a close acquaintance with his principal doctrinal writings which he quotes very appositely. He evokes vividly the life and times of the first Brothers. Brother Anthony, Jean Partois, who joined the Institute in 1686, was one of those closest to de La Salle so it is not too fanciful to connect him with most of the events mentioned in the letters.

Brother Alberto gives the impression of understanding clearly and judging correctly the concrete situations in which the Institute, the Brothers and the wider lasallian family find themselves to-day, particularly, but not exclusively, in Argentina. There is nothing banal in these pages; everything is described by a witness who is alert, well informed and impartial. Reading his book, one not only shares the anxieties but also the hopes and enthusiasm which sustain the work of to-day and inspire the plans for tomorrow.

We must not regard this correspondence as purely anecdotal. Each exchange of letters brings a corresponding exchange of ideas: he deals with the themes of vocation, schooling, gratuity, fidelity to the teaching of the Church, the lay character of the Institute, renewal, youth movements, administration and the question of lay teachers in lasallian schools.

At the end of the book the author provides an index of topics treated.

CHARMING FRESHNESS

The book has a charming freshness of approach. Neither of the two correspondents is in the least didactic; however different the conditions in which they live they recognise each other as engaged in the same kind of work and living by the same spirit. Gently and patiently each explains to the other when and why such a thing was done, why one thing was done and not another. Each time the correspondence is discontinued its resumption is an occasion to recall an event or some urgent need of the moment.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Brother Anthony, for example, expresses his joy when he learns that the General Chapter of 1966-67 decided to maintain the lay character of the Institute. Brother Alberto explains to his correspondent that he must leave him to meet two Brothers who have come to help him with a week-end retreat for some young people whom he looks after. There are even some funny episodes to give pleasure to the reader. Brother Alberto tells Anthony that, reading his letter, one would think that he was watching a film of the life of de La Salle. He suddenly realises that his correspondent does not know what a cinema is and tries to explain it to him in a few well chosen words.

I cannot recommend this book too highly to anyone who, in his own apostolate, wants to make known both the message of de La Salle and the way in which the Institute tries to interpret it to-day.

Maurice Hermans, FSC
Director of Lasallian Studies
Casa Generaliza
Rome

The following extracts from the book give a little of the tone of the letters:

LETTER OF BROTHER ALBERTO TO BROTHER ANTHONY

How necessary it is for the young people of our day to meet men like de La Salle; men of real, deep prayer, not the countless false prophets who try to sell us gimmicks or "magic carpets" for reaching God, not those ridiculous people who tell us to pray in order to forget our problems.

No! Prayer is something else: It is a life lived in God, receiving and developing His message of love and bringing that message to men. It is in the heart of God that His message of love beats. It is there we must look. If the young people of our day discover this truth they will build a new world.

LETTER FROM BROTHER ANTHONY TO BROTHER ALBERTO

No doubt you have noticed that the Founder has twice called us brothers. He has never done so before. It was after he resigned his canonry that he got the idea of giving more stability to our group. For weeks he had been talking to us of a closer union amongst us. That is how the question of a name came up. At first it was "Community of the Christian Schools," then after we had begun to call ourselves "Brothers" the name became the community of "The Brothers of the Christian Schools." Our poverty was as great as our enthusiasm!

LETTER FROM BROTHER ANTHONY TO THE YOUNG PEOPLE OF TO-DAY

I must tell you how happy I am. I am proud of God's call to me and happy to feel close to Him and able to devote myself to the service of so many children and young people.

I know you are seeking God. He is very close to you: You can meet Him in the silence of prayer or "under the rags of the poor who attend your schools" (MDF 96,3). When you realise this you will find your own lives flooded with light and that many others will be enlightened by the light you bring to their lives.

Do not hesitate. Go forward. "God has made His light shine in their hearts."

Yours fraternally in Jesus Christ,

Brother Anthony

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

These words have become familiar to us, but the title was strange and literally unheard of when de La Salle and a few schoolmasters from Rheims adopted it in order to identify themselves.

1) BROTHERS:

Men conscious of living in a brotherhood. "They shall be called by the name of Brothers and shall not allow themselves to be called otherwise," wrote de La Salle at the beginning of the first edition of the Rules.

Not allow whom to call them otherwise? First of all, those with whom they live, confreres and pupils; then those whom they meet normally, the parents of the pupils; finally all others who may be allowed or forbidden. If an unknown person calls me "padre" or even "monsignor" I cannot forbid him.

Signification, then and now: We must often reflect on what the choice of this title meant three hundred years ago and what it should still mean to-day. Very early on, we do not know exactly when, the schoolmasters grouped around de La Salle recognised themselves as "brothers." They did not have to invent the word but they recognised that it expressed the reality they were living.

In community: it meant taking the name "brothers" and really living as brothers with all that implied of evangelical sharing, mutual help and support, close union and collaboration in the exercise of the apostolate.

In class: it meant being called "brother" by the pupils and being truly a brother to them. De La Salle had wanted the relationship between master and pupil to be just that; not primarily a relationship of authority and paternity, still less a relationship of superiority, but, above all, one of fraternity.

The humble origins of the first companions of this man of noble family, as de La Salle was, have often been pointed out. The respect and affection with which the Founder addressed each of his disciples, especially in his letters, are very significant: "I am, my very dear Brother, yours," he writes to each one of them.

2) CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

The Facts: In seventeenth century France the Church controlled practically all the schools so they could be called "Christian." In fact they were known under various names: little schools, parochial schools, charitable schools, charity schools. There were, also, special schools known as schools of Christian doctrine where only catechism was taught.

When they wanted to characterise the schools they had charge of de La Salle and the Brothers preferred to talk of Christian schools. So much was this the case that these two words came to designate, without question, their schools as distinct from others.

Outsiders, even high ranking prelates, often wrote "of Christian Doctrine" or even "of the Schools of Christian Doctrine." The Brothers, themselves, never used those expressions.

Their schools were gratuitous but they were not charity schools. The latter could only admit the children of poor families, to the exclusion of all others. They were not parochial schools where the poor were admitted free but the rich had to pay. Christian they were from the start, open to all, free to all, rich and poor alike. They were Christian, above all, in their teaching, organisation and methods, which were focused on leading the children, who attended them, to live "as true disciples of Jesus Christ."

3) BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

De La Salle gave St. Joseph and St. Cassian as patrons to his Institute. Neither he nor his disciples ever called themselves Brothers of St. Joseph or Brothers of St. Cassian. The Founder wanted his Brothers to be particularly devout to the Child Jesus and to the Most Blessed Virgin but he did not suggest that they be called Brothers of the Child Jesus or Brothers of Our Lady.

They were sometimes called "Brothers of Saint Yon" from the property where the Mother House then was. The Brothers, themselves, never used that title.

Before them there were the Society of Jesus, the Congregation of Jesus and Mary and many others. In their own day they saw the founding of the Sisters of Providence, the Sisters of Notre-Dame, the Sisters of the Holy Child Jesus...

Patrons and devotions were not to define the disciple of John Baptist de La Salle but his mission as Christian educator and, even more precisely, the privileged field of his apostolate. The Brother is a catechist, but in a school. He is not only a catechist. His ministry as Christian educator requires a meeting place where, each day, for long hours, he shares the life of the pupils: that place is the school.

In 1690, when he had to defend himself before the ecclesiastical Superiors of Paris on the question of the habit adopted by the Brothers, de La Salle was not afraid to reaffirm the uniqueness of a creation which he, himself, defined as "The Community of the Christian Schools" and its members as "The Brothers of the Christian Schools"! In the Paris of three hundred years ago it took no little courage to dare do that!

Brother Maurice Hermans, FSC
Director of Lasallian Studies
Casa Generaliza
Rome

As a supplement to this leaflet it may be of interest to reproduce the first chapter of the "Rules" of 1705 where the Founder and his first Brothers defined themselves and their role.

1) The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is a Society in which profession is made of keeping schools gratuitously. The members of this Institute shall call themselves by the name of Brothers and they shall not allow themselves to be called otherwise.

2) They cannot be priests nor aspire to the ecclesiastical state or wear the surplice or exercise any function in the church.

3) The end of this Institute is to give a Christian education to children: It is for this purpose the Brothers keep schools, that, having the children under their care from morning to evening they may teach them to lead good lives by instructing them in the mysteries of our holy religion and by inspiring them with Christian maxims and thus give them a suitable education.

4) The necessity of this Institute is very great because artisans and the poor being usually little instructed and being occupied all day in gaining a living for themselves and their families, cannot give their children the needed instruction or a suitable education. It is, therefore, necessary that others take the place of father and mother so that the children may be instructed in the mysteries of religion and the principles of a Christian life.

5) It was to procure this advantage for the children of artisans and the poor that the Christian Schools were established.

6) All disorders, especially among artisans and the poor, usually arise from their having been, in childhood, left to themselves and badly brought up. It is almost impossible to repair this evil at a more advanced age because the bad habits they have acquired are overcome only with great difficulty and scarcely ever entirely no matter what care may be taken to destroy them whether by frequent instructions or the use of the sacraments. As the principal fruit to be expected from the institution of the Christian Schools is to forestall these disorders and prevent their evil consequences, it is easy to conceive the importance of such schools and their necessity."

THE SPIRITUALITY OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

In a circular addressed to those in charge of formation, the General Council of the Institute pointed out a number of basic themes in order to help young people, preparing to become Brothers, to assimilate the spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

These elements can also be helpful to those who are seeking to share more fully in the spirit of the Founder and his successors.

HERE ARE THE MOST IMPORTANT ASPECTS

A warning

★ The spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle is not bound to any particular devotion. He does not base his message on any of those he recommended: devotion to the Child Jesus, to Mary, to Joseph among others.

★ His spirituality cannot be reduced to a spiritual theory. John Baptist de La Salle wrote about perfection and other aspects of the Christian life but none of these aspects represent his main contribution to our spiritual heritage.

Consistency of life and thought

The spirituality of John Baptist de La Salle is consistent:

★ between his concept of Christian life as centred on the essential: faith in God and commitment to others on the one hand;

★ and on the other, the life he himself led, totally consistent with his thinking. You believe witnesses whose lives confirm their words.

A concept of Christian Life

Though written for the Brothers this concept is valid for all Christians.

"The spirit of this Institute is first, a spirit of faith, which should induce those who compose it not to look upon anything but with the eyes of faith, not to do anything but in view of God and to attribute all to God.

"Secondly, the spirit of their Institute consists in an ardent zeal for the instruction of children and for bringing them up in the fear of God..."

What is implied in the spirit of faith and the spirit of zeal?

★ God first of all. The first Person in whose name we are asked to change our outlook and ways of acting. Therefore, a God who enters into relation with us and asks us to allow ourselves to be penetrated by His presence and to collaborate with Him. God in our mind. God in our heart. God in our actions.

★ Each one of us. The appeal is made to our sense of responsibility to commit ourselves. Our whole being is involved, our judgement, our feelings about what happens to us, our activities.

★ Life of reality. Far from leading us into a world of abstractions this spirit involves us in relationships with those around us, whom we are asked to look upon with the eyes of faith: It involves us in new relationships with the events which concern us so that we act and react according to that same faith.

Consistency between the thought and life of John Baptist de La Salle

The life of John Baptist de La Salle is based on a few convictions and major decisions in which his way of looking at things and of acting and reacting in a spirit of faith and zeal is strikingly evident.

★ God is so good that He wishes to save all mankind.

★ But our knowledge of the world, and particularly of the world of the poor makes us realise that people remain far from God, especially if they have not received a Christian education in their youth.

★ God calls us to collaborate with Him, to become the ministers of His saving presence to these people.

★ I accept this invitation from God, I dedicate my life to Him, I try to live and act only for Him.

★ To accomplish this work I associate myself with my brothers in order to create with them that community of evangelical love through which men, and particularly the most deprived, the farthest from salvation, may perceive the love that God has for them.

Sketched thus, in broad outline, the life of John Baptist de La Salle illustrates his spirituality: that of a man, responsive to God's call, who enters daily into new relations with the Lord, with men, with those who share his faith...

THE WAY OF THE SPIRIT OF FAITH AND OF ZEAL: CHANGING MY RELATIONS

My relation to God

★ Who is God for me? A vague notion... a Being as remote as He is supreme? Or the God revealed by Jesus — the father who knows and loves me better than I know and love myself.

★ What is the place of God in my daily life? in my prayer? in my thoughts? in my family and professional relationships?

★ What means do I take to come closer to God? to get to know Him better? What time do I give to my own religious culture, especially to improving my knowledge of Holy Scripture?

My relations with people

★ St. de La Salle called his Brothers "ministers" of Jesus Christ, messengers of His love and salvation, especially to those who are far from Him and who endure poverty and injustice.

★ And I, who am I for those with whom I come in contact? What image do people have of me? A professional and nothing more? Do I occasionally, allow something more to appear, a something in my words or actions which shows a little of the love of God?

My relations with my "brothers"

★ John Baptist de La Salle formed the schoolmasters into an association. He made Brothers of them so that they could live the Gospel publicly and become a living cell in the Church.

★ With whom do I unite myself and for what?

★ Is there a group with whom I could learn what God wants of me and which I could join?

★ Am I aware of what is happening around me in the Church? — what is being done to spread the Gospel? — to work for greater justice among men?

PRAYER TO ASK THE SPIRIT OF FAITH AND ZEAL

Here is the prayer which the Founder, himself, suggests to the Brothers for the feast of Pentecost:

"In your state you need the plenitude of the Holy Spirit, since you should live therein and be conducted solely by the spirit and light of faith. Only the Holy Spirit can give you these dispositions... Beseech God to confer on you to-day the same grace He gave to the Apostles so that after filling you with His Spirit for your own sanctification, He may confer It on you for the salvation of others also." LASALLIAN PRAYER IS AFFECTIVE PRAYER

I would like to make this clear with the help of a page from tome II of "A Christian's Duties to God." The first edition of this treatise goes back to 1703 and we know the sources from which de La Salle drew: "A Christian's Duty in the form of a catechism" by the bishop of Agen, Claude Joly, and "Theology of a Christian and his principal Duties" by a little known seventeenth century missionary, Jean le Coreur. The text quoted below is obviously taken from the latter.

It is interesting to place the two texts side by side.

Text of J.B. de La Salle	Text of Jean le Coreur
Q. In how many ways can we pray to God mentally or from the heart?	Q. In how many different ways can we pray to God?
A. In five ways: 1) by silence, 2) by thought, 3) by affection, 4) by action, 5) by suffering.	A. Five. The first by thought, the second by word, the third by silence, the fourth by action, the fifth by suffering.
Q. How do we pray by silence?	Q. How do we pray by silence?
A. By placing ourselves in the presence of God in a sentiment of respect and adoration, acknowledging our weakness and needs without asking to be delivered from them. This is what beggars often do. They are content to show their wounds and their poverty without asking anything from passers by in the hope of moving them to compassion.	A. By showing God our misery as we place ourselves in his presence without asking to be delivered, just as beggars do who are content to show their poverty and wounds to passers by in the hope of moving them to compassion.
Q. How do we pray by thought?	Q. How do we pray by thought?
A. By paying homage to God and acknowledging our needs without words.	A. By offering to God with love the desires of our hearts, in our thoughts alone without the use of words.
Q. How do we pray by affection?
A. By showing God, more by our feelings than by our reason, the love we have for Him and our desire to receive His graces.
Q. How do we pray by our actions?	Q. How do we pray by our actions?
A. By doing good for the love of God in order to pay Him homage and to obtain from Him the graces we need.	A. By doing good works inspired by the Holy Spirit.
Q. How do we pray by suffering?	Q. How do we pray by suffering?
A. By bearing with Christian patience all the pain and suffering it may please God to send us in this life in order to pay Him homage and to obtain the graces we need.	A. By bearing with Christian patience all the afflictions that God sends us in this life.

"A Christian's Duties to God" was composed by St. John Baptist de La Salle between 1695 and 1698. The complete work is in three volumes. The above extract is taken from volume II (C.L. 21 pp. 261 to 263).

Since de La Salle is thinking only of mental prayer in this context he omits Le Coreur's question on vocal prayer but adds another. It is precisely this last question which speaks of prayer of affection.

In this manner of praying, more by movement of the heart than by the thoughts of the mind, de La Salle expresses a basic principle of his own prayer, at least to the extent that his writings reveal it. For him prayer is total: it involves the whole person. In terms of the anthropology of the seventeenth century this means the mind, heart and soul. It involves the whole person because, by its nature, it springs from the most intimate depths of his being. After defining mental prayer in the "Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer," as an interior occupation, that is, an application of the soul to God, he continues,

> "It is called interior because it is not simply an occupation of the mind but of all the powers of the soul. To be pure and strong it must come from the depths of the soul, from its most intimate depths. If prayer involved only the mind or the superficial emotions it would be subject to worldly and emotional distractions which would render it fruitless. Unless this prayer of the mind penetrated the soul it would be merely a series of passing thoughts which left the soul in a state of aridity and bereft of God."

It is clear that affective does not mean emotional, much less sentimental. It is a love marked by strong, even vehement desires. It is a love of togetherness, of union, of communion, of commitment. It is sustained attention to the gifts received as can be seen from the beautiful prayer after Holy Communion taken from "Instructions and Prayers." Is the saint not here talking of himself?

> "What a great honour it is for man to talk intimately to his God, his Lord and Sovereign, as Moses, that faithful leader of his people, did and as we can do every day in prayer!"
> "But it is a greater gift and an inexpressible happiness to possess in oneself this same God and to be able to talk to Him of one's salvation, heart to heart, as to a friend and to ask Him for the graces one needs."
> "This is the advantage I have in Holy Communion, for having Jesus Christ in my soul I find there a God who treats me as a friend, who shares my interests and who seeks only the good of my soul. Sometimes He communicates to me his interior dispositions, sometimes He shares with me his views and the intentions He had in his actions which were done purely for the glory of his Father. Now He inspires me to do something for God, another time He urges me to commit myself entirely to his service. Sometimes He reminds me of what He did and suffered to save me; at other times He reveals to me the assiduity and continuity of his prayers to the Father and his desire for my complete conversion.
> Grant, O my Jesus that all the inspirations you give me may be engraved on my heart never to be erased and that they may produce in me all the effects you desire."

John Baptist de La Salle gave a beautiful definition of "affective prayer" in "A Christian's Duties to God." It is, if I may say so, wonderfully illustrated in that prayer. You find in it the attitudes towards prayer of the true disciple of Jesus Christ, who has become His friend and the confidant of the secrets of his heart.

By asserting, in his catechetical manual, that there is a way of praying "by affection" St. John Baptist de La Salle wished to show that something essential is involved...

EXPANSION OF THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

1983: 10,000 Brothers and more then 20,000 lay teachers in 82 countries

When he founded his first schools for the children of Rheims could John Baptist de La Salle have foreseen that three centuries later his spiritual sons would be doing the same work in 82 countries spread over five contents? Probably not, though with a man of such foresight and prophetic charism one can never be sure. It is a fact that, from the very beginning of his work, he left the provinces to go to Paris where his activities would have more influence. As early as 1702 he sent two Brothers to Rome to open a school. At his death in 1719 we find the Brothers of the white rabat and floating sleeves in twenty towns in France from Calais to Marseille.

Faithful to the ideals of the genial Founder, especially his desire to serve the underprivileged youth of the world, the Superiors who have succeeded each other at the head of the Institute — Brother Pablo Basterrechea, the present Superior is 24th in a very distinguished line — answered, as far as limited personnel allowed, appeals from all corners of the world. In 1750 the Brothers were in Switzerland. Already, in 1774, they were crossing the seas to take charge of an establishment in Martinique. The French Revolution, however, destroyed everything: the Institute was "officially" suppressed. In fact it continued outside the borders of France and especially in Italy. When Napoleon "officially" re-established it, the Institute resumed its expansion at an even faster rate.

EXPANSION IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

Before the middle of the nineteenth century the Brothers were established in several new countries: Reunion (1817, the first African country), Belgium (1831, after several abortive attempts following the Revolution), Canada (1830), Turkey (1841), United States (1845), Egypt (1847), and Germany (1850).

Then followed 20 years of extraordinary territorial development in 20 different countries. Several of these were in the Far East (Malasia, Singapore, Burma, India, Viet-Nam, Ceylon). Europe, also, was represented: (England, 1855; Austria, 1857; Greece, 1858; Rumania, 1860; even Monaco, 1868), as was Africa (Algeria, 1854; Tunisia, 1855; Mauritius, 1859; Madagascar, 1866; Seychelles, 1867) and Latin America: (Ecuador, 1863).

From before 1880, second centenary of the Institute, the Brothers had already had time to get to Hong Kong (1875) to Chile (1877) to the Holy Land (1878) and to Spain (1878). In that same year of 1880 Luxemburg and Ireland welcomed the Brothers. There were then about 11,800 Brothers in the Institute but they were already to be found in 30 different countries.

From 1880 to 1900 the Brothers landed on many foreign shores, some of which they later left (Armenia, Bulgaria, Syria) but their work was firmly established in Lebanon, Czechoslovakia, Argentina, Colombia and Hungary. The century ended with the jubilee year of 1900, marked by an important mile stone for the Brothers of the Christian Schools: On 24th. May Pope Leo XIII canonised their Founder.

CRISES AND EXPANSION IN THE 20TH CENTURY

Despite the territorial expansion outlined above more than 10,000 of the 15,000 Brothers in the Institute were in France. But in 1904 a law compelled them to close their communities. A certain number remained and discreetly carried on their work but a much greater number emigrated.

From 1900 to the First World War the Brothers consolidated their earlier foundations and established themselves in several more countries where they developed local vocations as soon as soon as possible (Panama, Mexico, Puerto Rico, Cuba, Brazil, Venezuela). Irish Brothers established schools in South Africa and Australia, in 1904 and 1906 respectively, while the Belgian Brothers went to Zaire in 1909 and the Germans to the Philippines in 1911.

Between the two wars expansions slowed down slightly. It was a time for consolidation, for opening novitiates and for an increase in numbers (from 11,000 to 14,000 Brothers). This did not, however, prevent the opening of houses in Bolivia, Peru, Japan, Portugal, San Domingo, Aruba, Ethiopia and even Korea and China...

After 1946 when numbers reached 16,000 Brothers and then decreased considerably, expansion resumed at an increased pace. In Africa, first of all, where Spaniards, French, English, Italian, American, Canadian and Belgian Brothers founded schools in Djibouti, Upper Volta, Niger, Cameroon, Togo, Benin, Rwanda, Nigeria and Kenya...

During the same period countries of Asia such as India, Pakistan, and Thailand saw the arrival of the Brothers while the Australians reached out to Papua and New Guinea. In Latin America the Brothers moved into Paraguay.

We must now pay tribute to the latest foundations: that of the Canadians in Haiti, 1973, that of the Spaniards in the Ivory Coast in 1979, that of the French in Chad in 1979 and especially the praiseworthy effort of the Vietnamese Brothers who, expelled from their own country, founded a new community in New Caledonia.

Other foundations are under consideration...

In most countries to which the Brothers have gone since 1946, they have put down firm roots. Upper Volta, India, Pakistan, Rwanda, Paraguay and Cameroon have formed administrative units (districts or delegations) with an encouraging number of local vocations. Hopes for numerical expansion are realistic.

Three hundred years of history, of foundations and trials, of increase and decline in numbers have given to the Institute a centuries old, collective experience which allows it to regard the future calmly and without fear. The present phase is marked by territorial expansion. An increase in numbers is already discernible in the new sectors to which the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle has urged his sons.

THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS IN THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

The above title is that of the "Declaration" published by the General Chapter of 1967. Brother Luke Salm, professor of theology, Manhattan College, contributed much to the final draft of the text. He explains in this paper the motivating force of the "Declaration."

WHY THIS DECLARATION?

The contemporary world has experienced profound changes in almost every aspect of its political, social and religious life. As a result, many individuals and groups seem to have lost their sense of identity. Thus the search for identity — group identity as well as personal identity — is a characteristic concern of people everywhere in today's world.

At Vatican Council II the entire Church was challenged to a program of aggiornamento, a renewed sense of the identity of the Church as the people of God relating to the joys and sorrows of the contemporary world. Religious congregations were challenged to do the same. Each Institute was invited to adapt and renew itself in such a way as to make its identity and purpose — its very raison d'être — manifest to its members, to the Church, and to the world at large.

For the Brothers, the search for the identity of the Institute and the identity of the individual Brother within it was undertaken as the principal concern of the 39th General Chapter held in Rome in 1966-1967. The Body of the Institute, represented by the Chapter, had to ask such basic questions as these: Why does the Institute exist? What is the role if the Institute in relation to the Gospel? to the Church? to its Founder, St. John Baptist de La Salle? What are the essential elements that constitute the identity of the Brother? How can the Brother integrate within himself the many elements that comprise his religious life? How can the Brother give new vitality to his apostolic work? In short, what does it mean to be a Brother in today's world?

The response of the Institute to these fundamental questions can be found in the document entitled The Brother of the Christian Schools in the World Today: A Declaration. More than any other document that emerged from the renewal Chapter, the Declaration, as it is called, represents the mind of the entire body of the Chapter. The text was discussed and debated on the chapter floor paragraph by paragraph. Some 500 suggestions to improve the text were received from the delegates and processed by the commission responsible for putting it into definitive form. It is not surprising therefore that the final vote was all but unanimous. That gives reason to hope that the special guidance of the Holy Spirit runs through its pages.

In presenting this text to all the Brothers, the late Brother Charles Henry, the Superior General at the time, describes the Declaration as "one of the principal documents of our 39th General Chapter." He goes on to say: "It is, then, in the light of the Declaration that we must read and understand the texts of our General Chapter, including the Rule and the Constitutions. It is the basis of the doctrine that you will find in each of them." Ten years later, in 1976, the 40th General Chapter reaffirmed the Declaration as a still valid statement to animate the apostolic mission of the Brother.

CONTENTS

The INTRODUCTION to the Declaration states that the Institute, "faithful to the spirit of Vatican II," intends to undertake the work of renewal and adaptation on the basis of the three sources proposed by the Council: a return to the Gospel, fidelity to the Founder, and the "signs of the times." Concerning fidelity to the Founder, CHAPTER I stresses fidelity to his spirit and charism, not necessarily to "specific texts and practices that may have to be abandoned." Thus fidelity to the Founder is a dynamic process, entrusted to the Institute, that involves a community search for his charism in dialogue. In relation to the signs of the times, CHAPTER II recognizes that the Institute will have to play "a more active role in the life of the world and the Church." The Brothers themselves recognize this; the Church desires it; and the world, caught between optimism and despair, needs the witness of consecrated persons who know the ultimate meaning of the world and the mystery of human existence.

Chapters III, IV and V constitute the heart of the Declaration. CHAPTER III defines the identity of the Brother: he is a baptized Christian, consecrated by vows in an exclusively lay Institute; he has given himself to a community totally dedicated to an educational mission with a special preference for the poor; his mission involves not only the ministry of the Word of God but the total educational process that brings students to full human maturity, the school being the preferred but not the only means to accomplish this apostolate. CHAPTER IV challenges each Brother to make his own personal synthesis of these elements, recognizing that "there is no changeless and universal type of Brother to which all should conform."

CHAPTER V addresses the problem of how to integrate the religious life of the Brother in its three principal dimensions: religious consecration, community life, and apostolic mission. Religious consecration, rooted in baptism, introduces the Brother into a new manner of life, a new community relationship, a new sense of mission and so it implies a new and irrevocable commitment of the entire life of the Brother to Christ. Community life is the place where the Brother meets God and finds his personal fulfillment. Since the purpose of the Institute is apostolic, apostolic action is of the very nature of the religious life of the Brother. These three elements work together in a remarkable integration and interdependence. The apostolate is a community enterprise and is, at the same time, an expression of the religious consecration of the Brother. At the same time, religious consecration motivates the apostolic work and stimulates the community to be an authentic community of faith. Thus the Brother lives an integrated religious life in an apostolic community of consecrated men.

The last three chapters of the Declaration deal with specific aspects of the apostolic mission entrusted to the Institute. CHAPTER VI calls for a rededication to the service of the poor through education. The Brothers are to combat poverty in all of its forms and to give special attention to the educational needs of the most neglected of the poor. Even when the Brothers are not teaching the poor directly, they will nonetheless sensitize all their pupils to the problems of justice and peace in the world. Thus every Brother must make his own the decision of De La Salle to go to the poor "with the heart of a poor man."

CHAPTER VII deals with the work of education as an authentic apostolic mission. For the Brother, the work of evangelization and catechesis holds the primary place, with attention to the professional training and personal qualities of the teacher, the relevance of the Christian message to the concrete experience of the students, and full respect for religious freedom. The teaching of religion cannot be divorced from the total educational experience which is itself apostolic and a preparation for catechesis. The Brother does God's work in whatever he does for the advancement of human civilization and culture.

CHAPTER VIII reaffirms "the intrinsic bond which links the school with the ultimate purpose of the Institute." But it is not enough to reaffirm the school; it has to be renewed. This calls for more creative methods in relating to contemporary culture, a respect for the students as persons, educating them to freedom in a genuine school community, adequate preparation of the teachers, and a reappraisal of traditional commitments so as to emphasize quality education over mere numbers. In addition, it is appropriate that the Brothers begin to exercise this apostolate outside the schools, provided they do so as members of a community and as representing the Institute.

The Declaration concludes with a short exhortation to each Brother to enter fully into the personal work of renewal and invites them to seek the help of the Holy Spirit and their heavenly patrons to bring supernatural blessings on the enterprise.

POINTS STRESSED IN 1981 FOR BROTHERS AND LASALLIAN ASSOCIATIONS

In May and June, 1981, the Brothers Visitors from all over the world, together with Brother Superior and the Council studied the present situation in the Institute and noted certain facts and trends. The following are some of their reflections on the apostolic mission of the Brothers and of the lay teachers who work with them.

1. UNDERSTANDING OUR TIMES

1.1 Our world is changing rapidly and we have trouble finding our place in it.

Who can deny that contemporary society is permeated and fashioned by the most radical questions?

★ The materialistic drive of the consumer society and the worship of money.
★ Migration of peoples in search of work: unemployment.
★ Ferment in the Third World (economic, political, religious — particularly the resurgence of Islam).
★ Militant ideologies exported from elsewhere.
★ The all pervading fear of atomic war, insecurity and terrorism.

1.2 The mental outlook of adults and of the young evolves considerably in a comparatively short time.

We, ourselves, are surprised when we study attentively the evolution of social morality, family life and religious practice. Everything seems to have become relative, bordering on general permissiveness. The young are subjected to evil influences over a long period but they are better able than adults to grasp the novelty, to struggle for justice and to believe in universal brotherhood.

Young people seem able to reconcile opposites in the life of the group as in their own lives: thus while the phenomenon of unbelief seems to spread unremittingly, a longing for the spiritual is becoming more evident and more urgent.

1.3 In the current of laicisation we have accepted deviations or lowered our standards.

Let us have the courage to admit it.

Has the lasallian school not sometimes been reduced to a mere teaching establishment? Such establishments usually maintain a high standard of teaching. Those parents are not mistaken who seek for their children a place of serious study with maximum chance of obtaining qualifications and diplomas. Brothers and lay teachers often show great dedication to their profession.

Nevertheless, the danger of their becoming professionals in the narrow sense of teachers — and the absence of all voluntary activity is becoming evident here and there.

2. LIVING TO-DAY FOR GOD MEANS RE-MAKING OUR COMMITMENT AND STRESSING CERTAIN ATTITUDES

2.1 An ever living source

The inspiration of the Brothers and of lasallian associations finds its source in the evangelical work of St. John Baptist de La Salle. Shocked by the wretched condition of both children and schoolmasters he gradually leaves his own "world" to join them and to establish with them a human brotherhood founded on faith and living by the Spirit, in order to announce, here and now and by a temporal benefit concretely realised, salvation in Jesus Christ.

2.2 A cultural Starting Point...

No education is possible without an a priori attitude of sympathy. Such sympathy is necessary in order to understand the life and reactions of young people:

★ Why and how has their concept of the family changed?
★ Why and how has the individual and social object of work changed?
★ How do their surroundings determine their behaviour?
★ What are the factors which shape their political ideals (ecological movement, fight against torture, rights of ownership etc.).

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

★ Why are they attracted to God and Jesus Christ but often react against the Church?

It is not the reiteration of our own concepts which will enlighten their lives but the discovery — with them — of the meaning and answers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, ever new to modern man. To accept conversion for oneself so that the young may undergo conversion at the same time is not to deny one's past.

2.3 ...Which develops into an educational project...

A group of educators should define its understanding of education, its cultural components, its Christian character. In this way a charter can be drawn up "together and by association" which will call forth the enlightened commitment of each member of the educative community.

The project should be simple and precise but open to adaptation. If it is too rigid it would mean ignoring the rapid interplay of cultural and sociological factors mentioned above.

2.4 ...leading to a community of faith...

The life of faith is developed by the daily sharing of reflections inspired by faith. There are no limits to this daily reflection which is born of faith. Is a faith which is not openly expressed (under pretext of respect for freedom) sincere and living?

The community celebration of the faith will be the end result and the food of the life of faith, the starting point of a new take off.

Living to-day for God in the world as it is, calls for something more than a professional approach in order to adopt a pastoral attitude going beyond the time and place of the school and opening out to the life of the Church in which the risen Christ is active to-day.

3. CHECKING ON OUR FAITH AND ZEAL

There are certain marks which will help us check on our lasallian way of life.

3.1 Live with young people

It is no use talking if we are not, from the start, in communication with the young, if we do not share their anxieties and their hopes. It is no use talking if we measure our presence among them in hours of teaching and our action in terms of school programs. We must take steps to meet young people at other times and in other places (cultural clubs, camps, days of recollection, retreats etc.).

"The Brothers will live with their pupils from morning to evening in order to teach them to live well." (Old Rule)

This quotation reminds us of the spirit of gratuity and total commitment without which there is neither education nor evangelisation.

3.2. Welcome underprivileged youth — transform the traditional school

A basic element in renewal (because it is a return to our beginnings) is the priority given to children and young people who most need to meet an elder brother, because the poverty and marginalisation, which they suffer, impose a serious handicap on the threshold of adulthood.

The school is often based on a culturally elitist model which practically ensures the failure of the weakest. It is a real challenge to the Institute to-day to create a lasallian school truly capable of welcoming the underprivileged youth of our society.

A gradual change is taking place but we have still a long way to go.

3.3 Put pastoral ministry before professional work

High professional standards, though necessary, must not make us forget that school prepares for life and not just for a trade or diploma. The school should encourage a critical attitude towards accepted standards in social life, (cases of injustice, oppression, individual and collective selfishness, greed for money), which are in contradiction with the teaching of the Gospel.

By training students to live the Gospel values (justice, sharing, kindness, forgiveness) the school prepares them for participation in the life of the Church.

3.4 Expand the community of educators

The very conditions of our work in school make us one of the ecclesial groups where priests, religious and lay people are in constant contact with youth. These conditions are ideal for building together a life community and, in the best conditions, a faith community (sharing the same spirituality).

It is a contribution of the first importance, in the spirit of the appeal of Vatican II, that we make to the Church. Brothers and lay teachers are not just auxiliaries helping one another but complementary to one another in their specific commitments. Such expansion should allow the sharing of responsibilities.

3.5 Express faith in Jesus Christ and his Church

Each one is, according to his vocation, a member of Christ's Body.

Formerly the Christian school tried to form habits of Christian living, habits of religious practice.

To-day it is much more important to give students experience of the spiritual life (initiation in personal and collective prayer, discovering the Gospel message, catechetical renewal), suitable to the age and vocation of each one, in order to bring to life in each one the life of the Spirit and lead them to commitment in the Church.

VOCATIONS ANIMATORS

A break in the clouds

Priests, Brothers, Sisters, catechists, lay militants... all forms of commitment to the service of the Church have been affected by the vocations crisis.

Yet, in recent times a renewal of interest in vocation has become perceptible almost everywhere. But it remains precarious. This has led Brother Superior and his council to write to the Brothers to help them to reinforce and expand this renewal.

Here are the main lines of the circular

"Open your eyes and see the world's needs."

★ If the inspiring of vocations is reduced to mere propaganda for presenting impressive statistics then it were better not to mention it.

★ We must not fix out attention on statistics but on the young and the educational needs which arise.

"We invite each one of you to look at the youth of his own country or region as John Baptist de La Salle looked at those of Rheims, Paris and elsewhere. You will thus become more aware of the extent of the problem... the young need a greater number of educators to meet them — better trained to understand and speak to them and more Christ-like to make Him known to them." (Paragraphs 2 & 3 of the circular)

★ Well then?

— There are young people all around us: do we look on them with a little of the love that Christ has for them?

— Can we find out what is being done for them and what is not?

— Do we know who is working in the service of youth and what we could do to help them?

— Do we know how to pray the Lord of the harvest to send workers into His harvest? Do we invite others to pray with us?

God's co-workers in inspiring vocations

The circular states that: "Each vocation is the mystery of God's meeting with man." Every vocation of baptised persons: priests, religious or married.

John Baptist de La Salle explains his vocation as Founder: "One commitment led to another without my having foreseen it from the beginning." It is in this way that young people and their educators can discern the authenticity of a call from God. The way in which a person responds to events and commits himself, when this happens repeatedly and becomes habitual, directs a boy or girl towards one or other form of Christian life. Discernment of vocations is a respectful study of the life and personality of the individual.

God and the young person are the protagonists in this encounter, but, parents, priests and Christian educators play the role of precursors: to make plane the way, to help find the right direction, to prepare the encounter.

To help inspire vocations is an educative action

To inspire vocations is an educative action. It is not something reserved for the chosen few. It is the right of all young Christians. It is not something entrusted only to specialists: all Christian educators exercise this apostolate according to their degree of responsibility.

All education worthy of the name helps to direct a boy or girl towards finding his or her place in society. It helps them to discover and develop their talents. It suggests professions...

Thus every Christian educator helps young people to find in the Church the kind of service to which they are called by their baptism. The inspiring of vocations is, in fact, the faith education experienced by young people: deepening of prayer life, gradual commitment, finding the right way in which to respond...

It is in this general framework, normal and healthy, that the educator can carry on a more personal dialogue with a young person without infringing his freedom, and come to the point where he can discuss with him the possibilities of concrete commitment.

Inspiring vocations is, therefore, the concern of all educators:

★ of parents first of all — no need to stress that

★ of priests and religious, who, more than by their words, should show young people who they, themselves, are and what they suggest, "Come and see"

★ of every educator, catechist or militant, who, also, represents an authentic form of service...

★ not everyone for himself but each for all in the service of all forms of vocation within the Church. The Spirit of God is not the Spirit of divisiveness but of unity.

In conclusion: a few questions

These questions challenge us as educators because sincere work in inspiring vocations reveals in a clear light what we are doing and what we should be doing.

Have we not said, "precursors of the encounter between Christ and the young?"

★ I cannot fulfil this role without showing that the Lord counts in my life, that my life guarantees the truth of my words.

★ I cannot fulfill this role if I'm interested only in the intellectual abilities of the young, if I do not see them as real human beings with their aptitudes and their dreams as well as the difficulties they meet with.

If I do not listen to their personal questions — those concerning the meaning of their lives — I am merely a dispenser of knowledge.

★ Of what kind of future am I a precursor. What do I consider success in life? Having a good position? a high salary? or does it consist in doing or being something else, for example, putting oneself at the service of others for the sake of Christ?

★ We are all precursors: our families, our communities, our institutions... Are they places where one can encounter the Lord through us, the faithful, who compose, organise and direct them? Groups of people, also, speak a language. What message does the group for which I am responsible or of which I form part, have for young people?

Our Prayer?

★ First of all we must ask the Lord of the harvest to send labourers into His harvest.

★ Secondly, we must offer ourselves as workers in the apostolate of vocations among the young people confided to our care.

★ We must seek the grace of conversion in order to become authentic messangers of God's call.

★ We must realise what that implies for us. We must begin now!

DE LA SALLE TODAY IN UPPER VOLTA

I - TO SERVE YOUTH, AND WHICH YOUTHS?

The facts: on 6 July 1983:

— 20,000 boys and girls who completed primary school passed the competitive exam for admission to secondary school.

— The Ministry will admit... 2,000 of them; and the 18,000 others?...

— And all those who have never attended school: 85% of the children under 15 years of age.

— And all those who will never enter secondary school...

Our responses:

These questions must always be present to those who work to educate the young people of Upper Volta...
These questions must influence our work and our commitments.
These questions must be faced continually.
But these questions must stimulate and challenge us:

— Only a minority attends school...
— Only a minority succeeds in school...
— The school must not be allowed to function as in an established society.
— The school must become part of another world...

What do Upper Volta and its youth need for tomorrow?
However, the classes are full: 45 or 50 students, at times even 100 in an elementary class...
However, the educational system is very costly...
What shall we do when everything is so urgent: health care, education, water, food, and announcing the Gospel...

Brothers of the Christian Schools, we try to respond to one need among others: the Christian education of adolescents in primary and secondary schools.

We do not forget the others, all the rest, but this is the work to which we are called and sent, with our limits our deficiencies, our errors...

our Faith and our Zeal... and also with the appeals and the image of the youth of this country, with the hopes of a very young Church...

Because here as elsewhere, the young people demand from their elders that, without reservations, they help them to develop and to become men and women such as are needed by their country and by the Church.

Because everywhere the Good News of Salvation must be heard, among farmers as among the unemployed, as well as among young people and students.

Because 300 years of experience in the education of youth gives us a certain expertise in this area.

II - LOOK AT ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

Seventeenth century France was 80% rural, but John Baptist de La Salle established his communities in the cities. He did not hesitate to choose.

He wrote La Civilité Chrétienne for poor students.

He made the son of the inkeeper and the son of the water carrier live together. The school was open to all because the salvation of God is for all.

Generally, he worked within the school system which already existed:

— but he radically changed the programs and the methods,

— but he went beyond the rudiments because he wanted to be helpful to the young in their world and in the one in the process of developing,

— but he consecrated himself entirely to this task, he and his Brothers.

III - COMPONENTS OF A PRAYER SERVICE

You call us

You call us to love you by loving the world to which you send us.
O faithful God, grant us, that in loving the world, to love only you.
Go on your way, proclaiming my Gospel.
Go despoiled of everything, sharing your joy.
Make yourself worthy of love, of peace and of tenderness
Have the heart of a child, be simple and true.
So as to be my witnesses, watch in prayer
My kingdom is within you, it seeks your heart.
The Spirit will lead you in new ways
Go, fear not, I remain with you.

If you know how to see the earth

If you know how to see the earth, you will see the presence of God
If you know how to see your Brothers, you will see the face of God.
Look at this poor man, in his pain he calls to you
You will see the presence of God,
And receiving him into your comfortable house
You will see the face of God.
Look at those eyes enlightened by a beautiful love
You will see the presence of God
In their smile and their sweet light
You will see the face of God.
Look at these men with great hearts
You will see the presence of God
If you know how to fill them with hope
You will see the face of God.

Questions

— What is the role of the local Church in the field of Christian education?
— Who chooses individuals for this work and on the basis of what criteria?
— To what extent do the parents, the youths, the laity, the Christian Community participate in this educational activity?
— To what extent is it identified with the country?
— How can the Brothers' schools be schools for pedagogical, spiritual, cultural, evangelical renewal...?

IV - WHAT THE CHURCH OF UPPER VOLTA SAYS

Letter of the African Priests to Educators (12 August 1974)

"they threaten to close the schools. Ask yourself if there is still an opportunity to teach rather than to dig wells. In brief, to close or to continue, to educate men or to feed them?

There are so many real questions which are so visible in the right eye and the left eye of the poor that we must consider them.

That is why we come to you who have consecrated yourselves with devotion and competence to this work. And going beyond you, as individuals and as teams, we address ourselves to your superiors and to all individuals in the diocese and elsewhere — as far as our fraternity can reach — to plead the cause of a promising future for youths with a Christian spirit who are prepared to reconcile the faith and their African culture.

This future depends above all on your understanding and our collaboration, but more immediately it depends on the humble and persevering devotion of innumerable teachers who accept their vocation as educators.

V - ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTION OF OUR EDUCATION

1) In our country the Church is present in the midst of an illiterate population, and she cannot forget that the lack of instruction is one of the unnamed miseries in the world today.

2) The basic problem is to give these youths an ideal, and the ideal assumes a concrete form in the harmonious and lived relation between faith and culture.

"The Diocesan Community must state clearly that it considers the tasks and the mission of teaching one of the highest priorities of evangelization."

EVANGELISING A WORLD IN A STATE OF CRISIS

PRESENT EXPERIENCE

We are witnessing bewildering changes in our society in the matter of standards and values (keeping in mind particular situations in different countries).

This quickening rhythm is accompanied by connotations which demand from the believer serious reflection on the foundations of his faith. In effect, a naive or triumphalist attitude, lacking a critical sense is of no value. On the other hand, we cannot remain disorientated or resigned to accepting a state of discouragement and nostalgia for the past.

WARNING BY THE CHURCH

"The Church has recognised that a wide gap has opened between herself and modern culture. The enormous variety of cultures, customs and traditions throws down a challenge that, at first sight, might appear to be above our strength... The modern world feels fascinated by its conquests. Too often it accepts ideologies, standards of morality and behaviour which are in contradiction with those of the Church or, at best, it quietly ignores Christian values." (John Paul II: Address to the Pontifical for Culture)

FROM DE LA SALLE TOWARDS A MORE CHRISTIAN WORLD

"The Brothers, as members of the Church, live in this world and are necessarily sensitive to the problems which arise in each successive period of human history." (Declaration 8,1)

A world marked by the greatness of man and by his technical and economic progress.

A world become more and more secular in the continuing process of desacralisation.

A world where life, liberty and human dignity are more and more threatened.

A world where God is missing or rejected. (Declaration 11,2-3) These needs are not less urgent than they were at the time of the foundation of the Institute. (Declaration 23,2)

DE LA SALLE'S REQUIREMENTS: STANDARDS IN THE APOSTOLATE

De La Salle is a realist in his projects. He starts from the basis of faith which renders his zeal fruitful. (Declaration 47,2)

— He seeks a purpose in life (especially for the most deprived).

— His moral teaching is always based on the Gospel.

— His highest aspiration bears "the sign of the faith."

Based on these principles, the evangelising action of De La Salle and his disciples is the redeeming salvation of Jesus which becomes:

★ History because it enters the world through a preferential decision in favour of the poor.

★ Word of God, incarnate in the prophets, messengers of Christ.

★ Celebration in which we look forward to encountering the living Christ.

★ Community, where we feel responsible for one another because we love one another and share with one another. "In the Christian school the students experience true community." (Declaration 44,3)

AN URGENT APPEAL — BEYOND RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES — COMMUNITIES OF BROTHERS

The spirit of de La Salle cannot be confined to communities of Brothers. It must produce fruit among those who have been enriched by it.

STUDENTS - FORMER STUDENTS

"The Brothers will remember that, instead of doing everything themselves, they can involve their students and alumni in some of their educational and apostolic activities." (Declaration 52,4)

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

EDUCATIVE COMMUNITY

"Lay teachers make a unique contribution through their knowledge of the world, of family life and civic affairs." (Declaration 41,3).

TEACHERS

"Lay teachers should be completely involved with the whole life of the school: with catechesis, apostolic organisations, extra-curricular activities and administrative positions."

"In certain cases it may become necessary for the teachers to take charge of these leisure activities." (Declaration 46,3; 47,2)

PARENTS

"The Brothers work closely with parents, keeping in mind that they can learn much from parents as well as give them information." (Declaration 47,2)

"LAND OF OUR SWEAT" - EDUCATION, OUR SPECIFIC APOSTOLATE

"The end of this Institute is to give a Christian education to children: it is for this purpose the Brothers keep schools." (De La Salle: Rules, 1705)

PARENTS, TEACHERS, FRIENDS OF DE LA SALLE

Brothers; we exercise our apostolic mission by providing Christian education in schools. De La Salle wants us to live in the world, to interest ourselves in its needs and to share its preoccupations and hopes. By our formation and life style we invite people, especially the young, to live fully and joyfully their own lives. "Very conscious of the ways in which God speaks to the young to-day" we exercise our faith and find stimulus in our work. ("Very... to-day" Paul VI)

A PROPHET IN DIFFICULT TIMES

For our activity to be effective it must be based on present reality, accepted with love. This presupposes and demands:

Avoidance of prejudice:

God's salvation is for everybody. Respect reality. Do not distort it.

Commitment to the place where we live:

Organisations and structures: cultural, recreational, professional. Cultivate human relations — in families, at work, in political circles. Promote values supportive of human dignity: campaigns for supporting human dignity at school, parish, diocesan and international level etc.

Conformity with the faith we profess:

Autonomy of the individual conscience. Respect for those who live by another ideology. Encouragement for local forms of religious expression. Conformity of life with faith.

Professional Integrity:

Have a thorough knowledge of what we are doing. Be qualified for our professional task. Make our methods and procedures known. Become integrated in a conscientious and responsible laity.

POINTS FOR REFLECTION AND SUPPORT IN OUR APOSTOLATE

★ Luke: 1:21,24: The wisdom of the simple.

★ De La Salle: Called by the Church (Meditations: 199,1; 203,1; 198,3).

★ In my position I judge conflict situations from the view point of faith: their causes, their manifestations, their solutions.

MY SONG OF HOPE:

I shall rise every day
You, yourself will saturate the air with those droplets of hope That, sometime or other will bring back to me.
The little joys long forgotten

YOUTH AND THE WORLD OF WORK

"The renewal of the Christian school calls for relevance to contemporary culture... an openness to the life of the world..." A Declaration: The Brother in the world to-day.

"If the schools have any function, any justification, it is to prepare young people for the future. If it prepares them for the wrong future it cripples them" — Alvin Toffler in "The School Administrator," April 1983.

"...John Dewey... had seen the division of education into vocational training and the academic curriculum as reflecting the division of labour inherent in a class-divided society." H. Svi Shapiro, in Harvard Educational Review, August, 1980.

Among other goals a good school will seek to prepare its students for the future, preparing them to some extent for earning their living and for life in a world which by high technology is undergoing a revolution at least comparable to those effected by the end of feudalism and by the flowering of the industrial revolution. In this paper we shall consider chiefly the first of these goals, what, broadly speaking, might be called vocational education, but we shall not be able to evade completely the impact of the second. For the present purpose the words school, schooling and education will be used interchangeably. The importance of the Christian religious element in education is presumed.

There is a very large body of information on vocational counseling and training in the US. The current volume of Books in Print lists nearly 1,000 titles. The January, 1983, catalogue of the Educational Research Information Clearing House (ERIC) carries abstracts of about 400 studies by state and federal departments, universities and private agencies. The Education Index lists almost 700 articles on vocational training and counseling published in professional journals in 1982. The latest catalogue of the US Government Printing Office has over 400 government publications in these fields, from pamphlets of a few pages to thoroughly researched volumes.

In all this there are extensive accounts of everything needed to pursue any profession, career, trade, job opportunity, requirements, preparation. There are guidelines for starting a small business and for running a family farm. There are studies of priorities in inner city vocational education, of federal subsidies for medical training and for training teachers of agriculture in Iowa. There are evaluations of courses and opportunities for computer programmers, dentists, and electricians. In short, there is a vast store of information of value to students, parents, counselors and educational planners on vocational training and preparation for the world of work.

Traditionally the secondary high school in the United States has sought to ready students for the future by providing college preparatory programs in the same institution with business and commercial curricula. In fact, the earliest of the Christian Brothers' schools, working in large cities with the sons of immigrants and the poor, were exemplars of this model. The theory is obvious: that this is a sound and relatively inexpensive way to provide for different levels of ability and different careers in an ambiance conducive to social unity. The larger public systems also included specialised vocational and trade schools at both the secondary and junior college level. Various industries in a given area conduct job training, and specialised trade schools are operated by private enterprise often at fairly high tuitions.

From this plethora of information and from generations of experience with this variety of schools two sets of goals for life/work planning have emerged. One stresses job performance: competence, good work habits ability to accept correction and follow directions, loyalty to the employer, minimal academic skills. The second set is quite different. It includes fairly high levels of literacy, by which is meant ability to read and interpret fairly complex sets of directions and to listen with comprehension; a good level of math skills and ability to develop them; capacity for decision making and sound judgment.

About 25 years ago, dissatisfied with what he saw as an inadequate attempt to achieve these two goals and to do so in an atmosphere conducive to both overall excellence and a democratic society, James Conant proposed the "comprehensive" school. Eliminating small academies and separated trade schools, this was to be a large institution combining the best of academic, business and trade courses. Students of all levels of ability and career orientation mingled freely, and were assigned indiscriminately to certain programs. Other programs challenged the brightest, and still others provided preparation for careers in business and trade, even for the least gifted. In an atmosphere of equality and multiple opportunity everyone would be prepared for a satisfying and useful life.

The practical approach taken by individual institutions in preparing students for the transition into the world of work has depended on local conditions, the needs of the community which the school serves, and the resources available. Models and ideas developed elsewhere have their value, but the actual implementation must be determined by a proper assessment of local conditions.

Achieving this twofold goal presents a special challenge to the American Catholic schools with their limited resources. The goals must be integrated. Where only the first is pursued vocational education becomes liable to the Dewey/Shapiro charge cited at the beginning, that its real purpose is to stratify social class and create a docile workforce for industry. But where the second is properly implemented, for example, by routine use of I:Q. and mere ability testing, the slow learner is not seen as a putative late bloomer, and the school becomes another unwitting agent for stratification of social class. A good education will prepare students to earn a living but not by teaching them a job while in the common school. Respect for persons, an essential characteristic of the Christian school, demands of a system of education which, while recognising that individual differences must also mean recognising limitations, still strives to provide the fullest opportunity for all levels of ability.

The Constant study in the late 50's had made the large comprehensive high school, with its great mix of the academic, the commercial, the technical curricula, the ideal, but student motivation for academic excellence never fully materialised and many bright students were satisfied with a minimum of challenge, and filled their schedules with entertaining easy electives.

Those who began vocational, non-college programs changed their minds as graduation and the world of work approached. The 60's and 70's brought education for self-fulfilment and both college preparatory and vocational preparation work suffered. Nowadays the misguided look to the computer and high technology as an easy solution to problems of life and career planning.

The result has been confusion and mediocrity at all levels of education for no norm has been discernible. A "dis-learning society" has emerged documented in the recently released report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, entitled "A Nation at Risk."

> "...educational reform should focus on the goal of creating a learning society. At the heart of such a society is the commitment to a set of values and to a system of education that offers each member the opportunity to stretch one's mind to its full capacity from early childhood through adulthood, learning more as the world changes."

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

In other words, the school must prepare the student for life in which a simple "how to do it" training will not suffice. No matter what shape education will take, the future and the world of work will belong to those with a very different kind of preparation.

Anticipating the Report and its findings by two years, the distinguished American educator and philosopher, Mortimer Adler, saw the cause in an inappropriate attention to the first of the goals we have considered: preparing for jobs at the level of the secondary school. Specialisation, (at so early an age) he says "is the disease of modern society." He then offered his solution, called the Paidea Proposal, which seems an adaptation of the medieval trivium and quadrivium. He divides all education into three programs: acquisition of organised knowledge, development of intellectual and learning skills and the improved understanding of ideals and values. All students would follow the same program, though provision for different ability levels would be made. All students would take physical education. There would be no trade schools as such, but students would be expected to master certain manual skills: cooking, sewing, carpentry, and have work experience.

Whatever the structure of the educational system needed now, no school which calls itself Christian can function as though we still live in the old world. Teachers and programs must help students look at their futures in a realistic way, in terms of the sort of reality which to-day's world of work has created. A whole, Christian view of each student as a person in the modern world demands this:

> "The Christian school endeavours through its program of instruction to prepare its students for their professional life, for marriage and its responsibilities, for service to society and the Church. It makes known to them the great needs and aspirations of modern man. It encourages them to be competent in to-day's world..." (Declaration 47,2)

The suggestions are given only to provide foci around which discussion might be planned. There is no prioritization, no sequence and these questions, topics and activities should be adapted to local use. They do assume some preparation for any discussion.

1 - Prepare a list of what graduates of this school are doing since they received their diplomas 5, 15, 25 years ago.
Why do we not know more about our alumni?
What do they say about how this school prepared them for life and work?

2 - Tell the story of your own search for a job, a career, a profession. What helped you most?

3 - Which passage in the accompanying paper do you agree with most strongly? Why? Which do you oppose and why?

4 - How many of the current student body are working after school? In what jobs? What is the average earning? How are they using this income: current tuition? for college? for family or self support? Savings? Entertainment? Auto? Other?

5 - Does the school have any contact or cooperation with industry for job training, career counseling, etc.?

6 - Organize a "Career Day" featuring exhibits, talks, interviews with representatives of local business and industries. For students and parents (and teachers!).

7 - Evaluate publications for career counseling available in the library and in the counselors' offices.

8 - List the job-training programs and technical schools of this region, e.g., in junior college, and private schools, or industry-related. What evaluation is available on the quality and reliability of each?

9 - List the job-finding and counseling services available in the area. How reliable are they?

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

10 - How does this school foster decision-making skills? Foster judgment & critical thinking?

11 - What non-academic manual skills can be learned in this school?

12 - Discuss the Peidea Proposal of Mortimer Adler. There is a brief, excellent summary prepared by Adler himself in the July 1982 issue of "The National School Board Journal."

13 - Do academic and early vocational specializations, early separation by ability (de facto if not de jure), the proliferation of electives and less demanding academic programs, etc. impede or stimulate the growth of the learning society? Do they foster or promote equality or class structure, or are they in fact indifferent?

14 - Mortimer Adler says that the twentieth century has contributed the concept of "the equality of man universally" to his original list of great ideas. Do you agree?

15 - Discuss this proposition: "A good education prepares students to earn a living but not by teaching them a job while in the common school."

LEARN TO LOOK AT REALITY
EXAMINE WHAT IS SAID
LISTEN TO WHAT IS NOT SAID

It all began because St. John Baptist de La Salle and his first Brothers were able to see all around them the real misery of youth.

Everything: their personal vocation, their creations.

The following paragraphs tell how, in our own day, a community of Brothers (at Garges in a Paris suburb) observed the young people who lived near them and how they reacted:

TO SEE THE HIDDEN DISTRESS AND HEAR THE SILENT APPEAL

There is no need to travel thousands of miles in our affluent society — over equipped and over informed — yet adept at hiding its misery — in order to find spiritual loneliness, cultural deprivation and religious confusion.

"In our town of 40.000 inhabitants there are more and more abused and battered children. Tragedies due to unemployment and alcohol. It is often urgently necessary to place families in care for short periods so that the children can breathe and sleep peacefully free from fear and without having to separate father and mother in the middle of the night. Can you do anything about it?

(Statement of a social worker dealing with family allowances)

Children, young people disillusioned with life, who have seen too much...

Refugees, deportees, what can we offer them so that their lives be not passed in a state of misery and apprehension.

"Look...

In this area there are more than forty of us who know nothing and can neither read nor write. Something must be done. We can't go on like this. It's not just...
We don't want to go to school... Get us a school...

(Youths aged 12 to 15)

What kind of school do they need?
What kind of teaching? For what kind of men and women of the future?

"You know we attended a Technical High School. From the age of 17 we gradually became drug addicts.
Why? What happened? Tell us what's wrong with us. How do we get out of this mess? Our ties are broken... We don't want to work. What have we got to live for?"

(Young people aged 22-23)

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Shipwrecks from elsewhere...
How can we be with them, close and discreet, in order to be, at the right moment, that attentive ear which catches the cry for help.

"Brother, in this area there are little gypsies who want to go to school. Our public school made a great effort to help but it quickly came to nothing because the local authorities chased them from the site. Our structures are too rigid. Could you do something for them?"
(Departmental Inspector of Education)

Tracked down, chased away. They're different. Aren't they...
How do you provide them with the means of expressing their difference and thus enriching our common heritage...

"Since I came to this school my father listens to me and takes an interest in me"
(A boy of 14 years)

"Oh, you know a child is like a puppy. He just grows"
(Father aged 40 years)

"Tell us what goes on in a child's head. My baby does things with his hands and feet and I don't know why."
(Young mother aged 15)

Parents are confused, crushed by life, helpless in the presence of their children.
How do you get them to take heart again and come alive.

TO LISTEN ATTENTIVELY TO THE HEARTS OF MEN
TO GET INVOLVED IN THEIR CARES DEMANDS GREAT INTERIOR SILENCE...

* to listen to all the noises arising from modern planning and hear behind its clanging and rationalisations the strangled cry of those who can no longer speak;
* to let pass again through our minds and hearts the little acts, the little things seen and heard and felt and then forgotten which — in the long run — are going to become the flesh and blood of our own conversion.

SUGGESTIONS:

* to each one of us individually: take time to observe young people and question those who know them.
* to our communities and lasallian groups: take as your objective to get to know a group of young people in an area, in a street, in a parish, in their families... then draw up a viable plan of action or take part in a community service already in operation.

CHRIST'S CHALLENGING CHOICE

The poor, the despised of this world, the troublesome, those on the fringe of society, the sick, the handicapped, the victims of segregation — one is almost led to believe that the Gospel is for them alone.

1. THE LIFE OF JESUS

To start with, His parents are poor, unknown, from a forgotten village. He is born in poverty and because of this He endures all the disadvantages of the poor.

From infancy He experiences emigration — the curse of our time — and He experiences it again at the age of seven. During His public life He has nowhere to lay His head.

Occasionally, He has nothing to eat: He has to "steal" ears of wheat or find fish by a miracle.

He dies, nailed to a cross, despised, outcast, without a supporter.

He hasn't even a tomb of His own to receive His mortal remains.

2. HIS DOCTRINE

His beatitudes are not exactly for the rich and powerful: they talk of the poor, of those persecuted for justice sake, of those who mourn...

He does not choose His disciples from among the rich and powerful. He tells them to carry nothing with them, not even a scrip nor a spare tunic.

As for us, Christians, who are His disciples, He wants us to be detached and free as the lilies of the field (who do not spin to make clothes) and as the birds of the air who do not store up provisions...

He tells us clearly, "Do not store up treasures for the moths to destroy."

"Give and it shall be given you."

He utters terrible reproaches and maledictions against the rich and powerful of the world, against those who use "religion" to live in comfort.

He will judge us on our generosity, on our love — a love which is effective — "I was hungry... I was naked..."

3. HIS PARABLES

The Lost Sheep — we must leave all to find it.
The Rich Man and Lazarus.
The Prodigal Son — the wastrel who wants to leave home.
The Good Samaritan...

4. HIS ACTIONS

★ All His miracles are worked in response to needs, to difficulties, to sickness, to the misfortunes which befall people. One could say that He suffered constantly from seeing others suffer.

★ He defends the woman taken in adultery when they wanted to stone her.

★ He heals lepers and paralytics...

★ He helps the paralytic who hasn't the strength to get to the pool.

★ He shows a special predeliction for the blind.

★ He frees those possessed by the devil.

★ He has pity on the crowd who followed Him and have nothing to eat. He multiplies the loaves.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

I have quoted only a few examples. One could find many more in the Gospel.
From all this the conclusion is clear:

★ A marked preference for those on the fringe of society.

★ Denunciation of injustice and struggle against it.

★ Dignity of the person, of the individual — before property, honours.

★ The law must be made to serve the person.

★ Greed, riches etc. make it difficult for the Christian to enter the kingdom.

★ We shall be judged solely on our relations with others — with the unfortunate.

★ Can one be a Christian without sharing, without loving those in need — even to the ultimate consequences?

5. A TESTIMONY

The Lord, who has this disconcerting preference, often enlightens, through His Spirit, the marginalised, the forgotten, the oppressed.

The light comes slowly, as if by stealth, and young people, who have no education and who are totally oppressed, gradually come to know Life and express it joyfully in their own way.

I quote from a letter received from Teodoro a few days ago.

Teodoro is twenty years of age. He has already done two years of an eight year sentence in a very tough prison. He was sent to gaol at the age of eighteen for carrying arms and using threats — all under the influence of drugs — Here is what he says. You may interpret it as you wish:

"The Word of God is very beautiful but It is also a two edged sword which penetrates the heart and leaves it bare.

To begin with, I want to tell you that I have found God in prison. There is no doubt but that 90% of people have a wrong idea of Him. Life has taught me that one is punished in the same way he made others suffer. The person who has been unjust is punished by life to make him realise that injustice is not the road to follow. The person who does wrong and knows it ends by having to pay for his wrongdoing, and how!

Even in prison, the man who takes delight in exploiting the weak, robbing his fellow prisoners while threatening them with a knife, bullying others because his heart is filled with pride, is hated by the other prisoners.

O.K. One day he runs across someone stronger than himself, who gives him what he deserves and makes him pay for all the evil and injustice he has committed. He ends up in the most humiliating condition on earth — conquered, beaten, and what is worse, despised for his cowardice.

A man worthy of the name, a human being, does not exploit the weak or rob his fellows. He respects his neighbours as he wants them to respect him. He treats his companions as he wishes to be treated. He despises hypocrisy and injustice...

As for myself, I neither believe nor disbelieve as yet. I feel great respect for Holy Scripture. There is no doubt but that the message it contains is the truth. Christ, too, had a wonderful message but they killed Him because He spoke the Truth and Truth is Love. With love there are no wars; there is justice and goodness instead of wickedness; understanding instead of jealousy. Yes, it's true that love is peace...

Life is very different from that, it's quite the opposite. And from all the ruin, misery, suffering, and sorrow that one sees I have come to the conclusion that life is a school which helps to perfect man because man will never be perfect until he learns to know evil.

I feel certain, not because of my own ideals, but rather because of the Scriptures that "God is eternally good and just." For that reason as I understand it, I firmly believe that there is no eternal fire because God could not be as cruel as man... It could be that man judges himself. Can you image anyone as severe as oneself in judging his actions?

I know that what is more important is to be rich in spirit rather than in material goods... To be rich in spirit is to be in possession of the whole world. He who is rich in worldly goods and poor in spirit is like a tiny atom in the midst of the universe.

NOTES

★ Teodoro has little education. He spent a few years in primary school.

★ He wrote the above in his prison cell. He reads, writes and thinks though he can only send one letter a week, alternately to his mother and to the Brother who befriended him.

★ I think his testimony should make us all think, whoever we are.

THE PLACE OF THE CHRISTIAN TEACHER
(Reflections of a lay teacher working with the Brothers)

★ WHAT DO WE WANT TO DO?

As a Christian teacher — man or woman — working in a school under the patronage of St. John Baptist de La Salle or as an employee in the same school, I find myself faced with three problems:

1) I love my pupils and apply myself to my work to the best of my ability but what can I do to be more responsive to the young, especially those who are in trouble (scholastic failure — family difficulties).
In other words: how to be a true educator?

2) I teach one or several subjects as well as doing some secretarial work and looking after maintenance etc. I do this wholeheartedly but am aware that I must do more to help young people to find Christ.
In other words: become an apostle in my school.

3) I mix every day with the Brothers of the Community or if they are not there I meet them frequently. But, in spite of all this I feel so different from them.
In other words: how, in my situation, can I get into communication with the Brothers and live according to the spirit that animates them?

★ WHO ARE WE?

The three problems outlined above can be reduced to one and the same question: What is the place of the Christian teacher in the school?
Let's hear three statements which are also answers:

ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

"You are engaged in a ministry wherein you have to touch hearts. But you cannot possibly do this without the assistance of the Holy Spirit. Beseech God to confer on you to-day the same grace He gave the Apostles, so that after filling you with His Spirit for your sanctification, He may confer it on you for the salvation of others." (Meditations 43,3).

POPE JOHN PAUL II
(a friend of the lasallian family)

"Be faithful to the charism of your Institute. Be faithful to your original vocation as "apostles of the school." A really arduous vocation, which involves renunciation and sacrifice, total dedication to the mission of education, inexhaustible confidence in the young and great love of the Lord, nourished by assiduous prayer because only God can give growth." (Message to the lasallian family, 1982)

JEAN GUITTON: Another friend of the Brothers

"The teacher is a prophet who should inspire prophets: The prophet is one who continues Christ, in so far as Christ was a traveller, speaking to each individual and awakening in him or her the sense of being and the sense of God." (Conference at Passy-Buzenval, May, 1965)
"Obligation to touch hearts," but it can only be done by the Spirit of God.
"A great love for God, nourished by assiduous prayer."
"Only God gives growth."
"To be a prophet and inspire prophets."
Our horizon begins to light up, doesn't it?

★ WELL THEN?

Let's look again at the questions asked at the beginning: Basically the first question asks that I have the spirit of faith (availability, attention to others, to the action of God in my life).

The second question: "the spirit of zeal" (be aware the God calls me to collaborate in His plan of salvation, in my own small way).

The third question: "the spirit of love." (Give God an important place in my life: have a sense of community and brotherhood).

The spirit of faith, the spirit of zeal and the spirit of love are the three great characteristics of lasallian spirituality.

★ WHAT SHOULD WE DO? SIX PROPOSALS FOR ACTION

1) Become a man (or woman) of prayer, possessed by the Holy Spirit (a time set apart each day for prayer and meditation... a short annual retreat). My relations with others will quickly change.

2) Become gentle, affable to all, discreet and respectful to others. Blain, biographer of St. John Baptist de La Salle, notes that the young seminarist was an example of virtue in the seminary of Saint Sulpice but that his teachers did not realise it to later on: true virtue is discreet, unrecognised, perhaps despised.

3) Live as much as possible among the young: recreation and other activities...

4) Have a sense of togetherness, of community (educative community, various groups, movements, charitable activities...).

5) Nourish myself regularly from the Gospels for: "We have one master, Jesus Christ."

6) Examine often, alone or with a spiritual director, how God guides my life, what signs He gives me (chance meetings, failures). God will make known to me whether He wants me to take a position of responsibility in the school or whether He wants me to work in anonymous obscurity.

★ HOW FAR SHOULD I GO?

At one time or another I must consider the question of my station in life:

★ If I am single, does God want me to consider the religious life — Brother, Sister, priest? I must give the question serious consideration and the Holy Spirit will enable me to say yes or no.

★ If I am married and committed for life does the Lord want me to join the hundreds of Signum Fidei who, throughout the world, try to live the spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

★ PRAYERS

Here are two prayers which will help each one whether in the context of private meditation or while taking part in public celebrations.

"Oh God, who conducts all things with wisdom and gentleness and who does not force the will of man, wanting me to dedicate myself totally to the care of schools You led me imperceptibly from one undertaking to another without my having foreseen it from the beginning." (St. John Baptist de La Salle)

"Oh God, Trinity whom I adore, help me to forget myself completely so as to rest in You, calm and peaceful as if my soul were already in eternity! Let nothing trouble my peace nor cause me to depart from You. Oh my unchanging God, let each moment carry me farther into the depths of your Mystery. Set my soul at rest and make it your heaven, your beloved home and the place of your rest. Let me never leave You alone there, but let me be entirely present there in living faith and adoration, completely submissive to your creative action." (Sister Elizabeth of the Trinity)

INTEGRATION OF THE CHRISTIAN TEACHER IN THE EDUCATIVE COMMUNITY

1) A Brazilian experiment

Up to thirty or forty years ago the schools were, from the point of view of technique and educational methods, run by the Brothers. Lay teachers were the exception. But times have changed. Establishments of from a thousand to four thousand students are in the charge of a religious community of few members, assisted by scores of lay teachers and other educators. These people are professionally qualified but do not necessarily know the spirituality and educational methods of de La Salle.

Faced with this reality, Brother Visitor of Sao Paulo began, in 1982, to make contact with a small group of lay teachers in each school. He did this to satisfy a latent desire on the part of the teachers to gain a better knowledge and understanding of lasallian spirituality and educational method.

He invited the teachers to come closer to the Brothers' spiritually so as to inspire in them enthusiasm for maintaining a Christian ethos in the school.

From this arose the Lasallian Teachers' Groups — an attempt to initiate collaborators of the Brothers into the same spirituality and educational methods in order to continue the educative work of the Brothers.

To attain this objective, each "Lasallian Teachers' Group" meets, under the direction of the Brothers' community, once a fortnight for prayer, study and reflection. All the groups of a province come together for an annual retreat.

2) Community spirit

The great values of the lasallian educative system are the spirit of faith, the spirit of zeal and the spirit of community.

In 1680, on the feast of St. John the Baptist, de La Salle took the first masters into his own house for meals during which they read while he commented and explained. He succeeded, also, in introducing them to daily prayer and morning meditation.

A year later he decided to lodge them in his own house despite the objections of his family. On 24 June, 1682, he went to live with the schoolmasters in a rented house in the rue Neuve. All this helped in the formation of the new masters and ensured that the schools would be maintained by an incipient community.

The primary importance that the Founder attached to community is expressed in the passage of the first Rules which reads: "In this Institute the members will always show and maintain a true community spirit."

3) Origin of community

"Every human community is in origin divine and by nature spiritual because we are all children of the same Father. God wills that men should form one family and should treat one another as brothers..." (G.S. 24,1). "God chooses men, not only as individuals, but also as members of a definite community." (Id. 32)

Very opportunely the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education affirms that, "All the work of a Catholic educator takes place within a structure — the educative community — which is composed of all categories of people — pupils, parents, teachers, administrators and non-teaching staff — who have mutual relations of collaboration and who give to the school its character as an institution for complete formation..."

"Thus the educative community is, in its turn, a school forming part of greater social communities and when that educative community is truly Christian at the same time — as the educative community of the Catholic school is called to be — then it is the milieu where the educator has the greatest opportunity for teaching the pupil to experience practically what it is to be a member of the great community which is the Church." (The Catholic Teacher, Witness to the Faith in the Church, No. 22)

Two questions for consideration

★ What more could I do to promote union and participation in the educative community of which I am part?

★ Is it possible to form, where I am, at present, an educative group with the aim of deepening knowledge and experience of lasallian spirituality?

TESTIMONY

Personal witness

In his writings St. John Baptist de La Salle insisted on the importance of personal witness which should precede the verbal message of the Gospel. "If you want the instructions you give to those you have to teach to be profitable and to lead to the practice of virtue, you must be careful to practice, yourself, what you preach. You should be filled with zeal in order to communicate the graces which are in you to your pupils and thus animate them to what is good and in order to draw down God's Holy Spirit upon you, the more easily to urge them forward." (Meditations 194,3)

In his meditation for the feast of the apostle, St. Thomas, de La Salle writes, "You have the happiness to read the Gospel and meditate upon it every day and are entrusted with teaching it to others. Show that you really believe in the maxims of the Gospel by making your actions conform to these maxims and by putting them in practice." (Meditations 84,1)

The Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education

The recent document of the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education, "Lay Catholics in School — Witnesses to Faith," published on the feast of St. Teresa, 15 October, 1982, has this to say:

> "Conduct is always much more important than speech; this fact becomes especially important in the formation period of students. The more completely an educator can give concrete witness to the model of the ideal person that is being presented to the students the more this ideal will be believed and imitated. For it will then be seen as something reasonable and worthy of being lived, something concrete and realizable. It is in this context that the faith witness of the lay teacher becomes especially important. Students should see in their teachers the Christian attitude and behaviour that is often so conspicuously absent from the secular atmosphere in which they live. Without this witness, living in such an atmosphere, they may begin to regard Christian behaviour as an impossible ideal. It must never be forgotten that in the crises 'which have their greatest effect on the younger generations,' the most important element in the educational endeavour is 'always the individual person: the person and the moral dignity of the person which is the result of his or her principles, and the conformity of actions with those principles'." (Cf. "Lay Catholics in Schools — Witnesses to Faith," No. 32 which quotes John Paul II: Address to UNESCO, 2 June, 1980)

SUGGESTIONS

★ Discuss the above passages in a group.

★ How can the Christian educator use the matter he teaches in order to witness to the Faith?

A PRAYER

"God our Father, who sent your Holy Spirit to the Apostolic College so that by His movement they might renew the face of the earth, send us your Spirit, also, that our lives may respond to your plan of salvation for us and for our society."

ASSOCIATION TO-DAY

It was three hundred years ago and it's a very nice story!... No! It's to-day and right where I'm living!

By comparison with the rest of the world, the young people of my country are by no means the most deprived but they do not know how to find happiness. Who is going to help them find the liberating message of Jesus Christ? The Brothers' Institute is responsive to this situation. As the number of religious is insufficient to provide solutions to all the problems posed the Institute is constantly searching for new solutions.

Instead of withdrawing fearfully into itself and thinking nostalgically of the past it is looking objectively at the situation and investing in the future. It can no longer fulfil its mission by itself. What of it! Like John Baptist de La Salle it is content to work with those who come to it.

Lay collaborators want to become progressively involved in the lasallian project. The Institute welcomes this desire and works with them. The Brothers Visitors' conference has said so publicly.

Together and by association, Brothers and lay teachers accept their differences, share their respective riches and try to find new forms of living together. Thus, for the past several years we find joint teams of Brothers and laymen forming school administrations where responsibility sharing is effective. Educational establishments run by laymen voluntarily maintain relations with the Institute. Brothers Visitors in all the French districts meet regularly and for long periods with lay principals and take part in faculty discussions. The members challenge the Institute as to its objectives in order to know what position they could agree to accept in its structures.

Lasallian establishments under lay administration are visited by joint teams of Brothers and laymen. As these visits are carried out in a spirit of real fraternity the experience has proved extremely beneficial to both visitors and visited.

Finally, week-ends of reflection, formation and sharing are organised for the human and spiritual satisfaction of both Brothers and laymen. The latter are often accompanied by their wives.

"TOGETHER AND BY ASSOCIATION"

Here is the testimony of the lay Principal of a Technical High School where a community of Brothers also works.

BEAUVAIS, 1980: Five hundred Brothers met on the occasion of the commemoration of the third centenary.

At the close of this special event at which I had the good fortune to be present Brother Jacques d'Huiteau drew this conclusion which attracted my attention on re-reading the report of the meeting: "I believe the Institute has re-lived the experience of Sarah. She laughed when the angel told her she would become a mother. You could laugh, or sneer, on seeing the average age of the Brothers. Nevertheless, at no time did I feel nostalgia for the glorious past nor fear of the uncertain future. Those who were present were living fully in the present... Sarah has given birth!..."

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

It is my profound conviction at this moment that the Brothers' Institute is living fully in the present and that it shows by its actions that it has no fear of the future.

A layman, married and with two children, I have been, for the past ten years, head of a Technical High School which has been in the charge of the Brothers since 1941. I am convinced that John Baptist de La Salle created, three centuries ago, a cell in the Church which has not ceased to grow and regenerate itself. That basic cell is the spirit of association.

ASSOCIATION DESIRED BY DE LA SALLE

The lasting success of the work of De La Salle does not rest solely on that basic idea but it seems extremely important to me to examine, in our time, how the Brothers' Institute continues the work begun through its commitment to association.

John Baptist de La Salle appears to me, as I gradually get to know him, an extremely pragmatic man. All through his life he observed, he saw, he calculated, not grudgingly, but with a generous, courageous realism and then acted. Living in community must certainly have been, for a man who was essentially contemplative, a form of action. What else could he have done to solve the problems which confronted him? His action seems logical in the face of the diverse origins of the first schoolmasters and especially in view of the enormous difference in education which existed between the wealthy nobleman and those men of the people.

Only a common life shared at every moment of the day could provide mutual self-education. Besides, John Baptist de La Salle could only convince his schoolmasters by living with them, like them and for them. In so doing he followed the teaching method of Jesus Christ.

I like to think that this osmosis took place little by little. John Baptist de La Salle was no longer quite as he had been, he had become a little of them and entered the hearts of the men whom he was able to call Brothers.

TOWARDS THE FUTURE

Obviously this new form of association does not develop without some clashes and difficulties.

The situation is not idyllic, reactions and expectations of the various partners are sometimes, perhaps often, surprising; analyses of a situation are not always the same.

However, those who are experiencing these changes are decided to continue their experiments along these lines. Each one is aware that he must get accustomed to his partner and that requires a lot of time, patience and self-denial.

The Brothers' Institute, by agreeing to follow the road opened up by Vatican II, assumes the role of pioneer. There is no question of forming a third order but of finding a form of partnership between consecrated men and men living in the world which can offer a challenge to those who attend our schools.

The Brothers, by re-thinking the forms of their action and by agreeing to work through intermediaries, risk seeing, in a few years, the Institute in the forefront of the Church's educational apostolate, because the lasallian virtues are quite capable of filling the void that many teachers experience who want to carry out their work conscious of their responsibilities.

We are witnessing the birth of new cells in the Church.

Sarah has given birth!

"WHY STAND YOU THERE LOOKING UP TO HEAVEN?"

(Eleven celebrations for vocations) (1)

THEME: Masters and Apostles
To-day de La Salle is ourselves.

Text of de La Salle:

"This is also one of the essential qualities required of those who instruct others, for they must get to know their pupils and discern the manner in which to act towards them. Some require great mildness, while others need to be directed with firmness. Some require much patience; others need to be goaded on. It is necessary to punish and reprehend some, in order to correct their defects, whereas others need to be continually watched lest they should wander and perish. This varied conduct must depend on knowledge and discernment of character, and this grace you must beg of God most earnestly, as being one of the most essential for you in the direction of those over whom you have charge."

CREATION OF ATMOSPHERE

Has the Christian school a role in evangelisation?

That is a critical question which requires serious analysis and one we should often ask ourselves during our tricentenary celebrations in order to be able to give satisfactory answers to those who trust us, as well as to the frequent criticisms we receive.

All periods of history, which brought important changes in civilisation, knew similar crises. The solution lay, not in closing the school or abandoning it to its fate, but in renewing it. Continuing renewal, the constant law of all pedagogy, coincides with the need for continuing conversion in every Christian, apostolic community. What urges us to act in this sense is our quest for a true Christian identity.

John Paul II says, "The proper character and the basic raison d'être of the Catholic school is precisely the quality of religious education integrated in the general education of the pupils."

Hymn Themes
★ The song of Ruth
★ If the Lord is for us
★ Come, come follow me.

Gospel Text:

"Whoever welcomes in my name one such child as this welcomes Me." (Mt. 18,5)

★ "Que haceis mirando al cielo?" by Aingeru Castaños, F.S.C. Edic. S. Pio X. Madrid, 1982. This gives 11 Celebrations of the Word and each is a paraphrase of a Chapter of the Brothers' Rules. They pray and commemorate the Rules in as much as they propose a way of living and call for personal and community commitment. Written by Brothers these pages offer the Lasallian spirit to youth groups, teachers, men and women of the Signum Fidei movement. They deal with poverty, obedience, the spirit of faith, life of prayer, active apostolate, the community, teachers, apostles, religious consecration and fidelity.

To-day's Text:

"To-day de La Salle is ourselves, even if we find it difficult to believe. This challenge demands effort... because in the light of his teaching we have found to-day that the Christian school does not concern the teachers alone. It concerns us all. All of us support its walls and its roof. All of us maintain its enthusiasm and its ardour." (F. Gainza).

Has the Christian school a role in evangelisation?

Do not try to give easy, abstract, general answers. Each school is more or less capable of evangelisation to the extent that those in charge are able to animate it.

Our presence in any school, our presence and especially our action in the school should aim at giving a really satisfactory answer to the question. If that were not so the raison d'être of the Institute would be called in question and the heritage of St. John Baptist de La Salle would be no more than an historic memory.

May the constant meditation of the saint's message and the sincere request for his help bring us nearer to him and, by that very fact, bring us closer together while bringing our schools more into conformity with the model he put before us.

THE WORD OF GOD

Advice: The sacrifice of His life, which Jesus is about to offer, gives meaning to all prayer. The unity of all among themselves and with the Father is the fruit of the love which gives life in giving up its own life. The Father and Jesus are one because He did the will of the Father who lives in Him. "If we love one another God is in us."

a) Reading from the first letter of St. John, the apostle (4,11-16)

"Dear friends, if this is how God loved us, then we should love one another: no one has ever seen God, but if we love one another, God lives in union with us, and His love is made perfect in us.

We are sure that we live in union with God and that He lives in union with us, because He has given us His Spirit. And we have seen and tell others that the Father sent his Son to be the Savior of the world. If anyone declares that Jesus is the Son of God, he lives in union with God and God lives in union with him. And we, ourselves know and believe the love which God has for us."

Hymns for meditation (Themes)

★ The Spirit lives to set us free
★ All over the world the Spirit is moving ★ Alabaré ★ Glory, glory, Alleluia...

b) Reading from the holy Gospel according to St. John (17,11-19)

"I am no longer in the world, but they are in the world. Holy Father keep them safe by the power of your name, the name you gave me. I protected them and not one of them was lost, except the man who was bound to be lost — so that the scripture might come true. And now I am coming to you and I say these things in the world so that they might have my joy in their hearts in all its fulness. I gave them your message and the world hated them, because they do not belong to the world. I do not ask you to take them out of the world but I do ask you to keep them safe from the Evil One. Just as I do not belong to the world they do not belong to the world. Dedicate them to yourself by means of the truth."

Acclamation (Themes)

★ Jesus you are the Lord
★ All glory to you
★ How lovely on the mountains

REFLECTION (One of six given in the book)

Unpublished letter of St. John Baptist de La Salle

De La Salle's style in his letters is rather harsh, exigent and critical, like that of the prophets. He calls a spade a spade. He gives laconic answers to questions of conscience and administrative problems. Strict use of the rudder to keep on course.

"I see you doing ordinary things. Prepare yourself for the extraordinary. The Spirit will blow strongly. I allowed myself to be led. They all took me for a fool — my family, the archbishop, even that first handful of chance companions. One saw nothing at all. But the Spirit continued to blow powerfully. Up to the time of the heroic vow. With what joy! Eat the bread of charity but be in the breach. Without yielding to the pressure of hypocrites nor to be persecutions of the writing masters nor to the fatigue of travelling companions. Temper your soul for risks. The Lord's ways are not our ways. You must be a tracker dog. Dig among the garbage and the ruins till you find his traces. Open up paths. Beware of easy solutions.

The young are waiting for you. Look at the swarming mass of young people in town on a Sunday evening. They are as sheep without a shepherd. Lift up your eyes and see the fields ripe unto the harvest. How many good qualities, how many anxieties await the friendly hand of the harvester. You must find a way. Study will help you. But that is not enough. You should develop intuition, a taste for adventure, for risk, intelligent dedication to team work. Charismatic friends of the young."

Guide: COMMUNITY REVISION (The book contains 17)

★ Do we offer the young more active ways of participating in and expressing themselves than mere formal, silent presence in the councils of adults?

★ Do we allow the young to think about their future responsibilities social, civic and political. Do we ever reflect that by restraining them we leave them more vulnerable?

★ Do we not allow students to move from one class to the next without learning to be responsible, either as individuals or as a group?

★ Do we not place obstacles to their freedom by an excessive work load and obligatory activities, without the possibility of choice; by reserving information for the few and by not taking the young seriously?

★ Is the witness given by educators before the young an invitation to know the hope of liberation assured by faith in Jesus Christ? (Brother Aingeru Castaños - Editions San Pio X - Madrid)

INTRODUCTION

As a preface to this edition of LASALLIANA I wish to inform you that Brother Superior agreed to the request of the editorial committee and appointed Brother Léon Lauraire as its chairman. Brother Léon is in charge of the Education Office in the Generalate. In fact, the Education Office has widened its scope to become a secretariate for education and particularly for education in Lasallian inspiration.

Brother Léon Lauraire will continue in Rome, at international level, the work he was doing for the French Region. He will help Lasallian educators, both Brothers and lay teachers, to benefit from the sum total of tradition, experience and achievement which were bequeathed to us by the Founder and his successors. That is the purpose of the Lasallian leaflets and the reason why Brother Léon was given charge of their production.

I myself, had the pleasure of getting this publication under way and shall be glad to continue collaborating with the editorial committee.

Brother Patrice Marey, General Councillor

The second number of LASALLIANA has extended the scope of its articles and increased the number of its contributors. Their contributions witness to their sincere interest in the Institute and their willingness to share their thoughts and achievements.

These Lasallian leaflets are intended to be used as a subject for reflection and as aids in their work, by individuals and groups but their practical value will only become evident after several editions. At present they appear rather fragmentary and disjointed.

We are counting on our first readers to introduce them to others in order to increase their impact and spread their influence among educators and to increase the number of contributors.

Publication of the leaflets is in the hands of a group of Brothers in the Generalate. In addition to their regular duties they have generously agreed to help with the production of LASALLIANA. I have the pleasure of introducing to you the editorial committee:

- Brother Patrice Marey, General Councillor,
- Brother Manuel Olivé, Assessor of the Lasallian World Federation,
- Brothers Maurice Hermans and Jean Pungier of Lasallian Studies,
- Brother Edwin Bannon of the Archives Department,
- Brother Yves Mazé, Secretary to the Procurator General, translator and secretary to the editorial committee,
- Brother Léon Lauraire, Education Secretary.

All are happy to contribute, through LASALLIANA, to a better mutual understanding between the Brothers of the Institute and their lay colleagues, in their work and witness, as well as to bringing a more explicit Lasallian charism to their educational ministry.

In the first number of the new year, 1984, they wish to extend to their contributors and readers their fraternal good wishes, encouragement and thanks.

AN X-RAY PHOTOGRAPH OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

This paper will, like an X-Ray, show only a skeleton. It could be covered in flesh and blood and given a living soul by a reflective reading of good biographies and the Founder's own writings. The following may serve as a guide.

I. HIS LIFE

A. He prepares himself without knowing it: 1651-1678

1651-1661: Education at home: parents, grandparents.
1661-1669: "Bonorum Puerorum College": Latin, Greek, Rhetoric.
1662?: First Communion.
1662?: Confirmation.
1662: Clerical Tonsure. Rheims.
1667: He takes possession of his Canonicate.
1669-1678: Universities of Rheims and Paris. Philosophy and Theology.
1670-1672: Seminary of Saint Sulpice in Paris.
1672-1676: Guardian of Brothers and Sisters.
1672: Spiritual Direction by Nicolas Roland.
1672: Sub-deacon in Cambrai.
1676: Diaconate in Paris.
1678: B. Theology. Rheims.
1678: Ordination. Rheims.
(1680-1684: Guardian of Brothers and Sisters, second time).
(1680: Doctor in theology. Rheims).

He does not yet know exactly what his vocation will be as a priest. The thought that it could be the christian school was furthest from his mind.

"I had never thought of it before. Many of M. Roland's friends had tried to get me interested but it had never made any impression; and I had never had any thought of doing anything about it". (Blain I,169; Bernard 30).

B. A ninety degree turn: 1678-1682

1678: He interests himself in the Sisters of the Child Jesus.
1679: Meeting with Nyel. St. Maurice School.
1679: Meeting with Mme. Catherine Leleu. St. James' School.
1680: He brings the masters to live with him.
1681: He introduces them into his family life in his own home.
1682: He moves with them into a house in the Rue Neuve.
Thus starting a new community life.
Some people have doubts about the future.
"End 1682": He sees clearly that the christian school is his vocation.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

"After much prayer, after much consultation, it became clear towards the end of the year 1682 (he himself says so) that God was calling him to take care of the schools..." (Blain I,193; Bernard 49).

C. The foundations of God's work:

1682: The Brothers of the Christian Schools.
1683: He gives up his family.
1683: He reduces his priestly activities to a minimum (preaching, confessing, directing).
1683: He gives up his canonicate.
In favour of a priest who is not his brother.
1684: He gives up his personal fortune to the poor.
1682-1684: First foundations outside Rheims.
1684: He gives the Brothers a habit.
1686: They make the first vows of obedience.
1686: He consecrates the Institute to Our Lady of Joy in Liesse.
1686: He gives up his post as superior.
1688: He goes to Paris to give the Institute a character of universality.

Such are the essential and solid foundations but a stout building needs to be raised thereon.

"I always looked on my salvation and the establishment and government of our community as the work of God; that is why I leave everything in his care, to do only therein what is according to his orders; and I shall consult him often on all that I should do for the one or the other; I will often say to him these words of the prophet Habacuc: Domine, opus tuum." (Rules which I have imposed on myself, Blain II, 319).

D. Consolidation: 1688-1694

1689: "Decision to maintain completely the lay character of the Institute.
1689: He draws up the "Mémoire sur l'habit". Among other things he says: "Work in schools requires the entire man."
1691: Vaugirard. No more schools will be opened until the Institute has grown.
1691: Heroic vow of two Brothers.
1691: Long annual retreat.
1692: The novitiate is established.
1694: First Rules.
1694: General Chapter.
1694: First perpetual profession with 12 Brothers.
1694: New attempt to give the society a Superior General who is a Brother.

It could be said that the work was complete. If God decided that the Founder should vanish physically, the Institute was already constructed. If he survived, it was to enrich it...

"Most Holy Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, prostrate in profound respect before your infinite and adorable majesty I consecrate myself to you to procure your glory as far as I am able and you will require of me..." (Signed formula of his profession).

II. ASPECTS OF HIS PERSONALITY

A. SAINT: see his life sections B,C, and E.

B. FOUNDER: He opens Christian and free schools for the populace in 25 towns.

He writes: The Conduct of Schools, from experience. Something entirely new: School for the populace. Priority given to reading in the native language. Groups and standards by classes. Silence, (the use of the "signal"). Continuous activity: various jobs. Individual control. Personal record cards. Catechism; Christian atmosphere.

Eight Catechisms: Instructions and Prayers for the Holy mass. Instruction and Prayers for Confession and Communion. Instruction for Learning how to make a Good Confession. The Duties of a Christian towards God: by question and answer. Exterior and Public Worship (Christian Life). The Duties of a Christian towards God. Continuous discourse. Long summary of the Duties of the Christian towards God. Short Summary of the Duties of a Christian towards God.

Five other school books: Spelling book (to learn how to spell and pronounce). Office of the Blessed Virgin and Psalter (for reading in Latin). Exercises of Piety for the Schools. Rules of Good Behaviour and Christian Politeness.

"If you love Jesus Christ, you will take every care to imprint his holy love in the hearts of the children you train to be his disciples: see, therefore, that they often think of Jesus, their good and only Lord, that they often speak to Jesus, that they aspire only after Jesus and that they breathe only for Jesus" (Meditation 102,2).

D. SPIRITUAL WRITER: His originality becomes apparent in four principal themes:

— Unity of life. Make no distinction between the business of your state and those of your salvation and perfection..." (Recueil of short treatises, p. 184).

— Spirit of Faith. The spirit of faith should induce those who compose it (the Institute) to view nothing except by the eyes of faith, to do nothing except with a view to God and to attribute all to God. (First Rule, Ch. II, art. 1).

— Meditation in the Presence of God. "It is worthy of note, as regards the presence of God, that one must not dwell on it for but a short time, for it is that which most contributes towards obtaining the spirit of prayer..." (Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer, p. 35).

— Theology of Education. "All the care you take of the children confided to your care will be useless if Jesus Christ Himself does not give them the virtue, the strength and the efficacity..." (Meditation 195,3).

He writes: The Collection of Short Treatises. The Common Rules of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. The Rule of the Brother Director. The Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer. Meditations for the Time of the Retreat. Meditations for Sundays and the Feasts of the Year (192 in all). Numerous letters, nearly all of spiritual direction. We have only 134 of them of which 53 are signed.

"You have committed yourself to taking the place of God with regard to those you teach. And in taking care of their souls you have, so to speak, offered him soul for soul" (Meditation 137,3).

E. PRIEST: A very small aspect since he subordinated everything to his vocation as Founder. He was a priest however:

— An exemplary celebrant of the Mass.
— Confessor.
— Spiritual director (there are 14 letters giving direction to people outside).
— Convertor of souls. (There are 8 very impressive cases known).
— Defender of the Pope: against Gallicanism, Jansenism, Quietism...

A MEETING OF THE FIRST BROTHERS WITH M. DE LA SALLE. THE 1686 ASSEMBLY

1st PARAGRAPH: Introduction

In 1686 John Baptist de La Salle summoned the 12 principal Brothers to an assembly which started on the eve of the Ascension as a retreat and continued to Trinity sunday.

This procedure of the Founder reveals his pedagogy which is worth while studying. It is revealing not only because of his methods of procedure but also because his attitude and the atmosphere of prayer throughout the day were so many lessons.

This assembly put some fundamental decisions to the Brothers and they can be summed up as follow.

— Regulations cannot become Rules properly so called till they have been tried out for a number of years.

— Henceforth they would no longer be known as "masters" but as Brothers.

— Their dress would distinguish them not only from the clerics but also from lay people.

— Their food and life style would conform to that of the poor families whose children they had in class.

— Finally, the Brothers who made the request would be allowed to pronounce the vow of obedience for three years by consecrating their life to God in the service of the poor in school.

It was not by chance that such gestures consolidated the Society. De La Salle went into detail, planned rigorously, prayed, reflected, took council and finally obtained the agreement, participation and commitment of the Brothers. What was his method? How did he propose to accomplish it? We shall try to find out in the following extract from Blain (1).

"In order to transform the Assembly of Masters into a community, they must be given a habit, constitutions and everything established with a perfect uniformity suitable to their vocation. They must all be inspired with the same spirit, the same sentiments, the same dispositions, the same outlook and make but one body and one soul just as the first Christians forming the primitive Church presented the model of a perfect community for the years which followed. But in order to do this, he did not think that he should contribute anything from what he thought personally.

The humble institutor convoked his principal disciples to the number of 12 and they assembled together to discuss the means of giving them shape, of getting them settled and assuring their stability...

It started on the eve of the Ascension of the year 1684 (*) and finished on the feast of Pentecost; but it was extended to that of the Blessed Trinity. Monsieur de La Salle opened the meeting with a very touching speech. He made them see that the order which reigned in the house should lead them to think of the means of maintaining it; that regularity which is the soul of a community needs wise rules and that thought should be given to practicing them before drawing them up... You will perceive your own work in the book which will be written and the laws it contains will appear agreeable because you yourselves have been the legislators...

He concluded that on this point as on all others he left them entirely free to speak their mind, and even greater freedom to follow it; that all that he would do would be to listen to them and to decide according to the greatest number of votes; and finally that what he recommended most particularly was to pray well and to prepare themselves by a fervent retreat to know the will of God.

(1) BLAIN. Blain was, with Dom Elie Maillefer, his nephew, and Brother Bernard, one of the 3 contemporaneous biographers of the Founder. In 1733 he published in 2 volumes "La vie de Monsieur Jean-Baptiste de La Salle, Instituteur des Frères des Ecoles Chrétiennes." They can be consulted in Cahiers Lasalliens Nos. 7 & 8.

(*) Recent studies lead us to prefer 1686 as the date.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

During this long period of prayer and meditation they had time to invoke the Holy Spirit and to prepare their hearts for his inspirations. In silence and recollection, as each one was free to pay attention to his voice and to listen to his inspirations, each one also had the right to communicate his thoughts and feelings to the others. Without forewarning, without suggesting his views or inspiring them with his ideas, Monsieur de La Salle left them free to think and say what they wished. Doubtlessly the shortest way and the easiest for them would have been to get him to speak first and allow themselves to be led like docile children by the light of their father. A man of God such as he, was the mouth piece of the Holy Spirit and pronounced his oracles for them. Perhaps they did this; perhaps they told him they were his children, and asked him to govern them like a father and give them rules without their advice and without deferring to their feelings. But what means could they take to overcome his humility on this point which gave him the right only to listen to them, take their advice and decide on a majority of votes? Not that he did not help them with his own inspirations or put them right when their ideas were not sensible nor correct. But he did it in such a way that he did not find therein his self esteem and that it did not hinder their liberty to make their own suggestions and justify them in any way. The only right he reserved to himself was to speak a lot with God and ask Him to speak Himself to this college of his 12 disciples, and to make known His holy will through them so clearly that that there was nothing further to do but to endorse these thoughts dictated by the Spirit of God..."

THIRD PART: General Objective

"...inspire all with the same spirit, the same sentiments, the same dispositions, the same outlook and make of them but one soul like the first Christians" (1).

Specific Aims

1) "...consult together on the means to give shape to the establishment, to get them settled and to give them stability" (2).
2) "...transform the Assembly of Masters into a regular community..." (3).
3) "...give them a habit..." (4).
4) ...rules and constitutions.
5) "...establish perfect unity in all things suitable for their vocation" (6).

Method Followed

1) Motivate the Brothers: "opened it with a touching speech" (7).
2) Start from what has actually been practiced: "...the order already reigning in the house..." (8).
3) Faith in the group and in its aptitudes: "...he did not think he should put in anything of his own..." (9); "he left them perfectly free on this point as on all the rest..." (10).
4) Number of representatives (12 Brothers).
5) Freedom of discussion on ideas and feelings: "...give their opinions..." (10).
6) Sufficiently long meeting (18 days).
7) Expressing what they live, they reaffirm their identity: you will find therein your own work..."

Attitudes

1) Complete freedom (107).
2) Listening to the Spirit (11).
3) An Assembly of prayer (12).
4) Respect for the Brothers (13).
5) Listening attentively to the Brothers (14).
6) Accepting the majority view (15).
7) Judicious and discreet direction (16).

A NEW IMAGE OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE FROM AN ANTHOLOGY OF HIS WRITINGS

Educating young people is becoming a more complex and difficult art, so much so that leading educationists are beginning to feel the need to go back to those masters of the art who produced the best results in the past in order to find enrichment and a stimulating model for comparison.

In the front rank of those educators is St. John Baptist de La Salle, and the anthology "Proposta Educativa", Educative Proposals, presents a complete synthesis of the treasures of his human and Christian wisdom, allowing the educator to discover a new image of de La Salle — a saint alive, relevant and stimulating and not a rigid figure encased in three centuries of history.

ATTENTION TO GOD AND TO THE NEEDS OF THE YOUNG

The real de La Salle is a rich and complex personality in whom attention to the things of God and to the needs of the young are united in what seems a wholly natural manner but which is, in reality, the fruit of intense effort and genuine self sacrifice.

In none of his writings do we find him speaking of God without allusion to man nor of man without reference to God. His pedagogical counsels drew their reason and strength from a Christian vision of reality but in their constant reference to God there is nothing which constrains or confines the development of the human personality. This balanced synthesis of the divine and human de La Salle attained thanks to his intimate acquaintance with the Word of God, evident in every line of his writings, and to his realistic view of the needs of the young people of his day.

SUMMARY OF PROPOSTA EDUCATIVA

This book which is divided into two parts, has a fifty-six page introduction to the writings of de La Salle. In it the following points are briefly dealt with:

— The historical and cultural background to de La Salle's thinking.
— Essential biographical information.
— A spiritual profile.
— His principal pedagogical insights.
— Lasallian educative style.
— The vitality of his message to-day.

In the second part (152 pages) he develops his theme. By a judicious choice of the best Lasallian texts on education and pedagogy, skilfully inter-related, he throws new light on the Founder's concept of a Christian education:

— The meaning de La Salle gave to "educate".
— The implications of an educative community for pupils, educators and parents.
— The characteristic marks of Lasallian pedagogy.

This is not a history book but a book which compels, which forces us to take up a position, to put ourselves in unison with de La Salle. It in an educational code but without the rigidity of a

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

code. It is full of the warm, brotherly and persuasive encouragement of a man who sees clearly, understands and foresees with convincing force but without imposing himself.

THOSE TO WHOM THIS ANTHOLOGY IS ADDRESSED

While taking into account the need to introduce young Brothers, about to begin their apostolate, to Lasallian educative methods, "Proposta Educativa" is addressed, primarily, to lay teachers and to all who work in schools of the Lasallian "family". It is meant for those who want, not only to work with the Brothers and to adopt their methods, but also to share their spirituality and to discover not only how to educate but how "to be" in order to educate.

In the school of Lasallian Christo-centered spirituality they will learn to look at the model proposed by de La Salle:

— Christ the Master who was ever willing to listen,
— Christ the model because of His example,
— Christ the liberator because He himself was free,
— Christ the model for men by His obedience.

The path that de La Salle proposes to educators is a demanding one but one that is in harmony with the concept of continuing education, so widespread to-day. It is a lesson taught by de La Salle and worth meditating on.

THE AUTHOR

Brother Secondino Scaglione, from the District of Turin, is a specialist on the life and work of St. John Baptist de La Salle and editor of the review "Rivista Lasalliana".

THE BOOK

San Giovanni Battista de La Salle, Proposta Educativa, Edizioni Marietti, Torino 1983, 208 pages.

SUGGESTIONS FOR STUDY GROUPS AND PERSONAL REFLECTION

• The prophetic spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle is not dead. His message is still a challenge to us. His love for children is still with us.

• The Lasallian educative message, existential and dynamic, is in no way an idealisation of the past nor a blind disregard for reality. Neither is it wishful waiting for a miraculous restoration, but a firm determination to follow in our own day and in our own circumstances the footsteps of de La Salle marked as they are by the imprint of the divine.

• There is a widespread temptation to-day to do something new, decisive, definitive but it is all very vague and no real progress is made for want of a model.

The examples of the decisive action both in the human and spiritual sense, given by St. John Baptist de La Salle have something to teach us in our present circumstances in the world of to-day.

ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE'S MESSAGE TO TEACHERS

THREE NOTES CONCERNING THIS LEAFLET

I. On the reverse of this page is an extract from a book by Brother Jean Pungier which is to be published shortly under the title: "Message of St. John Baptist de La Salle to Catechists and Educators."

In about 150 pages, it examines the ideas of the Founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools on catechetics. It is not an exhaustive study, basing itself on only two of La Salle's texts on the subject. One, which is fundamental, is taken from the "Meditations for the Time of the Retreat". The other, which is perhaps less original, is from the "Duties of a Christian towards God" by question and answer, (Cahiers Lasalliens 21). It contains some quite interesting points.

1) John Baptist de La Salle's message to Catechists and Educators in the Faith:

Chapter 1. Your are the ministers of God.
Chapter 2. You are building the Church.
Chapter 3. Your God is a God of Goodness.
Chapter 4. Since you are disciples of Jesus Christ, bring disciples to Him.

2) A Catechism by John Baptist de La Salle:

Chapter 1. The Duties of a Christian towards God.
Chapter 2. A Source of these Duties: The Catechism by Jean Le Coreur.
Chapter 3. Another Source of these Duties: The Catechism by Claude Joly.

3) A few Extracts from the Duties of a Christian towards God (with a short commentary).

II. At first sight, one is generally disconcerted by the texts presented by John Baptist de La Salle. They are written in the language of the 17th Century and the Founder concentrates on strict doctrine. They are, moreover very condensed as is the case for the extract from the Meditations for the Time of the Retreat (MTR 13,3) (see reverse) which seems to have been woven from the Epistle of St. Paul to the Ephesians, (4,11-16). An effort is, therefore required, but it is well worth while.

III. Possible questions which would make this leaflet a basis for reflection, discussion and prayer:

1) How would you describe for young people today their "Situation of Neglect"?

2) How would you, for yourself or for your group or educative community, rewrite "God's Plans" for these young people?

3) a) Looking through the eyes of faith at your life as a catechist or educator in the faith, can you say with John Baptist de La Salle that God has intervened in your life? That He has enlightened you? That He has called you or that you have offered yourself to Him with a view to realizing His plans for salvation?

b) "Minister of God". What is your understanding of this expression of the Founder? How do these demands, these responsibilities, affect you?

c) What role does the Holy Spirit play in your activities as educator in the faith? In yourself, in the young people committed to your charge?

JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE'S MESSAGE

THE REALITY,
a situation of neglect

"Consider that it is a practice all too common among craftsmen and the poor to allow their children to live like vagabonds, going hither and thither, till they are of an age to find employment in some profession. This situation arises not only from their inability to pay teachers because of their poverty but also because, having to work away from home, they have perforce to neglect them.

This has disastrous consequences, for these unfortunate children, having become accustomed to doing nothing for many years find it difficult to accustom themselves to working. Moreover as they get into bad company, they learn to commit many sins which are very difficult to give up later on because of the bad habits contracted over many years" (MTR 2,1).

Between the Two Situations:

God intervenes in our lives:

"God has been so good as to bring a remedy for such a great evil by establishing the Christian Schools" (MTR 1,1).

"God Himself has enlightened the hearts of those whom He has destined to teach children His word, so that they may enlighten them by showing them glory of God" (MTR 1,1).

Men,

— who offer to work for God's designs:

"Admire the goodness of God who has provided for all the needs of His creatures and the means He takes to bring men to a knowledge of the real good (...) and offer yourself to Him to help the children He has confided to your care as far as you are able" (MTR 5,1).

— as responsible ministers:

"God has called you to your ministry to procure his glory and impart to children the spirit of wisdom and light in order to know Him and to open the eyes of their hearts. You will give an account of how you have instructed those under your care" (MTR 14,1).

— open to the Spirit of Jesus Christ:

"Hence you must ask Him for much, so that all the lessons you give them may be animated by His Spirit and that they may draw all their power from Him. Thus as it is He who enlightens every man coming into the world, it may be He also who enlightens their mind and leads them to love and practice the good you teach them" (MTR 3).

GOD'S PLANS,
a situation of salvation:

"When Jesus Christ made you responsible for the instruction of children and their formation in religious practice, he entrusted to you the task of building up his body which is the church.

Since children are the most innocent part of the church, and usually the best disposed to receive the impressions of grace, Jesus Christ desires that you fulfill your task of making them holy, that they all form that perfect man who is Christ come to full stature, so that they are no longer like children tossed here and there, carried about by every wind of doctrine that originates from human trickery and skill in proposing error. They can be victims of such error in the companions with whom they associate, or in others who propose evil and lead them into falsehood. But you are to help them in all things to grow to the full maturity of Christ, the head, through whom the whole body of the church grows with the proper functioning of the members joined firmly together by each supporting ligament, building itself up in love. In this they share in the promises of God in Jesus Christ. (MTR 13,3).

MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS

02-A-12

INTRODUCTION

In the history of the foundation of the Institute we note that the majority of texts written by St. J.B. de La Salle date from 1700. It seems that, after 20 years of research and experimentation, the Founder and the first Brothers felt the need to formulate their common experience.

Thus it is that about 1705, The Rule, The Meditations for the Time of Retreat and the Management of Schools appear almost simultaneously. It is, therefore, an important moment in the self-awareness of the Institute and in its consolidation.

To read the Management of Schools to-day requires a complete intellectual displacement. We must continually keep in mind that it was written for primary school teachers, concerned with giving a basic education in schools entirely staffed by Brothers.

The evolution of education and pedagogy, the diversification of the scholastic and educational commitment of the Brothers, the co-operation of Brothers and lay teachers in the same tasks, the geographic expansion of the Institute to varied cultures and educational systems, all emphasise the "strangeness" of the Management of Schools to our twentieth century mentality.

We must, consequently take an overall view of a text which is characterised by an obvious concern for precision and detail. But under the rather off-putting surface of the text we find orientations and educational insights of astonishing richness and of singular relevance to our own time. It is these educative insights which give sense and coherence to the "ministry" of the Brothers which is so well synthesised in "Meditations for the Time of Retreat".

1) THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS: PART OF THE PEDAGOGICAL MOVEMENT OF THE TIME

We know, especially after the Lasallian studies of the past twenty-five years, that de La Salle organised the Brothers' schools in the educational context of the late 17th century, that is, in an era of increasing concern for popular education. By his training and his contacts de La Salle was well aware of previous efforts in this field and of what was being done at the time of the foundation of the Brothers' Congregation.

His biographers and historians of education have shown the influence that Charles Démia, Nicolas Barré and Nicolas Roland had on him. From the point of view solely of schools it would be interesting to study the resemblances between the Management of Schools and such works as: "The Parochial School" or the "Remonstrances" of Charles Démia, or the ideas stirred up by "La Lettre" of Deacon Paccory. The Management of Schools shared, therefore, the educational concepts widespread in society or explicitly formulated at the beginning of the 18th century.

At the same time, its content is coherent with the particular end of the Foundation of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. It is meant for schools which admitted the children of artisans and the poor — children who must be saved while, at the same time, receiving instruction and serious training.

2) MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS: A PROFESSIONAL GUIDE

> "The Management of Schools was written in the form of regulations only after a great number of conferences with the Brothers of the Institute who were the most senior and best qualified to conduct schools, and after the experience of a number of years. Nothing was included which had not been agreed on and well tested, advantages and disadvantages weighed and the consequences, good or bad, foreseen as far as was possible." (Manuscript of 1706 - Extract from the preface)

The Management was written with the aim of helping the Brothers in their daily task of instructing children. Other texts and studies of de La Salle have shown how anxious he was that his schools should be successful. That preoccupation is evident in the Management of Schools and dictates the choice of methods of work and the system of organisation there presented.

Why such a guide?

• Because teaching is a noble task. For the Brothers of the Christian Schools it is a "ministry". To be convinced of this one has only to read the last two paragraphs of the foreword to the Meditations for the Time of Retreat. Here de La Salle quotes St. Jerome, St. Gregory, St. Protogenus, St. Cassian and the Chancellor of the University, Gerson, as illustrious forerunners of the Brothers in this ministry.

• Because the Brother must not separate "his employment from his state of life". It is in and through the school that the Brother fulfills his mission. He must bring to his daily task the same seriousness, the same conscientiousness as to the spiritual exercises which regulate the life of the Community.

• Because the Brothers must be effective in their work the Management of Schools gives them the means. Effectiveness means the success of the pupils. That is only natural. But we know that de La Salle reminds the Brothers:

— that it is the poor who should benefit by their work,
— that their modest or poor condition does not permit the waste of school time, — that progress in their studies is the guarantee of their future.

The corollary to this concern for efficiency is the importance given by de La Salle to the formation of future Masters or young Brothers.

A professional guide to what?

To understand the importance and necessity of the directions given in the Management of Schools we must put ourselves in the context in which it was written. Essentially it was at a time when popular education in France had just begun. It was still at the initial stage. Brothers and schoolmasters had to be pioneers in many respects. They had to organise their classes so as to reconcile collective teaching with the needs of the individual pupil. They had to introduce the teaching of reading in French instead of in Latin...

The Management of Schools mentions the introduction of training in new subjects so as better to prepare the pupils for social and professional life: for example, legal documents such as wills, contracts etc. required in daily life.

These few reminders explain the need for a complete and precise text on the organisation of classes, methods of teaching and the working tools of the teacher etc.

3) THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS: A GUIDE TO OUR MINISTRY

Teaching in a Brothers' school was not just a matter of practising a profession. The Brothers were not just a new "Corporation" like the "Writing Masters or the "Masters of the Little Schools". Besides instructing the children, the Brothers were concerned for their salvation. They exercised a ministry. This was their real raison d'être.

The Management, therefore, gave an important place to all the daily activities which could help directly in the salvation of the children:

• Good example — to-day we would call it witness — which the Brother should give to the pupils in his conduct.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

- The acts of piety which punctuated the school day for the class: prayer in common, recalling the holy presence of God, the morning reflection, recitation of the rosary.
- Assistance at Mass in the parish church.
- Daily catechism lesson.
- The choice of edifying texts in the teaching of reading.

There was no ambiguity as to the Christian orientation of the Brothers' school. Here again we encounter the general thinking of the time. In a country where Catholicism was the State religion it was essential that children be taught the mysteries of religion and the truths of the Catholic faith. Other sects, even Christian ones, had had no legal existence for a number of years.

The Brother and the Master share in God's universal plan of salvation. They are workers in the cause and are given a great responsibility in what concerns the children's salvation. They will have to render an account on the Day of Judgement. That responsibility is all the greater when it concerns "children of artisans and the poor" because they are generally "farther from salvation". We recognise in these expressions the themes developed by de La Salle in "Meditations for the Time of Retreat".

4) THE MAIN EDUCATIONAL LINES OF MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS

If we go beyond the letter of the text, the impression of uniformity and repetitiveness and the feeling of constraint it conveys to the modern mind and if we try to place it in the context of the period, then we can discern in the Management of Schools the main educational lines that guided de La Salle and the first Brothers in their schools. These orientations can surprise by their richness and their modernity. Here are some of the more obvious ones:

• Priority of the Person

The text of the Management of Schools brings us back time and again to the child, to his needs, his personality, his behaviour, his character, his future, his surroundings, whether family, parochial or social.

This attention to the children is all the more evident when it is a question of "poor" children, that is, of those whose families live in difficult conditions without help from anyone. For them the schools plays an essential and effective role in supplying the deficiencies of the home.

The priority given to children demands availability, attention and presence on the part of the Brother or Master and great flexibility in the organisation of the school and the class. A revealing detail is the provision of a supernumerary teacher so that the pupils are never without a teacher if the Brother or Master is absent or ill.

• An all round formation

The text of the Management of Schools reveals a concurrent concern for: Scholastic formation: acquisition of the indispensable rudiments of reading, writing, arithmetic and knowledge of legal documents required in ordinary life.

— Training in a trade, as far as was possible at the time, to prepare for life after school and to give the pupil a better chance in the struggle to earn a living.

— Doctrinal formation through knowledge of the mysteries of religion and revealed Truth. Insistence on this aspect of religion is explained by the controversies of the period: Jansenism, Quietism, Gallicanism.

— The acquisition of good habits. It is not enough to have an abstract knowledge of the truths of religion. We must form good habits of conduct.

• In an atmosphere of close personal relationships

Concern for the Brother's relations with the family, the parish and the area in which the pupil lives, is everywhere evident. To this is added concern for the Brother's relations with the pupils in class. Here, for example, are some of the usual recommendations:

— Effective attention of the Brother to each pupil through constant vigilance.
— Reception of the pupil and parents at the time of enrolment so as to get to know the family.
— Importance attached to mutual respect among the pupils and between teachers and pupils.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

— Importance of good example on the part of teachers and pupils alike.
— Practical mutual help in lessons and work.
— Personal relationship even in correction so that it may be understood, accepted and, therefore, effective.
— Retention of some pupils during lessons when their presence is beneficial to the group even though they are capable of promotion to higher grades.

All these provisions are aimed at creating and sustaining mutual affection among all, pupils and teachers. The Brother is asked to love all his pupils tenderly. The reciprocal affection of the pupils is the best indication of the good order and progress of a class. In this way is a "fraternal" school created.

- A pupil centred school

Historians of education in France have stressed the contribution of de La Salle and the Brothers to simultaneous or collective teaching. This risks giving a deformed image of the Brothers' schools at the beginning of the 18th century. In reality the Management of Schools describes a school where Brothers or Masters:

— give to each pupil, in each subject, work adapted to his age, his knowledge, his progress and even to his character;
— maintain great flexibility in school structures and organisation so as to permit the admission of pupils in the course of the school year, change of lessons at appropriate times for the pupils, special holidays for certain among them and varying times for beginning and ending school according to circumstances;
— form heterogeneous classes for pupils of different levels of attainment or "lessons". The latter term meant "learning units" in different subjects.

This is far from the image of the monolithic class. Thanks to sub-divisions in reading, writing arithmetic etc. each pupil could find the work adapted to his ability and rhythm — a program made to measure.

CONCLUSION

It is not a question of attempting an exaggerated exegesis of the Management of Schools. The text, as we have seen, owes much to previous or contemporary thinking, as is often the case in the history of educational currents or ideas.

But the concepts formulated in the Management of Schools made possible the creation of a school adapted to the needs of the time and especially to those of the poor. This is what accounted for the success of the Brothers' schools and drew large numbers of pupils to them.

What is more important to us to-day, wherever we work, is to understand and follow the procedure which produced the Management of Schools at the beginning of the 18th century. This procedure may be summed up as:

— attention, awareness and openness to the needs of the child;
— analysis of those needs;
— trying out concrete suggestions in answer to those needs;
— consultation in order to find out the best answers;
— rationalisation and development of effective positive answers.

This is what the first Brothers did and the preface to the Management of Schools, quoted above, bears it out. If "Meditations for the Time of Retreat" is the theological synthesis of the Brothers' ministry, the Management of Schools is, if we may say so, the description of its daily application.

By the method of its composition and application it illustrates perfectly the expression contained in the formula of vows of the Brothers since the beginning, "Together and by association".

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS OF CAHIERS LASALLIENS (1959-1984)

1) A CLEARLY FELT NEED

Even before 1940, especially in France and Italy, the study of Lasallian origins was seen as a matter of primary importance, in the Institute, first of all, and later in the wider field of the history of pedagogy and spirituality. The publication of the first nine volumes of the "General History of the Brothers of the Christian Schools" by Georges Rigault in 1937 made a contribution of the greatest importance to this study while, at the same time, demonstrating the urgent need for further research and publications on the person and on the written works of J.B. de La Salle.

It was, however, the late Fr. André Rayez, S.J. who published, in 1952, an inventory of the known sources and works published up to that time. This inventory not only pointed out the merits and limits of a certain number of essays and studies but called for more research with a view to publishing the ardently desired Monumenta Lasalliana. (cf. André Rayez, Etudes Lasalliennes in the Revue d'Ascétique et de Mystique, January-March, 1952).

During this period, Brothers who were studying theology or other ecclesiastical sciences foresaw the eventuality of presenting theses or memoirs consecrated to Lasallian origins and particularly to the spiritual teaching of the Founder. At the beginning, these Brothers, for their part, could only confirm the findings of Fr. Rayez. Of the first three biographies of J.B. de La Salle, only one, that by Blain, had been published. A work such as this was not easily accessible except in abridged editions or in editions containing important deviations from the original. Of the written work of the Founder only some manuscripts were preserved in the Institute Archives. The works published by de La Salle or by his second successor, Brother Timothée, could be consulted, for the most part, only in later editions unless one went to some of the great libraries, notably in Paris, to read one or other of the editions published during the life-time of the author or shortly after his death.

2) A DECISION OF THE GENERAL CHAPTER OF 1956

A memoir was submitted to the Brothers capitulants in 1956 which tried to focus attention on the lacunae mentioned above. It proposed a first program of work: research and publication of texts and documents capable of serving as a basis for scientific study of J.B. de La Salle and more generally of the period of the origins of the Institute. It requested that Brothers, who were particularly qualified for the work, should be allowed to devote themselves full-time to such research and publications. In the capitular commission and in the full assembly the Chapter recognised the validity of the points made in the memoir and accepted its conclusions.

3) AN UNDERTAKING WITHIN THE BOUNDS OF POSSIBILITY

With a view to preparing the desired Monumenta it was decided, first of all, to bring together the basic documents already known, to make known the documents uncovered by recent research and finally to prepare studies of the sources and content of Lasallian thought. Thus it was that in April, 1959, the Cahiers Lasalliens first saw the light of day.

The first twenty-five volumes (1959-1966) presented the earliest biographies — Bernard, the two Maillefer and Blain — and included two volumes of indices for the series (1974-1979). After these came the complete series of the works of the Founder based on the first edition or on the earliest known edition. The series was reproduced by the anastatic process.

Some volumes in this series belong more to the category of studies or essays: on Meditations for the Time of Retreat, on the Collection and even on the canonical status of the Institute.

A second series starts with Cahier 26 (1966). It is still continuing, thanks to the untiring research and publications of Brother Léon Aroz. Several hundred documents are thus presented, analysed and annotated. All of them throw light — often in a novel way — on the initiatives of de La Salle in his own family, within the body of the clergy and especially in his relationships and responsibilities as Founder.

On the last page of each volume of the collection the aims are summed up in a few lines:

"Cahiers Lasalliens": Texts, Studies, Documents,

- published in a collection which is not periodical,
- centred on the person of St. John Baptist de La Salle, his written work and the origins of the Congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools,
- in preparation for the publication of two definitive works: A critical biography of the saint and the corpus of his works.

2) TO WHOM IS THIS COLLECTION SPECIFICALLY ADDRESSED?

To the Brothers of the Christian Schools, very definitely, and also to those whose studies or activities lead them to a greater interest in the holy Founder, in his thinking and in his educational achievements. The critical notices which appeared in several scientific reviews on the publication of the different volumes drew attention to the remarkable contribution that such publications make to a better understanding of the history of ecclesiastical and civil society under the Ancien Régime.

For this reason the complete collection of the Cahiers Lasalliens is to be found in most of the great libraries of Europe and America, North and South.

5) WHO PUBLISHES THE CAHIERS LASALLIENS?

The publisher is the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. It is to the General Council of the Institute (General Secretariate or General Accounts Department) that application must be made for authorization to reproduce or translate the Cahiers Lasalliens.

Subscriptions and orders should be addressed to: Cahiers Lasalliens, Casa Generalizia FSC, Via Aurelia, 476 - ROMA.

THE BROTHERS' PART IN THE CATECHETICAL MOVEMENT IN CHILE

In Chile, as in other parts of the world, the catechetical movement got now impetus from and took specific shape after the second Vatican Council. At that time two Brothers were engaged in catechetical work for the diocese of Santiago: Brother Miguel Dominguez, from Cuba, a specialist in youth work and group dynamics, and Brother Enrique Aguilo, from Spain, a specialist in catechetics.

CATECHESIS FOR ADOLESCENTS

Brother Miguel Dominguez was the first Brother to be called, jokingly, "Monsignor", since he was made Vicar in charge of the arch-diocesan apostolate of youth. Needless to say, he never used the title! The post was created by the Cardinal Archbishop, Raoul Silva Henriquez. Brother Miguel's task was to form animation teams among young people in each of the eight pastoral zones into which the arch-diocese, with its three million inhabitants, was divided. In addition he collaborated in the production of catechetical text books for children and adolescents. At present he is Director of Scholastics in Medellin (Colombia) but his memory is still fresh among us. You may still meet priests, religious and lay people who consider it a priviledge to have followed his courses and who have, as a result, greatly increased their possibilities for enriching their human relationships, increasing their efficacy among apostolic groups and bringing greater maturity to Christian communities.

FAMILY CATECHESIS

Brother Enrique Aguilo, from the District of Valencia, also worked full-time in the diocesan catechetical apostolate. He contributed to the first edition of "Al Encuentro de Dios Vivi" (Meeting with the Living God) which adopted an original approach to religious education. It is for the use of parents and is aimed at helping them to prepare their children for the reception of the sacraments of Reconciliation and Holy Communion. The Cardinal, a former student of our college of Talca, initiated this new approach and supported it in person.

The program was first intended to last for one year but was later (1971) extended to two years. The authority of the Archbishop was indispensable to getting adults, who considered that they had no need of it, to accept a long course in faith education. Until he returned to Spain in 1973, Brother Enrique worked with the diocesan team, giving courses to responsible lay people, recruited in the parishes to help parents fulfill their obligations. He also published a book entitled, "Methodology of Family Catechesis".

Since 1968, De La Salle College, Santiago, has adopted this system of family catechesis for preparing children for First Communion in preference to direct preparation in class. Gradually the system has spread to other schools and colleges. Though they did not create the system, it can be said with truth that the support of the Brothers was decisive in having it accepted by all the catholic schools of Chile. This initiative has convinced the Brothers that they should address themselves directly to the parents and not limit their work to the children.

I remember that, at first, we were not at all happy with the Chilian bishops' emphasis on the apostolate of adults. We thought that it would downgrade our centuries old tradition of work with children and adolescents. When we began to bring the parents together to teach them how to give a Christian education to their children we were rather condescending towards them.

But as soon as we decided to form small groups and when our reduced numbers no longer made possible our presence at each meeting, the movement gained a new dynamism from the laity. It was only then that we began to listen to these lay people who could sort out their family problems among themselves without continual recourse to our guidance.

In 1974 I was asked, as a member of the diocesan catechetical committee, to contribute to "Meeting with the Living God" and to form a group of animators of the Liturgy for the younger children who also share in family catechesis by taking part in the liturgy of the Word on Sundays.

SCHOOL CATECHESIS FOR THE YOUNG

I have also been called on by the archbishop to direct the National Office for Catechesis. A group of us, lay people, priests and religious, have drawn up various programs of catechetics for schools throughout the country. We have also produced a series of teaching aids, both written and audio-visual.

In Valparaiso, Brother Rodolfo Andaur has worked for several years with the diocesan education committee in the initial and the in-service training of religion teachers for Catholic schools and non-confessional state schools. Religion courses are, in fact, provided in state schools for children whose parents do not claim exemption. Brother Miguel Angel Ortiz has replaced him in this post after having worked with the diocesan team in Santiago. For several years Brother Ramon Lara had helped him in Talca.

In Temuco, Brother Juan Fernando Garcia was given special responsibility for Confirmation with instructions to train catechists for this new form of the apostolate of youth. All these extra responsibilities in the general apostolate have not prevented the Brothers from carrying out their duries in their own schools and in their own communities.

NATIONAL CATECHESIS

In the past ten years the most notable work carried out by the National Office for Catechesis has been:

a) the extension of family catechesis in preparation for reception of the sacraments to all the dioceses of the country;

b) the systematic training of lay volunteer catechists in schools and parishes;

c) the production of a catechetical program for pre-adolescent children and a socio-religious program for adults;

d) the preparation of means for mass evangelisation and group catechesis.

Brother German Martinez, scholastic and student of theology, has been helping our group recently by going round the country giving courses in catechetics and conducting days of reflection for the diocesan clergy who request it.

The Brothers who participate in catechesis at national level in Chile have the advantage of personal experience in the classroom and in the educative work of our own schools and colleges. Wherever the Church has called on us, as in Temuco and Talca, we have made our schools available to the town and to the diocese for the work of catechesis. We have also taken part in the apostolate of the young and of the family at diocesan and national level. This has in no way hindered our total dedication to the Christian formation of the students in our own schools. The District Commission, responsible for education and catechesis, is, at present, planning Lasallian apostolic action in the ten centers for which the fifty Brothers of the District of Chile are responsible.

A healthy interaction is taking place between the internal apostolate of the Brothers and their wider ecclesial commitments. The experience gained in school has accustomed us to dealing with children and young people and has taught us the value of work thoroughly prepared. Our commitments at diocesan and national level bring us into contact with the realities of life and pastoral problems of which Brothers, who remain in their communities, have only the faintest idea.

I believe that these apostolic activities outside our own houses improve the quality of our work and bring us closer to our bishops and priests. In return, the bishops and clergy get to understand us better and appreciate us more. In this way possibilities for pastoral work are opened up and we are prepared to undertake them if and when we are no longer allowed to work in our own schools.

REFLECTIONS

- What connection can you see between the charism of St. John Baptist de La Salle and the activities mentioned above?
- What does the work of the Chilean Brothers, in the field of catechetics between 1966 and 1983, suggest to you?

INCULTURATION OF RELIGIOUS LIFE IN AFRICA

1) CONTEXT

It is a well-known fact that religious have played an important role in the evangelisation of Africa. Jesuits, Redemptorists, Holy Ghost Fathers, White Fathers, Capuchins and Franciscans, to cite only a few of the male congregations, have made outstanding contributions to the Church in Africa.

Nevertheless, there is little understanding of the religious life among the African people. This is because the work of the missions took precedence over the religious life of the missionary. Religious life was considered in some way an adjunct to missionary work. Religious Sisters and Brothers were, first of all, auxiliaries on the mission. Local congregations, particularly of women, exist in fairly large numbers to-day. They were founded mainly to provide helpers for the clergy in various ways. They did not specialise in any particular field and their numbers grew in proportion to the needs of the young churches. As a result these congregations have difficulty to-day in specifying their charism and spirituality.

It is, therefore, easy to understand why religious life, as such, had not been well presented or offered to Africans as an ideal of the Christian life. In general we can say that, before Vatican II, priority, in Africa, was given to establishing the Church with the help, of course, of religious Brothers and Sisters. Before discussing the inculturation of religious life in Africa these facts have to be pointed out.

2) A COMPLICATED PROCESS

For the past twenty years there has been a lot of talk about africanisation adaptation, indigenisation, localisation, incarnation etc. when discussing inculturation of religious life in Africa. It is a recent preoccupation in the history of the Church in Africa — one might say a post missionary preoccupation.

Whatever feelings one may have about inculturation — enthusiasm, annoyance or reticence — it is not open to doubt. It is a necessity which follows from the logic of the Incarnation. The Faith needs cultural supports so that it may be preached and lived. The credibility and force of the witness given by religious life depend, to a large extent, on the cultural channels through which it is expressed. This is the fundamental principle which justifies inculturation.

Talking about inculturation will not bring it about. Far from it! Talking about it in a naive manner as though it were a simple matter of transposition or substitution, of replacing western cultural supports by African ones is much too simplistic.

In the matter of African customs and traditions, for example, we must face the fact — and get rid of dangerous illusions — that these customs and traditions are no longer to be found in their pristine state and that, consequently, the choice to be made is much more delicate and complex than had been thought.

— Africa is not a village. Customs and traditions vary from one region to another, from one country to another. They vary even within the same country from one ethnic group to another.

— These customs and traditions have not all an equal chance of survival, even if they have existed for centuries.

— We must take account of necessary breaks with tradition and the resulting void.

— Inculturation to be authentic must be effected in the spirit of the Gospel, that is with complete abandonment of one's own cultural inheritance and an openness to local culture. We must never lose sight of this for in this debate I get the impression that some think it sufficient to "africanise" in order to render the process easy. It is true, for example, that mixed communities create problems and are sometimes an obstacle to inculturation in certain ways. However, it is equally wrong to think that the creation of homogeneous communities will solve the problem.

In short, the process of inculturation is a human process involving human beings. It should be brought about gradually and with care to discern what is good in local customs and traditions in order to retain it.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

3) AREAS OF INCULTURATION

Experience, however limited, helps us to discern paths to the principal areas of inculturation.

• We must strive for a meaningful religious life. I mean by that that inculturation is not an end in itself but the means to a religious life which speaks to the people.

That implies a great deal. Let us ask ourselves the following questions: In what local terms do we identify ourselves? What is our real name? Up to the present we use approximations or awkard paraphrases to translate "religious", "religious life", "congregation". As for "Brothers" and "Sisters", there are, as far as I know, no appropriate words to express them in our African languages (at least in the most widespread ones). How do you translate "Vow"?

• Inculturation must make an effort to find adequate ways to incarnate the charism of each congregation in its own context. That is the essential. If not, inculturation risks becoming a kind of folklore. The great orders were inculturated because they were able to form part of the society of their time and respond to the needs of the age and the problems which beset it. That is the task in the Africa of to-day.

• It is important to relive, in the spirit of the Gospel, the cultural values which are recognised as the cardinal values of the great African tradition: solidarity, community, welcome, hospitality etc. which are also in the great tradition of the religious life. Considering solidarity under its family aspect, African religious are led to find new and unprecedented ways to live this family solidarity and integrate it into their religious life without sacrificing the essentials of their vocation. Experiments are taking place which must be encouraged and improved in the light of experience. In community life much remains to be done to combine, with prudence, what is good in African family tradition with the requirements of life in a religious community.

• Inculturation will be brought about by African religious and only by them. Religious life, like the Church itself, which is involved in the same necessary inculturation, cannot go on indefinitely wearing a foreign mask. Many elements will disappear of themselves in the course of time and with the onward march of life. Religious life will become part of African life or it will disappear. I repeat that religious life will be inculturated by Africans or not at all. But this will not be accomplished by just any African religious. It will be done by those who have the gift of foresight, who can rediscover the fundamental values of the African soul and who will be able to give to that soul a religious expression because they will have lived, assimilated and made their own what is essential in the religious life. Such people will have something to say. They will be "the fathers of the religious life" in Africa. They will, in a manner of speaking, refound religious life. Inculturation concerns people rather than things.

2) HOW DOES ALL THIS CONCERN THE WESTERN WORLD?

It concerns the Western World in more ways than one.

• First of all because it is the West, through the accidents of history, which brought religious life to Africa. This resulted in the fact that the African Church, in general, knows nothing of Eastern religious values and that is a pity. Now that the child is passing through the normal process of growing up it is only natural that the father should not be disinterested in nor dissociate himself from his offspring.

• Secondly because we all belong to the Church and in the Church all are brothers. Belonging to the Church demands the willingness to listen, and calls for dialogue, empathy and welcome among its members. Local churches or continental churches which dissociate themselves from or show indifference to other churches do not belong to the Church. In this sense I highly appreciate my membership of an international Institute which opens to me the widest ecclesial horizons.

• Lastly inculturation is not an exclusively African problem. In many respects the Western World is also concerned. There's nothing more annoying than to be told at every turn, "You must africanise". "You must adapt"... giving you to understand that on the other side of the Atlantic or the Mediterranean there is nothing more to do. It has already been done. The backward are always on the same side! Inculturation is not the exclusive duty of the young Churches.

5) CONCLUSION

The duty of inculturation is continuous and long term. What one has found is always relative, never definitive. I think this is implied in "Perfectae Caritatis" (2,1) which urges religious institutes to initiate a renewal combining adaptation to the conditions of existence with a continuing return to the sources of Christian life and to the original inspiration of their Institutes.

"Under the impulse of the Holy Spirit: and the Holy Spirit is still at work".

YOUTH APOSTOLATE IN RURAL AFRICA

The Executive Committee of S.E.C.A.M., in collaboration with the Superiors General of Congregations (male and female) working in Africa, took as its theme for 1983 "The Apostolate of Rural Youth". A dossier on this subject was submitted to all the bishops of Africa. The following gives the essential points of discussion and the lines of action proposed:

1) NEGLECT OF THE RURAL POPULATION

• Despite the growth and development of several big cities Africa remains a predominantly agricultural continent.

• The rural population suffers from poverty and ignorance. The causes are multiple: uneven distribution of available land, lack of productivity, ignorance of modern methods of agriculture, lack of training and leadership.

• Young people suffer more keenly from these rural problems:
— lack of schools, or of places in those which exist,
— high drop-out rate because of unsuitable programs for rural life,
— teachers who are poorly trained, badly paid and who, consequently, have little interest in their work.

This list of problems is not exhaustive. Those who are in close contact with rural Africa could complete it and perhaps suggest some solutions to the condition of endemic poverty.

2) NEEDS AND ASPIRATIONS OF YOUTH

The rural world is not closed in on itself. It shares the incessant mobility of the modern world. The mass media puts it in contact with the whole world. It learns the history, the way of life, the cultural and religious heritage of other peoples. Young people in rural Africa are aware of all this, hence their aspirations for a better life and their desire to satisfy new needs.

Family life and marriage

They want to free themselves from traditional customs such as payment for a wife and the inheritance system, but at the same time maintain the principle of the extended family and use it intelligently. Many prefer the ideal of monogamy to the traditional polygamy.

Society

They want socio-political reform as well as reform of the educational system which is at the root of many of the problems of rural society. There is a growing spirit of individualism and a consequent loss of the spirit of solidarity.

Religious beliefs

Young people are beginning to question ancestral rites and practices. They are less willing than their parents to have their lives governed by religious rites. Therein lies the challenge to the Church. How can we create a synthesis of the world inherited from ancestors and the modern world, between traditional beliefs and faith in Jesus Christ?

3) DIFFICULTIES OF THE YOUNG

The influence of the elders is a tremendous force in rural society and weighs heavily on the young. The pressure of society, of the family, of the tribe is still felt even in middle age. Among young people, ancestral customs are no longer regarded as forces of cohesion in society so much as a straight jacket which prevents growth in the individual. Pressure is also exerted by religions such as Islam and by certain Christian sects as well as by modern ideologies such as marxism and apartheid.

4) PRIORITIES IN THE APOSTOLATE OF RURAL YOUTH

The Church in Africa has always tried to meet the needs and aspirations of young people. It has established schools of all kinds; Secondary, Technical, Trade and Agricultural Schools, apprentice training and health services. For their formation as Christians the Church has tried to provide catechetical instruction at their level, has organised small Christian communities, has established houses for prayer and multi-purpose centers. It has formed youth organisations such as J.A.C. (Young Christian Agricultural Workers) which are best adapted to rural conditions.

5) NEW LINES OF ACTION IN THE APOSTOLATE

Though the work accomplished by the Church, including that of the Religious Congregations, has been very important there remains an enormous amount to be done. Some new lines of action proposed are:

- Africanisation of schools to bring them within the reach of rural children. This means adopting programs suitable to rural conditions.
- Respecting African culture and languages while at the same time providing modern technical training.
- The establishment of schools which will prepare students for afterlife.
- Collective development

Through the school we must aim at influencing the entire village.

- Restoring the sense of solidarity

As in cities, the rural population is threatened by individualism and self-interest.

- Developing a critical outlook

This is essential in one-party states where all are expected to follow the government line. It is equally important in the face of certain traditions carried over from the past and which are at variance with the teaching of the Gospel.

6) PRIORITIES FOR EDUCATORS

Here we shall mention only a few:

- Awareness of rural problems. This means the numerical importance of young people in rural areas and taking account of their difficulties and special needs.
- Suitable Training, particularly in technical subjects. This implies getting to know the needs of rural areas and acquiring the necessary technical ability to deal with them.
- An essential quality is that of being able to form relationships. Young people expect their educators to be approachable and sympathetic, to interest themselves in their personal lives in the village, to boost their self-confidence by allowing them to speak for themselves and look after themselves, to speak to them of God in a language they can understand.
- Example of one's own life

"Modern man pays more attention to witness than to masters, and if he listens to masters it's because they are witnesses."

St. John Baptist de La Salle and the problems of rural youth

— De La Salle was well aware of the problems of young people in the country.

"The good priests of the countryside sought a remedy for the ills which the servant of God had long deplored. He was more anxious than they to heal the wounds that were becoming fatal for the poor people of the rural areas."

— The work was appropriate for the Brothers.

"The Brothers could do in the villages the good work they were doing in the towns. They would even have done the work more easily as the country children were more docile and the parents less troublesome."

— De La Salle would not allow the Brothers to take on the work for financial and community reasons.

"The poor country parishes had not sufficients funds to support two Brothers nor enough work for them. There was no question of sending a single Brother as de La Salle had made it a rule never to send less than two Brothers."

— De La Salle established a seminary for country schoolmasters.

"He encountered many obstacles and tried several times to re-establish it. (We know of three attempts — two in Paris and one in Rheims) "He gave up the idea after the third attempt, deciding to leave the task to others whom God would inspire to undertake it" (Extracts from Blain and Bernard).

1983 MISSIONARY SYMPOSIUM

To fulfil the wish expressed by Brother Superior General in his letter of 8 December 1981, the first Missionary Symposium was held in Togo from August 15 to 20, 1983.

SECOLI encouraged the Districts to prepare for this between October 1982 and May 1983 with the result that the following four points were chosen for discussions.

— The mission (Evangelization, School, necessary initiatives).
— The Community (animation, inculturation, a life of witness).
— Initial and continuing formation and the need of training staff.
— The missionary spirit: why go on the missions?

The 24 participants from the centre and from various regions of the Institute, after intensive work, voted the following propositions. Because of a "coup d'état" in Upper Volta, a neighbouring country, the programme had to be shortened and thus the formulation of these propositions could not be perfected by the introduction of modi. As set out they concern the Institute as a whole.

MISSION

1. The Brothers should, at regular intervals, reflect on the nature of their work, studying carefully the real needs of the country where they live and examining themselves as to whether their work is adequate for those needs. The assistance of competent persons should be sought for these periodical re-assessments.

2. In the light of Brother Superior's 1981 letter, par. 22a, schools in the Third World should examine their present commitment to see whether they are rendering a preferential service to the poor:

a) In countries where the majority work on the land we should favour agricultural foundations suited to the employment of young adults, not children. The final objective would be the formation of leaders for the rural districts.

b) In urban centres the Brothers must aim to form Christian leaders who will work for the promotion of the Church and of social justice in their areas.

4. The Brothers' work must always be carried out in association with their community, the witness of community life being of the highest importance in the developing countries.

FORMATION

6. Our mission as Lasallians is primarily to bear witness to the Gospel truths and not only in a teaching apostolate. The formation of our Brothers and of our lay collaborators should lead them to become animators of our institutions which will thus remain centres of evangelisation both proclaimed and lived.

8. As there are at present insufficient formators to staff our multiple national novitiates we propose the establishment of regional novitiates capable of being provided with competent personnel and adequate means for ensuring first-class formation.

9. Following the novitiate there should be a scholasticate period devoted to the continued deepening of the religious, catechetical and theological formation — this to precede the undertaking of academic studies. At the conclusion of this period of religious and academic training the Brother will be assigned to a community where his formation may be continued with the help of a visiting Brother counsellor.

STRUCTURES, RELATIONS

11. The African Region should appoint a full-time delegate who would reside in Africa and would ensure liaison between the Region and the Centre of the Institute. The Region must specify his duties and provide him with the means and the authority to fulfil them successfully.

13. SECOLI should be the linking agent between the Third World districts and the sponsoring Districts and other funding organisations.

15. Since a greater representation of delegates from the Third World to the General Chapter is not possible, the Superior General and his Council are urged to invite more observers from these areas.

COMMUNITY

16. Our communities should be involved in an apostolic project and should be much concerned to be seen as religious communities recognisable as such by their availability to others, their openness to, and concern for, their immediate neighbourhood, the simplicity of their life style, their prayer-life and their fraternal sharing.

18. The Brothers working in Africa should integrate themselves more fully into the local culture and customs, and should seek to discern the Gospel values and the apostolic possibilities implicit therein.

19. A willingness to study the local language is an integral element of a missionary vocation. It is essential that any Brother destined for the Missions be given sufficient time to learn the vernacular of the area he will serve.

LASALLIAN EDUCATORS: MEN AND WOMEN OF PRAYER

Throughout the Lasallian world today the emphasis on creating schools that are authentically Lasallian is striking. In many places, Brothers, lay teachers, parents, former students, associates, and the students themselves are reflecting together on the meaning of Lasallian education and are working together to effect genuine renewal of their schools.

We are beginning to see, for example, Lasallian Days, workshops, and retreats, together with productive efforts at building educative communities that are faith-filled, person-centered, committed to excellence in teaching, creative, zealous for the religious growth of the students, concerned for the poor and for justice and peace.

What is most encouraging in this movement of renewal is the desire of many members of the Lasallian Family to participate not only in the educational objectives of the Institute, but also in the spirituality of Saint John Baptist de La Salle. There is a growing realization that the Lasallian Family of Brothers, lay teachers, parents, former students, associates, and students, united in the vision and spirit of the Founder, could be a highly effective instrument in the mission of Christian education today.

IDENTITY AND PRAYER

This introduction might seem a bit long in a short article entitled "Lasallian Educators: Men and Women of Prayer". But in fact, what has been said is fundamental to understanding De La Salle's teaching on prayer. For our Founder, there is an inseparable link between the identity of the Brother (and, by extension, all members of the Lasallian Family) and a regular pattern of personal prayer.

For De La Salle the Brothers' vocation is to respond to the needs of the young as ministers of the Lord, as his ambassadors and co-workers. The Brother is to re-present Jesus Christ, making his loving and saving presence a visible and effective reality among young people. Logically, then, De La Salle can say: "Hence, since the object of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is to educate children in the spirit of Christianity, and to endeavor to procure them that spirit, it is of the utmost importance that the Brothers be... imbued... and abundantly filled with the Spirit of faith." (Collection)

De La Salle's meaning is clear: we cannot give what we do not have. The Lasallian educator must be a man or woman of faith, that is to say, a person in a living, conscious, dynamic relationship with God. It is in this context that we can understand the Founder's insistence on the necessity of regular personal prayer. It is prayer that nurtures this close relationship with the Lord: "The principal occupation" in personal prayer is to be filled with God and united interiorly to him." (Explanation of the Mental Prayer: EMMP). We can now understand why De La Salle insisted that the Brothers should have a great love for personal prayer and should look upon it as the first and principal of their daily exercises.

It is not possible in this short article to consider in depth our Founder's teaching on prayer. What we can do, however, is reflect briefly on some of the most fundamental orientations. The first we have just seen:

1) The necessity for regular personal prayer in the life of the Lasallian educator springs from his or her identity as minister of the Lord.

THE WORD OF GOD

Closely related to a commitment to regular prayer is a love for the scriptures. De La Salle considers the scriptures the first Rule of the Institute. "The scriptures," he says, "must be eaten by all true servants of God, that they may subsequently be able to communicate and explain their secrets to those whom they are called upon to instruct." (Meditation 170).

De La Salle taught the Brothers to meditate on the scriptures daily, allowing the Word of God to penetrate their minds and hearts. He taught them to move from reflection to ardent conversation with the Lord.

For the Lasallian educator, therefore, the habit of reading and meditating upon the scriptures is of primary importance. Our second orientation, then, can be expressed as follows:

2) The Lasallian educator devotes some minutes every day to prayerful reflection on the Word of God.

PERSONAL ENCOUNTER WITH THE LORD

Another fundamental orientation of De La Salle is that prayer is a personal encounter with the Lord at the center of our being. He doesn't use those precise words. His language is the language of his day: "Mental prayer is an interior occupation, that is to say, an application of the soul to God... It is not only an exercise of the intellect but also brings into action all the powers of the soul... its operations must take place in the inner recesses of the soul." (EMMP).

Dated language, yes, but the meaning is clear. The Lasallian educator should meet the Lord daily at the center of his being. Prayer is more than a period of reflection on God, or on some doctrine, teaching, or idea. "The first things which we should do in mental prayer," he says, "is to penetrate ourselves interiorly with the presence of God." (EMMP) To make sure that the novices did not spend too much time in "thinking about" God, De La Salle insisted that they converse with the Lord. To help them sustain this conversation, he suggested they follow a series of acts.

The Founder said that beginners would normally use many words in their conversation with the Lord, but that those more experienced should use fewer words or even no words and remain for some time in an interior silence." (EMMP)

The heart of De La Salle's teaching is that prayer is a period of heightened awareness of the Lord's presence in our life. It is a time for conscious personal encounter with the Lord in the depths of our being. At times we might want to converse with many words. At other times with few words and more silence. And there may be times when we are quite content to remain before the Lord in a loving attentive silence. Our third orientation is this:

3) The Lasallian educator, convinced that to render present Jesus Christ, regular contact with him is required, makes it a personal rule to encounter the Lord in prayer every day.

LIFE'S EXPERIENCES AND PRAYER

Let us consider one more basic orientation of De La Salle: the link between our daily experiences and our prayer. For De La Salle prayer was never an escape from everyday realities. On the contrary. He urges the Brothers to see the relationship between their prayer life and their daily service of youth. They should bring their experiences to the Lord. He tells them to intercede for those "confided to your care." "When you encounter some difficulty in the guidance of your disciples when there are some who do not profit from your teaching and you observe a reckless spirit in them turn to God with confidence. Earnestly ask Jesus Christ to make his Spirit come alive in you, since he has chosen you to do his work." (Meditation 196)

De La Salle trained his novices to make a conscious link between their daily experiences and their prayer by concluding their reflection and conversation with the Lord with a practical daily resolution. Brothers more experienced he advised to "leave meditation with a renewed desire to discharge your duties well." (EMMP) The orientation is clear. We can formulate it thus:

4) The Lasallian educator comes into the presence of God fully alive. There he or she reflects on life's daily experiences, converses with the Lord about them, and renews his or her intention to serve him with greater fidelity.

ZEAL AND PRAYER

"Your zeal must go so far that you are ready to give your very life, so dear to you are the children confided to your care." (Meditation 198)

The same De La Salle who made that remarkable statement is the same De La Salle who exhorted his Brothers to have a great love for the holy exercise of Mental Prayer. (Rule). He was convinced that only persons of prayer could be truly Christian and effective ministers of youth. That is why he urged the Brothers to make the scriptures central to their life and to bring themselves into the presence of God daily, encountering him in the depths of their heart.

Those of us who wish to live the Lasallian spirit would do well to take to heart these words: "As you are under the obligation of obtaining graces not only for yourself but likewise for others, and also of acquiring the gift of touching hearts, you ought to apply yourself in a special manner to the practice of mental prayer, for this is precisely the exercise which God has provided you with for the purpose of obtaining his graces." (Meditation 129)

THE CHRISTIAN TEACHER EDUCATES CHILDREN TO LIVE ACCORDING TO CHRISTIAN VALUES

1) FROM 6 TO 11 FEBRUARY, 1983

A meeting of Lasallian educators in Brazil was held at Florianopolis to discuss education in values. Ninety-two teachers from the Brothers' schools were present. The aims of the meeting were:

a) Integration of Lasallian teachers, mostly lay teachers — in the mission of the Institute.
b) Heightening among the teachers awareness of the importance of values in education.
c) Study of the principal lines of action for education in values.

At the end of the meeting criteria for action were formulated and educative groups present were asked to draw up definite plans as a guide to future action:

1) Our mission as educators must first of all be one of evangelisation.
2) The principal characteristic of a Lasallian school should be its concern for the poor and the oppressed.
3) Education should form consciences critical of unjust conditions and willing to work for their amelioration.
4) An educative community should try to inculcate values of truth, justice, brotherhood, service and sharing.

Those who took part in the conference agreed that it was a very valuable experience. We hope that it will bear much fruit in the educative mission of those who participated in it.

2) FOR ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

The ultimate object of all educative action is God, revealed as Father by His Son, Jesus Christ — our Brother.

It is a source of joy for the disciples of St. J.B. de La Salle to teach the young to live their lives in the spirit of Jesus Christ.

"You will experience great satisfaction, when they have grown up, in seeing them live in justice and piety, far removed from evil company, and in the practice of good works. The instructions you will have given them will not have consisted solely of words but will have been accompanied by an abundance of grace in those who will have benefited by them." (Meditations, 207.3)

Other human and spiritual values inspired by Lasallian pedagogy and spirituality are instrumental values capable of leading young people to the absolute value — God.

"The mission of the Christian teacher aims at the creation of a society where God reigns through truth, justice and charity; a society where the weakest find social redemption. The Christian teacher will find means of forming the consciences of his students to be critical of their own society and confident of themselves. He will encourage them to participate in activities for the common good, warn them against manipulation by the means of social communication and encourage them to say what they think." (Cf. O Carisma de La Salle, RELAL)

3) THE SACRED CONGREGATION FOR CATHOLIC EDUCATION

The Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education in its document "Lay Catholics in Schools: Witnesses to the Faith" speaks of the values and importance of the Christian teacher who witnesses by his attitude:

"Critical transmission also involves the presentation of a set of values and counter values. This must be judged within the context of an appropriate concept of life and of the human person. The Catholic teacher, therefore, cannot be content simply to present Christian values as a set of abstract objectives to be admired, even if this be done positively and with imagination; they must be presented as values which generate human attitudes and these attitudes must be encouraged in the students. Examples of such attitudes would be these: a freedom which includes respect for others; conscientious responsibility; a sincere and constant search for truth; a calm and peaceful critical spirit; a spirit of solidarity with and service towards all other persons; a sensitivity for justice; a special awareness of being called to be positive agents of change in a society that is undergoing continuous transformation."

"Knowledge, values, attitudes and behaviour fully integrated with faith will result in the student's personal synthesis of life and faith. Very few Catholics, then, have the opportunity that the educator has to accomplish the very purpose of evangelisation: the incarnation of the Christian message in the lives of men and women." (Paragraphs 30 and 31)

4) FOR PERSONAL REFLECTION OR GROUP DISCUSSION?

a) What place do the Gospel and the Holy Scriptures, in general, have in our scale of educational values?

b) What attitudes does the teaching of Saint John Baptist inspire in our students and teachers so that Christian-human values permeate our educative community?

c) What injustices exist in our own educative community?

d) What can we do to ensure more awareness of liberty, justice and brotherhood and what action can we take to transform the relations and structures of the educational system?

e) How do the educational activities of our community show up when judged in the light of de La Salle's teaching on the educational service of the poor?

5) SUGGESTIONS

1) During Eucharistic celebrations use the penitential rite, the Offertory or Communion to:

a) ask pardon for our personal and community neglect of Christian values in our lives;

b) offer to the Father our resolution to live by and give witness to Christian values in our own lives;

c) thank God for the progress made and the good example given by Brothers and teachers from de La Salle's time to the present day.

2) Commentary followed by the Lord's Prayer.

3) Prayer: "Oh God, who hast manifested Thyself through the mouth of the prophets, send unto us Thy Spirit that, faithful to our Christian vocation, we may, like Mary, in her canticle, announce Thy message of liberation and renounce social and personal sin. We ask this through Jesus Christ, Thy Son, who lives and reigns with Thee in the unity of the Holy Spirit. Amen." WHO ARE THE MARGINALISED?

In the guidelines given to the Barcelona Secretariate of the mission to those on the fringe of society we find a definition of this concept. Here are its terms:

"We consider as marginalised all individuals or groups who, for economic, racial, cultural or ideological reasons or because of physical or mental disabilities, have not got free access to the benefits of society (work, culture, services, participation, consideration etc.); everything in fact, which places them in a situation where they are unable to fulfil their potential as human beings."

REMARKS

- The economic factor is all important. If you have money, even though you are disabled, you are not marginalised or treated as such. A President of the United States was paralysed as a result of polio. A handicapped person from a wealthy family gets all the care that specialised services can provide.
- In some countries, immigrants belonging to certain races who come in search of work, are completely marginalised. Some are sent to prison merely because they do not have valid identity documents.
- The person who, in his youth, did not have a chance to receive instruction or education will have difficulty in reaching a position where he will be treated with the respect due to him as a person.
- In cities many sick people receive only occasional treatment. Society does not accept full responsibility for them and if it is a totally capitalistic society so much the worse for the sick.

THE SOCIALLY MARGINALISED PERSON

He lives on the fringe of society: he failed to keep peace with it and is now without friends, if indeed, he ever had any; he has given up hoping; he realises that it is impossible to improve his situation and ends by feeling that he is "on the other side of the tracks" among those condemned to look in from the outside, to watch the march of social progress, wealth, well-being, decent standards of living, social consideration and self-respect.

He does not belong!

THOSE WHO SHOULD NOT BE CONSIDERED AS SOCIALLY MARGINALISED

- Certain groups who, for ideological or political reasons or merely to defy the social system, opt out. Generally speaking, they can give up their self-imposed marginalisation if they so wish.
- Certain classes who consider themselves or call themselves marginalised: women engaged in the feminist struggle, homosexuals, prostitutes etc. We all, in some way or other, suffer a degree of marginalisation. There is always someone who does not accept us or places to which we do not have access.

THE MARGINALISED PERSON AS DEFINED BY THE DIOCESE OF BARCELONA

• He endures material poverty and human deprivation as a cause or consequence of his marginalisation.

• He cannot escape from his unfortunate condition without help from others.

• He does not choose this condition, does not seek it and is incapable of protest against the society which forced it on him or of seeking help to face up to and improve his lot.

• His condition is imposed not by the society as a whole but by groups within it. He ends up by creating a world of his own, a world apart... Social legislation is of no real help to him (in the end it serves to punish him). Cultural organisations do not help him nor do the social services to which he cannot or does not know how to apply without help from somebody else.

• It is very difficult for society, whether through government agencies or voluntary organisations, to take responsibility for the complete and effective integration of such people.

THE MARGINALISED

— Many children who do not receive even basic care from birth.
— Those who get no education — they are often rejected because of the problems they create.
— Young people without home or family or who have left home for reasons which were unforeseen or unforseeable.
— Old people without a roof over their head.
— Unmarried mothers, rejected by their families.
— Prostitutes, especially when they get old.
— Prisoners abandoned by their families and without legal aid.
— Families of unemployed parents, left without means of subsistence.
— The sick who are unable to do productive work and have no families to help them.
— The mentally handicapped who, at best, are locked away in institutions where they often receive treatment which reduces them to vegetables.
— Migrant workers who cannot find work, have neither home, family or friends and no knowledge of the language of the country.
— Ex-prisoners whose families don't want them.
— Vagrants without a home, belonging to no group, no family.
— The populations of countries which did not benefit by industrialisation and are exploited by the more advanced countries of the world.
— Ethnic minorities persecuted in their own country.

We have among us many marginalised people whether in rich countries or poor countries. It is only too easy to ignore them, to pass them by, to forget them. At best, we concern ourselves with them when they inconvenience us. Then we try to get rid of them by placing them in "homes", putting them out of sight in shanty towns or slums. If we could, we would put them in concentration camps.

Some years ago, when I was working in a center with five hundred boys between the ages of six and fifteen I was subjected to all sorts of criticism, recriminations and prohibitions, even by the administration, because we decided that the boys had the right to go for a walk, play with the children in neighbouring villages, go to the cinema or go on excursions in small groups...

But Christ went to meet the marginalised of His time: lepers, beggars, the blind, the possessed, prostitutes... And we walk with Christ only when we are sensitive to this burning problem: The existence of men — our brothers — whom we ignore or try to get rid of lest they trouble our tranquillity!

THE CHARISM OF TEACHING

The term 'charism' has transcended its theological connotation in recent times, becoming a 'media-word', applied freely to notable talent in almost any sphere — politics, entertainment, sport etc. The present article recalls its scriptural origin and considers its significance with special reference to the teaching vocation.

The word "charisma" may have been coined by St. Paul himself. The addition of the suffix "-ma" to effect a slight change in the meaning of an existing word was not, it seems, unusual in the spoken usage of Paul's time. In this case, the classical word "charis", meaning "a favour", became "charisma", meaning "the result of a favour", taking on a further specific shade of meaning by the use to which Paul put it. Some commentators prefer to think that he took over the word for his own purposes from Hellenistic Greek, but the difficulty with this view is that only two examples of its use have been found in one of the two most important writers of the period, Philo, and none at all in the other, Josephus.

But, whatever its origin, it is very much Paul's own word. Of its total 16 occurrences in the New Testament (there are none in the Greek O.T.) 15 are in the Pauline corpus. The exception is in I Peter 4:10, a single coincidence which may have something to do with the acknowledged assistance in the composition of that letter of Paul's fellow-missionary, Silas. We have come to think of the word in the technical sense conveyed by its modern derivative "charism", but Paul's use of it shows that it could be applied to any of God's gifts freely bestowed, without merit on the part of the recipient and without recall on the part of the divine giver (Rom. 11:29).

THE PAULINE LISTS

It is, however, in its technical sense that the word is most characteristic of Paul and most frequently used by him. There are four lists of the charisms in his letters: two in I Corinthians (12:8-10 and 12:28), one in Romans (12:6-8) and one in Ephesians (4:11). Not all four lists contain the same charisms; it would be uncharacteristic of Paul's spontaneous manner if they did. When we compare the four lists, we notice that only two charisms appear in all four, namely prophecy and teaching. This coincidence cannot of itself be taken to mean that Paul considered these two charisms the most important ones, for that would raise a problem about the status of "apostles", named in only two of the lists. But it may be fair to infer that Paul thought of prophecy and teaching as being particularly representative of what he intended to convey by the word "charism".

AN ORDER OF IMPORTANCE?

The question of relative importance among the charisms is, in fact, one that is discussed by N.T. commentators. When Paul wrote in I Cor. 12:28: "And God has appointed in the Church first apostles, second prophets, third teachers, then workers of miracles, then healers, helpers, administrators, speakers in various kinds of tongues..." did he intend to establish an order of importance among the charisms? Some authorities (e.g. the German K.H. Rengstorf and the Englishman J. Ruef) would answer negatively; but the author of the standard commentary on I Corinthians, Père E.B. Allo, O.P., is categorical for the affirmative view: "God has established in his Church a strict order of function and dignity. The words 'first', 'second' and 'third' are to be understood as literally as possible; he who is 'first' is above him who is 'second', the 'second' above the 'third'..." (Première Epître aux Corinthiens, p. 333). A similar opinion is favoured by Rudolf Schnackenburg and by the authors of The International Critical Commentary on I Corinthians.

APOSTLES, PROPHETS AND TEACHERS

If we follow these latter authorities in opting for a hierarchical order in our interpretation of I Cor. 12:28, we note that those who were designated "apostles" in the early Church were ranked first. The primacy of apostleship, as a service to the community, was unchallengeable. This charism corresponded most closely to that of Jesus' chosen Twelve. Paul, an apostle 'born out of due time', is the staunchest apologist for the role and its most eloquent panegyrist. He more than once lays vehement claim to the title for himself (as, for example, in the opening sentence of his letter to the Galatians) and, in II Cor. 3:1-6:10, he spells out what such a claim implies, what it is to be, by this charism, "ambassadors for Christ" and "fellow-workers with God".

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center

Next in Paul's list come the prophets, those agents by whom the Holy Spirit declared God's will or revealed coming events to the Church. Their lineage went back to the great seers of the Old Testament. "He who prophesies," wrote Paul, "speaks to men for their upbuilding and encouragement and consolation" (I Cor. 14:3).

And, ranking only below those two noble charisms in Paul's list, comes that of the teachers. Needless to say, this charism was possessed and exercised in a supreme degree by the apostles, as is clearly shown throughout the Acts of the Apostles. But, as time went on, a specific teaching office began to emerge in the Church, evidence for which is supplied by the Pastoral Epistles and by the writings of the earliest Fathers. Our available space will not allow us to examine the way in which, in fact, the N.T. demonstrates the potent influence of the teaching charism in the early Church. But what we can touch upon is the relevance of this evidence for us today.

THE VATICAN COUNCIL'S RENEWAL OF THE CHARISMS

A succinct statement of that relevance is to be found in paragraph 12 of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen Gentium, where we read: "It is not only through the sacraments and official ministries that the Holy Spirit sanctifies and leads the People of God and enriches it with virtues. Granting his gifts 'to each one as he chooses' (I Cor. 12:11) he also distributes special graces among the faithful of every rank, by which he makes them able and willing to undertake various tasks or services advantageous for the renewal and upbuilding of the Church, according to the words of the Apostle: 'To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good' (I Cor. 12:7). These charisms, whether they be the more unusual or the more simple and widely diffused, are to be received with thanksgiving and consolation, for they are exceedingly suitable and useful for the needs of the Church."

In another document, the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (Apostolicam Actuositatem), the Council Fathers declared that the Holy Spirit confers the charisms which enable the laity to carry out an apostolate in the Church (par. 3) and later, in the same document, that "teaching is a distinguished form of this apostolate" (par. 30). (It is worth recalling, also, that Cardinal Suenens, in his decisive intervention in favour of the Council's stressing the perennial value of the charisms for the Church, instanced the field of catechetics as his first example of the way these charisms are seen to be active today.) Yet again, in par. 8 of the Decree on the Renewal of Religious Life (Perfectae Caritatis), the contributions made by religious Institutes to the apostolate, including that of "teaching doctrine", are specifically related to the Pauline charisms listed in Romans 12 and I Corinthians 12.

ST. DE LA SALLE'S ANTICIPATION OF THE COUNCIL'S TEACHING

It is impossible for anyone acquainted with the Meditations of St. John Baptist de La Salle, and particularly with his sixteen Meditations for the Time of Retreat, not to be impressed by the way in which he anticipated this teaching of the Council on the renewal of the charisms in the Church. All four Pauline passages are quoted or alluded to in the Retreat Meditations, and their doctrine underlies our Saint's profound understanding of his disciples' ministry in the Church — and indeed the ministry of "all persons engaged in the education of youth", for the meditations were written for them as well as for the Brothers. One passage, in particular, explicitates this concept and may be quoted here as an appropriate conclusion to these brief considerations:

> "Reflect on what St. Paul says, that God has established in the Church apostles, prophets and teachers, and you will be convinced that he has also established you in your ministry. The same saint gives you another expression of this when he says that there are different gifts, different ministries, and that to each person the manifestation of the Spirit is given for the common good, that is, the good of the Church. To one the Spirit gives wisdom in discourse, to another the gift of faith is given by the same Spirit. You must not doubt that it is a great gift of God, this grace he has given you to be entrusted with the instruction of children, to announce the gospel to them and to bring them up in the spirit of religion. But in calling you to this holy ministry, God demands that you fulfill it with an ardent zeal for their salvation..." (MTR 9,1, Tr. Loes).

MEETING OF YOUNG LASALLIANS MALTA AND CARACAS 1983

BROTHER JOSE PABLO BASTERRECHEA, Superior General, to the Young Lasallians gathered in MALTA and CARACAS

Dear Lasallians,

This time I am going to address you in the form of a meditation. What you have done in meeting here is of greater importance than a simple meeting and enters the domain of the Church's mission in the world today.

THE PRESENCE OF GOD

This is the first condition for meditating on the Kingdom. So: "Let us remember that we are in the presence of God".

In De La Salle's spirituality, the PRESENCE OF GOD impregnates everything. God present at the centre of his life, such is the objective which every Brother who understands his mission proposes for himself. These are, therefore, the opening words to our meditation. "What place does God fill in my life? What role does his presence play in my daily activities? How does this presence enlighten my youth? Does God count above all the other values to which I am attached?"

1st POINT. FRATERNITY

This is the basic charism of the Brothers since their first Assembly in 1684. And their pupils have inherited it. Brotherhood stands out as soon as there is a Lasallian meeting. But this friendship, this brotherhood, today has not as objective the meeting of friends or old school companions. It is rather a force and a responsibility. Like the Brothers, we form a whole and we are a force. It all depends on the REASONS for our meetings.

For the last 20 years, we, the Brothers, have accepted the need to, and, in fact, do transform internally, our spirit and objectives, in full agreement with what the Founder would do if he had to start all over again.

I believe that this transformation affects the Lasallian Associations in the same way and for the same reasons. But I think that this transformation is too slow, sometimes they hold back and do not always understand it.

We Brothers, perhaps more than anybody, should understand the importance of the Lasallian layman and encourage him intelligently.

Practical application of this first point

Multiply these youth groups, starting with those in the last years at school. Meet often to discuss your experiences and to start initiatives. Seek objectives according to De La Salle's guidelines. And give the Associations that youthful look which is its special characteristic.

Then try to reinvigorate and rejuvenate the Associations. Give them a soul and make them joyfully alive. Propose high objectives to them and get to work yourselves with generosity so that the slogan you yourselves invented may be true: "TODAY WE ARE LA SALLE"

2nd POINT. FAITH

Your course resembles that of the Brothers. It is therefore inevitable that you be concerned about their "spirit". The Brothers, you know, do not lead a life which is strictly speaking "contemplative". Their life requires them to be active. The Brother is "born to activity". Yet he is a religious, consecrated to God who is the "centre and end of his life".

The Founder was able to fuse the two extremes and the result is that he wants the Brothers to inspire this activity. Hence he gives the Brothers three indispensable axes: personal daily PRAYER by which "he goes up to God with his apostolic anxieties... and comes down to his pupils to communicate to them the divine orders". And this, for the Brothers, is fundamental. The second is the PRESENCE OF GOD of which we have already spoken. God is with him the whole day long to be loved and served. The third is that of the GOSPEL, meditated profoundly to draw from it a way of life suitable for the Brothers.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

It should be the same with the conscientious Lasallian. And let me say that something very similar should inspire your groups of young Lasallians who meet together to reflect, pray in community and sincerely seek the Kingdom. You act, you feel, you are seeking the same thing... The means should be the same.

FAITH consists not only in "believing in something". It is above all LIVING SOMEONE. FAITH means assimilating the Gospel which becomes a criterion. To succeed in this living faith, I put two means to you which are taken from the Founder himself:

The GOSPEL assimilated through quiet reading, meditation and prayer. Feel that your mission today is a real VOCATION very similar to that of John, Peter, Philip and James and that the Spirit confirms and makes the morning of pentecost definitive. Our Lord Jesus has not ceased to call us today and the Spirit is not yet exhausted so...

Practical applications of this second point

See that those groups of young people you are going to multiply are Christian groups: groups of prayer, of the Gospel. That FAITH, which we are considering today, be the strength of this community.

3rd POINT. SERVICE

Now we must turn to the Founder. We do not know whether it was because he gave himself completely to God that he devoted himself also to the poor... or whether, understanding the needs of the poor, he devoted himself to them and felt the need of God. What is certain is that John Baptist de La Salle, under the inspiration of the Spirit, tried to find a remedy for the poverty afflicting neglected children and young people far removed from salvation. It was they, the children and the young who caused the conversion of this noble bourgeois into an apostle and a saint.

Young Lasallians must learn this lesson, united in FRATERNITY, leading a life of profound FAITH, they must enroll themselves in the SERVICE of the poor. And here everything is possible except for the lack of spirit, irresponsibility, the incoherence in our life style. Children and young people suffering some deprivation and, especially those who do not benefit from education, the outcasts, are all objects of our Lasallian preoccupations.

Young Lasallians, this year which precedes Mexico must be a year of few words but of numerous Lasallian "facts". Come to Mexico with the assurance of having inaugurated a new style in the Lasallian Associations.

Here is the new objective I am putting to you: get in contact with some Lasallian missionary work. Let each group of young Lasallians try to find a Lasallian "mission" and get to know it. Let it try to help it by all the means suggested by your interest in a work which is really worth while.

Will the young Lasallians understand and accept this new sign of the Institute, and will they have the evangelical courage to follow this movement through their personal and communitarian devotedness?

If, when we come to Mexico, your actions express positively that you have understood me and that this year will have been a year of "signs", we can face the Congress with hope.

Practical application of this third point

Do not go off in different directions. Determine WHAT you are going to do, WHEN and HOW you are going to do it... because it is you yourselves who have said it — following De La Salle is SERVICE, and today, WE ARE DE LA SALLE.

SPIRITUAL BOUQUET

At the end of our life, we shall be judged on our LOVE. Our Lord says: "Then the Son of Man will say to those who will be on his right hand: 'Come you blessed of my Father, for I was hungry and you gave me to eat, thirsty and you gave me to drink, I was naked and you clothed me, sick and you visited me'... And they will say to Him When did we see you hungry or thirsty, or poor, or sick or in prison and we assisted you?" And He will answer them: "I tell you that every time you did it to one of the least of my brethren, you did it to me".

Dear young people, here we are at the end of this meditation. Now is the time to return to reality. Accentuate FRATERNITY, enlightened by FAITH, devote yourself to SERVICE. Then Malta and Caracas will be two lights on the Lasallian journey.

MEXICO CONGRESS 24 TO 28 JULY, 1984

In the history of the Lasallian World Federation it was the congresses which revealed the signs of the times, often in a rather disconcerting manner. A quick glance at the various congresses will show us a little known aspect of the Lasallian movement among lay people.

• First CONGRESS, BRUSSELS - October, 1958. The first international meeting of past pupils was expressly called by Brother Nicet-Joseph, Superior General. A thousand past pupils attended and enthusiastically approved the project for a world federation, which Cardinal Pizzardo had asked for in his letter of 30 September, 1958. He stated, "This project fulfills one of the dearest wishes of Pope Pius XII" and Pope John XXIII told the group which was drawing up the constitution, "The moment has come to form this federation".

• Second CONGRESS, ROME - September, 1960. Thirty-seven delegations, meeting in general assembly, adopted the constitution of the World Federation.

• Third CONGRESS, BARCELONA - September, 1964. (2,000 Delegates attended.) For the first time the Congress considered a theme under 21 different aspects. The theme was the Second Vatican Council and the Congress showed, in a striking way, its relevance to society. For Spain it meant a complete revolution in thinking and marked progress towards association. For the other delegates it was less revolutionary, perhaps because they had not had time to study the Council documents.

• Fourth CONGRESS, CANADA - 1967. Two factors adversely influenced the work of this congress. It met in five different cities, each of which had wanted to sponsor it. 1967 was, also, the year of the World Exhibition in Montréal. These two circumstances did not make for the serious study of the theme prepared for the congress. However, Brother Charles Henry, Superior General, spoke at all five centers, briefly but very much to the point.

• Fifth CONGRESS, BUENOS AIRES - 1972. A wind of change, made stronger by the Second Vatican Council and the General Chapter of 1966, was blowing. For the first time, the Institute, in the person of Brother Pablo, Vicar General, stated what it thought of and expected from the associations of past pupils — Christian living and social and missionary action were the order of the day.

• Sixth CONGRESS, MALTA - 1976. Not more than 600 delegates attended but they made their views clear. The federation changed its name and its structures. Its objectives were henceforth to be precise: The Lasallian World Federation comprises the whole Lasallian family; former students, lay teachers, parents of pupils, friends of the Brothers and young people who wish to join — all who wish to follow the inspiration of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

The federation accepts as a challenge its role in: the welfare of young people, the strengthening of Christian family life, the promotion of solidarity and justice, concern for those who are suffering and the defense and development of Christian education.

• Seventh CONGRESS, PARIS - 1980. It was the year of the Third Centenary of the foundation of the Institute. Not surprisingly, therefore, the congress was held in Paris, Reims and Rouen and the central theme was the Founder, whose work was studied both before and during the congress. The presence of a number of young people who knew what they wanted was an important aspect of the congress. Admiration for the Founder took various forms.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

One large group undertook to lead an evangelical life, in the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle, by becoming members of "SIGNUM FIDEI". Henceforth the activities of the associations would center on the Founder.

• Eighth CONGRESS, MEXICO - 1984. It seems that the Federation has found its raison d'être which is to inspire the whole Lasallian family. It is not enough to admire our Father. We must imitate him, otherwise we get lost in theories which are not translated into action. Here, then, is what the coming congress in Mexico can offer those who are willing to attend, even if it means a real effort on their part:

— Fidelity to the Institute in the sense that the federation is following a path parallel to that of the Institute in its devotion to the Founder and its dedication to the poor as desired in the last two General Chapters. The Paris Congress showed, in a very moving manner, its devotion to the Founder. That of Mexico should demonstrate, in its own way, its dedication to the poor — the preferred of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

— Sense of the Lasallian family which meets as brothers. Nothing in Mexico must give the slightest hint of class distinction: neither religion, race nor social status. All are brothers in de La Salle and must maintain simple, friendly relations so that those of modest means may feel themselves at home.

— Faith in the depth of our own hearts — faith in the mission confided to John Baptist de La Salle and to us in turn. We are certain that praying together will provide us with some of the most memorable moments of our stay in Mexico. The presence of God, so characteristic of the life of St. John Baptist de La Salle, will fill our days there. The wish of all, irrespective of religious denomination, to put God at the center of our lives, will be one of the principal fruits of this meeting.

— Educational service of the poor. This was the one great preoccupation of de La Salle's life. The Brothers have rediscovered its vital importance and we hope that it will be a major theme of this congress. The whole Lasallian family must turn its attention to the poor and make their educational needs the objective for which they will work all the harder. After the Paris Congress the only honourable way for us is to dedicate ourselves to the point of suffering, as Mother Teresa told us in Malta. This, we hope, will be the revolutionary call coming to us from Mexico.

• In the light of this ideal we would make the following suggestions:

1) Everything about the congress should be simple, austere and poor. It would be absurd to talk of the poor in an atmosphere of luxury.

2) More than any previous congress, this one should be organised with the poor in mind. Let us not come to Mexico with empty hands.

3) Everything in Mexico should be eminently practical: organisation, discussions with definite objectives, practical projects, real achievements.

4) After Mexico each National Federation should hold its own "application" congress to consider what was said and done in Mexico and to put it into practice at local level.

5) Young people, like others, must bring their dynamism and drive, as well as the experience acquired at an international meeting, to the task of putting into practice what they have learned.

REACHING THE UNREACHED... IN THE STEPS OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

Note: The Editorial Committee is grateful to the author for his response to an invitation to contribute a paper to 'Lasalliana'. Brother Superior General, in his Christmas Letter 1982, paid tribute to Brother James's work in these terms: "Not far from Madurai, Brother James Kimpton is engaged in an impressive work of development and training among very poor children and families (including a group of lepers) in the 'Saint Joseph Village' of Genguvarpatti. This type of work deserves our fullest admiration and our wholehearted support, inspired as it is by an authentic Lasallian spirit on behalf of people whose needs are extreme."

In my work among the poor remote villages of this part of South India, St. De La Salle and his special charisms have been the heart and soul of what I do. Without the very particular atmosphere that the whole Lasallian drive has given to my own individual outreach, I think little would have been achieved of any permanence.

THE UNKNOWN FUTURE — AS IT WAS FOR DE LA SALLE, AS IT IS FOR US

Quite definitely De La Salle's whole life was one of several displacements in which he had to take steps out into the dark of the unknown future. These steps, these displacements, he had to make in total trust in the call of divine Providence. He had to make them, not asking for light to see the whole road, but just enough to make the next few steps. He was called gradually to leave all aspects of his established life for which he had been specially prepared during his earlier years. Thus he gave up his position in the Cathedral of Rheims to go down and live with the much lower level of society his new work demanded. He had eventually to leave his aristocratic paternal house and family in order to live among the uncultured men whom God had chosen for him to work with. He went into work that was wholly new, started off in an apostolate which he could not possibly foresee. So much so that eventually, towards the end of his life, he admitted that if he had known the amount of suffering and hardship entailed in the work he had founded, he would not have touched it with the tip of his little finger.

Our work sometimes requires that we leave absolutely everything connected with the first part of our lives or even with subsequent parts of them, so that we are making new starts in unknown territories during different times of our lives. We may be asked to leave family and all established friends, home, and even country, permanently. We may have to abandon any connection with our own culture and accept another which is completely foreign. And we may have to step out into a way of life and work which is totally unknown.

Thus I, as an Englishman, have, at the choosing of Providence, spent most of my life in countries of the East, doing work I never dreamed I would do, and of such a wide variety that I too would have taken fright had it been presented to me in the beginning years: healing the sick, housing the homeless, teaching the untaught, caring for orphans, even mothering the tiny babies that are brought to us unwanted and uncared for, caring for leprosy patients... In all this, God's voice was heard and a step was made into the dark of the unknown future, taking the risk of launching out into the deeps pointed out by God.

TRUST IN PROVIDENCE WHICH DID NOT FAIL DE LA SALLE AND DOES NOT FAIL US

De La Salle taught me that his Brothers must have blind and total trust in divine Providence. He made it clear in his own life that God gives only so that we may give it all away, and that the more we give the more we will receive to give away, and that what is held on to can only stagnate and be fruitless.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Thus when De La Salle consulted his spiritual director to find out what he should do with all his inherited wealth he was quite bluntly told to give it all away and not keep even a fraction of it in any form. So-called wiser men thought he should use it to found his new schools, or that he should put it into the bank and live off the interest. But no, once again there was that step into the dark to be made, a challenge from God to be faced and a risk to be taken. And De La Salle took it. He literally gave everything away to the non-productive poor and went off and lived like them, completely dependent henceforth on Providence for all his needs and those of his earliest followers. Surely that too was meant as a lesson for us all; and so De La Salle made sure that his Brothers understood that their work was to be among the poorest and to be wholly gratuitous, and that they too were to depend on Providence — in the spirit of faith that he so often referred to.

In our work among the poorest of people in these villages, which are primitive and so lacking in every kind of security and necessity, our approach has always been, and I hope always will be, that if there is a need clearly shown to us by God, then the first step is not to look into purses or bank accounts, but to attend to the need, knowing full well with deep conviction that God will provide all that is needed in materials, finances and men. Never once has this failed. We came here with an allowance of Rs. 2,000 and we were asked not to request more hereafter. We looked around at our neighbours who lived in the most abject poverty and saw what we must do. We reached out. We attended to the greatest needs. We did the most foolish things in the eyes of the world and of those who depend upon large bank accounts or strong sources of income. We simply gave away what we had and we also started to build and heal and to care for children and the very needy, with no money. Our annual expenditure (not our budget, note, because only God can budget) is now Rs. 2,600,000 in the villages alone; and we also run a children's home for the most destitute and for unwanted babies, with its own separate accounting of close to Rs. 700,000.

Our Founder stepped out into the dark with empty hands and apparently inadequate helpers. But divine Providence never failed him. Divine Providence has never, in any way, failed us. Always there is enough to feed the five thousand in the desert — with twelve baskets of superabundance left over for still others.

THE SAINT'S ENDURING MESSAGE: TO RADIATE CHRIST TO OTHERS

But De La Salle knew full well that his real work was to be a redeemer with and for Christ. He knew that there was no other reason for his call from God than that he should spend himself in order to lead other souls to God, in order to be another redeemer in the work chosen for him by God. He knew also full well, and kept on reminding his Brothers, that the whole reason and meaning for their being Brothers was that they should radiate Christ to all with whom they came into contact the whole day long. They were to carry Christ in themselves because Christ in others awaited their love, and also their love was HIS love. There was to be this mutual interchange of Christs from the carrier to the receiver, as is always the case. De La Salle kept on insisting that we meet Christ in the early part of the day, at meditation and Mass and Communion, and that we keep in close touch with Him all day long, and that thus, indeed, we would be able to radiate Christ, that thus we would be other redeemers — and only thus. How frequently he came back to that refrain; how much he insisted that the Brothers be men of deep prayer — or else be worthless as pruned vine twigs.

In our work among the Hindus and Muslims in these small villages hidden away behind their veils of coconut palms, we rarely meet with Christians. And when I questioned myself why God had put us in such a place, among people we would not ever convert, He made it very, very clear that He was the one who was working and not us. He, Christ, was the one who would reach out to whomsoever He put in our paths each day. We know full well that only God can convert if He sees the need and when He is ready. He, Christ, would do His work, in His way — and often without our ever knowing what He was doing or why. Our responsibility was merely to keep in the closest touch with Christ and then to let Him work in the way He wanted. Our part was merely to show Christianity in action. All the rest was His doing.

Prayer: Lord, when I am hungry give me someone to feed; when I am thirsty give water for their thirst. When I am sad, give me someone to lift from sorrow. When burdens weigh upon me, lay upon my shoulders the burden of my fellows. Lord, when I stand greatly in need of tenderness, give me someone who yearns for love. May your will be my bread; your grace my strength; your love my resting place.

some insights into catechesis with adolescents in the context of contemporary society

In January 1983, Darton, Longman and Todd, London, published a short book by Brother Gerard Rummery, FSC, Australian Director of CIL, and Brother Damian Lundy, FSC, England, in which these two friends present a distillation of some of the ideas they have explored in recent years with parents, teachers, priests and young people in several countries. We offer a brief outline of the book's principal themes. Each of its five chapters contains material for reading, reflection and discussion, offering some questions to be explored in groups.

PILGRIMS TOGETHER

The authors argue that "there are no simple, universally applicable answers to the important questions we are considering. As the twentieth century moves towards the twenty first, old and young alike are pilgrims together, and in our changing society and church it is no longer a case of confused young searchers asking their questions to which older, wiser believers trot out the obvious familiar answers to be found, in a more stable age, in the common catechism, or in the standard manuals of theology of a centralized, unchanging, uniform church." And they add: "In adopting this attitude, we believe that we are being faithful not only to our times but to the very nature of faith itself, and to the experience of the first Christian believers. We believe that people are called to make the journey of faith not by treading mechanically a predetermined path..." (vii).

GROWING INTO FAITH IN A CHANGING WORLD

This is an unfamiliar and challenging concept for many Catholics: its notion of faith is dynamic, not static, seen as a gradual personal response to the God who speaks, calls and saves. At the same time to grow into faith is a challenge to grow into church, for "I am baptized into the faith of the community, and, as I grow, I look to my fellow-Christians to be accepted, nourished, forgiven, healed, blessed, renewed, challenged and enlightened, so that I, in my time, with my brothers and sisters, may become the Good News which will save the world." (4)

This positive view of church is, sadly, often lacking in the young, because it does not correspond to their experiences. As infants they were baptized into a church and a faith, from which many have become estranged: some simply drift away, while others, hostile and disillusioned, choose consciously to reject the faith of their parents.

A key task for adults is to ask how our church can transcend the cultural forms assumed in its historical development so as to be relevant to this new society and especially to the needs of the young. This calls for an analysis of past memories and present experience, helped by the insights of contemporary poets, anthropologists, social commentators and theologians — of which the book offers a sprinkling.

LISTENING TO THE YOUNG

A study of American youth in 1974 pointed to five dominant "cries" of the young: the cries of "self-hatred" (arising from a conviction of personal worthlessness and failure), of "the psychological orphan" (after conflict at home), of "social protest" (against inadequacies and injustice in society), of "the prejudiced" (eg. inherited racial discrimination) and of the "joyous". Does the adult church hear these cries? and, if so, how do we respond to them? Many feel that teenagers are more inclined to reject "churchianity" rather than "Christianity", because they see the church as irrelevant and outdated: "God, tell me... Are you really counting on this old lady to invite young people to dance?" (27)

But we must take care not to equate rejection of religion with loss of faith. The distinction is important. Indeed, the authors argue, "such a rejection may sometimes be necessary if the young person is to become emancipated from an image of God and his service which has never developed beyond the cultural conditioning of a family, church or society" (27).

FROM CONVENTION TO CONVICTION

We are familiar with the notion of "growing in faith", in the faith received as a gift of God in Baptism, which we are urged to hold on to or preserve. As an alternative to this rather static notion, the authors propose that we consider what is involved in "responding to the continuing call of the God whom we meet at the different stages of our lives — and not merely within the confines of one particular institution or system." So they speak of growing "INTO" faith, and explore the traditional image of life as a pilgrimage, suggesting that this has received new force from the stage-development theories of human psychology, proposed by pioneers like Piaget, Erikson and Kohlberg. The American Methodist researcher and teacher, J.W. Fowler (with whom the authors worked during the summer of 1983), has applied the psychological insights of these pioneers to the study of faith-development. The findings of years of research are presented in Fowler's book, Stages of Faith (Harper and Row, San Francisco, 1982). He shows how the faith of childhood, rooted in experiences associated with the family and social background, is challenged in our culture to grow beyond these boundaries through a process of personal struggle, critical reflection, reassessment and searching in the years of adolescence and adulthood. Older Christians, more secure and established in their faith, must not "lose faith" in the young but try to assist the process whereby the "turning away" of adolescence can become a "turning toward" a new and positive set of values and beliefs. Catechesis can help this process, but it can also hinder it.

The journey from the "received faith" of convention to the "sought after faith" of personal conviction is difficult and confusing in a society as complex as ours: it demands time, space, guidance, encouragement and patience, and a great respect for personal freedom. The concerned adult reader may best be brought to appreciate this by tracing the main stages of his own personal growth into the faith which is now his own, though he may need to be reminded that the society in which he grew up has changed radically in most countries.

"NO ONE MAKES THE JOURNEY OF FAITH ALONE!"

The final pages of the book are concerned to explore, in practice, how parents and teachers can respect the growing autonomy of young people, while trying to provide the conditions which appear to favour growth into a more mature personal faith. We are called to pass on the Christian heritage and to open up the richness of a concept of faith which invites the development of a trusting relationship with God which will prompt a person to act according to Christian values, not just to give assent to verbal formulae.

If we apply the Emmaus story (Luke 24) to our present situation, we shall see that ministry to the young may be much more important than formal classroom teaching — though there is a place for such teaching provided that it is done well. Sensitive ministry offers the challenge to commit oneself to Jesus as a disciple, while respecting the individual's freedom to respond to the call, as Jesus himself did (Matthew 19,16f.). In a constructive spirit, readers are invited to work with young people on a "re-designing exercise" on the church they would like to become — a church in which personal ministry could be more effective.

One central idea of this book is that not only do young travellers need the support from an older generation, but equally that older travellers need the vitality, the promise and the hope communicated by the young. The process of accompaniment at different stages of the journey is explored with reference to models of the faith-community opened up in official church documents, as well as in personal "dreams", and the authors discern some signs of hope, as they ask:

> "So what about this vision of a living church, which is good news for a world often disillusioned by the failures and inadequacies of religious systems which seem to preach one thing while practising another? How does it compare with the sad old lady, dressing up for the hollow celebrations, while the young yawn with boredom? It's a long way off... And yet, in the last few years, there have been so many promising signs of a renewal of faith and of community in the most unlikely places, sometimes in the very centre of decay and hopelessness. Our age has its prophets, like every other. God still speaks, and his word has lost none of its power. It is a word many young people long to hear: 'I want the Church to show me the love and glory of God himself, so that, with God's help, the Church, society and the world will work itself out — through God's love,' wrote one seventeen-year-old, recently." RUN SCHOOLS OR FACE A CATASTROPHE

Understanding the situation

UNDERSTANDING THE SITUATION

Both catholic and protestant schools have been in the Camerouns for almost a century. From the very beginning of evangelization the missions opened schools followed by colleges.

The colonial administrators made the opening of a school a condition for opening a new mission. Though sent by a secular government in Paris to run the "Colony" for France, the High Commissioners of the Metropolis none-the-less made grants to denominational schools.

Each superior of a mission was at the same time director of his primary school and sometimes of the college. The Church regarded the school as the first place in which to preach the Gospel.

In 1948, a bishop asked the Brothers to run a Training College for Teachers. Other bishops followed his example and soon there was a considerable number of religious in the primary and secondary schools of the country. This was a period of glory for the denominational schools.

The situation changed in the 1970s. Religious personnel became scarce and the influx of students continued to grow in both primary and secondary schools. In the primary schools, lay people became directors and in the secondary schools Cameroun lay teachers form an increasing percentage of the teaching staff. The F.S.C. are the first to hand over the management of their schools to the Camerounais.

But in many cases the two phenomena, Camerounization and plethora of staff, are not organized but suffered as a necessary evil.

1) Many parish priests, where laymen have taken over, are no longer interested in the school where they no longer have any authority, Discipline, levels of study and results are in rapid decline.

2) Diocesan directors, often unprepared, neglect pedagogical leadership in favour of the administration of finances and of personnel.

3) The primary school teachers getting less and less help are now more and more overworked. In most schools the teacher pupil ratio is 1:60. The six year olds start their schooling in classes of up to 100.

4) The salaries of teachers in private schools remain static while the cost of living is constantly on the increase. Hence the loss of the best of the teachers to more lucrative posts. In spite of the efforts of the Church to obtain just salaries for the teachers all attempts at improvement have been blocked. It is the State which fixes the fees in the private schools and also the amount of grant. Moreover, the Teachers' Union is ineffective since it is affiliated to the one and only party.

5) The present schools in the Camerouns seem to be less and less adapted to the cultural context of the rediscovery of the ancient values proper to the country, of an expanding economy and of youth unemployment.

SOME ATTEMPTS AT FINDING A SOLUTION IN THE DIOCESE OF YAOUNDE

In spite of the attempts by the Cameroun Episcopal Conference, the problems of salaries have never been solved. Hope springs anew with the new political regime under President Biya. The elementary principle of social justice, "equal pay for equal work" seems like a dream after 25 years of vexations. The effort to find sponsors for our schools has never given satisfactory results.

Since 1971, the Church has attempted to let parents and local people generally have their say, to let them take the initiative in educational and teaching matters. They were deprived of this right with the advent of the white schools. This is the School for Collective Advancement which the Brothers initiated at the request of Archbishop Jesus Zoa of Yaoundé.

Since 1973, the local Church, aided by International Organizations (Swiss Lent Action, CCFD) organized short courses of a month for its 1050 primary school teachers to improve teaching techniques and initiate them into leadership methods for their milieu.

At the same time, the Church also organized training courses in leadership for the local communities, courses not only for teachers but also for the responsible people in the neighbourhood, such as religious and political leaders, traders, influential planters, and agricultural and hygiene leaders, etc. To adapt evangelization better to the local mentality, catechists have perfected a method and catechetical text books in the traditional language and according to the needs of horizontal sharing (palabre) and a more meditative form of prayer.

To motivate the leaders in their function as Christian educators, days of recollection have been organized for the last few years, the themes being taken from the teaching of St. John Baptist de La Salle for the Brothers. In 1982, the theme was, "Make no distinction between what concerns your employment and what concerns your sanctification". In 1983, "You are the ministers of God and the ambassadors of Jesus of Jesus Christ to the children confided to your care". As a result of these recollections, many of the teachers have expressed the wish to know the Founder of the Brothers better and to celebrate his feastday every year.

BUT IS THIS SUFFICIENT?

After decades of ineffectual effort to obtain a just remuneration for the teachers, is not running schools, in fact, conniving at a grave social injustice?

On the other hand, does not the handing of a school over to the State authorities risk depriving the little ones and those in remote parts, who have no voice, of their right to instruction? Have we made ourselves sufficiently clear about the teaching content and methods better adapted to the needs of the people?

Have we used efficacious means to make parents with no voice against authority more aware of their rights? What can still be done so that they do not rely on the Church in the struggle we share with them?

We have invested in courses and educational days for their training. What other means can we take for their continuing training?

The spiritual doctrine of De La Salle, their patron, inspires and stimulates our teachers. What can we do to share it with them and bring it within their reach?

There are still 50 F.S.C. in school in the Camerouns working side by side with many former pupils. How can they become better promoters of pedagogical, cultural and evangelical renewal?

The Brothers have been working in the Camerouns for 35 years. What do they know about their former students? Why do not the Associations of Former Students share in the preoccupations the Church has with the catholic school?

INTERVIEW WITH BROTHER SUPERIOR GENERAL

From the beginning Brother Superior has encouraged and supported the publication of "Lasalliana" and follows its development with keen interest. We thought the moment had come to ask him to explain his reasons for encouraging our efforts and his interest in the project as part of the general Lasallian renewal movement.

1. "Brother Superior, you were present in Lyons in September, 1982, when the joint Institute - Lasallian Associations decided to produce the Lasallian leaflets, later to become "Lasalliana". From the start you strongly supported the project. Could you tell us what your motives were?"

Brother Superior: "The meeting to which you refer revealed, once again, a movement which is taking place in many areas where the Institute exists and is at work. It is the increasing number of people who feel affection and admiration for John Baptist de La Salle and his work and who want to get to know better the meaning of the Lasallian message for the world to-day.

It is only natural that persons and groups who share this interest should seek publications of quality containing serious studies which would deepen their knowledge and guarantee its authenticity. There are already many publications which provide reflections, information and commentaries on St. John Baptist de La Salle but the authors of these publications experience, themselves, the need for more ample and authoritative information on the Founder and his message.

To meet this need we formed a group of Brothers who, having a thorough knowledge of the Founder and easy access to sources, could write and publish regular articles for those who are interested and feel the need for such authentic information. This is precisely what the team responsible for "Lasalliana" is doing so I am happy to support and recommend their work and the aims they have in view."

2. "Brother Superior, we are now approaching the end of 1983. The Lasallian movement, comprised of lay people interested in the spirituality and educative practice of the Brothers, is spreading widely. How do you see the development of the movement?"

Brother Superior: "I consider this movement positive, relevant and urgent. Without exaggeration I think these qualifications justified. The development is positive because it is a sign of progress in the understanding of and respect given to de La Salle and also because it penetrates deeper into those layers of society associated with the Brothers.

I have had the opportunity of being present at the inauguration of the movement and have seen its development in many different parts of the world. I believe that in this development we can see clear signs of the presence and action of the Holy Spirit.

It is a relevant development because it co-incides with a movement becoming general in the Church — the growing awareness of the essential role of lay people as the people of God — a movement firmly founded on the teaching of the Gospel.

It is an urgent development because it is the only means of facing the immense tasks which confront and challenge us. How else can we serve the young and the poor, promote justice and find solutions to problems identical with those which inspired and called forth the founding zeal of St. J.B. de La Salle.

For all these reasons which I have stated more than once, I see in this movement a great motive for hope at this moment in the history of the Institute."

3. "What suggestions would you make so that after a promising start, the movement does not lose impetus and continues to give satisfaction to those who joined it?"

Brother Superior: "Briefly, I would limit myself to proposing what is of immediate application. We must take care to nourish the movement with genuine and precise ideas based on the inspiration and message that de La Salle left us by his example and in his writings. We must not invent a fictional de La Salle in place of the historic Founder. The first feelings of affection, spontaneous, empirical and emotional as they are, must be deepened, strengthened and supported by an exact and well-founded knowledge of the man.

We must also provide the members of the movement with opportunities for exercising their enthusiasm in a concrete way. Practical projects must be envisaged and planned to put into effect what Lasallian thinking and the Founder's teaching suggest for helping those in need and guiding youth along Christian social lines. A movement which confines itself to speeches and thinks that progress consists in rhetorical proclamations, is condemned to an inglorious demise. It has none of the characteristics of the initiatives of St. John Baptist de La Salle."

4. "Brother Superior, how do you see the role of 'Lasalliana' in this movement?"

Brother Superior: "I think the answer lies in what I have already seen of "Lasalliana" and its relation to the movement. To avoid being jeopardised, the movement should be given clear, dynamic ideas, of proven authenticity and in keeping with the reality which we are trying to get to know better. The achievements by which it will become known and strengthened must be based on sound principles inspired by truth. We hope that 'Lasalliana' will provide such ideas in plenty, together with motivation, data and facts capable of communicating the personality and thought of the Founder and capable, also, of suggesting initiatives in accordance with his teaching.

May 'Lasalliana' become a source of inspiration and courage by making known the spirit which should animate the movement and graft it more firmly to the venerable Lasallian tree."

5. "What recommendations would you give to the editorial committee and to contributors to 'Lasalliana'?"

Brother Superior: "The group is composed of competent people who have had a long and thorough formation. The manner in which they have already begun their work is evidence enough that they know what they are doing and are capable of succeeding in their task. If there is one point I would like to stress, it is that they develop a team spirit. That is the way to honour and put into practice the Lasallian motto, 'Together and by association'. It is the best way to ensure good results from an undertaking that we hope will be fruitful and enduring.

As a recommendation I would, also, express a wish that this enterprise just begun, will be continued with unflinching determination. One always has a doubt or a fear that an undertaking which begins with the highest hopes, may later become routine, less interesting, less inspiring and less rich.

As for technical advice I shall only say this: I have complete confidence in the ability and experience of the members of the production team."

6. "Could you suggest to readers of 'Lasalliana' how best to profit from it?"

Brother Superior: "I congratulate the readers of 'Lasalliana' who have made its acquaintance and that of its contributors from the moment of its first appearance. I know that a large number of Brothers were looking forward to such a publication to increase their knowledge of the Institute and deepen their understanding of the Lasallian spirit.

I would like them to welcome and use these leaflets as a means of extending their knowledge of, and increasing their love for, our holy Founder whose work they appreciate so much. As I have just said, they should use them as an instrument of work rather than as a means of satisfying their curiosity, however legitimate. 'Lasalliana' should not be too hastily relegated to the archives but kept within reach so that this collection of information may introduce them to the saint and his work. The leaflets should not be treated as work of erudition but as examples of witness to be carefully studied and from which conclusions should be drawn for the Brothers' own lives.

What I am saying is that the leaflets could, on occasion, be used as subjects for meditation and as an encouragement to greater dedication to the redemptive work of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

7. "In conclusion, Brother Superior, what relevance, in your opinion, has such a publication to the life of the Institute to-day? How does it relate to the Brothers' contribution to education in the modern world?"

Brother Superior: "I think I have already answered these questions in saying what such a publication means to us. Because of the crisis of identity which, in recent decades has troubled and continues to trouble so many congregations, including our own, we recognise more clearly than ever before that a thorough and precise knowledge of our Founder and his doctrine is the best guarantee of, and stimulant to, a renewal of fidelity and vitality.

That we may respond to the demands of our age to be inventive and creative, without compromising our fidelity to our spiritual heritage, the message of de La Salle must penetrate more deeply and take more definite shape in the minds and hearts of all of us who profess to follow him, as well as in those who wish to share in the action which his message inspires.

I sincerely hope that these leaflets may be of help to the thousands of people who seek a better understanding of Lasallian values and of the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

God grant, through the intercession of him who is our Father, our Founder and our Guide that these Lasallian leaflets may awaken a new spirit of generosity in favour of those whom St. John Baptist loved and served so well — the young and the poor.

PRESENTATION

With this third Number we come to the end of the first year of publication of LASALLIANA. Throughout the year, the team responsible for the publication has been attentive to the reactions of certain readers who have been good enough to pass on their observations to us. We see in this a directive to continue with this work and to make certain adaptations arising from these observations.

The increasing number of subscriptions in each of the three languages is already a source of encouragement. We hope, however, that this increase will continue during 1984-85.

The collaboration of more and more authors is likewise an encouraging sign. Thus LASALLIANA can become an organ of expression for the Brothers within the terms of reference outlined at the beginning of its publication.

To synthesise the reactions received, we may say that they are all positive. Perhaps other reactions, more critical ones, were not sent to us?

The satisfaction expressed referred especially to the following points:

— The choice of headings which allows for a coverage of the life of the Institute as a whole.

— The richness in the content of the texts, even if the interest of each one of them varies according to the taste of the readers.

— The variety of the contributions, especially the contributions made by lay people.

— The brevity and the seriousness of articles adapted for very busy readers, with awareness of the constraints this places on the author.

— The ease with which the sheets can be used for purposes of meetings, seminars and even in the fostering of vocations.

— The practical convenience of the arrangement thanks to the type of codification chosen.

— Thus the readers can gain a better knowledge of the Founder and of the History and Life of the Institute.

Many express their wish for a successful continuation of the publication and to them we extend our thanks. As an answer to this wish we can say that the first number for next year is already well advanced in its preparation.

One Brother suggested that a list of titles that have already appeared should be published. This is an interesting suggestion which has been followed in the present number.

We see these encouragements also as a call to our vigilance and also as an expression of gratitude to our authors of the first numbers, a gratitude which we share completely.

This word of thanks is addressed also to all LASALLIANA readers and especially to those who have shown their interest in the publication by sending us their reactions.

RHEIMS 1684. A COMMUNITY FOUNDED ON PROVIDENCE

> "At the end of 1682, it became apparent to M. de La Salle that Providence was calling him to take the schools in charge. And he realized that, having to arrive the first at the exercises he had initiated in his house and give good example to those for whom they were intended, he could not do that and at the same time be assiduous at the offices in choir. This his director could in no way approve for he required him to be most assiduous in his attendance".

These lines are taken from the first biography of the Founder by Brother Bernard. The third biographer, Canon Blain, repeats this more concisely.

> "It was apparent to him at the end of 1682, he himself says, that God was calling him to take care of the schools and that, having to be the first at the community exercises, he could not be as assiduous at the office as his director exacted of him".

Most probably both biographers have based themselves on the "mémoire des commencements" written by John Baptist de La Salle many years after the events. Both of them begin in the same way their account of two particularly decisive years in the history of the Community of the Christian Schools: 1683 when Canon de La Salle gives up his canonicate, 1684 when he distributes his personal fortune among the poor.

It was on August 16, 1683, that Abbé Jean Faubert, a priest hitherto unknown, takes his place in the chapter of the cathedral of Rheims instead of Canon John Baptist de La Salle. Such a change did not take place without strong and lengthy opposition from his family, his colleagues, his spiritual director. The Archbishop himself did not give his consent or else resigned himself to it in spite of all he could do to prevent it.

Now that he was more closely associated with the few teachers who lived with him, the abbé De La Salle did not stop there. Very soon he decided to get rid of his personal fortune and to rely henceforth on Providence.

Referring to this the three first biographers mention the Founder's hesitation, hesitation which could have been reinforced by the counsels of his friends who were often well intentioned. If he wanted to get rid of his fortune could not the former canon use it for the benefit of the teachers? Could he not think of "founding" a community of teachers as Nicolas Roland had "founded" the community of the Daughters of the Infant Jesus?

If one has doubts about the dialogue which Blain tries to recall forty years after the events, one can but feel the truth of the prayer which Brother Bernard seems to have taken from the above mentioned memoire.

> "My God, I do not know if I have to make a foundation or not. It is not up to me to establish the communities, nor to know how to establish them. It is you, my God, who know how it should be done and will do it as it pleases you. I do not dare to make a foundation because I do not know if it is your will, nor would I make any contribution to founding our houses. If you found them, they will be well founded, if you do not found them they will be without foundation. I pray you, my God, to make known to me your will as regards this".

De La Salle once again perceived the hand of God in the tragic events taking place under his very eyes. 1684 saw a very severe winter and all the historians of the time describe the famine that followed as particularly serious and even murderous. The whole year and the winter which followed saw the poor flocking to the towns from the countryside. They came in great numbers, to Rheims especially, in the hope of finding some relief.

For the second time, La Salle gave up the guardianship of his younger brothers on August 16 of that same year. He left to them the house in the Rue Ste. Marguerite and various properties and incomes that he owned personally. On the orders of his director he kept £200 in order not to tempt God and distributed the remaining cash among the poor. Dom François Hélie Maillefer writes about this as follows:

> "This faithful steward was then seen to distribute in an orderly fashion and with discernment the wealth of which he regarded himself as the trustee. He examined the needs of each one in minute detail, provided for their needs, distributed bread and saw that it was distributed to the children in the schools, gathered together every day a large number of poor people whom he fed and sent away overwhelmed with his generosity after giving them sound advice according to their situation.
> He did more. He went into the homes to find the poor who were ashamed to lighten their distress and through his frequent alms save them from the shame of poverty.
> Those who were witnesses of his generosity were astonished at seeing a man so full of confidence in Divine Providence that he gave no thought to the morrow. Even the Brothers in the schools who helped him to distribute his alms could not refrain from showing their astonishment. He told them with his customary tranquillity that God was a good Father who never deserted those who trusted in Him, that they would never lack anything as long as they tried to please Him."

Rather than estimate the exact value of the alms he distributed in this way — about £40,000 according to Blain — we will examine the significance of this staggering gesture. In 18th century France, more so than in our days, the faithful who wished to perform some good work took care to assure the future by establishing a foundation properly so called. With respect for the memory of his director, Canon Roland, John Baptist took great care to see that the Daughters of the Child Jesus were well provided for, showing that this new community would not have to rely on the generosity of the people of Rheims.

Breaking with tradition, Father Barré in Rouen encouraged the mistresses in the charitable school to rely solely on Providence. It would seem that he induced John Baptist de La Salle to do the same. What is certain is that the priest of Rheims decided definitely and irrevocably on the second of these two attitudes.

It was in vain the archbishop, Charles Maurice Le Tellier, proposed that de La Salle should "found" his community. The former canon was all the more resolute since the all powerful prelate offered his generosity only on condition that the Community of the Christian Schools should remain within the boundaries of his archdiocese.

In 1690, when describing his Community to the ecclesiastical Superiors, De La Salle did not fail to affirm that "this Community is at present established and founded on Providence alone". His choice, taken in 1684, was therefore still valid six years later; it continued to be so during the whole life of the Founder. If he expected the parish priests and the charitable boards to finance the schools they established and asked the Brothers to run, he none the less expected the Community as such to have no other resources that those of Providence.

THE KNOWN MANUSCRIPTS OF ST. J.B. DE LA SALLE (1)

A FEW STATISTICS

The number of manuscript documents written throughout and signed by John Baptist de La Salle, and known to be in existence, amounts to 65 (a total of 97 sheets of paper written on one or both sides). (A) 53 of these documents are letters, all of which except three were addressed to individual Brothers. (B) The remaining 12 are of a legal or administrative nature. In addition to the signed documents there are (C) 8 certainly written by the Founder but not signed by him. (D) 7 documents are known which were not written by De La Salle but to which he added brief marginal comments or amendments or supplementary information: five of these are also signed by him. And, finally, there are (E) 27 known manuscripts to which, in one capacity or another, he added his signature, but nothing more.

An outline survey of each of these categories now follows (in this and further issues of LASALLIANA) in the order listed, together with bibliographical references guiding the interested reader to ampler and more detailed information on the points made; the frequently occurring "CL" followed by a number refers to the relevant volume of the indispensable Cahiers Lasalliens series.

(A) THE LETTERS

All except two of the 53 known manuscript letters are preserved in the Archives of the Maison Généralice in Rome (AMG). They are stored between sheets of glass in brass frames, and are thus able to be read without the need to handle the fragile leaves: the frames are slotted vertically into grooved shelves in fire-proof, double-locked steel cabinets.

THEIR ADDRESSEES

49 of the 51 letters in the AMG collection are addressed to ten of the Founder's disciples: 19 to Gabriel Drolin, 10 to a Br. Mathias (about whose identity there is disagreement among the experts), 6 to Br. Robert (Denis Maubert), 5 to Br. Hubert (Gilles Gerard), 3 to Br. Denis (Jean Louis Guynand), 2 to Br. Joseph (Jean Le Roux), and 1 each to Br. Anastase (Antoine Paradis), Br. Barthélemy (Joseph Truffet), Br. Paulinus and Br. Severin (the identity of both of whom is uncertain). The remaining two letters in the AMG collection were both addressed to Louis Deshayes, a priest of Rouen who had requested Brothers for a foundation which duly materialised in nearby Darnétal.

THEIR CHRONOLOGY

All of these 51 letters cover a time-span of no more than 16 years and 8 months - from 30 May 1701 to 17 January 1718 (and were written therefore after M. de La Salle had reached the age of fifty). By a curious coincidence the two known manuscript letters not in the AMG collection were written, respectively, two weeks earlier and six weeks later than the two dates mentioned. The so-called "Durham Letter", addressed to an unnamed Brother, and found in 1955 in the library of the English Seminary of Ushaw, near Durham, is dated 15 May 1701. It is kept in London at the Provincialate of the district of England, and the story of its serendipitous discovery during the centenary year of the Lasallian presence in England can be read in the April 1956 issue of the Bulletin des Ecoles Chrétiennes. The date of the other letter not in AMG is 2 March 1718 (almost exactly a year prior to its writer's death). It was addressed to the Founder's brother, Canon Jean-Louis de La Salle at Rheims. The letter was discovered in 1969 in an "Etude" of M. Claude Thiénot, a Rheims lawyer, by Br. Leon de Marie Aroz who published it, in both fac-simile and printed form and with a commentary of absorbing interest, in CL 39 (1972). By permission of M. Thiénot, this precious manuscript is on display at the Hôtel De La Salle, the Founder's birthplace in Rheims.

A lithographed fac-simile of one early letter exists and was published as long ago as 1908 in the March edition of the Bulletin des Ecoles Chrétiennes. This was the Founder's letter to the Mayor and Aldermen of Château-Porcien, written on 20 June 1682 (four days, therefore, before the momentous "exodus" of M. de La Salle — then aged 31 — from the family home in the rue Sainte-Marguerite to the rue Neuve). The original was discovered in January 1843 by the Archbishop of Rheims, Mgr. Gousset, and was retained in the archiepiscopal archives, but an enquiry in 1951 revealed that it was no longer there and that its whereabouts were unknown.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE LETTERS

The AMG manuscript letters have been photographed twice: first in 1948 when the set was made available to districts of the Institute subscribing for one; and secondly, with advanced photographic technique, by Br. Georges Ley of the district of North Belgium.

The contents of the collection may be read in each of the three languages currently in use for the Institute's official publications. They first appeared in French, under the date 26 January 1952, as No. 335 of the Institute's series of Instructive and Administrative Circulars. The circular was issued by the Superior General, Br. Athanase Emile, with an Introduction by him, but the edition of the letters it contained was the work of Br. Felix-Paul Vandamme. The latter was at this time already engaged on the preparation of a critical edition of the letters, and was putting the finishing touches to this when death overtook him at the early age of 39. His work, not as definitive as he would have wished to make it, but an invaluable critical edition all the same, especially if consulted in conjunction with his Circular 335 edition, was published by Ligel in 1954, with a characteristically graceful and informative foreword by the Institute's historian, Georges Rigault.

In 1952 Brother Clair Battersby added De La Salle: Letters and Documents to his three previous books on the Founder, thus completing a Lasallian tetralogy in English, elegantly produced in uniform format by a leading London publisher, Longmans Green.

And in 1962 the Pontifical Institute of St. Pius X in Salamanca published, as No. 4 in its distinguished "Sinite" series, a Spanish translation of the French critical edition, but adapted and edited in order to take account of new information subsequent to Felix-Paul's production.

THE QUANTITY OF MANUSCRIPT LETTERS

The 53 known manuscript letters represent, it need hardly be said, a mere fraction of the total the Saint must have written. Battersby's suggested figure of 18,000 may, at first sight, seem grossly exaggerated, but he argues it principally on the basis of the known statistics of the Society's personnel in the Founder's lifetime related to the article in the earliest known version of the Brothers' Common Rules (CL 25) requiring them to write individually to the Superior "at the beginning of each month" (and we have the assurance of his biographer and contemporary, Canon Blain (CL 7), that the Founder "was exact in replying to each". But even if we prefer the much more conservative estimate of "two to three thousand" suggested by Felix-Paul, the extant remnant looks pitiful and leaves us wondering what happened to the rest. It is true, of course, that we know of the existence and contents (complete or partial) of other letters of the Founder from his biographer Blain and from other copies preserved in AMG. Felix-Paul included all 35 quotations known from Blain only and 19 known from Blain and other sources. But, as Br. Maurice-Auguste Hermans, General Editor of the Cahiers Lasalliens, assures us (CL 10), none of Blain's quotations comes from the manuscript letters known to us — a tantalising fact which leaves us without a point of reference whereby to test the degree of confidence we may feel as to the verbal exactness of his quotations.

THE LOST LETTERS

Can we hope that more of the many lost originals will come to light? From Circular 335 we learn that 34 autograph letters were available for despatch to Rome in December 1845 when the Founder's cause of beatification was approaching the stage of the study of his writings. Since that date, therefore (bearing in mind the loss of the Château-Porcien letter), 20 more have been discovered — an average of approximately one every seven years, which would make the next discovery overdue by eight years! However, the first of the new discoveries accounted for a single batch of 10 letters (those addressed to Mathias) found in a loft of the presbytery of Pernes (Vaucluse) at some unspecified date between 1850 and 1856. Following that, single finds were made or notified successively in 1860, 1871, post-1871, pre-1888, about 1900, ditto, 1915, about 1920, 1955 and 1969. The usual gap between the discoveries has therefore been about a dozen years but since there has been one gap of 35 years, perhaps our next discovery is not overdue after all. What chance is there of finding a treasure-trove of several letters together? The late Fr. André Rayez S.J., in a celebrated article entitled "Etudes Lasalliennes" in the January-March 1952 issue of the Revue d'Ascétique et de Mystique, did not exclude the possibility: "I remain convinced," he wrote, "that there are texts still to be gathered together or discovered, as, for example, the letters... It would be a rare stroke of good fortune to find some packets of these..." And the Institute's leading discoverer of Lasallian documents, Léon Aroz, is likewise hopeful. Commenting on the 1955 and 1969 finds, he adds: "Others, no doubt, await the lucky touch of some researcher." (CL 40,I)

THE SCHOOL CLIENTELE OF THE LASALLIAN SCHOOLS AT THEIR BEGINNINGS

The term "clientele", today used in business, meant in those days the group of people, most often poor, who enjoyed the protection and services of a "maître ès loi" or a "patron" who could defend their interests. It was inevitable that gratitude should give rise to duties on the part of this "clientele". The relation between "maître" and "client" was not that between master and servant or today's employer and workman or employee. It was certainly different to that which St. John Baptist de La Salle required between the teachers and those whom he called their "disciples" rather than pupils, but it was very akin since it was a relationship based on a service freely given, freely sought, and gratuitous.

In the 18th century schools were not much sought after by the poor because the instruction given seemed:

— rather useless for essentially manual trades;
— too long to acquire when one had to earn one's living at an early age;
— unattainable if one had to pay or if long journeys were required from the country to the nearest built up area;
— segregationalist, the poor being separated from the rich in schools which were free or in separate schools.

The employment of teacher in the elementary school was considered as a means of earning one's daily bread by those whom Canon Blain called "mercenary teachers", that is the writing masters and the masters of boarding establishments and the "small schools" (Petites écoles) who were organized in powerful trade unions having scant tolerance for any rivals. In spite of the law which obliged them to receive the poor gratuitously, they paid little attention to it. Diminishing the number of their non fee paying pupils seemed to them to be the way of improving the teaching given to the fee payers; refusal to accept ill-clothed children who were often absent for family reasons seemed to them to be a service rendered to the others, a service which the better-off families willingly remunerated.

ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE COMES TO FILL THE VACUUM

Not a school vacuum, for schools existed:

★ Colleges run by congregations or religious orders (Oratorians, Jesuits, Doctrinarians...) and colleges dependent on the towns or universities. But they hardly prepared for any other than a gentleman's career and were not adapted to the needs of the working classes, even when it was the rule that day students paid nothing, as with the Jesuits.

★ Elementary and middle schools run by the "Boarding masters and those of the Little schools" and by the "writing masters". They were relatively numerous since they admitted only a few children and were jealous of any concurrence. In Paris the local government had to intervene and forbid the opening of new ones at less than 200 metres the one from the other. But the poor were repulsed and hardly took the risk.

★ Charitable schools run by the parishes or by general hospitals for the children who were most deprived. But this gratuity entailed the trustees refusing to admit children not in need. The result was real social segregation. It was humiliating. Families who were not destitute avoided them. They preferred to pay the teachers, being ready to shorten their children's education when funds ran out.

But a vacuum as regards teachers' training establishments for:

★ The writing masters, experts in account writing, trained their own helpers or apprentices.

★ The teachers of the Little schools and the charitable schools had the benefit in Paris and certain big towns like Lyon (with Demia) of four annual meetings directed by the Education Officer or High Chancellor, who was the diocesan Director of the schools for the working classes. That was about all. They also were trained by a practical apprenticeship being in contact with the pupils and an older teacher.

★ The project of creating "teachers' seminaries" proposed by Chennevières and Démia was not realised till after those founded by Saint John Baptist de La Salle. Démia, moreover, in a printed notice and in an unpublished personal memorandum (an edition is now being prepared) refers to an example established before 1688 in Rheims by the Founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. He asked the authorities to facilitate the creation of similar training centres in Lyon and every French diocese.

THE FIRST OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE'S PUPILS WERE EDUCATED BY APPRENTICE TEACHERS ENGAGED IN THE WORKING CLASS SCHOOLS

★ In Rheims, Nyel recruited teachers to open a number of schools in the town and in the region. St. John Baptist de La Salle took them into his home to train them to a more ordered life: the habit of prayer, the use of free time to study the catechism and to prepare the lessons to be given, healthy recreation by excursions together.

★ As the numbers of the teachers increased, new recruits stayed for a while in the Rue de Courtrai to see first how this new community of the Brothers of the Christian Schools lived and to be initiated into the teaching methods. This was, then, a kind of novitiate-normal school which it is difficult to define exactly.

★ In succession to the uneducated people who at first came to Nyel there now came new personnel who had attended the colleges and sometimes had even acquired a good Latin culture as was the case with Gabriel Drolin and Henri Lheureux. Creative reflection was now superimposed on the integral pragmatism of the teaching methods previously used. The theological and spiritual training given by J.B. de La Salle, doctor in theology, completes the formation of those who are preparing to become Brothers of the Christian Schools.

★ To meet the needs of the countryside, La Salle establishes also the Seminary for country teachers. After four years of reflection, it became an established fact in Rheims in 1687 or perhaps already in 1686 in part of the present house of the Brothers in the Rue de Courtrai. The Founder defined by deed that such a teachers' seminary was an integral part of the duties which could devolve on the Brothers but also that these country teachers, qualified to spend some time in the Brothers' schools, did not belong to the Lasallian congregation whose rules provided for life in common as a constant support. The country teachers could live on their own and help the parish priests who had no curates. They were not forbidden the priesthood; it was compatible with their functions (example Antoine Forget who trained in Paris for six months under St. John Baptist de La Salle's direction and left for Canada to run the school of the Sulpicians).

THE DUTIES OF A CHRISTIAN (1): A WORK CHARACTERISTIC OF DE LA SALLE

What would Don Quixote have been without Cervantes? What would Cervantes be without Don Quixote? In the great masterpieces of human genius author and work are one. The work is a portrait of the author and in it he continues to live and speak to mankind.

For the seeker, who wishes to discover the personality of the author, the surest way and the most rewarding sources of study are to be found in his representative works, whatever their nature. For this reason and because I consider the treatise on "The Duties of A Christian" one of the best works that have come from the pen of de La Salle, I believe I can find in it the characteristic traits of the rich and many faceted personality of the man from Rheims. I shall confine myself, intentionally, to showing how "The Duties of A Christian" throws into relief the triple dimension of de La Salle as Founder, Theologian and Catechist.

1. THE FOUNDER

Charism attains its full dimension in the Founders of Congregations. Each Founder exemplifies in a concrete manner one of the many functions in the Mystical Body. For de La Salle it was to be "the christian education of poor children through the school". Providence led him gently and progressively to the difficult but effective task of redemption of ignorant and abandoned children.

The path of renunciation was signposted by painful episodes from the moment he took over the direction of his infant foundation: the heart-rending break with his family; the "nonsense" of distributing his goods to the poor when both he and the Brothers were starving; the "burning of his boats" when he resigned his canonry...

Nevertheless, all this, however heroic, did not exhaust the charism of the Founder of the Christian Schools. His sons, the Brothers, and their pupils needed to nourish their spirit, strengthen their will, warm their hearts and enlighten their faith. It was for this reason and with this aim that the Founder, without having had even a remote preparation for such work, became by necessity and by his charism of founder, a schoolmaster and pedagogue who deserved to have his name inscribed in the history of universal education.

His biographers show him to us at different moments in his intense and busy life, sometimes replacing a Brother in the classroom for a catechism lesson, at other times writing treatises on pedagogy, catechetics and asceticism for the use of the Brothers. "After having established all the practices and customs of the community (1695-1698) he turned his attention to providing it with works useful to the Brothers and their schools... catechisms of several kinds, simple for the pupils, more advanced and of greater depth for the Brothers, and all accompanied by moral precepts and pious practices. These are the sources from which the masters of the Christian Schools draw their enlightenment in order to explain the great mysteries of religion" (Blain).

Maillefer, a relative of the saint, also affirms that he composed "several works of piety as well for the instruction of the pupils as for the use of the Brothers who were in charge of them."

To which work is he referring? By that time (1714) almost all the writings of the saint had been published, including "The Duties of A Christian".

Blain goes into detail: "After having established all the practices and customs of the community he turned his attention to providing it with works useful to the Brothers and their schools... catechisms of several kinds..." Surely one of those catechisms was "The Duties of A Christian". What is more, the charism of the Founder reaches out beyond the religious family circle to other educators, to their pupils and to the faithful in general. The author of the preface to the edition of 1727 writes, "This catechism, full of solid and holy instruction, has been composed by its pious author for the benefit of persons engaged in teaching those who are sunk in deep ignorance of the mysteries of our holy religion." The vicar general of the diocese of Rouen, in his approval of the "The Duties of A Christian" in 1796, declares, "This work seems to us to be well adapted to the instruction of children and useful to the masters who teach them as well as to all sorts of people."

Whether de La Salle intended it or not, the fact remains that "The Duties of A Christian" provided the Brothers, lay teachers and catechists, for over a hundred years, with a solid and efficacious aid and at the same time served as a teaching manual of the faith for hundreds of thousands of French children. That was a product of the charism of de La Salle the Founder.

2. THE CATECHIST

The catechetical role of de La Salle is a consequence of his charism as Founder. It is in the seminary of Saint Sulpice that we must look for his catechetical formation. There he learned from the lips of remarkable catechists (Tronson... and especially Baüyn) the pedagogy of practical catechesis. Besides the weekly conference Baüyn gave an additional one each month which the seminarists were free to attend. This conference was devoted exclusively to practical catechetics: one of the most experienced catechists explained the catechism in the presence of the students. Could this have been the origin of our catechism of "formation"?

It was said of him, "A man so zealous for the salvation and sanctification of children inspired a similar zeal in many priests who passed through his hands. The most illustrious of these were de La Salle and Grignon de Montfort".

The biographer, Maillefer, describes the Founder and Superior of the Brothers thus: "He passed from row to row, instructing the children in the principles of the Christian life, speaking to them gently and inspiring in them docility, attention and modesty by his affability. His reproofs, when necessary, produced fruit in the hearts of these young boys and a change in their conduct and manners soon became apparent. In a word he became a child among children. He enlightened their minds, touched their hearts, gave them the witness of his example and led them gently and spontaneously to a Christian "metanoia".

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Could any catechetical method be better?

THE "PARENTAGE" OF "THE DUTIES OF A CHRISTIAN"

Blain presents an image of the catechist of Rheims writing "catechisms of various kinds, simple for the children, more advanced and of greater depth for the Brothers". This statement makes it possible for us to speak of "parentage" of "The Duties of A Christian" in which all the sections have common characteristics. Here are some of them:

UNITY

Unity defines a family. In that of "The Duties" all its members share the same spiritual heritage. The style and vocabulary, taking account of the demands of adaptation, are transmitted from one to the other, as is shown by internal criticism.

HIERARCHY

Family bonds and relationships differ with the members of a generation. In "The Duties", from the first part, which contains nearly five hundred pages, to the "Profession of Ten Articles of Faith which the Christian must know and believe", in one page, there is a grading of contents and methods to suit those for whom they are intended in conformity with the aim of each treatise. What is remarkable is their interdependence and mutual ressemblance.

ESSENTIAL MEANING

As the members of a family grow away from their roots secondary traits tend to disappear but basic traits remain. Here again, de La Salle stands out as an eminent theologian and catechist in his own time and by his vision of the future. In the "Little Summary" often used in the catechisms on the Principal Mysteries, the Commandments of God and of the Church are merely listed but in several questions the themes of Christ, the Church, the Sacraments, particularly Penance and the Eucharist, are studied. He summarises himself but retains the essentials of the Christian message. De La Salle is more a catechist and theologian than a moralist.

WORKS COMPLEMENTARY TO "THE DUTIES OF A CHRISTIAN"

De La Salle says with the Apostle St. James, that faith without good works is dead; that we must practise the maxims of the Gospel; that we must live according to its teaching etc. For this purpose we have another catechetical work from the pen of de La Salle as a complement to "The Duties". It is sufficient to mention the chapter headings since we take it for granted that the reader knows the contents of the manual and the persons for whom it was intended: "Instructions and Prayers for Holy Mass", "Method of Preparing for a good Confession", "Instructions and Prayers for Holy Communion", "The Public Worship which Christians must give to God", "Exercises of Piety and Spiritual Canticles".

Even reading the titles of these works is enough to fill us with admiration, respect and gratitude.

HOLY SCRIPTURE IN "THE DUTIES OF A CHRISTIAN"

Revelation and Tradition constitute the leit motif of "The Duties". De La Salle is a master of Sacred Scripture. He venerates the Sacred Books and considers them as his first and principal rule of life... It is not surprising then that he uses them with consummate skill. In "The Duties" he employs them in various ways. Sometimes, but rarely, the scripture text appears verbatim, as when he lists the Commandments of Divine Law and reproduces the words of the institution of the Eucharist... Often he suits the biblical quotation to the text of "The Duties" as for example on the very first page which begins: "Jesus Christ saying in the Gospel that eternal life consists in knowing the one true God and Jesus Christ whom He sent on earth..."

In the evangelical introduction to the Decalogue we read: "Charity comprises two things: love of God and love of our neighbour. This is what Jesus Christ means when He says that there are really only two Commandments which comprise the whole Law. At other times he is content to say succinctly: "As the wise man says"; "as Jesus Christ says in the Gospel..." Many pages look like a scriptural arabesque but without the slightest allusion to the text or authors from which passages are taken. The chapters on the Life, Passion, Death and Resurrection of Jesus are masterpieces of adaptation.

In the Lasallian catechism there are numerous pages where passages of Scripture are so employed that they give the impression of being the author's own thoughts. The ideas and biblical expression combine so naturally that they become beliefs and precepts for both the author and the reader of "The Duties of A Christian". If you omitted the passages referred to, many pages of the work would have no meaning. What would be left of the treatise "De Deo"? of the creation of the angels? More importantly, what would be left of the Mystery of Redemption?

With the skill of an artist matching his colours, de La Salle moves from one evangelist to another to paint the multi-coloured life of the Word Incarnate, dead and risen again.

The alpha and omega of "The Duties" are expressed in two passages which make direct allusion to the Holy Gospel. We shall finish our reflections with them. The catechism opens with these words which are a programme in themselves: "Jesus Christ says in the Holy Gospel that eternal life consists in knowing the one true God and Jesus Christ whom He sent on earth. All that a Christian should strive for in this life is to know God in Himself and in all that He has made, and the Son of God made man and all He has done for our salvation, that is to say, the Gospel."

When de La Salle puts the last touches to the dome of the classical edifice of "The Duties of A Christian" he places there the living stone of the Word: "The principal effect that these prayers should produce in us is to lead us to practise the maxims of the Holy Gospel. It is also the greatest benefit we can draw from the knowledge (cf Prologue) of the Sacred Mysteries and the teaching of the Church."

3. THE THEOLOGIAN

For the composition of the nearly two thousand pages which make up his catechisms de La Salle needed tranquillity and time. His life as Founder and superior of the Brothers afforded him no such tranquillity and time. He was compelled to draw on treatises in use at the time and to adapt them to his purpose. In the choice he made and in his adaptations we can see both his sensibility as a catechist and his competence as a theologian. Let us examine briefly how he, a doctor in theology, drew his inspiration from these sources and at times surpassed them in his catechetical treatises. Let it suffice here to refer to four of his sources: Holy Scripture, the Fathers of the Church, Claude Joly and Jacques Le Coreur. We shall deal with the first two later on.

CLAUDE JOLY

"The Duties of A Christian" of de La Salle follows so closely the catechism of the Bishop of Agen that we find the following evidence given at the time of the beatification of the educator from Rheims "Another edition, in continuous style, which we found in the same library and which bears the name de La Salle was printed in Rheims in 1779, that is, sixty years after his death. This book, in its contents, is similar to that of Monseigneur Joly. How did the Venerable Servant of God come to resemble so closely the Bishop of Agen? On the other hand, the author of the first life of the Venerable does not mention this book."

A close comparison between the bishop's catechism and that of the priest leads us to the following observation: John Baptist de La Salle used the work of Joly particularly in the composition of the part of his book dealing with moral principles.

In the treatise "De Praeceptis", the commandmants of God and of the Church, only eleven pages out of fifty-nine in "The Duties of A Christian" do not show a visible influence. There are, also, long paragraphs where the correspondence is almost verbatim. The chapters on Sin and the Virtues corroborate the resemblance between the two works. Only FIVE pages out of FIFTY-ONE do not bear the mark of Joly.

The influence of the Bishop of Agen in the treatise "De Sacramentis" is minimal, but once the subject of moral is touched upon, as for instance, in the conditions for making a good confession, the authority of Claude Joly is clearly evident.

The reason why the author of "The Duties of A Christian" followed so faithfully, and on the subject of moral, exclusively, the work of the bishop, is revealed by his own conduct. On numerous occasions he advised his followers not to get involved in deciding whether a sin was mortal or venial. The most they could tell their pupils was that it was serious.

Apart from the chapters which we have qualified as moral there is little to indicate the influence of Claude Joly. Of the THIRTY-FIVE pages taken up with other treatises, ELEVEN, most in the section "De Sacramentis", borrow only definitions, while the other TWENTY-FOUR draw from the source with great moderation.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

JACQUES LE COREUR

Is the name Jacques Le Coreur, priest, doctor of theology and confessor in the parish of Saint Germain l'Auxerrois, that of the author of "The Principal Duties of A Christian"? Some evidence suggests that it is: In any case the catechism was written for use in the missions that the author gave to people who had made their First Communion. This explains why it contains four hundred and sixty pages and deals here and there with matters of casuistry.

The roles of Joly and Le Coreur in the work of de La Salle are complementary. The influence of Joly is most evident in the section dealing with moral, that of Le Coreur in "De Sacramentis", particularly. The contributions of the latter are more evenly spread throughout "The Duties of A Christian".

The first section of Chapter IV of "The Duties of A Christian" shows evidence of "Principal Duties of A Christian" in the more difficult areas of theology. The inspiration of Le Coreur is felt in two places only in the chapter "De Ecclesia" and then only in matters of theology.

The missionary priest rarely makes his influence felt in the treatise "De Praeceptis" and when he does it is only to provide a definition or a doctrinal passage of little importance.

It is in the seven sections on the Capital or Deadly Sins that the complementary roles of Joly and Le Coreur become more evident. De La Salle borrows verbatim from both for almost the whole of his catechism. Naturally the passages taken from one source and reproduced in "The Duties of A Christian" do not appear in the other. The only coïncidence of both is found in the section dealing with other sins, a sequel to the Capital Sins.

In the treatise "De Sacramentis", the influence of the catechist from Amiens on the Saint of Rheims is most evident. As we cannot follow them step by step we must be content with the following observations:

a) Le Coreur's authority is always evident in arguable cases or in matters of casuistry as for example, "If the damned retain or do not retain the sacramental character and why; who can communicate under both species? and why the ordinary faithful may not do so; when the priest may and should refuse absolution..."

b) For the ceremonies in connection with reception of the sacraments in general and in particular for Baptism, Confirmation and Marriage and especially for Penance and Holy Orders.

c) For definitions of the sacraments in general. The definitions of Confirmation, the Eucharist, under various appellations, and Holy Orders are taken verbatim from Le Coreur.

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (2): «Live with the pupils the better to educate them"

In the second number of Lasalliana (paper 02-A-12) I gave a general account of "The Management of Christian Schools" in order to situate the work in the context of the 17th-18th centuries, at the beginning of the Institute.

Those few pages underlined the importance and interest of the text but without showing with precision the richness of its contents. That richness will be better shown by a more detailed study of some aspects of the work.

The first part will consist of a detailed account of the conditions under which the first Brothers or schoolmasters worked as regards time, accommodation and programmes. It is possible to reconstruct these elements fairly accurately from references scattered throughout the "Manuscript of 1706" and the "Edition of 1720" of "The Management of Schools". These two texts can be read simultaneously in the Cahiers Lasalliens, No. 24.

LARGE MIXED ABILITY CLASSES

The number of boys in a class was at least 50 and often more. The scarcity of schools, the rising demand of the urban working classes for education from the mid-seventeenth century and the undoubted success of the Brothers' schools were some of the reasons for the large classes.

More than by their numbers the pupils were characterised by their differences of background, origin and age. In that era compulsory school attendance was unknown and there was no fixed legal age for beginning or ending one's school career. Enrolment of a child in a school and the length of time he spent there were matters for the parents. The problem of when a boy left school is often referred to in different ways in the "Management" and you can guess that it was a source of constant worry to de La Salle and the Brothers who naturally considered that early leaving meant an incomplete and unsatisfactory education. From other indications in the "Management" and particularly from those referring to writing, which was taught after the age of ten and preferably before twelve, it can be deduced that the majority of pupils were between ten and twelve with extreme cases ranging from six to fifteen or over.

CRAMPED, AUSTERE BUILDINGS

Though we complain today of the lack of teaching space, particularly in the inner cities, nevertheless, we have buildings which are purpose built and sufficiently large and functional. This was not always the case in the early days of the Institute. The schools were usually ordinary houses adapted to the needs of teaching. The floor space considered suitable, as mentioned in the edition of 1720, varied from 25 to 35 square metres for the younger children and from 35 to 43 square metres for senior pupils.

When you consider the number of boys in a class you can form an idea of the space available to each pupil!

Within this space the furnishings were rudimentary: benches and boards or tables for lessons. There was little individual equipment beyond the bare necessities for writing, a reading book for the senior pupils and a catechism. On the subject of equipment you should re-read the last chapter of the edition of 1720.

Of course, such material conditions were not exceptional at the time. They were the lot of most schools for the working classes but they help us to realize to what extent the skill and authority of the teacher had to make up for the lack of teaching equipment.

AN OVERLOADED TIME-TABLE

"The Management of Christian Schools" does not provide a time-table properly so called for the whole day or the whole week but in reading from chapter to chapter especially of the first part we can glean enough fragmentary information to reconstruct an approximate time-table for the master.

The programming of certain activities such as spelling and Latin remains rather imprecise but the following approximation will give a good idea of what was done and when.

The rigidity of such a time-table is more apparent than real. Many imponderable elements forced the schools to be more flexible: the customs of the parish, the number of pupils in the class, the natural rhythm of the seasons as well as fairs and other events of the local calendar.

The essential thing is to estimate the workload that this imposed on the Brothers or masters. In practice, each teacher spent approximately forty hours a week with the same pupils. This certainly allowed him to get to know each one personally and thoroughly.

We must add that the school year was also long: except for a few holidays scattered throughout the year and especially at Easter, the school holidays consisted of the month of September. We have then, to reckon with a school year of at least 46 or 47 weeks which was quite a lot when compared to the present school year in most countries. (It was approximately 280 days)

These figures help us to understand the references to fatigue and overwork, even to the illnesses of teachers and the consequent interruption in the school's work.

The organization of the school time-table illustrates one of the major and constant concerns of the Institute: to educate children one must be with them. "Children being under the care of teachers from morning to evening, they can teach them to live well".

This accords with the general concept of formation current in the eighteenth century: the child is an apprentice who must learn from a "master", as in all other trades.

It explains also why the terms "model" and "good example" are so important and so often used in the "Management" as means of formation. The master is the one who must always provide models and examples in school activities as in his own behaviour.

Because children, especially "children of artisans and the poor" as de La Salle so often recalls, do not find such models at home, it is essential to send them to a Christian school and to keep them there as long as possible.

School conditions as we know them, particularly in secondary schools and centres of higher education, are very different from those described in the "Management of Christian Schools". That does not absolve us, as individuals or groups, from asking ourselves the following questions:

1) "To live with the young in order to educate them". Is that important today?
2) Have we calculated the total number of hours we spend with our pupils? What conclusions do we draw from this?
3) Does this time help us to get to know them and help them in their development and growth?
4) What can we change in the internal organization of the school or in our own conduct to improve the situation?
5) If we do not know our pupils what meaning can we give to our vocation of Christian educators?

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (3)
"Teaching made to measure"

One of the first essentials for the first Brothers with their large and heterogeneous classes was the organization of the time table and the programmes. The aim of the "Management" was precisely to propose actual methods of organization based on successful experimentation to inexperienced young teachers.

The following chart enables one to understand better how the different kinds of lessons were introduced and distributed and, therefore to give an idea of the normal school career of the pupil. It is immediately evident that the disciplines are introduced progressively one after the other while the new pupil devoted the greater part of his time to reading and the various religious exercises prescribed for the school.

PLAN FOR SCHOOL COURSES

Plan of School courses in the conduct of Schools

N.B. In reading: "All pupils, at all stages, except those reading from the charts, will be divided into three sections: 1st beginners, 2nd moderate, and 3rd advanced and perfect in that lesson."

"There will however be only two sections in 'Politeness'. The first will be those who make errors in reading it, the second those who make none". "All the pupils in the three sections on the lessons will however read together without discrimination or discernment, as the teacher will tell them".

READING was, therefore, the first initiation into school life. And the Management of Schools in no way differs from the customary practice in 17th century France. Some primary schools, indeed, offered only this teaching. Others added arithmetic but rarely handwriting which was the monopoly of the "writing masters", and this explains the difficulties M. De La Salle had with this corporation.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

LATIN. "The book in which they will learn to read is the book of Psalms; only those will be admitted to this lesson who can read French perfectly". This sentence recalls the important revolution which De La Salle introduced into the schools by having the child learn to read in his mother tongue.

WRITING. Because of the instruments in use at that time, this art demanded a long and difficult apprenticeship. "The children must be able to read perfectly in French as well as in Latin before beginning to write". "Arrangements will be made so that children do not learn to write before the age of 10". "If however a child should have reached the age of 12 without having started to write, he can start writing lessons before learning to read Latin providing he read French well and correctly.

ARITHMETIC. Arithmetic will be taught only to those who have started on the fourth stage of writing in the round and the second inclined and it will be the Director or the Inspector who appoints them to these lessons as well as to the others.

SPELLING. The teacher of handwriting will take care to teach spelling to those in the seventh stage of writing in the round and the fourth inclined, and the Inspector of Schools will pay attention to this.

SIMULTANEOUS TEACHING BUT DIFFERENTIATED

Such an organisation of the time table enables classes of homogeneous groups of pupils to be constituted for each of the subjects taught.

Within these groups there was real mobility each month when the changes of "Orders" or "Lessons" were made.

A class must therefore be seen not as a group of pupils doing the same work together but as a collection of distinct groups coexisting together and working simultaneously for secular subjects. The class became as one for catechism, prayers and religious offices. These groups were differentiated by the level of knowledge acquired and by the individual rhythm of progress.

The varying number of pupils in the classes and in the groups, differences in age, and sometimes dates of admission to the school were so many factors leading to suppleness and diversity in these groupings.

If we are to compare this kind of class with what we know of modern teaching practice we must refer to what is known as "subject level homogeneous groups" to be seen in some schools. We can thus note the modernity of some of the concepts put forward in the Conduct of Schools.

THE TWOFOLD OBJECTIVE OF ORDER AND EFFICENCY

Strictness in progress and in the division of the children into the different Orders and Lessons allowed order to be established in the classroom. With the large numbers of pupils involved this was a necessity. It was also, no doubt, a means of avoiding having to have recourse to the "corrections" in use in the schools of the times and to which the Management refers at some length.

Order also allowed efficiency to be attained in a simultaneous teaching practice which was relatively recent in the 18th century in primary schools and which the Brothers tried to systematize from the very beginning. This is illustrated by a passage from a recent book. "General History of Teaching and Education in France" (Paris 1981):

> "Besides the priority given to French, which was more or less exclusive, other pedagogical innovations explain the success and efficacy of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. Established in towns and always in groups of two or three, they are thus able to divide their pupils into classes and different groups according to their level. The homogeneity thus obtained enabled the individual method to be dispensed with by occupying all the children in a group in the same activity. This "simultaneous" method experimented with in the 16th century had already developed in the 17th century in the east of France where in the schools of Pierre FOURIER there were three levels in reading: that of the alphabet, that of the printed book, and a higher level where the pupils learnt to read manuscript registers... But it was with the Brothers of the Christian schools that the method was systematically applied at all levels of apprenticeship to the rudiments". (Various authors, Vol. II, pp. 440-441)

Besides efficiency and order, this organization shows that attention is paid to the person of the child for it allows his abilities and progress to be taken into account. It is a personalized approach to teaching.

Assuring order and efficiency is also a means of showing the respect one has for the child and especially for the poor who have no time to lose in inefficient schools.

Differences in age also permitted the employment of mutual aid among the pupils. Generally speaking one can see a tentative effort at mutual teaching.

It is not perhaps the actual methods of organization in which we are interested today, but we can look into the essential and lasting educational orientations they imply.

FIFTY YEARS OF THE "RIVISTA LASALLIANA"

At fifty years of age a man's life reaches its highest point of maturity. For a review, fifty years represent the work of four generations of editors. This is the case with "Rivista Lasalliana", a quarterly review of pedagogical formation and information published by the Brothers of the Christian Schools of Italy.

ITS ORIGINS

Brother Goffredo Savoré founded the "Rivista Lasalliana" in Turin in 1934. He was then fifty years of age and at the height of his activities as educator, writer and scholar. He gathered round him a group of Brothers in their thirties as collaborators and editors of the review. The "Rivista Lasalliana" should, therefore, be considered in the context of the District which produced it. Seen thus, it was a communal effort and a high point in the cultural history of the Province.

ITS AIMS

The basic plan which set out the aims of the "Rivista Lasalliana" and directed it on its way, not always without difficulties and obstacles, served as a guide in the choice of subjects treated and gave pride of place to Lasallian studies and articles of a pedagogic and educative nature.

You can read the guiding principles in the articles of foundation of 1934. "The aim of the 'Rivista Lasalliana' is to serve as a review of religious and professional formation for the Brothers. This objective is to be attained by a thorough study of the life and teaching of St. John Baptist de La Salle, of the life and work of the Institute and of the teaching of the Church, especially in the field of asceticism. Among the means to be employed is a deeper study, in the light of modern experience, of the principles, methods and factors which influenced the pedagogy of de La Salle and his disciples with a view to avoiding being trapped in an unthinking routine."

ITS CONTENT

It has always specialised in Lasallian themes, treated in their broadest sense. Consequently it publishes articles on pedagogy, philosophy, moral theology and asceticism under their historical, theoretical and practical aspects. It pays particular attention to the study of the traditions and methods, both organizational and didactic, of our Institute with a view to their formative value.

Studies and articles fall under the following general headings:

— Lasallian Studies.
— Lasallian Literature.
— Lasallian Texts.
— Ascetical and Mystical Writings.
— Catechetics.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

— Methodology and Teaching.
— Pedagogy and Philosophy.
— Review of books published in the Institute or works relating to it.

COLLABORATION

At first collaboration was limited to what the Brothers themselves could provide but was gradually extended to the Lasallian educative community by inviting contributions from lay teachers, parents and university professors who shared the Lasallian outlook. This collaboration produced richer and deeper insights into Lasallian culture and the review became the "property" of the entire educative community.

This collaboration should not be limited to the review but should become an integral part of the professional responsibility of teachers and educators in all our institutions.

DIFFUSION

Very soon the "Rivista Lasalliana" went beyond the confines of Lasallian institutions and found its way into religious, pedagogic and educative centres as well as into the faculties of religious studies and pedagogy of Italian and foreign universities, libraries and the publishing houses of similar reviews (Approximately fifty, thanks to the exchange system between reviews).

FUTURE PERSPECTIVES

In recent years the need has become acute to keep pace with contemporary realities which speak a new language and talk in terms of a new culture produced and conditioned by modern technological progress. This "aggiornamento" must be achieved without betraying the principles on which the review was founded. With this in mind the review, formerly reserved to the Brothers, has enlarged the circle of its readers to include lay teachers, lay educationalists and pedagogical research workers. It tries to present the pedagogical insights and spiritual teaching of de La Salle in a manner which appeals to modern readers.

The language used has, consequently, to be adapted to the experience of modern society without regard to distinctions of class or culture. Basing itself on this principle the review has taken on a more flexible character, better adapted to concrete reality.

In keeping with this new outlook it invites competent contributors to write on.

★ Different experiments in the religious and educational fields as lived at various levels within the framework of the Institute.

★ Education today examined in the light of the teaching of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

★ The creativity shown in educational experiments which requires theoretical structuring.

★ Recent thinking on the organization of teaching within the framework of current pedagogical development.

SAINT PIUS X INSTITUTE FOR ADVANCED CATECHETICAL STUDIES

A SHORT HISTORY

The Saint Pius X Institute for advanced Catechetical Studies was founded by the Congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools on 12 October 1955. The Sacred Congregation Religious approved it and declared it Pontifical on 25 March 1960.

Under the patronage of His Holiness Pope Paul VI, the Sacred Congregation for Seminaries and Universities raised its academic status by incorporating it into the Pontifical University of Salamanca on 18th April, 1965, and declaring it part of the theological faculty, under the title of The Pontifical Institute of Religious Sciences, with power to award the Baccalaureate and Licenciate of the Institute. In 1965 a Board of Governors was formed composed of Visitors who had student Brothers at the centre.

By the decree "Sacrae Catecheseos" of 18 April 1965, the Institute was incorporated in the Theological Faculty under the title of "The Saint Pius X Institute for Advanced Catechetical Studies" and subjected to the statutes of the said faculty besides its own statutes.

The academic year 1977-78 saw it transferred to its new site in Madrid, a move which had become necessary for various reasons. The negotiations with the ecclesiastical hierarchy for this move had painful results. It was granted on condition that the courses were reduced and the Baccalaureate or basic course in Theology were suppressed and the centre limited to the second grade: licenciate in two years.

THE INSTITUTE'S OBJECTIVES

From the beginning the Institute proposed objectives which are still valid today. a) The training of experts in the Catechetical Sciences. b) Producing people qualified to educate in the faith in state and private schools at all levels. c) The training of research workers in the disciplines more directly connected with Catechesis and Education. To attain these objectives, the Institute includes fundamental and scientific studies of the Human Sciences, of Theology and of Catechetics which are necessary for teachers of the faith in all places where the Church is to be found.

THE BROTHERS' CONSIDERABLE EFFORTS

From the very beginning, the Saint Pius X Institute has required a great effort on the part of the Spanish Brothers. On speaking of effort, the question of expense immediately springs to mind, but one must also consider the great strain of providing a group of Brothers for the running and for the academic responsibility of the centre.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Many a time it has been asked whether the effort was worth while. Economically no. But yes in all other respects. Many are the Brothers who have studied at Saint Pius X and whose pastoral and catechetical activities are significant in their respective regions. Numerous also are the members of other religious orders who have passed through our classes. And perhaps we have obtained other benefits none the less real for being less evident such as new thinking on the theological studies of the Brothers, a re-evaluation of our mission as educators in the faith, a re-vitalization of our own catechetical and pastoral charism, etc.

We complain about the present situation because there are not many young Brothers studying at the Institute. Times of crisis are not inducive to large numbers. In spite of everything, the quantity and, above all, the quality of the Brothers is quite representative and their option for catechetics and pastoral work is unmistakable and specifically Lasallian.

The Brothers of C.E.L. (Spanish Lasallian Centre) follow a course of both theology and catechetics. This is an additional motive for hope and a renewed consciousness of our efficacy.

THE ACADEMIC AND CREATIVE ASPECT

In this Institute, besides the academic courses, we direct our attention definitely towards creativity. Our vitality as an Institute depends on our creativity. Realising this, we take account of the catechetical needs of the moment so as to provide suitable answers. It is thus that various courses have been inaugurated: courses for the qualification of teachers of religion, correspondence courses in theology and Catechetics, school for the training of parish catechists, summer courses, various sessions throughout the year, etc...

We try, through our review "SINITE" as well as through the other publications of Saint Pius X Press, to make a modest contribution to a service of catechetical and pastoral reflection and action.

All this means that the spirit of this educational community of professors is always open to current catechetical thought, to the directives of the authorities and, above all, to the needs of those who devote themselves to one or other form of catechesis. Besides this, I think that the long years of work of the Saint Pius X Institute have contributed to creative thinking as regards catechetics, have taken the lead in the doctrinal and practical aspects of catechetics. Having considered anthropological catechetics and catechesis of experience, we have written books of religion on these as a basis, and provided catechetical directives for the education of children and young people in the faith.

The problems we have to face and the uncertainties which disturb us are numerous. But what is clear to us is our mission within the Church, the fact that we are able to meet the urgent need of training catechists, of educators in the faith, of leaders in the evangelizing action of the Church. We are committed to it and we hope that many others will undertake this task with enthusiasm.

THE LASALLIAN STUDY CIRCLE DISTRICT OF OTTAWA

The Lasallian Study Circle (Centre d'Etudes Lasalliennes, C.E.L.) of the District of Ottawa is the result of a resolution proposed at the last district chapter which asked the Brother Visitor and his Council to organise a renewal course for the Brothers, who so wished, based on a rediscovery of the Founder and his letters.

The first year, 1982-83, sixteen Brothers took part in C.E.L. In 1983-84 the number has risen to twenty. Likewise a number of young men who are more or less interested in the religious life joined the circle.

The C.E.L. calendar provides for six meetings during the school year, one Sunday a month from November to May. The Circle terminates its activities usually about the 15th of May when we celebrate the feast of St. John Baptist de La Salle over here.

Each session of the Circle follows the following pattern: the explanation of some Lasallian theme, 30 minutes; group discussion for 30 minutes followed sometimes by a plenary session. All the meetings end with a prayer followed by a reflection and a Celebration of the Word, about 20 minutes, and a community meal.

One Brother was responsible for introducing the subject during the first session. Three confreres took on this responsibility during the second.

The following are the subjects studied during the first year:

11) The Crises in the Life of De La Salle.
2) The Lasallian Vocation: Tending to Perfection through fidelity.
3) The Brother's Ministry as De La Salle Saw it.
4) The Spirit of Faith according to De La Salle.
5) The Founder's Place in my Religious Life Today.

During the discussions, the participants explored the following themes:

★ Discovering De La Salle's attitude when faced with a crisis. What personal application can we derive therefrom?

★ Try to discover what our fidelity should be, based on the "Considerations about our State and Employment".

★ Rediscovering what Saint John Baptist de La Salle says about our ministry in Meditations nos. 93, 193, 195 and 201.

★ Discussion about the Founder's teaching regarding the spirit of faith. How do we practice this today?

This year the members of C.E.L. have all agreed to make a study of the LASALLIAN PEDAGOGICAL PROJECT as the general theme under the following aspects.

1) The Place of the School in the Lasallian Project.
2) The Specific Object of the Lasallian Project: THE FREE SCHOOL.
3) De La Salle as the Trainer of Educators. How De La Salle Trained the First Brothers.
4) The Broad Outlines of De La Salle's Training of the First Brothers: Dialogue - Community - Commitment.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center

5) De La Salle and the discernment of Vocations.
6) De La Salle's Writings.

Such is a brief outline of the very modest effort in our district to nourish the devotion and interest of the Brothers in the Founder on the one hand, and, on the other, to shed Lasallian light on our apostolic life today.

THE APOSTOLATE OF URBAN YOUTH IN AFRICA

Brother Vincent Rabemahafaly, Secretary to "African Encounter and Collaboration", continues to deal here with the problem of youth which is one of the principal preoccupations of the Church in Africa. R.C.A. is an organization for collaboration between the Conference of African Bishops and the Superiors General of Congregations working in Africa. The last number of "Lasalliana" contained an article on the Apostolate of Rural Youth. This is the other half of the picture, the Apostolate of Urban Youth.

I) THE FACTS

First of all there is the huge proportion of young people resulting from a spectacular population explosion. Africa has a young population, being composed, for the most part, of countries with 45 to 50% of the people under 15 years and about 55 to 60% under 25.

Besides the numerical importance of the young there are two additional factors: the rapid urbanization of Africa which sees mushroom cities spring up at an alarming rate and the exodus from rural areas which, together with urbanization, affects mainly the young.

Several causes explain this fact which it would be interesting to study in each sector of the population.

The African urban population is composed of young people. A typical example is Nairobi where 78% of the inhabitants are under 30 and, of these, 30% are between 15 and 20 years of age.

II) CATEGORIES OF YOUNG TOWNDWELLERS

★ Educated young people. This is the largest group comprising pupils of primary and secondary level and the students from whose ranks comes the challenge to established institutions. This group has benefited most from the work of the Church.

★ Young Workers. These are people who can fend for themselves but who are often exploited because they have no work contracts. No trades union looks after their interests. The Church is still seeking a means of helping them.

★ The young unemployed or job seekers. Coming from the villages or "shanty towns" they seek casual work to survive. They are the "Parking Boys" or "Carry your parcel, Ma'm Boys" of the large cities. They are not only left to their wretched lot but are mistrusted because of their misdeeds.

★ Groups of young people brought together by ethnic, cultural or regional ties. These groups play the part of traditional age groups.

★ Young people in public service: army recruits, police recruits, civil servants. We could add to these the younger members of the single political party, a phenomenon common in Africa.

★ Juvenile deliquents. Delinquency among the youth of the rapidly expanding cities is a major problem. Alcoholism, drug abuse and prostitution are on the increase.

QUESTIONS. Are there other such groups of young people in the city or town where your Community is at work? Which group is most at risk and what would you propose to do in order to help its members?

III) ASPIRATIONS AND NEEDS OF URBAN YOUTH

A) Urban youth has many desires and aspirations, not all of equal value.

★ They want to enjoy to the full the benefits of modern civilization. That means a comfortable life symbolised by a well-furnished home, a car and plenty of money and they will go to any lengths to get them. This desire to enjoy the comforts of modern life does not take away, however, a certain nostalgia for traditional society which appears to them a lost paradise and which they would like to see revived. Community spirit is still strong amongst them, and if many students aspire to a respectable position it is because they want to be in a position to help the family and social group.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

★ They want to have a profession or a trade in order to find work. Diplomas are often over valued in the struggle for professional status, but it frequently happens that because the school is ill adapted to African needs many young people find themselves without any practical training. The qualified young person knows very well that personal worth is not enough and that he must win the favour of the personnel manager in the traditional manner. Once employed he must turn a blind eye to corruption, otherwise he risks finding himself in the unemployment queue. In the face of such difficulties the young person does not know where to turn.

★ Young people seek justice and freedom. In general, they support the objectives, often praiseworthy enough, of the party in power in their country but feel that in daily life the fine speeches about progress and justice are rarely put into practice. This leads to frustration. It is the students who show most daring in expressing their aspirations for freedom and justice.

★ Openness to and desire for a spiritual dimension. There is in the African soul a strong inclination to mysticism. Large numbers of young Africans belong to the existing religious system with its multiplicity of sects which have sprung up everywhere. To this is added a tendency to go back to ancient traditions and cultural habits.

★ Demand for a Church more congenial to the African soul. Accusing the institutional Church of having compromised with the colonial regimes, some young Africans consider it a factor in their alienation. They do not feel at home in a Church which preaches a morality so foreign to them and so demanding. They would like the Church a little less clerical and much more simple, less associated with the great and more in sympathy with ordinary people...

B) Needs of the young. Parallel with the aspirations of young people there are real needs which a realistic apostolate should try to meet.

The R.C.A. report examines some of these needs. We shall merely mention them:

— need for family solidarity and assistance;
— need for an education which is adapted to the milieu and a preparation for living;
— need for responsible adults who will serve as leaders and examples in social life;
— need to understand the Christian faith better and to express it in terms of their own culture;
— need for a basic ecclesiastical community, a Church of the people of God, more committed to the struggle for justice.

IV) HOW ARE THESE NEEDS TO BE MET?

The answer to this question concerns several sectors of the apostolate. The most relevant of which are:

★ Catechesis. Several initiatives have been taken in this field by different local churches. However, it must be admitted that the level of religious knowledge leaves much to be desired. This points to a lack of basic Christian formation and poses the following questions:

What is the content of the catechetical syllabus and who is responsible for drawing it up? What part do parents and former students play in this particular apostolate? Is there coordination or dispersal of efforts among those whose duty it is to educate young people in the faith whether in the school or outside of it?

★ Education through the school. There is a need to re-examine the work of the schools in the light of the present crisis in the African educational system. In face of the pressure for diplomas which favours individual development and becomes a divisive factor in society because it encourages an elitist mentality, it might be well to give more thought to the suggestion of a school for collective development. This means:

— taking as objective the advancement of a whole group rather than preparation for diplomas; — encouraging a sense of community betterment;
— emphasizing the role of parents and community leaders.

★ Extra-mural education. There is a lot more that can be done in this field:

— development of all the means of promoting informal education such as: youth movements, discussion groups, social awareness groups, use of radio and television to encourage the emergence of Christian leaders capable of contributing to the betterment of African society;

— more attention to the poor and emarginated: living among them and creating, in collaboration with them, forms of collective education leading to the formation of sharing communities.

Other initiatives have still to be taken in favour of children in unsuitable homes, of the unemployed and of the children who roam the streets of African cities and towns.

The apostolate of African youth as proposed by R.C.A. has a close resemblance to the educational apostolate of St. John Baptist de La Salle who took many steps to meet the needs of urban youth in his own time. Did he not provide a home for the young Irish boys, the sons of those exiled with King James II? Did he not open a Sunday school for young sailors in Calais, a residential school for the sons of middle class parents and another for the "libertins et indociles" whom we would call today juvenile delinquents?

Following in the footsteps of de La Salle his disciples are today trying in different ways to meet the manifold needs of the young people of Africa's towns and cities.

What new initiative can your Community take here and now?

LA SALLE-CIENFUEGOS: SOLIDARITY PROJECT

De La Salle College, Santiago (Dominican Republic), has 1350 students, sons of upper and lower middle class families. Cienfuegos is a township of 20,000 inhabitants, for the most part poor and emarginated.

We shall describe here the methods of organization and animation of the project, an account of which appeared in the first number of "Life of the Institute Today", page 58.

I) AIMS OF THE PROJECT

1) Direct contact with the poor and their cultural background in order to find out their values, their problems and their expectations so as to share with them our spiritual and cultural heritage.

2) Dialogue between our educative community and the people in the slum area in order to analyse the causes and consequences of their poverty and to help to remedy them by initiatives in popular education.

3) Evangelization of our educative community through contact with the poor and sensitivity to the demands of justice which must result from such contact.

4) Education in social responsibility and Christian commitment to the struggle for justice and the advancement of those on the fringes of society.

II) PREREQUISITES FOR THE EDUCATION OF THE POOR

1) Christian motivation: evangelical attitude of openness and availability.

2) Basic information on the concrete problems of the township and on the general psychology of the inhabitants.

3) Direct contact with the people and cultivation of lasting friendships which will be mutually beneficial on the human and spiritual planes.

4) Attention to external factors which could create barriers such as dress, means of transport, language, topics of conversation etc. (There must be no condescension)

III) MAIN LINES OF PASTORAL ACTION

1) Awakening of self-awareness among the poor. General uplift through education.
2) Organization of the community through the training of leaders particularly among the young.
3) Coordination and integration of the activities of the educational, social and religious elements in Cienfuegos.

IV) PASTORAL WORK FOR AND WITH THE PEOPLE OF CIENFUEGOS

1) Facilities already provided:

★ A dressmaking shop (1979) with 15 sewing machines, run by a lady volunteer and one instructress.
★ A school for typists (1981) with 15 typewriters and an instructress paid by the project organisers.

2) Occasional Activities

★ Literacy campaign, provision of books, and medicine for the dispensary.
★ Cultural activities by groups of students from the College, such as plays, concerts etc.

3) Help provided for the people's own efforts

★ Advisors to help the youth groups.
★ Trainers for sports teams and teachers for help with basic education.

V) ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED IN THE PROJECT

1) The Pastoral Team

Animation of the project for justice to the poor of Cienfuegos is the work of the Lasallian educative community. To animate means to maintain motivation in the pastoral work, to organise, coordinate and evaluate it on a permanent basis. This is done by a team of three lay people and one Brother who meet weekly and who are financed by the College.

Methods of animation employed in the College include:

— systematic catechesis on justice and commitment to the poor;

— diffusion of information among the educative community by means of college news sheets, circulars, posters and talks;

— organization of class groups such as Justice and Peace etc.

2) Cor Unum

This is a movement organized by the students of the College to arouse interest in and provide funds for the project. There are at present about 500 members among students from 5th year primary to 4th year secondary level. They donate 25 cents each on 25th of every month.

3) Justice and Peace

This is a movement of recent date. It is comprised of young Christians who commit themselves to the promotion of justice in their own lives and in the society in which they live. The movement is not confined to Lasallian circles but the student members provide a guarantee that the project will be maintained when they leave college. They form teams or "communities" in each class. Each member tries to make a concrete contribution to a project for justice. They meet periodically for prayer and reflection under the guidance of a member of the Lasallian educative community (Brother or layman).

Their pastoral activities are aimed at the practice of justice:

— in their personal relations with God and with others;

— in family relations with parents, members of the family and employees and neighbours;

— in school in their relations with teachers, companions, ancillary staff etc.

4) Youth and Cultural Centre - May, 1973

This is a concrete realization of the ideals of the project which began on 22nd December, 1978. It is an external sign of the Lasallian determination to be present among the poor. It is a meeting place for several youth organizations and for adults who find there people anxious and willing to encourage and advise them. There they can form lasting relationships and find means of self-improvement.

The embryonic library has already got all the books required for the Baccalaureat (School Certificate). These were donated by 4th year students of the College.

By means of loud speakers, "Radio Youth" keeps the people of the township informed. Two projects have their headquarters in the centre:

a) "Women in Action" – a programme for education in health, hygiene, domestic economy etc. conducted by a lady teacher.

b) "Youth Encounter" – an organization for literacy programmes, help with school work, children's choirs, theatricals etc.

V) DIFFICULTIES

1) People move away from the township. Lack of communication (there is only one telephone). Poor means of transport. Roads are impassible in wet weather. 70% of the people have neither water nor electricity. 60% are illiterate. Promiscuity and its results are widespread.

2) On the part of the institutional Church there is mistrust, gossip... and SILENCE.

3) From outside the township there is pressure from political parties who want to make capital out of the inhuman condition of the people and to manipulate them. There is absolute indifference on the part of the Government to the social problems of Cienfuegos.

VI) RESULTS

We are still sowing... When we discuss the situation among ourselves we feel we are moving in the right direction but...

YOUTH VILLA: PASTORAL CENTRE

Youth Villa had its origin in the desire of the Brothers of the District of Québec to make a direct contribution to education in the faith especially of young people but also of numbers of adults. It is, in a way, an answer to a simple question: "We can no longer teach school, what are we to do?"

We must point out that in Québec, as in the rest of Canada, control of schools has been out of the hands of religious congregations for the past twenty-five years. The state has established a system of education which is modern, free and open to the whole population from nursery school to university.

Though the public education system is officially Catholic (A bill to be introduced in parliament proposes important changes in this matter) and religion is taught in all state schools, except where the parents demand exemption for their children, the pupils do not always receive a Catholic formation of high quality. This is particularly the case at secondary level, between the ages of 12 and 17, where the students have little opportunity to question and clarify their beliefs and no place for meaningful religious celebration or exchange of opinions, with the help of competent adults, on the problems posed by modern society.

The "Youth Villa" is intended to be just such a place. It is not a perfect answer to the problem but it has been in existence for the past 13 years and is known, appreciated and encouraged by the bishops of our local church. This comprises the residents of the city of Québec and its surroundings, approximately 750,000 people. Though about 12,000 young people and adults come to the Villa every year there are many who have still to get to know it.

It has been in operation since 1971. It replaced an animation centre which the Brothers had established some years before on the grounds and in the building of the former juniorate of Ste. Foy. You could almost say that, without the name, the pastoral centre already existed there, because when the house at Ste. Foy was sold, its pastoral activities continued at the Villa from October, 1971.

The present building had been acquired three years before as a new juniorate but it soon became evident that the juniorate system no longer fulfilled its purpose. It was no better than a good boarding school. It was finally closed in 1971. The pastoral centre occupies the building and gives a new "vocation" to the house.

The Villa, had, therefore, never been a Brothers' school nor a retreat house attached to a school. Besides, the Brothers of the District of Québec have had no schools for the past twenty years. Nor is the Villa a house of formation. Briefly it is this: a place where young people (and sometimes adults) from schools and organizations in the region can come for days, evenings or week-ends of reflection. As Brother Bruno Blondeau, its principal founder, wrote, "The pastoral centre is a service offered by the Church to families and schools through the Brothers of the Christian Schools". That objective has not changed though the manner of providing the service may change according to circumstances.

As I mentioned before, the students of all schools (private or public) have religious instruction periods provided for in the school timetable and the services of a pastoral animator (school chaplain). If a teacher decides to ask permission from the school authorities to take a group of pupils to the Villa it is because he personally believes that what they will do there will help them to deepen their faith, to express it or in some cases to rediscover it. All the groups that come during the week are brought by teachers (mostly lay people) who have confidence in us. Without them we would have no direct contact with the school population.

Since 1978 a completely new team animates the centre. For this purpose a Brother was withdrawn from a state school and two lay people employed as animators, partly because there were no Brothers available and partly because we wanted to form a mixed team with different life experiences. If we decided to put so much effort into forming a team of animators it was because a study done by some Brothers connected with the centre had shown that it was necessary if the work was to continue. The Brothers as a whole agreed and it was with their moral support that the new team set to work in September, 1978. The team included a Brother interested in faith education of adults and a Capuchin Father who acted as chaplain to the Community. Since then the team has been expanded to include three Brothers together with, for this year at least, two clerical students who are completing their theological studies at Laval University.

The Brothers' Community at the Villa occupies a considerable part of the building and is composed of a number of Brothers, some of whom are retired. These Brothers, working full-time or part-time provide important support for the animators by looking after the meals, doing repairs, improving the building and grounds, doing the secretarial work and keeping the accounts.

The pastoral centre comprises two sections: an animation team, composed of Brothers, lay people, and a priest and a community of Brothers who look after the material needs of the centre.

Quite recently, December, 1983, the centre published a brochure for the benefit of those who might wish to avail of its services. (These, we must add, are not completely free) The contributions of groups cover about 20% of running costs. The rest is made up by the District.

I shall give below the complete text of the brochure as it describes accurately the present position:

OBJECTIVES. Through its work the centre wishes to contribute to the pastoral work of the Church particularly in the field of the education of the young in the faith.

It provides help for pastoral animators, parents and catechists who ask for its services. It is also open to groups of adults in search of the faith.

ACTIVITIES

— Days of recollection every week for secondary school students.
— Days of intensive preparation for Confirmation.
— Evenings and week-ends for Scripture study groups.
— Meetings of adult groups for study of the faith.
— 24 hours of recollection and silence.
— Animation in schools and parishes.
— Meetings of groups and movements connected with the pastoral ministry.

The animation of the days of recollection is generally done by the centre's animation team which prepares programmes adapted to particular groups.

METHODS. Basing our concept on the fact that young people have the faith and that they want to deepen it and make it grow we offer them themes for reflection and activities suitable to their age. In this way we invite them to receive Jesus Christ as the Good News for people of today.

Means: activities and reflection, workshops and sharing sessions; Celebration of the Word, of Reconciliation and of the Eucharist; Moments of relaxation.

THE ANIMATION TEAM. The work of animation is carried out by a qualified team composed of religious, lay people and a priest. All have been approved by the bishop of the diocese. Several religious provide essential services.

A COMMUNITY. The Brothers of the Christian Schools direct and maintain the institution. It is for them a way of carrying out the work of faith education among the young begun by their founder, St. John Baptist de La Salle.

ENVIRONMENT. Situated on the banks of the Saint Lawrence, half way between Cap-Rouge and Saint Augustin, the Villa provides an ideal environment of beauty and tranquillity conducive to the recollection required for any serious reflection. The site is enchanting at all seasons of the year.

INSPIRING DECOR. The principal meeting place is without doubt the "Jardin". It is, par excellence, a place for interior recollection. It calls for silence. It creates silence. It is decorated with real trees, dried, with their leaves, as well as with some remarkable pieces of sculpture in wood which are thrown into relief by concealed lighting. Off this hall are rooms for small groups, arranged in varied and original ways. One of these rooms, "La Source", is reserved for private prayer. (End of quotation from brochure)

I stressed above that the teachers and school pastoral animators are our only contacts with the school-going population. It is thanks to them that groups of students, both boys and girls, particularly from secondary schools, can come to the centre. That remains true.

As from this year an important group of children will leave the school environment for religious instruction. They are the pupils of the sixth class i.e. children of 11 to 12 years old who are finishing primary school and who are preparing to receive the sacrament of Confirmation. Up to now this preparation was done during school hours.

The parish, through the local committee for preparation for Confirmation, will bring these children to us for days of instruction and reflection on the meaning of Baptism and of the new sacrament they are going to receive. This preparation will occupy the animation team during February, March and part of April. If we devote so much time to it, it is because the demand is so great. Not less than seventy groups of children (40 to 55 at a time) will follow one another at the centre for days or evenings of reflection and instruction. Some parishes ask the school authorities for days off school so that the children can come to the centre from 9.00 a.m. to 3.00 p.m. Others, who cannot come during the day, arrange to come between 3.00 p.m. and 9.00 p.m. and often later because the centre is occupied.

Others again come in the evening or on Saturdays because they do not want their children's initiation into sacramental life associated with school. (Everything leads us to believe that this movement will become more popular in the near future.) Who brings these children? It is the parents through a committe established by the parish. The parents must, in effect, take precise and positive action to have their children prepared for the sacraments. They must make application to the parish, bring the child with them when making the application and guarantee a follow-up.

In this way the parents will play a more active role in the preparation of their children for Confirmation. The Villa had already taken the initiative in this matter by insisting that a minimum number of parents accompany the children, at least one parent to eight children. This was, indeed, a happy initiative: it gave parents an opportunity of seeing the kind of catechetical instruction the child received and a chance to experience a day of recollection. ("It was for us a real retreat" they often tell us) And lastly it made us known and appreciated as catechists. (We can barely meet the demand. And that without any advertising.)

This period of intense work with children finishing primary school is all that we can do for them. Our principal work is with young people between the ages of 12 and 17 who, according to what we were recently told by a specialist, are in a "pastoral desert", by which he meant that little was being done for them on the pastoral plane.

Of course the pastoral centre is much more than what I have described above. Let me say in conclusion that its programme is open, flexible and continually adapting itself to the pastoral needs of the young so as to be able to answer to their real needs which cannot be other than spiritual.

Our fidelity to St. John Baptist de La Salle is shown by the interest we take in and the priority we give to the faith education of the young. We carry out our work in a spirit of faith for none of us can cause faith to spring up in the heart of others nor can we measure the fruits of our activities. We work in a spirit of humility because our programmes and methods of today may not be suitable in three to five years' time and knowing, at the same time, that there may be better or more urgent work to be done. Lastly, all our activity is inspired by charity. We try to live charity. It is what we propose to those who are "humble of heart".

CATECHESIS IN OUR LIFE

1) FAILURE OF THE "CATECHISM"?

For many long years the immense treasures of CATECHESIS was reduced to the CATECHISM due to historical circumstances, to a book containing a short summary of the Christian doctrine, of the principal truths of the Christian faith, presented in the name of the ecclesiastical authorities, to be memorised by means of question and answer. The term also serves to remind us of a systematic organization and time table aimed at the communication and assimilation of this summary. The whole being destined above all for preparing children to receive the sacraments of Christian initiation.

Catechism thus applied took no account of the social and cultural changes in the world such as the conquests of science, the process of secularization, pluralism, atheism or oecumenism. It consequently took no account either of the changes in the Church itself, of the fact that the structures which produced and crystallized the catechism were those of the Church of the Middle Ages, of the Counter Reformation of the 16th Century or of colonial Christianity. Catechism is not suited to the complex realities of the 20th Century, soon to become the 21st, because its horizons, its content, its methods, its language, and the point of view from which it starts and to which it wishes to arrive are no longer suited to the context of the modern world. Learning by heart a summarized Thomist doctrine of the principal truths of faith does not lead to conversion, does not meet the needs of modern man or present day challenges and does not commit man to the transformation of the world.

The failure of the catechism and the consequent search for the true meaning of catechesis are the result of profound biblical, spiritual, theological and pastoral renewal on the one hand, and, on the other, of the demands resulting from social, economic and cultural changes which affect man and the community in their very being, their way of organizing themselves and of acting, and their destiny.

2) SEARCHING FOR THE MEANING OF CATECHESIS

A knowledge of the first five centuries of Christianity is fundamental for the understanding of the true meaning and significance of catechesis. The circumstances which obliged the Christians to organize themselves clandestinely into communities of faith, of brotherhood and hope, led to the main preoccupation being with adults. Option for Jesus Christ was a gesture of radical human liberty responding to a gratuitous call of God and entailing a recognized risk of martyrdom. The change in life style, from the religious point of view, (abandoning the gods, pagan customs and attaching oneself to Jesus Christ and his plans) led to a social change (the establishment of a different kind of community, giving testimony to Christian values, a challenging of political and religious systems, etc.).

When describing the primitive Christian community, the Acts of the Apostles (Acts, II, 4... IV, 35) enumerates the basic elements of true catechesis. They are the doctrine of the Apostles, prayer, the eucharist, witness to the resurrection, brotherhood which unites the community, the sharing of gifts and possessions, infectious joy. That is to say that CATECHESIS IS A COMMUNITARIAN PROCESS OF CONTINUING EDUCATION, using divers means, WHICH LEADS TO THE CHRISTIAN'S PROGRESSIVE COMING TO MATURITY IN THE FAITH SO THAT WITH JESUS CHRIST HE ASSUMES CO-RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE SALVATION OF THE WORLD, AS AN ACTIVE MEMBER, in communion and participation WITH THE COMMUNITY OF THE CHURCH.

Over the last few years the Church has thought long over the need for a new kind of catechesis. The current of biblical, patristic, liturgical, theological, anthropological and pastoral renewal traced out new paths during the first half of the 20th Century and led to the Vatican II Council which brought about important renewal "ad intra" and "ad extra" to the Church. Catechesis did not lag behind on this path. Without overlooking the significant progress in catechetical research and reflection which preceded the Council, especially in international Congresses and Weeks, one must refer in the first place to the Council documents themselves (1962-1965) the international Week in Medellin (1968), the International Catechesis Congress (Rome, 1971), the General Catechesis Directory of the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy (1971), the Synod on "Evangelization" followed by the apostolic Exhortation "Evangelii Nuntiandi" (Paul VI, 1974), the Synod on "Catechesis" (1977) with its "Message to the People of God" followed by the apostolic Exhortation "Catechesi Tradendae" (Jean Paul II, 1979), the Puebla Document (CELAM, 1979), a whole series of declarations by the bishops of different countries on the Renewal of Catechesis following all these proceedings.

3) SOME NECESSARY CHANGES IN CATECHESIS

a) As regards those who practice it. It is the Christian community itself which is responsible for the education in the faith of those who compose it.

The family is the first community, the little "domestic Church", in which our Lord is imitated and honoured and where Christian values are assimilated in the context of words, gestures and actions and confirmed by the living testimony of the parents. The Community of the Church bringing the faithful together in the faith and in action, nourishing them, convincing them, organizing them and pledging them to the service of God and of the community with the aim of transforming the world. The Catechists are called and sent by the community to carry the word of God and of the Church, the cooperators with the family: people who participate closely in the life of the community, having an extensive culture and an intense spiritual life. They are the primary witnesses of Our Lord and his message. They lead those who are catechized to participate in the development of the catechesis and in the progress of the community.

b) As regards those who are the object of catechesis. This is the Christian throughout his life, especially as an adult, for he has the power to influence decisions in society. Hence, besides the strictly doctrinal ideas of the Church, the adult tries to organize his life, his family, his profession, his participation in the destinies of society: in this respect he challenges the real Church of which he does not always feel himself an integral part, but rather a passive member. It is to this freedom that the renewed catechesis gives priority. While granting its due place to the catechesis of children who are easily malleable because they are receptive but not always capable of discernment, the Church needs to channel the best of its energies in favour of adults and, logically, of young people.

c) As to its content. This is the Bible, the great and permanent manual of catechesis, since the whole of Christian Life depends profoundly on the Word of God who summons, judges, challenges and sends (DV 8, 21, 24, 26). The great themes of the Christian faith always remain the same, but they are studied and lived in the framework of the preaching of salvation in the "kerygma" within the community of faith and commitment and in the actual human situations of the present moment. If these conditions are lacking, the content remains within the context of doctrinal "synthesis" without any effect on personal, community and social life.

d) As to method: the various psychological and pedagogical methods are useful in the process of education in the faith if they are suitably adapted. They must, however, follow the methodical principles of CHALLENGE or interaction, that is to say: a mutual and efficacious relationship between life with its ever occurring problems and formation in the faith, which provides solutions based on revelation or argues the experiences of life by pointing out directions. Without this actual confrontation between THE EXPERIENCE OF LIFE and the FORMULATION OF THE FAITH, conversion or liberating action will be difficult even if the well-tried methods of SEE, JUDGE, ACT are used.

4) WE, LASALLIANS, AND CATECHESIS

Be convinced personally and community wise, about the MESSAGE OF SALVATION (The person of Our Lord, his teaching, his mission) and make it reverberate (catechesis comes from Kate-echeo to make to echo), by making it vibrate till it enters the fibres of our being, converting and transforming us (conversion-metanoia), till it overflows with actual signs of mature faith (community-koinonia, liberating service-diakonia; liturgy, etc.) which is the continuing process of Education in the Faith which renewed Catechesis proposes to bring about. Not only does it radically modify the traditional "catechism" for children, it places every Christian in a continuing situation of being catechised as well as an agent of catechesis and an educator in the faith, because of his place in history and the requirements of the communitarian process.

To be Lasallian is to live in the spirit of faith and apostolic zeal: "Signum Fidei", in brotherhood: "indivisa manent". Therefore, to become this SIGNUM FIDEI, this sign of faith as proposed by De La Salle, every Lasallian must assume for himself and others a radical catechesis: A COMMUNITARIAN EDUCATION IN THE FAITH WHICH IS CONTINUING, PROGRESSIVE, ORGANIC, ORDERED and SYSTEMATIC, always aiming at ever-greater maturity expressed in actual and specific signs of a change in life style, in human relationships, in the construction of society and relationship with God, sights fixed on the plenitude which will be manifested in the Eschatology.

Called by God to a vocation and quite specific mission among the people of God, "CHRISTIAN EDUCATION", the Lasallian is intrinsically a CATECHIST, an AGENT OF EDUCATION IN THE FAITH, through his testimony, his word, his personal and community activity. From this point of view his zeal is creative in opening the paths, by all means possible, to the prophetic SIGN of denunciation and annunciation, taking as reference the inheritance of the Christian faith in confrontation with the social, economic, political, cultural and religious realities which have to be transformed so as to be in harmony with the divine plan of a fraternal, united and just society.

"THE SCHOOL GOES TO THEM"

The purpose of the Gabriel Drolin Association may best be summed up in its own statement of objectives, "In view of the number of young people regarded as failures, the Association has for object the creation and putting into practice of teaching methods designed to reduce backwardness during school and formative years."

The Association began with a meeting between Brother Pierre and the teachers newly assigned to the special classes for reluctant or backward pupils in an area of high rise flats at Garges les Gonesse.

In the course of his twenty-two years' teaching in primary schools in various parts of the region Brother Pierre had been able to consult leading members of the teaching profession. His availability, due to the fact that he was teaching in a private school, led to his accepting a completely new post. He was assigned to the education of children of families of no fixed abode. There he learned from the inside the real problems. Faced with the illiteracy of the children he initiated a program of action to make the parents aware of the need for instruction. His qualities as an educator were given full scope.

He was asked to supervise the introduction of new teaching methods at Garges les Gonesse for a full school year. He was then asked to extend the scope of his action to other areas, hence the formation of the Association.

Let us go back a little. An educational aids system had been provided to help young people and adults. A large team of monitors had been recruited. The sector dealing with itinerants had done some research and introduced new methods.

In the early stages, teaching was based on the practical experiences of daily life not on literary textbooks. After two years' experience each monitor was asked to write a summary of the methods employed with beginners in reading. Little by little an original method was developed and published under the title "At last I can read and write". Requests for training in the system came from outside the area. Teachers and educators became interested and asked us for further publications: a critique of reading methods in common use, an explanation of some of the other means of helping beginners. The booklet "How to learn to read" went through three editions and was used in the national literacy campaign of one foreign country.

Our preoccupations at national level soon led us to call on government departments concerned and our document entitled "A real educational service for itinerants" with its twenty-six proposals helped to make the general public aware of the problem. As a result, official studies were made such as: "Education of the children of Gypsies and Nomads" 1981, and "Sixty Proposals to counteract insecurity and poverty", 1980. These official reports show evidence of the experience we gained during thirteen years of dealing with the problems.

The awareness of the public authorities encouraged us to invest in additional personnel and more mobile classes.

The Association has established several mobile teacher units and has persuaded the authorities to allocate money for the payment of voluntary teachers. At first it was the Brothers who, because of their experience in school, were appointed to these posts. We must now enlarge these teams which set out each morning to teach the children on the city's outskirts who cannot yet attend ordinary schools. The teachers of project "The School Goes To Them" are happy — happy because of the joy of those "kids" who cannot understand why teachers should want a vacation.

The Catholic education authorities are becoming interested in our methods and have given priority to our project, "The School Goes To Them" in their training programme for teachers of itinerants in 1984 and 1985.

In January, 1984, we launched the "Campaign for 1,000 scholarships" in reading, with the help of a teaching aid which has proved very stimulating: "A Reading Licence"... Yes, a folder in three sections with one, two or three stars to encourage the learner-reader to work for a scholarship that entitles him to buy the books of his choice. The campaign organisers are hoping to provide a fund of 500,000 francs.

The learner-readers want more, so other teaching aids are forthcoming. A remarkable method of teaching numeracy has come from an outstanding teacher, Sister Marie de Vendée. Training periods are also provided by our Association.

A system of writing, a method of division, certainly, but above all a dynamic pedagogy — a pedagogy of success... and 40 propositions to be learned (not merely to be read).

In conclusion, let us quote a passage from Jacotot (1836), University Professor who challenged hidebound teachers.

"Look for the poor, the ignorant. Take them from their corners and the ignorant will soon show you that they are the same kind of creature as Lagrange and Pascal and that there is but one and the same human intelligence."

PEDAGOGICAL RESEARCH CARRIED OUT BY THE LASALLIAN NATIONAL COMMISSION (Brazil)

The Pastoral and Pedagogical Committee of the District of Porto Alegre had asked the Lasallian National Commission for advice on the practical application of Lasallian pedagogy in the circumstances of today. The first intention of the Committee was to study the characteristic traits of Lasallian pedagogy as experienced by the Brothers, lay teachers and former students of our establishments at national and continental (Latin American) level.

A circular under two headings was sent out:

1) What are the traits that characterize Lasallian educative practice?
2) Suggestions for the realization of the work proposed.

The circulars were sent to 80 Brothers in the two Brazilian Districts and in Latin America, to 49 teachers in the two Districts and to 5 former students.

On reception of a satisfactory number of answers, the team appointed by the National Commission for the study of Lasallian pedagogy met to study and analyse the answers. It was agreed that, in view of the nature of the answers received, the work should be divided into three parts:

a) drafting an introduction to the basic objectives of Lasallian education;

b) elaboration of a series of principles which at the beginning envisaged the following: general principles, community and social principles, educative principles, principles of pedagogical practice and training;

c) account of educative practices corresponding to each of the above principles.

The results of this work were submitted to a group of Brothers and Lasallian educators as well as to a large number of former students. The group studied the principles proposed, rewrote them and provided a series of educative practices relating to each principle.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

Lasallian education is characterized by its Christian outlook and its insistence on an evangelical spirit of fraternity. It proves its loyalty to the Church. It engages in the task of reforming society with a view to bringing about the Kingdom of God.

PRINCIPLES

1) Lasallian education aims at the formation of the whole human person considered as the centre of the educative process.

2) Lasallian education is education for freedom and undertakes to work towards this end.

3) Lasallian educative practice is engaged in continual self renewal in order to meet change.

4) Training and development of the critical sense is an essential factor in Lasallian education.

5) The Lasallian educative process is one of participation and communication.

6) Lasallian educative action is characterized by its care to plan and organize its programmes in accordance with its principles.

7) According to de La Salle, the value and dignity of the educator spring from constant effort.

8) In Lasallian thought, the educator is a minister of God's Word.

9) Solid formation of the educator, evident in his life and work, is indispensable for the work of Lasallian education.

10) The Lasallian educator gives priority to the most needy.

11) Preference for the poor should be evident in every Lasallian educative initiative.

12) Lasallian education makes a synthesis of faith, culture and life.

13) The Lasallian educative mission is undertaken as a community effort and gives preference to:

a) education in the family setting;
b) formation of community leaders;
c) attention paid to the school personnel;
d) follow-up of former students;
e) effective and significant presence of the Brothers;
f) integration into the educative community of pupils, parents, educators, management, personnel and former students.

14) The Lasallian educative community is open to the wider national and universal communities. Consequently:

a) it analyses the reality of which it forms part;
b) it confronts it with the ideals of the Gospel;
c) it undertakes to transform it.

15) The Lasallian educative process is characterized by a spirit of friendship and fraternal esteem between teachers and taught.

16) Esteem, understanding and welcome for people are characteristic marks of the Lasallian educative style.

17) Attention to the emotional and affective development of students is an important factor in Lasallian education.

18) Lasallian education announces Jesus Christ and His message.

19) Education in faith is an all-embracing process which involves the participation of the entire educative community.

21) Pastoral care of the young and fostering of vocations have a quite exceptional importance in Lasallian educative action.

22) The Lasallian school is characterized by the quality of its teaching, its serious formation and the continual renewal of its programmes.

23) The teaching and training given in Lasallian schools are aimed at preparing the students for life.

24) In the teaching and formation he gives his students the Lasallian educator takes account of individual differences, respects the personal rhythm of each, stimulates and shows appreciation of individual effort, tries to adapt his teaching to the level of each individual and pays special attention to the slow learner.

25) The Lasallian educator tries to make learning and training as appealing as possible... His aim is the formation of the individual.

26) Art, music and sport are given an important place in the school curriculum.

27) Preparation for work and development of the scientific spirit are constants in the Lasallian school programme.

These principles, and suggestions for their application, were sent back for further study, additions and suggestions, to those who had answered the first questions.

A member of the national team was asked to compare these principles with those laid down in the Management of Schools and other Lasallian documents in order to find a sound basis for and enrichment of the principles which are to guide all educative action in Brazil.

They noted deficiencies in popular education which is given priority by the District of Porto Alegre. These deficiencies will be made good after the Latin American meeting in Lima in July, 1984, which has made popular education its theme.

THE LASALLIAN FAMILY

INTRODUCTION

Thinking about the content of this article I asked myself several times what would interest the readers of LASALLIANA from the pen of a Lasallian who has lived in close contact with the Brothers' Institute for the past fifteen years and who has been responsible for animation at local, national and international level.

I think I can give a satisfactory answer to the question by expressing in the simplest way possible the problems I have come up against in recent years and by reducing them to the one great problem which affects our structures at all levels.

THE PRESENT SITUATION

Since the World Congress of Buenos Aires (1972) there has been a real "leap forward" in the quality of our Associations, thanks to the generous action of those responsible who have transformed themselves fundamentally. I can say, without shadow of doubt, that with few exceptions our Associations throughout the world have taken on an effective ecclesial dimension. This is confirmed by the existence of leaders who have put aside questions and problems in order to promote the restructuring, in a Christian sense, of our Associations.

This silent, assiduous action has often passed unnoticed. Our new Associations, struggling with daily problems, attract little attention.

What is lacking, blatantly lacking, in our Associations is the presence of a considerable number of convinced Lasallians, of a number of carefully chosen members who would exercise an apostolic influence. In effect, you can accomplish little with politeness and friendliness which is all we have had up to the present. It is, in fact, absurd to expect a dozen or so people, no matter how well intentioned, to act in the name of thousands of members who are potential animators but who are little concerned about the social, charitable and religious programmes put forward.

Something very different is expected from a Catholic Association in the '80's. But where can we find convinced Lasallians if the Lasallian schools which educated them to university level failed to communicate to them the missionary zeal which should animate every believer. Does the Lasallian project, theme of so many learned congresses, symposia and conferences, really animate the students? Does it produce alumni anxious to respond to the manifold needs and demands of the Catholic laity? How many of them do so? What initiatives have been taken by Lasallian schools to form, in the Lasallian spirit, their lay teachers, their co-workers, their former students who are willing to help and their friends and sympathisers?

These are disturbing questions the answers to which would take us far beyond the limits set for this article.

WHAT CAN BE DONE: THE STUDENTS

They constitute the largest part of the Lasallian Family and are the prime object of the Lasallian Educative Project.

The pupils spend a considerable period of time at the Brothers' schools and by the very fact that they attend Catholic schools they demand something more than mere cultural and scientific formation. This is also what the parents think when they choose for their children a school having specific ecclesial connotations. Whether they did so for convenience or from conviction is secondary to the fact that the Catholic school must not betray the ideals on which it was founded.

This preamble might appear unnecessary, but entire classes of pupils at Lasallian schools do not have a Brother to teach them or have one as a teacher only, not as a Lasallian educator, because of a certain "fear" or reluctance to talk on spiritual themes or of the consecrated life.

Every former student has in his memory and in his heart a special place reserved for one or two Brothers whom he regards as having played an important role in his formation. These Brothers are scarcely ever remembered as teachers, however brilliant, but rather because they found time and ways to talk about life, about its problems and risks, its joys and deceptions and of how to look upon them in the light of Christian faith. That is the first message that the young expect from a religious. That is the path of faith, the development of personality that parents want for their children when they choose a Catholic school.

FORMER STUDENTS

Let us not forget that they are as numerous as the actual students. A document from the Superior General says, with reason, that the participation of former students can develop from politeness and friendliness to forms of active engagement, both material and spiritual, for the support of the Brothers' work. This is an important principle which risks remaining at the theoretical stage if situations are not created to allow former students, who so wish, to take on precise responsibilities within the framework of the Brothers' institutions. Like all committed Lasallians, like the Brothers themselves, the former students require specialised formation.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Their generosity can be availed of only if the communities of Brothers show themselves willing to accept a precise pastoral programme for lay people, which in present circumstances is an objective to be aimed at and certainly not an actual reality.

We must make special mention of the younger people who finished their studies at a Lasallian school a few years ago, and of those who are now in their final year. This is fertile ground which must be developed each year by Lasallian formation courses organized by the Districts or by the Associations. This would allow us to add, each year, to our Associations, new elements formed and perfected in the Lasallian spirit and would be very different from the haphazard way our Associations have been formed up to the present — with the inevitable results.

We should pay similar attention to the formation of leaders. They cannot be improvised nor can they continue to take responsibilities for which they were not prepared, especially in view of the precise programmes which we want the new Lasallian Associations to put into effect.

THE PARENTS

They are the Brothers' first collaborators while their children are still at school but the situation changes radically when it comes to the wider Lasallian community because parents are generally taken up with their work and their families. Besides, it is difficult for some of them to keep up their interest in the Lasallian world when the children have left school.

Even among this group of lay people there are some who are available and who are acquainted with the founder and his spirituality for reasons which were, perhaps, more practical than idealistic. We must find a place for these Lasallians also and help them on the way to spiritual perfection through a specialised formation.

LAY TEACHERS

For a long time past they have outnumbered Brothers in Lasallian schools but interest in their vocation has changed little. A school can continue to be Lasallian if somebody takes the trouble to provide Lasallian inspiration for the work of these educators. This is generally confined to attendance at a congress or symposium from which they return disappointed because they find the meeting too academic or the themes treated, too theoretic.

Consequently, it is necessary to give thought to the on-going formation of these members who are so important to the educative community, if we want the Brothers' school to remain Lasallian in spite of the continuing diminution in the number of Brothers. In this way the educative possibilities of the school will be increased and it will acquire all the connotations of a Catholic school.

Lay teachers could also become members of Signum Fidei or undertake other forms of activity animated by Lasallian spirituality. One could envisage many possibilities for this group of people, certainly, but it is pointless to entertain illusions and to hope that all this will happen spontaneously. It is the fruit produced by a well considered on-going formation.

How can all this be brought about? Can it be done or is it merely utopian? An old Latin dictum said, "Everyone is the artisan of his own destiny". How does a Community of Brothers set about creating around itself a community of Lasallian lay people thoroughly formed? How does it give them a suitable on-going formation?

It is necessary that:

1) The Community be amenable and if not, it must be made aware so that every attempt at action will not be met with insurmountable and tenacious resistance.

2) A Brother be appointed Assessor or Animator of the Lasallian Family who will take charge of the on-going formation of former students, teachers, parents, Signum Fidei and of all those who seek access to the message of the Founder. This Brother will also ensure the integration of these Lasallians in the school and extra-mural structures of the institutions concerned and follow them step by step in their development.

From these principles it follows that:

a) The Brother will not be "lost" to the school or to the Community. On the contrary, he will bring to the school better qualified helpers and collaborators. It is not a question of freeing a Brother from school but of employing a Brother for the school.

b) The Brother must have special qualities. You cannot impose this work on somebody who does not want it. You must, on the contrary, assist the Brother who, by his natural talents is qualified for the work, by easing a too heavy work load or by relieving him of it completely in the case of large institutions. (This applies also to a large number of potential Lasallian animators.)

c) Following from what has been said above, the choice of the Brother should be as carefully considered as that of a Director or Bursar, given the wide field of his possible activities.

All this is feasible. It is not utopian but it requires precise decisions. These could be taken at Community level but it would be much more significant if they were studied and proposed at the level of Provincial and General Chapters.

THE IDENTITY OF THE BROTHER OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

Paper given by Brother Alain HOURY, Visitor of Paris, to a Plenary Assembly of the French Episcopate at Lourdes, November 1983

The following text was composed for the Plenary Assembly of the French Episcopate in November 1983 at Lourdes.

The introduction to the study of the dossier "Religious life and the missionary prospects of the Church in France" was to be made by two religious men and two religious women. My contribution, as agreed with the other interested parties, would dwell on the links between the Brothers of the Christian Schools and the profession of the teacher-educator, and on the lay character of our religious life.

The twelve minutes for which the text was written, and distributed to the bishops, were reduced to six and I had to condense it on to both sides of a single sheet.

This kind of text, midway between one giving testimony and a theoretical explanation, because of its brevity, inevitably leads to omissions and rather brief summaries. It is not so much interested in recalling the important points which make for the originality of the Brothers' religious life not only in the Church but also in comparison with most other forms of religious life.

Underlining these differences does not mean being in opposition to them but realizing the gift which is made to us, for the Church and the world, in following St. John Baptist de La Salle.

Address delivered at the Conference of the French Hierarchy, at Lourdes, November 1983, by Brother Alain Houry, Visitor.

Today here are 1,700 Brothers of the Christian Schools in France. Their median age is 62 years so we are faced with the problem of ageing personnel. I can not continue my present work (e.g. looking after a number of schools for which we have responsibility) if I do not look to the future by involving myself in the ministry of vocations. That requires that I make plainly understood the originality of the religious life of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. For if what we are does not correspond with what we do then it is impossible to understand either the one or the other.

Few religious live their lives so closely associated with a precise task. "The end of the Institute", wrote the Founder, in the original Rule, "is to give a Christian education to children and it is for this purpose that we keep schools."

You see from this that the apostolate of the school (and particularly of the Christian school) is an essential element of our religious life even though the field of apostolic action is much wider.

We believe that in the relationship between teacher and pupil, in the educational process, fundamental principles are involved — the salvation of the young person and the building up of the Church. Our work as teachers and educators is not just a means of sharing in the world of work and justifying ourselves in the eyes of our students. It is in doing this work that we show to young people that through us they can find salvation both temporal and eternal.

To consecrate yourself for life to the education of the young presupposes that you experience God in so doing. This is what inspired the first Brothers to reshape the schools of heir time and make them accessible to all. It could be said that the criterion of the authenticity of our experience of God is the progress of our work.

Our work becomes for us the substance of our religious consecration (Declaration 48,2). The spirit of faith and of zeal, characteristic of our institute, leads us to exercise our profession of teacher-educator in a contemplative manner, avoiding any dichotomy between our religious life and our professional life.

"Make no distinction between what concerns your state of life and your sanctification", recommended St. John Baptist de La Salle. For a Brother, his work with young people and his spiritual life are one and the same. This is far removed from the so-called two objectives of the apostolic religious life.

It is important to make people understand that a profession can be a path to perfection.

Our manner of consecrating ourselves to the young implies, for us, a real bond between culture and faith. The Brother dedicates himself to the education of the young and helps them to attain, through culture, their full human potential (GS 53) (Declaration 13,5). He seeks, with his young disciples, to Christianise the cultural milieu in which they live. He is a teacher who is also a witness — an elder brother who lives with them.

St. John Baptist de La Salle quitted his aristocratic and ecclesiastical milieu to become part of the culture of schoolmasters and their pupils. This is how he and his Brothers "left the world" by accepting fully the Gospel which challenged a system that approved the practical exclusion of so many young people.

Could we do the same thing to-day? I believe that a law which would prevent the Brothers from getting to know the living conditions of their students and from speaking to them as Christians in the course of the day, would scarcely be conducive to the fulfilment of their catechetical ministry. Such would be the case where religion became an optional subject in the school curriculum. The living tradition of the Institute "has always sought to unite closely the work of evangelization and that of civilisation and access to culture (Declaration 40,2). "Our world", said the Chapter of 1966, "needs witness given at the very heart of profane realities and the lives of men, by persons who know and love God as a living person." (Declaration 11,14)

In view of what I have said, you will not be surprised if I now stress the lay character of our Institute. We remain unambiguously lay religious. This was our deliberate choice from the beginning and it was calmly restated, after mature reflection, by the last two General Chapters, held since the Second Vatican Council. In no way do we wish to form part of the hierarchical structure of the people of God.(1) Why? "Community exercises and work in school demand the whole man", said our Founder (Memoir on the Habit).

"The whole man". St. John Baptist de La Salle was concerned all through his life with the problem of the use of time. Because he could not be completely faithful to his duties in the Cathedral Chapter and at the same time see to the consolidation of his first community, he resigned his post as canon of the cathedral of Reims, a post very useful to the Church. He had often to defend the originality of his foundation against those who wanted it incorporated into the juridical and pastoral framework of the time.

As lay religious, we are, in a way, witnesses to a very modern ecclesiology. We have inherited from our history an instinctive distrust of any ministry which proceeds from an a priori position. The manner of my own intervention is an illustration arises from the fact that we are called first to live, in order to see later how our life fits in with the pastoral plans of the Church of France. Pastoral care of the young may not, in certain sectors, have always been given due priority but that did not prevent us from feeling ourselves truly part of the Church in our dedication to the young: the call of Christian families was not lacking.

May I, as a religious superior, be permitted to remind our bishops that it is not fitting for a community of Brothers (or Sisters) to be unable to participate in the Eucharist on week days. A parish Mass at 9.00 a.m. is out of the question for those who practise a profession. Proper conditions are required if we are to carry out our pastoral mission.

I must also say a few words on the Brothers' educative service to the poor and on their community life. Community is based on a common mission. Community life means a life of sharing, of prayer and much more besides.

The community can, by its own dynamism, create new forms of service to young people in difficulty. Often the work is similar to that carried out by other agencies. Sometimes we must invent, create and find time to do such work outside our normal work. And if the needs of France are great they must not make us forget the appeal of the young Churches.

is with this in view that we insist that the formation of every young Brother in France must include a period of, at least, two years in a Third World country. Such an experience of the international character of the Institute (four fifths of the Brothers are not French) and of the extent of the world problems which we face, helps the young Brother to enter more readily into the missionary designs of the Church of France.

However, we do not define ourselves, primarily, by what we do nor by the pastoral services we render. Religious life has its own inherent value and significance as a sign and this implies a fundamental poverty and independence of productive activity. More than in their work, I believe in the silent presence of the Brothers. "God loves you", they seem to say to the young, "and the proof is that we are among you because it is He who has sent us to you."

THE BROTHERS IN TURKEY

Since the Brothers first went to Turkey in 1841 to teach the children of poor Christians, their situation as well as that of the Christians living there has changed utterly. The Ottoman Empire, "the sick man of Europe" was replaced after the first World War by a Republic, ultra nationalist and lay. The Brothers' Institute, which at the turn of the century was rapidly increasing in numbers, was able to send, over a period of years, up to three hundred Brothers to Turkey. After the expulsion of the Brothers from France in 1904 establishments such as St. Joseph's at Kadiköy expanded to such an extent that they could employ eighty Brothers. Several dozen schools, mostly primary, were opened throughout the country. These were supported by the secondary schools which included one boarding school.

Following the peace treaties, exchanges of population between the Christians of Anatolia and Muslims living in Europe, and the return of many Europeans to their countries of origin, led to a decline in the number of Christians who now form only 0.4% of the population as against one third under the empire. Muslim children replaced Christian children in our schools which had acquired a reputation for excellence.

Since primary education was nationalized we are left with only three secondary schools which serve the children of well-to-do parents. The Brothers have got older, some have died and others have returned to France to resume their apostolate, interrupted in 1904. The last Brothers to come here were those from Bulgaria when the Communists seized power there in 1948. Since then our numbers have steadily decreased until only twelve remain to run three schools: one in Izmir and two in Istanbul. The boarding department of one of the latter has now been closed and the other handed over to lay teachers.

The Brothers' work is confined to these schools which are dependent on the Ministry of Education for their programmes (Franco-Turkish), their intake (decided by the Ministry of Education on the results of competitive examinations), and for their fees which are their only source of income. Under such constraints the Brothers follow their usual policy of running the schools under the supervision of a Turkish deputy Principal while they take charge of departments or teach certain subjects. By taking on excessive work loads a small number of Brothers is just about able to keep the schools open, but it is obvious that 12 cannot do the work of 80, and locally recruited staff, despite their good will, cannot compare with Christian laymen such as, for example, you find in France.

Other forms of work have been tried in recent years such as that in the Popular Education Centres (a unique creation of Atatürk in the 30's but now closed following the troubles which almost led to civil war in 1980) and in the University of Istanbul (in the advanced school for language teachers). This work, though promising, has been suspended. Last year, for one term, a Brother, together with an Assumptionist Sister, was invited to give a course in French to a group of young teachers in the faculty of Islamic theology — an interesting experiment in a reputedly closed milieu if ever there was one!

These restrictions have discouraged those who are on the spot and dissuaded others from coming here. In 1980 Brother Superior General had to take a firm stand before 500 Brothers meeting at Beauvais to prevent the French Brothers from abandoning completely this sector. On the contrary, he encouraged them to reinforce the Brothers still in Turkey with these words, "It would be a disgrace to abandon a sector because conditions are difficult. That is precisely where we should be."

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

If, indeed, one is not discouraged by the lack of immediate and spectacular results and if one believes in sowing in order to reap then it is not difficult to see the importance of such work (that of the Brothers and other foreign religious who work in schools and hospitals and who witness by their faith and service of others to the goodness of Christ).

There is first of all the simple work of the school, valid here as elsewhere, in the development of intelligence, mind and heart, work of the first importance to the numerous young people of a poor country and the basis of its long term development. The work of former students, now in key positions in every sector of the nation's life, gives proof of this. None of them is to be found in the ranks of migrant workers in Europe. On the contrary, their initiative provides work for their fellow countrymen at home.

Then there is the daily silent mixing of Muslim, Jewish and Christian pupils, though the latter are becoming less and less numerous. The bonds of friendship thus created lead naturally to the disappearance of misconceptions and prejudices, source of so much conflict in the Middle East between those who believe in the same God, and prepare minds for a life in common where differences are accepted and respected.

Finally, this work has other moral and spiritual aspects. Our disinterested service causes the Muslims amongst whom we live and work to regard Christians in a more favourable light. In the eyes of most Muslims Christians are the western heirs to the Crusaders, dominating the world by their technology (a technology which Muslims must learn from them), infidels who have betrayed their own religious message and whose morals are degraded like those of the tourists seen naked on the beaches.

When they meet Christians who are genuinely willing to serve them and whose morals are above reproach their suspicions are allayed and give place to respect and sympathy leading to close collaboration in work and eventually to serious dialogue even in matters of religion. This is always on condition that we show a total respect for them as persons and for their faith. Any form of proselytism is quickly detected and instantly rejected. On the other hand, an attitude of genuine love which sees in each person the image God has put there, encourages that person to express himself freely and to speak of problems which worry him and which we, ourselves, could never introduce.

At the beginning and, perhaps, for a very long time, "we must not so much talk about Jesus as be Jesus present in the midst of them" according to the well-known formula based on the mystery of Christ's life in Nazareth: thirty years of prayer, silence and ordinary life to prepare for three years of public ministry. This is true, no doubt, of many kinds of evangelization but is absolutely necessary in a Muslim milieu. Thirteen centuries of stormy relations between Muslim and Christian and the multiple snares posed by inherited ideas and vocabulary such as "Trinity", "Son of God", "Prophet", "Transmission and alteration of the Scriptures"... have created a veritable mine-field. It is a wise precaution, before entering into serious dialogue, to be aware of our lack of vocabulary to express our concept of God.

It rarely happens, though it is becoming more frequent, outside our schools, that certain people pursue to the end their quest of Christ. Then the problem of helping such people arises. This is a very delicate matter because of the difference of mentality, the hostility of the milieu and the traditional reluctance of Christian communities to accept them. This is part of the unforseeable that cannot be written into a work contract and that requires great discretion. But we can all try when we know that, in any case, God has gone before us and invites us to follow in His footsteps.

"Follow me... you will see greater marvels yet" (John 1,50).

LEARNING FROM THOSE WE TEACH

03-E-08

PRAYER

It is you, Lord, who made me a human being. You did so that I might know and love you. Everything around us is meant to serve us and to bring us closer to one another and to you. But we are slow to understand your goodness and wisdom and slower still to do what you require of us. Yet in spite of our reluctance, our blindness and our rebellion you multiply your appeals, your gestures of pardon and encouragement... Praised be you Lord, for what you have done for us.

I believe, Lord, that it was you who asked me to change communities in 1970. I came to Beauvais where I was welcomed by nine Brothers who worked in an agricultural college. At the beginning it took me some time to grasp what was expected of me in the formation of students who had come here to follow a five year course in engineering. So, although I was a teacher in the school I had, myself, to learn like everyone else who changes occupation. I had to try to establish relations with the other teachers. I consulted books and tried to be attentive to the reactions of the students. You, Lord, kept me from being discouraged while I learned from others. Thanks, Lord, for the prayers and advice of those who helped me. Pardon my stubbornness and rash judgement of others.

There's another thing I want to recall, Lord. It was the suppression of compulsory religious instruction for the boys of the first cycle. The need I had to learn from others made me too sensitive to the negative criticism of religious instruction by a large number of students. It produced a crisis which we solved as best we could. The passage of time together with more experience has made me realise that we lack the human formation in depth and, perhaps, the intense spirituality needed to give a religious education rich and accessible to all- believers and unbelievers alike.

In the years that followed I was tempted to doubt my usefulness in that school. In fact the greater part of my time was not spent in making you known. Only a very small number of students came for religious instruction. Little by little and thanks to conversations, community meetings, reading etc,. I came to understand how my way of life could be the bearer of a message capable of awakening in young people the desire to seek you. In this way I realized that we could teach by example, by our mode of life, and that we would be imitated in our search for God. That is why, when we cannot speak explicitly of you because of the hostility of men or of our own deficiencies you ask us to be still more vigilant in cultivating attitudes which speak very clearly of you. Grant Lord, that we may be ever more prepared to let your light shine through us.

I want to thank you also, you who are always so anxious for our good, for having allowed one of my students to make me acquainted with an association in the town of Beauvais, a group of young and not so young people who collected scrap after working hours. I became a pupil of that student who introduced me to the Association of Youth for Mutual Aid and Development (AJED). That was in 1972.

The following year it was decided to devote part of the funds raised from the sale of the scrap to helping families in the region who received no aid from the social services, public or voluntary. I was asked to take charge of this work with the help of a full-time worker for the Association. In this way I came into contact with families in all kinds of difficulties: homelessness, unemployment, illness, death or desertion of a partner, alcoholism...

In company with other members of the Association I spent many an evening listening to men and women who tried to make us understand something of their situation as emarginated, as rejects from the affluent society.

About two years later Yvon and Marie-Thérèse, members of the Association, told me about an appeal for help made by the Parish Priest of the parish where the school is situated. They had been deeply touched by the priest's appeal for a family living not far from us in an "emergency" housing estate. That priest had taught Yvon and Marie-Thérèse. They contacted the family and gradually became aware that they needed to learn a lot before they could deal positively with the problems they encountered.

Within the AJED we formed a little study and action group for just that. About 1975 we thought we should get to know the area where the family lived. Studying reports of visits made to families in trouble, discussing them with social workers, and with advice from the Movement for Aid to All in Distress, founded by Fr. Joseph Wrésinsky for the "Fourth World", we prepared ourselves for over a year before venturing into the "transit" estate.

You know, Lord, that we hesitated for a long time before making a move. We had heard so much about the people in the estate: "They're a crowd of good for nothings". "They spend their time drinking and fighting" – "They live at public expense" etc...

Then one day, doubtless urged on by yourself, Lord, we went to a vacant lot in the estate. It was January, 1976 and snow had fallen. I was with Yvon and Marie-Thérèse and two Brothers from the school, Claude, a teacher and Jean-Marie, a student. We arrived there like the members of ATD when they organise what they call a cultural pivot or street library. We had two worn carpets which we put on the ground, some books, some games and puzzles, paper and pencils. In a short while children gathered around. Some read with us for a while, others played games or tried the puzzles while others drew. We continued each Saturday to the following June. The numbers of children increased and we gradually became accustomed to their aggressiveness which became intense towards the end of the session. They tore the books and stoned us as we left. On Saturday evenings we made a report on the day's work.

In the year that followed, under your guidance, Lord, we continued our efforts to learn from our contacts with the children and their parents. We were also helped by the experience of the members of the ATD movement. While learning from the children I think we were acting a little like you, Lord. We came closer to the poor children of the estate which we visited. It was because we were willing to learn from them that they began to do as we did and to learn from life what it is right to do and not do.

Later on, in collaboration with the Municipal Library, we organized a lending library for the children, giving each one a library ticket. Gradually the number of readers reached 110. In this way we got to know the families of the children better and a little later were happy to find adults asking to borrow books also. Was this not a kind of school? In the process we became aware that some of the adults could not read or did not understand what they read. Lord, should we not do something about that also?

With the help of the students of the agricultural college we organized workshops and excursions for the children on Wednesday afternoons. I have just found, Lord, what a student wrote in November, 1977:

"I ask myself what is the point of going to these slum areas to visit people of no importance in socalled 'transit' or 'emergency' townships around Beauvais which at most form only a tiny part of the 'Fourth World'. Still that is how a team of eight or nine students have passed their Wednesday afternoons since the All Saints holidays." It is difficult to know what urges them to give their time to children who have no other school but the street.

"My first impression was favourable thanks to the welcome of the children who were at once surprised to see us, curious, suspicious, outspoken but also amused. What struck me later was the aggressiveness of these children among themselves and towards us. They swear at each other and at us. They fight and try to appear tough... I believe this is due to the lack of affection in their lives. These children need to feel loved by someone and not to be treated as misfortunate rejects of society".

Reading between these lines written by a student called Etienne, one can guess that there is for him, and certainly for others, a call to learn from these poor children whom they have encountered:

"I believe this experience to be beneficial, not on the intellectual plane but because of the psychological effects it has on us. It lets us see a world totally different from the one in which we live. It shows the absurdity of two worlds which are unaware of each other's existence and yet live side by side. On the other hand it makes us realise that we are the privileged few, that we are the lucky ones, that we must change our way of life which rejects them because they do not belong to our milieu. Besides, it takes us out of our egoism and narrow-mindedness."

If these students have been able to stick to this work for one, two, or three years, in the case of some, it is perhaps, Lord, because you placed in their path people who had learned and had taught them something.

In 1977 we tried to make a methodical study of the population of the "transit" township which we visited each week. With the help of a lady Counsellor in social and family welfare we learned that the great majority were French citizens, that 38% were under 18 and that 55% of adults earned no wages.

We also carried out a study in the schools of the neighbouring residential area by contacting the Principals and the teachers. We found that of 137 children from the residential sector 122 were in normal classes and 15 in special classes, that is classes for those who were retarded, lacking motivation or disruptive. On the other hand, out of 58 children from the "transit" township 19 were in normal classes and 39 in special classes. Lastly, in one of the schools in the area we learned the following facts concerning children from the "transit" area:

— at the beginning of school, that is, in the preparatory department, 3 children out of 16 are retarded. None are above average;

— at the end of the preparatory stage 9 out of 10 are retarded by one, two or three years.

These figures strengthened our resolve to do something to remedy this injustice. Perhaps it was you, Lord, who inspired us to act, for you said, "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst after justice..."

In the months that followed, our plan of action took shape. It consisted in offering to the children who wanted it a period on one day of the week between 5 and 7 o'clock in the evening for revision of the work they had done that day or the previous days in school. We became aware, early on, that we could not limit ourselves to school work. Quite a lot of educational work could be done through games, conversation, mimes etc... As soon as we learned that we could use the time in a flexible manner and for a variety of activities we began to speak of A.D.S.-evening activities. We could find no more precise term. We did not want to speak of remedial classes or school work so as not to remind the children and their parents of scholastic failure. With about 50 children helped by 40 adults I think we are providing individual attention for children who are seldom listened to at home and who feel out of place in an ordinary school.

It seems to me that an adult is able to influence and educate a child to the extent that he or she is prepared to learn from the child as a human person. This is a necessary condition for the development of the full human potential of both the child and the adult.

In short, the discovery of our inability to help the young and not so young of the "transit" township compelled us to learn from others and to realise that this basic attitude is an important factor in our approach to the task of educating children.

In 1980, on the initiative of a student who had kept in contact with a group of young people in the township, an association was formed and registered. In 1981 Philippe arrived in the Community. While completing the second year of his novitiate he gradually came into contact with the 120 families of the township. You permitted him, Lord, to understand better through these contacts the nature of the call you addressed to him and to others. Like others before him he learned from the people he met. Because of his presence and help the management of the "Maison du Quartier" (Neighbourhood Centre), recently built by the Municipality, was confided to our association.

In this building, which is meant to be a place of welcome and sharing, the parents meet on Thursdays for social, cultural and domestic sessions. On Mondays and Tuesdays children with reading problems come for help. A workshop for adolescents is in operation on Wednesday afternoons and on Friday evenings a group of young people hold their meetings there. There is still plenty to be learned. I am thinking particularly of those who recently broke into the building during the night and damaged it.

Through joy and suffering Lord, you cease not to offer your light and your strength that we may continue to combat injustice, bring others to you and be a symbol of the Church which brings together your children who are scattered, excluded, sick and in misery.

Lord, grant that we may learn from others so that we may be always your disciples and bearers of your Good News to the world.

PRESENTATION

Lasalliana No. 4 marks the beginning of the second year of publication. The editorial team wishes to thank you for the interest and confidence you have shown by renewing your subscriptions. We hope that the second year's numbers will give you equal satisfaction.

At the start of this new series it seems appropriate to recall the purpose of Lasalliana as it was first presented. These leaflets are addressed to a mixed readership of Brothers and lay people, to all those who wish to get to know better and to live the charism of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

The essential aim is, therefore educative and apostolic. Each leaflet can become an instrument for reflection and work. This is why we prefer texts which are short and easy to read. Because of this contributors are compelled to choose subjects and sometimes to condense them in order to suit the format of the leaflets unless they prefer to write a series of articles on the same theme. We are well aware that this is often demanding and frustrating for them. Occasionally we have to take the difficult and delicate decision to cut texts which are too long.

Our contributors do not pretend to be specialists but their articles are always interesting, enriching and stimulating. Obviously we do not expect that all the articles will interest all our readers equally. That depends on many factors. But we hope that out of the twenty articles in each edition some will attract the interest and attention of most readers.

These articles are not written solely with the individual reader in view. They are essentially instruments of work, the contents of which can be:

— thoroughly studied for a better understanding — discussed and developed in certain of their aspects — enriched by personal experience and additional research — studied in the light of local conditions
— put into practice in actual situations.

This underlines the fact that the leaflets are addressed more to groups than to individuals and that they can be read and studied in common as, for example, in study circles, at teachers' meetings, District sessions and retreats, community meetings, at meetings of parents, former pupils, Lasallian associations and in houses of formation, etc.

We think that it is by work in common that certain difficulties in understanding, especially for readers not well acquainted with Lasallian origins, tradition and aims, can be overcome.

With best wishes to our contributors and readers for a happy and successful year,

Brother Léon LAURAIRE

FIRST TAKING OF THE HABIT: RHEIMS (Winter of 1684-85)

"This habit has been worn for the past five years in five different towns in the dioceses of Rheims and Laon".

These lines are taken from a memoir written by M. de La Salle during the winter of 1689-1690. It is the text which for some years past we call the "Memoir on the Habit". Written entirely by the Founder himself, it is possible to date it from the following lines:

"For almost two years now the Brothers of the Christian Schools working in Paris have worn this habit and nobody during this time has made any complaint except Monsieur le Curé de Saint-Sulpice who has recently objected in rather strong terms".

So, the habit that the Brothers wear in Paris is no longer to the taste of the parish priest who employs them in the schools of his parish, the famous parish of Saint-Sulpice.

Several other passages in the memoir show clearly that the parish priest wanted the Brothers to dress as priests. At the very least he wanted them to wear the long clerical cloak. That is what M. de La Salle believed he could not accept.

He, therefore, wrote this memoir to justify his decision in the eyes of his ecclesiastical Superiors. In his opinion it was not a question of some detail of clothing, of adopting one kind of cloak rather than another. What was at stake for the Founder was the very identity of his Community which was misunderstood and, perhaps, threatened.

To read his plea — it really was a case for the defence — gives us some very interesting information concerning the early years of the "Community" and especially the circumstances and motives which led the "Community" to adopt a distinctive habit.

In the early days, the schoolmasters gathered around M. de La Salle, wore a waisted coat like other laymen and were distinguished from them only by the white rabat. In winter time they were unprotected from the cold, whether in their houses, their unheated schools or in the streets. To protect themselves from the cold the schoolmasters adopted the cloak which was then common in the Champagne region.

"What serves as a mantle", the memoir continues, "is a cloak without collar or buttons on the front, fastened at the top by a large hook on the inside... Such cloaks were then in use and were considered very suitable, useful and comfortable for the schoolmasters, especially those who had to teach outside the house or in parts of the city at some distance from the house in order to convenience the children. The schoolmasters use this cloak as a mantle in the streets and as a house coat in winter in the classrooms and in the house".

If we can believe Canon Blain, the advice to adopt this cloak was given to the Founder by the Mayor of the city of Rheims. What is beyond doubt is that the choice made by M. de La Salle and the schoolmasters was dictated by practical considerations.

With cloak and coat the outward appearance remained that of a "secular". However, for the past two years the Community of schoolmasters had gradually distanced itself from the "world". In the Rue Neuve they really lived the "life of religious". This led the masters to exchange the coat for a kind of "short soutane".

"The habit of this community is a kind of soutane which comes down to mid-calf. It is without buttons and fastened on the inside with hooks from the top to mid-way down the front. From there down it is sewn. The sleeves come down to the wrists and are fastened with hooks which do not show".

It is perhaps astonishing to see the insistence with which the Founder dwells on certain details: "without buttons", "A large hook on the inside", "hooks which do not show". Such insistence is, however, significant. Ecclesiastical as well as civilian fashion required a lot of buttons down the front of soutanes and coats, on the sleeves and on the facings. The buttons had to be of quality and were often ostentatiously luxurious: precious metals, mother of pearl or, at least, silk. External hooks could also serve as a pretext for sophisticated ornamentation.

On the other hand, monks, mendicant friars and other regulars insisted on the fact that their habits were fastened by cords or other means and without ornaments. If he could not present the dress of the Brothers as a "regular habit" — today we would say a religious habit — M. de La Salle insisted on letting the ecclesiastical authorities of Paris understand that the Brothers lived as religious and considered that they should dress in a manner befitting their state as "persons withdrawn from the world".

That first taking of the habit in the winter of 1684-85 was meant, precisely, to witness to this fact. Before their pupils, before the parishoners of Rheims, Rethel and elsewhere the Brothers, wearing this habit, "professed" their membership of a Community which was not to be confused with any other. Neither ecclesiastic, secular nor regular — in the sense in which the Church understood these terms — the disciples of M. de La Salle insisted on their identity as Brothers of the Christian Schools.

"Since (the adoption of) this habit", states the memoir, "a person has no other idea when he asks for admission but to join a Community and remain there for the rest of his life. He does not know what it is to ask for wages and considers himself happy to be accepted. It is the habit alone which produces these effects".

The "Memoir on the Habit" is preserved in the Archives of the Generalate of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. For over a century several biographers or historians of the Institute have reproduced longer or shorter extracts from it. The complete text, in modern spelling, can be found in "Cahiers Lasalliens" 11, pages 349 to 354.

THE KNOWN MANUSCRIPTS OF SAINT J.B. DE LA SALLE (2)

(B) THE OTHER DOCUMENTS WRITTEN THROUGHOUT AND SIGNED BY M. DE LA SALLE

Of the 12 manuscripts, other than the Letters (surveyed in LASALLIANA 3), written throughout and signed by our Founder, 7 are in AMG, 3 are in the municipal archives of Rheims, 1 is in private ownership also in Rheims, and 1 is in the archives of the Département Seine-Maritime in Rouen.

THE FORMULA OF VOWS, 1694

The first, in chronological order, of the AMG collection is the Formula of Vows, personally composed by M. de La Salle for the ceremony of the first perpetual vows in the history of the Institute (leaving aside the secret "heroic" vow of 1691), the ceremony which took place at Vaugirard on Trinity Sunday, 6 June 1694. The formula, contained on one side of a sheet of paper 14x17 cm, would seem to have been written out by the Founder to serve as a model for transcription by the copyist for the occasion, Brother Michel-Barthélemy Jacquinot. The latter made thirteen separate copies of it, leaving blank spaces for the individual names, closing lines and signatures to be added personally by the Founder and by the twelve Brothers chosen by him to pronounce with him these first perpetual vows of association, stability and obedience. The "model" formula ("one of the most precious relics left by Saint John Baptist de La Salle") (CL2) is preserved between glass in a frame similar to those in which the letters are kept. The historical context of the formula has been fully explored by Br. Maurice Hermans in CL2, and the same authority has demonstrated its place in the young Society's progress towards canonical status, in CL11. An illuminating discussion of it as a "parole-force" in the Founder's faith-journey can be found in CL45, a work of Br. Miguel Campos. A curiosity of the manuscript, as such, is that it does not contain the addition "Roman Priest" after the signature, despite a statement of Canon Blain to that effect (CL7).

THREE "OBEDIENCES"

Next in order of time are three "obediences" addressed to Brother Joseph, Jean Le Roux, already mentioned as a recipient of two of the extant letters. By these three documents the founder appointed Br. Joseph, first in 1708, then in 1709, and again in 1711, to visit certain named communities, of which the Directors were instructed (in the first of the documents) to "receive the aforementioned Brother in the aforementioned capacity (of "Visitor") and to make known to him all that takes place in their house". The significance of these three brief, formally-worded mandates in the administrative evolution of the Society has been shown, again by Br. Maurice Hermans, in CL11.

THREE ACTS OF CESSION

The remaining three AMG manuscripts in this category reveal the Founder, with a consciousness that he had not long to live, disposing of property held in his name, in favour of his successor, Br. Barthélemy (and, therefore, in favour of the Institute). On 11 August 1718 — less, that is, than nine months before his death — he wrote out and signed, in duplicate, a formal cession (to "Joseph Truffet, called Brother Barthélemy, charged with the general conduct of the schoolmasters known as the Brothers of the Christian Schools") of his library which, according to Blain (CL8), he had transferred from Paris to Saint-Yon, Rouen, which had been his residence since December 1715. The fact that this library was (in Blain's words) "quite well stocked with books" recalls the assurance of the earliest biographer, Br. Bernard Dauge, that the Saint used the annual income of 200 livres which, in obedience to his confessor, he had withheld from the distribution of his fortune to the poor, for his journeys, for the upkeep of the chapel, and for "furnishing his library with books for his own use and that of the community" (CL4).

Three months later, on 14 November 1718, he drew up a formal bequest to Barthélemy of "all the furnishings of the house of Saint-Yon". This and the previous duplicate document have been published in full by Br. Leon de Marie Aroz in CL26. All three manuscripts were to receive specific mention with their dates, confirming their validity, in the Testament of the Founder, dated 3 April 1719, which is also reproduced in extenso by Br. Aroz in CL26 (but only according to an ancient copy, since the original is unhappily lost).

THREE DOCUMENTS RELATING TO M. DE LA SALLE's ROLE AS EXECUTOR OF NICOLAS ROLAND's WILL

Three manuscripts preserved in the municipal archives of Rheims were written throughout and signed by M. de La Salle in fulfilment of his responsibility as co-executor of the will of his friend and spiritual director, Canon Nicolas Roland. They relate specifically to that part of the will which entrusted him (and a joint-executor, Nicolas Rogier) with the task of "securing, in its own situation and place, the establishment of the house and community of the Daughters of the Holy Child Jesus, together with the means needed to bring this about... not ceasing until the purpose is fully achieved." In a Cahier Lasallien (No. 38), devoted entirely to the life and foundation of Nicolas Roland, Br. Leon de Marie Aroz has shown, with abundant documentation, how seriously, and with what efficiency, John Baptist applied himself to the task thus imposed upon him by Roland's will. Three of the nineteen documents adduced by Br. Aroz in this monograph are the manuscripts we are considering. All three are reproduced in fac-simile and in transcription, with detailed annotation by the learned commentator.

Particularly impressive among these three manuscripts is one headed: "Statement of all the goods, houses, properties and investments yielding revenue, belonging to the Community of the Holy Child Jesus..." It consists of ten pages of the Saint's small, compressed script, itemising in meticulous detail the property and goods held by the Sisters at the time of Roland's death. The provision of such an inventory was a necessary step in the process of obtaining the letters patent which would give Roland's foundation legal recognition. Interestingly, not only is the document written throughout by M. de La Salle, but his signature alone appears at the end of it and not that also of the joint-executor, Rogier, who was a year below the legal age of majority (then 25) and who seems to have left all the initiatives to John Baptist — himself only 28 at this time.

The second of these three documents is a form of contract renting a property of the Holy Child Sisters situated at Beine to a local farmer. It fills a single page and is written throughout by M. de La Salle but in the name of the lessee (it begins: "I, the undersigned Archambault Pierre, farmer...") whose barely decipherable signature is appended alongside the Saint's customary "De La Salle".

The third manuscript is a brief statement of twelve lines, dated 18 February 1682, in which the Founder undertakes to indemnify personally the Sisters for any financial loss they might incur from a contract entered into, on his advice, three years earlier. It is a curious piece about which it would be interesting to know the underlying story.

TWO MORE LEGAL STATEMENTS

The document in private ownership (that of the Rheims lawyer, M. Thiénot, mentioned in another connection, in our previous article) is a private deed, dated 21 October 1699, whereby John Baptist authorised his younger brother Pierre, then a Counsellor at the Presidial Court of Rheims, to bring to a conclusion "in whatever manner he deemed suitable" a matter of a debt long owed to the Saint. It was a gesture of confidence in Pierre, whose distinguished career and noble character are portrayed by Br. Aroz in CL39, where the document here referred to may be found reproduced in fac-simile.

Finally, in this category, there is a formal attestation by the Founder, dated 11 December 1717, to the effect that certain investments in the city of Rouen belonged in reality to the Brothers of the Christian Schools and not to himself, even though the four contracts concerned had been made out in his name. The small document, some 120 words in all, has a significant place in the early history of the Institute. A month after its writing, the property of Saint-Yon, until then only rented by the Brothers, became available for sale. The price asked was 15,000 livres, and the sum of 6,000 livres realised by the Community on the strength of this attestation of M. de La Salle made a substantial contribution to this sum. Saint-Yon was to remain the Mother House of the Institute until 1771. The text of the document, of which the original manuscript is in the keeping of the Seine-Maritime Archives in Rouen, is reproduced with annotations by Br. Aroz in CL26. (To be continued)

THE CLIENTELE OF THE LASALLIAN SCHOOLS AT THEIR BEGINNINGS (2)

THE SECOND CATEGORY OF PUPILS IN DE LA SALLE'S SCHOOLS

Children from the more prosperous social classes

★ To begin with it was only the poor, the sons of uneducated people, of the ill-clad, who filled the gratuitous classes of the Brothers. It was primarily for them that the Lasallian community had been established (Cf. Med. for Christmas).

★ To begin with, their lice, bad smell, their rough manners, vulgar language, kept the children of the so called "decent" families away.

★ La Salle changed this situation with their training in good manners, in politeness. All were attracted to the classrooms, lice disappeared, repulsion gave way to a kind of astonishment and then to curiosity.

DISAPPEARANCE OF SOCIAL SEGREGATION

★ The better off families (craftsmen, small business people) began to prefer the Lasallian schools to those of the Writing Masters and the Teachers of the Little Schools. They there found an efficient training to:

— self control and obedience to parents;

— render service and to assume responsibility (participation of pupils in classroom offices, visits to the sick and to be absentees);

— a speedy and conscientious apprenticeship to reading, writing, arithmetic, the duties of a Christian towards God, towards oneself, towards others...

★ The results were a series of court cases, acts of vandalism by the Masters of the Little Schools and the Writing Masters who wanted to keep in their paying schools all the children who could afford it.

★ Court inquiries did indeed show that there were pupils with the Brothers whose parents were well able to pay fees: two doctors, a master wheel-wright, a master locksmith, a wine merchant, a grocer, a goldsmith, restaurateurs.

★ La Salle, however, never gives way and will never give way when it is question of the gratuity of the schools and a gratuity which refuses to close its doors to those who are in a position to pay. His schools remain open to all... even the rich because he refuses to humiliate the parents who are poor by asking them to furnish proof of their poverty, because he sees that the poor need to mix with those who are less poor while still at school to enable them to acquire a more cultured vocabulary and more elegant manners than those in the milieu from which they come. He therefore leaves the control of resources to the parish priests, when he cannot avoid the pressures of laws with which he does not agree.

★ This pressure by professional groups hostile to the free access to gratuitous teaching of rich and poor of whatever social class for fear of competition and a comparison of their results was to pursue the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian schools during the whole of the 18th century and to be continued in the 19th to arrive at its zenith in 1886 when they were forbidden to run communal state schools and in 1904 when they were forbidden to run any school in France. It is still this pressure by certain unions which leads the French government to refuse financial assistance for the poor which they need if they are to choose for their children a Christian school rather than a non-paying secular school.

CREATION OF COURSES FOR ADULTS

★ The general rule at the time of St. John Baptist de La Salle and his successors in the 18th and 19th centuries was for the children of the lower classes to learn in a short while at school the indispensable elements required to enter an apprenticeship.

It quickly became evident that further study was needed if one wishes to advance in his profession: bookkeeping, technical drawing, arithmetic, the elements of science, intelligent spelling.

Hence adult courses were inaugurated from the very beginning during the workers' leisure hours and sometimes on a Sunday, always with plenty of time available for the Christian training of adults whose short period at school had prevented them from acquiring it, and always in such a way that those who wished could express their Christian faith in prayer.

★ Courses for adults have never been completely abandoned by the Institute.

CREATION OF SCHOOLS FOR YOUNG DELINQUENTS

★ The science of amendment is given in the "Conduite des Ecoles" and in the counsels to a new teacher. Brother Othmar Wurth's study is an admirable testimony.

★ The boarding school of St. Yon was a detention centre, in other words a psychological centre for the correction of young delinquents. La Salle agreed to it because it was destined for the morally most disadvantaged.

★ Later on similar establishments were accepted by the Institute in different parts of the world. The young people are received in them after a court order. In order to follow in St. J.B. de La Salle's footsteps, the Brothers must be able to organize the regulations, create a brotherly atmosphere between the Brothers and the prisoners, let them share in the responsibilities as one can begin to trust them more, bring them gradually into contact with other people and follow them up when they have left the establishment.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE ST. YON BOARDING SCHOOL FOR FAMILIES OF MEANS

★ The success of the schools for the working classes led the well off families who lived at a distance from the town to ask St. J.B. de La Salle to open a boarding school for their children. The saint agreed pointing out that it seemed that God allowed such a request to furnish the financial solution for meeting the urgent need of a Training Centre for the Brothers. There were thus two conditions required if such a boarding school was to come within the normal activities of the Institute:

— there must be only a small number to prevent too many Brothers from being assigned to them to the detriment of the schools for the working classes;

— the school itself must be gratuitous, with only the boarding being paid for.

★ It is obvious that the studies could and should be more extensive in such a boarding school since the children remained there longer and the professions for which they were destined exacted a greater degree of knowledge and culture.

★ The different general chapters have continually ratified this outlook and it was only in 1904, as far as France is concerned... that the legal suppression entailed the closing or abandoning of the small schools which were not so well supported by the "power of money", while the bigger boarding schools continued by virtue of those same powers which were capable of maintaining them in spite of the laws which ended up by disinheriting only the poor.

THE DUTIES OF A CHRISTIAN (3): DE LA SALLE HIMSELF

A writer in the seventeenth century had a very different concept of literary proprietorship from that which forms the basis of modern laws of copyright. It was quite common to find paragraphs, pages and even whole chapters taken from other authors without the slightest acknowledgement. De La Salle was no exception. As one of his commentators writes, "He took spiritual nourishment from wherever he found it". Nevertheless, thanks to his wide knowledge of theology and catechetics, he was able to use his sources with such skill that it is difficult to tell what is his own from what he took from them.

THE FAITH

Most catechisms of the Founder's time, faithful to Bellarmine, stress the objective aspect of faith rather than personal adherence to the message and its Author. De La Salle, without neglecting the "fides quae creditur" stresses the "fides qua creditur".

In his Meditations we frequently find the concept of faith as a personal commitment. In "The Duties of A Christian" he gives us this beautiful definition: "Divine faith is a virtue which leads us to believe, with submission of mind and heart, what God has revealed and with steadfastness all that the Church proposes to our belief". Who could fail to see in the expression "submission of mind and heart" the binomial subjective-objective: the faith which enlightens us and the faith to which we adhere? We also find in his definition God who speaks and the Church which guarantees the message.

In "The Duties of A Christian" Part II, the definition of faith leaves no room for doubt as to its dynamism and is far removed from the objectivist definitions of most catechisms of the period. Here it is: "It is to believe that God is good, that He is our last end and to put all our confidence in him". Adherence to a person; confidence in a person, without restriction, absolutely. In another part of the "Duties" he stresses the vital commitment that the faith demands from believers. "It would be useless for Christians to have the faith and to believe in the eternal truths that Jesus came to announce and that the Church proposes to their belief if their faith were not animated by charity and accompanied by good works".

THE LAW THAT SAVES

I point out elsewhere that in "De Praeceptis" de La Salle follows Joly closely. The reader may well ask in what then the Founder's originality consists. It is in the foundations on which he bases the precepts of Sinai. Here as in Chapter XVI of the Rule he draws from Saint Augustine and more so from Christ Himself. In thirteen pages redolent of the Gospel he affirms with the Apostle that Love is the fulfilment of the Law. In the introduction to "The Duties of A Christian" we find a resumé of the links between charity and the commandments. "We are in this world only to love God and we have religion only to the extent that we love Him. We cannot please God without loving Him and this love of God is so necessary that it is He alone who can help us to keep his commandments in a Christian manner and who can give and preserve the life of our soul, for it can live only in so far as it possesses grace and charity. This is what led St. John to assure us that he who does not love God remains in death, that is to say, that he is before God as one who is already dead".

SIN

Many catechisms, contemporaneous with "The Duties of A Christian", confine themselves to pointing out the relation "Sin - Commandments" because "God gave us these in order to avoid those". De La Salle, on the other hand, introduces personal relationship into the concept of sin.

Evil, the enormity and ingratitude of sin, can only be understood in the contemplation of Christ on the Cross. In the prelude to the story of the Passion in "The Duties" we read these words, "The principal reason for the coming of Christ into this world having been to suffer and die for the sins of mankind" and at the moment when the curtain comes down on the drama of Calvary, "That is what Jesus Christ suffered for love of us. He could have avoided all that suffering and that shameful death. One drop of his blood would have sufficed but He offered himself voluntarily to make us understand the enormity of sin and to show the excess of his love for us..."

De La Salle considers sin not only as a legal transgression or as an evil inflicted by the sinner on himself, but as a NO addressed to the God of love, as a gesture of contempt for the sufferings and merits of Jesus Christ. In a word, a refusal of the call of God to supernatural communion. That is the concept of sin, and not any other, that Divine Revelation has transmitted to us.

THE SACRAMENTS

The fact that the treatise "De Sacramentis" takes up almost the whole of the first half of "The Duties of A Christian" — two hundred pages to be precise — justifies the opinion that the work is more theological and dynamic than moralising.

The catechisms of the eighteenth century, following Bellarmine, accustomed us to considering the Sacraments more as means of fulfilling our duties than as sources of grace and holiness. De La Salle, on the contrary, puts the emphasis on the sanctifying grace that they produce. The pre-eminence given to grace is evident in the long prologue by which he introduces the Sacraments and in which he shows how grace depends, essentially, on them.

JESUS CHRIST AND THE SACRAMENTS

In dealing with the relationship between the sacraments and Jesus Christ many of the catechisms mentioned did so in a rather superficial manner, confining themselves to the institution of the sacraments without entering into the essential bonds and the actual dependence of the signs of salvation on the One Mediator. "The Duties of A Christian" shows in sober language and with theological precision the triple relationship that the sacraments have with the person of Christ. "It is Jesus Christ who is the author of all the sacraments of the New Law, having come on earth to sanctify men and having won for them many graces and merits by his death. He found means of applying his graces and merits to them through the sacraments He instituted for this purpose. It is He, also, who produces them in time and who is their first cause. The men who administer them are, as it were, only the instruments though they are the dispensers of the mysteries, for as St. John says, it is He (Christ) who baptizes."

THE SACRAMENTS IN THE CHURCH

The theologian from Rheims does not forget and wants his readers to know that the sacraments are given in the Church, "dispensatrix of all the merits and satisfaction of Jesus Christ." It is she who, in accord with Holy Scripture, decides in matters concerning the sacraments... establishes or changes, when she judges it necessary for the faithful, this or that ceremony.

Not only are the sacraments given in the Church but they are given for the Church, "for they are very necessary for the good of the Church because of the effects which they produce..."

THE SACRAMENTS AND CHRISTIAN LIFE

By means of the sacraments the life of Christ is communicated to and developed in the souls of the baptized. "It is by Baptism that we are engendered in Jesus Christ. By Confirmation we receive strength and an increase of grace. It is by the Eucharist, as by spiritual food, that our souls are nourished. Penance heals our souls, wounded by sin; Extreme Unction takes away the remains of sin and gives us a special strength... Holy Orders gives power to the ministers of the Church to govern it. Marriage is for the procreation of children and for bringing them up in the love and service of God."

CEREMONIES OF THE SACRAMENTS

The detailed explanation of the liturgical ceremonies — those most holy ceremonies, most worthy of respect and capable of inspiring devotion... and of instructing the faithful — together with the attention given to the sacraments in the life of the Christian, places "The Duties of A Christian" in a class above most of the French school catechisms of the seventeenth century and clearly shows its originality.

Though the ceremonies, of themselves, add nothing to the essentials of the sacraments "it would be a great sin to omit them without necessity because they were handed on to us by tradition". This is the reason why the Church so frequently urges pastors "to explain them to the Christian people" in the knowledge that understanding of the ceremonies contributes much to the reception of the sacrament. Such instruction will obviate a magical concept of the rubrics since "these graces are only given in view of their faith and devotion and not in virtue of the ceremonies", though he does admit that some ceremonies produce grace in virtue of the prayers of the Church.

The insistence of de La Salle on the spiritual meaning of the ceremonies in the life of the Christian is remarkable. For example, the ceremony of putting salt in the mouth of the person to be baptized "is to mark that, freed from all corruption, he receives Divine Wisdom which gives him a taste for spiritual things and for the practices of a Christian life".

PRAYER

The ninety pages consecrated to the second means of obtaining the graces necessary for salvation speak eloquently of the role he assigned to it. The definition he gives of prayer is of the best catechetical vintage: "Prayer is an application of the mind and an elevation of the heart to God to worship Him and to ask for all the things we need for our salvation." He employs, once again, the terms mind and heart. Before asking we must adore, thank and offer ourselves...

In four closely reasoned pages he analyses and comments on each element of the definition, bringing out his precise concept of the theme on the theological and catechetical planes.

The writings of the Fathers of the Church are the most abundant source of the treatise "De Oratione". Chrysostom, Augustine, Ambrose... lend their spiritual authority to the filial relations and dependence of man in relation to God the Father. It is these same authorities whose works illuminate the Meditations of the saint.

It is on purpose that I omit two themes in which the originality and theological depth of de La Salle surpass in breadth and quality the treatises of the period, including the sources from which he drew his inspiration: they are Jesus Christ and the Church. The limits imposed by this article preclude consideration of such doctrinal richness. Perhaps we shall deal with them on another occasion. What I have shown proves sufficiently that de La Salle deserved the title of Doctor of Theology, conferred on him by the University of Rheims, and that he did honour to that institution.

THE DUTIES OF A CHRISTIAN AND PRESENT DAY CATECHESIS (4)

Like the prophets, every founder of a religious family is called by God, with a charism for the men of his time and for future generations. Because of this twofold mission, his message in the Church contains transitory components and others which transcend time and space. A quick glance at St. John Baptist de La Salle will confirm this statement.

After three centuries, the Brothers, his sons, continue to obey his command: "Go and teach". His writings had the validity and the vigour of a "norm" for his contemporaries and yet his message still today inspires texts which respond strictly to the "signs of the times". Proof of this can be found in chapters I, II and III of the Rules in which he describes one after the other, the identity and the need of the Institute and the threefold spirit which should animate its members: the spirit of faith, of zeal, of community (God - the pupils - the Brothers). It is also seen in the personalist and personalizing pedagogy of the Conduite. The dignity and individuality of the person, enhanced in the light of the Gospel in the Règles de la Bienséance, proclaim it as also do the DEVOIRS I, the key and the paradigm of the "generation" of De La Salle's catechisms. Is this book of any interest to catechists according to Vatican II? I will try to give a summary of its aspects which are still suited to our times and which express the theological thought behind it.

THE SOURCES

De La Salle quotes at length from the doctrine of Holy Scripture and the traditions of the Church. The number of quotations speak for themselves: Genesis 38 times, Exodus 11, Deuteronomy 13, Ruth 1, I Samuel 4, II Chronicles 1, Tobit 6, Judith 1, I Maccabees 1, Job 1, Psalms 25, Proverbs 1, Wisdom 2, Ecclesiastes 6, Isaiah 1, Jeremiah 2, Daniel 3, Joel 1, Habacuc 1, Matthew 140, Mark 16, Luke 60, John 58, Acts 24, Romans 15, I Corinthians 17, II Corinthians 4, Galatians 3, Ephesians 10, Philippians 1, Colossians 2, I Thessalonians 2, I Timothy 8, II Timothy 1, Titus 1, Hebrews 9, James 11, I Peter 2, I John 7, Apocalypse 4. (I do not think this is exhaustive).

The Holy Fathers. St. Augustin 48 times, St. J. Chrysostom 33, St. Ambrose 14, Tertullian 14, St. Cyprian 8, St. Thomas 8, St. Gregory 6, St. Jerome 4, St. Bernard 3, St. Cyril 3, St. Basil 2, St. R. Bellarmine 2, and once: St Denis, St. Ephrem, St. Evariste, St. Isidore, St. Leo, St. Nicholas, Pope St. Pius V, and Theodoret.

JESUS CHRIST

In the "Devoirs", one finds JESUS Christ as the central figure and, as a living breath, the HOLY SPIRIT, who is the Spirit of Jesus Christ. I will limit myself to quoting the titles of as many chapters on the person of Jesus Christ as one could find in the "Devoirs": Jesus Christ Redeemer, Jesus Christ Saviour, Jesus Christ Mediator, Jesus Christ Priest, Jesus Christ Head of the Mystic Body, JESUS CHRIST IN THE GOSPEL: the Master, Jesus Christ of the poor, the Way, the Truth and the Life, Jesus Christ Model of the Christian, etc.

The life of Jesus Christ as presented in the "Devoirs" gives an admirable summary of the four Evangelists... We could sum up the leitmotif of the "Devoirs" in the following words: "The faithful are the members of Jesus Christ and, to be considered as such, they must be united to him through charity".

THE CHURCH (Body of Christ)

The chapters on the Church in the "Devoirs" are, I think, the Saint's richest and most original. While most of the catechisms of that time stressed the "juridical" aspect of the Church, the "Devoirs" declare: "There has always been a Church even before Jesus Christ". It differed from the present Church in that it "was not composed of a visible society of faithful, as... now"; but the essential constituent elements are the same in both cases: faith and the anticipated merits of Jesus Christ by which God saved the believers of that time "united to God by the faith and the charity which animated them".

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Here is the definition he gives of the Church: "It is the society of all the faithful whether living or dead, who are all united in Jesus Christ". Can anything better be said and in fewer words?

THE LAW OF LOVE

The treatise "De Praeceptis" is De La Salle's least original work, but it is redeemed by the moralism of its source (Claude Joly) in the THIRTY introductory pages to the Decalogue. In it, with the Gospel in hand, he leaves no doubt that, for him, the first and principal rule is the Gospel, that is to say "the law of love": love of God above all things, and the love of one's neighbour for God's sake.

SIN

De La Salle transcends the relationship between sin and the commandments. He introduces the personal aspect of sin into his Catechism: "The principal reason for Jesus Christ coming into this world being to suffer and die for the sins of all men...". "This is what Jesus Christ suffered for love of us..." but he offered himself willingly to make us realize better the enormity of sin, to show his excessive love for us.

De La Salle, therefore, does not see sin as a simple transgression of the Law of God, but as a NO which the sinner opposes to the love of God, as contempt for the sufferings of Jesus Christ.

THE SACRAMENTS

The catechisms of the Saint's times look on the sacraments as a means of performing one's duties rather than as a source of grace. For the Saint of Rheims, on the other hand, the sacraments are SOURCES OF SANCTIFYING GRACE, means of uniting us intimately with Jesus Christ.

a) Jesus Christ and the Sacraments

"Jesus Christ is the author of all the Sacraments"... "It is he who produced them in time...", and again: "It is He who baptizes".

b) The Church and the Sacraments

"The Church is the dispenser of all the merits and satisfaction of Jesus Christ"... Not only are the Sacraments given in the Church: "She establishes or modifies such and such a ceremony when she judges it to be necessary for the good of the faithful...", but they are also given for the Church: "They are very necessary for the good of the Church because of the different effects they produce...".

c) Sacraments and Christian life

Through the Sacraments, Christ's life is propagated in the Christian. De La Salle knew it and wanted those he catechized to know it; for this purpose he quotes a long passage from the Catechism of Trent: "It is by Baptism that we are begotten in Jesus Christ; by Confirmation we receive strength and an increase in grace...".

Space is too limited to make even a short reference to the originality and riches of the Sacramental Ceremonies in the "Devoirs".

PRAYER

Catechism must end in prayer: put those catechized in relation with the Father. It is for this reason that the "Devoirs" ends with a treatise "De Oratione". EIGHTY pages of the highest evangelical quality form the apex of De La Salle's catechetical edifice. We will close with the precious definition which he gives of prayer: "Prayer is an application of our mind and an elevation of our heart to God, to render Him our respect and to ask him for all the things we need for our salvation". Before asking: adore, thank... render honour. Always the same binomial: spirit-heart: thanks-love.

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (4)
"A rigorous learning process"

In leaflet 03-A-19 I described the teaching given in the first schools of the Brothers and how the five subjects were introduced, one after the other, beginning with reading which formed the initial stage of the child's education.

A careful study of the "Management" shows the methods used and the characteristics of the training given. The following are among the most important:

STAGES IN LEARNING

It seems to me that we can easily distinguish the principal stages in the process by which the child mastered the elements of the programme.

★ A "Model" is put before the child: You find this in the different subjects taught: pronunciation and articulation in reading, headlines written by the teacher on the pupil's copybook for writing, and the copying of passages to teach spelling... You will notice, in reading the "Management" that the importance given to the concept of "model" in the school was similar to that given to the concept of good example.

★ Imitation of the model by the child. When necessary, the model was repeatedly placed before the pupil if he failed to grasp the meaning or to get the spelling or pronunciation right. For this the teacher called on the assistance of other pupils and only intervened himself when none of them could give the correct answer.

★ Assimilation of the model, through a series of exercises and constant repetition until the matter was thoroughly learned. There is repeated insistence in the "Management" on the perfection required in this learning process and on the perseverance necessary to succeed.

If the difficulty was too great for some pupils the teacher had to break down the matter into the simplest elements and repeat them as often as necessary until the pupil had mastered the whole subject bit by bit.

★ Formation of habits and reflexes, until the action of reading, writing or calculating became automatic. Today we would call it acquiring "know-how". But the acquisition of these habits was always accompanied by careful explanations so that the child understood what was asked of him and what he was required to do. In other words he learned intelligently.

★ Finally the learning process ended with an evaluation, of what had been acquired. This we shall deal with in the next leaflet.

NATURE OF THE LEARNING PROCESS

As shown in the five stages described above, we find here a form of deductive learning. It was current in 17th and 18th centuries and accorded with the ideas then prevalent of the relation between teacher and pupil and the concept of authority.

In school the pupil found himself in a situation comparable to that of an apprentice who, as in the case of all trades, bound himself to a Compagnon or Master in order to learn the trade through contact with him. This is why de La Salle insisted so frequently on the need for the teacher to master thoroughly what he was to teach to the pupils so as to be able to set them an example in everything.

This concept of teacher-pupil relations as an apprenticeship is a very ancient one which goes back to Aristotle and which can be reduced to its three principal elements: Repeated actions form habits and habits help us to practice virtue.

If we come to a period closer to the beginnings of the Brothers' schools we can find some astonishing resemblances between phrases used in the "Management of Schools" and some of those found in the "Discourse on the Method of Correct Reasoning and of Finding the Truth in Science", published by René Descartes in 1637.

The ideas of Descartes became very fashionable among the cultured classes of 18th century France and we cannot exclude the possibility that they inspired other works. One could make a comparative study of phrases and sentences in the "Management" and in the Cartesian rules (analysis, synthesis and enumeration).

STIMULI TO LEARNING

Nowadays theories of learning insist on the stimuli which encourage children to learn. We shall try to distinguish those which appear in the "Management of Schools": what encouraged the pupils to learn?

Throughout the text, and not only in the first part, we can find stimuli which I shall classify in two categories:

Explicit Stimuli:

— the child wants naturally to go to school and learn if the parents put no obstacle in the way,
— to encourage him, the school offers him a warm welcome which is in itself a stimulus to learning,
— the teacher is asked to give the pupil personal attention and affection especially if he is in any difficulty,
— his efforts and his progress are regularly noted and rewarded,
— explanation always accompanies the teaching to ensure intelligent learning,
— the teacher gives verbal encouragement and urges him to learn,
— a programme and rhythm to suit his personality gives him confidence.

Implicit Stimuli:

— the immediate correction of mistakes,
— the help of more advanced pupils,
— confidence created by success,
— solid effect of the model and of good example,
— regular evaluation of results,
— monthly change of group or section,
— wall posters urging pupils to work.

THE OBJECTIVES PROPOSED

Lasallian schools were explicitly established for a modest social class, that of "artisans and the poor". Their purpose was, on the human plane, essentially utilitarian. They set out to give their pupils the minimum of knowledge necessary to enable them to manage their personal and professional affairs. That meant finding a trade or occupation and succeeding in it thanks to what they had learned in school.

This after-school objective is explicitly mentioned in several places in the "Management of Schools" and determined the choice of certain exercises in reading, writing and spelling as well as of problems in Arithmetic.

Within the class, the organization of work aimed at efficacy: the acquisition of what would today be called basic knowledge and useful skills.

The pupils could become competent in specific occupations, for the ability to read, write and do calculations was still sufficiently rare in the France of that time to make those who had such ability a kind of privileged class.

CONCLUSIONS

What is striking in the "Management of Schools" is the rigorous organization of the learning process. There are in it some modern concepts. Knowledge of the learning process is more advanced in the 20th century than it was in the 18th and we use a different terminology, but when we get down to concrete reality I find certain things in common, for example:

— the need for thorough assimilation of the subject matter before moving from one level to a higher one,
— the recognised importance of work stimuli,
— the importance of repetition of basic facts,
— insistence on precision and clarity of models,
— positive reinforcement through immediate correction of mistakes, — frequent and regular evaluation of knowledge acquired,
— explanations given to ensure intelligent learning.

We must not exaggerate these comparisons. But neither must we forget that the 1706 Manuscript of the "Management of Schools" was the work of Brothers whose formation was limited. That they were able to formulate, in such simple terms, such essential elements proves their wealth of experience. It shows also what can be done "together and by association".

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (5): IMPORTANCE OF EVALUATION

Modern pedagogy gives considerable importance to evaluation of results and of the knowledge and skills acquired. And rightly so, for it is a means of finding out the precise nature of the learning process and the efficacy of the conditions in which it is carried on. Methods of evaluation may vary with the school situation and take on forms more or less complex according to the nature of the knowledge and skills acquired.

The importance of evaluation has been confirmed by the appearance recently of the science of docimology, or evaluation of what has been acquired.

Such refinement is, obviously, not to be found in the "Management of Schools" but I think it interesting to look at the evaluation system proposed therein.

QUESTIONING AND CHECKING

Reading through the first part of the "Management" we can distinguish five forms of questioning or testing during the learning process.

★ Questioning during the Course of Work to make sure that the pupils understand what they are learning. We find several examples of this in the passages devoted to arithmetic, spelling and training in sharpening the pens (quills). This attention to understanding by the pupils is continuous in the "Management". From among various passages we could quote let us take this:

> "The Master will the insist that the pupils, whose spelling mistakes he has corrected, rewrite the work neatly at home making the corrections he has indicated, and he will check when next he corrects their exercises that they have, in fact, done this work". (p. 74)

★ Questioning to Stimulate the Pupils. This is for the purpose of finding out if the pupils are paying attention to the lesson and profiting from the efforts of their companions.

> "The Master will, from time to time, question some of the pupils following the same lesson to make sure they are attentive and that they understand". (p. 71)

★ Questioning at the End of the Lesson to check the extent of acquisition and comprehension:

> "When a pupil has learned all the lines of the alphabet chart, before beginning the syllables, he will continue to the end of the month to study the entire alphabet of which he will be required to read all the letters at random, in order to ascertain whether he knows them all; and he will not advance further until he knows them perfectly". (p. 26)

★ Monthly Revision before promotion to a higher grade or section.

> "In order that no teacher may be mistaken in regard to the fitness of his pupils for promotion, all the teachers will examine, towards the end of each month, on a day fixed by the Brother Director or the Inspector of Schools, those pupils in all grades and in all sections who should be ready for promotion at the end of the month". (p. 21)

★ Monthly Test: At the end of each month the tests arranged will allow the teacher to find out in the grades and sections:

— those who are fit to move to a higher level
— those whose attainment is doubtful
— those who are not ready for promotion.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute - Napa CA - USA

The final decision is left to the Inspector of Schools who carries out another test if he thinks it necessary. In order to prepare the pupils for this final test the teacher will give them a quick preliminary test.

> "The teacher will give to each pupil proposed for promotion a lesson to study to see if, in fact, he is ready for the section to which he is to be promoted. If the change is to take place in the afternoon he will do so that morning. If in the morning then he will give the test the previous afternoon". (p. 23)

MONTHLY PROMOTIONS

★ Attention to the individual and to the group

Frequent change was a powerful stimulant to the pupil who was regularly informed of his progress and his capabilities. Encouraged in this way to keep working and to do better, he was in a position to keep his parents informed of his progress. This was the individual aspect of the evaluation.

But the change over to simultaneous teaching in the Brothers' schools called for attention to the group-class. The group could be enriched and stimulated by the presence of pupils normally capable of promotion to a higher level but whom it was desirable to retain for the sake of the others. This called for a delicate choice between the legitimate interests of the individual and the desire to help the group.

> "The teacher will take care, some time before the day on which the promotions are to be made, to inform those pupils whom the Brother Director or the Inspector has agreed not to promote — either for their own good, because they are too young, or for the good of the group or grade, in order that there be some who can support the others. They will do this in such a manner that these pupils will be content to remain in the grade or section where they are".
> They will persuade them by means of some reward, by assigning to them some office, such, for example, as Head of the Class and making them understand that it is better to be first or among the first in a lower grade than last in a higher grade. (p. 23)

★ An Important Arrangement

These frequent and regular promotions introduced an important element of mobility into the internal organization of the classes since each class contained several sections or grades. It was important to keep account of these different changes in order to follow the progress of each pupil in the school. In the large classes of the time that meant heavy additional monthly work for each teacher: lists of "Changes of Section" and lists of "Changes of Grade".

The "Management of Schools" gives model lists to ensure uniformity of procedure among the teachers.

Opposite the name of the pupil, the date of his admission to and promotion from the section or grade was entered. The teacher also entered on the list some remarks concerning the behaviour of the pupil: how often he came late, if he were absent without permission, if he did not know the diocesan catechism.

All this information was collated by the Inspector of Schools. We have already noted the key role he played in the decisions to promote or not promote pupils.

CONCLUSION

No official examination, no entrance examination to another scholastic establishment, no external standard obliged the Brothers to carry out these monthly evaluations, the organization of which imposed a heavy and complex task on the teachers.

That can be explained and justified, and it is important to say so, only by the dual objective of care for the pupil and for the effectiveness of the teaching given: care to keep the child regularly informed about his work and progress as well as the desire for efficiency so that parents might have no reason to complain of the school or to think that their children were wasting their time there.

By its frequency and its extension to the whole process of learning, that system of evaluation became continuous. Is that not what we consider today the most satisfactory system?

THE PRINCIPAL MYSTERIES IN THE SPIRITUALITY AND CATECHESIS OF ST. J.B. DE LA SALLE

"You lay the foundations for the building of the Church when you instruct children in the mystery of the most Holy Trinity and the mysteries accomplished by Jesus Christ when he was here on earth." Seventh Meditation for Time of Retreat, Loes translation p. 66.

This quotation may be taken as programmatic for this short article, for the catechetical aspect of it at least. In it St de La Salle incidentally and unselfconsciously states what he understands by the term, the Principal Mysteries. We might compare the answer of a traditional catechism to show the closeness of the parallel: "There are two Principal Mysteries of religion: 1st, the Unity and Trinity of God; 2nd, the Birth, Death and Resurrection of Christ our Saviour." (Australian Catechism, 18th ed. 1962; this catechism derives largely from the Maynooth Catechism, itself closely related to well known French catechisms of the 17th and 18th centuries.)

It is significant that in the very opening pages of the Meditations for Time of Retreat, de La Salle reminds the Brothers that they are "administrators of God's mysteries" (p. 47). Elsewhere he sums up their catechetical mission as being "to provide children with a Christian mentality and to teach them the mysteries and doctrines of our religion" (p. 60).

Further, he reminds them that "there are a number of doctrines which are absolutely necessary for us to know in order to be saved" (p. 51). These doctrines are in fact those of the Trinity of Persons in God and the Redemptive Incarnation of the Son of God.

THE BROTHERS' SPIRITUALITY

St. de La Salle makes no express attempt to base the Brothers' spiritual life upon the contemplation of the Blessed Trinity (indeed the present Rule seems much more explicit on this point; cf. Chap. 10, art.j). But it is clear that he presupposes such a basis. Even a cursory reading of the Meditations for Sundays and Feasts, more especially those meditations devoted to aspects of Christ's redemptive mission, make it quite clear that the Brothers' spiritual life is to be based upon a deep awareness of the object of their faith and of the practical lived consequences of such faith. This is simply what the spirit of faith is: the Brother believes with all his mind and all his heart what the Church teaches in her Creeds and catechisms (cf. Meditation No. 5: Sunday in Octave of Christmas, Battersby translation 1964 ed. p. 26) and he lives his life accordingly.

St. de La Salle could easily make his own what Pope John Paul II said recently when speaking of Christ's redemptive mission: "We must have our minds and hearts open to receive this manifestation (of Christ) which is not meant to be so much a knowledge of the mystery of Christ as our immersion and our absorption into it" (O.R. 23 Jan. 1984, p. 3, col. 3; emphasis in the original).

FROM THE BROTHER'S SPIRITUALITY TO HIS CATECHESIS

The union between the spiritual life of the Brother and his zeal as a Christian educator is so close that each not only sustains the other but each finds its natural expression in the other. This is commonplace in the thought of St. de La Salle; but it finds explicit expression in his Meditation for Trinity Sunday: "(This mystery) is the more adorable for you as you are obliged to teach it and make it known to children who, like you, are by baptism consecrated to the Most Holy Trinity. They bear the marks of this consecration in their soul and to this adorable mystery they owe the unction of grace which has been applied to their soul" (Battersby, p. 202).

THE PRINCIPAL MYSTERIES IN THE BROTHERS' CATECHESIS

One of the injunctions of the Rule as I learnt it was that, of the total time to be devoted to catechesis — four and a half hours a week — one half-hour of the Sunday school session was to be devoted to catechesis on the Principal Mysteries. Though perhaps conceived mainly in terms of revision of knowledge already imparted and assimilated, nothing in this prescription of the Rule would exclude an ever-deepening and, as we would say today, an "interiorising" of these Mysteries by both Brother and pupil.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

And perhaps of at least equal importance as this weekly return to an explicit recall of the Principal Mysteries would be the careful insistence on reverence in making the Sign of the Cross, in bowing the head at the Gloria Patri, in teaching oneself and then one's pupils to relish rather than to avoid the formal trinitarian conclusion which characterises the liturgical prayers...

DOCTRINAL OR PRACTICAL EMPHASIS?

It must be admitted that in the Meditations for Time of Retreat St. de La Salle's manner of referring to the doctrinal aspects of catechesis is somewhat disconcerting: much of what he says might be read in a dismissive sense. He seems sometimes to imply that knowledge of "the truths that are purely doctrinal" is of less importance than that of "the practical truths of the gospel". (Or does this impression derive more from the translation — Loes — than from the original? Concerning the expression "truths that are purely doctrinal" Br. Loes explains in Appendix C that this is his paraphrase for what seems to me to be a rather different expression.)

It would, however, be quite false to the mind of our Founder so to force the contrast, which he makes for his own reason of emphasis, to make it sound like the equivalent of the contemporary opposition of orthodoxy to orthopraxis. (Cf. Catechesi Tradendae No. 22)

What St. de La Salle has in mind is simply the ageless truth that, to be effectively salvific, faith must be living, that is animated by supernatural charity (cf. Loes p. 60). For, if faith without works is dead, so are works without faith. One must believe and one must do; and one must both believe and do at the same time: there is no room for choice. "It is useless to play off orthopraxis against orthodoxy: Christianity is inseparably both." (Catechesi Tradendae No. 22)

For St. de La Salle faith and morals are inseparable: "Contradicting the morality preached by Jesus Christ is quite as dangerous as attacking His doctrine, for the loss of faith generally results from depraved morals." (Battersby, p. 27)

Any conflict, then, which we may seem to discern between "the purely doctrinal truths" (Loes), which would obviously include the Principal Mysteries, and "the practical truths of the gospel" would exist rather in the contemporary mind than in the mind of our Founder.

PLACE FOR TEACHING THE PRINCIPAL MYSTERIES IN CONTEMPORARY CATECHETICS

It seems to me that the contemporary orientation of catechetics leaves little place for catechesis on the Principal Mysteries.

First, this orientation is — excessively — anthropocentric. It starts with man, "starts with where the pupils are" — a principle not wrong in itself — but often it seems to have no desire to transcend that starting point. But surely one of the essential objectives of catechesis should be to draw attention to God and away from oneself?

Again, it is excessively socially-oriented: it seems to be too much concerned with man and his moral problems, with the structures of society, and too little with faith-knowledge of the world of divine realities, especially of the mystery of grace operating through the sacramental economy; and of the world of divinely assured certainties made available to us in the Church's magisterium.

I am sure that I could use Pope John Paul's Exhortation on Catechesis in Our Time (Catechesi Tradendae, 1979) to illustrate my contention that the basic programme of catechesis at every level should be the Creed, an approach which would permit of limitless deepening if one so wished (Cf. Catechesi Tradendae, Nos. 28, 59, 61; more especially for the Principal Mysteries, Nos. 37, 38, 48).

The depreciation of the doctrinal aspect of catechesis in favour of what, for the sake of brevity, I am rather unwillingly calling the moral dimension, derives mainly from an inadequate concept of faith: a concept which underplays the part of the believing mind and exalts the part of the trusting heart. Space does not permit me to explain myself further. I have done so at length elsewhere.

For myself, reading the Meditations of St. de La Salle and any others of his writings, I note how serene is his faith: there is no evidence anywhere of reticence, of hesitation, or of suspended judgment, concerning anything proposed by the Church; his faith is co-extensive with the total content of the teaching of the Church (cf., again, Battersby p. 26). And from this serene faith follows a clear and consistent practice, clearly exemplified in loyalty to the Church's teaching.

CONCLUSION

Let me ask the question St. de La Salle puts to his original readers: "Have you studied well all these truths up to the present and are you thoroughly committed to their making a strong impression on the minds of these children? Have you regarded this responsibility as the most important in your work? From this moment take the steps to make it your main concern to teach perfectly the truths of faith and the practical maxims of the holy gospel to those who are entrusted to you" (Loes, p. 63).

It seems to me that for ourselves personally, as Christians and as religious, it is question of our once more coming to recognize that "the fundamental act of religion (is) the adoring acceptance of the sway of mystery in dedicated love". (Rahner, Theological Investigations IV p. 61; Eng.tr.) On such a contemplative basis the Brothers can build an appropriate catechetical mission. All zeal stems from, and is conditioned by, supernatural faith.

LA SALLE FOUNDATION FOR NATURAL SCIENCE (FLASA)

In answer to a request from the editorial committee of "LASALLIANA" I shall try to give an account of how the La Salle Foundation for Natural Science achieved, in practice, the educational aims proposed at its inception.

FLASA has just completed twenty-five years of uninterrupted work in the service of important sectors of the population of Venezuela which were emarginated and discriminated against both socially and economically. Starting from zero twenty-five years ago, the Foundation today has four centres of activity. Three of these are situated in different parts of the country, at Margarita on the coast, at Guyano and at Cojedes Boconó in regions with varying natural resources to be exploited. The fourth centre is in Caracas. It is the headquarters of the Foundation and houses the central administration as well as the scientific staff who direct the work of the other centres.

The Foundation had its origin in the La Salle Association for Natural Science, an institution which has been in existence for forty-four years and which was due to the efforts of high school students who channelled their scientific curiosity into the study of the fauna and flora of Venezuela. Today the Association continues to render useful service to the country and its young people. It was during the course of their researches that these students became aware of the backwardness of many communities and the poor economic conditions in which they lived. This was due to the obsolete means of exploitation of natural resources in use. They were incapable of competing on the market with those who applied industrial methods to production and benefited from advanced technology.

The proposal to create the La Salle Foundation to improve conditions in these communities delighted Brother Ginès, its Founder and first President, and his zealous and faithful collaborators, for the action of FLASA would be inspired by the humanistic and philanthropic ideals of the Natural Science Association. He was all the more pleased as this orientation towards the poor and the disinherited was in line with the thinking of Saint John Baptist de La Salle who found similar conditions in the France in which he exercised his apostolate.

All its accumulated knowledge and acquired experience was to be put at the disposal of the communities which were gradually to come within the sphere of influence of FLASA. Education would, unquestionably, be the best means of attaining these objectives. For that reason we set about establishing technical high schools leading eventually to the setting up of University Institutes of Technology such as the Institute of Navigation and Fisheries at Margarita, of Industrial Technology at Guyana and of Agriculture and Stock Raising at Cojedes.

Today the student population of FLASA's institutions numbers 4,000.

In the statutes of the Foundation (here we must underline the general principles which inspire the philosophy underlying the ideals of FLASA) it is specified that this Institution "conceives education as a socialising process which respects individual character and which is achieved by assimilation of ancestral traditions together with a scientific and academic formation". This process is aimed at a better all-round development of persons prepared to respond to the needs of their social milieu and to share in its democratic way of life.

In accordance with this concept fourteen Educative Principles were drawn up as a guide to the daily realization, in each of the centres, of the ideals of the Foundation. Their formulation was the outcome of the educational experience gained by the directors of FLASA who wish to see them adopted not only in their own centres but also in the national education system.

These principles which faithfully reflect the philosophy of our Founder were, together with the practical means of applying them, laid down by the Administration in a document entitled "FLASA and Education". They are as follows:

1. Education is an evolutionary process which requires continual study and revision.
2. Participation of all members (teachers, administrators and workers) in the planning of school life, in the development of the institution and the evaluation of results so that all may understand that it is a collective undertaking based on continuing mutual co-operation.
3. Recognition of the fact that each individual has a specific personality with distinct physical and psychological characteristics which must be taken into account so that the pupil's growth and social formation (in the family and in society) make take place in accordance with the ideals of human solidarity.
4. Acknowledgement of the adolescent's need for and right to guidance in taking responsible decisions and in finding solutions to problems arising from social and professional relationships.
5. Strengthening of national identity by means of an education integrated into the oral tradition of the community whether local, national or Latin-American. Revitalization of craft training in order to rediscover the traditions of the people and to make a positive evaluation of the cultural heritage, created by earlier generations, which is at the base of these traditions.
6. Concept of school life in its totality as a series of experiences and effective stimuli that help students grow to understand the problems of social life, the standards and principles on which it is based and the responsibilities and duties which it implies.
7. Provision of experiences, activities and basic knowledge so as to discover and meet the interests and needs of students, to promote the full development of their personalities, to train them to think and to give them an opportunity to acquire an aptitude for action and a resolute attitude in the face of their natural and historic disadvantages.
8. Development of the abilities and skills of the students through activities and practical knowledge so that they may be able to use them effectively in the world of work thus making their training in trades a preparation for future productive work. In this way we hope to forge a link between the training we give the students and production in the local community.
9. Activities, experience and knowledge provided for the student should be chosen and adapted to suit his biological, intellectual and emotional development on the one hand, and on the other, account should be taken of the requirements of a nation striving for its own transformation and development.
10. Techniques adopted in carrying out a scholastic programme should be in accordance with the modern concept of education which stresses the complete development of the pupil's personality.
11. Scientific evaluation of the results of the educative process requires not only an assessment of the degree of knowledge but also of the forms of individual and social conduct that the student acquires and adopts during his period at school.
12. The modern concept of school discipline is that of a dynamic process of harmonious development of the personality of the student, of a conscious, considered and voluntary acceptance of a system of values. This presupposes an adequate understanding of social behaviour, emotional balance, acceptable habits and desirable attitudes.
13. The collaboration of parents, friends and public representatives, when well organized, can be an excellent means of finding solutions to the educational, socio-economic and health problems of the students, can enrich the life of the Institute and spread its influence to other sectors of society and can continue and make known its educative work.
14. The overall formation of the student should help him to find his place in the community and to identify with it. It should stimulate him to continue his education beyond the period of formal schooling and fit him to play a part in the development of the La Salle Foundation in his own locality and in the country at large. The teaching staff of the Institutes should also share in this process of continuing education.

The educational planning by which the Foundation puts its philosophy into practice has been so efficient that the success of its system of teaching and training is an established fact and the best guarantee of the validity of a method inspired by the humanist and Christian ideals of its authors.

Yesterday's students, today taking an active part in the productive life of their communities are the best proof that the La Salle Foundation has achieved its educational objectives and is ready to put itself at the service of Venezuela.

THE "HARAMBEE" SPIRIT

The Brothers from the New York and LINE districts came to Kenya in 1958 at the request of the local Bishop to staff Kamwenja Teachers Training College. For the past 25 years they have been responding to the needs of the local Church in a variety of apostolates including teaching in Government and Church schools, junior seminaries, pastoral institutes and youth centres.

The late President Jomo Kenyatta led his Kenyan people to independence in 1963 with the rallying cry "Harambee" - "Let us work together". His idea was that when the community sees a need they join together to solve the problem. Whether they give of their labour to re-build a neighbour's house gutted by fire or contribute cash to construct a dispensary they are acting in the Harambee spirit. Perhaps no-where has this been more exemplified than in the field of education. Although the Government devotes 16% of its budget to education, it is far too little in a country where more than half the people are under 19 years of age. Today Government maintained schools are far out-numbered by "Harambee schools" schools built and maintained by the local community.

One of these Harambee schools, run by the Brothers, is Rongai Secondary School in the central part of Kenya. The town and the school take their name from a Masai word meaning narrow, which describes the stream flowing on the eastern boundary of the town. Here, for the past eight years, seven different Brothers have laboured. Before independence the area was part of the "white highlands" of the Rift Valley. Now these European farms have mostly been broken up into small shareholdings and have passed to African hands. The land is poor; the people are poor.

As St. La Salle sought out the poor of his native city to lead them to God, so the Brothers, although not yet native, "are associated together to engage in educational work for the service of the poor" at Rongai. The late Brother Charles Henry stated that "the vocation of the Brother obliges him to enter fully into the movement of renewal and reform of the school... to an effort that is continuous in order to assure the quality of the education he imparts and the perfect adaptation of its program, its methods, its objectives". This, then is what we are trying to achieve at Rongai.

At a first glance, Rongai Harambee School might not appear much different from any other secondary school. Students dissect grasshoppers in the lab, struggle with English grammar and move from class to class at the clanging of the bell which, incidentally isn't a bell at all, but a two metre section of railway track! Our students do well in the National exams, but this is only what one expects in a Brothers school. It is after the time for formal lessons, however, that the real Harambee nature of the school becomes evident. The Brothers have instilled into the students that it is their school and it is up to them to keep it going — teachers and students working together. And they do!

In a country where white-collar jobs are becoming almost non-existent and 95% of the population is involved in agriculture, the students have to learn the dignity and necessity of farming. On top of a college oriented curriculum we teach agriculture and every day after school everyone gets his hands dirty. On our 2 hectare "shamba" our 200 boarding students practice intensive farming, using irrigation and lots of manure. They grow almost all their own food: maize and beans, spinach and bananas. They keep about 100 pigs and grow canna to feed them and make all the pig food in our own mill. Every Saturday they slaughter a pig for Sunday dinner. Twenty boys care for 200 rabbits. Every few weeks 30 of them appear on the menu. Two men are employed to do the cooking, but they are helped by the students who grind the wheat and maize into flour, peel the potatoes and cut the fire wood that fuels the stoves. We have one maintenance man, but most of the jobs from painting to plumbing are handled by the students, who are responsible for the upkeep of the buildings. We have just built a woodworking shop and some students will be taught carpentry.

One of the Brothers helps the students prepare the weekly liturgy in the school and organizes an annual retreat for each class. On Sundays, our students, together with the catechist, arrange the parish liturgy.

After four years at Rongai Harambee Secondary School our boys leave us. We hope they have learned the meaning of "Harambee" and that they are now ready to face the world as self-reliant Kenyans and Christian gentlemen.

A PUBLISHING HOUSE SERVING A COUNTRY'S CULTURAL IDENTITY

SHORT HISTORY

In 1972, after 12 years of independence, the Government of Madagascar accelerated the process of breaking with the school organization inherited from colonial days. This was especially noticeable in the Malgachisation of programmes and the use of the national language for lessons. At the same time, great efforts were made to extend schooling to secondary level by the opening of colleges and grammar schools in the principal towns of the country.

To meet this development and these changes new and adapted school books and documents had to be created. The authors were offered an important and exciting task.

Bearing the needs of their pupils in mind, the Brothers of the Christian Schools were the pioneers in this work, thus rendering eminent service to teachers and pupils, and therefore to the whole educational system.

From 1970 onwards a group of Brothers, realising the need for adapting their teaching to the local situation, set to work. The beginnings were modest and the means precarious: installations in a school in Tananarive, the printing of books and magazines by Roneo. Divers contretemps moreover tried the courage and tenacity of the pioneers.

However, the reputation of the first editions quickly spread beyond the bounds of the Brothers' schools and orders flooded in from all over the country. In 1971 a new educational review appeared, "TSIRIM-PAHAZAVANA," thanks to the cooperation between Brothers and laymen. This was the first and only one of its kind to be produced in the country, with one edition for primary schools and another section for secondary level.

DEVELOPMENT

This initial success led to and enabled the buildings to be extended and the FO.FI.PA to be produced. A small building was therefore erected to house the activities and the equipment as well as a small community of Brothers.

From 1975, FO.FI.PA obtained legal status as a publishing house. As such its books are printed in town and they assure the promotion and sales. Only Roneo work is now produced in the house.

Success and good management have gradually made possible the investments needed to avoid calling on the district for help. Assistance from SECOLI and MISEREOR made up what was lacking from local resources.

PRESENT PUBLICATIONS

With reduced man power, 2 Brothers and about 40 employees, FO.FI.PA continues publishing:

- — school books for all education levels, primary, secondary and higher,
- — pedagogical reviews, primary and secondary,
- — reading text books,
- — guides for rural development, hygiene, culture, civilization.

In short, all subjects taught are covered by these books, often with a choice between a number of authors. The 1984 catalogue contains over 360 titles for teachers and pupils, without counting a few novels and books of research and analysis not meant so much for school.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Among these publications special mention might be made of publications which are specifically Lasallian as well as district reviews and papers. In particular we should mention:

★ Translation into Malgache of:

— Maillefer's Life of St. John Baptist de La Salle.
— That by the Abbé Courtois.
— Pedagogy by Brother E. Gabriel.
— The Conduct of Schools.
— The Meditations for the Time of the Retreat.
— The Twelve Virtues of a Good Teacher.

★ The publication of books written in Malgache:

— Life of St. John Baptist de La Salle by Ratovoarison.
— Life of St. John Baptist de La Salle by Rasamoela.
— Life of Brother Raphael Louis by Brother Louis Robert.
— Life of Brother Raphael Louis in pamphlet form.

★ Life of Brother Raphael Louis in French by Brother Concorde Marie.

To these must be added booklets and pamphlets for the liturgy, for singing, and other texts of the Church in Madagascar.

TEACHERS RETRAINING SESSIONS

From 1970 the initiators of the FO.FI.PA were in demand throught the country for the continuing training of teachers especially in the field of mathematics and the structural approach to the Malgache language.

These requests have persisted and FO.FI.PA continues to offer training opportunities for adults:

— evening classes for candidates for the Baccalaureat, — pedagogical courses for teachers preparing their professional qualifying exam,
— correspondence courses in pedagogy,
— residential courses in pedagogical leadership in provincial towns and rural agglomerations.

The aim in all these activities is service for all in the good Lasallian tradition.

CONFIRMED SUCCESS

There are now similar organizations in the country offering healthy competition. We think, however, that FO.FI.PA is still very much appreciated for its solid courses, the quality of its publications and its organizational precision.

It is a constant encouragement for the management and all who cooperated in this work.

TO CONCLUDE

We have recently received more encouragement:

★ In 1983 the District Chapter recognized the efforts made by FO.FI.PA and thanked them.

★ More recently, in February 1984, Brother Superior General during his visit to the country said how much he appreciated the work being done and hoped to see the installations increased and transferred to respond better to the demands made on it. He congratulated the personnel for the family spirit and encouraged it to make it even closer.

We think that these wishes could be fulfilled more easily through twinning with a similar organization in another district with an exchange of ideas and techniques and perhaps a kind of sponsorship. Any suggestion on these lines would be very welcome.

LASALLIAN INITIATIVES IN THE PHILIPPINES (1)

One of the realities which makes the Philippines unique among her Asian neighbors is the fact that she is the only Catholic nation in Asia. As of 1983:

Total Population	51,500,000
Catholics	43,100,000	(83.8%)
Priests	4,954
Brothers	475
Sisters	7,074

Sixty-six percent of the total population is 25 years old or younger, and 13.5 million are actually in school. Only a small portion is enrolled in diocesan or parochial schools, or in schools run by religious. The 1983 Catholic Directory published the following enrolment figures for Catholic schools:

School/Level	Primary	Secondary	Tertiary	Total
Diocesan	164,692	412,363		577,055
Religious	163,157	186,464	320,552	670,173
				1,247,228

In a country where education is highly valued by the people as a means for economic improvement and social mobility, and which the local Church considers essential in her role of forming the minds and consciences of her members, the Brothers are constantly challenged to respond to these urgent educational needs. In 1911 nine Brothers: 5 French, 3 Irish, and 1 American, started classes for 125 Filipino students in Manila. In 1984 there are 46 Brothers: 30 Filipinos and 16 non-Filipinos, conducting classes on various levels in seven Lasallian institutions:

Level	Primary	Secondary	Tertiary	Total
Number of Students	6,731	5,753	10,529	23,013

There are presently 838 lay teachers and administrators in the different schools owned and operated by the Brothers.

On May 15, 1984 the District opened a new community in a leprosarium in Tala, a small town just north of Manila. Three Brothers are teaching in a private school which is supported by a private foundation set up to provide a free education for the lepers and their children. The Brothers continue to be asked to open new foundations or to take over others. They face the same problems which confronted Canon Roland, the canon of Rheims who eventually became St. La Salle's spiritual adviser and providentially encouraged him to involve himself in education. Canon Blain's description of the dilemma facing Canon Roland and De La Salle is just as valid today: "He had to find teachers, both men and women, capable of instructing the young well and of bringing them up in piety through example as well as through their words. The problem was where to find such teachers, where to discover disinterested, zealous and pious persons fit to carry out a task of this nature. To expect them to come down from heaven already prepared and ready to undertake this task successfully would have been to take pious illusions for realities."

Undoubtedly one solution continues to be that of fostering vocations to the Brothers' life. Our Brothers continue to exert their efforts in this. The District presently has 6 novices and 17 young men in various stages of pre-novitiate formation. Since the majority of our lay teachers are women, and a number have expressed interest in joining a Lasallian Sisters' congregation, we have also invited the Lasallian Sisters of Our Lady of Guadalupe to start a community in the Philippines. Two Sisters auspiciously arrived in Manila on May 15, 1984. They will also be able to respond to the vocational interests of many of our female students and alumnae.

RENEWAL WITHIN OUR INSTITUTIONS

Recent initiatives have focused on renewing our apostolic efforts both within our institutions and beyond them. This report highlights the former, especially that of sharing the Founder's spirituality and faith-perspective with those with whom we already share responsibilities in the education field. The District is confronted with the reality that Philippine education will continue to be a cooperative mission with our lay faculty and administrators, our students and their parents, our alumni and other members of the local Church and community. In light of this we have sought to bring about greater involvement and understanding of the other members of the school community regarding their vocation as "ministers of God, co-workers with Christ, ministers of the Church" in the work of Christian education.

The situation the District is responding to, is similar to that experienced by Brothers in many other districts. The 1981 Intercapitular Meeting of Brothers Visitors observed this trend and among the major recommendations they presented were: to make our work more pastoral; to be more open to the lay teachers working among us with the goal of their greater integration within the framework of our common mission and responsibility; becoming more truly "brothers"; and deepening our Lasallian roots. We have been fortunate in implementing these tasks because of the predominance of Catholics in our country, and especially, the presence in our midst of many sincere, dedicated and committed teachers.

On the concrete level we have taken the following initiatives.

PARTICIPATIVE FORMULATION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF INSTITUTIONAL MISSION STATEMENTS

The different groups: faculty, students, Brothers, alumni, administrators, parents, etc., are given the opportunity to participate in the formulation and implementation of the "mission statement" of the school or institution. In essence this statement embodies the general and specific goals or objectives of the educational community vis-a-vis the needs of the students, the local community, the country, the Church etc. Very often the process is long, but the involvement of these persons serves as an important learning experience for the participants. It entails the sharing of perspectives regarding the goals of education, not only in terms of personal and national criteria, but also in reference to the vision of the Church and St. La Salle.

REORGANIZATION OF INSTITUTIONAL STRUCTURES

While retaining legal control of the institutions, steps are being taken to allow more "voices" to be heard regarding the formulation and carrying out of policies and directions of our existing institutions. Each school has formed a board of trustees with a membership that is not limited to the Brothers. The larger community is represented by members chosen from among alumni, parents, the clergy, educators and professionals in the local community. Lay administrators are appointed to positions formerly occupied by Brothers. Their participation in these policy-formulating and direction-setting bodies allows for the development of the mutual commitment and interaction which gives life to the school, the Brothers' community and the local community.

LASALLIAN INITIATIVES IN THE PHILIPPINES (2)

ANIMATION OF LAY ADMINISTRATORS AND FACULTY

By necessity as well as conviction, our schools have implemented the appeal of the 1966 General Chapter that "lay teachers should be completely involved with the whole life of the school: with catechesis, apostolic organizations, extra-curricular activities and administration." (Declaration 46,3) What our Brothers identify as a more urgent need is that of sharing with our colleagues the mission and apostolic ideals proposed by St. La Salle. We already share the work and educational responsibility. There is also the critical necessity of integrating them into the mission and spirituality which we have received as a precious Lasallian legacy. This spirit and vision we want them also to be able to call their own.

One initiative was to offer the ideals and program of the association of the Signum Fidei. The initial response has been enthusiastic. After a year of preparation under the guidance of Brother Victor Franco, eighteen teachers from the primary school in La Salle Green Hills consecrated themselves in February, 1984 as Signum Fidei members. In addition to regular meetings, retreats, Bible discussions, prayer and Lasallian conferences, the members volunteered their services to open and maintain a nursery school. Now thirty children of the poor receive free instruction every year to prepare them to enter primary education. The parents of these students are also given guidance regarding proper nutrition and health care for their children. Other teachers from other departments and schools have signified their interest in the association. Two members have volunteered to spend a year teaching in our schools in the rural areas where their expertise and experience are benefiting other teachers and students.

On a district-wide level, a series of Lasallian Seminars was implemented during the schoolyear 1983-1984. This series consisted of four half-day seminars conducted for each quarter of the year. The seminars were attended by members of the faculty of all our schools and conducted by a team of eight Brothers. The following topics were discussed:

a) The Evangelical Itinerary of St. La Salle
b) The Lasallian Concept of a Christian School
c) The Founder's Twelve Virtues of a Good Teacher
d) The Ministry of Teaching as Seen in the Meditations for the Time of Retreat.

The series of seminars was a preparation for, and will be capped by, a three-day workshop on the Lasallian charism handled by Brother Miguel Campos. In each of the schools the activities, readings, and the culminating workshop are aimed at deepening in our lay staff and the Brothers their awareness of our common Lasallian charism and spirituality. So far the results show that on the part of our co-ministers and co-workers, such an awareness and understanding of the nobility and importance of their vocation as an apostle to the young strengthens their commitment and allows them to situate their "occupation" within a broader, more spiritual context. The activities have increased their enthusiasm for their personal ministry, and drawn the faculty members one step further in the formation not only of a community of learners, but also of believers.

These initiatives have also increased our colleagues' understanding and appreciation of the Brothers' vocation. Brother Cecilio Hojilla has gone around the different La Salle schools conducting retreats at the request of the teachers. As Vocation Director he noticed that with increase in interaction between the Brothers and our religious and lay co-teachers, the latter have become more enthusiastic promoters of the Lasallian vocation among their students.

The Brothers also recognize that the material needs of our lay teachers continue to be a burden, especially since salaries can barely keep up with rising costs of living. Almost all our teachers on the primary and secondary level are female because it is very difficult for male breadwinners to maintain their families on a teacher's salary. Most schools try to improve salaries. Brother Rolando Dizon, President of La Salle Green Hills, took the initiative of setting up a housing association which was able to acquire bank loans for buying, developing land, and providing low-cost housing for teachers and employees of our schools and those of other religious congregations.

VOLUNTEER PROGRAMS FOR ALUMNI AND STUDENTS

Other initiatives have been directed towards our students and alumni, especially their personal involvement in projects for the poor and working class. These projects complement the existing programs in our schools such as fund-raising for scholarships, catechetics, and "exposures" to the needy and their social condition. In De La Salle University an alumnus, Miguel Luz, has gotten the help and support of Brother Andrew Gonzalez, the University President, in his work as head of the university's Center for Social Concern. He has succeeded in getting students to volunteer their services for a few weeks to a whole year, working or teaching in one of our rural schools. On the same campus, another group of students have organized themselves into a group to offer their talents in conducting peer-counseling and leadership-training seminars for students in secondary schools for the poor and middle class in the Greater Manila area. In La Salle Green Hills, Brother Augustine Boquer has encouraged the school's popular singing group and band in giving concerts to raise funds for needy parishes and schools. In La Salle Bacolod the college students help out in the city jail, the home for orphans and the aged as part of their theology program.

SUPERVISED SCHOOLS

The Brothers receive many requests to open more schools notwithstanding our refusals because of our lack of manpower and the prohibitive costs of building or running a school. In the Philippines the government does not subsidize nor give aid to privately-owned schools. In this situation the Brothers have developed an alternative — that of supervising schools. A contract is made with a company or a diocese in which the Brothers agree to supervise a school or school system. On its part the company or diocese agrees to provide the material needs of the school, the salaries of the teachers and administrators, the costs of developing and maintaining the school, a stipend for the Brother who will supervise the school. The Brother Visitor assigns a Brother who will visit the school regularly; supervise its operation; recommend the appointment of teachers and administrators; draw up the school's short- and long-range plans. The Brother assigned runs the school(s) as the other La Salle schools.

At the present time Brother Robert Scheiler is completing his assignment as supervisor of the diocesan schools in the diocese of Iligan in Mindanao. Brother Martin Simpson is supervising several schools: one owned and operated by a company which runs a copper mine; another which mines phosphates; another which belongs to a lumber company. While these schools may not have the permanent presence of a community of Brothers in their midst, nonetheless the Brothers strive to share with them the essential Lasallian ideals and practices. The Brothers, lay teachers and administrators of the other La Salle schools extend their help and expertise to the personnel of the supervised schools, e.g. by visiting these schools and conducting workshops or giving seminars. The faculty and administration of the supervised schools also visit the other La Salle schools for seminars and observation trips.

TOGETHER AND BY ASSOCIATION

In the evolution of these initiatives and programs the involvement of the Brothers as individuals and as communities has led to a deeper clarification and identification of our role in the Philippine situation. With our growing number of lay faculty and administrators, the greater involvement of other members of the larger community in our school, and the continuing increase of students who flock to our schools — there is a deeper conviction that we share with many persons the charism of being "ambassadors" to the youth. In this context we see the relevance of our role as "the animating force of the school to which it gives life and direction according to its mission." (Declaration 48,6) These initiatives have had their share of difficulties and problems. But they are also the occasions for unfolding the rich meaning of our faith-commitment to be "Brothers" to our students and colleagues, and the depth of our vow to work "together and by association".

CATECHESIS IN GREECE

ORGANIZATION OF CATECHESIS

The modern catechetical movement in the Catholic Church in Greece was started about 1956 by a group of catechists (priests, religious and lay people) of the Archdiocese of Athens. These catechists, recently trained in catechetical institutes in France and knowing the great advances made by the French catechetical movement, decided to translate and adapt a series of manuals in Greek.

The "new pedagogy of the faith" with all that it implies made its appearance in Greece. A catechetical commission under the direction of the local episcopal conference was officially established on 17th June, 1965. From that date onwards a general interest began to make itself felt: catechists were trained, new textbooks were introduced into the schools and parishes and, as was to be expected, the first clashes occurred. Some questioned the new methods, others the content of the programme, others still the efficacy of both programme and methods...

Despite these suspicions the Commission went ahead with its work, sometimes stressing the need to employ scientific methods in catechesis, at other times paying more attention to the content of the programme, but always careful to produce a work which was not simply new but answering to the demands of faith, respectful of tradition and adapted to modern needs. After ten years' labour the Commission has succeeded in producing a series of books for children and catechists which have met with general acceptance and appreciation. After the books for children came others for adolescents and older students. These also are excellent productions. Though there still is room for improvement and renewal we can confidently say that something of value exists in the matter of catechetical textbooks and among teaching personnel in Greece.

For some years past the two most important dioceses have each a Catechetical Commission while the others have appointed animators for the work of catechesis. Once a year the Commissions and Animators meet to exchange views on the difficulties of the task, to learn of new publications, to study the evolution of catechesis and plan for the future. They also pray together and share the joys and hopes of a difficult apostolate.

WHERE CATECHESIS TAKES PLACE

In state secondary schools obligatory religious instruction is given by specialist teachers while in primary schools such instruction is given by the local schoolmaster. Catholic students do not attend these classes, except in villages with a large Catholic majority. The parish priest normally instructs Catholic children.

In private Catholic schools the students have religious instruction at the same time as Orthodox students have theirs. Priests, Brothers, Sisters or Catholic lay teachers take charge of their religious formation. Methods differ but an effort is being made to get away from mere instruction and develop a climate of growth in faith more open and more appealing.

In the parishes. Catechism classes are held once a week. These classes have a more ecclesial character and are aimed at a more definite commitment of the students to the local church. In many parishes there are also youth groups. Their meetings provide occasions for the religious formation of the members. There are no specialised groups such as the J.E.C. and J.O.C. in Greece.

In families. The family still maintains a generally Christian atmosphere which is shown by its adherence to certain religious practices, customs and habits. Popular religion holds a greater place in the lives of the people than Christian practices enlightened by faith.

SOME ASPECTS OF CATECHESIS IN GREECE

The following are some of the characteristics of catechesis in Greece:

Catechesis of a minority: Many instances recall the little communities of the early Church: the numbers, the places themselves and the problems are reminiscent of that era.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Traditional character of catechesis: The influence on Catholic children of their Orthodox friends is clearly evident in their attitude of "tradition - repetition - withdrawal". They lack the dynamism that western Catholics normally exhibit. The rather infrequent catechetical meetings are not always able to counteract this tendency. Nevertheless many catechists have the will and energy to go against this current.

A catechesis to be developed: A priori it is difficult to live Catholicism in an Orthodox country. In the minds of most Orthodox people Catholic: western i.e. French or Italian. Orthodox: Greek.

It is difficult for any non Orthodox person to have him or herself accepted as Greek. This is due to certain historical misunderstandings and the mishandling of Greeks by the West. For Catholics in Greece the future must follow a path which clearly shows in the Church diversity in the expression of the faith and acceptance of the contribution of other Churches to the work of evangelization. Dialogue with the Orthodox Church has still to be developed.

A catechesis which awakens faith. If the traditional character of catechesis makes it look rather out of date it must not blind us to the efforts being made to question and change it... Modern developments and the problems which they create demand a different style of life and thought. A desire for a more intense life of faith is making itself felt. Reflection and study groups are being formed which adopt a mode of life and expression free from abstractions.

A non clerical catechesis. More and more lay people are taking part in catechesis for children and young people. What is encouraging in this movement is that it is taking place, not in the sectors where priests and religious are few but where, objectively, there are sufficient priests for the work. In this movement we must stress the role of religious.

Ecumenical catechesis. Although the understanding of the Mystery of Christ and His Church is identical in the Eastern and Western Churches and the remaining differences arise from different and legitimate interpretations, nevertheless, we cannot, in the immediate future foresee collaboration between the Churches in the matter of catechesis. The reasons are:

1. The Catholic Church, very much a minority, must not allow itself to be absorbed by the Orthodox but must preserve its identity. Hence the (Roman) Catholic Church's reservations concerning everything connected with Eastern tradition.
2. The Orthodox Church, very much the majority, presses with all its weight on the small number of Catholics and is reluctant to enter into dialogue with the Catholic Church. Sometimes it puts obstacles in the way of dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Greek Government in order to maintain its position as the Church of the majority.

Between these two extremes there is a wide area of possible collaboration. Paths have been traced and efforts made towards greater mutual understanding. Hostility is giving way to a climate of mutual confidence.

LASALLIAN CONTRIBUTION TO CATECHESIS

The Brothers' schools are centres of catechesis in Greece. In the parishes the Brothers, and lay teachers trained by them, contribute to the animation of various catechetical groups. The Brothers are also in the forefront of publication of catechetical books and teaching material.

Some of the Brothers have been invited by local churches to take an active part in the organization of catechetical work in the dioceses.

THE SCHOOL OF ST. J-B DE LA SALLE (1): INTRODUCTION

04-C-13

EDUCATOR AND SAINT

He was certainly not an educator first and a saint afterwards. A master of pedagogy, he was also a past master in the art of guiding souls in the ways of the Spirit. Yet for more than two hundred years he has been better known as an educator than as an ascetical writer.

"If we did not dwell at some length on his educational achievements we would fail to understand fully the man and would, in fact, overlook the most original characteristic of his sanctity, and that which has made his influence so widespread" (1).

De La Salle was a born director, a sure guide, an organiser who could bring to fruition the precise ideas conceived by a lucid mind. Wherever he went, he left things in order and did away with routine. He was a creative genius well in advance of his time.

Rigault makes clear the attitude of de La Salle when he undertook to have Nyel's foundations in Rheims accepted: "The first step, by no means timid, but circumspect, of the future organiser of primary education" (2).

His role did not consist in sitting in a classroom teaching children though he did this occasionally (3). That does not prevent us from recognizing in him a man who had an outstanding knowledge of people and knew how to make himself acceptable to them. He had a perfect understanding of the human heart. On one occasion he remarked that he had only to hear a person speak a few words to know what that person was. His manner of governing the Brothers and the psychological notes he has left us in his writings show that he knew how to handle people.

We can more easily imagine the saint in an attitude of prayer than as a traveller and writer. He was an extraordinarily active man who had to impose on himself a rigid spiritual programme for the days when he found it impossible to pray with the community (4).

The day was not long enough for de La Salle, he needed hours of the night for writing (5). He has left us almost three thousand pages of writings in which we find an almost equal proportion of ascetical elements and of those of a pedagogical or educational nature.

Rather than by observing or copying other educationalists or religious legislators, de La Salle drew his inspiration from the experiences lived each day both by himself and by the community, reflecting in each line the limpidity of his soul, his exigent and practical mind in regard to himself and others which sought to lead people to the transcendent but also wanted them to live it in the present.

He undertook nothing without invoking the light of the Holy Spirit so that his Meditations are for the teacher a manual for action and, at the same time, a spiritual guide which aims at forming his spiritual personality at the deepest level.

His teachings are well thought out and expressed in precise terms with the aim of strengthening the Brother in his vocation as a teacher. It is the father encouraging his son. De La Salle has no doubt that in forming the souls of his disciples he is at the same time forging the spirit of the Christian school. What preoccupies our Founder is the desire to see the school "well conducted". (An expression already well-known in Lasallian circles.) This meant that it should be:

— a source of edification by the competent way in which it was run, — attractive to the pupils,
— a place of formation for the minds and hearts of children,
— a place of preparation for life and in the art of living,
— concerned to form children in the faith and to good habits.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Lastly, de La Salle shows his interest in the success of the school by his insistence on the constancy of the teachers. In his writings, as in his life, de La Salle does not try to attract attention to himself by making a lot of noise. On the contrary, he gently influences our minds and souls as we gradually enter into dialogue with him (7).

His style is that of clear reasoning which draws its conclusions from lived experience. He wants us to be saints as well as good educators, prepared to die, if necessary, in the service of our ministry (8).

DE LA SALLE, A MAN OF HIS TIME (9)

We cannot, of course, ask de La Salle to solve all the problems of today for us. He is neither an oracle to give an answer to every question nor a yoke to carry on our shoulders as a burden we must bear.

A man of his time, he bears the marks of the paths he has trodden. Nevertheless, he has had inspirations of a universal character and we must recognize that, in his capacity as Founder, God intervened in his life for the good of the Society he was called upon to found. He had other inspirations limited to the era in which he lived, to its culture and to the places where he carried on his work: regulations, influences, recommendations in his letters, etc.

We recognise the universal inspiration which goes beyond time and place when:

— he speaks of the spirit of the Institute, the spirit of faith and the spirit of zeal,

— he bases our whole life on personal and community piety,

— as master of the spiritual life, he recommends the presence of God as a means of tending to perfection,

— he points out that Christian education aims at the development of an evangelical attitude in the person involved in and with society, — as an eminent educator he tells us to transmit a deep human culture as a basis for the formation of a Christian personality (10).

We are invited today to return to the sources, not to copy slavishly, but to discover what were the principal forces and motivations which caused him to act and which constituted the leaven which permeated his work which was destined to spread throughout the world. That means possessing within ourselves the charism of the Founder.

Our Declaration leads us along this path when it urges each one of us to make the spiritual principles which inspired our Founder part of his own life.

De La Salle was in advance of his time in many respects. By penetrating himself with the spirit of the Gospel he sought and found man in what he has of the eternal.

"M. de La Salle? He is a volunteer of progress, of continuity of development, an enemy of school segregation, a pioneer of learning through French, of personalized education and of monthly evaluation" (11). "It was in thinking about the progress that could be made that he broke with routine and brought to perfection methods which had been employed before his time" (12).

THE SCHOOL OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE (2)
A school for the most needy

DE LA SALLE, A MAN FOR OTHERS

For de La Salle the service of the poor was not just an ideal but a way of life. He experienced in his own flesh what it was to be poor and to be treated as such. He made himself poor: a man available to others.

To become so he had had to renounce his canonry, dispose of his property — something not done at the time, according to Blain — and subject himself to community life for some forty years.

De La Salle had not far to go to meet the poor: he had them with him in the person of the Brothers. He had to begin with a rescue operation: rescuing them from ignorance and from the contempt in which schoolmasters were then held; settling them in their employment and inspiring them with love for their vocation as teachers.

Besides poverty of spirit he also experienced poverty in his body. In Vaugirard they had scarcely enough to eat. That house has remained the prototype of extreme want and of the most generous fervour. The Brothers lived joyfully in almost absolute poverty. They were following in the footsteps of a real giant of holiness and generosity of spirit. The saint had no need to urge the Brothers on, he had rather to restrain them. Some of them died young. The local people called the house the "little Trappist Monastery" (2).

In this climate of detachment and fervour the Brothers did not consider the words of their father exaggerated when he told them, "You are obliged by your state in life to love the poor since the task you have is to devote yourselves to teaching them" (3).

De La Salle always sought to take the most perfect path in order to do what was most pleasing to God. The voice he listened to was not that of the flesh or of nature but that of the Spirit who manifested himself in the calls made on him: priests who joined him, missions he preached, the reform school he opened at Saint Yon at the request of his friend, M. de Pontcarré. Louis XIV himself, who saw in the organization of primary education a powerful instrument for combatting Protestantism, sought the help of de La Salle whom he aided, for his part, by according him a form of protection and official recognition. His successor granted the Letters Patent later (4).

Much is said today about protecting the worker, about living among the people... Nobody took as great an interest in the people as did de La Salle. He must be ranked amongst those who tried to rescue the children of the poorest classes from the abject situation in which they lived. One of his principal preoccupations was to prepare them for a stable employment which would enable them to make a living. The instrument he used to attain this end was the provision of popular education to which all had access. In addition he provided secondary education at Saint Yon for the children of the better-off.

If he established boarding schools (the first was in Guise) and if his disciples opened more later on, they did so with a view to supporting free schools for the poor.

THE BROTHERS WERE FOUNDED TO TEACH THE POOR

The words "poor", "poverty", "indigence" abound in the vocabulary of de La Salle throughout his writings. Poverty is a constant preoccupation with him.

He wanted and he established free schools. That does not mean that the poor alone attended them. They were open to all. Nevertheless, as we read in the Rules, it was the poor, above all, who were to fill the classes.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

That meant: the sons of workers who, though employed, had no professional qualifications (artisans) or worse still, the poor who had no steady work and had to be content with casual labour (5).

Those who attended the Brothers' schools were the children of the poorer classes. By improving the profession of teaching and teaching methods, while at the same time giving the school a "soul", the master, de La Salle, created among the sons of the workers and their families a current of hope which enabled them to face life with a degree of optimism.

Throughout the Institute we have heard anew the unanimous voice of the Brothers (and it is a sign of vitality) demanding that their lives be dedicated to the most needy, putting them, as did de La Salle, at the centre of the work in which they are engaged.

The Regional Chapter of Spain and our own District Chapter, in their reports and proposals, are in complete accord with this general feeling, when they define, with precision and in the spirit of the Declaration, those amongst us who are the poor and most needy today.

Here is how they define them: Today's poor are the people who live their lives on the fringe of society, those without work, those who work for a wage which does not cover basic family needs. The poor are those who live in inhuman conditions of poverty, hunger, violence, illness, social emargination, or who are physically or mentally handicapped. These are the people who have particular need of our assistance (7).

We work for the most needy when:

— we teach backward pupils who have little ability;

— we try to raise the cultural level of parents;

— we try to find jobs for school leavers so that they may continue to lead the Christian lives begun at school;

— we give of our time, our strength and our person to make up for the lack of parental love and understanding and of faith (8);

— we want to speed up adaptation of our collective life style to the material standards of the milieu in which we work and of the educational establishments of which we have charge (9);

— we share our goods with others;

— we encourage the elite groups which we direct to make common cause with with the poor and promote the training of: urban and rural leaders, social organizers and animators, trades union leaders among the workers.

Our documents evidently follow the lines of the Founder's charism. However, the fact of having a clear vision of the ideal does not necessarily mean that we completely identify with it. What has changed in our way of acting is perhaps that we are unwilling to give up the comforts and security that modern life offers. Materialism has influenced us.

We find it easier to talk for an hour about the poor and their needs than to endure their presence for fifteen minutes. We must begin by living the reality of each day with a heart and spirit poor in the sight of God and in the presence of others. Let us follow the example of God who acts gratuitously, bestowing His gifts on us in abundance and with generosity. In school the Brother co-operates with God in revealing Him to his pupils and in being, himself, a GIFT to them.

THE TENDERNESS OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE
A characteristic beloved of children and young people

GENERAL SITUATION

Lebanese youth has been deeply marked by the fires of war during the last nine years. Family, school and social life has been disrupted. Besides, Lebanese schools differ so widely as regards ideology, cultural level and moral and religious standards that those of the Brothers must give evidence of very special values if they are not to be regarded as just a few among many others without any distinguishing characteristics. If Lasallian schools in the Lebanon have a high reputation it is due more to comparison with others than to any intrinsic merit they may have. But the prestige of the Brothers' establishments among both Christians and Moslems is beyond question. There are, of course, defects in the system and the atmosphere in which we work is far from favourable, yet the student educated in the Brothers' schools considers himself privileged in comparison with his peers in other schools.

As child and adolescent, the student moves from class to class and, one way or another, acquires knowledge and develops a certain spirit which, without being necessarily Lasallian, is not far removed from it. This is due, in large measure, to the fact that the Brothers still form 8% of the teaching staff.

PARTICULAR SITUATION

At all times and more particularly in conditions of continual war, pupil and teacher experience a special need of affection and understanding. Thinking particularly of the pupil, I can affirm that he expects from me, a De La Salle Brother, much more than I give him. Worried by the constant threat of violence, deafened by the explosion of missiles and of hatred, stricken directly by the deaths of his loved ones or indirectly by those of his neighbours, and disheartened by an insecure future, he must find a motive for living. Only adults who have a living faith and a hope proof against all trials, can give him confidence. Nothing is more reassuring than a love which resembles that of God. But the daily worries of parents, the indifference of those who should sympathise with and help him, the display of luxury by some people, fear, life in the shelters and internal tensions in families destroy this love or render it rare or unhealthy.

A PASTOR'S TENDERNESS

By speaking to a Lebanese child or young person of the goodness of St. John Baptist de La Salle and by giving him tangible proofs of it in your relations with that person, you open up to him ways of calming his nerves and warming his heart. He is moved and attracted by the serenity of the saint when he realizes all the depth of love in his life and work. I must show him de La Salle as a man who had a motive for living, love for young people and care for their salvation. He will then raise his eyes to the Good Shepherd who never deserts his flock even when he sees the wolf coming. The image of the Good Shepherd so moved our saint that he frequently returns to it in his Meditations.

> "They should manifest great tenderness for the souls confided to them so that anything which might be capable of injuring or wounding these souls will call for their attention. In this manner the sheep will love the shepherd and be pleased in his company since they will find therein their repose and their relief." (33rd Meditation, 2nd point)

One would think that this text was written for me, today, in my position as a Brother in the midst of young Lebanese, victims of so much violence. The grace to love more is the grace, par excellence, of my "today", a grace which must increase in my heart through prayer to the true shepherd of the flock.

THE BROTHER AS SACRAMENT OF LOVE

> "Picture Jesus Christ as the Good Shepherd who seeks the lost sheep, puts it on his shoulders and carries it back to the flock; since you take his place, consider yourself obliged to do the same."

Like Jesus, John Baptist de La Salle "had pity on the people (the children) without a shepherd" and from all appearances, left in the hands of mercenaries. This is, unfortunately, the case with the youth of Lebanon. Extremist ideologies pretend to offer salvation to man.

> "Having sacrificed his life for theirs, to make them good Christians and worthy sons of the Church, he asks nothing less from his brothers." (175th Meditation, 3rd point)

How many faces are brightened by the Brother's smile, his welcome, his attention, and his kindly word which is none other than the word of Jesus who speaks through his mouth. The respect and affection given to the child helps him to become more aware of his dignity as a younger brother of Jesus. This in no way affects the firmness required for a good Christian and human education. A boy who feels unloved will respond unwillingly to our approaches. Distrustful, he closes up and submits only under constraint. He "recognises the good shepherd" by his kindly manner, divines the noble motives which make him act and trusts him without complexes. On the other hand, he quickly unmasks the mercenary behind the most subtle disguises. The great test is love. He feels it and is not deceived. His confidences reveal much on this matter.

I am judged by the love which makes me worthy of his attention and admiration, in which case I become for him a bearer of the Good News and a model to imitate. I awaken in his heart a desire for truth and love, for openness and intimacy with Jesus Christ.

> "You have poor children to teach every day. Love them tenderly after the example of Jesus Christ". (111th Meditation, 2nd point)
> "The greater the tenderness you show for the members of Jesus Christ and of his Church, the more wonderful will be the effects of grace which God will produce in them."
> "The salvific action of God in their regard is expressed first and above all by the tenderness of his gratuitous love of which the Brother becomes for them the visible sacrament". (Announcing the Good News to the Poor, p. 327)

In the "Management of Schools" de La Salle recommends that "a new teacher should always have a joyful air, a calm expression and an outward appearance which suggests a solid character, full of kindness" (Management of Schools, Brother Anselme, p. 308). That is because in the eyes of the pupils the Brother is the ambassador of Jesus Christ, the one who writes his letter on the heart of the young. This noble mission demands a lot of patience and much tenderness.

> "You must consider the obligation you have to win their hearts as the principal means of getting them to live in a Christian manner." (111th Meditation, 3rd point)
> "Do you avail yourself of the affection the children have for you to attract them to God?" (101st Meditation, 3rd point)

DISCIPLES

A pupil becomes a disciple when he has formed a real bond of friendship with the Brother in whom he finds a model to imitate. He will have for him a loving respect which will lead him to seek his guidance in time of trouble or when he has a serious decision to make. The Brother, for his part, will direct his disciple to the one true Master, source of all tenderness. "Learn of Me because I am meek and humble of heart... Come to Me all you who labour and are heavy burdened and I will refresh you".

As a brilliant teacher the Brother may dazzle the pupil's mind, as an expert organiser he is not without influence on young people, but with a warm heart he has a deeper impact which lasts beyond school and influences the life of the person and his future relationships.

AT WHAT PRICE?

Such an attitude of kindness demands as much from me as it did from St. John Baptist de La Salle: a spirit of faith and zeal, self abnegation, the generous gift of myself. Far from being merely a question of temperament or a hobby, it involves my honesty, my authenticity, my fidelity and my consecration. It is not enough to know theoretically about the love of the Founder for young people, I must be in a position to draw that love, and the manner of speaking about it, at its source. I must employ the same means as he did: meditation, the Eucharist, Penance, interior life, living with young people in order to get to know them and allow them to discover through personal contact how much I am interested in them and how much I love them with a strong, pure love.

A witness only is credible; a witness to Someone who is not distant like a character from history, but who becomes present through my relations and reactions. I must be able to experience his presence within me and in the young person to whom I speak so that "it is no longer I who live but Christ who lives in me". "His Spirit alone can touch hearts". "He asks this miracle of me and helps me to perform it", according to St. John Baptist de La Salle.

THE COMMUNITY

The witness of kindness is also an obligation for the Community. My personal role retains all its importance but it can be neutralized. Serious, continuous and concerted action on the part of the Community is necessary to inspire in the young reflexes of confidence in each Brother. A warm homely atmosphere must be created in our educative communities. Is not this the only way to contribute to "the work of God" in the souls of the Lebanese boys who attend our schools?

EXPERIMENTS IN AWARENESS

With this end in view we undertook, three years ago, to sensitize our lay collaborators to the person of St. John Baptist de La Salle. Organized courses, extending over two years and illustrated by films and films strips etc. were attended by over two hundred of our lay teachers. To encourage their participation we paid them for the time involved. Several of them did not conceal their satisfaction at discovering a patron and father in their educative mission. In the schools certain relationships have shown a decided improvement as a result of these courses.

It is but a beginning and the first step of a very long journey.

ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE HERE AND NOW

FIRST, LET US FACE REALITY

The experience of St. J.B. de La Salle shows that before developing theories, regulations or programmes it is necessary to:

a) change our attitude as regards things and people: conversion;
b) examine reality to discover what God, who is there present, requires of us;
c) act conformably to these attitudes, that is to say, in "the spirit of faith".

The same invitation has been given to us in our own day by the Second Vatican Council, the Declaration on the Brother in the World Today and by the Latin-American bishops at their meeting in Puebla in 1979.

IN TODAY'S REALITY WE FIND GOD AND THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES

Our sub-continent is faced with countless problems. The situation is all the more distressing as it concerns a supposedly Christian sub-continent with a large Catholic majority.

Among the most pressing problems we must underline:

1) those pertaining to the biological needs of people: drinking water, physical health, food, work, housing and clothing;
2) social needs: family life, solidarity, sharing cultural advantages;
3) spiritual needs: strengthening of religious practice, improvement and intensification of evangelization and of catechesis;
4) cultural needs: a higher cultural level, preservation and development of local cultures, creation and development of new and better social attitudes, of better patterns of social behaviour, institutions for the safeguarding of our cultural heritage, more advanced scientific and technological research;
5) the conception and realization of an integrated social system which could create a future more just and more worthy of human beings;
6) the crying need for education (more than 30% of the population are illiterate) and the pressing demand of the people for the recognition of and respect for their human dignity.

All these needs combine to create among the people of the sub-continent a tendency towards a general attitude of fatalistic submission, or lead to ever increasing explosions of irrational physical violence.

On the other hand, due to present-day international interdependence, we are subjected to the impact of technologically more advanced civilizations. This impact is intensified by the rapid growth of cities and the development of the mass media. It is evident in a new disintegration of our cultural identity, a growing tendancy to imitate Herod and the diffusion of ideologies such as the capitalistic consumer society or the military totalitarianism of left and right. Side by side with these ideologies we see the spread of laicism and nihilism. The result is the increasing number of people who are indifferent to religion or who become adherents of non-Catholic groups or join esoteric sects.

THE TEACHING OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE, HERE AND NOW

Axiology teaches us that one of the dimensions of "value" consists in answering a physical, psychological, spiritual or social need. In order, therefore, that a value system of principles and criteria (Lasallian thought, for example) may not remain at the level of theoretical speculation it must answer real needs and give to the existence of individuals and of groups a greater significance than that offered by alternative systems.

It seems to me that such is the case with the teaching of John Baptist de La Salle as regards our sub-continent. Let us examine it more closely:

1) Preferential Option In Favour Of The Poor. The teaching of de La Salle was confirmed in Latin America by the pastoral decision of the bishops of the Latin American Episcopal Conference who urged us at all times and on every occasion to make an option in favour of the poor. Such an option has all the connotations that the concept has held in Lasallian thinking from the beginning and which was directed in the first place towards, bio-psychological needs, but also towards those of a socio-cultural and spiritual nature.

In this field we still lack many Lasallians genuinely involved at every level and in every position in society.

2) Education. This task is a priority for us in the case of children (as in the time of St. J.B. de La Salle) but also in the case of other age groups. The Latin American bishops also urged us to make a preferential option in favour of the young.

That is why we consider the prophetic role of education, characteristic of our Institute, particularly important and necessary in our sub-continent.

I would go farther and say that education must be expanded to reach more sectors of the population, even those at the highest level.

We think that every Lasallian, whatever his condition, should educate himself in order to educate others, and that we must, like St. J.B. de La Salle, begin by educating the educators themselves.

3) Complete Development of the Human Person. The basic aim of education is the development of the human person in all his dignity.

Catholic education aims to educate the whole person in the transcendent light of Christ's teaching. The Lasallian concept aims at the complete development of the person from a view point, at once theological and pedagogical. This concept was formulated especially in the Meditations for the Time of Retreat.

The teaching of St. J-B. de La Salle gives us a perspective which is perfectly adapted to a real respect for and a true development of the human person. In effect, a thorough understanding of de La Salle's teaching leads to the creation of conditions which make for a personalized education which helps the person to grow and develop, and in which the individual takes responsibility for his personal development as well as for that of the society in which history has placed him.

4) Fraternity as an Effective Means of Communion and Participation. Extreme attitudes of subservience or violence cannot be eliminated from society unless there is a real possibility of participation and solidarity amongst all classes. Such a climate is a necessary condition for mutual recognition of the personal dignity of each one and of the greatness and weaknesses inherent in the human condition. Such recognition is, in turn, the basis of mutual understanding and the human foundation for true brotherhood.

What is more, Christian brotherhood, which makes us all equal as children of God and unites us in his love, does away with servile submission as well as with irrational violence.

5) The View-point of Faith. To see things in the light of faith gives a greater dimension to human and temporal values both for the welfare of man and of society. The viewpoint of faith, an essential point in Lasallian teaching, gives to our option in favour of the poor, in favour of education, of the human person and of brotherhood, a content, a value, a dynamism and an appeal which are truly supernatural. Understood thus, the viewpoint of faith becomes essential if we are to face with hope our situation at this moment in our history.

The teaching of St. J.B. de La Salle, therefore, provides, here and now, a real answer to the sufferings and hopes of the Latin American people. If it is not effective it is not because it lacks power to transform, power which it has in abundance, but because the men are wanting who could incarnate it and apply it with decision, integrity and fidelity.

THE BROTHERS' COMMITMENT TO THE POOR OF HAITI

CONDITIONS IN THE COUNTRY

— Though it has a climate that could easily make of it an earthly paradise, Haiti is one of the poorest countries in the world.

— The population is 83% rural. In the towns 80% of the people live in a state of destitution or near destitution. In rural areas the situation is even more deplorable. 94% of the people live in conditions unfit for human beings.

— The state of health of the people is among the worst in the world. Infant mortality is as high as 150 per 1,000 births compared to Haiti's two neighbours: the Dominican Republic with 43 per 1,000 and Jamaica with 22 per 1,000. 60% of the people suffer from malnutrition.

— An estimated 85% of the population are illiterate. In the towns 89% of children of school-going age get some education but in rural areas only 26% go to school. 50% of children in the towns finish primary school whereas only 4% reach that stage in rural areas. Children are taught through the medium of French but in recent years there is a movement to introduce Creole into the schools.

The country is mountainous with only one seventh of the land suitable for cultivation. Wealthy townspeople own the fertile valleys while the peasants are forced to eke out a living in the barren mountainous areas. At the economic level things are no better. Industry is concentrated in the towns (90% of it in Port-au-Prince). Only two thirds of the rural population earn more than $40 a year while about 3,000 families in Port-au-Prince have an income exceeding $100,000 a year.

SOME HISTORIC LANDMARKS

1974: The first Brother arrives on l'Ile de la Tortue. He can expect no reinforcements from Montréal since the novitiate was closed in 1969. Soon he is given charge of the school of the Palmists. In the Autumn, however, two Brothers come to his aid, one from Guadaloupe and one from the Cameroons.

1976: After an unsuccessful attempt in the north east two Brothers begin work in Fatima, a poor quarter of Port-au-Prince.

1977: The Brothers are asked to take over St. Joseph's school from the Brothers of Christian Doctrine of Ploërmel who are leaving Port-au-Prince.

1978: Two new Brothers replace the Brothers of Christian Doctrine in Saint Louis du Nord.

1980: The de Montfort Fathers ask the Brothers to take over the secondary school which serves as a junior seminary.

1982: Two Brothers form a community together with two young teachers who express a wish to become Brothers. This is the beginning of a formation centre.

1984: Next September will see the opening of a novitiate with three novices: two Haitians and a Canadian. Three postulants and seven aspirants, who live in, together with fifteen aspirants who live at home, are preparing to enter the novitiate.

Balance sheet. After ten years there are twenty Brothers, six communities and a promising intake of recruits.

"GO FORTH FROM THE LAND OF YOUR KINSFOLK AND FROM YOUR FATHER'S HOUSE TO A LAND THAT I WILL SHOW YOU" (Gen. 12,1)

Brothers heard that call of God. They left home at an age when most people are thinking of retirement or of a less exacting occupation. They gave up a life which was, perhaps, too easy, well paid posts and comfortable security, to go to a country which, from the material point of view, is among the most deprived on the face of the earth. They heard, more or less clearly, the cry of a people, "poor, afflicted and oppressed" (Dt. 26,7). They left a country where for years the Brothers have been questioning their identity and their mission for a land where the situation is similar to that experienced by St. John Baptist de La Salle in Rheims or Paris and which caused him to write, "The working class and the poor being usually occupied all day in gaining a livelihood for themselves and their families cannot give their children the needed instruction nor a suitable Christian education". (Common Rule and Constitutions of the Brothers of the Christian Schools)

In the social conditions described above we can easily understand how the Brothers rediscovered their identity and their sense of mission in all its actuality. "All disorders, especially among the working class and the poor, usually arise from their having been, in childhood, left to themselves and badly brought up. It is almost impossible to repair this evil at a more advanced age because the bad habits they have acquired are overcome only with great difficulty, and scarcely ever entirely..." (Ibid, 1,6).

In such circumstances, political and economic solutions seem doomed to failure as long as the exploitation of others remains engraved on the hearts of Haitians. Real change, whether political, economic or social can only be brought about through a change of heart. As long as Haitians fail to recognise one another as a brother to be loved and helped rather than as somebody to be used to one's own advantage, then all reforms are worthless.

The principal reason for the Brothers' presence in Haiti is, "to give a Christian education to children by instructing them in the mysteries of our holy religion and by inspiring them with Christian maxims".

"ONE COMMITMENT LED TO ANOTHER WITHOUT MY HAVING FORESEEN IT FROM THE BEGINNING" (Blain I, 169)

That is how the Institute began in France. That is how it began in Haiti. A series of circumstances led the Brothers to commit themselves beyond what they had envisaged and, perhaps, beyond the dictates of prudence. As in the case of St. J.B. de La Salle, "God who orders all things with wisdom and sweetness and who does not compel the will of man, did it gradually and imperceptibly". (Ibid.)

In spite of initial hesitations, in spite of misgivings each time a new initiative was considered, the Lord guided the Brothers "suaviter ac fortiter" in the path He wished them to follow. Primary schools, literacy centres, co-operatives and a trade school were all undertakings forced on the Brothers by the circumstances in which they found themselves.

When the first stage was completed there remained the question of priorities. These have now been established. The first priority is the formation of teachers to provide for children and adolescents educators sufficiently committed to their mission to resist the attraction of large centres or foreign countries. With this in view great attention is paid to the pastoral ministry of vocations in order to provide a future nucleus of young men who are prepared to dedicate their lives to the service of the Lord by helping their brothers to escape from the modern forms of slavery which oppress them.

As there is a great need for evangelization of the young we are trying to establish a "Faith School" where, besides strengthening their own faith, young and not so young people will commit themselves to the work of catechesis in the different schools of the towns.

If the Brothers wish to work for the very poorest they must, without abandoning it completely, move away from the well-beaten track of academic education to devote the greater part of their energy and resources to starting trade centres for training in simple trades which young people can practise in their own locality or which will help them find work in production centres.

The Brothers hope that the future Haitian Brothers will be able to gather round them other teachers with whom they can share their ideal of educative service of the poor in schools which draw their inspiration from living Lasallian tradition.

If the Canadian Brothers can call forth and form a first generation of Haitian Lasallians then their stay in Haiti, however short, will not have been in vain.

MIGUEL FEBRES CORDERO, TODAY

Some may think that a saint from the last century is a museum piece or a useful instrument for maintaining an unjust and oppressive status quo. The holy Brother Miguel Febres Cordero has nothing in common with such a picturesque but misleading caricature.

From 1854 when he first saw the light in the Andean city of Cuenca, Ecuador, to 9th February, 1910, when his soul sought the peaceful abode of the Father of all men, one could say that, lovingly and tirelessly, he built up "a personality of extraordinary unity and coherence. This, in fact, is what characterises the saints more than anything else."

This unity is the antithesis of diversity. It forms a single texture, a vital synthesis. "How", asks Brother Miguel, "can you call 'Life' an existence without the love of God?" That is how he proposed to live and that is how he experienced the full human development which requires that we identify with people of flesh and blood. He expressed his thought clearly: "Jesus called himself the Son of Man and so identified himself with all humanity that He considered as done to himself the good or evil done to men. 'Whoever receives one such child in my Name receives Me'."

His life found its unity by centering itself on the existential love of God for mankind; the love of the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of the Amerindian. What is striking in Brother Miguel is his fundamental coherence: he lived what he believed and loved to do so. The living God, Father of all men, came to meet him. Miguel accepted the challenge:

> "Since you want me for yourself alone
> I give myself to you without reserve".

He lived the demanding experience of the God of nations and took mankind seriously. Nothing remained for him but to devote himself indefatigably to spreading the Kingdom among men. His intellectual interests, the appealing work of catechesis and the daily grind of teaching, even for an expert educator, all formed part of his religious sense of existence.

It cannot be denied that the strong personality of Miguel speaks to the Latin-American of today. He made a notable contribution to the strengthening of national sentiment in Ecuador. He was interested in the rich tradition of the people and played an effective role in developing our literary culture. He appreciated the value of certain forms of speech of our people and defended them on grounds of semantics and philology as well as by appeals to common sense. He wrote popular songs which contained plenty of sentiment but also expressed with impeccable style deep spiritual concepts.

The Latin-American Church has opted for the poor. Miguel was happy in the midst of children, many of whom were poor. It was the latter that he preferred. On the occasion of a First Communion ceremony he noted, "Many of the children are poor but on this day their hearts are of gold". His example spoke eloquently of his respect for the humble. It was a factor in mutual understanding and encouraged reciprocal service and a closing of the ranks against egotism. He zealously cultivated human solidarity.

As a plant seeks the light so Miguel sought the truth and defended it with firmness in spite of his natural reserve and childlike humility. In the face of danger this frail Brother showed none of the fear experienced by others and demonstrated the courage and sang froid of the man who has learned self control and has unshakeable confidence in God. This was the case in Quito during the Liberal Revolution of 1895 and during the tragic week in Barcelona in 1909.

Miguel lived and worked within a social, cultural and religious structure derived from the colonial system and the Council of Trent. One cannot, therefore, expect from him post-conciliary theories and attitudes. The Theology of Revolution and Liberation Theology had not yet appeared nor had jet planes and modern information systems. It is clear, nevertheless, that his critical mind and creative personality did not stick rigidly to the path of routine.

An insatiable desire for change and renewal drove him to strive for a total and permanent conversion which would liberate him from the idols and oppressive structures which are the consequences of sin. His intimate and private life reveals this much more than his community and social life, limited as it was by the conventions of the time in which he lived. The saints have all endured such limitations. In spite of them the basic orientation of his life is a constant invitation to surmount such limitations.

Far from allowing himself to become alienated, he never fled from reality whether in Quito or in Europe. With love he contributed his share of hard work and personal influence to the construction of a world less unjust and more human. He perfected the educational system, wrote school text books which were of real value and inspired by love of country and opened the way to new educational thinking amongst us.

He was an effective force in the cause of democratization and devoted himself with intelligence, wisdom and a sense of responsibility to the causes considered just in the context of his time. His love for his country led him to struggle day after day for its greatness and prosperity.

Son of America, he was by that very fact a son of Mary. Brother Miguel is no museum piece. For every Amerindian he is a living encouragement in the daily struggle for improvement.

His motto could well have been. "Excelsior! Always higher! Always farther! For God and for Mary in the midst of my people!"

FOREWORD

This number begins with a reminder that this is International Youth Year and with an appeal to make it a year of special activity in the service of the children, adolescents and young people for whom we work.

This appeal is, of course, not really necessary because you, readers of Lasalliana, are already well aware of the event. It seems to me, however, that we cannot pay too much attention to it.

There are many ways of serving the educational interests of the young as is shown by Lasallian activities throughout the world. The first four numbers of Lasalliana helped to give some idea of the diversity of these activities.

In this number also you will find examples of the creativity and commitment of Lasallian communities (Brothers and lay people) in the five continents:

* In Africa: articles on implantation of the Lasallian Community and on the College of Tounouma.
* In America: an article from a lady teacher in Argentina.
* In Australia: Beaudesert Boys' Town and the apostolate among the Vietnamese refugees in Australia.
* In Europe: The Brothers' work among the poor and the marginalized in France and Belgium.

These are only a few examples from among many.

Together with the description of activities which are signs of vitality there are also articles for reflection which carry over from one number to the next:

* on the aims of our commitments to the young. There are, for example, the leaflets on the "Lasallian School" and the Signum Fidei movement.
* on the meaning of the activities undertaken: You will find the first two leaflets of a short series devoted to the "Lasallian Educative Ministry" and to the "Lasallian Leader".
* on the common element in the original inspiration which we find in the thought, the action, the spirituality and in the writings of St. John Baptist de La Salle. As always, the first leaflets are a recall to this inspiration.

If the classification of the leaflets and their division under the different headings of Lasalliana appear rather artificial it is interesting to note that from one issue to the next you find:

— a striving for fidelity to the initial charism, — reflection on the quality and authenticity of the experience lived,
— renewed attention to the condition and needs of young people.

These few considerations seem to me to be particularly appropriate at the beginning of the International Youth Year.

THE KNOWN MANUSCRIPTS OF SAINT JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE (3)

(C) DOCUMENTS WRITTEN BY THE SAINT BUT NOT SIGNED

The third category in the classification of our Founder's known manuscripts which we have proposed for this outline survey, comprises eight documents written throughout by him but not bearing his signature. Five of these are held in AMG, and of these the most important is the document known as the Memoir on the Habit - an apologia he wrote in defence of the distinctive garb the early Brothers had adopted when critics, notably M. Baudrand, parish priest of Saint-Sulpice, wished him to change it in favour of normal clerical dress. The manuscript is self-evidently the Founder's draft (with numerous corrections and alterations) of what presumably in its final form was presented (signed, no doubt) to M. Baudrand; unfortunately, this fair copy has not come down to us. Brother Maurice Hermans has discussed in CL 11 the importance of the draft we possess, assessing it as more than an exposition of the reasons in favour of retaining the habit as it was: it was also "a judicious reminder of the conditions of the Community's existence and of the status to which it believed itself able to aspire".

The first historian of the Institute to give due treatment to this important document was Frère Lucard in 1882, and since then it has been published in full four times: by Jean Guibert in his Histoire de St. Jean Baptiste de La Salle, published in celebration of the Saint's canonisation in 1900; by Georges Rigault in Tome I of his nine-volume Histoire Générale of the Institute (1937); by Brother Clair Battersby, who included it (in the original French as well as in his English translation of it) in his 1952 volume De La Salle: Letters and Documents; and by Brother Maurice Hermans who presented it as the first of his pièces justificatives in his doctoral thesis L'Institut des Frères des Écoles Chrétiennes à la recherche de son statut canonique: des origines (1679) à la bulle de Benoît XIII (1725), published in 1962 as No. 11 in the Cahiers Lasalliens series. The Memoir has not so far been published in facsimile, though Brother Léon de Marie Aroz has included a photograph of its first page (there are eight in all, the eighth containing only a few lines) in CL 40 Vol. 1. Bro. Maurice has promised (in CL 11) a facsimile reproduction of the whole text in a volume of the Cahiers in preparation. (Readers of LASALLIANA will have perused with interest Bro. Maurice's paper on the Memoir in the last issue, 04-A-20).

Another unsigned manuscipt in the Founder's hand, preserved in AMG, is a single, undated page traditionally referred to as a "preface to the Collection of Different Short Treatises", though, in fact, it did not appear in any of the known twenty-two editions of the Collection (since it had not appeared in the princeps of 1711) until the penultimate one of 1932. The mention in this brief text of "a small volume" and "this little book" no doubt led to its traditional identification, but Bro. Maurice Hermans, who published the text in CL 15, has there convincingly argued that the original destination of the two paragraphs, "at once doctrinal and exhortative", which make up the "preface", was either to introduce the book of Rules as a whole or, "more probably", to serve as an exordium to Chapter II of the Rules, "On the Spirit of this Institute". If the latter, it was discarded in favour of the "solemn and vigorous" introduction which made its appearance in the Founder's 1718 revision of the Rules and was maintained, textually unchanged, down to the final of the thirteen known published editions of the Rules, that of 1947 (Cf. CL 25).

The remaining three AMG pieces in this category are merely transcripts of brief texts, not composed by the Saint. Two of them provide the earliest known example of the Founder's handwriting (apart from three mere signatures). Both are dated 27th July 1671 (when he was just turned 20) and are transcriptions of the recognised Latin formulas then in use to testify to a student's "assiduity" in attending his theology courses at the Sorbonne on (in the present two cases) the Incarnation and the Blessed Trinity. Presumably students could prepare their own certificates in this way to save the time of their tutors, who simply validated them by appending their signatures (though John Baptist had already, the previous year, received similar testimonials of assiduity at the University of Rheims, written throughout and signed by two of his professors there, Michel de Blanzy and the Irish Dean of the Faculty, Daniel Egan). The third piece is a translation into French of the permission in Latin given to the Founder by the Archbishop of Paris, Louis Antoine de Noailles, for the celebration of Mass in the chapel of the novitiate at Vaugirard; it is dated 27 March 1697. The presence of such manuscripts as these last three in the central Archives of the Institute illustrates the appositeness of the remarks with which Bro. Aroz introduced his outline history of the Generalate Archives in CL 40 Vol. II: "The Archives of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools trace their origin to the foundation period of the Institute. It is possible, indeed, to affirm, quite objectively, that it was the Founder himself who gave them their start...".

The three written but unsigned manuscripts of the Founder not held by AMG are all in the Rheims Municipal Archives. They were discovered there by Bro. Aroz who published them in facsimile and in transcription, with notes, in CL 38: all three, in fact, relate to M. de La Salle's period as executor of Nicolas Roland's will. Two of the pieces, dated 30 March 1679 and 24 August 1680, are forms of contract leasing two properties belonging to Roland's Sisters of the Holy Child Jesus. The legally worded document, written (because presumably composed) by M. de La Salle, bear the signatures only of the respective lessees. The third document is a financial evaluation of the Sisters' properties, drawn up in August 1679 at a preparatory stage of the signed inventory of all their goods compiled and completed by October of the same year (cf. LASALLIANA 04-A-21).

(D) ADDITIONS TO EXISTING DOCUMENTS

7 manuscripts are known, not written by the Founder but bearing additions in his hand; five of these are held in AMG and three of them also carry his signature, as do the other two documents held elsewhere.

A passing reference has already been made (cf. 04-A-21) to one of the AMG pieces, the Formula of Vows transcribed (from the Founder's master text) by Frère Michel-Barthélemy Jacquinot and completed by M. de La Salle with the insertion of his full name in the text and the addition of the concluding words: "... all my life, in testimony of which I have signed, done at Vaugirard this sixth day of June, feast day of the Most Blessed Trinity, of the year sixteen ninety four. De La Salle".

Among the other formulas of vows bound into the same booklet as this one of the Founder are those of two disciples who pronunced their vows later than the original twelve, Frère Paul (Pierre Raimbault) and Frère Grégoire (François Cortier): both of these pages have brief additions (unsigned, but unmistakably in the Founder's hand) recording the dates of the deaths of the two Brothers, 29th October 1695 and 29th July 1700 respectively.

The letter of authority, dated 4 December 1716, which Frère Barthélemy carried with him when he made his tour of all the houses in view of the forthcoming general assembly of 1717, carries this addition of the Founder, with his signature: "I am in agreement with what the Brothers have resolved above, and with the day, month and year there indicated". And the remaining AMG manuscript in this group provides us with the chronologically latest known writing of the Saint, being dated 17 February 1719, less than two months, therefore, before his death. It is a signed statement added to a transcript by F. Barthélemy of the Founder's document of 11 August 1718, already referred to in category (B) (cf. 04-A-21), ceding possession of his library to his successor. The brief addition merely authenticates Barthélemy's copy.

To the present category belongs one of the most striking of the discoveries of Lasallian documentation which we owe to the researches of Bro. Léon de Marie Aroz. The Founder's 1676 Report of the Guardianship, found by him in the Archives départementales de la Marne (dépôt annexe de Reims) on 24 September 1964 ("a lucky day for the researcher!" comments Aroz) and published in 1967 in four successive volumes (28-31) of the Cahiers Lasalliens, series, comprises 460 pages. The Report is presented in the stylised handwriting of a professional scribe, but Bro. Aroz has identified fifty-four pages on which corrections or marginal comments have been made by M. de La Salle personally (proof, observes Aroz, that he had "read, re-read, completed, corrected" the pages of the report before submitting them). His signature appears only once, namely on the penultimate page.

Finally, there exists another fairly extensive legal document of twelve pages, a report of financial transactions made by a certain Edme Lapinte on behalf of two sisters, Agatha and Marie Blondel, both members of Nicolas Roland's community. The date of this document, 16 September 1678, shows that it was drawn up within the period of M. de La Salle's executorship of Roland's will (dated 23 April 1678). Hence it is not surprising to find substantial marginal annotations in the Founder's handwriting on five pages of the report, together with a concluding signed statement that the report had been duly drawn up in his presence. The document is published in CL 38, in facsimile and transcription with notes by Br. Aroz.

(E) SIGNATURES ONLY

Our final category consists of 27 documents bearing the signature of the Founder, but nothing more in his hand. Four of these are in AMG and, of the other twenty-three, eleven are in Paris (National Archives), eleven in Rheims (six in the municipal archives, four in the annexe of the Marne departmental archives, and one in private ownership) and one in Rouen (Seine-Maritime Archives). This and much other information about the documents concerned is conveniently available in CL 41, Vol. I, since the author, Brother Aroz, had the happy idea of appending to that work a chronological inventory of all the 99 known signatures of the Saint (97 of them on original documents, the other 2 on facsimile copies). He was prompted to do this, he tells us, by questions frequently put to him by "people eager to know even the least details of the particular circumstances of the Founder's life". The inventory is introduced with a two-page descriptive analysis of the evolving characteristics of the signatures at the successive stages of the Founder's life, and then a detailed description is given of each of the ninety-nine signatures, from the boyish, painstakingly-written "Jean baptiste dela Salle", appended to the baptismal certificate of his brother Pierre for whom John Baptist, then 15 year old, was godfather, to the final "De La Salle" of the 68 year-old Founder, referred to above.

Introducing his list, Bro. Aroz disclaims any intention of offering in his commentary a graphological interpretation of the signatures. But it may be mentioned, as a matter of interest, that a graphological analysis of the Founder's handwriting was, in fact, published in 1952 in an Italian work entitled I Santi dalla Scrittura. The author, Girolamo Moretti, a Franciscan priest and expert graphologist (his text book, Treatise of Graphology, had reached its 7th edition by 1952) presents an analytical commentary of a specimen page of manuscript of each of fifty-eight saints. The author was aware that the handwriting put before him was in every case that of a canonised saint, but the identity of the saint was not made known to him. The book reproduces each specimen passage in facsimile (that of our Founder comes from a 1706 letter to Brother Hubert) and each is followed by a study of the writer's psychology as evidenced simply by the handwriting shown. It is an interesting exercise, to say the least, to weigh what graphology has to say about the temperament and character of M. de La Salle against what one knows of him from his life and writings.

REFERENCE LIST OF QUOTATIONS

contained in the writings attributed to St. John Baptist de La Salle

The Lasallian Studies Centre received, last March, a work entitled "Reference List of Quotations in the Writings attributed to St. John Baptist de La Salle". The author of this work writes the following brief introduction:

Research on the passages containing a quotation has been carried out for all the writings of St. John Baptist de La Salle with a view to publication in the Cahiers Lasalliens. The exception is the "Exercises of Piety performed during the day in the Christian Schools". Those researched are: The Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer, the Meditations, the Collection of Short Treatises, Instructions and Prayers, the Rules of Good Manners and Christian Politeness, the different manuals on the Duties of a Christian, the Management of Christian Schools and the Rules of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

For each of the writings studied the work gives, in the left hand column, the quotation and in the right hand column, the reference with indications as to where to find it. For quotations from Holy Scripture the reference gives only the name of the sacred book with chapter and verse. (Jerusalem Bible). For non-biblical quotations (the Fathers of the Church and different authors) the text is given with the reference at least when this is possible. It is given in the original (Greek or Latin) because this is what the editions used have done and also to avoid being drawn into problems of translation.

At the end of the work a thirty page table has been drawn up of the works and authors cited with corresponding indications for the writings of St. John Baptist de La Salle, of the page and line where the quotation appears. A four page table for recapitulation gives the numbers of the references according to the works and authors cited and according to the writings of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

Research has been facilitated by the works (or editions of the Meditations) of Brothers Luis Varela, Brother Anselmo A Balocco, Brother Michel Sauvage and Brother Miguel Campos. However, these works deal only with some of the writings of de La Salle and are interested only in quotations from Sacred Scripture, especially those from the New Testament. The present work deals with all the writings of de La Salle and includes all the authors cited by him.

The method employed to find the references of quotations not given in the writings studied (these are the more numerous) was to have recourse, for Holy Scripture, to the tables which indicate where a given passage can be found from the principal words it contains. For the Fathers of the Church I used the indices at the end of Migne's volumes on Latin and Greek patrology. For the other authors I used manuals of bibliography and library files.

A certain number of quotations from the Fathers of the Church and other authors are almost identical with the texts from which they were taken. But many others are only approximate. It often happens that the quotation is not clearly evident in the sentence and that the author's text is often modified... This was common practice in 17th and 18th centuries. The notion of literary ownership and copyright was practically unknown. Writers had little scruple about using other writers' ideas or incorporating them in their own thought while modifying their expression. We have now become more respectful of literary creation and more demanding as to the manner of borrowing from the texts of others.

I had to search a long time to find the quotation of St. Jerome in the Meditation for the First Sunday of Advent (MD 6,21), permeated as it is by fear of God's judgement. "He (St. Jerome) says also that being, as he was, completely covered in sin he hid day and night for fear that he might be told, 'Jerome, come forth', and that he might be made to pay the last farthing". Eventually the following text was found in the letter to Florentius (P.L. 22, 336) "Ego cunctis peccatorum sordibus inquinatus, diebus ac noctibus opperior cum tremore reddere novissimum quadrantem. Sed tamen qui Dominus solvit compeditos et super humilem et timentem verba sua requiescit, forsitan mihi in sepulchro jacenti dicat: Hieronyme, veni foras". (As for me, stained by all the filth of sin, I await trembling night and day to pay the last farthing. However, since the Lord looses those who are bound and lets his Word rest on the one who is humble and who trembles, it may be that He will say to me who lie in the grave of my crimes, "Jerome, come forth" — a reference to the resurrection of Lazarus (John 11, 42 - 44 - You can see that the meaning is different in the text of the patrology from that in the Meditation. The person who has recourse to quotations sometimes does so from necessity but often also to embellish his discourse, to illustrate it by pious examples which give it force or make it more agreeable. This, however, is a danger — orators and writers often fall into the the trap of forcing an example or misusing a text to give weight to their own arguments.

It is not possible to deal in a few lines with a work of six hundred pages involving more than five thousand references.

Among the writings of St. John Baptist de La Salle, the one least burdened with quotations is the Management of Schools, but the historians tell us that this work is above all the fruit of the reflections of the Founder and of the most experienced and responsible Brothers in the Institute.

Quotations from Holy Scripture are by far the most numerous. The catechesis expounded in the Duties of a Christian is founded on the Gospel. The spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle in the Meditations is inspired mainly by the Gospels and the teaching of St. Paul in his epistles. The Rules of Good Manners and Christian Politeness make more than fifty references to Ecclesiasticus or the Book of Ben Sira the Wise: "The wisdom taught by Ben Sira comes from the Lord. Its principle is the fear of the Lord, it forms youth and brings happiness". (Introduction to the Book of Ecclesiasticus in the Jerusalem Bible).

More than seven hundred references are made to the Fathers of the Church and other writers (56 names counted). The Fathers most quoted are: St. Augustine (129 times), St Chrysostom (59), St. Ambrose (31), Tertullian (28), St. Jerome (27), St. Bernard (27), St. Cyprian (14), St. Thomas Aquinas (14), St. Cyril of Jerusalem (11), St. Gregory, Pope (11). We must also take into account the place given to Conciliar declarations, particularly those of the Council of Trent (168 quotations), often textual, especially in the Duties of a Christian.

In view of the numerous quotations from Holy Scripture and from ecclesiastical writers a question springs naturally to mind: What kind of formation was given to the Brothers to enable them to use them? The historians of St. John Baptist de La Salle tell us that many of the young men who sought admission to the Institute were uneducated and that the first preoccupation of the Founder was to give the Brothers the kind of formation that their state and their work required.

Some will ask themselves what is original in writings where borrowed elements, so to speak, fill almost every page. Such a question would have astonished de La Salle himself. "Nowhere does he try for complete originality" writes G. Rigault (History of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. T. 1. p. 446). His main preoccupation is the Christian education of children and the formation of those in charge of them. He wishes to provide the teachers with the work tools they need for their own spiritual culture and for carrying on their work. If he finds works treating of subjects which interest him he borrows without scruple, as was the custom of his day. Besides, it is only when you are content to juxtapose borrowed material that you show lack of originality— St. John Baptist de La Salle quotes or borrows following a train of thought which guides him throughout a page or a Chapter. His ardent soul is often revealed in the kind of questions he so frequently asks the Brothers in the Meditations, or in the stringent conclusions he is forced to by a reflection inspired by a text taken from the Gospel or from an epistle of St. Paul, a page from St. Augustine or St. Chrysostom.

The work presented above is far from being complete or perfect. All the references have not been found. Others are merely approximate. The work undertaken was wideranging and to complete it a considerable number of books had to be consulted. Others, perhaps, will take it as a starting point for further research, more precise and more effective.

THE MEDITATIONS FOR THE TIME OF RETREAT AND THE DIRECTED RETREAT (1)

This is the first of two articles on the suitability of the Meditations for the time of Retreat for use in a directed retreat. To facilitate treatment of the subject I will divide the material into three sections: the place of retreats in the early history of the Institute; a brief discussion on the nature of spiritual direction and the directed retreat; the use of the Meditations for the time of Retreat in the directed retreat. In this first article I will discuss the first two elements listed above and in the next issue of LASALLIANA the third and concluding aspect of the subject.

RETREATS: LASALLIAN TRADITION

The retreat has always held a revered place in the spirituality of Saint John Baptist De La Salle and consequently should hold a special place in the spirituality of the Brothers. Many of the great decisions affecting our foundation and ongoing development have been made in the context of a retreat. As early as 1681 De La Salle began to make an annual retreat with the teachers, using his own home as the place. From these retreats came the formation that resulted in the teachers becoming the first Brothers. The retreat of Ascension Thursday to Trinity Sunday 1686, culminated in the pronouncement of the vow of obedience for the first time. Retreats were important enough for De La Salle to purchase the property of Vaugirard for this purpose. Removed from the urban center the Brothers could devote themselves to needed rest, relaxation and prayerful reflection. The first of the ten day retreats to be held at Vaugirard took place from October 8-18, 1691. The importance of the retreat of May 30 - June 6, 1694 cannot de overemphasized, from it came the first draft of the common rule and the first perpetual vows pronounced in the Institute by De La Salle and the twelve principal Brothers. The content of these early retreats and their result seem to indicate that the Brothers came together to seek the presence of God and to discern how best they could respond to what God was asking of them.

The personal experience of De La Salle was also marked by the importance of retreat. We know that he was very faithful to the annual retreat as well as seeking other times for extended prayer. De La Salle made a retreat of thirty days with the Carmelites in 1706. During his personal crisis about 1713 he also made a retreat of forty days at the monastery of Saint Baume and spent extended days of prayer on the Mountain at Parmenie.

Noteworthy also is the importance De La Salle gives to retreats in his writings, especially the Meditations for the Time of Retreat. Besides this spiritual classic, the Collection also contains an extended section detailing material to be prayed over during the annual retreat. In the Rule of 1705 part of chapter thirty-six (articles 11 - 21) is devoted to the annual retreat. De La Salle encourages the Brothers to pray with the Scripture and on the duties of the school. He indicates that the morning spiritual reading on each successive day of the retreat is to come from the Gospel of Matthew chapters five, six and seven followed by the Gospel of John, chapters thirteen to seventeen. He seems to suggest that the morning mental prayer should be made on these chapters and says very definitely, that all mental prayer after noon is to be made on the duties of the school. De La Salle sees the retreat as a time of extended prayer in which the Brothers are invited to consider the quality of their apostolic life in the two-fold context of Scripture and the duties of educational service.

In both the writings of De La Salle and the practices of the early Institute the Brothers are invited to come together to discover how God is present among them and how they are responding to what God is asking of them. Both the writings and the practices reflect the three constant elements in any authentic expression of a Christian spirituality: a desire for God centered in Christ; a willingness to live a life of ongoing conversion; and a life-style marked by simplicity and prayer based on the maxims of the Gospel.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

All of this is well summarized in a letter of De La Salle to Brother Barthelemy written toward the end of the Founder's life: "It seems to me that what I desire in prayer is that God make known to me what he wants of me and that he put me in the dispositions he would like me to have".

SPIRITUAL DIRECTION IN THE CONTEXT OF A DIRECTED RETREAT

Spiritual direction is concerned with directly helping a person with his/her relationship with God. The person is helped not so much to understand the relationship better, but to engage in it, to enter into dialogue with God. Spiritual direction focuses on what happens when a person listens and responds to a self-communicating God. Perhaps an illustration from Scripture will be helpful. In the first chapter of the Gospel of John is the marvelous story where the disciples of John meet Jesus for the first time (John 1:35-39). John is talking with several of his disciples when Jesus appears on the scene. John immediately recognizes Jesus and points him out to his disciples with the words, "Look! There is the Lamb of God!" In this instance John functions as a spiritual director by helping his disciples to recognize Jesus in their midst. As Jesus leaves the scene, two of John's disciples leave John and follow Jesus. Down the road a bit, Jesus turns to these two disciples and ask, "What are you looking for?" Notice the question is one of desire, one of life. The two disciples respond with a question, "Teacher, where do you live?" Also a question full of life. Then Jesus invites them into relationship with him, "Come and see". So they went and spent time with him talking about, no doubt, their life experiences. This is what spiritual direction is about. One person helping another person to recognize how God is present in his/her life and to follow him. We can define spiritual direction then as help given by one Christian to another which enables that person to pay attention to God's personal communication to him/her and to respond to this personally communicating God. To help another grow in intimacy with God and to live out the consequences of this relationship. The focus in spiritual direction is on experience, and specifically, on religious experience, i.e., any experience of that other person we call God. Moreover this experience is viewed not as an isolated incident but as an expression of an ongoing personal relationship God has established with each one of us. Relationships develop when the persons involved pay attention to one another. We make an assumption based on Christian tradition that God is always faithful to his part in the relationship; that God is always paying attention to the other person.

It is important to make a few clarifications here. Spiritual direction is an act of accompanying another person; a walking with another person. It is not telling another person what to do, or imposing in any way on the freedom of the other person. The primary relationship is always between God and the other person; the spiritual director is a privileged companion. The role of the Spiritual director is to help the other person focus always on the Lord. Spiritual direction is not counseling; it is not psychotherapy; it is not pastoral counseling. While each of these have their place in our experience they are not to be confused with spiritual direction. Spiritual direction is about that relationship that is mine with the Lord and that manifests itself primarily in the activity we refer to as prayer. Spiritual direction is a process that helps a person clarify what is happening in his/her prayer life. In this process a spiritual director does two things: the director helps the person to pay attention to God as God reveals himself in the person's life and the director helps the person recognize his reactions and decide on his responses to God.

A directed retreat is a retreat in which one enters into a spiritual direction relationship with another person for the duration of the retreat. Instead of conferences and spiritual exercises, the person spends his/her day in silent prayer an solitude with the Lord. Once a day the person meets with the director to share the experience of the prayer and to allow the director to help him/her clarify how the Lord is present and what He may be asking of the person. From what the person shares the director may make suggestions about looking at certain patterns that seem to be developing in the person's life, or he/she may make no suggestions at all. The director takes the experience of the person as the person gives it.

The normal movement in a directed retreat is the foundational experience of a God who both loves us and forgives us. We first experience a God who is constantly offering himself in relationship regardless of the sinful condition of the person. From this initial experience one moves to contemplate this God incarnate in the world in the presence of Jesus and to open oneself to the invitation of the risen Lord to come follow him. This experience is repeated many times over the course of a person's life. In a directed retreat this experience may be experienced very intensely because of the atmosphere of constant prayer. However, there is no pattern to be expected in the experiences of a directed retreat since the Lord leads each one differently The only expectation one may have in a directed retreat is that the Lord will reveal himself.

SIMPLE ATTENTION AND THE SPIRIT OF FAITH

In Explication de la Méthode d'Oraison, St. La Salle presents a method of prayer which at first seems to be excessively elaborate and unnecessarily systematic. On closer examination, however, it turns out to contain in itself a wide variety of options which can be used to adapt, abridge or finally to disregard the entire method altogether. Rather than outlining a rigid format of prayer, Explication provides the Brothers with a means to "do something" during the time of mental prayer until "prayer" begins to happen within them; that is, until they can become sensitive to recognizing and giving themselves to the Spirit. Among the suggestions which St. La Salle mentions in Explication to help the Brothers respond to the Holy Spirit during the time of mental prayer, one seems to be particularly significant to the Founder; namely, the prayer of simple attention.

St. La Salle describes simple attention as the way which "belongs to the stage of proficients" and we must include the saint himself in this category. From his writings and life style we have every reason to assume that some form of simple attention was part of the prayer of the Founder particularly during those nights when, according to his biographers, he was completely absorbed in prayer. Also he most likely anticipated that the Brothers themselves would attain to this kind of prayer if they remained faithful to their vocation. Finally, and most importantly, the prayer of simple attention was significant to the Founder because of its intimate connection to the spirit of the Institute, the Spirit of Faith.

Simple attention, St. La Salle writes, "consists in being before God with a simple, interior view of faith that He is present..." It "consists in remaining (in this presence) with a profound interior respect..., a spirit of silent worship, of love, of admiration, of gratitude and thanksgiving, of self-abasement and a heartfelt desire to unite oneself with our Lord...". In simple attention "we remain in this attitude of worship and adoration, without reasoning nor expressing ourselves... in formal acts, and simply holding to a spirit of pure, devout and affectionate attention".

Although St. La Salle may have been influenced by the Carmelite school of spirituality, and in particular by St. John of the Cross, in naming this way of prayer simple attention, there can be no doubt that his description of it was based on his own experience. Since his personal style was to rely on his own experience as the basis from which to teach the Brothers, it is unlikely that he would have even mentioned simple attention if he had not personally experienced it. Nor is there a compelling reason why he would have included the description of this way of prayer in his practical manual of mental prayer unless he knew from experience that simple attention was a form of prayer to which the Brothers themselves would quite likely be drawn. He refers to simple attention as a prayer style which is a "great grace" but which is available to "many souls". John of the Cross and Teresa of Avila seem to estimate in terms of months rather than years, the time that it might take for faithful religious to be gifted with this particular form of prayer.

St. La Salle assumes that if the Brothers remain faithful to the practice of prayer they would gradually no longer need to occupy themselves with the numerous "acts" which the Explication describes, but move to a form of prayer in which there were fewer but long-continued reflections, and then to a state where they would "simply collect themselves interiorly, direct their thoughts to the presence of God, and very quickly find themselves fixed in this holy exercise". Thus, they would come to experience simple attention to "the presence and the action of God", during at least some of this time of mental prayer. Specifically, St. La Salle suggests that, within the time of mental prayer, the Brothers might experience the prayer of simple attention "for ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, more or less".

By describing the 'time-frame' of simple attention in this way, St. La Salle situates it within the overall time alloted to formal mental prayer. However, it is apparent that he anticipated that the influence of simple attention would flow over into the daily lives of the Brothers. In describing the second part of mental prayer, the consideration of the subject matter proper to the mental prayer — in this case a particular virtue — St.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

La Salle remarks that "this method of simple attention, when accompanied by the proper dispositions, attracts the soul gently and effectually to the practice of the virtue...". The flow of prayer over into daily life comes from the gentle attraction for good which the soul feels in the experience of the prayer of simple attention. This attraction to the practice of virtue is the result of "remaining in the presence of our Lord" with the disposition of "worship and adoration, without reasoning... simply holding to the spirit of pure, devout and affectionate attention". From the prayer of simple attention practiced during the time of mental prayer comes the gentle attractive force empowering the Brothers throughout the day to practice the "virtue which has been the subject of our mental prayer".

The connection between simple attention and the cultivation of virtue is not, therefore, so much the result of a pious strategy calculated during the time of the mental prayer or even of a firm resolution adopted as a result of the prayer. Rather the connection is found in the perduring gentle attractive force for good which flows from the awareness of the presence of God and which now begins to replace our attachment to self will. This attractive force arising in the time of simple attention becomes the force of the Spirit to motivate our daily actions.

Although St. La Salle's example is specific to the practice of "a virtue" it is clear that the Founder is alluding to the overarching influence which this gentle attractive force will exert on all the activities of daily life as a result of the experience of simple attention. Implicitly here is the interrelatedness between simple attention and the Spirit of Faith, for this attractive force flowing from the awareness of the presence of God experienced in the prayer od simple attention is at the heart of the Spirit of Faith.

As described by St. La Salle, this gentle attractive force has two aspects: that of adherence to God and that of detachment from self. He names them "purity and detachment", and describes them as empowering the Brothers to "look on creatures only in their relation to God" and "without any particular view or any reference to self".

These characteristics of the gentle attractive force for good flowing from simple attention are the characteristics of the Spirit of Faith. St. La Salle anticipated that the Brothers would bring to their daily lives the attractive force for good which they experienced in simple attention: the attraction to "look on creatures only in their relation to God, and consequently appreciate in them only what is of God". This attractive force flowing from the experience of simple attention in mental prayer is the attitude called Spirit of Faith when it relates to the daily lives of the Brothers. For St. La Salle, the Spirit of Faith is simple attention "in action".

During the formal time of mental prayer, simple attention to the presence of God is explicit: the mind and the imagination are filled explicitly with images of God or are explicitly opened to God. In the daily experiences of life, the Spirit of Faith does not necessarily fill explicitly the mind and imagination with God's presence, since frequently they must be occupied explicitly with the task at hand. But the prevailing attitude is the same in both simple attention and the Spirit of Faith: in both there is "a spirit of silent worship, of love, of admiration, of gratitude and thanksgiving, of self-abasement", of "thinking only of Him and what concerns His service and acting for Him alone". Basically, the Spirit of Faith is, in the context of the daily lives of the Brothers, what simple attention is in the context of the time of mental prayer.

One indication, therefore, by which the Brothers would know that the Spirit of Faith was developing within them would be that the gentle attractive force for good they experienced in themselves during the prayer of simple attention was the same attitude which they now found in themselves in their relationship to the events of daily life. They would begin to experience "gratitude and thanksgiving", rather than being judgmental in their relationships with persons and events; "a spirit of silent worship" rather than greed or self-aggrandizement; "self-abasement and a heartfelt desire to unite oneself with our Lord" rather than a desire for success, vindictiveness, or avoidance of pain, in the face of the daily tasks and struggles of life. In short, they would find themselves more and more led by "a strong and supernatural affection" for virtue and more and more able to "overcome with ease, the opposition of our vicious nature". At the same time they would find themselves less and less under Jesus'criticism of Peter: "Get out of my sight, you satan!... You are not judging by God's standards but by man's".

It seems that St. La Salle anticipated that the Brothers would be enlightened by the prayer of simple attention to look upon everything with the eyes of faith; that they would be empowered with the courage to do everything for God; and that they would receive the capacity to attribute all to God. And that this growth in the Spirit of Faith would come about not through some personal clever strategy or series of resolutions, but by that gentle attractive force for good which flows from prayer of simple attention.

IMPLANTING THE LASALLIAN IDEAL IN AFRICAN CULTURE

1984 Session of the Lasallian African Union

Last August the Lasallian African Union held its fifth session since 1975 in the Senior Seminary of Koumi, Burkina-Faso, on the theme of inculturation of the Lasallian Community. It brought together about twenty Brothers from the different French speaking Districts of the African Region (RELAF). A twenty page report gives the essentials of the business discussed during those few weeks. With the approval of Brother Vincent Rabemahafaly, General Councillor, and of Brother Dominic Samne, Regional President, we give the following summary of the report.

The Lasallian Community from its origins.

Starting with the "Meditations for the Time of Retreat", Brother Miguel Campos helped the participants to reflect and meditate on the Lasallian Community as it was from its beginnings:

— a community inspired and supported by the living Word of the Gospel, — caring for the most abandoned,
— with the apostolic objective which is attained through the ecclesial functions exercised by the Brothers,
— a community with living structures capable of maintaining it and enabling it to attain its end,
— a community which organizes itself as a corporate body and chooses Superiors to guide it towards its objectives in fidelity and hope.

Brotherhood and evengelization.

Father Sidbé Sempore, O.P., dealt with this aspect of community during the third week. Forms of community exist in traditional society (village, family, clan) supported by structures designed to preserve the values by which they live. How do we regard these communities in the light of the Gospel and what can we, or should we retain from them to help us to live the evangelical brotherhood recommended to us by Christ who has given us this mission?

Conclusions

During the first three weeks Brothers worked in groups or in general assemblies. Gradually facts emerged, questions were asked and discoveries made. Thus a consensus was arrived at and convictions were formulated in the form of a profession of faith as follows:

We, Brothers of Africa,

— assembled from 3rd to 31st August, 1984 in an ordinary meeting of the Lasallian African Union, — having reflected, meditated and prayed during this time on the community of service founded by St. John Baptist de La Salle and on African society and its values, — aware that the implantation of our religious family in Africa must take place through the assimilation of these values, purified and enlivened by the Good News of Jesus Christ, believe in John Baptist de La Salle as someone human and accessible and inviting each Brother to become so;

— who urges us to make him alive today, here and now, in our conversion to God and through the mediation of the poor,

— whose God is a mysterious God, not to be domesticated, surprising, showing himself in events, taking us by surprise, intervening at the moment we least expect,

— who, through his Brothers, together and by association, answers the call to a mission of salvation in favour of African youth, — who invites us to be faithful to his charism, to keep it alive by interpreting present reality in the light of the Gospel, — who invites us in the diversity of races, ethnic groups, cultures and languages, of life styles and apostolic commitments.

For the Community we believe:

— that it is the living God and the action of God that creates the Community. It is God who called us, and our Community is born of Divine Providence. If we exist as a Community in Africa it is thanks to that Word and to the action of God.

— that a Community is composed of persons having each his culture, his formation, his nationality, his character...

— that the Word calls the whole Community to renewal through a permanent conversion of its members and a disinterested love.

— that in Community difficulties have always existed. Instead of dividing they should stimulate each one to pardon, to understand, to practice patience, to be indulgent, to practice mutual charity...

— that the Community should be attentive to the individual Brother, making use of his talents in the sharing of responsibilities, teaching him to respect differences and helping him to live "together and by association".

— that the Community Project, established and formulated by all its members, is the appropriate and efficacious means of assuring the vitality of the Community. It should be evaluated and revised periodically.

— that the Community is called upon to be open to its milieu by agreeing to share its goods with the poorest of the locality. It is by committing ourselves to the struggle against poverty that we live the poverty of the Gospel.

Special attention should be paid to Brothers in difficulty:

— the isolated, the ill, the timid, the emarginated... The Community must try to really know the members of its family.

— that the Brother is called, not for himself but for others. His mission is to announce the Gospel in the footsteps of, and with the charisma of de La Salle, whose mission was the Christian education of youth. God has confided young people to us for their salvation. We are therefore workers for the Kingdom.

— that in the face of materialistic ideologies and a civilization fascinated by possessions and action, the search for solutions to the problems of African youth is urgent and compels us to live to the full our spirit of zeal in action and prayer.

— that because of our efforts to adapt our community life in order to respond, in an evangelical manner, to modern needs and because of the kind of relations we cultivate with those we encounter, and because of our life style, our ministry and our ideals, we can attract young people.

— that the life of prayer is an essential dimension of the life of a Brother, that it is in renewed Community prayer that the Brothers tell Christ of their apostolic needs and receive from Him light and benediction, and that the Brother who neglects his spiritual life is no longer Lasallian.

— that the source from which de La Salle drank has not dried up and will never cease to satisfy the thirst of his sons throughout the ages.

TOUNOUMA: A COLLEGE FOR THE PEOPLE

In De La Salle College, Tounouma, students generally do well in the examination for the Baccalaureat. But does the Baccalaureat serve any purpose today?

It is, in fact, true that this diploma is no longer considered essential for entrance to a profession. The successful student is the one who has acquired a certain amount of knowledge in the subjects studied: Literature. Mathematics, Science, both natural and physical, History, Geography, etc...

But has he really assimilated this knowledge so as to be able to use it effectively in daily life?

On leaving college he soon discovers that, after completing his secondary school course, he no longer knows how to use his hands and that he is less prepared for life than the mechanic down the street who repairs motorcycles or the young girls in the store who sell peanuts.

To find a professional post he has no other solution but to keep on accumulating diplomas, at the univerity, if he can gain entrance, or at some other educational establishment. So, is the time spent in college lost and is his early life wasted?

Certainly not. But we must qualify the initial question by the statement that, while the Baccalaureat is not of direct use, you cannot get far in present day society without it. That is one of the reasons why countries maintain and develop secondary education.

Formation of personality

We all know that the knowledge acquired during the twelve to fourteen years spent in primary and secondary schools quickly evaporates on leaving school. That is why we think that the secondary school should:

— train students in the art of learning,
— train them to work on their own, — develop in them a taste for knowledge and — inculcate a degree of humility in face of what has yet to be learned.

It is not a question of deprecating the acquisition of knowledge and the accumulation of diplomas, for this is the duty of every educational establishment.

On the other hand, the school has an important social dimension. A school is, of course a building of bricks and mortar, but it is, above all, a team composed of teachers and taught. The quality of relationships within the team condition, to a large extent, the academic result. At Tounouma we think that a school which functions well should become a centre of radiation in the immediate area and in the region as a whole. When we possess something we must share it generously, particularly if the area in which we work is deprived.

At Tounouma we have walls so that those who feel themselves imprisoned may escape to the outside world. But in those walls what counts are the doors, always open to those who wish to enter or leave. You may judge for yourself.

The College is an educational establishment for secondary education which aims at providing educated Christian leaders for the country and for the Church but we try to go a little farther.

A literacy centre

For the past ten years we have made our students, girls and boys, aware of the problem of illiteracy. The literacy rate in this country is one of the lowest in the world.

Every evening, from 6.00 to 7.30 p.m., we take in about 250 adults from eighteen upwards. These are taken care of by sixty monitors, all students of the second cycle, under the guidance of five teachers. They are divided into six categories: A, B, C, D, E, F. Occasionally four or five out of group F take the Certificate of Primary Studies examination, but our aim is less to prepare them for examinations than to give them sufficient knowledge to face the problem of finding employment.

Basic Technical Training

With a view to giving additional technical training, we initiated, ten years ago, a section for home electricity and a section for motor maintenance. This is, of course, a modest beginning but it is an effort to give our students a better chance of finding work, and for those already employed, a chance to improve their skill.

As most of our students are either unemployed or unpaid apprentices or, at most, poorly paid shop assistants or labourers, we do not ask much in the line of fees. Text books, electrical equipment and motor engines and parts are paid for by friends of the College.

A socio-cultural centre

Another important extra-mural activity of the College is caring for the children of the area during the long summer holidays from July to September. Under the direction of two Brothers, some fifteen senior students organize football leagues for more than 2,000 children. Football is very popular in Burkina-Faso. This activity is less a pastime than an effort to break down religious and ethnic barriers. The results, so far, are encouraging. Our sports facilities, especially our football pitches, are at the disposal of local adults and townspeople during the holidays when the students are away.

Five years ago we set up an open air cinema cum theatre which can accommodate about 2,000 people. There, most of the Diocesan Christian Youth events take place. The aim is always to instruct, to educate and to evangelize.

A catechetical centre

One of the Brothers, with the help of a group of senior students, gives religious instruction to the primary school children of the parish on Saturday afternoons. Primary schools were nationalized in 1969 with the result that there is practically no religious instruction given in them.

We could, in addition to the above activities, mention the meetings of the Focolari group, the National Union of Christian Youth, and parent groups which meet every Monday.

Conclusion

It is true that the College of Tounouma prepares students for the Baccalaureat as a matter of professional obligation on the part of the teaching staff. But, at the same time, it tries to form young people who, at the end of their academic studies, will feel themselves more human and more at liberty. The out-of-school activities mentioned above contribute, we believe, to their human and Christian formation.

BOYS TOWN, BEAUDESERT, Queensland (Australia)

Editorial note

The pastoral care of delinquents or of children at risk has a long history in the Institute since those first young gentlemen whom the Founder accepted in Saint Yon. It is not surprising that a man concerned about children left to themselves from morning until night because of the occupations of their parents, should have been deeply concerned about other children and young people who were seen to be "far from salvation". This, too, has been the concern of generations of Brothers down to the present day. It is true that, in a number of recent instances, the Brothers have had to give up some such works because of the extreme demands of government agencies, or because of greater financial responsibility assumed by the state. There are, however, a number of instances where the very governments which dismantled a whole network of such institutions run by voluntary bodies have now turned again to the Brothers to ask them if they would resume such work.

The Boys Town described in the following article is the second establishment with this name which the Brothers of the Australian District have founded. While the first now continues under another name and under different direction, Boys Town Beaudesert has become nationally known. The subject of two different television documentaries in the past decade, it has attracted much generous support from a wide range of charitable bodies and individuals. It is a Brothers foundation in a deep sense, for the priest co-founder, Monsignor Owen Steele O.B.E., was himself one of the first pupils of the Brothers in their very first Australian school. For him, Boys Town was the realisation of a dream which he felt could only come true if there were Brothers to direct the work. Many generations of Brothers have spent their summer holidays, or large sections of them, "helping out" in Boys Town. The work remains one of the priority tasks of the Australian District in its service of the poor.

We are grateful to the present Director of Boys Town for the following impressionistic account of the work accomplished there.

THE ALL-ABSORBING WORK OF BOYS TOWN

It isn't easy to write about the boys of Boys Town. I much prefer to try and forget about our problems — the boys' problems. For all that, our work with delinquents is all-absorbing, intriguing, rewarding. In spite of all that goes wrong, perhaps because of all that goes wrong, I and all my staff are powerfully drawn towards these problem boys.

I spent part of today at the Brisbane Children's Court where these baby-faced "crims" go on trial. It is a modern building where so many do so much for the disturbed souls of these sad-faced youngsters.

A girl, 13, peers through the thick corrugated glass door in a stainless steel partition. She is in a cell in an airy and well lighted basement. She seems to symbolise the clouded perspective in which these kids see life. For them the worthwhile things in life are the dangerous thrills, the fun of the streets, drugs, the unwholesome friends, the bent way of life.

In adjacent cells other juveniles sit and wait. Some are isolated. Others are in groups. In a control room an attendant presses a button and one of the cell doors is electrically opened. A boy emerges and is led upstairs along carpeted corridors and ushered into a large well ventilated room. The magistrate salutes the duty solicitor and invites the boy to sit down. Another session of the Children's Court has begun.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The session is a procession of breaking and entering, damage to property, prostitution and all that goes with it. These are only the external symptoms of the greater evils that lurk beneath — the lack of love, the neglect, the loneliness.

Billy is bent as his father was bent, as some generations before them were bent. Billy has never known God or Faith. All through his short life - childhood, teens, his Dad's been nicking things and Billy knows it. Every minute of his life his Mum or step mum has been close to the bottle.

Because of his father, or mother, Billy knows others of this breed. They are his father's friends, and the children of his father's friends are his friends. This is his only world. Everything, everyone he comes in contact with is bent - without Faith, without hope. At marriageable age who is going to marry Billy other than one of his own class? It's a self perpetuating cycle and who knows that better than Billy. He will continue to live in his own tight community and he likes it that way.

His offspring will be of his own kind. They will be taught, and they will believe, that criminality is both normal and desirable.

Of course there are exceptions. A small number of our boys are from good families. Decent people who seem to have done a fair thing by all their children. They love their children and stand by them but they cannot like some of the things their children do.

In another level of society the double standards of adults are to blame for the plight of young people who suffer from homelessness, lack of love, drug addiction, pornography and sexual abuse. What do youngsters say of the hypocrisy of the older generation who heavily indulge in the "old drugs"while we young people are not supposed to touch the "new drugs".

There are no locks or bars here at Boys Town. A lot is done for them here and we hope they will stay. Sometimes they don't. But we usually know where to find them — rap dancing or just idling in the Mall. Maybe in the Valley where redlight areas abound. There are greater dangers there. When we have found them, they don't deny that they are doing harm to themselves. They come back home with us — but they find it hard to turn their backs on what they see as the fun of the streets.

The methods we use at Boys Town are not new. We aim to do a kind of "break and enter" — break into the cycle of quasi criminal activity and implant within the seed of Faith, Hope and Charity for what is it that makes a man good or evil but what he believes?

By presenting normality we aim to put the boys in conflict with the situation in which he was brought up.Tasks within the range of their ability are presented to the boys as opportunities to succeed and so build up confidence.

The boys live in cottages in which cottage-parents, supported at all times by the Brothers, simulate good family life. The boys are taught to share, to respect the rights and property of others. In the cottage they experience love, security — and good home cooking.

We have our own registered secondary school. Study is encouraged. A little work around the cottage is mandatory. It is a contribution to their "town" community. Just a little public worship and, we hope, a deep knowledge of Our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

We persist in doing these things. We forgive to seventy times seven times.

Not a little satisfaction comes to us from many of our "old boys" who constantly express their confidence and gratitude by making the trip out to Beaudesert or otherwise keeping in touch, telling us of their successes and sometimes of their failures.

I take this opportunity to salute the many institutions similar to ours in all parts of the world. We salute their staffs who use methods very similar to ours in devoting themselves to "remedial work" for boys and girls who seem born to be victims.

Last week it was one such boy who, at a picnic, found a wallet containing $ 250. Michael handed it in because "the owner will need it".

WORKING AMONG THE INDO-CHINESE STUDENTS: A CONTINUING MISSION

During the first half of 1975, the Republic of South Vietnam was invaded by the Northern Communist Vietnamese who took control of the entire country. At the same time, its neighbours to the West, Kampuchea (also called Cambodia) and Laos, fell to the Khmer Rouge and the Pathet Lao respectively. Indo-China came under total control of the Communists. This event resulted in the departure of hundreds of thousands of refugees to other parts of the world in search for freedom.

Since 1975, Australia has been generous in accepting Indo-Chinese refugees for resettlement on its soil. Even though Asian immigration is not new to this country and Australia's experience with refugees goes back to the immediate pre- and post-war years and the 1950's, the sudden and massive influx of Indo-Chinese refugee children into Australian schools has brought many problems for the teachers who have to teach them, and particularly for those who are not familiar with or not prepared for the situation.

On the other hand, it has been and still is a source of anxiety and fear for these children who have been uprooted from their homeland and transplanted into a totally new environment. Moreover, unlike the immigrants who may return to their homeland if immigration is seen to be a mistake, these refugees have to accept that they may never return home again. Whether or not their new environment is pleasing to them, they must make various adjustments resulting from many conflicts:

EMOTIONAL CONFLICTS

The experiences of war and recent memories associated with the trauma of escape, confrontation with pirates, danger of death, deprivation, and separation from loved ones, have left their imprint in the form of introverted personalities, unstable behaviour, and unfriendly or distrustful attitudes.

The changing role of parental authority is a confusing factor which often causes emotional conflict and insecurity. It is possible for children to be left without moral support from their parents who themselves are facing many difficulties in adjusting.

Resulting from such a sudden change of life style, loneliness, homesickness and isolation are daily problems which greatly affect the development of these children who become vulnerable to stress and psychological breakdown.

CULTURAL AND SOCIAL CONFLICTS

Conflicts are likely to arise when cultural and social backgrounds differ. If Indo-Chinese children are to live up to the expectations of both their parents and teachers, it is likely that they will experience conflict. Within their own culture, these children are expected to be obedient and respectful to elders, passive, modest, to do well in school and to study. At school, they are taught to be well behaved, polite, respectful to teachers, quiet, passive, formal in their approach and hard working. However, at school in Australia, they are expected to be polite, self assertive, independent, active, to ask questions, to volunteer answers, to participate in group discussions, all of which in many ways are in conflict with their own cultural traditions.

EDUCATIONAL CONFLICTS

Most Indo-Chinese children, being used to the teacher centered method of learning, tend to work the passive way by listening, watching and imitating. In Australia, they become confused when they have to learn independently and select their own subjects when at secondary level. Encountering such a situation, they often feel a lack of self reliance, self confidence, as well as difficulty in decision making. Worse still, teachers sometimes label them as "passive", "quiet", "unco-operative", "backward", so that they tend to ignore them and not give them the attention they need.

The language barrier is a big handicap for Indo-Chinese children. Although on arrival each child is entitled to three to six months of intensive English language teaching either under the New Arrivals Program or at the Catholic Intensive Language Centre, their knowledge of the language is insufficient for them to cope with studies particularly at secondary school.

AN INITIATIVE OF THE CATHOLIC EDUCATION OFFICE

In 1982, in order to help alleviate some of the above problems, the Catholic Education Office in Sydney took the initiative of employing me as Liaison Officer for the Indo-Chinese Students working in 300 primary and secondary schools within the Archdiocese of Sydney.

I am attached to the Multicultural Education Program within the Special Purpose Programs which receive special funding to assist in the education of migrant children.

As Liaison Officer for Indo-Chinese Students, I am responsible to the Co-Ordinator of the Multicultural Education Program for developing and maintaining strategies designed to facilitate the integration of Indo-Chinese students into the catholic schools of the Archdiocese.

My duties are:

1) To assist teachers with the planning and implementation of programmes appropriate to the needs of Indo-Chinese students including:

(I) the provision of cultural and linguistic background information.

(II) the organisation of translators and interpreters as requested.

2) To establish contact and liaison with the following groups:

— Indo-Chinese communities,
— Migrant Centres/Hostels,
— Relevant Commonwealth and N.S.W. Education Departments, — Catholic Immigration Office and Welfare organisations, — Catholic Education Office personnel, Regional and Central.

3) To liaise with the Language Reception Centres regarding the placement of children in Catholic schools and educational continuity from the Centres to the schools.

4) To provide information about the existence and nature of Catholic schools to Indo-Chinese parents and to assist interested parents with enrolment of their children in Catholic schools.

5) To assist in gathering and collating statistics relevant to Indo-Chinese children.

6) To assist in inservice education courses as required.

7) To carry out other duties as assigned by the Diocesan Director of Schools.

It will be apparent that my work revolves around people's problems, many of which must, even after concerned effort, remain unsolved. As long as Australia accepts Indo-Chinese refugees there will be a need for a continuing mission to these people.

I personally obtain much fulfilment from being closely in touch with Christ's poor.

LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY (1)

Note: In August, 1984, six hundred Brothers from the United States/Toronto Region gathered at St Mary's College, Moraga, California, for a week of prayer and reflection on the meaning of the Brother's vocation in the United States and Canada today.

Brother John JOHNSTON, Vicar General, presented a major paper on LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY. While the focus of the paper is clearly addressed to the Brothers themselves, the general orientations have relevance for all Lasallian Educators throughout the world.

LASALLIANA will publish excerpts from the address, slightly edited by the author, in successive editions.

Opening remarks

Never in my life have I had a year and a half to prepare a forty-five minute talk! But never in my life have I spent as much time reflecting on the myriad issues associated with LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY. Preparing these remarks has been a blessing, because it has forced me to clarify my positions and to structure the expression of my thoughts into a forty-five minute format.

Brothers, since this convocation is an assembly of the United States/Toronto Region, this talk should have both US districts and the Toronto District in focus. But the considerable differences between the countries of the United States and Canada render impossible a single point of reference. Maintaining a dual focus, however, is not feasible. The basic point of reference, therefore, will be the United States of America. Nevertheless, I think that most of what I have to say is relevant to the situation of the Institute in the Toronto District today.

A Search of Living Men

The DECLARATION tells us that it is as living men that we must discover how fidelity to our Lasallian charism can be lived in the present time (Declaration 7). I have asked myself in recent years if we are really judging, deciding and acting in the United States as living men. I have questioned whether we are really faithful to that dynamic stance which the 39th General Chapter consciously adopted in 1966-67. Our delegates made courageous decisions at that chapter, as well as at the First US Regional Chapter in 1968 and subsequent District Chapters, decisions that replied to concrete situations demanding clear, unambiguous responses. I think that most of those decisions, perhaps not all, were wise, in that the time and conditions required them.

Letting Go

I am not particularly concerned now about assessing that past. I am more concerned that we be just as creative, dynamic, and bold today. Sometimes, I fear that we are locked in, frozen, paralysed by decisions of another day. Are we living too much on past investments? Investments made not only fifty years ago, but also fifteen years ago. Permeating these remarks this morning will be a plea for openness, detachment, for a spirit of "letting go" not only of that Institute of 1960 which no longer exists, but also of that Institute of 1970 which no longer exists, an Institute the story of which is ancient history to the young men in this gathering today.

Towards a Common Understanding

But that remark should not lead you to expect anything remarkably creative and revolutionary from me today. On the contrary, I think that the elements for a creative revitalization of Lasallian Educational Ministry are known to all of us. But to make better sense out of these elements we need a less nebulous and more functional model of Lasallian Educational Ministry. Under the umbrella of such a model, we can find the order and direction for which we crave; without it we have confusion, frustration, demoralization, and polarization. We have to have a common understanding of "who we are and what God expects us to do" (Fiddler on the Roof), a common understanding which we consciously embrace and to which we commit ourselves in association.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

A Recognizable Ministry

The topic assigned me — LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY — implies that there is in fact such a recognizable ministry. I believe that there is — or at least that there should be and can be. As a catalyst in our search for what that something is, I'll present some responses to four questions: Lasallian Educational Ministry: BY WHOM? WHAT? FOR WHOM? HOW? The questions are closely interrelated, so much so that I find it impossible to begin where I would prefer to begin: with the FOR WHOM? I must begin with BY WHOM?

LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY: BY WHOM? THE VOCATION OF THE BROTHER

Part 1

Central to an effective and functional model of Lasallian Educational Ministry is a common understanding of the BY WHOM? this ministry is to be exercised. When we operate out of fundamentally different images of what a Brother is, our presuppositions and mutual expectations become so diverse and communication so painful that we are inclined to avoid conflict and opt instead for a spirit of "amicable toleration" — the equivalent to a commitment to the status quo. Certainly a healthy diversity in living the Lasallian vocation is a rich blessing. But if we are to achieve any significant degree of unity in this diversity, we must have a common understanding of who the Brother is and what he is all about.

De La Salle's Image of the FSC

De La Salle's understanding is clear. God, in His Providence, that is to say, in His love and concern for poor and neglected youngsters, kindles a light in the hearts of certain persons, calling them to respond in association to these needs. The Brother is such a man, called to be minister, ambassador, co-worker with Christ in freely chosen celibacy, poverty, obedience, and service of the poor through education; a man vowed to this commitment all his lifetime, trusting that God will be faithful. He is a faith-filled and prayerful man, a community man, a zealous man.

De La Salle's imagery is apostolic. In the sixteen meditations he prepared for the Brothers to use during the important time of the annual retreat, he speaks of zeal an astounding forty-six times. He consistently refers to the young as those "God has confided to your care".

An Apostolic Model

This apostolic model of consecrated life, for a long time ignored because it did not readly fit into 19th and 20th century theologies of consecrated life, was vigorously embraced by the 39th General Chapter.

That this General Chapter option for an apostolic model of a consecrated life was a repudiation of the "monk-who-also-teaches" model with two separate ends, one primary, the other secondary, is well known. But we cannot presume that Brothers are now operating out of this General Chapter apostolic model. Many of us, I suspect, are consciously or unconsciously living out of models which are not Lasallian. One such model suggests a new form of dualism: personal growth through the living of the three traditional vows and spiritual exercises as the primary end; and the service of others as a separate and secondary end. Another places its primary focus on the living of community life or on witnessing to fraternal love, with the service of others a separate and secondary end. Later we'll talk about models of association that cannot be reconciled with the Lasallian model of association. There is no question here of right model and wrong model. It is a question of which model we, through our General Chapters, have embraced.

Apostles, not just Teachers

But there is a second consideration concerning our image that is equally important. We are called to be apostles in virtue of our religious consecration, not just teachers. We are to be excellent teachers, yes, but more than that. We are to be loving men, concerned for young people, yes, but more than that. We are to be evangelizers. We are called to be zealous men. Zeal is of the essence of our vocation. And let us not confuse zeal with professionalism. We must, of course, be professionals, but zeal is more. Zeal involves an ardent desire to help young people grow in the spirit of Christianity.

LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY (2)
THE BROTHER IN ASSOCIATION

So far, Brothers, our focus has been the image of the FSC as an individual. Let's adjust that focus: the first Brothers experienced themselves called to live their consecration in association with men united by a conscious sharing of the same ideal, expressed in and through a strikingly original manner of living the Gospel. They vowed association for the purpose of teaching the poor gratuitously. This vow of association was in a sense a vow of identity: it answered the question: who were these men living this new life style?

This association had teeth in it. The men committed themselves to one another for the service of the poor. They vowed obedience to the group and to its representatives. They promised to go wherever they were sent and to do whatever they were assigned. They vowed stability, even if obliged to beg alms and live on bread alone.

To Live in Society with...

Association is a precious tradition among us. We live it on the international, regional, district, and community levels. We hold that it is a constitutive element of our vocation. Our commitment to association has no less teeth than that of our early Brothers. We also have committed ourselves to one another: "to live in society with!" We have promised to go wherever we may be sent and to do whatever we may be assigned by the body of the Institute or by its superiors.

Perhaps what I have just said sounds naive. But it is in fact the way we describe ourselves every time we renew our consecration. There have been changes in our process of assigning and being assigned, but the bottom line is still the same: availability: "Here I am, Lord; send me".

In the last twenty years we have become increasingly aware of our responsibility to participate more actively and directly in determining how our gifts and talents should be used in the service of others. Institutional needs have gradually yielded to the personal needs of the Brothers as priority criteria. Inevitably, tensions have developed around district commitments and personal preferences.

Nevertheless, there are considerable differences in assignment policies within the region. A number of districts have worked creatively and with success to reconcile district commitments and personal preference. Some others, in practice if not in theory, grant individual choice. In some districts Brothers are challenged to consider specific needs before they choose their apostolate; in other districts this practice is less common. A considerable number of Brothers choose to stay where they are. A smaller number choose new apostolates, in existing schools or outside them. The tendency is for districts to become a composite of the individual choices of the Brothers. The possibility of corporate planning is quite limited. It seems clear that we are operating out different models of association. We lack a common understanding of and commitment to working "together and by association".

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Availability

Our Institute model — go wherever we are sent, do whatever we are asked — is not the only feasible model for religious institutes. But it is the one we have freely choosen as an international body. It is the model to which all of us committed ourselves. In essence it means that we agree to work together and by association to implement, in a structured and coordinated manner, a district plan which we make our own. Certainly we have the right and even the duty to make known our interests, preferences, and judgment relative to our suitability for specific tasks. Certainly also we can and should bring initiatives for new possibilities to the Visitor and District Council. What matters is that we are available, available to be challenged and to consider seriously the needs of the district and even the Institute internationally. The bottom line is that the Visitor has the last word, which is more than a formalistic rubber stamp. That power the Institute gives the Visitor is a responsibility demanding sensitivity, concern, and utmost respect for the human person, a responsibility for the exercise of which the Visitor is strictly accountable.

Association — that commitment freely made to one another for the sake of mission — must be built on mutual trust and self-sacrifice. An association of loving persons freely committed to the same ideal is a group with power — legitimate power at the service of the Lord and of the Church; a power to do really worthwhile and significant things.

THE SCHOOL OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

Personal attention to the pupil

1. The Brother's abnegation

Children are, at every moment of the day, the centre of interest of the Lasallian educator. Self abnegation is his favourite virtue.

We do not have to go out into the street to make ourselves known. The pupils themselves are our best propagandists.

"Each day the Brother of the Christian Schools fulfils his task, a monotonous and obscure but sublime task which demands a degree of heroism and lots of love".[1] This silent and modest work is the leaven of the mass. Fine speeches are above the heads of the children. Their power of attention is limited but not their instinct to observe and imitate. They are immediately conscious of our dedication and generosity, of our state of mind and of our manner of living. It is impossible to avoid, day in day out, the critical observation of the pupil. Though he does not understand things in the way we do, he understands them in his own way but that does not prevent his grasping, by intuition, the essentials.

In school the Brother transforms and models his pupils. His own personality is the principal agent of this transformation. It is not so much subject matter and methods which impress but his own personality which gets across to the pupils:

— his patience which prevents him from giving way to ill humour when he has to correct a pupil (cf. Letter No. 37, 7-8).

— his self control which makes him even tempered so that the pupils have no difficulty in approaching him at any time. (Letter 58, 15).

— His tenderness towards all. A love which is not weakness but dedication and assistance, especially to those who are in most need. (Letters 11,15 and 55,16).[2]

De La Salle insists that the school be always well run. His Management of Schools is a model of its kind and shows his attention to detail. Nothing escapes his regulations which aim at making effective the efforts put into instructing and educating the pupils. His spiritual inspiration enlivens and stimulates his pedagogy. If children come to de La Salle's schools it is not only because they are Christians and poor, it is also because the Brothers are competent teachers. We must not forget the care with which he prepared the Brothers who taught in the Sunday schools of Saint Sulpice and in the boarding school of Saint Yon where higher courses were provided. These were the forerunners of what are called today modern secondary schools.[3]

Our present documents recall the directions followed by our Founder and his Brothers when they remind us that whatever their nature or level "the Brothers' schools are characterized by the quality of the education and formation given in them". (Declaration 45,2). Farther on (No. 48) new demands along the same lines are formulated:

— value the teaching vocation, that is to say, recognise and appreciate their identity as men consecrated to God for the service of others,

— continue and develop their spiritual and cultural formation,

— educate their students to the realities of the ever changing world in which they live, teaching them not to fear change but to live with it while judging, criticising and assimilating the values that the modern world offers.

2. Attention to the individual pupil

This is another marked characteristic of the Lasallian school, today as formerly. Let us look first at what was the traditional practice and then we shall glance briefly at today's practice.

The simultaneous method used by the Brothers in their schools was applied to the group in general, without, however, losing sight of the individual pupil. This is what happened when:

— it was pointed out that each pupil's progress should be noted. As the programmes were graded, the pupil had to pass a test before moving on to the following "lesson".[4] St. John Baptist de La Salle says in Letter No. 56, "They must not change from one "lesson" to another if they are not ready for it. If you don't pay attention to this they will learn nothing". In this matter de La Salle did not follow the example of the Collège des Bons-Enfants where pupils were automatically promoted every year. He went farther in taking account of the nature of the child who was to be promoted as soon as he was judged capable in reading, writing and arithmetic, etc.[5]

— the saint advises the Brother to pay special attention to the backward or less gifted children. (He himself did so on every occasion).[6]

— he looks into the reasons which could cause pupils to absent themselves from school. He considers the part of the Brother as well as that of the family or social circumstances. If the Brother does not gain the affection of his pupils, if he presents a dour image or if he is too severe in his corrections, the pupils will not become attached to the school. It is by his affability of manner rather than by harshness that he will attract them.[7]

— the pupils share some of the responsibilities of the teachers: they mark the list of absentees, recite the prayers, visit the sick; there is an almsgiver, distributors and collectors of books... For each of these offices the Founder writes a chapter in the Management.

De La Salle studies the individual child so as to be better able to guide and lead him with success. It should be one of the principal preoccupations of those consecrated to the education of others to get to know the child and to learn what motivates him. In effect, some require gentleness and patience while others have to be urged on. (Med. 33, 1).

In this matter the Management could be considered a model of care for the individual child. It studies:

— the character of each one
— his qualities and defects
— his intellectual and moral development
— his basic inclinations
— his habits and his relations with the members of his family in so far as they help or hinder his progress in school

For de La Salle there is no distinction to be made between the dedication the Brother should have to his pupils and the vigilance he should practise over his conduct. He draws attention to the fact that before thinking of correcting others he should consider the example he himself gives both in and out of school, realizing that pupils imitate the example of their teachers. (Cf. Med. 202, 3 and 91,3).

On all the points mentioned there is continuity between what was done formerly and what is done today. We have the evidence in the Documents which are in accord with the evangelical thinking of the Founder. (Cf. Declaration, 45 to 48).

SIGNUM FIDEI (1)

INTRODUCTION

Signum Fidei is a movement inspired by the spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle. It responds to an interior desire for evangelical perfection which involves the whole life of the person who accepts the call of the Lord. As this call is heard in a Lasallian context, the commitment, because it is Lasallian, will be to an educative and, more particularly, to an evangelizing apostolate.

SIGNUM FIDEI asks from the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools its support and, in return, offers its help, as a priority, to the Institute's "apostolic projects".

A short historic outline

During the 1970's, Brother Charles Henry, Superior General and Brother José Pablo, Vicar General, in the course of their visits to different sectors of the Institute throughout the world, became aware of the desire of some lay people for closer ties with the Institute in its work and in its spirit. The repeated expression of this wish and the fact that it came from such diverse sources strongly impressed the Superiors who asked Brother Paulus Adams, then Assistant, to undertake a study of this movement which was still uncertain of itself.

Helped by Brother Manuel Olivé, he began work on the project and soon results began to show. A small group of Lasallians accepted the idea with enthusiasm and, together with the two Brothers, set about constructing the framework and establishing the basic principles of a movement of Lasallian spirituality for lay people.

In November 1975, a group of five laymen and two Brothers drew up directives for the "Life Style" and "Consecration" and chose a name for the new fraternity which had come into being. It would be called Signum Fidei.

On 5th June 1976, during the General Chapter in Rome, and following the Perpetual Profession of six Brothers, eleven members of Signum Fidei pronounced their Act of Consecration in the presence of the capitulants who were deeply impressed and who, at the close of the ceremony, gave a cordial accolade to the newly professed Brothers and to the Signum Fidei members without distinction.

With God's help the new Signum Fidei fraternity has continued to develop. By the time the next General Chapter assembles in 1986, 400 Signum Fidei members will have made the Act of Consecration, dedicating themselves to the service of God, of the Church and of the Institute, in favour of the poor and especially of the young.

Consecration

This is the starting point of the new fraternity. The person who wishes to join Signum Fidei wishes to give himself to God. It is a true consecration of his whole being and his whole life to the greater glory of God and for the benefit of those in most need.

Constitutions of Signum Fidei

These are contained in the "Life Style" and in the "Consecration". We would like to underline the three main characteristics of the fraternity: Realizing that everything is a Grace, in accordance with the teaching of St. John Baptist de La Salle who says, "Make no distinction between the duties of your state and what concerns your sanctification"; Joy which is a gift of the Holy Spirit; the Presence of God which gives meaning to our life and to our work.

Interior life

Christ calls us to a greater intimacy with himself. This is of the highest importance and requires great care on our part. The apostolate is but the outward expression of this divine life. The means proposed by Signum Fidei for sharing the divine life are:

Daily prayer at a fixed time; attention to the presence of God throughout the day — a truly Lasallian practice and a means of bringing God into every activity of our day and of our life — Sacramental life in order to live the Christian life in all its fulness and with all the sacrifices it entails.

Apostolate and evangelization

Signum Fidei, the sign of the faith, is for others. It cannot be confined to the pursuit of personal sanctification. It gives itself to others, to all who suffer and especially the young.

The Signum Fidei member will adopt an "apostolic project" which will demand time and perhaps money but, above all, love. Teachers and the school; parents and their families; the Association and its animators, all will be the object of his love. He will be "a sign of faith" to all with whom he comes in contact. But it is especially the children and poor youths who will be the object of the zeal of the Signum Fidei member who will give himself to them without counting the cost and with the utmost generosity.

How to become a member of Signum Fidei

A period of preparation is required before making the Act of Consecration. During this time the candidate will study the "Life Style" and the formula of consecration. He will be initiated into the duties of his new state and of the apostolate which, according to his means, he will adopt as his "apostolic project". He will find a member or a Brother who will direct him in his new commitment to the Lasallian way of life of the Signum Fidei. He will join with other members in prayer and work and, if possible, in the same "apostolic project".

Two years are usually sufficient for this preparation but the period may be prolonged or curtailed by agreement with the Brother or Signum Fidei member who "accompanies" him.

Finally, when the time is ripe, the candidate will arrange with the fraternity and with the local Brothers' Community the date when, at the Offertory of the Community Mass, he will make a public Act of Consecration by reading the accepted formula.

It is desirable that the Act of Consecration be made with a certain degree of solemnity and in the presence of Signum Fidei members and Brothers who wish to participate in the ceremony.

A natural sympathy will unite the new member with the Brothers and with the other Signum Fidei members with whom he shares the Eucharistic liturgy, prayer, fraternal discussions and finally the family meal.

Signum Fidei Prayer

"Heavenly Father, in your divine Providence, you have also chosen me to be a sign of faith in the midst of a world filled with confusion and doubt.

Awaken in me and in all the members of Signum Fidei a deep spirit of faith and zeal for an apostolic commitment which, after the example of St. John Baptist de La Salle, will inspire others to consecrate their lives to Christian education.

Bless the work of our brothers and sisters throughout the world. May we all, supported and animated by the Spirit of Love, become more and more "the salt of the earth" and "the light of the world", especially for the poor and those farthest from salvation.

Receive, o Lord, into your glory, our brothers and sisters who have gone before us with the sign of faith and who sleep the sleep of peace. We ask this through Our Lord Jesus Christ your well beloved Son. AMEN."

SIGNUM FIDEI (2)

LIFE STYLE OF THE FRATERNITY

I. EVANGELIC VOCATION

a. The Holy Spirit has called us to be ambassadors of Christ and dispensers of His Word according to the charism of St. J-B. de La Salle.

Our mission is to reveal to the world the love of Christ for the poor and especially for the young by means of evangelization founded on the person of Jesus Christ and on the response to the Good News which He has announced.

This presupposes a close intimacy with Christ our Saviour which Signum Fidei members will try to acquire and develop.

b. Attentive to His call we offer ourselves to the Church for its "edification". We are "infinitely" attentive to all that comes to us from her through our Holy Father, the Pope, and our bishops. This sense of the Church strengthens our faith and informs the apostolic project which we wish to carry out in full ecclesial communion.

II. THE SPIRIT OF OUR FRATERNITY - SIGNUM FIDEI

a. The spirit of our fraternity, inherited from our Holy Founder, is the spirit of faith and of zeal.

b. The spirit of community throws into relief our resemblance to the Brothers of the Christian Schools with whom we feel fraternally united.

III. THE SPIRIT OF FAITH

a. Faith makes us live the love of the Father revealed in Jesus Christ, dead and risen again, and instilled into our hearts by the Holy Spirit.

Faith gives us a new perspective. We see men and events in their reality: men in order to help them to realise their vocation as sons of God; events as sent by God Himself.

Faith helps us to discern how we act in prayer, in the choosing of our apostolic project, in our search for God's will in our Signum Fidei fraternity.

Faith stimulates us in the evangelical service which Christ inspires us to undertake. Through faith we know that He lives in our hearts and is present amongst those who gather together in His name.

b. As Signum Fidei members we animate our lives and our activities with the spirit of faith, we seek God in all things; we regard everything with the eyes of faith; in our actions we turn to God and finally we attribute all to Him.

c. Each day we set aside a fixed time for prayer and meditation on the Gospel in order to meet Christ and to accept with docility what He communicates to us in the silence of the heart. Through the Gospel, read, meditated on, prayed, Christ communicates his personal message to us to make us understand our vocation and to help us to fulfil our commitments. Exchanges of experience with our fellow members of Signum Fidei assure coherence.

d. The life of the Presence of God directs and fills our day. We try to put God at the centre of our lives. With this living, loving presence which radiates through our work, our rest and our family life, we "make no distriction between the duties of our state and the matter of our sanctification" because we do all to please Him.

e. We live this Presence in a particularly intense way and in intimate union with Christ in liturgical and sacramental liturgies. We share daily in the Eucharist Sacrifice and in the liturgical prayer of the Church, if possible in community, in the spirit of the liturgical seasons which we are careful to celebrate.

f. Our Lady is for us, members of Signum Fidei, our Queen and Our Mother. We worship her with filial devotion. Every day we pay her special homage: the rosary and the angelus. Her total "Yes" to God inspires our total giving of ourselves so that He may live in our hearts as He lived in that of His mother.

g. St. J. B. de La Salle is our Father and model. We all want to acquire his spirit, to study his life and his writings, to share his charism and his spirituality. That is why we are anxious to find all the documents which could help us and why we appeal to the Brothers to assist us in our Lasallian path.

h. Each evening, members of our fraternity spend some time in the presence of Our Lord to evaluate their day and to examine their fidelity to their vocation. That is when they recite this "simple prayer" and ask the Lord to send his Spirit on them and on their brothers and sisters in Signum Fidei.

IV. THE SPIRIT OF ZEAL

a. The love of Christ which urges us on is expressed by our zeal to evangelize and this desire makes of each of us a sign of faith; a Signum Fidei in the midst of the world.

God has need of us as signs of faith, capable of revealing to all, and particularly to young people, His love and His message. It is in Him that they will find their happiness, their Christian fulfilment and the motives for trying to create a society more just and more humane.

b. We wish to manifest and to share the riches of Christian life with which God has gifted us, through evangelizing activities, an "apostolic project" in our own area, thus making concrete our collaboration in God's creative and saving work.

c. It is of the highest importance that each member define his "apostolic project" in conformity with possibilities, that he cooperate practically in the work of the Redeemer and that he devote himself constantly and creatively to his "project" while seeking the help of other people in its realization. The realization of the "apostolic project" is a witness to our faith and zeal for the service of the poor and the marginalized — those dear to our Founder and to Our Lord Jesus Christ.

d. The Signum Fidei apostolate is clearly Lasallian: we all try to exercise an educative influence in the widest sense of the word i.e. in the sense of evangelization. All of us, whoever we may be, wish to be "signs" for our own milieu.

e. When it concerns the interests of the Gospel the members form a team or the nucleus of a larger group to carry out a major project or to animate in a Christian spirit other activities.

f. These are the attitudes that our zeal inspires, making of each of us a messenger or, in a manner of speaking, the message itself — joyful and simple:

- — total availability to announce Jesus Christ directly,
- — love for all, especially the poor and the young,
- — desire to help others — groups or individuals — to live as Christians,
- — friendly acceptance of assistance to our brothers in Signum Fidei to discern the will of God in their lives and in their "projects",
- — a positive and encouraging attitude to the young, to parents, to teachers and to co-workers to whom we offer our help and our faith.

On hearing this message, people — especially the young — will understand and accept the wealth that the Holy Spirit brings to all who believe in Him.

V. THE SIGNUM FIDEI COMMUNITY

a. In the Lasallian tradition each Signum Fidei member will seek to join with other members to form little communities where they will meet regularly to live their faith and to share their successes and difficulties.

Together in community we escape from ourselves to throw ourselves into the work of establishing the kingdom of God in our area: in the district, in the parish and preferably in a Lasallian enterprise.

b. All the members of the same region or country form a fraternity at regional and national level. We like to meet regularly in a spirit of joyful brotherhood to rejoice together at God's presence amongst us and to exchange views, reflect and pray as a community. Here we plan our common apostolic project while mutually enriching and encouraging each other and discerning, with the help of the members, the best means of advancing in the spirit of faith and zeal.

c. Each year we make a few days' retreat, in community if possible, to deepen our understanding of the meaning and requirements of our vocation and to reaffirm our gift of ourselves to God and our zeal for the success of our "apostolic project" whether personal or community.

d. At the beginning of the different liturgical seasons we try to find time for reflection and reading so as to enter, with the Church, into the spirit of the mysteries commemorated.

e. Our community greeting, after invocation of St. J. B. de La Salle is: "Live Jesus in our hearts. For ever!"

VI. SIGNUM FIDEI CONSECRATION

a. The members do not make vows properly so called. Instead the Consecration binds us to live according to the precepts of the Gospel. Our poverty consists in moderation and simplicity after the example of Christ; our chastity, in the care we have to live strictly according to our state, and in the dedication of our affective life to the love of God; obedience in the acceptance and fulfilment of the "Life Style" we have embraced and in the willingness to follow the advice of our brothers in Signum Fidei, in mutual love, while striving for evangelical perfection.

b. Following a period of preparation we make our Consecration in response to the call of God. It is, at the same time, the starting point of our new life, dedicated to His service in the edification of the Church, according to the charism of St. J. B. de La Salle.

We call it "Consecration" because it is for us the confirmation of our consecration in baptism and because it fully expresses the meaning of our giving ourselves to the Blessed Trinity. We like its resemblance to the Brothers' formula of vows which was composed by the Founder himself. And we look on it as a prayer, perfectly suited to the beginning and ending of our day, and one which renews daily our membership of the Signum Fidei fraternity.

c. Each year we renew our Consecration either privately or in community. There is nothing, however, to prevent a member, after several years in the fraternity, from making his consecration for three years or for life, after careful reflection and on the advice of his spiritual director.

THE JOY OF LIVING FOR THE SERVICE OF OTHERS

It is always difficult to put into writing and to share with others what, in a certain sense, concerns the most intimate part of our lives. This becomes easier, however, if it helps other people and if it tells them of the joy to be found in serving others.

I am a lay teacher in a hamlet far from the provincial capital of Jujuy. I am married and am the mother of five children. In my life I have experienced a wonderful conversion like that of St. Paul. The instrument of my conversion was a man who, by the example of his life, opened up for me new perspectives: the realization that I am a teacher of love and laughter, the bearer of a message, filled with wonder each day by the simple hearts of children, in short, a Christian teacher because I am a Lasallian teacher.

THE DISCOVERY OF DE LA SALLE AND HIS CHARISM

In a sense I discovered God and de La Salle at the same time, after a life from which God was completely absent. My indifference was suddenly dispelled by a sense of need which was connected with the founding of a Lasallian school for the marginalized in a poor district of the province of Jujuy in the north of Argentina. I took on this work after resigning from my previous post. Without my seeking the present situation, this sense of need became a reality in my life.

The discovery of God came with the discovery of a teacher and of his dedication, his service, his humility and his gift of himself. Discovering de La Salle meant discovering the possibility of doing now what he did long ago. Thus it was that the Gospel passage "Suffer them to come to me" became the inspiration of my professional life.

In the depth of my heart I was anxious to get to know de La Salle better, and as I penetrated deeper into his charism my spirit opened out as if liberty had given it wings. My pupils were not just children whom I happened to be teaching, they were material to be moulded into a new creation, young lives bringing a sense of wonder into my life. I felt a sense of responsibility as a co-creator in the work of the Lord where it is the person who matters not just the instruction given.

The pupils of the school, very poor, badly nourished, poorly clothed and lacking in education, made the task difficult. The hours of class were not long enough. I had to give a little more of my time. From day to day the formation meetings became more demanding. It was at that point that I entered on the way of de La Salle with little daily renunciations and with the difficulties experienced in the formation session of the educative community. To work together in a spirit of fraternal love presents difficulties for which, as de La Salle knew, prayer provides the answer.

Looked at in this light, inadequacies, sufferings, misunderstandings and even discouragement all become sources of joy because de La Salle experienced them also. All these things strengthen the will and are part of service.

One experiences a thirst for knowledge which is not simply a matter of professional duty but a new aspiration: teaching is a way to sanctification and happiness. The school yard is gradually transformed, the sad little faces light up with smiles and the silence gives way to joyful chatter. The Brothers bring their tenderness to all and the lay teachers make a new discovery: that of having been the bearers of happiness to others. What joy de La Salle had brought into my life!

THE DISCOVERY OF FAITH IN THE FAMILY

The charism of de La Salle is gradually becoming part of my life and the little sacrifices made in the service of my school become less painful. I see them as a necessary part of my work. Priorities are appearing in my scale of values. To be born to a new life and to be true to myself are among the first.

De La Salle comes also to the family in the person of little Peter who is poorly clothed and who suffers from the cold, of John, a real little devil, or of Mary who cannot learn the vowels. We share their sufferings and their needs. In this way we grow in faith in the midst of our daily occupations. My work is not just my own, it is that of us all. De La Salle is not for me alone, now he is for us all.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

I read his life to my family, proud of having so important a friend and proud of my profession as a teacher. In this way the Lasallian family becomes a reality. The laughter of my pupils forms a chorus with that of my own children and they are always asking of my husband, José.

However, there is something wanting. I feel an urge each day as I get to know the Founder better, to give myself more and more. As a result we work better, or rather, we live more fully during catechism lessons, at parents' meetings or outings, etc.

THE URGE TO GO TO THE MISSION FIELD

De La Salle puts before us the daily effort: preferential attention to the poor. We must try continually to form a synthesis of faith, culture and life. One's sense of need becomes more and more pressing. In the midst of the joy of discovery and of forming a wonderful community come renouncement and separation. The Claretian priests ask our help and we have to leave all. Once again the words of de La Salle stimulate us and show us the path to follow: "I ask you, O my God, to make known to me your will in this matter. What should decide my choice? the greater glory of God, better service of the Church, my own perfection, the salvation of souls? The same voice that called me here seems to call me elsewhere. It is true that the hand of God, which placed me where I am, can take me away from here".

Thus we were asked to leave all we had built up. It was not "our" work. It was God's work. But if the call of the Lord is pressing, that of his servant is also: go to the poor, to the needy, to the marginalised, "leave all and follow me".

By his life de La Salle speaks to us of Providence, of abandonment... and we find the light and the motivation to act. We have, therefore, left all; friends, school, etc. and have gone. How sad the leave-taking was! The same voice that called us here asked us to leave. We had to begin anew.

How we upset the Lasallian community! The new beginning was not easy, but Christ needs courageous, dedicated Christians, free to talk of freedom, poor to speak of humility, disinterested to speak of the gift of self, gentle to speak of gentleness, confident to speak of hope.

It is what de La Salle says, "Reanimate your confidence in his infinite goodness and do him the honour of trusting yourselves to him without worry about the present or fear for the future, thinking only of the present moment in which you live".

Brothers, that is how I live and though I am not in a Lasallian school I feel more Lasallian than ever in my new life. If God is in my heart here is where he wants me to be among the poor and most needy.

THE REGION WHERE I WORK

The Lord asked us to go, to leave everything and to abandon ourselves to providence in a little village on the high plateau, Abra Pampa, at an altitude of 3,400 metres and at a distance of 230 kilometres from the provincial capital, Jujuy. It is lonely and inhospitable, with intense cold and constant winds.

The village is made up of houses with mud walls and thatched roof and a street of trodden earth. The winter is severe. Poverty brings each day its quota of humiliations. Loneliness and wind are our sole companions and the silence needs continual getting used to.

The people are, for the most part, illiterate, subjected to marginalization and exploitation. They are the "Coyas", descendants of the Incas of the country, silent and almost impenetrable, accustomed only to suffering.

Here as in other places poverty is the mortal sin, hunger crucifies Christ every day, illiteracy is the common lot, children have never learned to smile, here is where labourers are needed for the harvest!

DE LA SALLE MORE ALIVE THAN EVER IN A SCHOOL

This is how the Lasallian star continues to shine in my heart and in that of my family, opening up new paths and bringing new smiles. I explain to people that it is still possible to love, that we are seeking solutions to their problems. In this way life, the Gospel and love enter the community.

At present I am teaching in a government school where there are no Brothers but where de La Salle is more alive than ever. Yes. He is here also! They knew nothing of de La Salle but the desire to share in this service existed unsuspected. The Lord had need of us here.

We form here a really fine Christian community where children are given first place. In addition, catechesis attracts volunteers. We read the writings of de La Salle, share the knowledge of him that we have gained and draw courage and enlightenment from it.

This year, with the help of two lady teachers from the school, we are organizing a course in Lasallian spirituality and we are trying to put it into practice in our daily lives.

We are thus opening up avenues of hope. I pray God to send more labourers to the harvest where we are most needed. We have need of Christians of courage, daring and disinterestedness. God will provide the rest.

THE LASALLIAN LEADER

In our associations, the leader — the person among us who accepts with generosity and a sense of responsibility the task of animating our groups — possesses, as a Lasallian, certain traits and characteristics which are easily recognisable. This is true in almost every case.

VOCATION

Our leader (this is his first characteristic) is certain that he has been called to the work of de La Salle, which is God's work. The holy Founder, the history of the Institute, the living witness of the Brothers urge him towards his specific vocation: the work of evangelization of youth in the family and in the school.

SHARED FAITH

His second characteristic, faith, is the base and foundation of his vocation. It was, perhaps, the Brothers who taught him to live the faith, not as a treasure to be kept to himself but as wealth to be shared joyfully with others. He did this as a child at home and at school and he does so now in his fraternal relations within the Association.

AVAILABILITY AND ZEAL

This is the third characteristic. Loving deeply the task for wich he has assumed responsibility he fulfills it with a constant zeal and complete availability, surrendering himself humbly to the movement of the Spirit. "I trust you, Lord", "I adore in all things the will of God in my regard".

STYLE

All this presupposes, without any doubt, a style, a manner of acting, a way of understanding things, a manner of being. Our leader is or, at least tries to be, simple in his relations with others. He is at ease with their culture; he is guided by faith; he is tenacious in his efforts; prepared for all occasions and situations; he is not easily discouraged; he seeks out those in need and offers a brotherly hand. He offers, he gives, he accepts, he shares, he understands, he hopes.....

HE IS AIDED BY GRACE

But, you will say, if we could find such a person, gifted with so many admirable qualities, should we not put him in a glass case? No. I assure you. There are thousands like him, full of Lasallian charism, generous, available, faithful, devoted to the Lasallian cause in which they remain united. And what of their ability, aptitudes, effectiveness? "Chosen by God they act according to the graces received from Him". Open to the Spirit, "the Spirit himself inspires them what to say" and enriches them with gifts and abilities. I know such a leader, with his personal limitations and lack of time and means. Completely dedicated, he felt forced to act, trusting that God would make up for his deficiencies. The result was a work of high quality accomplished with utter disinterestedness.

SERVICE

What are the fields of action and practical aims of the Lasallian leader and who are the beneficiaries of his services? The Lasallian world provides many outlets for such energy and good will once they have been accepted and canalized. These outlets are to be found in education centres, the Associations and all concerned with them, schools, youth, family, teachers, social work, missions, vocations, etc. There are different tasks and diverse ministries which all have their source in the common evangelizing mission which unites the members to the Institute.

INTEGRATION IN THE INSTITUTE

This must be regarded as fundamental. In effect, the activities of our leaders as well as all individual and group activity undertaken can only be justified if they are — at their own level — connected with the work of the Institute, in intention and in fact. As for the Associations connected with scholastic centres, we could make a long repetitive list of frustrations, wasted efforts, unfinished projects or projects which were badly carried out because the plans were not integrated in the overall programme of the centre and because there was neither understanding nor agreement with the Directors and Communities of the establishments concerned.

MATURITY AND DISCERNMENT

We must demand these qualities from our leaders and ourselves. Older groups, filled with nostalgia and memories and acting under the guidance of the Brother "in charge", have now reached maturity in associative and apostolic action. Their energies must be integrated into the general programme of the educative communities. If not, we shall again experience frustrating difficulties and misunderstandings.

The same mission unites us all in de La Salle: work for the Brothers, with the Brothers, inspired by them and, needless to say, counting on them.

Mixed commissions are today a source of considerable value which we must use and whose great possibilities we must put to work. Thanks to them and, perhaps to them alone, will it be possible to set up and co-ordinate programmes, projects and responsibilities accepted by our leaders. These latter have made clear their availability, no longer for random and occasional roles as in former times but for formal and permanent engagements in the service of the apostolate. Today more than ever we need the concentrated efforts of all. From those responsible we expect attentive consideration and judicious discernment so as to integrate and profit from their availability.

FULLNESS AND CONSECRATION

Besides the educative community there is the religious Community which guides it and infuses it whith Lasallian life. Over and above maturity there is fullness. This is the process which urges our leaders to aspire to something more: to live to the full the spirituality of de La Salle. They love the apostolate and, in their desire to identify with it, seek to go beyond their own vocation by imitating the Brothers in their religious fidelity.

These are the "Signum Fidei". They respond to God's call "by a full acceptance" and "by consecrating themselves to Him in the accomplishment of their mission". They draw courage from prayer and "by making no distinction between the duties of their state and the affair of their salvation". They live the apostolic project they have adopted and offer us the witness of their lives for they are firmly convinced that they must "render an account of those who have been entrusted to them".

Symbols of faith, bearers of new hope.....

PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS OF YOUTH IN TURIN

1. Turin: a city in crisis

The city of Turin with its industrial zone forms a metropolis of one and a half million inhabitants which underwent a radical transformation in 1980. Fr. Sorge, S.J. describes it as an epochal crisis. Turin's main industry — the manufacture of motor cars — has suffered the consequences of the energy crisis and especially of the introduction of modern technology such as the use of "robots" in the production process. A fall in sales coupled with the introduction of new technology has caused a serious drop in employment, the social consequences of which are relieved only by recourse to unemployment payments.

The following figures give some idea of the situation: In four years, from 1980 to today Fiat-Auto has seen the number of its employees fall from 140,000 to 99,000 (of whom 15,000 are not working but are paid by the state). A further reduction of the labour force to around 60,000 is forecast for 1986.

Turin which, during the 60's and 70's had so much work available that a surge of uncontrolled inmigration into the city took place, is now suddenly faced with a grave unemployment problem. There are today nearly 55,000 applicants for jobs and a large number of these are young people in search of their first job. Employment is, therefore, the most urgent problem today, a source of agonizing worry especially for school leavers who risk a long and humiliating period of unemployment.

Marginalization is another disturbing problem, particularly the marked increase in the number of drug addicts. There are more than 10,000 of them in the urban area and the numbers are rising particularly in the 15 to 18 age group. This modern plague of society whose roots are ethical as well as social and cultural, affects all the districts of Turin. Two areas, however, stand out: the well-to-do residential area of the upper class and the working class zone of the proletariate and the immigrants. In other words, the worst affected are the sons of the wealthy and of the poor, while the middle class seems to have greater resistance, thanks to its stronger family ties.

2. Escape through drug abuse

According to the report published by the Commission of Inquiry set up by the Turin City Council and representing all political and social interests, the escape from society through the use of drugs seems to be the result of deep ethical and cultural differences or of the present conditions of economic and social unrest.

The crisis which affects the economic structures of Turin also produces a tendency towards despondency. A marked decrease in the number of marriages and births is evident while the number of those living alone has greatly increased. A large sector of older people lives practically cut off from the rest of the population. There is risk of a wide generation gap appearing in society.

In such a crisis situation we must consider all the causes. If we take account only of the economic aspect we shall have a very limited view of the situation.

There is also a cultural crisis and a crisis of values. The deeply rooted positivism of the two main cultural streams (laïcism with its origins in liberalism, and Marxism) is not able to provide an adequate answer to a completely new problem which surpasses the kind of thinking current at the beginning of the century, and because of which Turin is still represented by the dialectical contrast between Agnelli and Gramsci, between rising capitalism and the worker movement, under the control of the Italian Communist Party.

Today the reality is much more complex. Turin cannot surmount the crisis without the launching of new activities by the "third" sector, that is, by scientific research and by the University. In the process all cultural streams are needed including that represented by the Catholic Democrats.

A new dimension of the city cannot be expressed solely in terms of productivity and economy, it demands from all an awareness of human problems, of ethical problems first of all. Only in this way can a new sense of solidarity come to life capable of offering possibilities to future generations and of preventing the consumer society from creating a new ghetto - that of the old.

3. Responsible attention by the Christian educator

The Christian educator should, above all, be conscious of the imperative need to oppose the tendency to seek solutions to the city's problems which are purely materialistic, characterized by the profit motive or by selfish interests which set one sector of society against another.

There is an equally imperative need, in view of existing tensions in society, to give responsible attention to the all round education of the person which goes beyond purely personal interests. For example, it is difficult to oppose the spread of drug abuse even in school if you do not endeavour to form individual consciences to a scale of values which give meaning to the life of a young person and demand commitment and a sense of responsability to himself and to others.

To be more specific, it seems essential to stress the kind of commitment required at each level of education. In universities and other institutions of higher education which form the future leaders of industry it seems appropriate to insist on their role as enlightened and constructive leaders not only of industry but of society.

It is not, therefore, a question of a school whose aim is preparation for a personal career. The school must also educate the student to make choices which are in accord with the general good. It is development of the human personality which must be given priority in industrial policy, in the conduct of public affairs and in professional activities. This demands a careful study of the life of our society so that an effort and if necessary criticism, can be made to discover new sectors for development and new industrial activity, in other words, to make a contribution to the renewal of the whole life of the city.

In middle and professional schools attention must be paid to the preparation of students for a trade or profession which offers some hope of employment. To this end school programmes must be adapted to the needs of the area, given that a good professional training has important value for the future, for it guarantees employment and protects the person from marginalization and idleness.

The Christian educator must do his best so that the school may not be just an aside in the life of the young person but an essential factor in his personal development and in his finding his place in society.

4. The Lasallian response

Lasallian experience suggests two considerations:

a. You cannot fully respond to the needs of the persons and of society without an education unlimited by the horizontal dimension but envisaging also the vertical dimension. In a society becoming more and more secularized, reference to Gospel values and to a higher Reality seems an essential element for the young person if he is not to be carried away by the myths of the consumer society and the "good life" as an end in itself.

b. From the ideological aims of the 19th century came an ardent aspiration for a new dimension of man with new possibilities towards the absolute. In this context the Lasallian message remains an essential point of reference and should never be watered down for fear of embarrassing certain social and cultural groups.

Three centuries ago, in a France where the middle class was beginning to emerge, St. John Baptist de La Salle gave preference to the poor. Today we must devote our attention to the "new poor" of the post-industrial society. In present day Turin, the "new poor" are the young people threatened by unemployment and emargination and a prey to drug pushers. Whence the special importance today of technical and professional schools which are orientated towards market outlets and are more responsive to known needs.

To provide such a school is to answer in full to the needs of those who otherwise would become the "poor" of twenty-first century society. It is equally important to bring attention to bear on new scientific research and modern technical innovations for it is in these fields that the future of the next and following generations is determined.

5. An agonizing question

There remains the agonizing problem of drug abuse. Here I pose a question: Why do the Lasallian Community and the Lasallian family not enter this field in an educative capacity by the formation of groups of leaders capable of taking the initiative in the fight against drug abuse? In this field there is a void: Few people devote themselves to this work and they often lack the scientific training and the means necessary.

A "school" for volunteers, training the best of the young people, would be a really worthwhile initiative. The same holds good for Turin as for Milan and Rome for the drug problem is the same in all great centres of population.

Like the abandoned children, the vagabonds, the "libertins" of the seventeenth century, the young drug addicts of today are waiting to find on their path a new de La Salle.

BROTHER ARMAND HUBERT: TWENTY YEARS IN A SPECIAL SCHOOL

Introduction:

This Brother, who has spent the past twenty years in the apostolate of caring for retarded children, prefers not to talk of the work which he has done so well. I asked him if I could write these few lines though I have not had the happiness of living with him during those years of dedicated service.

My principal and practically my only source of information is an article, dated 15th June, 1982, which appeared in the review "Equipe" of the District of South Belgium. The article was the outcome of an exchange of views during which Brother Armand Hubert answered questions from about a hundred of his confreres at a meeting held at Mont de La Salle, Ciney (Belgium).

Brother Maurice Hermans

Beginnings:

Like many others Brother Armand Hubert became aware that more and more pupils were not benefiting from the teaching given in ordinary classes. For almost twenty years he had been teaching in primary schools and then from 1962 to 1965 was in charge of the fifth year class in a school of the Brothers in the town of Binche (Diocese of Tournai, Belgium).

During a school inspection, Brother Armand and the Academy's Inspector discussed the serious problem of retarded children. After three, four or five years schooling these pupils have still not learned to read. "With your experience", suggested the Inspector, "you could start a special class for these boys".

In September 1965 two special classes were formed. Five years later there were six. Faced with the same problem, the Sisters in a neighbouring Community formed three special classes for their pupils. In 1972 the special classes for boys and girls were combined in a special school. Pupils and teachers went to live at the château de Clerfayt which had been put at their disposal by the Fathers of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary.

Administration was put in the hands of a lay man but Brother Armand remained in charge of education, a post which he had held from the beginning.

The number of pupils, boys and girls, remains around a hundred. For the most part, they are children who are slightly handicapped or lacking in muscular coordination and unable, therefore, to follow the rhythm and programme of basic primary education. Their defects were diagnosed by the psychologists at a special centre for the purpose. There is a small number of more seriously retarded children, some mongoloid children and some very seriously handicapped children who will never be able to read, and finally there are some with "character" problems — disturbed children.

At thirteen years of age some of these pupils go to a special training school while the less handicapped are able to attend normal technical schools.

The Brother among the children

The Brother is, for these children, not just a Director or even a teacher or animator. He is all that and more besides. The child is at the centre of his preoccupations. It is for him that he established the school so that he might no longer be rejected or neglected. It is with the child in mind that all moves are made and all decisions taken. It is the child who must be made happy in a climate of affection, at once relaxed and calm; it is he who must be helped to develop. In a word, the Brother seeks to put into practice the advice of St. John Baptist de La Salle to his first disciples "to love all their pupils tenderly".

Loving them means, above all, listening to them patiently without ever showing surprise or annoyance at their untimely demands. For instance a boy wants a football pitch for himself and his companions. The Brother goes to a neighbouring farmer with the request and the farmer puts a field at their disposal. A boy wants to make a visit home so he mentions it to the Brother who intercedes with the authorities so that he can realise his wish. For Mothers' Day, a child, instead of buying a gift, makes an object for his mother and it is the Brother who finds the materials and tools to make it. A boy cannot make his profession of faith in his own parish so the Brother arranges for him to make it in the school chapel. Organizing an excursion, remembering a birthday, tending a wound, providing clothes and, perhaps, a gift when the parents have too easily forgotten, all these are the concern of the Brother.

When teachers, off duty, use the time for a little relaxation among themselves, the Brother is with the children. It is at such times, especially, that the children come to him with their troubles.

The Brother and the teaching staff

The Brother is especially careful to see that the members of staff remain united, dynamic and enthusiastic. He seeks to create friendly relations among the personnel. He is close to everyone, always available, and aware of each one's difficulties in the exercise of his educative task.

When a teacher arrives late or is kept at home by illness, the Brother is there to replace him. You can always count on the Brother to do repairs when the school is too poor to pay a maintenance man. It is the Brother who looks after maintenance and most importantly, keeps the central heating going.

The Brother is, above all, the person who understands. You would have to have "gone through the mill" to understand how a class of retarded or disturbed children can test the nerves of adults.

How can anyone from outside or from a distance understand the problems of supervising recreation or the school dining room during the mid-day meal? The Brother has gone through it all. He understands, helps, puts in a soothing word, suggests appropriate action. He can often help adults to understand the sometimes inexplicable reactions of certain children.

The Brother is the moderating and conciliating element in the school. On him depends the maintenance of mutual trust and good relations between pupils and teachers, between the teachers themselves and between teachers and management. The Brother is also the conciliator when it is a matter of relations between those responsible for the school: the Governors, the parents' committee and the teachers' representative.

It frequently happens that the Brother is taken into their confidence by members of staff. He becomes the intermediary between God and the people with whom he works. Some will discuss with him family problems and other delicate matters which they keep hidden from the rest of the world.

At the end of a two-page article in the District review the editor quotes from Brother Armand the following:

"I must mention my contacts with the families of my pupils which take up a lot of time and also the work of catechesis. I spend twenty four hours a week teaching catechism".

"Twice I received special encouragement. Once Brother Superior General paid a surprise visit to the school anf afterwards wrote to me saying, "You are doing wonderful work which is perfectly in line with the purpose of the Institute".

"Our bishop (of Tournai) said to me a few months ago (March, 1982) "I see two fields of action for the Brothers: running special schools like yours, and working among immigrants. Continue to give your witness to the world".

EDUCATIONAL SERVICE OF THE VERY POOR

"Let us not be content to stay where we are, but rather let us go on our way directed by the Holy Spirit, with the aid of our Brothers and the guarantee of the Church" (Circular 412, p. 119).

"Every man carries in himself a fundamental, inalienable value, his dignity as a man". (Movement ATD Fourth World)

For five years I have been working with young people and adults in a "Fourth World" setting in Rheims. I am part of an educational organization known as The Movement to Aid the Very Distressed in the Fourth World (Le Mouvement Aide Toute Détresse Quart Monde). I began this work and continue to do it with the encouragement of the District Council. For two years three Brothers worked with me, one full time and two part time.

In this article I wish to say something about the people for whom the ATD exists and about my own work with these people of the "Fourth World".

FOR WHOM ARE WE CONCERNED?

In every society there are millions of poor workers living at the lowest rung of the social ladder. From one generation to the next they pass on a heritage of ignorance, indigence and violence. Excluded from decent housing, basic education, instruction in the professions, and lacking a national union, they are at the arbitrary mercy of the administration and dependent on the welfare agencies. They form a sub-population which in 1960 was given the name the "fourth World". Although the extent of this sub-population is unknown, it is estimated that approximately ten million people in Western Europe alone are part of this culture, with about two million of them in France. The fourth world population of France is family population estimated at three hundred fifty thousand. The majority of these families are French in origin and have a history of nomadic existence; there are also refugee families who over several generations in France have joined the sub-population.

Sent to the galleys by Louis XIV and relegated by Karl Marx to a rank of "population in rags" this sub-population continues today to experience the sub-human conditions of a life marked by exclusion. The families of the fourth world suffer in every area of life:

Economics: Their income is very low or non-existent; since they have no guarantee of even a minimum wage, they must live by their wits.

Housing: Their housing is always over-crowded and of the poorest quality. Despite the disappearance of large shantytowns their habitations continue to be dirty and dangerous. They are usually located on the periphery of large cities and in the worst environmental conditions — temporary homes built to meet an emergency. The people are to be found more or less hidden and scattered in hovels, huts, tents, cellars, abandoned cars, immobile canal boats and empty factory buildings. The minority of these families who may succeed in getting public housing are rarely able to remain there.

Health: Their health is the worst in the nation. They suffer from tuberculosis, alcoholism, pediculosis, stunted growth and other diseases related to the environment. Their life expectancy is the lowest and their infant mortality is the highest; they are a reminder of France in 1850.

Family: They know the humiliation and the mutilation of being deprived of the responsibility of raising their children. Their family and social lives depend in large measure on the public social and educational agencies.

Education: Unable to read or write, the men and women of the fourth world are stuck in a destructive ignorance which undermines all of life, poisons their relationships and often crushes them. In spite of their efforts they have few chances of advancement and are condemned to pass this heritage on to their children. Unable to use existing political power or union and family organizations, they remain ignorant. They are viewed as "Social cases" marginal people condemned to a life of uselessness and mere survival.

THE MOVEMENT TO AID THE VERY POOR OF THE FOURTH WORLD

The Movement ATD was born in 1957 with the aid of a few families and Father Joseph Wresinski. Since its inception it has fought for the respect and the advancement of the people of the fourth world. Its object is to help these families reintegrate into our collective consciousness and acquire the means of expression which are at the disposal of the majority of citizens. The Movement has three principal goals:

— to see that the recognition of the needs of the most neglected is guaranteed.

— to promote a society which gives absolute priority to the most underpriveleged among its members. Misery is not inevitable but is the result of choices made in the areas of economics, politics, science, culture and religion.

— to sensitize our society to the fact that all our efforts to build a world of justice, peace and brotherhood are futile until we attend to the needs of the poorest among us.

The work of the Movement is focused on three areas:

— the family: acquisition of the means necessary to live a decent family life.

— education: to permit access to the gift of knowledge by mobile libraries, learning to read and write and providing job training for the professions.

— participation: assemblies of young people and adults to learn public speaking and the ways of union representation.

A COMMITMENT TO ACTION

The discovery of the fourth world, existing outside our gates, is a progressive discovery. Twenty years of teaching in the Middle East did little to prepare me for this world. Meeting with close friends in a house for young people, showing the same care, the same ideal for justice and facilitating a group of illiterate immigrants for many years helped me to discover among us those most neglected and living in misery. It was also a time for me to answer some questions in my own life. Through reading and sharing the Gospel, various texts of the Founder, the Declaration and the letter of the Superior of May 15, 1978 I came to the conclusion that I had had enough of discussions about poverty and the poor... it was absolutely necessary to do something! But what? When? Where? And With Whom?

The different organizations and projects with which I was familiar did not satisfy me. They appeared to maintain the poor in a form of assistance, or a state of dependence. They did nothing to respect their dignity or to empower them to take matters into their own hands, to live decent and upright lives. A meeting with volunteers of the Movement ATD was followed by my participation in some formative sessions designed to help me understand the plight of the people of the fourth world. My search was ended! I was able to properly celebrate with my Brothers the Tercentenary and to put into practice my vow of educational service to the poor. It was an occasion for me to return concretely to the sources of the Institute.

My efforts with neglected youth were not successful in a day or two. I was able to meet them straight away because of the history and the work already in existence through the Movement ATD in Rheims. In the first place I was content being present to the youth, meeting them where they were, listening to them, sharing with them a part of their experience, permitting them to be and be known such as they were. I had to win them over in some way. All this work demanded much time and patience, a certain "wasting of time". Secondly, the work consisted in bringing them together, helping them to live together, to listen to themselves, to express themselves, to discover and express their needs, to learn ways of changing that would allow them to take charge of their lives. And finally I was able to convince some of the "official" organizations, who were not as yet open to the most neglected, to pay more attention to this area of our society. I worked as a kind of educational facilitator for a group of young people between sixteen and twenty years of age, the majority of them illiterate and from the fourth world. The situations of these fifteen boys and girls were practically identical:

Material poverty: living conditions beyond the worst one can imagine.

Exclusion: they are practically excluded from all walks of life and especially from the world of employment. They turn in upon themselves and are fearful of leaving their neighborhoods. They are afraid of the unknown in any form and consequently are unable to follow through on a project.

Intellectual poverty: this is easily recognized in the paucity of their vocabulary, the difficulty in handling the language and their inability to progress beyond the simplest thinking. Their intelligence lacks dynamism, their imagination lacks creativity. Their inhibitions, however, are less important than their lack of means.

These divers details help in understanding the thousand and one difficulties which confront the students of the ATD Center. These difficulties are enhanced when faced with the practical: venturing into an unknown environment, a simple trip to another area of the city, remembering the time for a meeting, keeping to a schedule, incomprehension or poor interpretation of information, in general a paralysis of the young person by a milieu which does not believe in his new-born project.

I have attempted to outline the essential areas in my commitment to and my work with the fourth world. What are the Results? For youth marked by the daily weight of misery interiorized over many years the results are not immediate. Neither is it possible to measure them by the usual criteria. By way of answering the question of results and as a conclusion allow me to cite two remarks by parents of these youth. The first from a mother of an eighteen year old girl who had just completed ten months of instruction at the Center, "She was a girl of the streets now she is a woman". The second from a father, living in an abandoned car on a vacant lot, about his son, "Since he has been going for instruction, he no longer plays the fool and the police do not arrest him anymore".

SCHOOLS WITHOUT WALLS

"We are all aware of the problem of illiteracy in developing countries but are we equally aware that the same plague is spreading, little by little, in the areas surrounding our great centres of population?

That was the question asked, in the presence of the Academy Inspector of Pontoise and in that of leading personalities of the Departement, at the inauguration of our second Mobile School Unit for the education of the children of itinerants in the Paris area. That question, asked on 22nd March, 1983 on the wretched camping site of the itinerants of Eragny, found an echo in a recent report published by the Commission of the Mayors of France and which proposed the setting up of a "school without walls", organized by travelling teachers who volunteer for educational work among the "nomads".

In fact, the establishment of the first "school without walls" took place on opening day, in September 1982 when a mobile school unit led by Brother Camille and named "Antenne Mobile Scolaire" first left the St. Joseph de Pantin school yard for a camp site where about twenty motor caravans were parked on the east side of Paris.

It would, obviously, take too long to go into detail about the beginning of this venture, "revolutionary" in the context of the French education system, but which the Minister of Education had foreshadowed in the official regulations of 1970. These proposals, however, remained a dead letter. Briefly we could say that without the prophetic vision and drive of Brother Pierre (see Lasalliana, No. 3, leaflet 03-C-10) and of his small team of Brothers working under the title SIGEVO (Educational Service of Itinerants), hundreds of "gypsy" children would remain irredeemably condemned to illiteracy without hope of escape.

This is precisely the problem underlined by the Academy Inspector of Pontoise at the inauguration of the second Mobile School Unit when he uttered the significant words that warmed the hearts of the handful of Brothers present:

"M. Cote (Brother Léon Cote), by devoting himself to the disinherited, fulfills a mission of the utmost importance and brings to light a very painful problem of which we are not always fully aware within the confines of the established educational system. You and your fellow teachers are truly pioneers! I hope that we may follow your example and, particularly, that we may learn from your experience of the mobile school which I consider the best means of dealing with the problem of illiteracy". Who, precisely, are these people whom we call gypsies, tinkers, itinerants or nomads? In fact, there is general confusion on the part of the majority of people, which does not make it any easier to understand these marginal groups who tend to disturb and annoy right thinking folks.

If we study their origins we find the Gypsies who are of Indian origin and who came to Europe five or six centuries ago. They comprise several ethnic groups, notably Manouches, Sintis, Rom, and Gitans... The Rom are fairly numerous on the east side of Paris and are sedentary while the Manouches continue to live in caravans along the roadsides when there are no parking sites provided for them by the public authorities. In the Paris region alone there are an estimated 20,000 Gypsies. Their total number in France is about 200,000. Practically all of them are French citizens.

The Yéniches appear to have originated in the Germanic regions of Northern Europe.

There are others who do not belong to these two groups but who have lived and travelled like them for generations.

When we consider their way of life we find a people faithful to certain specific ways of acting: an organization based on the nomadic tradition, respect for these traditions, a separate language, a highly developed sense of family solidarity and a strong religious sense.

From a demographic point of view, the population could be divided as follows:

* Young people under 16 years of age: 47% (Total French population: 27%);
* Adults between 16 and 65 years of age: 51% (Total French population: 59%);
* Adults over 65 years of age: 2% (Total French population: 14%).

You will note that the population pyramid follows the pattern observed in the Third World. That is the result of the sub-normal economic, sanitary and social conditions of the itinerants as compared with those of the majority of the population and which demand from society serious efforts to improve them.

On the other hand, polls and inquiries show that the average itinerant family consists of from 4.5 to 6.6 persons. Families with seven, eight or even more children are common.

In the two Departments of the Paris region, Seine-Saint Denis and Val d'Oise, where the Brothers work with the help of the Mobile School Units, the gypsy population is estimated at between 8,000 and 10,000 people. If you accept that the majority of these are itinerants, the number of children without schooling reaches several hundred in each Department. It is to these that our four Mobile School Units go. The creation of these mobile units has been shown as the only workable solution to the problem of educating this itinerant population which no traditional system of education could ever reach.

Besides, the continual changes of location imposed by the public authorities on these unfortunate people, who have been rejected for centuries by almost the whole of French society, make attendance at normal schools impossible.

In addition, most schools find it impossible to teach the children of itinerants in normal conditions since families come and go without warning. Even if they could, the rate of illiteracy of these children, estimated at about 95% in the Paris region, causes them to feel themselves strangers and failures in face of an educational system conceived by and designed for a culture utterly different from their own.

The mobile school unit, on the other hand, allows for adaptation to the specific needs of itinerant children, and takes account of their anxieties and their feeling of insecurity which arises from the contrast between the security experienced in the intimacy of the clan and the threat of the outside world.

Our daily approach to this rejected world is proof of our willingness to accept and listen to each individual itinerant child who wants to learn to read and write.

Our teaching method is, above all, a personal dialogue with each of the children confided to us by the parents. This requires that we work with small groups (on average, eight) who are taken in turn for a maximum of two hours a day. We try to make each group homogeneous as regards rate of progress but we take a very special interest in the older ones. This is because the older children can become, later on, teachers of their own family group. One young girl, after learning our method, devoted herself to teaching a dozen children of her own clan to read and write. As a result, the Gabriel Drolin Centre awarded her a substantial sum of money to help her to continue her work in more favourable conditions.

The method used is that invented by Brothers Pierre and described in Lasalliana, No. 3: "The School goes to them". In the space of three or four months an itinerant child can learn to read intelligibly. What a success for a child who was convinced that "he would never be able to read!" That is why we created quite recently, with the help of the Gabriel Drolin Centre, a "Licence to read" which rewards the child's efforts to reach that stage with the gift of a book token worth 100 francs. What motivation for the 300 or so young itinerants of the Paris region whom our units reach.

What wonderful things have been accomplished in France in the last hundred years of free compulsory education! But how much more remains to be done? That is the problem the school is faced with. More than ever it has need of people who are passionately interested in teaching and education. More than ever is there a need for innovation to "re-invent" the school...

Above all, learning for the sub-proletariat must come through knowledge and love of their milieu, for there, more than anywhere else, you give not only what you know but what you are.

1985: INTERNATIONAL YOUTH YEAR

NUMEROUS AND VARIED

Convention dictates that persons between the ages of 15 and 24 be called "YOUTH". We all know, of course, that the young of mind and heart do not allow themselves to be confined between such narrow limits.

In 1981 the United Nations Organization declared 1985 "International Youth Year".

Demographers tell us that there are about 900 million young people in the world. In the past twenty years the increase in the number of young people was in the region of from 17 to 19%. This is quite considerable, but according to the forecasts of statisticians the actual numbers will vary little from now to the year 2000 A.D. They base their forecasts on the present birth rate but, up to now, short term demographic forecasts have proven rather unreliable.

The division of these 900 millions among countries and continents is far from equal. As everybody knows, the growth rate of the population varies considerably between industrialized countries and developing countries. In the latter the growth rate is double that of the former. It is, therefore, in Latin America, Africa and South East Asia that we can expect the most spectacular increase up to the year 2000 A.D.: In Africa the total number of young people is expected to double in the next twenty years. In China, on the other hand, the number is expected to fall by 10% due to the policy of birth control. There will still be 183 million young people there which is quite a lot for a single country.

FACED WITH MANY PROBLEMS

To these quantitative differences are added the differences in living conditions whether economic, social, cultural or spiritual.

* For many there are the concrete problems of nutrition, hygiene, health and even survival. There are tens of millions who suffer from harsh climatic conditions, static economies and inadequate medical facilities.
* For others there are cultural problems: some receive a normal education and can acquire a solid culture which enables them to meet life's problems while others are condemned to remain illiterate.
* Some are born and grow up in united and caring families while others are abandoned or left to themselves without affection or support.
* Some, forming part of a strong, closely-knit community feel secure and well integrated into a way of life but many others find themselves rejected, forgotten, marginalized, perhaps uprooted by war or by forced migration.
* Happy are those who are healthy but far too numerous are those who suffer from illness or from physical or mental handicaps.
* Some, at the end of their schooling, find employment or enter a stable and respectable profession while others experience the insecurity and frustration of unemployment and see their lives as without hope. Studies of the problem show that, in general, the rate of unemployment among the young is three times higher than that of the population as a whole.
* Some grow up and live in a milieu which has clear and definitive values. Many, especially in industrialized countries, enjoy a high degree of material comfort but are faced with spiritual poverty.

  The International Catholic Office for Youth at present concentrates its efforts on the theme: "The child faced with a spiritual void". Is this emptiness not often the cause of dangerous and sometimes fatal attempts to escape from the situation.

These few considerations are meant to underline the contrasts which characterise the situations of young people and are not just a catalogue of dificulties. They partly justify the description, by a contemporary sociologist, of modern youth as "a troubled generation».

YOUTH YEAR: AN APPEAL TO EDUCATORS

When proclaiming the International Youth Year, the United Nations Organization also indicated the principal lines of action to be taken. The theme centres on three words: "Participation, Development, Peace". This recalls the theme of the Lasallian World Congress in Mexico: "Faith, Solidarity, Service". I would suggest that the word "Faith" be added to the theme proposed by the United Nations Organization. We could then ask ourselves what we propose to do or what we could undertake under these four headings.

Participation:

of the young people with whom we are in contact in the school or in youth groups or movements outside the school:

* How do we plan to increase the participation of the young in the activities, decision and conduct of daily life?
* What place are we prepared to give to the initiatives of individuals and of groups?
* How is it possible to arouse and develop the creative spirit so as to help them to live a fuller life in a world of rapid and continual change?
* What attitudes and habits should be encouraged so that they may eventually be able to take control of their own lives?
* What can we do to prepare young people for changes of profession, of place of residence, of culture so that they can accept such changes in a positive and enriching manner and not as something to be unwillingly endured?

Development:

* How to render, in daily life, the mutual service which is the preparation for a life of solidary with others.
* How to promote an open, generous and disinterested solidarity in the face of glaring inequality whether at home or far away?
* What personal or group commitments do we propose for rendering mutual assistance and for providing help to young people less fortunate than ourselves?
* What role are we prepared to play in welcoming, helping, integrating and sharing with new arrivals in our milieu: immigrants, refugees, itinerants, etc?
* What have we done about Circular 412 on "The Educational Service of the poor and the Promotion of Justice"?

Peace:

* Getting to know one another is a step towards understanding and agreement. What opportunities does our profession afford for improving our knowledge of others and practising mutual tolerance?
* To build peace we must get together, we must meet. What animosities and misunderstandings can we dispel by organizing meetings?
* This year invites us particularly to increase the number of exchanges among young people, to widen their scope and to diversify their nature, in regions countries and continents. What are we prepared to do in this matter?
* Peace is experienced also in affective sharing, in treating people as equals and with respect. What goods, cultural heritage, values and beliefs do we wish to share?

Faith:

* At its General Congress in 1982 the International Office for Catholic Education underlined four essential values that we could consider during this Youth Year: respect for the other person, responsible solidarity, creativity and interior life, understood and lived according to the inspiration of the Gospel.
* To put before oneself and to live these essential values is to contribute to the meaning of life. Is it not a lived and committed faith which gives to life its fullest meaning?
* In this year of 1985, have we planned to celebrate with young people the values and qualities which they possess: their friendship, their solidarity, their hope and their love of God?

In Conclusion:

To educate young people is to form the future, for youth is the future, theirs and ours. They must begin to build it, not just dream about it. It is our task to encourage and help them. The following quotation from the letter of Pope John Paul II to the Congress of the O.I.E.C. in February, 1982, could sum up and conclude this article:

> "The youth of today, fascinated by the progress of modern science, is tempted to accord to science unlimited confidence and to regard it as the supreme value. It is essential, therefore, that the Catholic School show its pupils that the progress of humanity is not measured solely by scientific and technological progress. True progress lies in the priority given to spiritual values and to moral progress. The basically unjust conditions encountered in a materialistic society result in a situation where some live in abundance while others die of hunger. To remedy this evil a new world order is needed and, consequently, an education in the values of justice and love which are its foundation. In a secularized society which has lost the sense of the sacred and with it the sense of morality, there is an urgent need for an education in religious values, an education which enables its beneficiaries to discover the call of faith. It is the duty of the Catholic School to awaken the young to the interior life in such a way that they may be able to answer the call of faith with enthusiasm and generosity". (Pope John Paul II - Letter to the O.I.E.C. - February, 1982).

FOREWORD

In the present number of Lasalliana which comes at the end of the school year 1984-85, you will find, in addition to the usual twenty leaflets, a list of 120 articles published in the last two years.

This list of titles will give you a more precise idea of the diversity and interest of the articles as a whole. The cumulative aspect of a publication such as Lasalliana is important. It invites the fidelity of contributors and readers and the ordering of additional copies of the numbers already published.

During the past two years the number of contributors has increased. As you may have noticed, the names of some contributors appear regularly. This is because the subject they have chosen to treat is the outcome of years of research, particularly on the writings of the Founder. We are grateful to them for sharing with us the results of their labours. Perhaps others will follow their example.

Personally, I think that Lasalliana is one of the publications in which the unity and diversity of the living Institute are most clearly evident. It is a useful means of mutual enrichment, modest, no doubt, but real. The more Brothers contribute to it by writing articles or by helping to publicize it, the better it will become.

With this final number of the school year your subscription comes to an end. You will receive, under separate cover, a subscription form for the year 1985-86 and we count on your renewing your orders. Don't hesitate to bring Lasalliana to the notice of your teacher friends, both religious and lay.

The Brothers in the Generalate who are responsible for finding contributors and for editing Lasalliana thank you for your help and fidelity. They would be grateful for the names and addresses of potential writers, Brothers and lay people, for the coming year.

With kindest regards and best wishes for success in your apostolate of education and evangelization.

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (6)
"Knowing the pupils as individuals"

Previous leaflets (see Lasalliana Nos. 3 and 4) show how "The Management of Schools" aimed at "education to measure" through the practical organization of classes and programmes. Another essential element of the personalized care of children is a thorough knowledge of each individual. This leaflet gives gives some indications as to how this aspect of education was dealt with.

AN ESSENTIAL EDUCATION PRINCIPLE

To get to know each pupil personally is an educational obligation for de La Salle and the first Brothers but it is outside "The Management of Schools" that the affirmation and explanation of this obligation is most strongly expressed.

Without referring to all the relevant texts I shall simply choose Meditation 33 for the second Sunday after Easter. De La Salle uses a passage from the Gospel of the day to develop his ideas on personal knowledge of each pupil. The passage is from St. John, 10,11 to 16, commonly known as the parable of the Good Shepherd.

Let us meditate, for example, on the following passage:

> "In today's Gospel, Jesus compares those who have care of souls to a good shepherd who is very careful of his sheep. One of the qualities which Our Lord says distinguishes him is that he knows them all individually. This is also one of the essential qualities required of those who instruct others, for they must get to know their pupils and discern the manner in which to act towards them." (Med. 33, first point)

PRACTICAL MEANS OF FULFILLING THIS OBLIGATION

It is in "The Management of Schools" that we find the practical means of acquiring this personal knowledge. I refer, particularly, to Chapter 3 of the second part: "Registers" (cf. pp. 133-137 and 233-239 of Cahier Lasallien 24). The third part of the "Management" of 1706 which is absent from the 1720 edition and which is devoted to "The Duties of the Inspector of Schools", gives us more details as to how personal knowledge of the pupils is to be gained (see especially pp. 256-262 of Cahier Lasallien 24).

To indicate the content of this text I quote the introductory paragraph of Chapter Three:

> "One thing that can contribute much to maintenance of order in schools is that there be well-kept registers. There should be six kinds of registers:
> 1. Register of admissions; 2. Register of promotions to grades; 3. Register of sections of grades; 4. Register of the good and bad qualities of the pupil; 5. Register of class officers; 6. Register of those who visited absentees.
> The first two of these registers are for the use of the Inspector of schools. The teachers will use the next two and the last two will be kept by the pupils." (Cahier Lasallian 24, p. 133)

A careful study of what is said about the different registers makes us realise how much their regular use helped the teachers to acquire a detailed knowledge of their pupils. We must add to these specific means the importance placed on vigilance throughout "The Management of Schools".

One gets the impression that the information provided by the registers formed a precise X-ray picture of the personality and behaviour of each child: his family background, his previous education, the different stages of his development since admission, his progress through sections and grades, the essential elements of his character, his absences and their causes, and even his conduct outside of school — between the school and his home.

SOME PRECISIONS

• THE ADMISSIONS REGISTER: When a child is admitted into a school, at the beginning of or during the school year, various items of information are entered in the register. You find, for example:

— a page giving his identity, that of his parents or guardian, his home address, whether he has made his first Communion and been confirmed;

— a note on his school situation: the grade and section in which he has been placed, his individual time-table, if this is necessary, his regular, authorised absences, his previous school or schools and the reasons for changing;

— remarks on his personality as he becomes better known. Observations concerning his character traits, his reception of Holy Communion, his regular attendance at school or his absences, his attitude to work and lessons, his promotion to sections and grades.

"Concerning all these matters, the Director will enter in the register what he judges appropriate" (p. 234). Discretion is assured since only the Director has access to this register.

• THE REGISTER OF PROMOTIONS: As promotions took place every month in the organization of the Lasallian school the filling in of the register entailed a considerable amount of writing. The registers provided a mine of information on the running of the school for in them one could see the results and from the results judge the quality of the teaching and follow the progress of the pupil. The register contained, also, brief notes on the pupil's conduct. Mention was made of his late arrivals during the month, his absences with or without permission, and the results of his regular recitation of the diocesan catechism.

• REGISTER OF THE GOOD AND BAD QUALITIES OF THE PUPIL: This was a kind of synthesis of the observations made by the teacher during the course of the school year. Each teacher had to prepare this report during the month of August, the last month of the school year. In it he gave his estimate of the pupil's personality as he saw it at that moment: his character, his conduct in class, his piety, his obvious faults, his good qualities, his punctuality, his relations with his parents, offices held during the year. The report was prepared under fifteen different headings as presented in "The Management of Schools". The object of all this work is clearly stated in the Management: "To get to know his pupils and the manner in which he should act towards them".

It is interesting to note also the following passage: "The Director will keep them all (registers) and will be careful to compare those of previous years with those of following years, and those of one teacher with those of another of the same class and same pupils to see if they agree or differ on some points or on all." (page 236) Here you should re-read the example given in the "Management" (Cahier Lasallien 24, p. 237).

• THE REGISTER OF CLASS OFFICERS AND VISITORS TO ABSENTEES: Both these registers were meant for pupils whose attendance was irregular: late comers and absentees. They helped also to keep a check on the conduct of the pupils.

We know that absenteeism was a serious problem at the end of 17th and beginning of 18th century. The reasons for this were many and to study them we would have to refer to the biographers of de La Salle and to the historians of the Institute.

We also know that one of the main preoccupations of the Founder was to make the Brothers' schools attractive and well organized in order to stabilise the school population. In this he was eminently successful.

These two registers provided a daily check on presences and absences in the large classes of the time and recorded information about those who were absent and the real reasons for their absence.

IN CONCLUSION

The evocation of this complex system of checking the pupil's progress and recording his personality traits could give the impression of an administrative system which was both annoying in its detail and in no way conducive to personal relations. We must, however, remember the size of the classes at that time. The large number of pupils in each class required constant vigilance and precise means of control.

We must, above all, go back to the thirty-third Meditation, and particularly to the second point, to understand the spirit in which the Brothers were invited to get to know their pupils. It was not a question of cold and distant relations but of relations of mutual love and affection:

> "It is also necessary, says Our Lord, that the sheep should know their shepherd in order to follow him. Two things are required, therefore, of those who have charge of souls and should characterize them. Firstly, they should be very virtuous in order to serve as an example, for unless they walk in the right path, those who follow them would be led astray. Secondly, they should manifest great tenderness for the souls confided to them, so that anything that might be capable of injuring or wounding these souls will call for their attention. In this manner the sheep will love their shepherd and be pleased in his company, since they will find therein their repose and their relief". (Med. 33, 2nd point)

It is, therefore, a question of mutual knowledge through relations marked by affection, for you only know a person well if you love him.

> "One sees well only with the heart. The essential is invisible to the eye" (Antoine de Saint-Exupéry, Le Petit Prince, p. 72).

WHY AND HOW WE SHOULD READ THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS

1. WHY?

On the day we consciously and freely decided to follow in the footsteps of St. John Baptist de La Salle we undertook certain duties and acquired certain rights. The effort to get to know him as a person became for us a categoric imperative from the moment we decided to follow him.

Coherence with our option and the Lasallian character of our way of life require that we make a serious study of the writings of our Founder. In them as in the calm waters of a deep lake we see reflected his image and his soul.

Whatever profession a person follows we expect him to know something of its origins, its evolution and the principal dates of its history. In the history of education the Management of Schools constitutes a document which the student of pedagogy should know both because of its intrinsic value and because of the influence it has had on millions of students and thousands of teachers. That influence continues since the spirit of the Founder continues to inspire Lasallian pedagogy.

The return to their sources so strongly recommended by the Second Vatican Council to religious in general and by our own 39th General Chapter (The Brothers of the Christian Schools in the World Today) imposes on us the duty to study the teachings of our Founder and to get to know him thoroughly. We should undertake our studies, not as an exercise in archeology, but with a view to adapting the teaching of St. John Baptist de La Salle to the reality of modern conditions.

Much has been written, and with competence, on the pedagogic innovations introduced into primary education by the Founder and his early disciples, but we must continue to study and make known the educational philosophy of St. John Baptist de La Salle, the philosophy which inspires all his writings but particularly the Management of Schools.

2. HOW?

Like every pedagogical work, the Management of Schools is the work of an author who lived and acted within a given society. We must take these two factors into account when we read his book. Besides, the society pre-dated the author.

Between the school and society there is an interaction — a symbiosis. The school reflects society and at the same time works to change it. It forms a link between past and future. Pedagogic action implies that one applies one's memory to what happened in the past, that one applies one's will-power to control the events of the present and that one uses one's intelligence to foresee what will happen in the future.

An exhaustive study of the Management of Schools presupposes a knowledge of the philosophic trends current in France during the second half of the seventeenth century and the early years of the eighteenth. The influence of Descartes did not cease with his death in 1650 but continued with his disciples. The "Sun-King", ruling on the principle that "L'Etat, c'est moi" dominated the entire period by his presence.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

It is equally important to be acquainted with the pedagogy of the time as formulated in the numerous regulations for the "Little Schools". Among the most important are those of the Precentor of Paris, Claude Joly (not to be confused with his namesake, the bishop of Agen). The "Parochial School" is even more important because it was beyond doubt one of the sources of the Management of Schools.

Lastly, the reader should be aware of the semantic value of many words in the text which have changed their meaning in the course of the years.

Environment and events, as the philosophers point out, shape the "I". St. John Baptist de La Salle did not discard the pedagogy of his time. On the contrary, like the bee, he took the best of what he could find in the manuals and what he had learned from his own experience. Passing through the prism of his noble and virtuous personality, existing educational theories and practices combined to form a multicoloured spectrum of educational ideals, balanced, creative, personalized and progressive. That is why, if one wants to read the Management of Schools with profit, one must keep in mind this background, study attentively the educational system proposed, and try to penetrate the psychology of the author which influences every page of the work.

A Lasallian will read the Management of Schools as a testament left to him by his predecessors. They devoted their best efforts to its compilation, to putting it into practice and to successive revisions of it. Its use throughout the centuries has formed generations of citizens and Christians to the benefit of the state and of the Church. That was the aim envisaged by the saint of Rheims.

I consider a reading of the capitular document "The Brothers of the Christian Schools in the World Today" as the best preparation for reading the Management of Schools. Many pages of this document contain the quintessence of the Management. The Capitulants, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, have brought together and made available in modern language the educational thinking of the Founder.

We must not regard the Management of Schools as a handbook for daily use in modern schools or as something of an anecdotal nature, but as the pedagogy "perennis". The adaptation of our Rules in 1966 did not mean for us a change of identity. We remain consecrated persons, animated by faith and zeal and living in community. Following the advice of a poet of antiquity, let us remove the outer bark and penetrate to the sap, let us leave the dead leaves to be carried off by the wind and let us hold fast to the trunk which has its roots firmly planted in the good earth.

CONCLUSION

If the reader now feels the urge to read the work of the Founder I would recommend two sources: first the princeps edition (anastatic reproduction) in the Cahiers Lasalliens, No. 24, and even more strongly, the text with a study, published by Brother Anselme. The introduction to this study is brilliant and the accompanying notes illuminating.

THE DUTIES OF A CHRISTIAN (5): Theocentric or Anthropocentric?

In the history of spirituality and catechesis the terms "theocentric" and "anthropocentric" are often presented as opposites. In this respect what was the formula adopted by St. John Baptist de La Salle?

From a careful examination of the pages of De La Salle's treatise we can state categorically: neither theocentric nor anthropocentric but christocentric because God and man meet in the Person of Jesus Christ. With St. Paul we can express it thus: "God in Christ, the salvation of the world" and again, "Christ the Saviour who makes sharers in his life all those who believe in him".

Considering the important place given in the "Duties" to the Person and Spirit of Jesus Christ I shall limit myself in this article to the instances where Christ is presented as Head and Soul of the Mystical Body. I would like, at the beginning, to point out some illuminating facts in relation to this matter.

THE NAMES GIVEN TO THE SON OF GOD IN THE "DUTIES"

The name Jesus Christ is the one that flows most readily from the pen of the saint — no less than 352 times. Then, but less frequently, comes the name Jesus — in 82 passages. We find the expression "Our Lord, Jesus Christ" 39 times and "Our Lord" 36 times. The expression "Son of God" is used 26 times. The fact that the word "Christ" is used in 4 passages only deserves our attention. Was it because the preceding appellations had a greater anthropocentric signification?

Though these 546 repetitions do not, of themselves, prove the christocentricity of the "Duties", they, nevertheless, give a revealing indication of the author's thinking. Other expressions such as "Spouse", "Redeemer", "Mediator", "Saviour" etc., frequently found in the "Duties", point in the same direction.

JESUS CHRIST IN THE MYSTICAL BODY

1. The mystic reality

According to De La Salle we must seek the ultimate and existential meaning of the Mystical Body in the saving will of Jesus Christ who, having come to save all men... unites them in one single body "because he has established a new religion and has given to men a new Law". (1).

This body, mystical and real at the same time, is the prolongation of his "divine-human" Person. Consequently, "to disobey the Church is to disobey God and Jesus Christ" (2) because the Church has received from Christ what properly and exclusively belongs to the Son (3): his power and authority as well as his doctrine.

2. Jesus Christ: Head and Heart of the Mystical Body

Just as in a living body it is the head that directs the whole body, so "Jesus Christ... is the Head... who leads and governs invisibly" the Mystical Body of the Church (5). Since the Church militant requires visible leaders, the Church's pastors, who represent Christ, govern it in his name and with his authority (6).

In the Mystical Body the grace of Jesus Christ is not only a directive force, it is also an animating and life-giving force through the action of the Holy Spirit whom he communicates to its members who are united with him in charity. A leitmotiv of the "Duties" is that the faithful are Members of Jesus Christ and that to be considered as such they must be united with Christ in charity. These two aspects respond to each other as do the chords which form a melody.

3. From Baptism to Extreme Unction through the Eucharist

In Baptism Jesus Christ takes possession of the Christian, incorporating him into his human nature and through the intermediary of his sacred humanity putting him in relation with the divine Person of the Word Incarnate. He communicates to him "the Spirit of Jesus Christ" by which he unites him to himself so intimately that God considers him from that moment as a "Member of His Son made Man" (7).

The personal union of the baptized person with the Head attains "community" dimensions which extend to all members of the Mystical Body of the Church. It is on this union that the "Duties" base the love we owe to Christians more than to other men (8). Furthermore, this loving intercommunication extends beyond time and space and makes the Church, militant, suffering and triumphant, a single Body in Christ Jesus (9).

The union within the Body of the Church has its own sacrament: the Eucharist. It makes the unity of the Body real because it contains really and substantially Him in whom the Church is One: Unus panis, unum Corpus. De La Salle writes that this sacrament is called Communion because it unites closely to Jesus Christ those who receive it, and that those who communicate are united by a sincere and visible love (10). It is the union of the members with the Head, and of the members among themselves in the love of Christ; in a word, the communion of the whole Mystical Body.

When he speaks of the effects of Holy Communion, De La Salle stresses that it unites us so closely with Our Lord that we form but one and the same Spirit with Him (11). These mystic effects extend even to the bodies of the communicants which become, in effect, Members of Jesus Christ... living Tabernacles of the Most Blessed Sacrament (12).

4. The Christian becomes one with his brothers through Jesus Christ

Sanctifying grace flows in a constant stream from the Head to the "Members" as long as these remain "united" to the Head by charity as the branch is united to the vine (13), that is to say, as long as they remain living members, because Jesus Christ does not communicate the effects of his merits to dead members" (14). Consequently, the sufferings of a Christian have a redemptive value and and are a complement of his Passion if the member is animated by charity (15).

In conclusion, the whole life of a Christian should be that of a branch united to the vine because if one is content to be a Catholic without being "united interiorly with Jesus Christ it is of no avail to salvation" (16). This union must, however, be habitual to the Christian so that, at the end of his life, he may be able to say, "that he wishes to remain to death in union with Jesus Christ", symbolized by the lighted candle placed in his hand by the priest who administers the sacrament of the sick (17).

THE MEDITATIONS FOR THE TIME OF RETREAT AND THE DIRECTED RETREAT (2)

The Meditations for the Time of Retreat in the context of a directed retreat:

As stated in part one of this article, the role of the spiritual director is to assist us in paying attention to God, as God is revealing himself in our lives, and to help us in recognizing our reactions to God's revealing and in deciding on our responses. Lasallian spirituality is admirably suited to foster this movement. By the Spirit of Faith and Zeal we are formed to a posture of looking for God present in every aspect of life and responding to God concretely in our daily activity. The purpose of a directed retreat and the Meditations for the Time of Retreat is co-extensive, as indeed it must be, since both are expressions of the one spirituality of Jesus found in the Gospel.

In the Meditations for the Time of Retreat De La Salle shows himself to be a remarkable spiritual director; he exhibits a profound understanding of the fundamental movements of the spiritual life. The Meditations for the Time of Retreat enunciate clearly the normal flow of these movements in a Christian spirituality: the awareness of a loving and forgiving God inviting us into relationship the way we are at the moment; the contemplation of the life and ministry of Jesus with a view to becoming His disciple; our lives as sacraments of Jesus present in the world helping others to discover the kingdom of God. Because the Meditations for the Time of Retreat are both biblical and historical, they root the Gospel in our experience of relating to God and others, especially our students.

The fundamental movement in a Christian spirituality is the experience of a God who loves us unconditionally as we are; a God who continues to be faithful to us in the midst of our own infidelity. The Meditations for the Time of Retreat begin by presenting us with an image of a loving and forgiving God who desires a relationship with us:

> God is so good that he not only brings us into existence by his act of creation but also desires that all of us come to a knowledge of the truth. This truth is God himself and all that he has willed to reveal to us through Jesus Christ, through his apostles, and through his Church. God desires all of us to be taught this knowledge that our minds may be enlightened by the light of faith (MTR 193:1).

Notice the personal and relational language of De La Salle: God is good, God desires. The truth spoken of is personal Truth, relational truth, God Himself! The knowledge spoken of is a felt knowledge, an experiential knowledge, a living knowledge, a faith experience of this personal God. The language is reminiscent of the creative language of Genesis where God creates in His image, blesses and fills with life:

> God created man in his image;
> in the divine image he created him;
> male and female he created them...
> God looked at everything he had made > and he found it very good. (Genesis 1:27,31)

The movement of the Meditations for the Time of Retreat is a biblical movement beginning with images of Genesis and ending with images from the Book of Revelation. The Meditations for the Time of Retreat, like the Scripture which inspires them, tell the story of salvation in sixteen simple but pointed reflections. But they are a special story of salvation: the story of God interacting with De La Salle and with us, inviting us to discover how God is present in our lives. As John the Baptist invited his disciples to recognize Jesus present in their midst and to follow Him, so De La Salle does the same for his disciples. As a good spiritual director, De La Salle points to Jesus and then gets out of His way! Again as a good spiritual director, he points to the events of our lives as the place to meet Jesus:

> Examine before God how you are acting in your ministry and whether you are failing in any of your responsibilities. Come to know yourself as you are. (MTR 205:1)

Lasallian prayer is an apostolic prayer; the fundamental act of this prayer is the ongoing dialogue with God about the reality of our lives. We are invited to share with God and with one another what is the truth of our experience: "Come to know yourself as you are," says De La Salle! We will come to know ourselves as we are when we come to know ourselves as God knows us, this is the truth of our lives and this is what both a directed retreat and the Meditations for the Time of Retreat are all about. Joys and sorrows, hopes and anxieties, gifts and sins, loves and hates, successes and failures, the daily life of interpersonal relationships, these constitute the "stuff" of our lives. The agenda, the content for a directed retreat, is the reality of my lived experience shared honestly with God. The Meditations for the Time of Retreat are an invitation to lay before the Lord what is happening in my life and ministry today:

> You must then devote yourself very thoroughly to prayer in order to succeed in your ministry. You must constantly represent the needs of your students to Jesus Christ, explaining to Him the difficulties you experience in guiding them. Jesus Christ seeing that you regard Him as the one who can do everything and yourself as an instrument to be moved only by Him, will not fail to grant you what you ask. (MTR 196:1)

The Meditations for the Time of Retreat help us to focus our lives of Faith and Zeal by asking in different ways two fundamental questions: How is God present in my life today? What is God asking of me in this situation?

Ways of Using the Meditations for the Time of Retreat in a directed retreat:

In the context of a directed retreat the Meditations for the Time of Retreat can be used in various ways, the director always being careful to respond to what is happening in the prayer of the retreatant so as not to impose the Meditations for the Time of Retreat in an artificial manner. Perhaps what is needed is to focus the image of God better; Meditations 193, 195 and 196 are excellent for this purpose. Maybe the retreatant needs to deepen his/her understanding of ministry; Meditations 195, 196, 199, 200, 201 and 202 will be most helpful here. If the quality of my personal prayer is the issue, Meditations 195, 196, 197 and 198 will have much to say about this exercise.

The Meditations for the Time of Retreat may also be prayed with a view to salvation history and the great mysteries of God in my life: the act of Creation in 193; the mystery of the Incarnation in 195 and 196; the Redemption 199 through 204; my response to God's goodness in these mysteries in 205 and 206; the desired union with God spoken of in 193 comes to fulfillment in 207 and 208.

Using the Meditations for the Time of Retreat in conjunction with the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer can be a rich experience of Lasallian prayer. For example: consider God present in the place in which we are using Meditations 193 through 196; God present in us using Meditations 197 & 198; God present in the Church using Meditations 199, 200, 203 and 204.

Simply to use the Scripture of the Meditations is another way of making the Meditations useful as prayer material. Or to use the first six Meditations as a unit of prayer is helpful. In aretreat of eight, fifteen or thirty days the Meditations may be used as they are, one at a time or in different groupings.

The most effective way to use them seems to be as they are needed to move the prayer of the retreatant. In other words, be selective as to how they are to be used. Do not follow any particular sequence, but when something in the prayer of the retreatant seems to suggest that a particular Meditation or a particular point of a Meditation would be helpful, then use it. The director must be very attentive to what is happening in the prayer of the retreatant and know when and how to introduce material to deepen the prayer experience of the moment.

Neither the directed retreat nor the Meditations for the Time of Retreat is a program to be completed in some prearranged fashion. Like the Scripture the Meditations for the Time of Retreat are a means to an end. They are an aid, a method to help us enter into dialogue with the Lord. They are an invitation to us to write the Scripture of our own lives from our relationship with the Lord. The Meditations for the Time of Retreat are to stimulate our prayer; they are not the prayer proper. When we finally enter into dialogue with the Lord then the Meditations for the Time of Retreat have served their purpose and should be put aside. In the hands of an experienced spiritual director the Meditations for the Time of Retreat can be the catalyst for a powerful prayer experience. Coming as they do from the intimate personal relationship of God with Saint John Baptist de La Salle they are their own best advertisement of success. They are a magnificent expression of De La Salle's wish written in his letter to Brother Barthélémy:

> It seems to me that what I desire in prayer is that God make known to me what he wants of me and that he put me in the dispositions he would like me to have.

NEEDS OF YOUTH IN FRENCH CANADA

The four French-speaking Districts of Canada are in the process of rethinking the role of the Brothers of the Christian Schools today. They are asking themselves what kind of image do they project and what the reality behind the image is. They are also asking what are the most pressing needs of present day youth which call for their concerted apostolic efforts. An inter-district meeting was held at Cap Rouge to consider the type of Brother required to meet the needs of Canadian society at the present time. Another meeting was held later. More than one hundred Brothers attended, including five young Brothers. These young Brothers and the four lay resource persons told the assembly what they expected from the Brother of today.

The following are brief sketches, by the members of the inter-district committee, of their vision of the ideal Brother who would meet the expectations of Canadian youth:

The Brother should be "a man of the people", prepared to share the life of the working classes, living in more modest surroundings and capable of giving real, not token assistance.

A man in work clothes i.e. a person who is not satisfied with a comfortable boring existence, a man who spends more time in work boots than in patent leather shoes, a man who thinks of something other than his personal comfort and wellbeing and who rejects the consumer mentality.

A "radiant" person, idealistic, dynamic, in love with life, having a positive outlook, happy to be himself. This does not mean to say naif, simple minded, childish, short-sighted or light-headed. He should be convinced that he is the depository of the salvation brought by Jesus Christ, in other words, a man who radiates the joy of life.

A man independent of structures, capable of improvisation, able to live with a variable time-table, with insecurity. He is, nevertheless, not absolved from attention to the Word of God nor from community life, for otherwise his life would have no meaning.

A man of God who radiates Jesus Christ, a man of faith nourished on the Word of God and by the sacraments, who sees everything with the eyes of God and who expresses his faith in terms adapted to the circumstances of modern life.

A man "free and inspired", not a slave to hypersensitivity which results in paralysis, a man capable of changing his view of things and his way of acting. Nothing in this life is cast in concrete. A broadminded person, ready to accept new challenges and attentive to new needs. In effect, a man freed from himself.

A man who is not afraid to show affection, tenderness, warmth, tolerance and mercy. A man full of the joy of life, not a "wet blanket".

A man who can "work in harness" i.e. as a member of a team, who carries out his commitments, who accepts responsibility and who inspires trust. A man who can involve young people and work with them.

A prophetic person who can take a wise view of things and who looks to the future. An interior person who sees things in the light of faith, not superficially, and who gives a meaning to life.

Let us now compare this ideal image of the Brother as envisaged by the Brothers themselves with that of the five young panelists aged from 18 to 22 who were invited to the Collège Marie-Victorin on 29th September 1984 to tell us what they expected and what they considered the most important needs of modern youth. We quote the following extracts from their most significant observations:

"The young person needs love and affection. You are a free person and I am so happy that you freely chose me as your friend."

Johanne Gravelle

"Young people want to feel themselves active members of a society which includes adults and young people. They need to be valued, to have concrete projects, to have aims in order to develop. They need to feel useful, to have a job, to be listened to with respect and to be allowed to run their own lives."

On the human and Christian side, young people must have the means of discovering and sharing real values: love, friendship and mutual aid. This presupposes certain changes in the world of education and recreation. They need forms of prayer and celebration more adapted to their needs as well as facilities for meeting other young people.

The young expect from adults open-mindedness, help in satisfying their needs, freedom to choose for themselves and no harking back to "the good old days".

Marie Bourgault

"In the matter of faith they want to be made acquainted with the Word of God. They would like to know Jesus Christ but without undue pressure. They expect adults to commit themselves to the welfare of the young and ask them to teach by example as well as by word. They will not accept the 'Don't do as I do but do as I say' mentality.

I would ask you, above all, to act towards the young with sympathy and love. They will remember what you are more than what you say."

"A major problem is the lack of communication between young people and adults (parents and educators). Young people are afraid to say what troubles them. In Québec the suicide rate is very high. We must listen to young people but in order to do so we must reach them. The way to reach them is to provide a meeting place where you can engage them in conversation, make friends, listen to their cries of distress and discuss their problems with them. Jesus gave his message to the people through the things that interested them! He was able to make friends and disciples among them. He was one of them.

Young people need to believe in something. They seek the light but find only drugs, alcohol and the new sects. Brothers, where were you when they made their choice? You who should be the teachers ready to light the path of your neighbours.

The young do not feel at home in the Church. Pope John Paul II reminded you that you should help us to find our place in it because the Church can exist only if we form part of it. Help us to bring our dynamism to the service of the Church.

You have asked me what kind of people we need, people who will help us to make society our own. We need inspiring leaders, men who can take us out of ourselves and make us interested in others. We need counsellors to help us in the choice of a career. We need youth centres where we can meet, find amusement and get to know one another. We need people who will help us to a better knowledge of our faith and of our Christian vocation. And lastly, we need men and women of good will to create a world of peace and love."

Réjean Dicaire

"A young person needs to be somebody in the eyes of someone. He or she needs to feel loved, cared for, noticed. 'Look at me' said a little girl to me one day. We must take time with them over simple things. We must trust them and believe in their good qualities. I myself decided to meet young people on their own ground, where they, not I, had the upper hand, that is to say, in the street, in the school playground, in the home, in places where adults were not in control. We must undertake projects with them and in doing so we must live in an evangelical manner. We must radiate Jesus Christ because the young need a 'spiritual master'.

Young people make gestures and ask to be allowed to commit themselves. They need models to identify with; adults who will treat them with respect and take them seriously. They need people of real love, of truth, of depth, of simplicity, of daring, of patience and of openness. They need people who are father, mother, brother and sister to them, different from but at ease with them.

Helping young people to really live the Gospel values, to organize their lives, to find solutions to their problems, to love as Jesus loved, and to enjoy themselves together is quite an education for an adult. It is impossible without God and without the presence of people who lead an interior life and who are capable of helping young people to grow. What is clear is that young people want something solid. It is not the easy and the superficial that they are seeking."

Sister Jacinthe Quévillon, P.S.S., Social worker

The following are the results of a poll of 282 students taken by Brother Gautier, FSC, on the needs of the young, together with the questions asked.

A group of educators wishes to hear your opinions on the present situation of young people so as to be able to respond to their needs. You can help them by answering the following questions:

1) What is, in your environment (school, family, society) the biggest problem and the greatest need of young people today?

2) What is, in your environment (school, family, society) the factor which prevents you from being as happy as you would like to be?

3) If, in your milieu (family school, society, friends) an adult were prepared to do something for you or for other young people, what would you ask him to do?

To questions 1 and 2, 136 answers mentioned the lack of love and affection, of attention, of understanding and of a willingness to listen on the part of adults. 70 mentioned problems related to drugs and drink. About 70 spoke of problems of adolescence: lack of self confidence, lack of freedom, too many pressures, the fact of not being treated as adults. 41 spoke of unemployment, lack of money and fear of the future (nuclear war).

In answer to question 3 which concerns our role as helpers, the young want us to be more attentive, more available and more affectionate. If adults would put themselves in young peoples' shoes fewer young people would be rebellious.

Brother André Gautier ends his report by stating, "Having read these answers I feel more and more the desire to do something for these young people."

The last adult to give his opinion is a lawyer, with three children of his own, who looks after a centre for young people in trouble.

"A young person needs understanding and complete acceptance. He needs hope and he needs Jesus Christ. The Brother is well placed to respond to the needs of today's youth. In the matter of education, make use of your experience and skill. Concentrate on the young people whom society has given up as hopeless:

1) Provide a training centre where 'drop-outs' and illiterates can learn a trade. 2) Take prompt and effective action with trade schools, unions, and other organizations to ease the transition from school to work. 3) Contact social workers and guidance counsellors with a view to helping young people in trouble. Provide temporary lodging, spiritual guidance etc. 4) Give direct and sustained help to young delinquents...

I invite the Brothers to profit by the International Youth Year to reflect on their role as educators in our society and to examine seriously the possibility of adopting a general (inter-district) policy of action and participation in the social, religious, and community life of the area in which they are called to work. They must do this if they are to respond to the pressing needs of the young in the spirit of the evangelical counsels and in such a way that they may be seen as representing Jesus Christ, the Saviour."

OPERATION MIGRATION
A Community Project in Africa

"The service of the poor through education is a work of preference for us as Brothers of the Christian Schools. This is made clear by the sense of unity among men in the world today, by the appeals of the Second Vatican Council and of recent Popes, by the fact of our religious vocation which dedicates us in a special manner to the imitation of Christ and by fidelity to the specific intentions of our Founder". (Declaration 28,1)

The migration project had its origins in the realization by those in charge of the mission at Nkolmébanga, 40 km. north of Yaoundé, that something would have to be done about the serious socio-economic problems of the area. They were moved to action by the desperate situation of the village people and particularly of the youth of the region.

It was not simply a question of bringing aid to the people but of radical change and improvement through the acquisition of more land, training in agricultural techniques, development of health services, and Christian education.

The Brothers were asked to take charge of the project because of its educational character. This meant bringing the school to the village. After all, the Institute gives preference to the poor and commits the Brothers to the service of those whose poverty constitutes an obstacle to their human development and to their reception of Jesus Christ. (C.R. 1g)

I. A REGION IN DECLINE

The Department of Léiké is situated in a forest region to the north of Yaoundé. The population is engaged almost exclusively in agriculture and the towns are comparatively small. Living conditions in the area are becoming more and more difficult as the population continues to increase and the land becomes exhausted due to misuse.

Traditional methods of farming combined with the lack of fertilizers, either natural or chemical, and the impossibility of resting certain areas because of pressure of population, have caused serious deterioration of the soil. Léiké was the first Department to introduce cacao production. Plantations cover one third of available land but the average age of the trees is 35 years. Production is around 250 kg. per hectare whereas it could be 1000 kg. per hectare. Most of the plantations will have ceased production within a short time because of ageing of the trees.

While the region experiences a decline in agriculture the population is increasing at an alarming rate to a density much too high for the type of agriculture practised. The Nkolmébanga mission area has a population density of more than 150 to the square kilometre. The result is that there is not enough land available for the younger generation and there will be less in the years to come.

However, on the other side of the river Samaga, the Department of Mboan has a population density of only 5 persons per square kilometre and has ample land available. A recently built bridge makes communication between the two Departments easier with the result that many villagers from Léiké have moved of their own accord to the other side of the river. But such migration is becoming more difficult because of the rise in the price of land caused by the influx of settlers. People have to move farther on and it is then that the real problems begin.

One senses a feeling of despair among the people in the face of a hopeless situation. "The earth is dead", they say. The fall in production has brought a reduction in money income resulting in a mass exodus from the countryside which could have dramatic consequences for the country in a very short time: ageing of the rural population and overcrowding in the towns with all the social and economic problems that that entails.

But the people have neither the material means nor necessary techniques to prevent exhaustion of the soil or to undertake a migratory movement in reasonable conditions: cost of transport and installation, food supply for the first year while awaiting new crops, infrastructures such as roads, water supply etc. In the face of such a hopeless situation the people remain passive because they do not know what to do to escape from it and have not got the will to try.

II. OBJECTIVES OF THE MIGRATION PROJECT

The aims of the project are simple: to restore life to the village and to make the people masters of their destiny. Restoring life to the village does not mean creating new structures to "serve" the villagers — structures that collapse as soon as the organiser departs. It consists in meeting the people and finding out their needs, in helping them to organize their own lives, in restoring hope to the adults and giving the young an interest in village life. This is what is happening in the pioneer village of Issandja-Mifoumbé where we are creating an attractive, dynamic village community.

The first thing we had to do was to set up a village. It was not easy in a forest region where there was no road, no water supply, not even a hut. But necessity is the mother of invention!

Re-settlement on new land solves only the immediate problem. The essential is to ensure that the same problems will not re-appear after a generation or two. It is necessary, therefore, to open up new horizons for the people by educating them. With this in mind we help them to try out new methods of farming to increase production while maintaining the fertility of the soil. We concentrate on two kinds of cultivation: growing of food crops by the women for home consumption and production of cash crops, mainly plantain and cacao, by the men. In this way the families are better fed and there is more money for the purchase of tools, equipment etc.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

To enable the people to lead healthier and fuller lives we encourage them to form village health committees to look after water supplies, sanitation and the setting up of local pharmacies.

A community which takes in hand its material welfare should also take charge of its spiritual animation. Beginnings were slow but at present five pioneers are undergoing a course in doctrinal formation. You may ask, why five? It is because animation of the community must be a communal effort. The community must not avoid its responsibility by passing it over to a semi-permanent catechist. Many villages without a priest, in some of the older Catholic countries, could well copy the Sunday liturgy of Mifoumbé!

III. MIFOUMBE - AN AUTHENTIC VILLAGE COMMUNITY

The site given by the chief of Issandja at 12 kilometres from the village has now become the new village of Mifoumbé.

1. On the material side

— 62 holdings, each of 8 hectares, have been staked out and fenced. 59 pioneers have begun planting banana and cacao trees. Some of these are already producing.

— 59 plots of savannah land, each of 50 ares, have been allocated for the building of huts and the production of food. 40 huts have been built and 12 more are under construction.

— Two buildings (part brick) have been erected — one for the Brothers and the other, the "Pioneer House", with a tool store, an office for the group leader, a clinic and a meeting hall.

— The school is almost finished and awaits authorization to open.

— A well has been sunk and some dozens of toilets provided.

— A village palm grove has been planted with specially selected saplings.

— Roads, bridges, etc. are in course of construction.

2. On the human side

— 59 pioneers, between 40 and 50 of them permanent. Others come and go, discouraged, no doubt, by the initial difficulties and by family problems. Some came simply to claim land but with no intention of remaining. The average age of the pioneers is 40 years but 16 of them are under 30.

— A community of three Brothers who initially confined themselves to teaching the village children but who now admit children from other villages.

3. Community organization

This village is not just a collection of individuals. It is an authentic village community welded together in hardships and effort.

The first pioneers drew up pretty strict regulations for the life of the group: rules for admission and exclusion and for the ordering of village life. A council, elected for three years, is responsible for applying the regulations and for the organization of the weekly community work. This is essential in a place where there were no roads, bridges or buildings and which received no help from the state. The council also settles disputes among the pioneers who meet regularly on Tuesday evenings. A kind of direct democracy!

It is this cohesion, in spite of the inevitable tensions, this community organization, not necessarily evident in view of natural individualism, which has brought the village into being, and helped it survive through difficult times and put down roots. The role of the Brothers in the village is more that of catalysts than of leaders. Our financial limitations do not permit us to play such a role.

4. The part played by the Brothers

"The service of the poor... requires a genuine participation in the life of the poor... a courageous, personal and community practice of poverty". (Declaration 34,2)

The presence of the Brothers at the founding of this village community is not without importance. We also have experienced an exodus. We also have lived in precarious shelters and gone without food. It is not enough to accompany the migrants. One must live with them, share their joys and their sorrows and take part in the construction of their village. It is this "living-with" people which has created between the Brothers and the pioneers a bond of fellowship.

5. The village and the local Church

The migration project was launched by the Catholic mission. It is encouraged by Msgr. Zoa, Archbishop of Yaoundé, who sees in this kind of work a form of the Church's presence and her interest in the whole man, both body and soul. We are trying, in this project, to follow the lines of "Populorum Progressio" and Paul VI's letter to Cardinal Roy. But a lot still remains to be done to make this a work of true evangelization. Does the same not hold good for every Brother irrespective of the form of his apostolate?

CONCLUSION

The work we are trying to do is very different from that of Brothers in the classroom but it has the same purpose: to help those with whom we come in contact to become masters of their destiny. We feel that we are truly Brothers in this work for the village and the future of its people. What can be more exhilarating than to give hope to people and to provide land for the young who did not dare hope? It is an exciting experiment in which our community is privileged to share, but much remains to be done before we can really "announce to the poor a Gospel of liberation", to quote the Cameroonian theologian, J.M. Ela, and before we discover the full prophetic meaning of the words of John Paul II, "Man is the way to the Church".

THE BROTHERS AND THE ASIAN REFUGEES IN FRANCE

As an introduction to this article I wish to call attention to two realities. The first concerns figures. Between May, 1975 and October, 1984, 107,000 refugees from South-East Asia came to France, 700.000 went to the United States and approximately 900,000 went to various other parts of the world including Israel.

Besides the total of these figures we must not forget that a great number rest on the ocean floor because only about 50% of those who tried to flee in boats ever reached land.

The second reality is the suffering endured by those who were picked up from the boats and accepted by other countries. After having paid their passage by a lifetime's savings they were taken on board frail and often overcrowded craft. They then ran the risk of being intercepted by coastguard patrols, of storms, of hunger and thirst, of the break-down of engines and of being attacked by pirates from Thailand. These latter, attracted by the hope of finding gold and by the women and girls on board, were guilty of the most heinous crimes: murder, rape, robbery and kidnappings.

So, when at Easter, 1978 I was asked by Vietnamese friends, priests and lay people, to do something for the children of my compatriots, I could not refuse. I agreed, but what could I do? How could I find the money? Where could I begin? I was only a refugee, myself.

However, together with the Vietnamese Brothers already in Paris, I decided to do what was most urgent. In conjunction with other organizations, both official and private, we helped with administrative forms, translated identity documents, wrote letters, tried to find lodging and work, got the children into schools and taught children and adults to read.

Without money, without support... for two years I was practically alone except for a young Vietnamese woman refugee who helped me with the work. Occasionally two Brothers helped me during their free time.

Little by little our work became known. The Ministry of the Interior recognized our literacy classes and from 1980 on we were accepted as a legitimate organization with a variety of activities. We run literacy classes at four different levels for ten hours a week each. We run supplementary courses for secondary school students in all subjects. We organize social, cultural and religious activities throughout the year with special functions at Christmas, Easter and the lunar New Year. We have monthly student meetings, guided tours in spring and summer and annual family vacations for the cost of the food. We have a lending library, an information office, a choir and a music club. On Wednesday and Saturday afternoons as well as on Sundays more than 100 students come to ALDER (Lasallian Association for Aid to Refugees) for help with their studies. Many families put their homes at our disposal for meetings. We five Brothers, three of whom have reached retiring age are, carry on this work from our house which has become a reception centre, open all day.

We have no fixed income and must rely on donations from well-wishers and annual membership fees. As Vietnamese refugees we are looked upon with distrust by an administration which, in spite of appearances, is prejudiced, while others have the benefit of government subsidies during their period of studies in France.

Though we have managed to maintain our activities for the past five years, it is only since October, 1983, and thanks to the opening of the house at Ivry, that we have known anything like comfort. This house, bought by the Region of France and put at our disposal, is the most appreciated, but not the only help we have received from the Brothers. We have also formed many personal friendships with individual Brothers and have found them most useful, but it is the house at Ivry that has been of most benefit to us.

Unfortunately, the initial objective of the Association has still not been attained: that of helping to educate the young people whose families were suddenly transplanted from a partly closed society to one which is wide open and often permissive. We are the first to regret this, as are many of our friends because, in their eyes, we are the best fitted for the task by reason of our vocation and the success of our work in Vietnam during the hundred or so years from 6th January, 1866 to 30th April 1975.

We share their point of view but for different reasons. Vietnam is a country in a permanent state of war since the Japanese occupation in 1941. When the Japanese left in 1945 we had the war of independence from 1946 to 1954, followed by the war against North Vietnam, 1954-75. At present we are at war with Cambodia and there is always the nationalist guerrilla. People under 40 years of age have never known peace. The ruins which continue to pile up after nearly 50 years of war will not be easy to rebuild. Those who, at the moment, in Vietnam, have to struggle for their daily bowl of rice, for the shirt on their back, or for the elementary freedom to think, to work, to move from place to place, to meet or even to sleep peacefully in their beds, are not the people to carry out this task.

This challenge awaits the generation which will have benefited, abroad, by the opportunity of gaining a better human and professional formation. But will they be able for the task of reconstruction if they are beginning to dissipate the only heritage that they brought intact from their native land: their culture, their language, their history and their traditions, and if they follow the same path of decadence which we deplore in other populations of immigrants from the Third World?

Sociologists interested in the case of immigrants, particularly Chinese and Japanese into the United States in recent decades, say that you cannot count on the first generation because they are taken up with the struggle to adapt and to earn a living, and that you can rely on only part of the second generation who are often disappointed with their milieu and reject it. Only the third generation is well adapted to the host country and at the same time faithful to its ethnic origins. Consequently those who care for the future of their people must work on the second generation in order to form the third.

The lesson is clear for us. To me it seems that this is a providential mission for us Brothers who are messengers of the Gospel and people in whom the sense of country and of ethnic culture finds a certain resonance...

An inquiry conducted by those in charge of Polish and Catholic Armenian pastoral centres shows similar preoccupation with loss of identity. The Poles, who came to France in large numbers after the second world war, and the Armenians who came after the first, have educational centres in schools or other establishments under the direction of religious of their own nationalities. The pupils of these schools are mainly Poles or Armenians though they live in a predominantly French milieu. Though only a small proportion of the children of both nationalities attend these schools, those in charge feel that they are serving their respective countries while leaving pastoral care of the people to their own clergy.

This dream which we have cherished from the beginning and which we have not yet been able to realize could have given rise to a community effort capable of creating a spirit of real unity and fraternal sharing, as well as a rallying point for our fellow countrymen scattered around the world. It could also have provided a formation centre for those in search of God while awaiting the moment to reestablish the District of Saïgon in a country united and at peace.

It is with this in view that we propose to create a system of mutual aid to meet effectively the needs of the refugees. Everything else is but a temporary expedient.

A SCHOOL CO-OPERATIVE FISHING PROJECT

"It was apparently for this reason that God, who does everything with wisdom and gentleness and who does not force the acquiescence of man, wanted me to commit myself completely to the care of the schools. He acted towards me in such an imperceptible manner and over such a period of time that one commitment led to another without my having foreseen it from the beginning." (St. John Baptist de La Salle: "Mémoire des Commencements")

UNFORESEEN BEGINNINGS

I find myself caught up in a complex which started off as a simple initiative but which now threatens to take me over completely. It all began with my arrival in St. John's College, Antalaha, in the month of October 1981.

I arrived in a college about which I knew little and in a strange environment on the north-east coast of Madagascar. There were then about 600 students in the secondary department of the college. There are now 1150.

What surprised me at the start was the high degree of absenteeism. The principal cause of this, in a wooded area with a damp climate, was malaria. Poor sanitation and drainage prevent the people from effectively combatting this disease.

I spoke of this to a Jewish friend who, in turn, mentioned it to one of his friends in the "Secours Populaire Français" and to other friends who are involved with "Enfance et Partage".

Thanks to these connections we were soon able to organize the distribution of nivaquine in the college: three tablets per student per week. This is the remedy currently in use in the country.

The distribution of medicine enabled me to form personal friendships with the students and to learn about their living conditions. I soon realized that besides malaria many of them suffered from malnutrition which made them more vulnerable to the disease. The majority of our students, in fact, come from villages scattered throughout the forest areas and live away from their parents during the school year. It would be more accurate to say "survive" since their material conditions are so precarious. Few among them, for example, can afford to eat meat or fish at home. Milk products are scarce and far beyond their means.

I described these conditions to one of the men in charge of "Secours Populaire Français" when I was thanking him for a consignment of medicine. Like myself, he found it paradoxical that people living beside the ocean should find it difficult to buy fish. In the end he offered to finance the purchase of fishing equipment and the setting up of a small co-operative fishery.

REALIZATION OF THE PROJECT

Surprised by this proposition I spoke to the local fishermen and then consulted the Administration Committee of the college. Thanks to their advice and help the project gradually took shape. The delegates of the European Development Fund soon became interested and encouraged me to go ahead. That was in December 1982.

Assured of financial support I commissioned the building of a three ton fishing boat but it was still risky. The Small Projects Office of the Republic of Madagascar showed some interest at first but the project was eventually financed jointly by E.E.C. and "Secours Populaire Français", each providing half the cost.

Essential equipment for the boat came only in July 1983 and she put to sea on 10th March, 1984. She is a fine boat of 20 tons gross and 7 tons nett, with a 15 horsepower diesel engine. We named her "TSIMANAKAVA", a Malagache word which could be translated as "Without discrimination" or "All together for a better world".

PRESENT ACTIVITIES

During the past ten months the boat has been in service when the weather permitted. Each evening the boat's crew of four, together with four boys from the college, put to sea. The catch is sold at the college at half the price charged for fish in the neighbouring town.

Results so far have been very satisfactory:

— cheap fish can be bought by the students themselves,
— despite sea-sickness, about twenty students are really keen on fishing,
— local fishermen are also interested. There is such keen competition to put to sea that we have had to establish a rota for the crews.

Success has brought further needs:

— to improve safety measures at sea,
— to increase the size of the catch,
— to satisfy a greater number of crews.

The order for another boat has been placed but we need about 40,000 francs (4,000 dollars) to pay for the engine. For the new boat we need a 22 horsepower YANMAR 3GM diesel engine capable of powering the boat and towing one or two local dug-out canoes. The organizations which financed the first boat are not in a position to finance the second one so aid from the readers of Lasalliana would be more than welcome.

THE FUTURE

In the course of the present month we are going to introduce new techniques by installing sonar on the boat and using modern nets. I have lots of ideas in my head... This region is potentially rich but the living conditions of the people preclude new initiatives.

Unfortunately, the young people who come to the college from forest areas dream only of obtaining the baccalauréat in order to move later to the capital. They are drawn to the bright lights of the city and want to escape the harsh conditions of life in the villages. Efforts must be made to bring minimum conveniences to the villages, to provide attractive employment and to create living conditions which will encourage young people to stay in the country areas. We have already tried to introduce stock-raising and the cultivation of soya beans, but only on a very small scale.

These attempts obviously run counter to the habits and ways of thinking of the people. We do not pretend to have found the secret of getting people to take their lives in hand and to widen their horizons. Too often they seem to adopt a fatalistic attitude.

The young people entertain the illusion that manual work is too hard and that diplomas will bring easy money. I could cite other examples from daily life which could give rise to pessimism and discouragement in the face of the immense task that lies ahead but this is our contribution to the work of God and our reason for continuing.

CONCLUSION

Two expressions of the Abbé Pierre could summarize the purpose and inspiration of these activities:

— to live and to help others to live,
— to make God's love credible.

Perhaps I may be permitted to add that the activities outlined above are, for me, additional to my full-time work of teaching second cycle classes in St. John's College.

LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY (3) By whom?: The Lasallian Family; new role of the Brothers

For some three hundred years the Brothers have received, lived, and passed on the Lasallian ideal, aided for a number of those years by men and women collaborators in an important but secondary role.

A CHANGING MODEL

This traditional model of FSC-lay collaboration has virtually collapsed everywhere. It neither can nor should continue to exist. It is not merely a question of a diminished number of Brothers. It is more the call to full apostolic participation of all Christians, and the willingness of so many well-formed, highly motivated men and women to respond positively to the challenge.

As the percentage of lay teachers in US Catholic schools has increased (from 8% in 1944 to 75% in 1982) we have progressively shared positions of responsibilites. Yet at the same time many of us felt frustrated, perhaps demoralized, that Brothers' schools, as we once knew them, were things of the past.

But lay teachers as well as Brothers have wrestled with the implications of this dramatic change. Many dedicated lay teachers in the FSC world are expressing the desire to participate not only in positions of authority in the school, but also in the Lasallian spirit and FSC tradition. The 40th General Chapter studied this development, calling it the Lasallian Family Movement, and strongly encouraged it. What has happened in recent years is nothing short of remarkable. Numerous districts of the Institute have organized frequent and effective workshops and retreats for lay collaborators in Lasallian spirituality and ministry. The response has surpassed all expectations.

There is a high degree of desire and readiness for identification with the Lasallian tradition. US Toronto participants in the Mexico World Congress were amazed to hear teachers, parents, young people speak of "our" Founder and of the spirit of faith and zeal in association.

The older model of FSC-lay collaboration — a triangular model, if you will, is yielding to a circular model. On points of this circle are the Brothers, the administrators, teachers, staff members, parents, former students, board members, friends, benefactors, students themselves.

A NEW FSC ROLE

In this circular model of Lasallian Educational Ministry, the FSC have a crucial role to play, but a different role from the past. This role is to animate, that is, to give spirit, support, vigor, and zest, to move to action, to encourage. We exercise this role of animation not only as individuals, but as communities. Determining precisely how is an essential moment in the process of formulating the Community Annual Program. Our communities ought to be "impact centers", giving spirit to the Lasallian Family, sharing, as the trained Lasallian disciples we should be, the richness of our heritage. We claim no special holiness or academic or professional superiority in virtue of our life-style; but we do claim this particular role of animation in Lasallian spirituality and Lasallian Educational Ministry.

Brothers, I know that what I'm describing is feasible only in FSC schools. But when we work in collaboration with other religious institutes or in other non-FSC schools or non-school apostolates, we can still represent personally and communally the values that constitute Lasallian education.

BY WHOM? THE LASALLIAN FAMILY

I want to insist that nothing I have said indicates in any way a "watering down" of the FSC vocation. We must avoid all ambiguity and lack of clarity with regard to FSC identity. The Brothers, on a point of the Lasallian Family circle, have a distinct identity as consecrated men. Nevertheless, the answer to the question BY WHOM? is not: Brothers of the Christian Schools with lay collaborators. The answer is rather: the Lasallian Family animated by the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

WHAT?

"The end of the Institute is to give a Christian education to children". (Rule of 1705) General Chapters throughout history, including the last two General Chapters, have strongly reaffirmed this orientation.

ELEMENTS OF LASALLIAN EDUCATION

The topic assigned me — Lasallian Educational Ministry — prompts us to ask whether there is in fact a specificity to Christian education that can legitimately be called Lasallian. I think there are clearly discernible elements in our tradition that make it possible for us to speak of a Lasallian expression of Christian education: attention to persons; special concern for the economically poor and for all "down and outers"; commitment to excellence; creative and adapted education; dynamic religious instruction and pastoral service; promotion of justice and peace; faith-filled and zealous teachers in association.

The composite of these elements gives us a picture of WHAT of Lasallian Educational Ministry. I'm not concerned whether other religious institutes have an understanding of their mission that is similar. We do not define ourselves in terms of who we are not, but in terms of who we are and what we are all about.

It is this understanding we want to share with other members of the Lasallian Family. For the next few minutes, however, I am going to focus specifically on our own relationship to Lasallian Educational Ministry.

THE MINISTRY OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

"It is true to say that the Brother exercises an apostolate whenever he truly educates" (Declaration, 41). The Institute has always given the central place in this Christian education. But it has never dissociated the teaching of religion from the rest of education, or devoted itself to religion alone. There has always been the concern to link the work of evangelization with growth in education and culture (Declaration, 40).

We are ministers who are educators; we are educators who are ministers. Our vocation requires that we be well-trained, professionally and academically, that we be life-time students. It demands also that we be prepared sufficiently in theology or religious education to be instructors of religion, as well as pastoral animators. While the teaching of religion will not always be feasible, it should be considered normal activity for the Brother. We cannot accept lack of adequate preparation as an excuse for not teaching religion. We have to remedy the lack. And there is no country in the world where continuing education in religious education or theology is so readily available.

MINISTERS TO YOUTH

But more than teaching of religion is required in our mission. We are called to be youth ministers, experts on youth, specialists in helping the young grow in the life of faith. Whether we are teaching religion or not, we can be actively involved, part-time or out-of-school time, in campus ministry, in the prayer and liturgical life of the school, in leading youth groups of prayer and Christian service, in helping with youth retreats, in counselling and spiritual direction of young people.

In some countries today there are full-time district-level administrators charged with the promotion, animation, and coordination of pastoral ministry in the schools of the district. The overwhelmingly positive response of young people to these movements is a clear indication that they are looking to us, Brothers of the Christian Schools, for help in growing as Christians.

But I repeat, Brothers, that Christian education is our ministry; the pastoral animation of the young is one dimension of that ministry. To reduce the mission of the Brothers, as some are inclined to do, to pastoral service is to opt for an apostolic scope far too narrow to be in any sense healthy.

LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY (4): FOR WHOM?

"Our consecration constitutes us messengers to the young to declare the truth that sets them free". (Rule, Chapter 9)

"Messengers to the young". While our service is not limited to the young, they are our principal focus. God has confided them to our care.

By vocation we are leaders of youth; guides for parents and others working with youth. We have to know young people, how they think, what their hopes, aspirations, problems are. We have to know how to reach them.

The youth we are called to serve by preference are youth who are poor. Our Rule is unambiguous that we are directed by preference to the poor. (Rule, Chapter 1) The 40th General Chapter insisted that orientation towards the direct service of the poor become the rule rather than the exception in district priorities, and that when we are not teaching the poor directly, we must be effectively educating our students to a commitment to justice and peace.

SOLIDARITY WITH THE POOR

Whatever their particular commitment, says the Declaration, the Brothers want to be in solidarity with the poor. (Declaration 32, literal translation) Solidarity with the poor is a good umbrella expression: the Brother is a Christian educator in solidarity with the poor. This solidarity commits us:

1) To "see" the poverty that exists, at home and abroad; to seek to understand the underlying issues.

2) To "feel" poverty and the effects of poverty — which implies exposure to and familiarity with the world of the poor.

3) To know the social teachings of the Church.

4) To be sensitive to our own attitudes, feelings, prejudices: and be disposed to confront them, and, when necessary, to change.

5) To live as persons of ordinary means or modest condition (Rule, Chapter 6) — otherwise we become too "at home" in the upper middle class environment; as De La Salle says, we'll "acquire rich tastes and will no longer be able to refrain from applauding the language of the rich, however pernicious it may be." (Last Will and Testament)

6) To take stands, to be willing to get involved, to put ourselves on the line, giving evidence that we are men in solidarity with the poor, people who really care.

7) To educate for commitment to justice and peace. I have the impression that we have made significant progress in this area in the United States. Since we must help our young people "see" the poor and learn the social orientation of the Church as well as give them the opportunity to serve, it is encouraging to know that such programs are enjoying high priority in our schools.

8) To serve the poor directly through education, at home and abroad. The 40th General Chapter challenged each of us "to volunteer for this educational service of the poor wherever the most urgent needs present themselves". (Proposition 13) A significant number of Brothers have said YES to this challenge. The list includes Brothers of all ages, including Brothers legally retired from teaching. If we do not see such service as feasible for us we should, nevertheless, support the district in placing "no obstacle, even under the plea of maintaining existing works, to Brothers who volunteer for this educational service." (Proposition 13)

THE QUESTION OF NEEDS

This orientation by preference for the education of the poor does not represent an option for one specific social class and the rejection of another. Nor does it imply that those who are not poor have no legitimate needs. It does mean, however, that we resist the temptation of labeling anyone with needs — namely everyone — as poor, thus stripping the word of all meaning. Thank God our First US Regional Chapter declared unambiguously: "By the word poor, we mean the economically poor" (Acts, p. 42) This no-nonsense stance does not, however, conflict with our grand tradition of reaching out to all "down and outers" — youngsters with behavior problems, the handicapped, the retarded, the emotionally disturbed, the intellectually slow, etc...

It is in this context that we must understood the expression: "serving those most in need." These are in the first place the economically poor people whose needs are not being met, either at all or satisfactorily, by government, Church, or anybody else. The Second US Regional Chapter had these same people in mind: "In this region, the economically dependent, the unproductive, and the victims of any kind offer the Brothers the greatest opportunity for service. These poor are excluded from a fair share of society's benefits, in spite of their desires and efforts; they lack many opportunities necessary to make their lives more fully human." (Acts, II Regional Chapter, pp. 47-48).

THE HISPANIC PRESENCE

Such economically dependent are many and I hesitate to specify any one group. Nevertheless, I want to call attention to the Hispanic population. The publication last December of the US Bishops' Pastoral The Hispanic Presence: Challenge and Commitment, together with the debate generated by the proposed immigration legislation, has made all of us more aware than ever of the needs of immigrants in the United States. In the last century Catholic schools responded creatively and admirably to the needs of Catholic immigrants. Today, according to the Bishop, Catholic educators must turn their skills to meeting the educational needs of Hispanics.

I know that we have many Hispanics in our schools and that we are making every effort to reply to their plea for help, even by the creation of new works. I want to affirm what is being done and at the same time urge the districts to commit even more men to this service. The need of elementary education of young Hispanics is keen. Many high school age students need remedial help. Adult Hispanics need to learn English. Can our high schools and colleges do even more through special evening and weekend programs?

There are unlimited possibilities for the service of immigrants as well as refugees not only from Latin America but from other countries as well. It is encouraging to know that some Brothers are actively involved and fully supported by their districts in diocesan programs for refugees, immigrants, and other minorities generally, exercising positions of leadership.

My specifying the Hispanics and other immigrants and refugees is certainly not intended in any way to minimize our very necessary service of poor US citizens. But it is to recall that we must always be sensitive to new needs, as well as to the perennial needs that never cease to challenge us.

SERVING THE POOR WHERE THEY ARE

Several times, Brothers, I have used the phrase "Service of the poor, at home and abroad". And the poor of the world are, proportionately, abroad. Today there are approximately sixty-six US Brothers serving very significantly in a number of foreign countries. That is approximately 4,4% of our personnel. I think the percentage should be higher. Brothers from the US are urgently needed to live, serve with, and support local Brothers not yet sufficiently numerous or not yet adequately trained to take responsibility for their apostolic projects; to maintain existing commitments where there are few or no local Brothers; to promote local vocations and to assist in programs of initial and continuing formation; to respond to special needs and to make new foundations in reply to the urgent requests the Superior General receives regularly.

Most of the poor areas of the world can provide educational opportunities for only a fraction of the school-age population. The needs, therefore, are urgent and demand our serious consideration. That the US/Toronto Region is presently reviewing its missionary commitments is good news. It is, of course, essential that this review take place in close communication with the Superior and the General Council, who are charged with the responsibility of coordinating our Institute missionary endeavors.

THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL (4): A place of interpersonal relations and pupil participation

1. THE SCHOOL: A CHRISTIAN AND HUMAN COMMUNITY

De La Salle was a man of his time. For that reason his pedagogical writings contain some principles which are now outdated. We cannot deny, however, that there are others which are modern and still relevant today. We find there, in embryo it is true, but still valid: the psychological study of character, an essentially practical education for life, attention to the child's background, the participation of the child in the running of the class, care and attention given to the individual, etc.

In the study of the Lasallian system there is something with identity of its own which must be preserved and developed. I mean the educative relationship between teacher and pupil as well as the pupil's active participation in the educational process. We would say today that every school should try to become a human community. The Declaration underlined for us the constitutive elements which such a school community should possess:

— human relationships which encourage dialogue and acceptance of persons as they are;
— a margin of liberty which allows the pupil a degree of responsibility for the conduct and discipline of the school.

From the beginning, Lasallian pedagogy has tended to make of the school a community where the child is at the centre. It sees him as a person whose potential must be developed by affording him all the help he needs. The child is, first and foremost, a person. In the school the relationship of love is the only one that can make all other relationships valid. The child is more affectivity than intelligence. Everything he thinks about reaches him through his emotions.

The Lasallian school is Christian which implies that it is open to all without distinction of class or colour. It is gratuitous: it freely gives what it has freely received. The Brother makes a gift of himself to others. His time is his pupils', he belongs to them. He lives for them.

The teachers are called Brothers, not masters. They are not functionaries working solely for a salary. They are not content merely to give instruction because they do not separate instruction from education (2).

Brother, not priest. This has clearly marked us and, in my opinion, happily so. Our schools have always been distinguished by simple relations with our pupils and with other people with whom we come in contact. We were always able to come down to the level of our pupils and mix with them as one of themselves. I don't think the Brothers found it difficult to accept the democratic demands of modern society. We were always accustomed to them. We had only to improve and perfect them.

We are conscious that distances between classes have lessened, that interpersonal relations have become simpler, that more importance is placed on the personality of the individual. The personality of the teacher is marked by humanity. That is the quality we like to see develop in a teacher (3). Teachers and pupils go through a process of mutual education in the practice of the precepts of the Gospel and in the fulfilment of the duties required of them by their respective situations (Med. 202). Pupils and teachers help one another to live in a manner worthy of God. This is apparently the meaning of de La Salle's Meditation 198,3.

The presence of the Brother among the pupils has as its purpose to help them to live in a manner worthy of God. It is what the Brother does when he predisposes the pupils to have the same sentiments and the same dispositions as Jesus Christ (Med. 198,3). In this way the Brother becomes for his pupil a guardian angel and a guide to his path (Med. 197,1) Teacher and pupils should both keep their regard fixed on him who is, par excellence, the Unique Master, Jesus Christ, and learn from him how to live.

2. THE SCHOOL: A PLACE OF INTERPERSONAL RELATIONSHIP AND PARTICIPATION

St. John Baptist de La Salle insists that the Brother must have the cooperation of the pupils in his educative task. The teacher can do nothing if the door he knocks at does not open of itself. In this matter force and cunning are of no avail. You need the key of love and devotion. The child must be convinced by experience that the teacher appreciates and esteems him. The teacher must gain his confidence. There must be between teacher and pupil what de La Salle calls a manifest bond of goodness, tenderness and affection (Med. 134,2). "They shall love all their pupils tenderly", the Rule tells the Brothers. It admits no exceptions: "all their pupils" (Med. 157,3).

De La Salle requires from the Brothers that they present themselves before their pupils, not with a sombre and severe expression, but with one that denotes joy and affability (cf. Cahiers Lasalliens, 24, pp. 185-186) which in no way means weakness or excessive familiarity. They should combine the firmness of a father with the tenderness of a mother (Med. 101,3).

The fruits of this system of education were apparent to all. Lacordaire, referring to the Brothers, could write, "Obscure apostles of the people of France, they create without noise... law and order, peace and fraternity" (Rigault, tome V, p. 241). Felicité de Lammenais added, "These men are respected for the austere gravity of their lives and loved for their goodness" (id., tome IV, p. 393). And Lamartine writes in the same vein (id., tome V, p. 114).

We quote only these three significant tributes from a period when the defence of the Catholic school had become an urgent necessity.

All this was made possible thanks to the methods employed, to the goodness of the persons involved and to their dedication to a specific task which brought about a notable change in the children of the common people (4).

Participation of the pupils

Modern pedagogy insists on the participation of the pupils in the educational process. Lasallian schools never neglected this aspect of their work. They stressed the importance of the relationship between the persons involved, teachers, pupils and parents.

1. Relations of the pupils among themselves. De La Salle wanted the children to live as well-behaved persons. His books were read in class: The Duties of a Christian, The Rules of Good Manners and Christian Politeness.

At a time when education was not yet obligatory the saint encouraged his pupils to show the human aspect of their school to their companions, less accustomed to the demands of school discipline, and to win them by their advice and good example. (Management of Schools by Brother Anselme, p. 222)

The list of offices that de La Salle confided to his pupils is well known. There are fourteen of them. We all know how seriously a boy takes an office entrusted to him. The distinction greatly honours him. It is, doubtless, one of the ways in which he can impress his companions with his personal worth. Such an office helps him to avoid the egotism common at his age. He realises that he must reckon with other people in his life. He must visit a fellow pupil when he is ill and find out why he is absent from class. Other pupils collect the food left over from the mid-day meal or the afternoon snack and distribute it among those who are in the greatest need.

2. Teachers and pupils. De La Salle, at all times, considered the school a place where efficiency reigns and where work should be exemplary. To attain this objective the teacher must have order and discipline. Correction was a thorny problem in de La Salle's time. Though he reduced them and would have liked to see them abolished, he minutely listed and adapted punishments to the faults committed. He maintained that a lot of absences were due to lack of restraint on the part of the teacher when correcting his pupils (Cahiers Lasalliens, 24, p. 184).

The manner of correcting, as de La Salle prescribed it, is such as to elicit the affection and tenderness of the pupil rather than the contrary (cf. Blain, Relations de plusieurs choses, p. 110). We leave aside the passage where de La Salle speaks of "vigilance". He uses the word "assistance" but the meaning is the same. The child must be assisted because he is weak. He must be made aware of his faults in order that he may correct them. (Med. 197,3) (5).

3. Teachers and parents. Relations with the parents are important when it is question of admitting a pupil to the school. Brother Director ought to ask the parents for certain information: the pupil's state of health, his outstanding qualities and defects, his character, etc. This information must be brought to the notice of the teacher to whose class the pupil is assigned.

Today great stress is placed on the role of the school counsellor. This is a key post in relations with the pupils and their families. It demands a high degree of tact and delicacy in dealing with people. It is a very effective role. If there is a post for a Brother who is a real educator, this is it. In such a position he can guide, direct, enlighten and unite.

Some of the above points will be developed in a subsequent article.

THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL (5): A preparation for life

I. DE LA SALLE AND HIS PREDECESSORS

For the predecessors of De La Salle the school was, first of all, a place for teaching Christian doctrine. The rest was incidental. The school was used as a "bait" to attract the children. De La Salle would not accept such reasoning because he considered that to work honestly was to live as a Christian and that the avoidance of idleness was, in itself, a virtue. Attracting children to catechism lessons was not his aim because there were other means of doing so which were less troublesome and less costly than the school.

He begins his chapter on "The manner in which the Brothers should behave in school" by imposing the obligation of keeping school, and goes on to make the obligation more explicit: Teach reading. Teach writing. Teach arithmetic and spelling. He then insists that the most important duty of the teacher is to teach prayers, catechism and the Gospel. De La Salle does not undervalue religious formation but he gives importance to secular instruction by recognising its intrinsic value, something which was quite new at that time (1).

"The Founder of the Brothers is an essentially practical genius, he creates schools which are a preparation for life" (2). He introduces an eminently democratic programme of studies. Thanks to him the common man will henceforth be able to learn of the glories of his country, read the Gospel and communicate by letter with those who are absent.

De La Salle refuses to impose on his schools an inconsistent programme of studies. "He made some decisive contributions to primary education" (3) as is evidenced by the position he took on the following questions:

a. Learning French before Latin. Latin takes second place in his schools. It is used only in reading while priority is given to French. In the memoir addressed by De La Salle to his friend, Godet des Marais, bishop of Chartres, he gives among other reasons for this preference the uselessness of teaching Latin to children of poor artisans, knowing that they would spend but a short time in school and that on leaving school, they would have no chance of continuing to study it (4).

b. The simplification of writing. De La Salle simplifies the rules of writing at a time when the writing masters had, by their numerous prescriptions, made it an impenetrable thicket, an area reserved to specialists and from which the poor were excluded. In spite of the complaints of the writing masters De La Salle does not cease in his efforts to popularize the art of writing. By putting a pen in the hands of the poor he is not giving them a dangerous weapon, as Voltaire and La Chalotais claim, but a tool with which to earn their daily bread and defend themselves.

c. The good of the Church and of the State. (cf. Declaration 47,3) The action of the Christian tends to promote the good of the Church and of the state. "The school aims at and attains the earthly objective (cf. Meditation 160,3) of preparing children for life here below by giving them the indispensable basic techniques, the essential tools: reading, writing, spelling and arithmetic." (5)

In De La Salle's schools the whole atmosphere speaks of diligent scholastic activity.

d. The schools are designed to meet specific needs. De La Salle adapts his schools to the concrete needs of everyday life. At Saint Yon he creates a form of higher education to meet the needs of the better off. This was the forerunner of what is called today modern secondary education. The "Sunday School" for workers and other adults is a new type of school to meet the needs of the parishoners of Saint Sulpice. The seminary for country schoolmasters is another stroke of genius on the part of the Founder aimed at supplying teachers from his "Training College" to the villages. The income from these boarding establishments will be used for the benefit of the schools for the poor.

II. THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL SEEKS TO FORM HABITS OF WORK

One of the fruits to be expected from the schools is the preparation of children for a profession. The school should prepare them to face life and to make themselves useful in the world when their parents decide to withdraw them from school (cf. Meditation 194,1).

"The school, as conceived by the Founder of the Brothers, should give the children a taste for work and gradually train them in habits of concentration. The pupils' efforts are stimulated and their progress carefully monitored throughout their period of schooling." (6) At the end of each school year the teacher puts on a sheet of paper all the information necessary for the parents and for the teacher who will have the pupil in his class the following year.

The "Management of Schools" which the Founder puts in the hands of his disciples is not, in itself, something sacred and immutable. De La Salle himself revised it several times. The more experienced Brothers helped him to assemble the treasures of pedagogical wisdom which it contains. Everything in it is important. It was the subject of much discussion and reflection. Good sense is evident in every line since its purpose is to contribute to the improvement of the instruction and education of poor children. We shall now consider a few of the methods which contributed to the success of the schools and to the welfare of the poor.

a. Pupils are allowed to progress at their own rate. The teacher cares for all his pupils but more particularly for the less gifted to whom he gives his time and attention while allowing the more able to work on their own.

b. The uniformity of method introduced by De La Salle creates an atmosphere of discipline and good order in all his schools. The time-table is adhered to and the silence observed by the teacher has no other purpose but to encourage the pupil to speak and explain himself. What the pupil finds out for himself will have more value than what the teacher too readily provides for him.

c. Pupils are encouraged to work on their own and to help their less able companions (7). Modern pedagogy insists on the necessity of allowing children to work on their own, on the value of individual initiative and personal research. The teacher should not do what the pupil can do for himself or teach another to do. De La Salle also uses the small group method for the weaker pupils and asks the more able pupils to help them even at the price of their own promotion. "Let the teacher be careful not to help them too readily to overcome the difficulties they meet in the solution of a problem. On the contrary, he encourages them not to give up and to look for the solutions which he knows they can find out for themselves. They should be persuaded that the knowledge they gain through sustained personal effort will be better retained. The teacher will not be satisfied with posing problems himself but will encourage his pupils to pose problems of their own according to their ability." (8)

d. Subjects for study are taken from everyday life. In arithmetic the pupils learn the elements of book-keeping, the use of money, how to make out invoices and how to make simple measurements etc. In reading they use manuscripts, records and legal contracts when they have mastered the elements.

As for social relations (9), De La Salle insists that the rules be learned from daily contacts among the pupils themselves rather than from formulas learned by heart. This, in spite of the fact that he wrote for them "Rules of good manners and Christian politeness", a work which Guibert says is better than anything that went before.

De La Salle requires that teachers and pupils reflect at the end of each school day on the way they behaved to one another and on the faults they committed. The child is thus led to think of others and to treat them with consideration. Our own Declaration says, "The school is one of the principal places for acquiring social graces both for children and adolescents". (44,2)

SEMINARS ON LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY

DEVELOPMENTS TAKING PLACE

In Argentina, as elsewhere in the Institute, we have witnessed, during the past twenty years a gradual reduction in numbers combined with a rising average age among the Brothers (the increase in the number of vocations is limited and of recent date). In the meantime our commitments have increased and become more diverse. As a result, our institutions are employing more and more lay teachers. Today they are more than twenty times the number of Brothers in active service. Lay men now hold positions at every level of educational organization and in all branches of teaching.

A study of the subject shows among other things that:

— the employment of large numbers of lay teachers is inevitable,
— Lay teachers take their place in our schools by right and not as spare wheels,
— if our schools are to remain Lasallian in spirit it will be thanks to the lay personnel,
— the latter feel that the schools are also theirs and wish to retain their Lasallian character, — not having made the novitiate or scholasticate their attachment to things Lasallian springs more from sentiment than from a serious study of Lasallian pedagogy and spirituality.

Faced with this challenge, the Brothers could decide to close ranks and await the future (what future?) or they could resolutely decide to create the future by forming their lay colleagues in the spirit of De La Salle. The District opted for the second alternative. The seminars have become the basic means of initiating lay teachers into Lasallian spirituality. They are a kind of kerygmatic phase in the process.

This effort to spread the Lasallian mystique among lay people, though not the first of its kind, has been undertaken with renewed vigour since 1978, thanks largely to the rediscovery of the Founder by the District.

The research work carried out by Brothers Maurice Auguste, Miguel Campos, Michel Sauvage and Patrice, together with the participation by a greater number of Brothers in the sessions of CIL and in the Latin American seminars on Lasallian spirituality have given vitality to our adhesion to a Founder who is now better known in his evangelical apostolate and in his spiritual doctrine. Our ministry has gained in fervour and has widened its horizons.

GUIDE LINES FOR ACTION

From the inception of this form of our apostolate, and to a certain extent, in the seminars on spirituality, two criteria were adopted:

1. to involve as many as possible of our lay collaborators in the work of education,
2. not to confine the work to a ready-made programme but to develop it in response to the needs of the teachers.

Two other criteria were adopted later:

1. to keep in mind the degree of commitment of the people concerned,
2. to respect the ecclesial dimension of the work. Lasallian action is an integral part of the Church's mission. It is not the Church.

SPIRITUAL WEEKS

Every year since 1979, one or two weeks of the summer vacation have been devoted to a project organized along the following lines:

Participants: Brothers and lay teachers. Several from each school to ensure subsequent mutual support and effective animation of the teaching body.

Animation: A team of Brothers and lay people together with a priest.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Duration: Five or six days. Daily Mass. Morning and afternoon sessions. Recreation and discussion after the evening meal.

Expenses: Each person participating was responsible for his own expenses. Some were helped by their school or college.

Objectives: With minor variations from week to week, the main purpose was:

1. to give the participants an opportunity to experience life as Lasallians and to deepen their knowledge of the spirituality of De La Salle;
2. to find God in their own lives and in the life of the group;
3. to discern God's call here and now and to commit themselves individually and collectively to respond to it.

Programme: The central themes of the seminars were:

1. The plan of salvation. (God's presence and design in history).
2. General view of the life-work of De La Salle and the main aspects of his spiritual doctrine.
3. The life of faith.
4. Mission: Teachers as God's ministers.
5. Mission: Christian community and fraternity.

Activities: The seminar is something more than a retreat. It is a time for studying and living the spirituality of De La Salle. The days are so organized as to allow for:

— initiation into personal and community prayer with the Eucharist as the culminating point of each day, — presentation of the life, work and teaching of St. John Baptist de La Salle as the main work of each day, — reading and reflection on Lasallian teaching, alone or in groups, followed by discussion, — periods of relaxation where the participants could meet informally and get to know one another better.

Towards the end of the seminar the District plan for the following year was presented to the participants who were invited to make a commitment to work together for its achievement.

OTHER PROJECTS

Besides the "weeks" described above, we have, since January, 1981, organized other meetings for those who are not satisfied with the initial experience but who wish to come to a deeper knowledge of Lasallian spirituality. These meetings follow a similar pattern but have a more specific objective (e.g. the study of Lasallian faith communities) or take the form of a retreat.

In February, 1985 a seminar was arranged for those who are responsible for internal organization in our colleges. Eighty-one lay teachers and eleven Brothers took part. The week's activities were centred on: Lasallian lay teachers as faith witnesses, Educational organization in the light of the Gospel, Collaboration with the District, in the District, and as a District.

Encouraged and inspired by the experience of these seminars on Lasallian spirituality the District has opened them to teachers in state schools in the extreme north-west of the country where the Brothers have recently opened a school for the marginalized. A Brother from the new Community has volunteered to keep in contact with and support the teachers who have participated in one or more of the seminars.

RESULTS

It is unwise to speak of "results" in matters of spirituality so the following facts should be treated with some caution:

— more than 400 persons have taken part in one or more seminars. This means that, at least a third of the administration and teaching staffs of Lasallian schools has made real contact with the Founder.
— The lay teachers understand better the spirituality of De La Salle and identify with the work of Lasallian schools.
— Relations between Brothers and lay teachers and among the lay teachers themselves have shown marked improvement.
— A more intense Christian life and a deeper commitment to the apostolate of teaching is evident among the lay teachers.

WHAT NEXT?

When you open up new paths you take on a certain responsibility. You must continue on to the end otherwise you let people down.

The response of the lay teachers gives the District the possibility of meeting other demands in the field of education, especially among the marginalized. But the lay teachers themselves, rightly demand that the Brothers take account of them and that they help them in their efforts to become Christian educators benefiting by what the Institute has to offer them. That is why the Argentine District must create a ministry of lay people among whom the lay teachers will hold a place of honour.

TWO DAYS AT PARMENIE
With the SIGNUM FIDEI of France

At Whitsun 1984, an event, modest but significant for the Lasallian movement, especially in France, took place at Parmenie.

AS BROTHERS

Over the week-end we formed a veritable Lasallian community in the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle. We strove to deepen that spirit in ourselves and to find the meaning of our own vocation. The group was composed of people of all ages: men and women, Brothers and lay people, parents of families, teachers and headmasters, students and former students, all members of Signum Fidei.

In all about twenty people came together to form a community, to pray together, to exchange views, to grow in the knowledge and love of God and of his servant St. John Baptist de La Salle.

Everybody wanted to make the occasion a worthwhile experience and so took the necessary steps to make it such. It required a real effort, in the beautiful spring sunshine, to drag oneself away from one's accustomed activities and to travel, as many did, across the length and breadth of France to this hallowed hillside.

AS LASALLIANS

We look back on the long hours spent in discussion in groups or teams and to the first meeting in the dining room where we had the opportunity to introduce ourselves and to say in what way we felt ourselves Lasallian. We preferred to start from our own experience before trying to define terms which we find too imprecise. Though the words "Lasallian" and "Signum Fidei" are much used (perhaps too much used) in our country few know exactly what they stand for. We experienced a moment of intense faith and hope as we listened to these personal revelations of attitudes which were genuinely Lasallian.

> "Claude (Brother), it did us good to hear you say, "Since 1942 I have never looked back". "And you, Alain (former student), when you quite naturally quoted the Founder in telling us that you were imperceptibly led" to feel yourself Lasallian". I imagine that the Brothers, especially, felt themselves one with you. As for you, Jean-Marc (lay teacher), you made a profession of faith when you said, "For me everything revolves around the school" and your wife added, "For the past twenty years I have been growing into the great Lasallian family."

PRESENT AND FUTURE

There are times like these when the witness given by members creates real unity and strengthens human and spiritual ties in a durable manner. Another period of discussion and exchange of views provided an occasion for considering the present situation of Signum Fidei and the future we foresee for it in our country. Signs of hope and causes for disquiet were analysed and modest but concrete and realistic proposals were put forward. First of all Brothers and lay people must together define the terms and explain the words which are now part of our vocabulary. How can one speak clearly about something that is ill defined.

These vocabulary problems, and they are not the only ones, do not always make for clarity nor do they help us to see things in the light of the Gospel. Brothers and lay people do not really know one another and each side often regards the other with a certain degree of suspicion. Some lay people find it hard to accept the renewal of our Associations and are unwilling to commit themselves while some Brothers are unaware of developments among Lasallian lay people. "The Brothers must be shaken up", was someone's rather blunt summing up of the situation. Hence the need to take seriously the preparation for the General Chapter to which, according to Circular 419, lay people are invited to contribute.

OUR CONVICTIONS

The last session, when the participants worked in groups, was devoted to drawing up a summary of the convictions expressed by each one. The following gives the opinions of the teacher-headmasters group:

> "In our profession we have chosen to pay attention to the young and especially to the most deprived amongst them: those who have problems at home or in school or who suffer material want — those "who are furthest from salvation"...
> ..."the least of these my brethren."
> To be closer to these young people we believe in the creation of a community of educators who have the same mission and employ the same means.
> "That they may be one..."
>
> We believe that our mission is a "ministry". Our profession becomes then, the means employed by God for the evangelization of the young.
> "Go ye therefore, teach..."
> Today it is St. John Baptist de La Salle who inspires our activities in favour of the young. We hope that other educators like ourselves will come to know the Lasallian spirit and that our community will grow stronger and become more and more available for the service of young people."

TWO LEADERS

Besides the periods of community prayer and of formal and informal discussion two people helped us to gain a better knowledge and a deeper appreciation of the evangelical inspiration that guided him. They were: Brother Charles Lapierre who underlined the significance of Parmenie in the life of de La Salle and Brother Jean-Marie Thouard, Regional President of France, who showed us how the Founder was led from "one commitment to another" until he surrendered himself totally to the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

NIMES 1985

The week-end was for all of us a time of grace. One concrete decision was taken as a logical "follow-up" to our discussions and is now in the course of realization. All Lasallians interested in the Founder will meet in Nimes, in the south of France, at the end of June 1985. We are convinced that like Mexico this meeting will be for our Associations and for the Institute a time of grace.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE LASALLIAN WORLD CONFEDERATION

Dear Lasallian friends, I thank you for your confidence and I put myself at the services of the Lasallian Mission in taking over the presidency of the world Confederation. I did not want the responsibility, and those who suggested me for the position have been aware of this for some time past. But they knew also that when the day came that I had to choose between the right to refuse and the duty to accept, my choice would be to conform to what I believed to be the will of God.

I shall fulfil my duties with my good qualities as well as with my faults; I shall do my best, with the help of you all but especially with the help of the Holy Spirit, of St. J.B. de La Salle, and of Our Blessed Lady, and, since my appointment took place in Mexico, I would like to place my tenure of the presidency under the special protection of Our Lady of Guadalupe whom we visited this morning.

Presidents come and go but the Confederation remains, and it is in the light of this continuity that we should envisage the future and that each one, in his own way, should commit himself to the action which will make effective the conclusions of the Congress in his own milieu.

Before addressing a message to you on this subject, I would like to pay special homage to the man who, for the past four years, was head of the Confederation. He wished to travel in order to get to know the Lasallians of all countries and, thanks to him, the new President has today a clear vision of what the Lasallian movement is throughout the world. I would like to add a personal word of thanks to Dr. Claudio Andreoli who has always shown me a degree of kindness which will contribute, as we both wish, to perfect continuity in the conduct of the Confederation.

It would not be right if I did not say a word of thanks to the man who has for years past been the soul of the Confederation and without whom many things would have remained undone, Brother Manuel Olivé!

I shall try to be brief because you have already listened to several speakers and I do not want to abuse your patience. I shall confine myself to outlining a programme of work for the years ahead and to making five appeals to those who are to be the principal agents in the Lasallian renewal.

We should be conscious of the fact that we are at the end of an era and that it is up to us to establish a new balance which takes into account the responsibilities of lay people according to the directives of the Second Vatican Council. We have witnessed for several years past the growth of different groups drawing their inspiration from Saint John Baptist de La Salle: attentive to the signs of the times we have let these groups grow up and develop considering that we must not usurp the place of the Holy Spirit. We have taken care to create a climate and soil favourable to the development of these groups and we knew that that would take time. First of all because in the things that concern God one cannot be sparing of time and also because the world knows that time does not respect what is done in a hurry.

These groups are today many and varied: lay teachers, young people, parents, Signum Fidei, former students and other groups claim a link with St. John Baptist de La Salle. The time has come to co-ordinate these groups whose objective is the same: to educate and serve the young, especially "the most deprived and those farthest from salvation".

We are going to turn resolutely towards all these Lasallians to give a new force to the development of this movement in our respective countries and taking particular care to:

— create, develop and support groups of young people,
— create, develop and ensure the evolution of former student associations,
— Urge and help the lay teachers to join national Lasallian organizations.

These organizations and regroupings will be impregnated with the Lasallian spirit which unites us and will, quite naturally, result from our Congress to which they will explicitly refer. This will be our way of putting into practice our reflections on Faith, Fraternity and Service.

The other part of our programme will be to turn towards the Brothers and to do our share in the preparation of the General Chapter of 1986 and afterwards to share in putting into practice its directives within the Lasallian movement.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

To carry out this programme, which I realise is ambitious, we need the collaboration of all, and for that reason I wish to close the Congress with five appeals:

My first appeal will be made to all of you who have participated in this Eighth Lasallian World Congress: young and old, lay people and religious, Signum Fidei and postulants, we have lived through extraordinary days in the study of the theme: Faith, Fraternity, Service, and we have arrived at some decisions.

Beneficiaries of these wonderful days, we must, when we get home, become missionaries and the leaven of the mass, but we must not forget that to be effective "the leaven must remain leaven" as Pope John Paul recently said, hence the need for each one of us to nourish himself regularly from Lasallian sources.

It is you who will be the effective instruments for putting into practice the directives of the Congress in your respective countries. The Confederation counts on you.

My second appeal is to the young. You have the enthusiasm, the dynamism and the generosity of youth. Put these qualities at the service of the Lasallian movement by committing yourselves to the movement in the fullest sense of the term. It is you who will ensure the renewal of the Lasallian movement, and your commitment will allow the Brothers of St. J.B. de La Salle to continue their work in the service of the young and of the deprived.

You represent for us the changing of the guard. You will, in a few years be, in your turn, guarantors of the continuity and of the spirit of the Lasallian movement; you should prepare yourselves to take responsibility in the future. Those in charge today count on you. St. J.B. de La Salle counts on you.

My third appeal is to the Lasallians in the school: teachers, collaborators with the Brothers and lay headmasters you are, more than all the others, guarantors of the Lasallian spirit in the schools where you have chosen to serve youth. It is you, in effect, who ensure, not only the concept, but above all, the putting into practice of the educative project. You are the actors and you have the role of perpetuating Lasallian values.

Your privileged position among the young makes particularly effective the integration of the conclusions of the Congress in your daily actions. We appeal to you to widen the scope of your activities and to share actively in the development of the Lasallian movement. You have your place there, we expect you there, and we know that we can count on you.

My fourth appeal is addressed to Lasallians outside the school, i.e. essentially to former students. A profound evolution has taken place among you in recent years. Whatever some people may say, we are no longer in the days when the words of a contemporary French philosopher could be applied to you.

"For them, heaven is too high, the earth too low, only the table is at their level". Witnesses to what you have received, guarantors of a spirit whose perpetuity you ensure by your steadfastness, you must never forget that to try to do as well today as was done formerly one must often do differently.

You ensure for the schools from which you came both outside help and openness to the world the students will find on leaving school. You are at the meeting point of school and life.

Leaders of the Lasallian movement and its main support you must not deceive the young. You must re-define the mission of your associations so that they may become authentic Lasallian Associations. We know that you can open wide the doors of your associations.

My fifth and last appeal is addressed to the Brothers of the Christian Schools. Sons of St. J.B. de La Salle and heirs to his patrimony and to his spirit your influence spreads, whether you wish it or not, to the Lasallians of all ages and you are the spiritual driving force, the soul of the Lasallian movement. You are not only heirs to a moral authority but also to a power which is decisive to the extent that nothing can come to life and develop without the active support of a Brother. I must stress here the irreplaceable role of the Brothers Visitors and the Brothers Assessors.

The Lasallians that you have formed or those who work with you are not demanding; they simply consider that, as they are near to you, they should put themselves at your disposal to serve the young in a spirit of faith and fraternity by giving the best of themselves.

Just as once the Brothers asked their Founder to resume the government of the Institute so we ask you today to take in hand the Lasallian movement, born of our dedication and of your fidelity to St. J.B. de La Salle.

Dear friends, we are all heirs and, like all heirs, we are depositories of a patrimony, the Lasallian patrimony, established by St. J.B. de La Salle and enriched by 300 years of work in the service of youth and especially in the service of the disinherited.

We, lay people, must transmit what we have received but we can do so only within the framework of the mission of the Institute. It is for you, my dear Brothers, to show us the way.

We are ready to go along with you. Help us to help you.

THEY GAVE MEANING TO MY LIFE

A few days ago, I celebrated in the privacy of my prayers, the 30th anniversary of my first commitment as a religious in the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. I was then nineteen. I was happy then and I am happy still, but in a deeper sense!

You may wish to know what I have done since that first commitment twenty-seven years ago, especially as all my active life has been spent in Africa: Morocco, Burkina Faso, Ivory Coast and Niger.

"THE SEED HAS BEEN SOWN"

September 1957 saw the realization of a youthful dream: I began teaching on African soil. The early years of my apostolate were marked by several meetings with the "Patriarch of the Atlas", Fr. Peyriguère, who died in 1959 after spending thirty years of his life among the Berbers. A life of prayer and silent presence at the heart of Islam without making a single convert! The strongest impression he made on me was one of faith in the living Good of the Eucharist, Saviour of the milieu in which he lived. His deepest conviction at the end of his life was; "The Seed has been sown"! I have retained the certitude that beyond the visible, God is acting and that the important thing is to render Him present wherever I am, to plant and to water, knowing that the rest is up to Him. That is what gave meaning to my apostolate in the Islamic world.

"THE TREE-TRUNK MAY BE A LONG TIME IN THE WATER BUT IT NEVER BECOMES A CROCODILE"

In 1965 I arrived in black Africa. My activities there were varied: teaching, formation of young Brothers, study of African sociology.

On my first arrival in Africa in 1957, I told myself; "I have come for good. I want to remain a Brother to the end of my life". That seemed to me as natural as it was exhilarating!

But the year 1970 brought a turning point in my missionary thinking. My sociological studies brought me to numerous villages of the Ivory Coast. It was there I heard more than one old man say with some malice "The stranger has big eyes but he sees nothing"! which meant: you're curious, but all you see, all you think you understand, you always see with the eyes of an outsider, with the reasoning of an outsider. You only grasp appearances. To really understand you must belong here!

Others quoted, in the same tone, the Bambara proverb, "The tree-trunk may be a long time in the water but it never becomes a crocodile", which means that even if you've been here a long time you always remain an out-sider! This made me understand that in spite of everything, a deep friendship could exist between people but that it sprang from mutual respect and sharing of what one is and what one has. And I realised that I was only an invited guest on African soil, happy to be so, and to act as such but prepared to accept the possibility of leaving if circumstances compelled me, as we have seen happen in other places.

But at the same time I realised that African wisdom and proverbs have their human limits. Happily, faith and love can overcome them. I felt that, despite appearances, and by sheer force of loving and listening, it was possible to reach a certain identification with the other person. True brotherhood, which knows no barriers, becomes real in Jesus Christ to the point where one feels at home where people really love one another.

It was a great moment for me, when that thought came to me in serenity. It was a little like a second breath to my life in Africa which I am trying to live in a spirit of availability for today as for tomorrow, in receiving as in giving.

"YOU DIDN'T EVEN NOTICE ME"

At the moment I am teaching in Niamey. Practically all the students in our technical college are Moslems. How does one live as a Brother amongst them?

Once in class I had just finished explaining the work to be done. Hands were raised asking for further explanations. I answered the questions and then said, "Get to work, now". But one hand was still raised. It was that of the most backward pupil in the class. I thought to myself: "The Lord invites me to love him. Go down to him and answer his question". Wanting to surprise him I went towards him but without looking at him and passing along the next row of desks. When I reached him and stopped to speak to him he turned towards me and I saw a face filled with utter hopelessness and heard a sorrowful voice say "You didn't even notice me".

The depth of his disappointment surprised me... What he wanted of me was that I should take notice of him at that moment, not afterwards. Of course, I explained matters to him and he was quite happy but I shall always remember the lesson he taught me.

I found the same expectations in letters from senior students of former years who occasionally write to me. One begins his letters with "My Dear Educator"... and after his signature underlines the sentence "I look forward to hearing from you".

Another expresses more the goodness of his heart and his eagerness to receive an answer than the truth as regards my behaviour towards him. (This gives me the right to quote him). Unconsciously, he describes the teacher he would wish to have to help him, and that gives food for though. "I searched my memories of school but I found no face but yours which I could clearly recall: I remember you because you always fulfilled well your duties as educator. You always had time for us young people, you were always available whether in class, in the playground or in your office. You easily joined in the conversation of a group of boys. You could always guide, advise and teach us. You were always patient, smiling, accessible. You knew how to encourage us. You always found something positive and praiseworthy in our work even in a mediocre poem without form or substance. That is why I write to you and ask you to help me." I could answer these young people and tell them that their letters, their attitudes and their reflections help us more than they think, that they sometimes shake us up and often challenge us.

BEING A CHRISTIAN CHANGES ONE'S LIFE

At the centre of this attention to man, which for us means attention to the young people who pass through our schools, lies the wonderful riches of the presence of Jesus, recognized and made actual in our lives. I am more conscious, perhaps, in this Moslem world where He is not really known, that I am His sign, His ambassador. Every time a group of pupils enters my class my prayer goes something like this, "Lord, If my visible role is to teach them the profane subjects they expect from me, my invisible role is to offer their existence, their daily work, their efforts, their fears and sorrows and their more or less conscious expectations as a prayer and a consecration of their lives to you".

It seems to me that my presence amongst them in the faith helps to start something, of which they are not yet conscious, but which for many of them will be lost on the way. To this priesthood of offering, which is the duty of every baptised person, is added the duty of witness through a manner of living and acting which surprises and challenges; "Be ready at all times to explain the hope you have in you" (1 Peter, 3,15). In a country where Christians form only 1% of the population a person must live Christianity 99%, — a Christianity which is a sign of the love of God for men and which calls forth the action of the Holy Spirit everywhere.

How encouraging to hear this statement from a Moslem student at the end of the year: "Being a Christian changes one's life".

To spend one's life transmitting something of the love of God incarnate in Jesus Christ, is this not to live one's life genuinely and to the fullest?

It is to live through the season of sowing, and therefore of hope!

MY HEART IS READY LORD (Ps. 57,8)

I said at the beginning of this article that I was happy... I have, in fact, been happy throughout my stay in Africa, a stay marked by frequent changes of place because of the work I was asked to do.

These successive uprootings, in the service of a common cause, however trying they may have been, convinced me, in their own way, that the only "incarnation" demanded of us, and which removes all illusion, is that which coincides with the will of God expressed in our readiness to accept events.

Then nothing surprises, nothing disappoints: the heart is ready to listen to the invitation of Peter (1 Peter 4,10-11).

EACH ONE AS A GOOD MANAGER OF GOD'S DIFFERENT GIFTS, MUST USE FOR THE GOOD OF OTHERS THE SPECIAL GIFT HE HAS RECEIVED FROM GOD.
WHOEVER PREACHES MUST PREACH GOD'S MESSAGE;
WHOEVER SERVES MUST SERVE WITH THE STRENGTH THAT GOD GIVES HIM, SO THAT IN ALL THINGS
PRAISE MAY BE GIVEN TO GOD THROUGH JESUS CHRIST.

A NEW APOSTOLATE FOR RETIRED BROTHERS

WORKING WITH PRISONERS...

Pierre who retired from teaching six years ago is a member of a team of prison visitors to the prison of S... Like each of the other visitors he talks in private every week with five or six prisoners who wish to see him. He makes these weekly visits throughout the period they are in prison (from a few weeks to several years). This apostolate of listening to the inmates also involves a great variety of activities: contact with the families, interviews with prospective employers, repeated visits to the social services, etc. Pierre is also lay assistant to the Catholic chaplain and as such takes thirty or forty prisoners for prayer and reflection on a Gospel text as the occasion offers.

AND WITH EX-PRISONERS...

André, who is a joiner, works full time with three companions in a workshop belonging to an Association which employs them as specialist instructors. In the workshop, which is situated in the country, or on building sites they are helped by six young men aged from 18 to 24 whom the Association places in their care for a period of six months and pays for their work. For fifty hours a week the "apprentices" work side by side with the instructors and take their mid-day meal with them.

Accepted as they are, often in a state of physical and moral exhaustion, these young men, from whom no life history or court record is demanded, gradually awaken to the reality of life and to relationships they have never before experienced. Rejection and repeated failure had led them to delinquency and prisom.

As time passes each finds his place, takes an interest in his work, learns to handle his budget, pays his debts (court costs, compensation to victims etc.) and begins to stand on his own feet. However, nothing can be guaranteed and you don't always win, but for many of these young men the work periods have been the road to social and professional integration into society.

...FOR THE SALVATION OF ALL THE PEOPLE

Pierre and André live in the same Community. They are Brothers of the Christian Schools. The people they deal with have a strange resemblance to the "children of artisans and the poor" of whom St. J-B de La Salle used to say that their parents were "compelled to abandon them".

It is to these "overgrown children", in a milieu little conducive to friendliness, that educators, visitors and chaplains must act as "brothers". Is this possible without convictions which must be continually renewed and affirmed? Some of these convictions are not entirely foreign to Lasallian tradition.

— God wishes the salvation of ALL men without exception. How many, before going to prison, had a chance to hear the Word of God?

— A man is still a man whatever the obstacles he met on his path: heredity, lack of affection, bad habits, etc... No man can wipe out the past, but to feel that he is respected for what he is can help a man to accept himself with his past and to take his future in hand.

— The message brought by the person who visits and supports the prisoner must be conditioned by the prisoner's actual daily experience. How can he become a self-respecting man if he finds in the depressing reality of his daily life no motive for hope?

Separated from his family... suffering from drug withdrawal... from the constant tension between the desire to "kick" the habit and the fear of relapsing... from solitude or the promiscuity of the cell, from loss of personality in the face of abuse from tyrannical warders... addresses exchanged in the exercise yard in preparation for a "job" after release... release with a miserable pittance for a man without family, without lodging, without work...

HAS THE GOSPEL NOTHING TO SAY ABOUT SUCH SITUATIONS?

— The building up of the Church — or of a more human world — is also the task of lay people including those temporarily detained. In the closed and regimented world of the prison, which is hardly conducive to a sense of responsibility, the practice of religion is the only way by which a prisoner can develop as a full human being. The awareness that he has something to share is, for the ex-convict, an antidote to withdrawal into himself with all its fatal consequences.

THE ROOTS OF THIS EVIL

It is not easy to unravel their tangled mass. It is easier to recognize the soil and climate which favour their proliferation.

— Unhappy or one-parent families. Gérard, abandoned by his unmarried mother and passed from one foster mother to another... Claude, beaten, up to the age of fourteen, by a drunken father who was finally deprived of his paternal rights... Maurice

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

who can no longer live with his drunken father. He ran away at the age of twelve to join a gang of car thieves... Daniel, torn between divorced parents...

— Schools where one is unfairly treated. Handicapped by poor eyesight and speech difficulties and classed as good-for-nothing, Louis finished school at the age of sixteen in a "deadend" class. Unemployed... two attempts at suicide... involved in a drugs network. Other boys from poor but decent families were not able to keep up and became disgusted with everything and with themselves. "Nobody bothered about me in school and it was there I first started to go wrong" is a refrain often heard in the prison. Three drug addicts began to sniff glue in 5th year under the very nose of the teacher...

— High density housing areas with mixed cosmopolitan populations. It is there more than in purely working class districts that young people feel excluded and, in protest, join rival gangs. Mahomet, revolted by being always suspected and blamed in the wrong, joined such a gang. Edward aged nine was rejected by the other children in the block where he lived. He ran away and joined a similar gang.

— Lonely adolescence. After a childhood without trouble and in surroundings neither better nor worse than those of others, they committed their first crime at the age of fifteen or sixteen. Why? Who knows? If you listen patiently for a long time you can guess the reason: depressing loneliness. "It was impossible to discuss anything with my father". "Everybody was against me". "I never had a companion". Then followed the flight from home, the desire to become somebody by acting the "hard man", an unfortunate introduction to drugs, the appearance of suicidal tendencies. Alain swallowed a tube of barbiturates, drove a car through the window of a pharmacy and got himself arrested saying, "Now I'll bother nobody".

SECURITY - PREVENTION

Under these titles local associations are being formed in the areas of greatest risk. Conscious of the fact that the disruption of family ties is at the root of delinquency and violence they want to develop a dynamic of neighbourhood friendliness between the generations, social classes and ethnic groups. They are trying to create a movement of active solidarity among the local population to include:

— old people who live alone and who have been the victims of robbery with violence or who are likely to become so,
— young people out of control including those with police records,
— families unable to do anything for the education of their children.

With the help of well-wishers they are slowly forming groups of social workers, providing meeting places, youth centres, family counselling and conciliation with a view to obtaining compensation without having to call in the police.

The participation of teachers and educators in such projects would make for a better understanding of the needs and aspirations of the young.

— Joy and affection in a secure environment would ease the child's anxiety which is the cause of agressivity and lack of self confidence.

— The child, especially if he is withdrawn, needs to be able to discover, build and play with other children, to express himself, and to be listened to by adults, if he is to fit into society.

— The adolescent who feels rejected needs to meet older people, adults who take an interest in him, take him seriously and trust him, if he is to find a motive for living and making an effort to better himself.

— Respect for the wish of young people to be and to act together, for their desire to be themselves and to be responsible for their future, acceptance of their tastes and their refusal of regimentation make it possible for them to develop into mature adults.

To consider them capable of joining together in collective action for humanitarian or social ends, to encourage them to do so or to ask them to do a favour is to give them a chance to show the better side of themselves. It could help a gang of adolescent delinquents to sublimate their aggressive tendencies into action for the common good.

WHAT CAN THE SCHOOL DO?

— To combat all forms of racism and the mechanisms of exclusion which are factors leading to anti-social behaviour,

— to discover, in the early stages, handicaps and behaviour problems capable of seriously disturbing the personality of the young person,

— to help a disturbed adolescent to understand and solve his interior conflicts, to make him conscious of his potential and of his limitations, of everything in him which could lead to delinquency,

— to help each student to realize his full potential, to become a useful member of society and to give a meaning to his life.

The following lines do not pretend to give the answers. They are meant to provoke the critical reaction of the reader:

— A school adapted and open to its environment, taking the means to combat scholastic failure, to minimize cultural inequalities, to encourage, while respecting differences, dialogue and mutual enrichment, to develop manual skills as well as mental ability and to care for the affective needs of the students.

— Constant vigilance, close collaboration with the family which must be made aware of its responsibility, recourse to competent authorities, such as the social services etc. Can a single teacher in a primary school cope with all these demands? Does the boarding school not encourage families to avoid their responsibilities?

— A system of education which emphasises the quality of relationships within the educative community and particularly between students and teachers. Support and care for the young person in difficulty... Responsibility given to the students, encouragement of initiative, a sense of solidarity and self evaluation, not only of school work but of the effort put into it and of behaviour within the peer group...

— In order to provide the students with better direction in their studies and careers and to make them aware of social realities, take every opportunity to arrange contacts between them and people engaged in work, in the struggle for justice and in the fight against all forms of poverty and oppression...

Learning from a friend how other people have given direction to their lives and how much the world has need of hearts and hands is an invitation to a young person not to allow himself to become a prisoner of his own immediate interests, of his dream of economic success or even of suffocatingly close family ties.

A BROTHER WORKS WITH YOUNG IMMIGRANTS IN BRUSSELS

When I arrived in Brussels in 1970 my intention was to work in the schools with immigrant children and to live a new form of community life in an ordinary house in a working class district.

Several years ago I redefined my objective as "to be with and to live among them". They are the Turkish, Maroccan and Albanian families who form 70 to 80% of the population of the district where I live. For the past ten years I have lived in a little apartment with two rooms.

My manner of life, the relations that it involves, my activities in the area and the time I have spent there constitute for me a human, social and cultural experience which has enriched my life and which justifies amply the exceptional character of my situation as a Brother detached from my Community to lead a privileged existence.

My work involves five different forms of activity.

IN THE SCHOOLS

In 1968 the Belgian government created "crash courses in the language used in teaching" for immigrant children. That was all it did up to 1982. The conditions for establishing such courses were so restrictive and held so little interest for the teaching profession that they met with little enthusiasm on the part of administrators or teachers. One day, a priest who was seriously concerned with the problem, said to me, "That is a task for religious".

That is why I am now teaching in three schools in this area. I give lessons for six hours a week in each school to groups of from 2 to 8 children. That is the maximum allowed under government regulations.

Two of these little primary schools with 150 and 210 pupils respectively, have no Belgian children. Three quarters of the pupils are Turks. Educationally they are very retarded because they do not know French sufficiently. Not only do they get no help at home but they speak Turkish all the time in the family, in the street, at school and even in class where they are in the majority. That does not help their French!

For the past three years the Belgian authorities have allowed additional teaching staff in schools with a high proportion of immigrant children but these teachers are sent there by government order or are students in training or part of a pool of peripatetic teachers. This makes for a dissatisfied, discontented and unstable staff and the unfortunate children are not only retarded but neglected in the weakest sector of the educational system.

Are these not the type of children that John-Baptist de La Salle would care for today?

ASSOCIATION FOR THE EDUCATION OF YOUNG IMMIGRANTS

This Association, founded with the help of two friends, has as its object the establishment of classes and workshops for the numerous young immigrants who cannot gain admission to ordinary schools because they do not know French, are too old, too backward or arrive from their country of origin in the middle of the school year.

After four years as a private organization, the Association is now recognized by the Ministry of Education as a branch of the Institut Technique de La Salle de Molenbeck. It is a trade school with a five year course in technology... geared to the needs of immigrants. In fact, more and more of these young people are looking for the kind of school which will welcome them and adapt its programme to their needs and help them solve the problems they face in a foreign environment.

With our 80 Turkish and Moroccan students we are well acquainted with such problems as backwardness, failure, drop-out, expulsion, indiscipline, delinquancy, family troubles, etc. Much is said and written today about this second generation of immigrants, without roots, without social structures, without education and without work.

Nine years ago we thought we had only to teach them French. Today we are faced with a multiplicity of problems and here again the State offers little help and shows less understanding of the abnormal situations with which we have to deal and which do not fit neatly into administrative norms.

At present, a team of 15 people (some part-time) look after these 80 youths. The majority of these teachers are particularly interested in this kind of school and try to make the programme interesting to these boys whose past has been nothing but repeated failure. Teaching has to be on a personal level because their levels of education are very different. Account is taken of their ethnic problems by providing teachers of their own nationality, Turk or Maroccan. Some of these teachers also act as social workers among the students from their own ethnic group.

Personally I no longer teach class, but look after administration and finances as a member of the Administration Council which is responsible for the running of the establishment.

LE RASQUINET

This is a centre to which the children of the area come for tuition and help with their homework after school. It also provides workshops where the children can develop their skills in the evenings and on school holidays, as well as a sports field for games.

It has been in operation since 1972 and during that time hundreds of young Belgians have come here to help organize different activities. During the summer vacation 150 children used the playing field or took part in the summer camps which we organized.

At present we are finding difficulty in getting young Belgians to help supervise these activities so we have had to limit the number of children admitted to the evening classes and to the workshops.

The evening classes meet an evident need. I have mentioned above the failures and backwardness experienced by the children of immigrants. This is due to unfavourable conditions at home where the parents cannot help the children with their homework, the living quarters are overcrowded, and the families large. The children's future progress is determined by the education received in the primary schools. At 15 or 16 (at least before the law which extended the duration of school attendance) they leave school and can only gain admission to trade schools where many of them never finish the course. The serious problems encountered by immigrant youth stem from their failure in the primary schools. Consequently, the best means of preventing these problems in the future is to help the children who are finding difficulty at primary school level.

CENTRE FOR TURKISH YOUTH AT SCHAEBEEK

This centre, opened a year ago, meets the needs and the demand of young people for a place where they can meet in comfort. Many of them pass their leisure hours in the parks, the public squares and in City II (a covered commercial centre). There they gather in bands; some in conflict with their parents, others victims of rejection, exclusion and racial prejudice. They easily turn to crime and commit acts of theft, burglary and agression which give them a bad reputation and attract the particular attention of the forces of law and order.

The youth centre tries to cater for these turbulent and sometimes violent youngsters and to prevent, as far as possible, their involvement in crime. To this end we organize cultural and sporting activities, help to solve their personal and social problems and to create among them a positive and responsible attitude to life.

The various activities of the centre are organized and supervised by some of the older Turkish members while I act as advisor and councillor and public relations officer with other youth organizations and associations and with the public authorities. This requires my constant presence among them. The mentality of Turks and Maroccans, their way of looking at things, their way of doing things and their social structure are so different from ours that it is very difficult to get them to work together for a common end. It demands infinite patience. Besides a meeting place and a gaming table they are not interested in any other form of social activity.

IN THE CAFES

The majority of Turkish and Maroccan men spend a considerable amount of time in the cafés. As two men out of every three are unemployed,the cafés are crowded all day to the disgust of Belgians who do not understand that café life is an integral part of the culture of these immigrants. In my district alone there are no less than 22 Turkish cafés to serve this important clientèle. Some of them are frequented by the older men while others are favoured by the young people, those between 18 and 30 years of age. It's in the cafés I find most of my acquaintances: fathers of pupils, former students or youths who have been members of the Rasquinet club. There, where they really feel at home, I am welcomed with open arms. They appreciate my keeping in contact with them and we can discuss our common problems in spite of the interminable card games which I have to watch for long periods before I can get down to discussion with the players. I spend most evenings and week-ends in the cafés because my presence there is one of the most important elements in my apostolate of being "with them".

I get to know and understand many things there, though I do not know their language. These moments of friendship and confidence help me to overlook what, to me, is negative and unacceptable in their customs. At least, it enables me to see things in their proper context and to form a fair judgement.

CONCLUSION

I get a lot of satisfaction from this work which makes up for the disappointments, hardships and worry inherent in the situation. But what I find hardest to bear is the inability of these Moslem men to understand my voluntary celibacy. That forms an insurmountable barrier between us — an inexplicable mystery. I feel deeply the fact that I cannot get through to them on this matter which they frequently bring up in conversation, but they can accept no other way of life but their own.

WHO WAS BROTHER SCUBILION?

To the public at large and even to his brothers in religion Brother Scubilion is practically unknown. Now, after a long period "in the desert" he is beginning to make the headlines. The Church, which in 1984 declared that he had practised all the virtues to a heroic degree, will probably declare him "blessed" in the near future. He will then take his place, as one of the glories of our Institute, alongside Saints Benildus and Miguel, Blessed Salomon and Blessed Mutien-Marie. A striking miracle, attributed to his intercession, is now undergoing rigorous examination by a medical commission. Miracle or no miracle, his reputation for holiness in the island of Réunion is such that the "vox populi" may soon be recognized as the "vox Dei".

But who is Brother Scubilion? When did he live? What relevance has he for today? In answer to these questions we are going to publish a series of four leaflets in "Lasalliana" on the life of Brother Scubilion. They are condensed from a book by the present writer which is about to be published (1). The reader will find therein ample documentation if these notes have succeeded in awakening his interest in Brother Scubilion.

Let us then, make the acquaintance of Brother Scubilion, beginning with some names and dates from his life story. His family name was Jean-Bernard Rousseau, a name made famous in history and litterature by Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Scubilion was the name of a saintly Norman monk of the sixth century. It was given to Jean-Bernard Rousseau the day he put on the habit of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. He was born in the French province of Burgundy in 1797. His adopted country was the distant French colony of Réunion, an island off the coast of Madagascar, where he died in 1867.

His life was divided into two almost equal parts: thirty-six years in France from 1797 to 1833 and thirty-four in Bourbon (2) (Réunion) from 1833 to 1867. In number of years the two periods were almost equal, but in impact they were vastly different. His years in France would have been consigned to oblivion were it not for his years of missionary activity in Réunion. Passionately interested in evangelization, Brother Scubilion left France with no wish or intention of returning. Today in his native diocese and even in his native village he is completely forgotten. An evangelical paradox. He is forgotten precisely because he gave himself totally to his adopted country as a missionary.

In Réunion, now a French department, Brother Scubilion is SOMEBODY. He is part of the common patrimony and collective memory of the island's population. They have not forgotten the humble Brother of the Christian Schools who landed on their island in 1833 and who, at a key moment in their history, became the friend, the teacher and, especially, the catechist of the slaves before their emancipation in 1848. He announced to them a Gospel of freedom! He died at his task among them and is buried among them at Sainte-Marie.

One hundred and eighteen years after his death a strong current of popular devotion draws crowds to his tomb. They come to honour a man who radiated Christ, who became the slave of the slaves, and who, long before the expression was heard of, made "a preferential choice in favour of the poorest".

THE STAGES OF HIS LIFE

Let us now go into more detail. Jean-Bernard Rousseau spent his childhood and youth in the little Burgundian village of Tharoiseau (376 inhabitants in 1806) near Vézelay, the important centre of Romanesque art. He was baptized secretly because the Revolution had banned public religious ceremonies. There was no resident priest in Tharoiseau up to 1818. Education remained disrupted for years so that Jean-Bernard's early schooling was rather inadequate. He never completely made up for this during the rest of his life. However, he did acquire enough knowledge to enable him to teach primary classes (3). He did this with success because he was a born teacher. As a young man he occasionally assisted the village teacher to the satisfaction of the people and of the new parish priest, the Abbé Darcy, who encouraged him to join the Brothers of the Christian Schools who had recently opened a school in Avallon (1819).

N.B. Hyacinthe Chassagnon wrote a biography of Brother Scubilion in 1902. It was based on sound historic documents. Evidence as to the holiness of Brother Scubilion was remarkably consistent. The present writer has drawn on it.

He made his novitiate in Paris (1822-23) at a period when the new generations of Brothers were formed in close contact with the courageous veterans who had come through, often at the risk of their lives, the dark days of the Terror. The early years of the nineteenth century were for the Institute "a second spring" and Brother Scubilion left the novitiate filled with the spirit of faith and of zeal characteristic of the early disciples of De La Salle.

For the next ten years he taught the lower classes or looked after the garden or kitchen in Alençon, Poitiers and Chinon.

But already his zeal for spreading the Good News was at work within him and he asked to be allowed to go to a missionary country. Just then (1833) the Minister for the Colonies asked the Superior General for Brothers for the distant and neglected island of Réunion. Three volunteers took ship from Bordeaux and after a voyage lasting 84 days, reached their destination. Among the three were Brother Scubilion and Brother Jean de Matha. The latter deserves mention because, as Superior of the Brothers in the colony, he founded a network of schools for boys between 1835 and 1870. Every little township on the island had a Brothers' school with names like a litany of the saints: Saint-Denis, Saint-Paul, Saint-Benoît, Saint-Leu, Saint-Pierre, Sainte-Marie...

Brother Scubilion easily took his place in this tightly organized body of religious teachers who followed an austere rule of life and who kept schools "together and by association", in the colony as in the home country, according to a set of pedagogical principles, rigorous and well-tried. He taught at Saint-Benoît and Saint-Pierre from 1833 to 1843. The pupils were, of course, the children of white parents. The slaves who, at that time, formed more than half the population, had no right to education, not even to catechism (4).

It was while he was at Saint-Leu (1843-1850) that he was, at last, able to devote himself to teaching catechism to the slaves. Père Monnet, "the Father of the Blacks" had been the courageous pioneer in this work of redemption. Slavery was abolished in 1848 while Brother Scubilion was still at Saint-Leu. But long before that date he had abolished the distance himself and these oppressed people, telling them that they also were the beloved children of God.

The township called La Possession was the centre of his apostolate among the recently freed slaves (1850-55). The obstacles put in the way of evangelization of the slaves by their owners before 1848 were such that, in fact, many of them were neither instructed nor baptized. Brother Scubilion had to gather them around him, teach them the elements of faith and prepare them for the sacraments. He tried also to make them honest, hardworking citizens, wothy of their newly found freedom.

The last ten years of his missionary life were spent at Sainte-Marie, a recent foundation in the north of the island. According to his Superior, Brother Jean de Matha, "The zeal of Brother Scubilion knew no bounds and, at Sainte-Marie, had gone beyond all bounds". He was now in his sixties and still busy teaching catechism to the freed slaves and to the free workers recently imported from India. He collaborated closely with the parish priest whom he called his "vicar", in visiting the sick and the fishermen who feared the "soutane" — the priest's, not his! He also helped the priest to erect a Way of the Cross and two little oratories to Our Lady of La Salette and Saint Joseph (5).

In 1866 he saw the dream of his life come true. A community of Brothers was established in Madagascar, the large neighbouring island. Unfortunately, he was not able to go there himself. Thirty-five years in a tropical climate together with the rigours of a missionary life had undermined even his robust constitution.

After a painful illness he died on 13th April, 1867. On the following day, Palm Sunday, the people of Sainte-Marie, who had lost "their old Brother", their "saint", honoured him with a triumphal procession, combining it with that of the Lord himself.

This was not a passing gesture. For the people of Sainte-Marie, with whom he had formed strong ties of friendship, Brother Scubilion still lives in the glory of the Risen Christ.

A strong feeling of veneration welled up around his tomb at Sainte-Marie and quickly spread to the rest of the island. It was a spontaneous movement which grew rapidly so that on the anniversary of his death scores of thousands of people flock to his tomb. This movement must, however, be directed if it is not to become merely a seeking of favours. Msgr. Aubry, Bishop of Réunion, and his clergy are very much aware of this. He told the pilgrims in 1983, "Don't look for miracles. Brother Scubilion is not a miracle worker. He is a missionary of unity. Return to your homes and become missionaries of peace and harmony".

The next leaflet in "Lasalliana" will deal specifically with Brother Scubilion the missionary: "A Brother to those far away".

THE BROTHERS AND THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

Most people are aware by now that a new Code of Canon Law has been promulgated in the church. As of November 1983, this has effectively replaced the 1917 Code in force up until then. The new Code is bound to make some impact on the Brothers, if not in their everyday life, at least in the manner and the meaning of the Institute's relationship to the church of which it is a part.

The part of the Code that most concerns the Brothers is Book II on "The People of God," Part III entitled "Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life" covering canons 573 to 746. Thus there are three basic types of organized religious life in the church: institutes of consecrated life are either a) religious institutes; b) secular institutes; c) societies of apostolic life. The distinctive characteristics of a religious institute are the profession of public vows and life in common. The fundamental characteristic of a secular institute is that the members live in the world, possibly with their families, and not necessarily in community. They are bound by "sacred bonds," sometimes vows, to a life of poverty, celibacy, obedience and prayer. The fact that these institutes are called "secular" has led many to misunderstand their true character. Societies of apostolic life are composed either of Brothers or Sisters living a common life for an apostolic purpose but without religious vows or other sacred bonds. It seems obvious that most institutes of Brothers are, and presumably intend to remain, in the category of religious institutes.

In the new Code, the collective term "religious institute" suppresses the older distinction between a religious order with solemn vows and a religious congregation with simple vows. Suppressed, too, is most of the discriminatory legislation in the 1917 Code concerning religious institutes of women. As in other parts of the code, there are precise directives to guarantee subsidiarity, collegiality and accountability in the exercise of authority in religious institutes. Much greater emphasis has been placed on the autonomy of religious institutes to determine their own internal affairs: there are more than 60 places where these matters are referred to the "particular law" of each institute. On the other hand, the local bishop is given much greater control than ever over all institutes, including institutes of pontifical right, in matters of public worship and the apostolate.

Compared to the Code of 1917, the new Code gives a more theological and inspirational definition of religious life (Canon 607):

> 1. Religious life, as a consecration of the whole person, manifests in the Church a wonderful marriage brought about by God, a sign of the future age. Thus religious bring to perfection their full gift as a sacrifice offered to God by which their whole existence becomes a continuous worship of God in love.
> 2. A religious institute is a society in which members, according to proper law, pronounce public vows either perpetual or temporary, which are to be renewed when they have lapsed, and live a life in common as brothers or sisters.
> 3. The public witness to be rendered by religious to Christ and the Church entails a separation from the world proper to the character and purpose of each institute.

Notable also is the text of Canon 619 concerning the role of the superior:

> Superiors are to devote themselves to their office assiduously and together with the members entrusted to them, they should be eager to build a community of brothers or sisters in Christ in > which God is sought after and loved before all else. Therefore, they are to nourish the members frequently with the food of the word of God and lead them to the celebration of the sacred liturgy. They are to be an example to the members in cultivating virtues and in the observance of the laws and traditions of the particular institute; they are to meet the personal needs of the members in an appropriate fashion, look after sollicitously and visit the sick, admonish the restless, console the faint of heart, and be patient toward all.

Despite this pastoral and theological emphasis, however, it is not surprising that the structural elements traditional in religious institutes remain intact and are explicitly mandated in the new Code. Approval of the basic Constitutions of each religious institute requires that they contain both "spiritual and juridical" elements, including "fundamental norms about the governance of the institute and the discipline of the members, the incorporation and the formation of the members, and the proper object of the sacred bonds" (Canon 587). A group of Brothers is presently at work in Rome preparing a revised text of the Rules, Constitutions and Book of Government of the Institute that will conform to these norms. The Code also reaffirms the traditional legislation concerning the canonical year of the novitiate, obligatory perpetual profession, the role of superiors and councils at every level (with considerable emphasis on wide participation and consultation) and, finally, the wearing of the habit "according to the norm of proper law."

In addition, since the Brothers are lay persons in a lay institute they are by this very fact excluded from the "power of governance" (potestas regiminis) in the church, although, like all lay persons, they may "cooperate in the exercise of this power in accord with the norm of the law" (Canon 129). Several sections of the code specifically recommend that lay persons be called upon to contribute their expertise in the decision making process. In the exercise of the ministry of the word, lay persons, including the Brothers, may preach in the church but they are forbidden to give the homily at Mass.

One feature of the new Code that has received a great deal of attention and that has relevance for the Brothers is the totally new section on Catholic Education (Book III, Title III). Here the rights of the parents and the right and duty of the Church to educate are again set forth with great insistence on the importance of Catholic education and Catholic schools. An official description is given of a Catholic school (Canon 803):

> "1. That school is considered to be Catholic which ecclesiastical authority or a public ecclesiastical juridic person supervises or which ecclesiastical authority recognizes as such by a public document.
> 2. It is necessary that the information and education given in a Catholic school be based on the principles of Catholic doctrine, teachers are to be outstanding for their correct doctrine and integrity of life.
> 3. Even if it be really Catholic, no school may bear the title Catholic School without the consent of competent ecclesiastical authority."

The Code goes on to say that the local ordinary (usually the bishop) has the right to appoint, approve, or remove religion teachers (Canon 805) and to supervise or visit Catholic Schools in his territory, even those established or conducted by religious institutes (Canon 806). It remains to be seen how this will be interpreted and applied in the various dioceses where the Brothers conduct schools.

Finally, it might be remarked that the promulgation of the new Code serves as a reminder to the Brothers that they are in fact members of a religious institute officially approved by church authority; that their personal identity as Brother is tied to the institutional form of the Institute and the church. On the other hand, this in no way contradicts the teaching of Vatican II, the new Code itself, to say nothing of St. John Baptist de La Salle, that for the Brothers the gospel is "their first and principal Rule." It likewise challenges the Brothers and the Institute to keep alive the specific charism of the Founder and the distinctive character and mission of their Institute.

FOREWORD

With this 7th edition, our third appearance of the Lasalliana begins. In a few months, the General Chapter will constitute an important event upon which we will have the occasion to reflect in future editions. The capitulants themselves or perhaps the next General Council which will be elected, will no doubt review the various publications of the Mother House, evaluate their objectives, their content and their distribution in view of providing the Lasallian Family with an improved and uninterrupted service.

At the beginning of this number, I should simply like to call the attention of our readers and users of the Lasalliana to the purpose of the articles which we publish.

Recently, upon reading the replies to a questionnaire on the situation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools in the different regions of the Institute, I became convinced that one of the most frequent concerns among the Brothers is that of sharing the Lasallian charism with the lay teachers who are associated with them in the same educational and evangelical mission. These responses, having come from 53 different countries, seem to me to be a truly significant sampling.

This has to do with a sharing on all levels:

— of the spirituality of St. John Baptist De La Salle,

— of a philosophy of education,

— of major pedagogical institutions and orientations,

— of experience accumulated over three centuries,

— of initiatives and responsibilities on every level in the concrete situations of today.

This willingness of sharing and of associating proceeds, no doubt, from various causes:

— the urgency of replacing the Brothers, whose numbers are diminishing, — the continuity of the educational work which is so often very much appreciated by those who benefit from it.

— the conviction of representing an educational trend of value,

— the concept of a type of scholastic community based on the style of the Brothers.

— the frank recognition of the Ministry of lay people in the Church, etc.

If the awareness of the necessity and urgency of this sharing is quite evident, there is some measure of hestitation regarding the manner and means this sharing should take. It is therefore opportune to recall that the Lasalliana was created for this purpose. It proposes channels of reflection and shared research to individuals, communities, and work groups. It offers the advantage of gathering together all the purposes and aims of Lasallian history:

— a consideration of the origins of the Institute in order to become better acquainted with the Founder,

— a wide range of actual accomplishments, of on-going research, of commitments, and testimonies.

It is because of this that the Brothers who work on the publication of the Lasalliana hope that these articles will be used as instruments of work and not simply as reading material. This therefore calls for distributing the Lasalliana within the community and throughout the institutions.

At the beginning of this third year, we hope that the 120 leaflets which have already appeared and the 60 planned for this year (20 of which are included here) will constitute some of the instruments of reflection on real life situations, and may they enlarge and make more meaningful the "the togetherness and by association" of the Lasallian family.

DE LA SALLE AND THE CIVIL AUTHORITIES

We shall deal here only with the original reaction of John Baptist de La Salle with regard to the civil authorities.

We begin with the cities, municipalities and parishes.

1) Distrust of the cities:

Legally, because the 17th century considers the school as "educative" and not merely a dispenser of "knowledge", the scholastic institutions are the moral responsibility of the clergy, although civil authority had its rights in their regard.

La Salle is engaged in a school adventure because of the last will and testament of Nicolas Roland which makes him the executor. He is twenty-seven years old. He cannot set aside the wishes of the deceased. He therefore follows his wishes literally. With the approbation of the Archbishop, he vigorously intervenes before the municipal authorities so that an inquiry "de commodo et incommodo" be undertaken and that the local approbation lead to the granting of the Royal Lettres Patentes. He opposes the town authorities in the administration of the office of the poor and of the General Hospital in order to obtain for the Sisters of the Infant Jesus a greater pedagogical and pastoral independence; In 1679, the Sisters thus obtain the Lettres Patentes which recognizes no other valid superior for them except the Archbishop or his designate. Their schools are at the same time "officially" municipal and diocesan "Christian-Catholic" to use a favourite expression of St. John Bauptist de La Salle in his Duties of a Christian. So, it is the Archbishop who exercises authority over them and not the municipality. However, the latter may at times underwrite certain expenses for services rendered to the people.

Accordingly, when Adrien Nyel arrives in Rouen from Rheims, he does not go to the town council nor to the General Hospital but to John Baptist de La Salle, as to a parish priest in need of a good school teacher. This is a course quite different from that set by Nicolas Roland. The masters for the boys' school will not be part-time hospital aids as were the Sisters of Roland who ran an orphanage. They will not be subjected to the pressures of the city official nor of those in charge of the hospital. The latter like the former would just impede these homeless children and at little expense at that, without being too concerned that they be properly educated, provided that the "public order" is respected.

2) Liaison with parish authorities

La Salle operates therefore with the parish priest and the parish authorities. This "Framework", that is, this team in charge of the administration of the parish assets is the true democratically organized authority for the management of the assets of the clergy. The parish priest receives from them his financing and it is to them that he renders an account. It is vital to be aware that the French Government today, characterized by its "separation of Church and State" was entirely unknown in the seventeenth century. In that period the term "Parish" was used not in a "religious" context but of a temporal jurisdiction having at its head the parish priest and having an economic administrative assistant responsible for all non-religious affairs. The important citizens were grouped by "parishes". The land claims by the Esates-General in 1789 will be done "by parishes" and will be matter-of-fact when not anti-religious.

So it is through the parishes that appeals are made to La Salle. In other words, the people are bound by two types of authority: the parish priest to represent the Church and the layman to determine the families' temporal needs.

At Rheims it is the pastor of Saint-Maurice who requests a teacher and who receives Adrien Nyel accompanied by his 14 year old assistant. They are responsible to the pastor and not to the town nor to the hospital in charge of the poor and their education. In case of a disagreement, Nyel is free to leave, the same as the parish priest can dismiss him without any formal process. There is complete liberty on the side of both parties concerned.

It is the same in the three gratuitous schools in Rheims run by the Brothers of the Christian Schools established at the request of the pastor. The lay authority in particular and at times even those of the municipality cover the expenses but no one is constrained to continue indefinitely in this collaboration. A good school will survive... an inept school will fold up... This is the law of progress, of pedagogical innovation, of devotedness which is always considered for the well-being of children.

The second stage: the Archbishop of Rheims wants to keep La Salle solely in his own diocese. La Salle hesitates. He consults the Minim religious priest, Father Barré, a man of great virtue (Rome has just proclaimed the heroicity of his virtues). The answer is clear: leave your homeland like Abraham, spread out throughout France, and begin by going to Paris and seeking authorization of the Archbishop there. La Salle knows from other sources, the importance that Jean-Jacques Olier, founder of the Sulpiciens, attributed to gratuitous Christian Schools. He therefore establishes a school in the parish of St. Sulpice, where he and his Brothers replace the teachers there, who are dedicated, but whose educational competence is limited. He takes charge of other schools. Finally, every part of this parish of 50,000 inhabitants has its Christian gratuitous and public school. No permission is ever requested from the civil authorities of the city, nor of the ecclesiastical authorities of the school of Paris. It is only the parish priest who, in favour of the needs of his parishioners, that is of the children and their families, gets involved in this new organisation. Subsequently, when a disagreement arises between the pastor and La Salle, the latter leaves Paris for Rouen: their mutual liberty permits this separation without juridical or financial complications. Upon the insistent demands of the parents and when the pastor returns to a more amicable disposition, La Salle does not hesitate to return and to furnish him with Brothers.

3) More complex relations

In Rouen, it is less simple. Archbishop Colbert open his doors. The city authorities are not asked because it is the Office of the Poor, in which Nyel was formerly in charge of the schools, which is responsible for gratuitous school service. But the Office is composed of the President of the Parliament, the Archbishop and various representatives of the city council. La Salle is requested to let the Brothers stay at the hospital and there take care of the orphanage as well as of the dormitory of the young apprentices. Having been chased out of Paris, La Salle accepts. Very soon the Brothers are overwhelmed by the excessive work and begin to fall ill. La Salle negotiates a revision of the contract. The hospital work is given up for the greater good of the schools formerly established in every part of the city by Adrien Nyel. The city will soon contribute to the financing of the school in cooperation with the General Hospital and various benefactors, but this will not give them any right to inferfere with the educational methods of the Brothers or in the recruitment of their pupils. In case of a disagreement, their only recourse will be the threat of removing their financial support. The choice of teachers remains exclusively reserved to De La Salle and to his successors as the head of the Institute.

For the most part events in the other cities developed in an analogous fashion: the municipal administration are in a consultative role but they do not actively participate in the success of the founding of the schools, nor do they have any decisive grip on the Lasallian institution. These schools ever retain full liberty to evolve, develop, and to educate in a Christian manner and in following the teaching of the programme elaborated by the Brothers themselves in answering the real needs of the gratuitous pupils. The civil authorities can only suggest changes, raise or lower their financial support in order to exercise some pressure, but they do not have the power to interfere in the internal running of the school.

DE LA SALLE AND THE CIVIL AUTHORITIES (2)

4) SOME EXCEPTIONS

La Salle never sends the Brothers into a village where there will not be enough children to fill up, one day or another, a minimum of five classes. He says this quite clearly in a prospectus whose purpose it is to make the Institute known: "The Brothers of this Institute will run schools only in towns where there will be at least five Brothers, four for maintaining the school, and one of these will also be in charge of the house, and a fifth serving Brother to look after the household needs and to replace a school Brother who should fall ill or should require some days of rest".

Let us understand this point clearly. He is not insisting on a minimum of four classes at once. For La Salle to accept a new foundation it suffices that the demografic conditions be satisfied in the future. Consequently, for classes of 50 each (in keeping with the directives of The Conduct of Schools) a town must have at least 200 boys of school age that is boys over six and under fourteen years of age. In actual fact, on this point La Salle always shows himself most anxious about remaining faithful to these principles. When the parish priest of Crosne, a village near Paris, asks him for a teacher, he answers that he has no "married teachers". He adds that "it is not fitting for a school teacher to be in an office if he really wants to be dedicated to his school". In other words, the duties of a clerk or helper of the clergy are incompatible with the scholastic dedication of a Lasallian teacher.

The same refusal was made to Guipavas, near Brest, in 1705. After sending two Brothers to that place, La Salle recalls them again because the allusion to Brest deceived him. It was not exactly a suburb of the city, that they were referring to but only a distant village and very sparsely populated. With regard to Darnétal, which someone informed him is close to Rouen, the Saint begins by being apprehensive: is it not farther away than he is told? Are there not fewer children of school age than he is being led to surmise? In other words how many "first communicants" in the parish, that is to say, not how many church goers but how many residents of school age? Once this matter is cleared up, he agrees to send Brothers to maintain there a popular school for boys.

A systematic study reveals that only nine cities out of twenty-five concretely supported the school projects initiated by the parish priest or Archbishop. Three cities, Le Puy, St. Omer, and Lyons began negotiations but without arriving at a conclusion during the lifetime of the Founder. Of the thirteen cities in which the Brothers established themselves with the solicitude of the municipal authority, four rapidly demonstrated a real hostility. In Mâcon the Brother had to pull up stakes. In Protestant regions, the municipal budget did not make a real contribution. Legislation of Louis XIV, hostile to the Reformists, put at the disposition of the civil authorities the assets of the émigré. Thus the Christian Schools at times became "royal schools", that is to say, supported by the royal budget thus profitting the local communities without costing them anything. Let us be precise in stating that the financial support coming from the civil authorities, and not from an explicitly Protestant source, did not stigmatize the beneficiaries as plunderers. This type of situation facilitated the development of the schools of Alès, Mende, Les Vans and Calais.

5) CONCLUSION

The Lasallian will to remain master of their programmes, methods, life-style, choice of directors and the teaching force in the school is manifest. Likewise, the unyielding determination of the Founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is not tolerating any discrimination among the students because of money often hampered the generosity of the civil authorities. They never ceased to believe, during the Founder's lifetime and in the following centuries, that the rich should finance the education of their children as far as they are able. On their part they considered as nothing the humiliation which paralyzes the poor when they have to reveal their financial condition in asking for enrollment in a school. This was also a failure to recognize the cultural value of having children of different social backgrounds present in the same school. This was in effect to despise the human value of scholastic programmes oriented towards trades and commercial employment and to stress rather the types of employment which give access to liberal careers of magistrates, lawyers, doctors, academicians, professors in colleges and those responsible for municipal, provincial and governmental finances, all employments which, at this epoch required a certain down-payment, fee or tax as a prerequisite for acceptance.

La Salle's independence with regard to city authorities corresponds, in a word, to his desire to serve at the same time, both Church and State, God and children, the family and society, without anyone being able to interefere with his ever greater promotion of expansion and enrichment of his secular studies as well as the quality and extent of the religious formation given to the pupils in his schools. These schools were opened by him not merely "to master the catechism", but above all to help the children "live a Christian life from morning until evening". Profane and religious instruction thus join hands, without it ever being forgotten that education is also, and ever more so the apprenticeship of moral living imbued by the spirit of faith, that is to say, by a permanent relationship with God.

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (7): Relations in class

The previous leaflet underlined the importance of the teacher's knowing his pupils well. This would lead, one would believe, to deep interpersonal relations. The reading of the Management of Schools lets one view the matter differently.

It would be advisable to set aside the ideas and practices which we have today regarding class-room relations and also certain current pedagogical methods which are so highly regarded today: dialogue, discussion, work groups, study workshop, pedagogical alertness... none of these can be found in the Management of Schools.

The importance of non-verbal relation

This title only appears to be paradoxical. Let us look back to the concrete conditions under which the first Lasallian schools operated: the classes are very crowded, there are numerous divisions within the class according to order and lessons, in a place not very conducive to teaching. How does one establish and maintain in such classes the order necessary for good work? By rigorous silence, among other things.

It seems that three aspects should be singled out: silence, signs, and vigilance.

The importance of silence

The second part of the Management is entirely dedicated to the "means of establishing and maintaining order in schools". The first chapter recommends to the teacher to be particularly vigilant "that an exact silence is maintained in the school!". The third article of this chapter is entitled "Of the care the teacher should take to see that strict silence prevails in school" and it gives in detail the purpose, the reason and the means.

The purpose:

> "Silence is one of the principal means of establishing and maintaining order in the schools; it is for this reason that each teacher should see to it that exact silence be observed in class, and that no one be allowed to speak without permission". (p. 122).

The justification of this is primarily in the spiritual order and not only pedagogical:

> "To achieve this, the teacher will convince his children that they should keep silence, not because he is present, but because God sees them, and this is His holy will" (p. 122).

The means: the teacher, as well as the pupils will speak in class only on three occasions:

The pupils:

> "The teacher will let the pupils understand that they are permitted to speak in class only at three times, namely, in reciting the lesson, at Catechism, and at prayer times". (p. 123).

Regarding the teacher:

> The teacher himself will also observe a similar rule and will not speak except at three times:
> 1- to correct the pupil during the lesson, when necessary, when another pupils cannot do it;
> 2- during catechism time;
> 3- during the reflection and during the examination of conscience.
> Outside of these three times, the teacher will not speak unless he deems it necessary and he should make sure that this happens rarely. (p. 123).

The use of signs

Chapter two of this same part deals with "signs which are in use in the Christian Schools". (p. 124).

> "It will be of very little use for the teacher to enforce silence if he does not keep it himself; he will teach the practice better by example than by words, and the silence of the teacher himself will, more than anything else bring about very great order in the school, and it will give him the means of watching over himself and his pupils. It is for this reason that the use of signs has been instituted in the Christian Schools". (p. 124).

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

This is the justification for putting into practice a great number of signs corresponding to diverse school activites, among which are: the prayers, lunch, inattention, school work, catechism and the "corrections" them selves. The paragraphs of the chapter give in detail the nature of the signs for each one of these eventualities.

And to facilitate the excution of these signs, a common instrument for the purpose is chosen, "the signal", which is briefly described in the text and which for a long time has been a part of the tradition of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

The vigilance of the teacher

Although put here in the third position in the Management it is the first "of nine principal ways which can contribute to establishing and maintaining order in the schools". (p. 115).

> "The vigilance of the teacher in schools consists particularly in three things:
> 1- In repeating correctly every word pronounced wrongly by the reader;
> 2- In making sure that everyone is following the same lesson;
> 3- In making sure that strict silence reigns in school.
> Careful attention should always be paid to these three things". (p. 116).

Again it is certain that vigilance is not intended as a disciplinary or coercive end, but rather to facilitate effective work. To facilitate the exercise of vigilance, place the children and station yourself in such a way that everyone is constantly within your view.

This vigilance is exercised not only in the classroom but also in lining up the pupils for going to or returning from church, during the liturgical office, and even in the streets, while leading the children towards their home. When the teacher cannot do this adequately himself, he should pick out certain pupils to assist him. With the good example which the teacher gives on all occasions, vigilance is the aspect to which the Management of Schools most frequently reverts.

Teacher-pupil personal relationships

As underlined in the texts cited below, the "non-verbal" relationships concern the rapport between the teacher and the class as a whole. As concerns the occasional relations with one or another pupil two principal types of rapport can be briefly distinguished:

Concerning authority-dependence relations

These appear for example:

* in the surveillance constantly exercised over each pupil, at every moment of the day;

* in case an infraction of the rules is established: the authority of the teacher is seen in meting out penances and corrections. It is sufficient merely to mention this here, without further details, even though it forms a central aspect of the Management of Schools.

* Contrariwise, the teacher can also reward good scholastic performance or excellent conduct by the distribution of prizes.

In these diverse situations the teacher operates within the authority with which he is invested in order to assure the good conduct of the class. It would be well not to forget that this type of relationship was very much in keeping with the concept of authority in the seventeenth century, "authority by divine right" in a very hierarchical society which was very respectful of established positions and of clearly defined roles or functions.

Concerning personal relationships showing an interest in the child

The respect for this hierarchy impeded neither personal interest nor affection for the pupils. In writings other than the Management of Schools, De La Salle insists on this very much. This interest finds opportunities for implementation on various occasions, for example:

— at the time of accepting new pupils, in trying to gather all allowable information to get well acquainted with them;

— in the keeping of the "Register" in the course of the year, or even the reading of the "Register of Good and Bad Qualities" of the previous year; — in the continual observation of the deportment and personality of each child; — and especially on the occasion of absences, in infoming themselves of the reasons and in welcoming the child back on his return.

This collection of means permitted the teacher to do a personality sketch of each pupils in the "Register of Good and Bad Qualities" cited above.

To this constant attention it would be necessary add the very precise occasions when the teacher ought to make decisions concerning certain pupils: the choice of "officers"; awarding of prizes; the decision to punish, the monthly changing of the lesson on rank...

On all these occasions, the Management requires of the teacher a personalized attention to the character and to the reaction of each pupil.

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (8): Relations among pupils

To talk about relations among pupils as found in the Management of Schools, it seems to me to be necessary to begin with "Officers". In each class, the teacher designated a certain number of pupils, especially those who had distinguished themselves by their seriousness, their application to work, their traits of character... to these he confided the charge or responsibility of coordinating activities for the good order of the group. These were the offices to which officers were assigned.

These were not the only type of relations which existed among the pupils and I would like to distinguish four kinds of relationships which seem to me to sum up the essentials of what is described in the Management of Schools.

Concerning relationships of authority

The manuscript of the text of 1706 lists four kinds of "Officers". They are assigned by the teacher at the beginning of the scholastic year in view of assuring order in the class, especially when he himself is absent or to fulfill certain tasks which he should not or cannot do himself.

Certain of these "Officers" exercise real power over their comrades, delegated though it may be. This is the case with the "Inspectors" and the "Overseers":

> "The duty of the inspector in each class shall be to observe everything which goes on in the class during the absence of the teacher" (p. 210).
> "He will faithfully report to the teacher all that has transpired together with all their circumstances; he shall be exact in neither adding anything, nor leaving anything out". (p. 210).

Regarding the "Overseers", their role appears even more ambiguous because they do not exercise their authority openly:

> "There shall be in each class two pupils who shall be in charge of checking-up on the conduct of the inspector, while he is exercising his duties, to see if he does not allow himself to be bribed, that he does not exact anything from others in exchange for not reporting their faults to the teacher" (p. 212).
> "The teacher will take care that the inspector does not know who the overseers are, and for this reason, they will not be openly appointed like the other officers, and will not hold any title" (p. 212).

Concerning the relations of service

These services are carried out by the other "Officers" designated by the teacher in making use of their qualities and talent. In the exercise of their duties, these shall contribute to the good order of the class:

> "All the officers shall be named by the teacher in each class, the first school day after the vacation. Each teacher will follow the advice of the Director or of the Inspector of Schools, and if subsequently he needs to change someone, any further nominations will be carried out in the same manner" (p. 204-205).

It would be useful to note that these officers numbered twelve; some duties were assigned to two pupils at the same time, and others were organized according to a monthly rotation.

These figures seem to me to be interesting, because it underlines the large proportion of pupils who were thus directly associated with the good order of the class. These pupils were on duty:

— during class work

— during prayer or lunch or snack time

— during the Mass in church

— outside of class time by visiting absent pupils, for example.

To give a complete list here would be only of anecdotal interest, the titles pertaining to an older stage of the language and would require too long an explanation.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

On the other hand, it seems to me interesting to retain the principal, of the distribution of responsibilities, which determined the naming of such "Officers". It must also be noted that the invention and implementation of this system did not come from the Management of Schools. It can be found in other schools in an earlier epoch than 1706, for example in the well known work "The Parish School".

Concerning relations of mutual help

The first Lasallian Schools constituted a systematization of simultaneous teaching in France. One could consider that this pedagogical situation easily lent itself to mutual help in school work, and many passages in the Management attest that such was so, thus, for example these two quotations:

> "During this time, there shall be two people in the first class who will be in charge, on the part of the teacher, to mark on the two papers sometimes a letter or a syllable and sometimes another in a different place, so that the pupils who are learning these things can do their lessons" (p. 4).
> "The pupils will assemble during the half-hour period preceding Catechism time, and while they are assembling they will interrogate one another, by pairs, about the diocesan catechism, like the drills which they will do during lunch and snack time. The teacher will be careful to take notice of who should be asking and repeating the catechism during this time". (p. 107-108).

In an even more significant manner, one finds mutual aid:

— during the reading and arithmetic lessons, it is a matter of correcting, that is helping, those who make a mistake.

— to help those who do not understand well, showing them how to read or calculate is a true example of mutual instruction.

— and when the teacher deems it useful for the progress of the group in a section or lesson, he will retain in this group one or more pupils who are more advanced, instead of changing them. They will thus become the motivating elements of the group and they will thus introduce the emulation and dynamism which generate progress. Is this not a nice little example of solidarity?

Concerning the relations of sharing

The clientele of the first schools of the Brothers naturally numbered a good proportion of families which were economically poor. Financial disparities were seen especially during lunch and snack time which the pupils were to take in class. This was, in the spirit of de La Salle, an educational opportunity in propriety and good manners. For these meals, the children were invited to bring their own food, without being constrained. This became an opportunity for those who brought too much food to share their abundance with others, especially true with regard to meat. They were advised not to bring meat because everyone could not afford it, and to share their food.

> "They will not be permitted to bring any meat, and if anyone shall bring some, it will be given to the most poor, to those of whom it is sure that they have not eaten any at home" (p. 8).

One of the usual practices was to collect the extra bread so that it could be distributed to those who needed it. This was a way of teaching the Christian concept of compassion and sharing:

> "He (the teacher) from time to time even during mealtime, will encourage this act of charity either by a few examples or moving reasons which will inspire them to do this, willingly, and lovingly for the love of God" (p. 15

Conclusion

These few glimpses of the interior relations in the class at the beginning of the eighteenth century may seem very modest in the light of those which we may experience or observe today.

It is, therefore, necessary to put this back into its place at the origin of simultaneous education to better understand the inevitable gropings in the organization and animation of the class-group.

Let us neither forget that the pupils were not accustomed to disciplined and collective schooling and individual instruction hardly prepared them for it. We know how difficult it is and how long it takes to develop any new group behaviour.

On the other hand, at this period, a clear-cut idea existed with regard to the teacher and the one taught, and this led to a pedagogical relationship of dependence of those who should do their studies under a teacher who knows and directs. In spite of this, we know very well how much John Baptist de La Salle insists in writings other than the Management of Schools, on the respect which must be shown for the child.

In fact, the proposals in the Management of Schools on the internal organization of classroom relations were new, and those who implemented them were pioneers.

JUNIORATE AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT CENTRE ANALABE

The Juniorate and Rural Development Centre are situated near the town of Ambositra on the high plateau od south-central Madagascar.

More than 250,000 people live in an area of 4,000 square kilometres, making it the most densely populated part of the country. As in the rest of Madagascar, the population is mainly rural and must eke out a living from the soil of this mountainous region.

I must say straight away that this juniorate is not the result of a preconceived idea but the answer to a long felt need and to the wishes of the people. As the name indicates, this is a juniorate for young people in a rural setting.

A brief historical note to explain the origin of this establishment

Two Brothers undertook the onerous task of rural development. They started with young people who had left school for various reasons: those who did not make the grade for admission to secondary school and those who could not pay school fees because their parents had to think of younger members of the family.

Back in the bush, these young people forgot what they had learned in school and many of them could not find work. It was a question, therefore, of awakening them to their worth as persons and as potentisl cultivators of the land.

We began with short three-day sessions in the villages themselves. The purpose of these sessions was not only to train young men in modern methods of agriculture but also to give them confidence in themselves and an ideal for which to live and work, in a word, to take a pride in themselves as farmers. This ideal runs counter to the accepted notion that farming is a dead end.

The present situation

We have now got fifteen centres in the vicinity of Ambositra with an average of from 25 to 30 young people, boys and girls, attending each. We visit these centres every three months. A supervisor keep in touch with the students after the sessions and monitors their progress.

To motivate the young people and to encourage them to work, we have formed small basic communities where all the members can share in decision making. They will thus be able to influence the life of the group and create a sense of solidarity among themselves which will help to make them more independent.

Our purpose is to train farmers, especially the younger ones, without taking them away from their rural environment. It is we who go to them in their villages, their fields, their rice paddies and their homes. We want to arouse their interest and direct their energies along paths that will lead to success.

That is why we are training them in the use of modern techniques in agriculture, in stock-raising, in carpentry and joinery and in building. At the same time we are trying to improve cultural and educational standards and involve them in Christian youth movements.

Why the Juniorate at Analabe?

* The Juniorate accepts young men who think they may have a religious vocation. They are mainly young peasants from our development centres whose ages range from 18 to 25 years. Their educational level is not high but they are intelligent and learn fast. They are recruited from the centres on the advice of the local priests, the Sisters and the supervisors. Conditions for admission are the following:

— Certificate of Primary Education at least, — two consecutive years' attendance at a rural centre as well as membership of a Christian youth movement,

— two years under the guidance of a priest, a Sister or a supervisor and contact with the Brother Director of the Juniorate, — three years' formation in the Juniorate before beginning the postulancy.

This Juniorate aims at forming these young men in their own rural environment, giving them a reasonable standard of education, and allowing them time to study their vocation. During their three years here they are expected to take responsibility for their own progress and are given a certain amount of freedom to run their own lives.

Their practical training consists in maintaining the premises, preparation of simple meals, gardening, rice growing, raising of cattle, pigs, rabbits and poultry. A small workshop is available for carpentry, repairs etc.

Their intellectual formation is taken care of by four hours of study per day with classes in Malagache, French, arithmetic, geography, natural science, agriculture, music, drawing and civility.

Religious formation is spread over three years with courses in: the Old Testament, the New Testament, the Divine Office, the Psalms and prayer. Twice a week reflection and discussion take the place of formal classes to accustom these young men to community life, to the sharing of opinions and the expression of one's views. It is important to point out that traditional values are given their due place in the formation of these young Malagaches.

Other activities also form part of their formation such as:

— taking part in the work of the Christian Rural Youth Movement, — helping the physically and mentally handicapped in a neighbouring centre,

— animation of community prayers and Masses,

— retreats and days of recollection.

Conclusion: Juniorate in the country or Juniorate for country youth

It is decidedly a Juniorate for country youth. Our task is to form young men who will become Brothers, capable of undertaking work in the several sectors of the Institute's activities: rural development, craft teaching, publication of books, farm management etc. In a word, "to do anything at which they shall be emoloyed" in and for the Institute.

In the course of the present year (1985) two of these young men who have been members of the Christian Rural Youth Movement for three years, have attended the development centre for one year and spent three years in the Juniorate, are thinking of entering the District novitiate.

LENTEN ANIMATION IN A HIGH SCHOOL (1)

Stella Maris College, Tamatave, is a secondary school which caters to students of the first and second cycles, that is, students from sixth class to the final year in which they do the baccalauréat (from 11 to 18 years of age approximately).

In 1984 when the Lenten animation began, the college had 1350 students of whom 900 were in the first cycle. 60% of these first cycle students are Catholic while the others belong to different Protestant groups. We felt it our duty to reanimate the faith of all these students, Catholics and Protestants alike.

Presentation of our programme

Quite simply we wish to share with you our efforts to give meaning to our catechesis and inspiration to the Christian life of the college during the Lent of 1984.

As happens every year, great importance is attached to the liturgical season of Lent and an attempt is made to live a fuller Christian life. It is a special time in the life of Christians and we try to use it to awaken or strengthen the faith of our students which is often superficial and dormant.

We focus on three points:

Strengthening the students' faith by a well-adapted catechesis and by scripture reading each morning.

— Reconciliation with Our Lord by an effort towards penance and conversion: all classes receive the sacrament of reconciliation and a greater effort is demanded in work, in respect for others, in fidelity, etc.

— Renewal of Christian life: love of God and our neighbour.

This year two special efforts were demanded:

— The first was reception of Holy Communion during Sunday Mass. (Attendance at Divine Service for Protestant students).

— The second was a greater willingness to share with those in need (the poor, orphans, lepers, sick children, prisoners, old people).

Each section of the college was organized for a precise effort to help our less fortunate brothers and sisters.

To attain our objectives:

— we tried to mobilize and sensitize all our teachers without exception. To this end we held a meeting on 25th February, during which the Lenten programme was worked out in detail.

— On the following 5th March the first hour of class was devoted to the launching of the Lenten programme by each form master.

— An inquiry was carried out throughout the college on Sunday observance. Three questions were put to the students:

- Religion (Catholic or Protestant?)
- Did you attend Mass yesterday or Saturday evening?
  (For Protestant students - Were you at the "Fiangonana" meeting yesterday?)
- Were you at Mass (or Divine Service) on Sunday 12th, 19th, 26th February?
  (Answer: not at all, once, twice, three times).

— At the same time an explanatory leaflet was given to each student and a letter sent to the parents so as to involve the families.

— Catechetical instruction in all classes was devoted to the observance of Sunday as the Lord's Day. A booklet of eight pages was prepared and distributed among the teachers.

Programme drawn up with the teachers

The following is a resumé of the decisions taken together for the animation of Lenten observance in 1984.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Motivation of our action:

We attach great importance to the feast of Easter for several reasons:

— This a Christian school and the education we offer is based on Christian principles. Christian belief enlightens our judgements and our year is scanned by the liturgical feasts of the Church (Christmas, Easter, etc.). With due respect for the liberty of our students we try to instil in them Christian values: the Gospel Faith, Sacraments, the Church...

Generally speaking, our students are happy in this atmosphere of Christian education. Some ask to be baptized and large numbers prepare for the sacraments of the Eucharist and Confirmation.

— The feast of Easter takes first place in our calendar. It is the foundation of our faith, the celebration of our redemption by Jesus Christ through his death and resurrection. "Jesus is alive", is the message of hope that, like the Apostles, we wish to share with our students.

— Hence the importance of the Lenten preparation. This year it takes on greater importance than ever because we are going to celebrate the jubilee of our redemption, the 1950th anniversary of the death and resurrection of Our Saviour, while for the Catholic Church it is also a year consecrated to reconciliation. To come closer to Christ and to be reconciled with our brothers, it is for that purpose that we have developed this Lenten programme and it is the entire educative community which is going to put it into practice: form masters, teachers, animators.

The example we give of a Christian life is important for our students.

Lenten animation has three goals:

- an effort to strengthen the faith of our students
- an effort toward penance and conversion
- an effort to live a full Christian life: love of God and our neighbour.

— We shall try to strengthen the faith of our students in two ways:

— by a well-adapted course of religious instruction based on the observance of Sunday, an instruction which will prepare for the effort at Christian living which we insist on. This instruction by bringing us back to the Sunday Eucharist, will lead us to the theme of redemption, to our salvation effected by Jesus Christ. A little booklet will help us to renew our own lives and to assist our students and their families.

— by a reading from the Old and New Testament at the beginning of class each day, followed by a brief commentary from the teacher.

— Effort at conversion:

— There are penitential efforts to be made: more serious application to work, to the duties of one's state in life, respect for the work of others, self-discipline, for the sake of the common good.

— There is also the sacrament of reconciliation. An outline of the celebration of reconciliation will be given to each teacher. Each group may use it with the agreement of the college chaplain. It is important that the groups work closely with him. Each team corresponding with a given age group, will have a coordinator.

The examination of conscience is most important. It is a means of forming the consciences of young people, of teaching them to distinguish between the important and the accessory, insisting on the duties of one's state, on respect for others, on the common good as well as on one's duties to God, to one's parents and to one's neighbour.

— Effort at living a Christian life: Love of God and One's Neighbour:

— Sunday celebration as part of religious education. We wish to restore the meaning of Sunday celebration, not as an obligation, but as an important part of our life as believers. We shall make a lightning "sondage" to find out the rate of participation in the Sunday Eucharist or in the meetings of the Protestant "Fiangonana". A concrete effort in this matter will be demanded from the students and their families will be informed accordingly.

— Care for one's neighbour. Each group of classes will draw up a programme for help to the neighbour, as was done last year, in order to make the students more aware of the needs of the less fortunate: the handicapped, orphans sick children, prisoners, and the old. Don't be afraid to shake up the selfishness and indifference of the students and get them involved in visiting and in material aid. They must be made aware of their duty to their neighbour and of the need to forget themselves. But it is also important not to reduce care for one's neighbour to mere almsgiving. On this point we must take the initiative. Class teachers must work together and stimulate each other.

Co-ordination of efforts:

The day the programme is launched each form master will take his class for the first hour of the day. He will proceed as follows:

— a lightning inquiry

— a distribution of leaflets to each student. The leaflet summarises the points mentioned above. A brief commentary on the contents of the leaflet is called for.

— a letter to the parents is given to each pupil advising them of the programme and inviting them to cooperate in our efforts.

In this way the season of lent will become a good preparation for Easter and will contribute to personal renewal.

LENTEN ANIMATION IN A HIGH SCHOOL (2)

Some comments on the results of the inquiry

The inquiry presented above gave precise results. These results, of great interest to the college itself, would with difficulty be fitted into a Lasallian leaflet. However, some general remarks will indicate general tendencies.

— The inquiry shows clearly that we were right to choose assistance at Sunday Mass as the starting point for our Lenten instructions and of our efforts at Christian animation. In effect, from sixth class, that is, the first year of College, a considerable number of our students cease going to church. Those who did not go to Church, either Catholic or Protestant on the three Sundays mentioned were:

* 22% of Catholics: 36 out of 162
* 28% of Protestants: 26 out of 90

These figures were almost the same for the following three years of the first cycle.

— There is also a group of irregular attenders who practice from time to time and who went to their respective churches on one Sunday out of three. Among Catholics the percentages vary from 19 to 10 according to age group, and among Protestants from 35 to 14. It is to these students that our Lenten instructions and animation should be addressed to encourage them to a better celebration of the Lord's Day.

The actual numbers are: 83 Catholics and 68 Protestants.

— Then there is a group more regular in their practice and who went to their respective churches on Sunday, 4th March and on two or thrée Sundays in February. They, doubtless, need instruction to get beyond the notion of obligatory Sunday observance and to enter into the true spirit of the Lord's Day. In general this is a pretty large group. The percentage figures show from 48% to 66% among Catholics according to age group, and from 42% to 62% among Protestants.

— The results in figures show a decrease from the third class, that is, the last class of the First Cycle. We must study the causes of this decrease. We could think, for example, of worry about examinations at the end of third year, of private courses followed by some on Sundays or simply the need for rest... The aim of religious instruction with regard to this group should be to get their priorities right.

— A quick comparison between Catholic and Protestant groups seems to point to two conclusions:

* the overall participation of Catholics is slightly higher
* the participation of young Protestants increases from the sixth to the third year.[1]

— It should further be noted that 90% of the college students come from Catholic primary schools. It appears, therefore, that formation in the Christian observance of Sunday should begin in the primary schools.

— Lastly, the importance of careful preparation of the Sunday liturgy in the College should be noted. It is in the careful preparation of the liturgy and the dignified celebration of the Eucharist that the students are gradually initiated into Sunday celebrations. They enter into the spirit of the Eucharistic celebration and go beyond the mere notion of obligation.

A catechetical programme on Sunday assembly

Has our Sunday lost its impact? Because of its ancient origins? They go back twenty centuries, in fact, since they go back to Christ. It is He who began the tradition at His resurrection. It is the meaning of the word "Dimanche", the Lord's Day, the Day of the Risen Lord. Since Easter Day and the following Sunday when Christ appeared to the Apostles, Christians met on Sunday to celebrate Jesus Risen. The day was called the first day of the week. (Acts 20, 7 ss).

Are the Christians of today, who are still faithful to this assembly, consciously aware of this? Are those who are still described as "practising" doing so from habit, from family tradition or from respect for the law of the Church which binds their conscience? But are these motives sufficient to resist the current which for decades past has reduced the number of practising Christians?

This leaflet and those to follow will shed some light on this gesture of faith whose roots we all need to rediscover and which gives meaning and richness to our working week.

Here is a list of the leaflets which will reinforce our catechesis on the observance of Sunday:

Leaflet 1: Christians assemble on Sunday. Why?
Leaflet 2: They recall the memory of Whom?
Leaflet 3: They hear the Word of God.
Leaflet 4: They thank God. For What?
Leaflet 5: They share a meal. What Meal?
Leaflet 6: They give witness. Of What? Of Whom?
Leaflet 7: All Christians do not share in the celebration. Why?
Leaflet 8: In what spirit should we live Sunday?

(1) Following French custom, classes are numbered from six to one, six being the first year of secondary school.

ST CASSIAN'S CENTRE: TEN YEARS ON. A PERSONAL ACCOUNT(1)

St Cassian's Centre, established in 1975 as a residential retreat centre for young people, is about to celebrate its tenth birthday. Here, and in two articles to follow, Bro. Damian Lundy, who was the centre's Director for the first seven of these ten years, offers a personal account of the centre and its work.

How was the centre brought into existence and why do people go there?

During the 1974 Chapter of the English Province of the De La Salle Brothers, I asked the Province to open a residential retreat-centre for young people. The Chapter had already decided to close our Juniorate (a boarding-school for boys aged thirteen to sixteen who were interested in joining the Brothers) and to set up a new team concerned with recruitment and the fostering of vocations, which meant that the large well-equipped country house in rural Berkshire where this pre-Novitiate formation had taken place was available. After the Chapter, I was invited by the Provincial (Bro. Victor) to join the new team, along with Bro. Joseph Hendron and Bro. Dominic Green. I agreed, on the understanding that the team's approach would include the establishment of a retreat-centre. This was accepted as an experiment for three years, beginning in the autumn of 1975. The experiment was to be assessed by the next District Chapter in 1978, with a view to the Centre becoming more established, if necessary in a different setting, or to its ceasing to exist, if the experiment had not been successful. It was also agreed that a financial subsidy would be assured by the Province. The new Centre was to offer to teenagers and young adults the experience of a residential retreat (though some misgivings were expressed about the use of that particular term), directed by the team of three Brothers with the participation of a chaplain a priest who would either be invited to participate by the team, or who would accompany a group with whom he was already in contact (e.g. a local priest or a school-chaplain).

As Head of Religious Education at the Brothers' school in St Helens, from 1970 to 1975, I had joined with another of our schools in organising Young Christian Student (YCS) activities, which had involved a few residential visits. On certain occasions during the summer, St Cassian's had been used for these retreat-holidays, which had proved successful and popular with those taking part. I had become convinced that many sixthformers who appeared to be so bored during Religious Education lessons would be open to religious questions if these were raised in a less formal and more personal setting, such as at St Cassian's. My experience with groups at Kintbury and elsewhere led me to this convinction. I also felt that Religious Education could succeed only if it started from the doubts and questions with which the young people were filled, but which almost all were reluctant to raise and discuss in a school-setting. Surveys and informal discussions confirmed my impressions. If, as professional Christian educators, the Brothers were to respond to the needs of young people in the 1970s (a rather neglected group in the Church), while not abandoning the traditional school-setting of their apostolate, I felt they should supplement this with a retreat-centre.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The need for a residential centre with a programme specially devised for the needs of young adults and teenagers was experienced more widely than among the sixthform boys and girls of St Helens and Salford. I saw it as a general need in the British Church, and one which was being met only partially and inadequately. I was sure that, given the chance to make contact with other schools, tertiary colleges and parishes, the centre would flourish.

The experience of creative liturgy, prayer and discussion in the relaxed and friendly atmosphere of a charming old country house would provide the young participants with that for which many of them thirsted but failed to experience in the local parishes or schools: the experience of a Christian community, in which questions could be asked and experiences offered, so that faith could grow. The option, made in freedom, to help to create such a community for a few days, would offer the young people an opportunity which they would normally not have, and for which compulsory Religious Education (however well taught) and compulsory attendance at church or at religious services in school were no substitute. The full participation of teachers interested enough to accompany the group, as well as of the retreat-team, would bring the young people into personal and informal contact with adults, most of them committed to Christianity while sympathetic to the difficulties and questions of the younger generation, and not free from questions themselves. There would also be the opportunity to meet other young people, since, right from the early days, it was envisaged that, if possible, the Centre would be used by people from more than one place, coming together to form a single group, in which both sexes would be welcome.

Finally, the challenge to continue the experience (and develop its implications) beyond the few days spent in the centre would be implicit, setting up more permanent local groups to meet in liturgy and prayer as well as for social reasons - groups which would evangelize their members and the world in which they moved; a concern much discussed in the mid-seventies at various levels of the Church.[1]

How did this tie in with the team's commitment to fostering vocations to the Brothers' way of life? I was convinced that the work of fostering vocations to the religious life and the priesthood could not be separated from the work of building Christian communities more generally, which included praying together and sharing experiences on the level of personal faith, even if this was a searching and uncertain faith. This would often include the need to reject some "hang-ups" and misconceptions, the resúlt of negative experiences which seemed to haunt many of the young people like ghosts, and which, if not addressed, were a major obstacle to growth into a more mature and personal faith.[2] If this was hard to achieve in a classroom setting, limited experience had shown how different the picture looked when seen from the setting of a residential centre, at a safe distance from home, school and parish (frequently associated with these "ghosts"). If the Brothers were to attract young men to join them, if God's call were ever to be heard as á personal call addressed in love to each one, young people must taste what a Christian community could be like and what it could mean to celebrate the Eucharist outside a formal church-setting, using music and texts to which they could respond as a group and as individuals. They must learn to relate to one another in faith and freedom, including a sharing of their questions and uncertainties. As they discovered their needs, personal. ministry would be supplied by the retreat-team and by the young people themselves, since a group which contains needs also contains gifts to cater for those needs. The work was fundamentally a work of evangelization. I am writing this with the benefit of hindsight: it and its implications were to become much clearer as the team worked together during the early years, and as the numbers of young people coming to Kintbury grew considerably - into hundreds and then up to some three thousand each year, a situation which led to various changes in the facilities at St Cassian's, the structure of the programme and the size of the team.

ST CASSIAN'S CENTRE: TEN YEARS ON (2)

What is the underlying theology behind the retreat-work at St Cassian's?

The basic conviction around which what quickly became known as "the Kintbury experience" was built is that each person has inherent value which is to be sustained and used (once it has been discovered) in the relationships which each one forms. A lot of teenage (and adult) "hang-ups" arise from the fact that, as people grow up, they acquire many negative self-impressions and they become blind to the good in themselves. However well-intentioned, parents and schools play a leading part in this situation. Often religion plays a decisive part in the process (so that it becomes a real enemy of faith), since the image of God with which so many people are encumbered is a basically negative and fearful one, which does nothing to help them grow, since they have no desire to relate with a God who is "like a merciless tyrant".[3] Often a good deal of remedial reflection and action is required since a repudiation of "the God I don't believe in"[4] may well be necessary before a search for an alternative God can really begin. This is not a private task, for we all need help and support, including affirmation to combat the self-depreciation which so many people practise.

My visit to retreat-centres in Australia and the U.S.A. in 1977 helped me to work out more explicitly what we had been trying to do in our centre since the retreats began. In Sydney, a priest friend drew my attention to a slogan which, with some modification, was eventually to become a kind of motto for Kintbury. I express it here using my own name, as it needs to be personalized:

I'm Damian
and I'm O.K.
'cos God doesn't make junk
but he collects it!

The last four words were added by me, since though the first page of the Bible makes it clear that "God doesn't make junk - "God saw all that he had made, and indeed it was very good",[5] two pages later on, the problem arises, told in the story of the Fall. (One recalls Karl Barth's answer to a fundamentalist student who asked him if he believed that the Serpent really spoke. Barth replied, "I don't believe the Serpent spoke, but I believe in what he said!") We note that God's judgment has traditionally been understood to include the first promise of eventual redemption. Throughout the developing relevation of God, as recorded in the Bible, people come to understand that, even if we make junk for ourselves and others, and turn the world in which we live into a junkyard, our dark human situation is relieved by the promise of God's salvation or healing presence for all who will accept him. We Christians believe this was fulfilled in Jesus, the Lamb of God who collects the "junk" of the world (cf John I,29) not to use it against us as evidence of guilty complicity in that destructive process, but to offer us the hope of a more abundant life. (John 10,10).

This is the Good News we all need to hear at every stage in life, but nowhere more urgently and more comfortingly than in adolescence, with all its bewilderment:

"that toil of growing up;
The ignominy of boyhood, the distress
Of boyhood changing into man;

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The unfinished man and his pain
Brought face to face with his own clumsiness".[6]

The challenge of the slogan ("I'm Damian," etc) is to let it question me and to respond to it honestly, to confront the reality in my life, and then, as a next step, to try to account for the reality by sharing my experience with others. I used to suggest that one could respond to the statement in one of five ways: by placing next to it a tick ("Yes, it's true!), or a cross ("No, I don't believe it!"), or a question-mark ("I don't know"), or a tick and a question-mark ("Yes, BUT..."), or a cross and a question-mark ("No, BUT..."). As you will guess, the three responses which were most common were those which included one of the three question-marks, which signified an underlying question or series of questions, to be pondered and identified, alone and in a "sharing-group".

The team's growing experience of what we were now calling "ministry" led us to see that the work of healing had a key place in the retreat-experience, and that the implications of this meant that individuals were called to respond to the new life received by sharing it with others. It was in the United States in 1977 that I first heard and came to adopt the expression, "Become Good News!". This was another way of expressing the challenge implicit in another expression we often used at the time: "Kintbury begins when you leave!".

Each person is invited to share his or her discovery in the world to which they return with something to give, namely themselves. Bro Simon Ryan, who made a strong contribution to the Centre for a few months during Kintbury's second year (1976-77), used to express the effect for the individual by quoting the final stanza of the W.B. Yeats poem I have quoted:

"I am content to follow to its source
Every event in action or in thought;
Measure the lot; forgive myself the lot!
When such as I cast out remorse
So great a sweetness flows into the breast
We must laugh and we must sing,
We are blest by everything,
Everything we look upon is blest".[7]

This non-Christian poem shows clearly the connection between self-acceptance, self-forgiveness and the singing or celebration of the resulting "sweetness" with which the individual is "blest". In Christian terms, it is God who forgives and accepts, when he is accepted; he is to be thanked and praised in personal prayer and in the liturgy of the group. It might be added that, from the very beginning, music played a big part in Kintbury. As well as praising God, it helps to build up and express a sense of community, so it was natural that it should punctuate the day and colour the style of liturgy, which was devised to allow individuals and the constituent groups to which they belonged maximum participation. Music and celebration are a natural response to God's generosity, discovered as an experience of the Good News: "It is by grace that you have been saved, through faith; not by anything of your own, but by a gift from God; not by anything you have done, so that nobody can claim the credit. We are God's work of art, created in Christ Jesus, to live the good life as from the beginning he had meant us to live it", is the Jerusalem Bible's attractive way of expressing Ephesians 2, 8-10. There are two connected responses: to sing the Good News, and to live it. The response will never be secured once and for all, for it is essentially a personal response to be made in the changing circumstances of life as well as expressed in the liturgy.

In the next issue of Lasalliana, I shall continue this account by presenting the outline of a typical session at St Cassian's.

LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY (5) HOW? SCHOOL AND NON-SCHOOL APOSTOLATE

"The end of the Institute", says the Rule of 1705, "is to give a Christian education to children, and it is for this purpose that the Brothers keep schools" The end: Christian education of children; the means: the school. The school, for De La Salle, was the principal and ordinary means, linked intrinsically to the finality of the Institute. Nevertheless, it is important to distinguish end from means.

It is equally important to be precise concerning the school that De La Salle chose as the ordinary means. It was not just any school. It was the Christian gratuitous school, the school which embodied the values we spoke of earlier, the school which was free of charge and therefore available to the poor for whom it was primarily intended.

The Christian School, available to all

The General Chapters have reaffirmed the Christian-School-available-to-all as the "foremost apostolic work of the Brothers", (Declaration 44) and as the "privileged instrument" for educating the poor. (Rule, Chapter 1). Obviously, to be such a privileged instrument the school must be creatively adapted to the needs of the poor and realistically available to them. Brothers sometimes erroneously interpret exhortations to give higher priority to service of the poor as exhortations to choose non-school apostolates. That is to mix apples and oranges. Matters concerning the FOR WHOM and matters concerning the HOW, while related, are distinct.

An Extraordinary History

Brothers, the history of Catholic schools in the United States is a clear manifestation of the faith and commitment of our Catholic population. We can and should be legitimately proud of our central role in this development, a development indicating that we were "inculturated" and "inserted" actively in the local Church long before these expressions became fashionable.

The Institute grew in the United States not in response to the needs of the poor class in a Catholic population; but rather in response to the needs of a Catholic minority in a population heavily Protestant, and, in varying degrees, suspicious of and even hostile toward the increasing Catholic population. Catholic schools made possible for the children of minority Catholics, many of them immigrants, many of them poor, a Catholic education which helped them to preserve their faith and to compete competently in United States society. The focus was the Catholic minority, regardless of social or economic status, and not the poor segment of a Catholic population. The financial sacrifice for Catholic education that even low-income Catholic parents, as well as young people themselves, have made and continue to make today is one of the most striking characteristics of the United States Catholic Church. In like manner the effort the Brothers have made and continue to make to keep tuition as low as possible through their contributed services, careful economizing, and creative fund-raising testifies to the desire of the Brothers to make their schools available to as many young people as possible.

Continuing Mission of Catholic Schools

As the Catholic minority has gradually moved up the economic ladder, we have accompanied them, building new schools in new neighborhoods and providing FSC communities. Catholic schools continue to play an important part in the mission of the United States Church, even though the majority of Catholic families, for financial or other reasons, choose not to avail themselves of their services.

Other Possibilities

While the Christian school, ideally gratuitous, is the "privileged instrument of our apostolate" the Institute, says Chapter I of the Rule, "is open to other possibilities for teaching and education adapted to the circumstances and needs of the time".

Of the 1005 United States Brothers directly engaged in the apostolate: 89% are in FSC schools; 11% are in apostolates apart from FSC schools (1983 statistics).

Guidelines governing the "work of the Brothers in schools not directed by them and in educational activities apart from schools" are provided in the Declaration (50-52) as well as in Propositions 11,12 and 62 of the Second Regional Chapter. The essential is that the educational activity be carefully studied, approved by the Visitor and Council, and become an integral, not marginal, part of the District Mission Plan, as well as the plan of a specific local community: "Those engaged in such apostolates do this work as members of a community and with the consent of their superior. They represent the Institute; it is important that they think of themselves in this way and be accepted and supported in their work by the other Brothers". (Declaration, 52)

Sometimes, especially where positions of leadership are concerned, Brothers will, of necessity or at least for understandable reasons, not be associated with other Brothers in their daily work. But our Institute preference is that Brothers work together and by association. This preference is not motivated by a blind obedience to a past tradition, but by a conviction that an FSC community working together and by association is a potent instrument for good.

Our Challenge Today

Brothers, as we reflect on our history in the United States, we cannot help but be impressed. What has been accomplished is a tribute to the vision, the faith, the zeal, and the courage of the Brothers who lived before us. We have to be just as wise, faith-filled, zealous, courageous, and creative today as we try to find our way in a country where Catholic descendants of the first settlers and immigrants "have arrived" (John Tracy Ellis), where a well-educated and zealous laity are assuming more and more responsibility for Catholic education, where new ministries are being created, where the role of men and women in religious institutes is changing, where the number of Brothers has diminished, where the cost of Catholic schools is a formidable and often insurmountable obstacle for low-income families, where many United States citizens live below the poverty line, where immigrants and refugees arrive regularly, with or without documentation, where a Church come-of-age grapples with its responsibility to "let go" of its provincialism and to think and act internationally, sharing its human and material resources.

Men of 1984

In short, this is 1984. As "living men" — men of 1984 — we must discover how fidelity to our Lasallian charism can best be lived today. It is not surprising that there is a tendency to pull the curtains down, to withdraw into the familiar, to try to reinforce what we have, to retreat in order to survive. There is a predictable and understandable reaction to calls for new ventures in response to new needs: "We must be realistic... Where are these Brothers to come from? Our numbers are declining... We have too many commitments already...".

And yet, the Church continues to challenge us to think otherwise. "Institutes dedicated to the active life should sincerely ask themselves in the presence of God, whether they cannot broaden their activity in favor of expanding God's kingdom among the nations; whether they might not leave certain ministries to others so that they themselves can spend their energies on the missions". (Ad Gentes, 40; Declaration 24) And, I can add, on other critical needs.

Distribution of Personnel

After the General Council visit to the United States in 1978, we recommended a deliberate policy of reducing the number of Brothers in some institutions and of withdrawing the Brothers from some others, in order to make more Brothers available for urgent needs, particularly of the poor, at home and abroad. This same orientation is at the heart of Circular 412. These recommendations reveal our confidence that Catholic men and women can assume more responsibility for Catholic schools today.

Both steps, of course, require careful preparation. No school should ever have to close because of our decision. Such moves in no way reflect negatively on what we have done or what we are now doing. The problem is not at all what we are doing; it is rather what we are not doing. There are so many young people deprived of Christian educators. Members of religious institutes are best able to respond, having the freedom, the supports, the structures that make a response feasible.

Turning over an institution to others and withdrawing Brothers for whatever reason, is always painful for the Brothers, and is inevitably accompanied by protest from the local people. But we have to be disposed to suffer the hurt and to subordinate our own feelings to the mission of the Church.

LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL MINISTRY (6): HOW? SOME PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

The real world

Where does all this leave us? Brothers, we do have to be realistic. We do have to be sensitive to the desires and needs of the Brothers themselves. We do have to be serious about commitments made in the past. I am not advocating any kind of recklessness. But I am advocating corporate evaluation, decisions, and action. Permit me to communicate some strictly personal views on the distribution of personnel:

1. I would favor designating a number of our FSC schools in each district, at home and abroad, as schools the Brothers would administer with a number of Brothers sufficient to be a significant animating influence in the Lasallian Family. Please note that I am not talking about the former FSC-lay triangular model of collaboration, but the circular model of Lasallian Family; I am not talking about "Brothers' schools" but "Lasallian schools". Such schools — first - class Christian schools, embodying the values of Lasallian education — can be examples of what Christian education is all about. Furthermore the availability of such schools is necessary for the many Brothers who want to work in schools that are explicitly Lasallian and administered by the Brothers themselves. Maintaining a number of excellent Lasallian schools, therefore, contributes to the mission of the Church and at the same time responds to the interests, talents, and aspirations of a number of Brothers.

2. I would favor maintaining a strong commitment to the institutions we presently have for the service of the poor, of immigrants, of youngsters with behavior problems, etc. This commitment implies a willingness to provide the specialized training that Brothers in such institutions need.

3. I would favor giving high priority to our colleges in the United States.

I am convinced that Catholic higher education is an important element in the mission of the US Church and that many Brothers have a gift for contributing on this level. At the same time we must participate actively in the continuing search for the meaning of the Catholic college and university and commit ourselves to strengthening the identity and character of our institutions as Catholic. Furthermore, I believe the Brothers in the US can help the Institute articulate the relationship of the FSC to higher education, an articulation that has not yet been done on the Institute level.

4. I would favor district commitments of FSC communities to collaborative efforts of long or short duration, at home or abroad, with dioceses, parishes, lay groups, or other religious institutes, in schools and other educational projects, giving priority to needs of the poor or disadvantaged or to the need for Catholic education in remote areas. We already have a number of such commitments. Others could be created. Some could be joint ventures of two or more districts.

The price to pay

Obviously, Brothers, the fourth and fifth possibilities cannot become realities if we are paralyzed by present commitments. That is why I suggest that while we renew and strengthen a number of our commitments, we reduce the number of Brothers or withdraw them completely from some others in order to make possible other ventures at home and abroad. Such moves would have to be preceded by careful planning, but planning that terminates in decision and action within a reasonable period of time.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Lasallian educational ministry: concluding remarks

Brothers, in my opening remarks, I said that our understanding of Lasallian Educational Ministry is determined in large manner by the image of the Brother of the Christian Schools that we embrace and by the model of FSC ministry that emerges in reflection on that image.

I have posed four questions concerning Lasallian Educational Ministry: by whom? what? for whom? how? My answers are conditioned by the image of the Brother and the model of Lasallian Educational Ministry that I embrace. I think that my understanding of the image of the Brother is consistent with the Founder's and with the decisions of the last two General Chapters. One can embrace the same image, however, and certainly disagree with specific remarks I have made. But if your image of the Brother is fundamentally different, then your model of Lasallian Educational Ministry will be different also. I think there are in fact several models of Lasallian Educational Ministry operating among us because we have not as a group made our own the image and model embraced by the chapters.

Vision and Commitment

Brothers, from time to time, people ask me whether as a result of my experience these past eight years I am optimistic or pessimistic about the future. My response is that whether I am optimistic or pessimistic is irrelevant. What my feelings happen to be has nothing whatsoever to do with what the future holds. I respond, however, that I have hope that the Brothers of the Christian Schools will continue to be a power at the service of the young in the years ahead. When I use the word hope I mean a vision of the future and a commitment to make that vision a reality. What I have talked about today is my interpretation of the chapter vision of what the Brothers are all about and can be all about for a long time to come. Without vision we die. But vision means nothing if we are not committed to making it a reality.

That special something

Two years ago the St Paul and Minneapolis District invited a panel of non-Brothers to tell the District Assembly exactly what they thought about the FSC. They did just that. They didn't canonize us, but they certainly affirmed us. One of the panelists, a non - Catholic woman in the St Mary's College psychology department, described a certain special something about the Brothers — something that shows itself in genuine brotherly love for and dedication to the students, a love which young people catch and to which they respond. This particular teacher was responsible for an exchange program with our De La Salle College, in Manchester, Britain. She said that what amazed her was that the St Mary's Students talked about their Lasallian experience in Britain in the same spirit. I don't know what it is, she said, but there is something special about you.

I think she's right. I entered the Brothers in 1951 because of that something special I experienced in the Brothers in Memphis. That something is still there. It is that precious heritage we call the Lasallian charism. It is the gift of Lasallian Educational Ministry which we have received from the Lord — a gift we have received for others. It is a ministry wherein, De La Salle tells us, we have to touch hearts. "Thank God, he says, for the grace He has given you in your work of sharing in the ministry of the apostles... Take pride in your ministry by making yourselves, as St Paul says, qualified ministers of the new covenant" (MTR VII).

THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL (6) WHY THE TITLE «CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS»

De La Salle called his schools "Christian Schools". Blain added the word "gratuitous". They in no way resemble those that preceded them. Their methods and programmes are completely different. All pupils are admitted irrespective of class or social position. They are kept, not by "masters" which would imply paid teachers but by Brothers, which recalls the gratuity and simplicity of the Gospel.

The Brothers are with their pupils from morning to evening. They make no distinction between secular and religious instruction, in contradistinction to their predecessors. Their only aim throughout the day is to teach their pupils to live as Christians. De La Salle considers that this is done, not only by the explicit teaching of religion, but also by a high standard of general instruction which contributes to the development of secular culture and prepares the children to make their way in the world.

We shall pass in rapid review the characteristics which de La Salle gave to his schools (and which we think he would like to see continued in the Lasallian schools of today).

1. The Brothers strive to develop the faith of their pupils through all the activities of the school day.

De La Salle does not wish to separate the sacred from the profane, secular instruction from religious instruction. The Brother will render an account for the one as for the other, for both are extremely important and strictly necessary in the school programme. The whole atmosphere of the school is an element in the religious education of the children. The Brother is not a catechist who happens to work in a school nor a school teacher doubling as a catechist. The purpose of the school presupposes and ensures the basic unity of the ministry of the teacher-catechist.[1] The profane acquires all its value when seen in the light of Christian faith. "The realities of this world and those of faith find their origin in the same God" (Declaration 48,3).

2. The Lasallian school enables the child to live and to give a Christian meaning to his life.

This help is not confined to the school. It extends to the human community of which the child is a part and in which he gives witness to his Christian commitment. In the second point of Meditation 202 de La Salle is very explicit. He wants children to commit themselves positively to the Alliance. The teacher must help them or rather "get them to do good and perform the good actions of which they are capable". He expects the Brother to attain this objective by adapting his advice and instructions to the age and capacity of his pupils. To this end he provides him with a programme: encourage them to perform good deeds, to speak the truth and to pray to God in private.

3. The Lasallian school helps to free the child from his innate evil tendencies and to open his heart and mind to God.

"The Christian education received in the new schools," says Blain, "went to the root of the evil and corrected the faults due to original sin". De La Salle is zealous for the sanctification of the pupils. He wants them to reach a stage where they will think and breathe only Jesus. He requires that the Brother, as a prophet in his class, point out to the children what could lead them to break the Alliance made with God at baptism. In Meditation 202,1 he reminds the Brother once again of the main purpose in the institution of the Christian Schools and of what should be the principal object of his zeal. He gives a list of the faults and sins to be avoided: impurity, theft, disobedience, disrespect to parents and faults in regard to his companions.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

In his class the Brother is a visible angel who helps them by his example and opportune advice to live in a manner worthy of God. He requires that they give up their bad habits and perform acts of charity. (Meditation 198,3).

4. The school helps the child to get to know Jesus Christ, to love Him and to live by Him.

The unity underlying all the activities of the Brother educator is to be found in reference to Christ. He is the sole object of the Christian message. Formation in the spirit of Christinity should be the soul and life principle of our ministry. Rather than continue writing on this subject I would invite you to read slowly Meditations 195 and 196 (they have a pronounced Christocentric spirit. The first point of Meditation 195 could be summed up thus: By his own life the Brother helps to save children. (It is through us that Christ becomes better known. Salvation is made available here and now in the classroom).

In the second point de La Salle reminds the Brother that authority comes, not from himself, but from Christ. (He is the principal agent in our apostolate). In the third point he gives us to understand that Christ by his words and actions, is for the Brother, the indispensable basis of his work. (The fruit we produce depends on our union with Him. God's work and ours are not two separate entities but one single work: to make effective the redemption of Christ).

We should note that the Christological reference is very frequent in Lasallian spirituality and is one of its characteristic marks. To realize this it is sufficient to re-read some of the Meditations, e.g. 183,3; 196,1; 6; 189,1; 87,2; 199,2.

5. Religious instruction has first place in the Brother's life.

By his vocation the brother is a catechist. He gives religious instruction in the school. He draws inspiration for his apostolic work from the pure source which is the Word of God. Although the general atmosphere of the school leads to the practice of the Christian virtues, de La Salle insists on the explicit obligation to teach the Word of God. He reminds the Brother that God will ask him to account for the manner in which he fulfilled this obligation (Cf. Meditation 200,1).

I give here a summary, by no means exhaustive, of the practical means suggested by de La Salle to help the Brother to initiate his pupils into the practice of the Christian virtues:

— assistance at daily Mass (This was normal practice at the time)

— daily prayer and awareness of God's presence (cf. Meditation 202, 2).

— reception of the sacraments. (Initiation in the Christian life is not confined to learning the truths of religion speculatively. It means coming to love and receive Him who is the object of our faith).

— performance of acts of charity and living the Gospel values (cf. Meditations 196,2; 198,3; 207,2). In de La Salle's eyes Christian education is not confined to instruction alone. It is put into practice in the concrete circumstances of daily life. Begun in school, it continues outside school and reaches out to our neighbour.

— examination of conscience at the beginning and end of the school day. Helped by the Brother's questions the pupil examines his conduct to see whether or not it was in conformity with the teaching of the Gospel. (Cf. Declaration 44,3).

Conclusion

We have seen how the school, if taken seriously, creates conditions favourable to a true Christian education (Rules Ch. IX). Through his ministry the Brother shares in the work of the apostles, according to de La Salle. "The conviction that Christian education is almost a priestly ministry is characteristic of Lasallian spirituality".[3] The Brothers share in the ministry of the Word by giving a religious education to the young.

THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL (7)
THE BROTHER'S ZEAL EXTENDS BEYOND THE CLASSROOM

To live one's life as vocation means much more than just living it as profession. It means living it with love and the total giving of oneself. It is knowing and experiencing in the depth of one's being the joy of having been called by God (Meditation 199,1) to work in his vineyard, which is the school, and which is of such importance to the Church (Meditation 155,1). It means being willing to sacrifice one's life to performing the humdrum duties of each day or, if needs be, in a more spectacular manner. Living thus I feel that I am realizing my full potential, that it is in my own best interest, and that my life is worth living.

The satisfaction and joy that come from dedication to a cause will be mine in proportion to my efforts. "Vocation comes with faith and, in the long run, is the key to true happines", says Marañon.

The Brother's interest in and care for his pupils are not limited to the time spent in the classroom. Faithful to the Founder's recommendation, he will interest himself in their welfare outside school, always solicitous that they live a Christian life. (Meditation 206, 2).

If the Founder creates in his schools the post of visitor to the absent and gives it a place in the "Management of Schools" it is to ensure that the teacher knows how his pupils behave outside school so that he may advise them at an opportune moment. If he founds boarding establishments it is a complement to, an extension of and a support for his main work, the gratuitous schools.[1]

The Brothers' zeal leads them to establish other institutions so as to extend their influence to their students who have left school. They keep in touch with them through the various stages of their lives and help them to remain faithful to the practice of religion.

In the following paragraph we shall take a look at the past and consider two post-school creations born of the needs of the period in France. This could help us to understand better our own times and the new initiatives undertaken as well as the reorganization of existing institutions. It is always easy to destroy. To construct and restore are slow and painful tasks that require much patience. We shall speak of the impetus given to the establishment of schools for adults at the beginning of the 19th century and the introduction of the Congregation of the Most Blessed Virgin to our institutions in the middle of the 18th century.

1. Evening classes or schools for adults

We have already mentioned the foundation of the "Sunday School" by De La Salle at the request of M. de La Chétardye, for the parishoners of Saint Sulpice. The example of the Founder's coming to the aid of the ignorant, irrespective of their age, led the Brothers to make painful sacrifices. "They had to take on additional work-loads and work long hours". The Brothers met the need felt by working people and satisfied their desire for knowledge so that in their own homes "they could open a book and take a pen in their calloused hands".[2]

In the time of Brother Philippe, who knew better than anyone else the needs of his century, there was a marked extension of this form of the Brothers' apostolate. Begun in Paris, it soon spread to the principal houses of the Brothers in the provinces. The government, awake to the pressing needs of the times, encouraged the Brothers in their work and provided subsidies for it. The struggle against illiteracy, undertaken on a small scale by the Brothers, soon became a national preoccupation.

From France the struggle spread to Turin where the Brothers were established, and where they worked valiantly in the cause of popular education. They succeeded in arousing the interest of influential people in the area who supported them morally and financially in their efforts on behalf of the working class. One of these helpers was the writer and patriot, Silvio Pellico, author of "I Miei Prigioni".[3] What was done then is still being done today. The Declaration states, "The school can often become a centre for evening classes for those who want to learn to read, for cultural activities and for friendly gatherings". (52,4).

2. Introduction of the Congregation of the Most Blessed Virgin.

From the founding of the first boarding establishments in the Institute the Congregation of the Most Blessed Virgin, under the title of the "Immaculate Conception" gradually develop.

The Brothers were not unaware of the strong spiritual appeal that the figure of Our Lady has for the young and of the role that the noble ideal that she represents can play in their lives.

A child imitates quite naturally the manner of acting of grown-ups and adopts the style of the social models he sees on television. Children identify with their parents and pupils "follow the example of their teachers" (Meditation 202,3).

No human attitude can be formed without reference to a model. However, the model, besides being appreciated and respected, must be loved and, in a manner of speaking, made one's own. Only then does the model become a force attracting imitation.

De La Salle does not fail to counsel his disciples to present Our Lady to their pupils as a guide and as a light on their way. He incites them to love her and to make her loved (Meditation 146). He does not doubt that the effort made to identify with Mary will awaken in them hitherto unsuspected capacities for good.

An atmosphere of genuine piety and a spirit of social commitment reigns in the Congregation: its members visit hospitals, teach catechism, hold evening classes for illiterates, give conferences, collect money and clothes for the poor and meet together faithfully on Saturday to honour Our Lady. All this helps to form them to the Christian life and soon vocations to the priesthood and the religious life flourish among them.

The future Brother Exuperien, so well known amongst us, was President of the Congregation of the Most Blessed Virgin in the college in Béziers. From there he came to join the ranks of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

As far as we can tell, it was Brother Irénée who first introduced the Congregation to the Institute. With Brother Barthélemy it was he who most closely followed the example of saintliness given by the Founder.

Filial piety towards Our Lady was an outstanding characteristic of Brother Irénée. His strong personality was welcomed in Saint Yon where he founded a "Society or Confraternity of the Immaculate Conception". It was finally approved by Pope Clement VII on 24th May 1746.[6]

It was not long before this confraternity spread to the boarding schools of the Brothers in France: Maréville, Saint Omer, Marseilles etc. Brother Irlide established it in all our houses.

Our Documents recommend that we keep in touch with our former students when they leave school. "They will continue to assist them with advice and friendship and also by establishing special groups genuinely inspired by the spirit of the Church". (Declaration 47,4).

The title we give these groups matters little. What is important is the spirit that animates them.

CHRISTIAN GROUP ANIMATION

This theme constitutes neither a novelty nor a change happening in the Lasallian Christian School. "By vocation the Brothers are catechists, this is their principal function". (Declaration 38,1). We ourselves think that Christian Group Animation for the young constitutes, by its relation to the Lasallian charism, a central, nuclear theme.

In the first place we shall specify that our reflections do not have as their object groups of youth in general; they are limited only to that part which is the Christian Group. Another supplementary distinction is that we are referring only to group animation. with a Catechumen orientation, that is to say which has for its end the Christian community. We divide into smaller groups which we designate as groups for aspects found in catechumen oriented groups.

Point of departure

The animation of Christian Groups has its origin in an indispensable experience on the part of the animator: to feel one's self a member of a community and of being sent by the same community. This is indispensable because the Christian group can in no case be as fruit, purely and simply on the particular initiative of an isolated individual; by definition, the catechumen oriented group presupposes a more or less immediate reference to the Christian community. At the base of this affirmation is found the words of the 1977 Synod: "The community is the place, the source and the fruit of catechesis".

Still more radically, and serving as a framework of the entire body we see the image of the church which is a sign of recognition and rallying cry of this entire pastoral: The Church, "The Community of Communities". This concept of the Church will constantly be the obligatory point of reference all during the process: at the beginning, the community, along the way, the community, at the culmination, the community. Thus the early consciousness of the church is found, as reflected in the Pauline epistle, as perceiving itself. above all, as a community.

In the course of history, the institutional element (the Church "Society") imposed itself rapidly and it has prevailed until our day where it continues to impose itself in practice. We thus arrive at the other "pole", the negative pole, we could say the antithesis, that from which the movement of this process begins. In fact, the youth whom we call upon to form a part of these Christian groups normally live their faith as far as "belonging" to the Church society, which implies the following characteristics:

— an inherited, sociological faith, which has not been personally accepted, — characterized by individualism

— centered on accomplishments more or less faithful to religious practices and the reception of the sacraments,

— lived on the fringe of vital options,

— which hands back church responsibility to the clergy.

Point of arrival

The community should always be present during the achievement of the process and as its fruit. This can be achieved under two principal forms: the Christian group constitutes its very self a community, or rather more frequently, the members of the group integrate themselves into already existing Christian communities.

This has to do with a point of arrival which is realistic and not utopian. That means that the animator should shun the temptation or the error, of converting the process into a stable situation. After having gone beyond the stages proper to catechumen orientation, the group and each of its members on their own ought to propose the problem of constituting itself into a Christian community or of going to become a part of a certain form of Christian community, be it parochial, "basic", or consecrated...

This is a crucial step which must be studied at a chosen moment which will be constantly present to the spirit of the animator to dynamize the process within a certain perspective. To do this it is necessary to have a sufficiently clear idea of what should characterise it:

— on the part of the youth: to be able to personalize the faith, which means to live conscientiously in liberty, with reference to others, disposed to share, in an attitude of seeking and continual conversion, allowing to be called into question by this attitude, with creativity and responsibility.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

— on the part of the community (the one formed by the group or the one which receives each of its members) it should be able to be thus defined:

• a group on a human scale, that is to say with an identity already established, where fraternal relationships and profound union exist;

• which has decided to follow the course of Christ as it is basically explained in the Commandment of Love and the Beatitudes:

• which expresses and celebrates its faith: which knows how "to give a reason for the hope that is in you". (I Peter 3,15), prays in the presence of Jesus and celebrates the Eucharist in union with the rest of the Church;

• which is engaged in bringing about the Kingdom of God, strengthening and transforming the reality which surrounds it.

The process

Let us begin by specifying who can be responsible for this animation: the "animator" is the "adult in the faith" who having himself followed a process of personalization of the faith and living it in community, takes his place in the group of adolescents or youth and as a member of this group and to stimulate it in a Catechumen process, sharing with the young his faith experience and uniting the efforts of all in view of achieving their common objectives.

The summons consists fundamentally in an appeal for conversion, to interest one's self in the Good News, to feel in one's self the need of salvation. For many it will be the passing from a life of a sociological faith to a consciousness of this identity as Christians. One could find a good opportunity of concretizing this summons during a retreat of Christian reflection with a view of making the youth conscious of the religious dimension of the person, of the call to the faith which was its main purpose, in order to arrive at a kind of personal option and at the decision to live in relation with others, that is, the group.

The discovery of the elements at the base of the Christian faith is the objective of the first stage of the process. To the animator reverts the task of presenting Jesus and his Gospel in such a way that at the end of the first stage the youth will be consciously initiated to accept the love of Good in their lives, that they be decided to follow Jesus, to already feel the desire to abandon their wordly values and criteria in order to adopt those of the Gospel, and to make the decision of living their faith and to share it with the group.

Then for the formation of the group, the animator should assure himself that the objectives are very clear. It frequently happens that the young demonstrate the tendency of exacting from the group the satisying of needs which redound to the advantage of other types of groups: leisure, celebrations, friendship, activities... The Christian Group is above all, a group which tries to give a meaning to life, without excluding the wish of satisfying other needs, but without ever replacing the other types of groups.

After the discovery, there has to be a foundation stage, a catechumen period, properly speaking, in the course of which one endeavours to arrive at a complete personalization of the faith and at a methodical initiation to the Christian mystery by means of these four fundamental dimensions:

• knowledge of the Mystery,

• evangelical style of life according to the Beatitudes

• religious experience, prayer and sacramental celebration

• Apostolic and Missionary Commitment

The ideal would be that this stage be concluded with the reception of the sacrament of Confirmation.

The last stage is that of consolidation. One endeavours then to arrive at a complete development of the faith, endowed above all with theological rigor, a critical sense, a prophetic character, and an expression of a means of prayer and of celebration. One experiences the various manners of sharing in community. Each member concretizes his life engagement and a social project or a church ministry.

The method followed all through this long process is the Christian reading of reality. It supposes that one always starts with the experience of the young in order to help and deepen it and to interpret it in a Christian sense. The Word of God ought next to clarify this experience. From the confrontation of one with the other ought to arise a concrete commitment which little by little will give birth to a life project. All this will be discerned and animated beginning with prayer and celebrated, above all, in the Eucharist.

The functions assumed by the animator vary slightly during the course of the process. At first he fixes upon a number of functions which he ought to transmit progressively to the group in the measure that they become more mature. It would be well, however, to spell out clearly three of these functions, given their importance:

• in the first place, he is an animator: "not so much a teacher who instills the truth but more an elder brother who helps the young to discern in themselves the call of the Spirit" (Decl. 40,4).

• he is a guide: he shows the way, he helps in the advance not only for the group but for each of its members for "to catechise is, by spiritual counsel and a personalized education, to help each baptized person to find his place in the service of the church and of men, whether as a militant layman, in the religious life, or in the priesthood" (Decl. 32,2).

• finally he is a prophet who helps in discernment, who does not allow people to founder in their mediocrity, who uses language which is both prodding and personalized... He tries to see to it that the youth meet God, who calls them by name, through His catechist more than by books or words. (Decl. 40,5).

COMPUTER TECHNOLOGY AND CHRISTIAN VALUES IN FSC SCHOOLS

"Harrod's New Year Sale" announced the full page ad in the Sunday edition of "The New York Times" on 30 December 1984. Imagine, a London department store seeking customers from a metropolitan area of the United States, and successfully enticing them to cross the Atlantic and convert their dollars into pounds! Our world has become smaller, our interaction more varied, and our interdependence more obvious. Awareness of these evolutionary processes is growing.

Our belief in the brotherhood and sisterhood we share as baptized Christians is reinforced by the realization and affirmation of these trends towards a more unified world. To strengthen these bonds it is necessary that the flow of information among the parts be smooth and accurate. It is through such communication that understanding flourishes and the connectedness of the human family becomes more apparent. The technology afforded by computers has the potential to assist us in managing and sharing information with speed and clarity. It can bring us closer together. The significance of this impact must be conveyed to our students.

The era ushered in by the industrial revolution has passed. We are on the threshold of a new age. And while we herald the advances in the processing of information brought to us by computer technology, we must be on guard against the possibility of an analytic and antiseptic anonymity. A human person is not reducible to an identification number! The dignity of each individual as a unique creature of God must remain in focus. Respect for life is a value we must continually model for our students.

Furthermore, provision must be made to safeguard the privacy of individuals whose files in data banks contain personal and confidential information. Unauthorized access and clandestine tampering of such files are unethical acts whose immorality should be clear to our students.

Among the educational needs of our time,then, is the importance of educating our students to be aware of and attentive to the uses and abuses of the computer in our society. Several aspects of this issue are referred to above. It is important too, however, to consider the role computers play in the microcosm of society that is our school or classroom. How is this contemporary technology utilized locally?

It is imperative that the computer in the classroom be perceived as a tool. The advantages of its prodigious memory and lightning speed make it particularly helpful in a variety of school settings and decidedly inappropriate in others. There is need for discretion in assessing its practicality for a given situation.

Frequently it is advantageous to determine the relationship between the computer and the student. Is the computer the master and the student the slave? That is, does the machine lead the person through a series of rigidly prescribed steps? Or, is the student the master and the computer the slave? That is, does the operator instruct the computer how to proceed? The tendency seems to be that the former model is frequently employed in remedial situations, for example, with drill and practice type software. The latter scenario is more often seen in enrichment activities, for example with the study of programming languages. In a school, such as one staffed by the Brothers, where concern for the individual is a hallmark of the education offered, it is important to be sensitive to the self image a student might develop based on his/her role vis-a-vis a computer. Again, it is important to reinforce the dignity of the individual.

In the section of the Brother's Rule devoted to Apostolic Work it states that "To accomplish their mission the Brothers constantly adapt their educational activities to the needs of the Church and the world" (Chapter 9, Section j). Certainly both the Church and the world would be served by increased openness in communication and deeper awareness of the sacredness of the individual. These Christian values can be espoused through the new and captivating forum presented by computer technology. Our challenge as educators is to read this message from this sign of our times.

THE MINISTRY OF TEACHING

I would like to begin by thanking the district for giving me the opportunity to share some thoughts on the teaching ministry of the Christian Brothers. Though I am very much honored I have found it one of the most difficult things to do. It is difficult in that the Brothers are probably the most critically professional group for whom one could write. We are critically professional in that both as a group and as individuals we are always reflecting on, and putting into practice, techniques that are proven, suitable, "in touch" with the needs and desires of those who are entrusted to us. We are, I find, a group of dedicated teachers who, despite our human frailties and individual idiosyncracies, are out to give the best we have to our students and colleagues.

As stated by Brother Joseph Brienza in the first of this series of articles "teaching is an art and not an exact science". I in no way feel that I have mastered the art but I am the richer and wiser in appreciating it. Because of meeting and having been touched by many masters (brothers, sisters, laypersons, and students), I have developed into a good teacher. These masters have influenced me to appreciate what teaching is all about.

Let it be clear from the outset that the best I can do is to share by means of some random thoughts, in no particular order, what has been given to me.

Teaching always involves two things: exposing the student to new information and experience and trying to personalize the discovery of what it means. Information will affect a person's behavior only in the degree to which he or she has discovered the personal meaning of that information. The challenge is how to help students explore and discover the meaning. Unless I can communicate the facts with some degree of affect then the learning is unlikely to take hold or influence behavior. In the junior high curriculum here at Saint Gabriel's I, as Social Studies teacher, spend time on the Constitution. I do it because I feel not only that my students should be aware of it as a document but more importantly that they come to see it as a "living" document, the knowledge of which can give them power and a basis to understand what this country and its laws are all about.

If true learning is to take place, I feel that the teacher must address four even more basic factors. I would list these as self-concept, feelings of challenge or threat, values, and feelings of being cared for and/or belonging.

What students believe about themselves affects very deeply every aspect of their behavior and learning. Students who believe they can are more likely to try and thus are more likely to succeed. Positive teacher feedback and encouragement enhance a student's self-concept and tend to bring about success. I find this extremely challenging and trying because it means I must constantly be aware of my personal impressions of the student which may for some reason "go against my grain". Students, however, who believe they cannot avoid the embarrassment and humiliation of involvement are likely to experience failure—which only proves what they already thought about themselves in the first place.

The second factor is feelings of challenge or threat. How often have we heard or read that learning occurs best when teachers are successful in creating atmospheres that are challenging without being threatening? The student's feelings, attitudes and beliefs are powerful sources of motivation and if I am sensitive to them the learning situation will be more productive. There is no doubt that feelings of challenge are conducive to learning while those of threat are ultimately destructive.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The third area is that of values. Values can be defined as generalized belief that serve as basic guidelines and determine our behavior. They are deeply personal and charged with feelings or affect. They play an important part in the dynamics of all we do. We as brothers have values at the very core of our being. We live and breathe them and I have often pondered on what the Brothers really taught me as a student at Bishop Loughlin. Then and now we value knowledge, skills, critical thinking, lifelong education, good citizenship, faith in a loving and merciful God, zeal for what is best. When I reflect on my years at Loughlin, it is not the factual knowledge I recall but individual brothers "teaching" by example what it means to be human — "the glory of God fully alive".

If I know that I am cared for and belong, I feel excited, energized; I want to get involved; I want to get with it; I enjoy the activity. If I feel uncared for or left out, I feel discouraged, disillusioned, apathetic; I want to get out, to avoid embarrassment and humiliation.

As I reflect on what I have just written I find that I have only repeated far less eloquently what de La Salle wrote in his Meditations for the Time of Retreat. Phrases such as "Be faithful in order to do as much as you are able...". "If you want the instructions you give those whom you teach to be effective in drawing them to the practice of good, you must practice these truths yourselves". "You must also be full of zeal". "You must cheer the fainthearted, support the weak and be patient towards all". "Your zeal toward those you teach would not go very far and would not result in much success if it limited itself only to words. To be effective your teaching must be supported by your example".

My vision of teaching is dependent on the good teacher and I recall some advice given by Brother Francis Huether. (He will, I hope, pardon the liberties I may have taken with it).

1. Have confidence in yourself, your vocation, your natural ability, in the wisdom, advice and good example of your confreres.

2. Live by supernatural motives. You will achieve much if you live by high ideals.

3. Ardently desire to be an excellent teacher and work for it! Aim for clarity. Seek to challenge. Involve each student to his/her ability. Extend them, enlarge their outlook.

4. Plan your work, then work your plan.

5. Be patient. How well de La Salle put it: "Patience is the leading characteristic of great minds".

6. Be persistent. Keep working for the goals you have prudently set for yourself and for the class.

7. Evaluate yourself, your work and your results constantly. Don't become stagnant.

8. Cooperate with those who are involved with you.

Not only is the above applicable to the good teacher but also pertinent as to what we should be teaching those entrusted to our care.

As I read over what I've written, I wonder if education, like life, is never at an end or standstill. It continues to challenge (if we allow it to) us as we come in contact with new faces, different places and circumstances. Every situation presents an opportunity to grow and develop. That challenge is there every day in every student and colleague with whom I meet and work.

"Consider, then, that your reward in heaven will be as great as the good you will achieve in the lives of the children who are entrusted to your care. It is in this spirit that St. Paul told the Corinthians: 'You will be our glory in the time to come on the day of our Lord Jesus Christ' ".

If we fulfill our duty and accept the challenge of our ministry, there is no doubt we will be able to enjoy the blessing de La Salle wrote of above in the 16th Meditation and thereby "shine as stars for all eternity".

THE LASALLIAN SENSE IN MY ACTIVITIES IN A PRIMARY SCHOOL (1)

Being in charge, together with a confrere, of the animation of the Catechetical programme and of the Christian School in the 23 primary schools of South Belgium, I can truly say that this animation is exercised in a Lasallian climate. If this climate draws its origin from the "practices of Jesus" it can not be less a spirituality of a disciple of Christ, John Baptist de La Salle, who lived his life in a very particular situation, that of a founder. And that marks out the manner of living out my profession.

I shall present here in the form of a small tapestry, sewed with several guiding threads and immersed beforehand in Lasallian spirituality. Looking at the different tableaux, we shall discover progressively these threads, which are the "soul of my work".

Let us start with the first tableau:

A catechism incarnated

Here we single out a group of Brothers and laymen listening to today's children, namely, the C.C.L. — Centre Catéchétéque Lasallien. It has been meeting regularly since 1976 to delve into the existential movement proper to the "Catechetical Programme for Primary Schools" as elaborated by a Commission which had been set up by the Bishops of Belgium.

Let us draw nearer to the tapestry to better discover the profound life of this group.

The Preface of this Programme contains an important passage: "The originality of this programme is manifest enough. It renounces a systematic plan, traditional before... It allows children to cast a tranquil glance on those who are alive and lets them discover at the same time, little by little, by reference to Christ the richness of the demands of their faith. Christian Education is rooted in a way in the habitual experience of children. Such a way is not always easy! But is it not thus with a truly evangelical pedagogy?"

We wanted to take that seriously. Seven encounters a year, of exchanges in class of our experiences, of profound questions to the level of our faith, the fidelity of the group and its sense of graciousness... all this constituted an assembling of life in order to accompany the child to the very heart of his own life story and to help him slowly towards the total growth of his person.

The thread of years will lead us to weave together catechetical themes proper to each age and a framework of five ages: experience of life, enlargement of this life, a deepening of experiences, the enlightening of this life in the light of Jesus, and an appeal to change one's life.

Lasallian Filigree: With which Lasallian threads is this first scene woven?*

 At first by the profound desire of John Baptist de La Salle to "Procure for children the means of salvation proper to their age". (MTR 1,3).*

 But we also see here, the threads of years, this "living tradition of the Institute... attached to integrate the Faith in Jesus Christ in the daily life of the young". (Declaration, 40,2).*
I shall always remember the following text read at a meeting of the C.C.L., as the very expression of their everyday experience:

"The catechesis of the Brother thus takes root in life and it is oriented towards life... The Word of God does not fall from above, abstract, upon anonymous individuals; it always comes to reunite, to enlighten and to deepen a human experience". (D. 40,5).

 I should like to add here, what seems to me essential in the framework of this article: The practice of a well determined catechetical step does not go by itself: it often poses a question and sometimes a doubt and discouragement. Two events — again life! — have however confirmed me* in this manner of evangelzing in the primary school!: First, CIL 79/2 with its particular method of forming persons, and second, at Easter 80, the Symposium on Catechesis, at the Mother House in Rome. That also is "Lasallian".

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Let us pass on to the second tableau:

The animation of 23 schools

What can be done to animate the schools interiorly so as to render them Christian... situated as they are in a consumer society of religious indifference, of individualism, which lacks a sense of graciousness, etc.?

The service of animation works three sectors at a time: they compose our tableau in three scenes. Let us look at the nearest one.

Scene 1: the annual catechetical day

Organised for each school, this day affords a deepening of the numerous aspects of the Christian School.

The statement of the theme of the previous year will light up the tableau: the animation of the Christian school with a strong insistence on inter-personal relationship — our catechetical options — non-sacramental celebrations — what is faith? — what is religion? — to what temptations a school must not submit if it wishes to be christian?

A quest is hidden under each of these different themes: that of truth. To be true towards one's self, towards the children, towards God. And in knowing that the truth makes one free!

Lasallian Filigree: Very modestly, I endeavour to rejoin St. John Baptist de La Salle: from the foundation of the Institute, he created a community of men so that he could form them to become adult in the faith and thus be able to educate children in the same faith in Jesus Christ:

"You are entrusted with reclothing them in Jesus Christ and his spirit. Have you taken care that before undertaking such a holy mission that you reclothe yourselves so as to be able to communicate this grace to them?" (MF. 189.1).

Scene 2: meeting of school directors

After 1981, days were reserved for these meeting. They pursued a double purpose: to promote a global unity of spirit in the Brothers' schools and to create, by inter-personal relationships, a common soul.

Some themes studied: the catechetical option — how to make a school a place of fraternal relations for "the well-being of all — favourable and unfavourable elements towards a fraternal relationship in the heart of a group of teachers — my personal relations as Director with the children found in my school.... with particular regard to the "poor". This simple list will allow one to determine just how much fraternal relationships are reflected on all levels of the school.

We should like to remark that more than a rediscovery, it was an opportunity of deepening Lasallian spirituality. In particular: the first meditation for the time of retreat, reading done without disengaging if from the present situation of children, parents and the students of today; the great spiritual attitudes of de La Salle, according to Brother Jean Pungier.

Lasallian Filigree: Fraternal Relationship is one of the keys "for procuring the salvation of children":

"You exercise an employment which puts you under the obligation of touching hearts. You cannot do this except by the Spirit of God: pray to Him to procure the salvation of others". (MD 43.3).

It is evangelical. In following a certain Jesus "who goes through town and village in search of lost sheep who are awaiting a look of tenderness":

"Jesus Christ compares those in charge of souls to a good shepherd who takes good care of his flock; and one of the qualities which he ought to have, according to the Saviour, is that he recognise each one distinctly...". (MD 33.1).

THE LASALLIAN SENSE IN MY ACTIVITIES IN A PRIMARY SCHOOL (2)

Scene 3: meeting the children in class

On glancing on my years as animator in the schools, I ascertain that I have put the accent on two essential aspects of the local belief in man: fraternal relationships and the search for truth.

To make fraternal relationships live in the classes and to make them be practices by the teacher, nothing made me understand myself so much as my joining in with groups of children. "Whatever absolutely directs personal human existence is good... the relationship of love with another: to be is to be in a relationship..." (Jean Kamp, "Le Dieu de ma nuit", Casterman, 1977, p. 124). To work such a thing in a Christian school, is to wish to constitute small cells of "the kingdom of fraternity according to God".

To make the children discover the truth in themselves and to help the teachers in this mission there is nothing like participating myself in Catechesis incarnated as decribed above.

Lasallian Filigree: It is necessary to read anew St. John Baptist de La Salle and commentaries on his writings.

"God has made you ministers... He has destined you to announce to these young plants the truths of the Gospel and to procure for them the means of salvation which will be brought to them. (MTR. 1.3).

There you have the theme which runs throughout all of these contacts. With Brother Jean Pungier, one could say regarding this text. "It is the very condition of salvation of the young. And it is the responsibility of their educators. This is what gives dynamism to the existence of the Christian educator, renders him attentive to the true needs of the young and their milieu, and invites him to the pedagogical creation on two plains: scholastic and catechetic" (Spirituality for teachers and instructors, p. 38).

Is this not just a summary of the entire life of de La Salle?

Search for the truth starting from the very bosom of fraternal relationships: it is the entire vocation of the educator marching as a minister of Christ and following in his footsteps! Enthusiastically!

But that takes a lot of time and humility. That is why the Founder invites us to make ourselves "small" before God and to make the youth "our brothers":

"...being obliged to regard themselves as the older brothers of those who come to receive their lessons, they ought to exercise this ministry of charity with a loving heart". (Blain, C.L. 7, p. 241).

"The smaller you make yourself... the more you will touch the hearts of those whom you instruct". (M.F. 79, 2).

There once again is one of the keys which opens the door to "salvation!".

Lt us finish by looking at the third tableau:
Lasallian Sharing

This is the last born child. What is it all about?

It is at the same time a composite of meetings of Brothers and laymen on the Primary level and the name of the periodical which is being prepared for them.

Lasallian Sharing wishes to provide the occasion to teachers who wish to more deeply discover John Baptist de La Salle so as to be able better to follow him in his passion for the young, in his wish to make them free ('salvation') in the educative style which he created (more fraternal than magisterial) in the pedagogical innovation leading youth more easily to a profession, in the challenge he issues: no education is possible without an association of educators.

Open to 400 teachers, of whom 21 are Brothers, the Lasallian Sharing does not yet see any congestion at its doors; in the course of the first three meetings, we had 15, 19 and 9 respectively.

If this tableau conceals also the Lasallian Filigree, it is easy for you to discover it. Without forgetting this: to abandon one's self to God, all the while safe-guarding one's interior peace and to continue to follow the road on which you started no matter what the number of marchers may be.

Let us now look at the complete tapestry

Let us go back a few steps to cast a slow and deep glance at the Lasallian tapestry: there remains in fact a final discovery to make, that of a current which passes through all the different tapestries considered. This current is to me, certainly, personal, but at least in my eyes, it is the thread of my life as a Brother.

I should like to speak of this desire to liberate the person. And there at certain moments of my life, I find myself following Christ:

"Go back and report to John what you have seen and heard: the blind see, the lame walk..." (Luke 7).

And I find myself following John Baptist de La Salle who affirms:

"You can work many miracles in your own regard and in your employment...; in your employment, by touching the hearts of the rowdy children who are confided to your care..." (MF. 180,3).

To touch the hearts to make the child capable of speaking, expressing himself, believing, listening, sharing, interiorising, growing... to become himself, progressively, a son of God, in the image of Jesus.

"These are the miracles which God will give you the power to work and which He will require of you!" (MF. 180,3).

This is the current which can live and which more than one Brother discovers in his own life: the minister of God to make possible the "mirabilia Dei" today and thus open the Paschal mystery of man.

A last word

To be conscious of the Lasallian activity in my life as a Brother today does not require me only to "retrace the sources" and thus to mention Saint John Baptist de La Salle, situated in Reims in the seventeenth century.

It is the wish also to draw the light of life with regard to the "Brothers" disciples of the Founder in this very twentieth century, from Brothers who for me bear a name and a face: Vincent Ayel, Joseph Famrée, Maurice-Auguste Hermans, Jean Pungier, Genaro Saenz de Ugarte, Michel Sauvage, Joseph Verdeur and the International Group of Brothers at CIL 79/2. Each one in his own way was for me a light — indispensable to a tapestry! — to progressively make a catechetical mission more precise, in drawing from the true life experience of the children, in view of "procuring for them the salvation of Jesus Christ" in the living present of their development.

THE APOSTOLATE OF THE LASALLIAN BOARDING SCHOOL

One week before school recommences, the request comes: "Could we please accept Adrian as a boarder?" Adrian had been adopted as a baby. His adoptive mother died when he was seven. By age twelve, the adoptive father, now re-married, said to the dead mother's brother, Alan "Either you take him or he becomes a ward of the State. I have had enough". Alan, although not knowing Adrian since Adrian had lived 2000 kms. to the north in Australia, accepts responsibility and Adrian enters boarding school. There is no place available, but somehow an extra bed is found by the Brothers.

An isolated case? Not really. Just the true story of one boy who commenced at St. Bede's College in Melbourne,. Australia this year, one boy whom the Superior General met when he stayed at St. Bede's in February, sharing mass and a meal with the boarders. There are many such boys in the Brothers' boarding schools.

It is a long tradition of the Brothers, dating back to the time of De La Salle, to conduct boarding schools.

Brothers who want to give their time, their efforts, their love to the underprivileged — boys with real needs — can find fulfilment in the most responsible and Christian task of educating resident students.

Since Brothers do not have the same family commitments as lay staff, the Brothers have a unique availability for work with Boarders and bring to it a wholehearted commitment that is recognized by both parents and boys. Parents have an especial confidence in the ability of committed religious to act "in loco parentis" in a boarding school.

The Brother is called upon to exercise a selfless love and care for the boys in his charge twenty-four hours per day. The Brother in a boarding school has a unique opportunity to exercise a Christ-like influence in the lives of the boys. Caring for boys in their physical, emotional and spiritual needs, the Brother has a capacity to touch them more deeply than day boys.

In normal circumstances the best environment for a boy is a good home situation, with father, mother, brothers and sisters. A boy's emotional needs are best catered for in a good home.

However, there are many circumstances which necessitate the alternative environment which a good boarding school provides.

Among the reasons for boarding are:

1. inaccessibility of a Catholic school which the boy can attend as a day pupil.
2. unsatisfactory situation at home, if there is a home.
3. qualities in the boy that make it desirable for him to spend a period away from home.

It is essential, of course, that a boarding department be well controlled with appropriate discipline and order. There is always the danger that a boarding section can become a harsh emotional environment caused by the closeness of boys living together, insensitive treatment of boys by teachers or by neglect on the part of the family that has placed the boy in boarding school.

Further, a poorly conducted boarding house could become a coarse social environment marked by bad language, untidiness, uncleanliness and, in general, a spirit of selfishness. Above all, it is imperative that a boarding school not become an erroneous moral environment wherein wrong attitudes to stealing, sexuality, truth, trust and other such matters develop. Anyone who has worked in a boarding school is very aware of the need to set high levels of expectations and demands in terms of the Gospel ideals.

Too often critics of boarding schools focus on a particular difficulty or shortcoming and make faulty generalizations. Without doubt, it is possible to run a very good boarding school in which excellent attitudes and values are developed.

Some of the values of a boarding school education for boys may be stated as follows:

1. Boarding schools develop in the students a manly independence. The boarder must learn to become self-reliant, to a certain degree, not only in managing his material affairs — money, clothing, travel and the like — but also in his emotional development. Mum and Dad are not around to shield, to protect, to assist. For this reason, boarding schools can be hard; but they do serve to toughen and strengthen the individual's character.

2. Boarding schools act as a great socializing agency: boarders must learn to get along with other boys. "Sharp edges" are rubbed off. Brash characters are frequently pulled into line by the other students. Boys from varying national and socio-economic backgrounds learn mutual understanding and respect.

3. In a boarding school a boy must learn to accept the demands of a strong system of discipline. To a certain degree life is regimented to a set pattern of schooling, study, recreation, meals and so on. Clear rules exist that govern behaviour. The development of a disciplined attitude to life is especially important in an age when informality is regarded as virtue.

4. The Catholic boarding school is a controlled religious environment. Traditional Catholic values are stressed such as participation in the celebration of the Eucharist and reception of the sacrament of Reconciliation. There is reassuring religious solidarity in the boarding school environment.

5. In most cases, attendance as a resident student result in improved study conditions. There are set hours for study. Study is supervised. Extra resources are available both by way way of textbooks and tutorial assistance. Boarders do far more study than most of their day counterparts.

6. A boarder is provided with the opportunity for many extracurricular activities. The full range of school facilities are available to resident students. Whilst day boys are travelling home, resident students are normally involved in sporting activities, photographs, manual arts or some other interest group.

7. Lastly, and perhaps ironically, boarding school teaches a boy to appreciate home. The emotional warmth of the home environment and the uninstitutionalized, less structured routine are seen more clearly as something to be appreciated. Family love and the freedom of the private home are recognized for what they are.

For those boys who have never experienced a stable, secure home environment, boarding school provides a place of belonging where people care about the boy, his attitudes, his development, his growth, his well-being. Boarding school can stabilize emotional insecurity. Diligent pastoral care can bring about great changes for the better in boarders.

The boarding school remains the preferred field of apostolic endeavour for many Brothers. It has been my special privilege to have been the Headmaster of a boarding school for the past eleven years. There have been changes. Conditions are less austere. There is more personal space and privacy for each boy. Costs have risen. Yet so has the demand. Catholic parents value highly the Lasallian Boarding School. It is a work of special commitment for us.

BROTHER SCUBILION (2): «A Brother for those afar»: The Missionary

The first document let us get acquainted with Brother Scubilion and to discover the great stages of his existence.

Now we must show what brought unity to this life: Brother Scubilion was a Missionary. He was a missionary in the sense given to this term and the end of the 19th century which saw great strides in this endeavour, turning from the countries of established Christianity towards the lands of Asia, Africa and Oceania. These were often old colonies or countries in the process of colonization. Without wishing to judge the ambiguities of these situations, it is an historical fact that they contributed in a positive way especially in the religious sphere.

Between 1822 and 1833 Jean-Bernard Rousseau had joined the Brothers of the Christian Schools and had lived his first ten years of the apostolate. At that time, after the turmoil of the French Revolution, the Brothers set as their priority the strengthening of their establishments in France itself. They really did not yet have foreign missions. Yet, a secret missionary fibre was beginning to vibrate in their Congregation. Requests began arriving from Louisiana, (a former French possession) and Guiana. Efforts toward both places were thwarted, the Institute turned towards a favourite direction, the Island of Bourbon. A fervent appeal by the Superior General, Brother Gerbaud, brought some volunteers. That was in 1817. The beginnings were very difficult: the sending of two groups of missionaries (1817 and 1826) hardly established a fragile "beachhead". The establishment of a solid mission had to wait until 1833.

Brother Scubilion was on his way (we already described this in the first instalment). So, from then on we had the "Brother for those afar". And the very farthest possible. A colony in the southern hemisphere, far from the city whose population had a definite Christian heritage but very neglected. It was almost a "spiritual desert". About 1820, for about 75,000 inhabitants there were some religious services on Sunday in the most important centres; yet there were no sermons, no catechism, let alone classes, and a lack of schools. The few schools there were existed for the white colonizers or the free Creoles. The slaves did not count at all, except for work. The majority of them were not even baptized. It was towards these that Brother Scubilion soon became inclined. (We will speak about this in the next instalment). Meanwhile, he will spend ten years in the apostolate of teaching primary classes and catechism in favour of the free population at St. Benedict's and St. Paul's.

So, here we have Brother Scubilion as a school teacher. He had to reckon with the character of whis pupils, rather given to laziness because of the hot climate. He is able to overcome their lackadaisical attitude and to win their affection. This he does less by his ingenuity (whose limits he recognized) than by his patience and self-mastery, and by his continual devotion to all. Being in charge of the domestic duties of St. Benedict's, he takes good care of the poor children for whom the Brothers provided lodging and food and sees to it that the black cook, a slave, prepares their rice well. This provides Brother Scubilion with an opportunity to discreetly give the children their first "homemade" and basic catechism lessons. The time was not yet right for "official" catechism classes for slaves after working hours.

For the moment, at St. Benedict's and St. Paul's, he taught catechism to the Creole children , who were not too attentive. Of course, he taught from the catechisms of his day: a summary of cut-and-dry questions and answers of the principal truths of our Catholic faith. Yet this catechist's convictions and enthusiastic presentation, and the strength of his example breathed into the exact and rigid pages the savour of the "Good News". Brother Scubilion never forgot the recommendations of his venerable Founder: "You should strive to make your questions and answers in Catechism easily understood, and explain them clearly by using words which are easily understood". (Meditation 33:3).

There is another aspect of Brother Scubilion's apostolate: although in charge of the lowest class, he extended his influence to all the pupils in the school. He had a spiritual intuition in detecting in the pupils the desire for a religious vocation, especially to the Brothers. The contagion of his own complete dedication was a kind of silent invitation: one wanted to become a Brother like him. Then, he sent at least ten young boys to the Novitiate. Later on, when he was finally able to catechize his beloved blacks (slaves) at St. Leu, one of them, thanks to him, became a Brother, the first slave to be vested in the habit of a Brother.

But beyond his work and days as a school teacher and a catechist, I would like to sketch a portrait of a missionary, to set aside the movement of this existence, to identify the spirit which animated him.

First of all, it was his passion to evangelise: a certain interior turmoil for his own 'salvation' without doubt either naturally ingrained or from the constant preaching of his times, but above all for the salvation of others. And the movement of his heart, of his life, could be sketched this way:

* In the metropolis from 1823 to 1833 he gave himself completely to the children of Alençon, Poitiers, and Chinon. Yes, but... out there somewhere there are other children who need the Brothers even more to instruct and catechize them because they are the most abandoned. "Let us then go also to other places to proclaim the Gospel!" Out there beyond, one can give himself more completely, detached from his family and native land, without a desire of returning.

* Once he arrived in Bourbon, he gave himself completely to the children confided to him: he instructed them, served them, catechized them, and led to the Novitiate. Yes, ...But these were the free children. What about the others? The most oppressed, the most abandoned? Are not the slaves also the children of God? Who will take care of them?

* At last at the service of the slaves, God knows that he has given himself without reserve. Yes... But..., Bourbon is a Christian country, at least according to the Baptismal Register, the slaves themselves in ever greater number are being baptized and catechized. But way out there, some 800 kilometres away, is Madagascar, the Great Island, still pagan. He dreams of going there to bring the Gospel Message: "For the past twenty-two years I have been asking this grace of the Lord God (Brothers for Madagascar) and that I myself might be of the number of those who will have the good fortune of evangelizing these good Malagasee"! (Letter of December 8, 1855). He will become a missionary to Madagascar without going there himself. He has carried this mission there in his heart and prayers. And in 1866, he will be happy to bless, he the veteran, his confreres who are departing for Tananarive. "You are leaving for this island which I have so much desired to evangelize! I cannot follow you but I shall always pray for the success of your work. Now that we have schools among the pagans, I shall die happy".

Yes, a passion was burning throughout the life of Brother Scubilion: the obstinate will to ever widen his field of endeavour, to extend it ever farther towards the most poor, in a total gift of himself. In Lasallian terms, it is Zeal; Brother Scubilion is a person eternally unsatisfied precisely because of his zeal! There is nothing unstable about him: wherever he is, he flourishes, he gives himself without reserve to his apostolate of the moment. But receptive to the Spirit, he aspires along the lines of his vows to "procure the glory of God as far as he is able". Brother Scubilion lives to the fullest his mission here and now, but his zeal makes him sensitive to the appeals of all and the unceasing invitation "to get even farther".

The second characteristic which I should like to underline with regard to Brother Scubilion, is the successful synthesis between his perfect esprit de corps (together and by association) and the daring of his initiatives. We could speak here of an obedience-initiative, an obedience operated from within by a love (therefore zeal) which is irrepressible. Those duties which are not expressly prescribed in his list of duties, he discovers, and improvises to the extent that he perceives a need.

Obedience-initiative, obedience and zeal: he succeeds in reconciling the two virtues and in accumulating their advantages. Along with obedience is the assurance of a solid mission within the framework of a community which supports him and without which he would not have his influence nor his outreach, assurance of a mission devoid of the pitfalls of personal fantasies or of the divergences of temperament. As regards zeal, as regards initiative, this timid one was always audacious. He permitted himself all and was permitted all. Speaking about the apostolate at the end of his career at Sainte-Marie, one of his former confreres gives the following testimony: "His superior told me one day that he did not watch over him, he always managed to go out to help the sick and the sinners, without thinking whether or not he had to ask permission, such was his great zeal". This was a trait worthy of the "little flowers" of St. Francis.

We conclude, with the words of Monseigneur Aubry, adressing a number of pilgrims who had come to pray at the tomb of the Servant of God, 17 April, 1983.

> "Do not look foremost for the marvellous. Brother Scubilion was not a miracle-worker, but a missionary... go home and become missionaries".

There are many modes of being so. To discover them, Brother Scubilion has revealed his secret.

FOREWORD

In a few weeks, the International Year of the Youth will officially come to an end. This event was particularly celebrated with numerous local, national, and international celebrations. They have certainly left pleasant and lasting memories for a good number of people who have participated in them. I am convinced that, among the various regions of the Institute, the Brothers have not failed to undertake diversified activities, some rather original, always solicitous of promoting the aspirations of youth and having them meet together. In one of the Leaflets of N° 5, a year ago, the Lasalliana encouraged you to observe this year with many activities. Now we shall be happy to receive written accounts of your observances. They can eventually be reflected in future issues of this publication, since, for us Lasallian educators, each and every year is really a «Year of Youth» which inspire us to think up, and adapt new initiatives for improving our service to Youth. So whatever has been undertaken in 1985 should not come to an end with the new year but should constitute an encouragement to pursue these efforts further.

At about the time that Edition N° 8 of the Lasalliana makes its appearance, The General Congress on the OIEC will be meeting on the theme: «Educating the interior man, the source of personal dynamism and of social involvement». Without doubt, the vast majority of the Lasallian readers will not be able to participate directly in the Congress, but will find the opportunity to read its thoughts and conclusions in various newspapers and magazines in their own countries. It seems to me that the topic chosen has a «Lasallian» ring to it and the title should hold an interest for us. It is a modern consideration of the same essential concerns which Saint John Baptist de La Salle had in his educational plans for the children of the seventeenth century. Certainly, the words, «value», «dynamism», «involvement», were hardly in vogue in the vocabulary of that period, but the same realities were expressed in what De La Salle referred to as virtues, evangelical maxims, introducing children to the Christian life in order to make of them «true disciples of Jesus Christ». Is this not the very same thing that we are trying to do today in educating our youth toward values and helping them to make these values a part of themselves?

Also, the 41st General Chapter will soon be opening. Often the word «celebration» is used when referring to it. Is this not, in fact, the celebration of all that has been lived, undertaken, and accomplished in the course of the past ten years in the Institute, thanks to our Lasallian vitality? In this issue, we should like to single out the importance of this event and to devote two leaflets to it. The first deals with the first Chapter ever attempted in the history of the Institute. The other deals with certain important aspects of the one about to take place. This is another example of the Lasalliana trying to re-unite the two opposite ends of our tricentenary history. This celebration concerns all of us because we will be associated and represented there by our delegates.

The choice of these three events, the Year of Youth, the OIEC Congress, and the General Chapter, is very limited with regard to the great number our thoughts and activities as educators.

JOHN-BAPTIST DE LA SALLE: THE MESSAGE OF HIS CATECHISM

At the beginning of 1985, Brother Jean Pungier, who is one of the Lasallian researchers in the Mother House, published in Rome a book entitled, John Baptist De La Salle: The Message of His Catechism. This work followed two previous studies by the same author, Ministers of Grace, and If We Were to Re-Write «How to Run Christian Schools» Today.

Lasalliana wanted to know what were the author's intentions and conclusions, so we interviewed him. Our questions and his responses follow.

1) Brother Jean, why did you write this book?

The title of the book is in itself explicit: «John Baptist De La Salle: the Message of His Catechism». It is neither a theological nor a historical thesis on The Duties of a Christian Towards God, but rather an essay.

What I have endeavoured to do, in fact, is to emphasize what the Founder wished to convey to his Brothers in the field of catechesis. I do this, not through the five books which comprise his catechetical work, but rather through the little «catechism», in question and answer form, which, following the lead of Brother Magaz, I call, Duties II.

Such elementary catechisms were multiplied in the seventeenth century. Every bishop either composed his own catechism or commissioned somebody to do so, and imposed it on the clergy of his diocese. Other manuals sprung up in response to more specific needs: many priests wanted to spread these «lessons» or «instructions» which they scattered to the four corners of France, during the «missions» either in the countryside or in the cities.

It was in this context that the Founder wrote his Duties II. As I said in the Foreword, «He composed it at Vaugirard, in a suburb of Paris, at a time when the Diocese had and was imposing its own text: when Father de La Chetardye, the pastor of the parish of Saint Sulpice where the Brothers were teaching, was a catechist of renown and who, several years before, had written a famous catechetical work». The question could really be asked as to why John Baptist De La Salle decided to write his own catechism. Was it to say what was closest to his heart? To render some service towards the Brothers?

I have tried to answer these questions. Have I succeded in doing so? Well, that is up to the readers to judge!

2) Have some previous studies been done on «The Duties of a Christian» and, if so, where does your work stand with regard to them?

To my knowledge, only one long and exhaustive study has been done on this Lasallian work. This was the doctoral thesis of Brother Manuel F. Magaz, now of the District of Central Spain. It is entitled, A Catechism of France's Golden Age: The Duties of a Christian by Saint John Baptist De La Salle (1968). I studied it very much before undertaking my own researches. This book gave me the general framework—both historical and theological—of the «Duties». Another thing for which I am indebted to it, in particular, is that it made me discover the interest in drawing minute parallels between the Lasallians texts and their sources. It is like suddenly coming upon our Founder at his desk, at the very time that he is working on his literary, theological, or spiritual creations.

The Cahiers Lasalliens, nos. 20 to 23, have provided me with reliable texts and indispensible bibliographies. The Rivista Lasalliana has given me very interesting studies on the theme. I am thinking particularly of the articles of Brother Dante. Thanks to this author, I have a better perception of how the Brothers at the beginning of the eighteenth century prepared their catechism lessons and how they developed them in class.

Many other works and articles have planted the seeds for my research and my reflection. I do not wish to drag out my answer, so I shall mention only the works of Brothers Michel Sauvage and Miguel Campos, those of Sister Elisabeth Germain and those of Brother J.C. Dhotel, very particularly his «Origins of the Modern Catechism», which I am often inclined to quote.

Where does my work stand with regard to these studies? I would say, in an «original» way. At least that is what I think! In fact, it is not the text itself of the «Duties» which is the object of my concern (although it does hold a great interest for me) but rather the plan of John Baptist De La Salle, his message, and especially his message for today. For example, look at Chapter II of the First Part. I tried to situate the «Duties» within the total educational plan of the Founder. De La Salle wanted to take up the challenge which was presented to the Church and society of his time by the situation of the children of workers and of the poor, namely, their ignorance of knowledge essential to their salvation and their ignorance of the basic elements of culture and good manners. The chapter underlines the profound aim of this Lasallian educational endeavour to raise up true disciples of Jesus Christ, and to set up, and put into practice, the best means of achieving this result.

3) In your opinion, then, what is the essential message of this catechism?

Before speaking about what is the essential message of John Baptist De La Salle which pervades «Duties II», I should like to say, first of all, that this message is localized.

My work insists on this aspect—at the risk perhaps of making what could be called the «present relevance of the message» less readable. The Founder's manual of catechism was produced at the end of seventeenth-century France. Its historical and culture roots seem to be in conflict with those of his source manuals of Claude Joly, Le Coreur and Paul Godet des Marais. The religious feelings of the period, its moral pessimism, ascetic and sacramental rigorism, are evident throughout many of the pages of the work. The manner in which the «Catechism lesson» was conceived, prepared, and delivered belong to pastoral and catechetical history.

I should like to add that because «Duties II» is «localized», it leads us to discover many of the aspects of the very personality of John Baptist De La Salle. It is very interesting to look at the writings of La Salle along side his original sources because what he chooses to use, how he arranges it, what he rejects are often very significant. It is a joy to discover it!

Let us get to your question, what in my opinion is the essential message of the catechism?. In answering the previous question, I have already said what, in my opinion, is the heart of Lasallian pastoral teaching and its aim: to raise up true disciples of Jesus Christ. It is the very objective of the entire first Instruction of Duties II. It is at the same time the starting point and the finishing point. You should read the very beautiful Treatise on Prayer with which the book ends. You will be as astonished as I was at the spiritual perspectives offered to these children of workers and of the poor who were enrolled in the Brothers' schools of that day. The Founder could not reveal his true self more than he has done in these pages: in them he explains his own way of praying, how he lived his own life under the gaze of a very loving Father, in union with Jesus Christ, and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

Read with this fundamental perspective, «Duties II» clearly reveals a treasury of teaching which is ever up to date. I shall cite as some strong elements in the message of John Baptist De La Salle, the trinitary characteristics of his theological and spiritual thought; his care to lead the children to the God who acts through history; the importance which he gives to the Gospel maxims and the links he establishes between them and the Holy Spirit; his concept of prayer as a duty rendered to God in the Church, as a life of intimacy with God the Father, in Jesus Christ, and with the Spirit, as spirituality in action: all that makes up the material of the day of a Christian lay person is lived in union with Jesus Christ, in conformity with His own sentiments, His own actions. It is very difficult for me to mention everything. There are so many notations, sometimes said merely in passing, and other developments which are strongly suggested about the faith, the Eucharist, Christian practices, devotion, etc. To cite an example, here is a short quotation:

Q. What is meant by praying to God with devotion?

A. It means to pray with great respect and with a tender and inner devotion toward God and all that pertains to Him.

So few words to get across to us what is essential!

4) In your opinion, what studies remain to be done with regard to the entire «Duties of a Christian Towards God?»

If we should look at the Cahiers Lasalliens nos. 20 to 23, you will notice that there are five different texts in the Duties series. Each one of them deserves to be studied by itself. Duties I and II (C.L. nos. 20 and 21) have continued to attract attention even until the present day; their sources are rather circumscribed: they have been the object of a thesis, several articles and my own work.

Duties III (C.L. n. 22), which treats «Of the external and public worship which Christians are bound to render to God...» has not been the object of any systematic study; its sources are unknown. This «Catechism for Feasts», using the seventeenth century nomenclature, doubtlessly contains a «Lasallian Message» which we could also discover.

An attentive study of the two Abridgements, both the Large one and the Small one, without doubt, would be of interest for a better understanding of John Baptist De La Salle and of his catechetical writings.

The field of research is therefore immense. It is wide open for those who are inclined towards this type of research.

5) Finally, how would you summarize the idea of your book?

I have already had the chance of expressing it when I said that my work does not so much seek to be an erudite work but rather to be a witness to an ENCOUNTER. It is an encounter with the Founder during the very act of conceiving and writing his catechism. It is a research into his educational thoughts and total pastoral ideas. Above all, it is a communion with his most profound desire of raising up veritable disciples of Christ from among the Brothers and their students, Christians, in the true sense of the word, who share the sentiments of their Divine Master and live according to his teachings, thus rendering their «duties» towards the Most Blessed Trinity, within this Society where the Holy Spirit dwells, the Church.

6) Can your work be of any help to the needs of the Brothers Catechists of today?

The Brothers, and the lay teachers, who have read «John Baptist De La Salle: the message of his Catechesis» or in lieu of this, at least the account of this interview, can themselves respond positively or negatively to this question. Personally, I would respond positively. Even though the life problems to which Duties II addressed itself are not the same as those of our epoch, the «Lasallian plan» is ever valid and challenging. John Baptist De La Salle was engaged in a catechetical endeavour directed toward his time. What about us? He wanted to raise up true disciples of Jesus Christ, within the milieu which he was given evangelize. What are we doing in ours?

Yes, it is the Founder himself who, through his catechism, is drawing us to this research and writing endeavour so that we can put into operation a catechism for the young people of today!

7) Thank you very much, Brother Jean.

THE VOCABULARY OF THE MEDITATIONS FOR THE TIME OF RETREAT

The project of the 'Vocabulaire lasallien'

Students of Lasallian spirituality will have learned with a pleasant sense of anticipation that a project of the Region of France is now under way for the issue in instalments of the massive compilation of Lasallian Vocabulary which has been in course of preparation at the Generalate, Rome, for a quarter of a century. Brother Maurice Hermans, General Editor of the Cahiers Lasalliens, began assembling the Vocabulaire in 1959 and, giving such time to the task as his many other commitments allowed, and working often alone but sometimes with valued collaborators, he has collected and card-indexed some 300,000 examples of the way the Founder used words in his writings. The source used for such references was the collection of the princeps editions of the Saint's works reproduced in Nos 12-25 of the Cahiers Lasalliens. The Region of France's project for issuing the Vocabulaire has been entrusted to Brother Daniel Hazard of 78a Rue de Sèvres, Paris. Brother Daniel envisages a total of six volumes of about 1000 pages each; a limited edition of 300 copies of each volume (in offset typescript format) will be available to subscribers. The first volume has in fact appeared and the others will follow, it is hoped, at approximate intervals of six months, the whole splendid undertaking being complete before the end of 1987.

A preview of what we may expect from the 'Vocabulaire Lasallien'

It so happens that we can obtain a good idea already of what we may expect to find in the Vocabulaire Lasallien, now that its volumes have begun to appear. As long ago as 1965, Brother Maurice Hermans, with the collaboration of Brother Michel Sauvage, compiled and published Le Vocabulaire des Méditations pour le Temps de la Retraite. 1104 words are listed in this, in alphabetical order, and the phrases exemplifying their use in the sixteen Retreat Meditations amount to 6376. As Brother Maurice explains in a preface to the work, the list of words presented is limited to verbs, substantives, adjectives and adjective-derived adverbs; it does not therefore exhaust the total vocabulary found in these meditations. Nevertheless, continues Brother Maurice, «such as it is, it certainly opens up the principal approaches to the thought of the author of the meditations.» Each word is accompanied by a list of brief phrases, sufficient already to give the reader an idea of how the word is usd. But a convenient and original system of reference makes it easy, if desired, to locate in Cahier Lasallien No 13's reproduction of the princeps edition, the full context of the quoted fragment.

The particular interest of a 'Vocabulaire' of the retreat meditations

A concordance of the Meditations for the Time of a Retreat is of special interest because it may be said that this work represents the full flowering of St. John Baptist de La Salle's spiritual teaching on the vocation of the Christian teacher. The studies of modern Lasallian scholars have shown convincingly that the retreat meditations represent the Founder's retrospective contemplation, in the evening of his life, of God's dealings with him through the successive stages of his spiritual journey. Brother Michel Sauvage has captured this idea in an expressive metaphor: «Irresistibly one thinks of an alpine climber who has scaled by arduous stages a rugged mountain-face and from the summit looks back and recognises and understands the route he has followed...» (Cahiers Lasalliens No. 1, p. XXXV). Brother Miguel Campos describes these sixteen meditations as the Founder's «peak experience», an experience in which he discovers a present point of time loaded with the fulness of past history and carrying within itself the full potential of history still to be made. In these writings the Founder reveals his grasp of God's action in his life, preparing the way for him, calling him, and urging him forward from one revelational experience to another in the work he had summoned him to do.

These are impressive claims for a writing so slight in quantity, but no-one who has read Michel Sauvage's Catéchèse et Laicat or Miguel Campos's doctoral thesis, published as Nos 45 and 46 of the Cahiers Lasalliens, can fail to be convinced of their appositeness or to accept Campos's word that the retreat meditations are one of the great texts of French spirituality of the seventeenth century. Such being the case, one approaches the Vocabulaire of this work with the expectation of making some interesting discoveries, and one is not disappointed. A few examples must suffice here.

Examples of what the 'Vocabulaire des MTR' suggests to us

Appropriately the substantive most used is Dieu which appears 187 times, and it would be possible to construct from these 187 examples a considerable Lasallian theology, using that term in its specific sense of the study of the nature of God. The God on whom the attention of the Founder is fixed in these meditations is the one addressed thus at the beginning of the first of the six new Eucharistic Prayers: «You do not leave us alone in our life's journey but are living and at work in the midst of us...». Merely looking through the list of usages we are aware that it is the immanence of God, rather than his transcendence, which here preoccupies the Founder.God, as manifested in the retreat meditations, is he who, having in his goodness created men, wishes that they all come to the knowledge of truth. He is himself this truth, but he has revealed it to men through Jesus Christ, the Apostles and the Church. He continues to call certain persons to be ministers of his word, so that salvation may be available to all. He is concerned about the plight of poor children whose lack of parental care exposes them to a life of ignorance and sin. He confides such children to the care of Christian teachers and calls upon those teachers to acquit themselves with zeal and love of the responsibility which he has placed upon them. He bestows special gifts on those whom he calls to this work to enable them to carry out their ministry well. At the judgment he will require those who have received these gifts to give an account of the souls confided to them even before giving an account of their own souls. But he is bountiful in the rewards he bestows on those who have carried out their ministry well, rewards they will enjoy even in this life and which, in the next life, will be proportionate to the service they have rendered to the children who will then be their glory. No fewer than 55 of the passages containing the word God are directly quoted from Scripture - an illustration of the extent of the biblical inspiration of these sixteen meditations, a feature of them which the studies of Michel Sauvage, Luis Varela and Miguel Campos have enabled us to appreciate.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Appropriately too, the substantive used most frequently after the term God is the name Jesus Christ which appears 95 times, 31 of them in direct quotations from Scripture. It is noticeable that in these scriptural passages the Founder, unlike his master St. Paul, never uses the alternative forms 'Christ' or 'Jesus' or 'Christ Jesus', variations which are a subject of discussion among exegetes of Paul's letters. But in this he is only following the Amelote N.T. translation which, as Michel Sauvage has shown in Cahier Lasallien No1, was his source for his sciptural quotations. What does, on the other hand, become clear, even from reading the mere list of phrases quoted in the «Vocabulaire» under the term Jesus Christ, is that the Christology revealed in the retreat meditations is profundly Pauline. All the quotations using the term are from Paul, with the single exception of one from the Acts of the Apostles, but the remaining 64 manifest no less convincingly Paul's influence on the Founder's understanding of Christ. (Paul's own name, it may be mentioned in passing, occurs 29 times in the sixteen meditations).

After Dieu and Jesus Christ, the noun having the greatest number of references in the 'Vocabulaire' is enfant which appears 90 times, and this fact seems to symbolise that synthesis which was at the heart of St. de la Salle's spiritual understanding in general and of the retreat meditations in particular. I mean the synthesis expressed in the well-known dictum found in the Collection of Short Treatises: 'Make no distinction between what concerns your salvation and perfection and your duties of state.'. Key notions in the Saint's pedagogy emerge from a mere numerical analysis of these 90 references. No fewer than 17 of them enshrine the idea that God, in his goodness, has specifically entrusted to the care of each Brother the pupils who frequent his classes. (A glance at the list of occurrences of the verbs charger — 25 times — and confier — also, coincidentally, 25 times — reinforces this concept). The Founder's finely-balanced awareness of children's capacity for ill and their potentiality for becoming 'true citiziens of heaven' likewise emerges impressively from this list. With these references in mind, one is less surprised than might otherwise be the case, to discover that the substantive zele has 46 references in this 'Vocabulaire'. One discerns the profound contemplation which had led the Saint to place the spirit of zeal alongside that of faith as the characteristic spirit of his disciples. The term foi itself occurs 22 times in the retreat meditations.

Thanks to the labours of the three Lasallian scholars mentioned above we no longer need to be told that the retreat meditations are impregnated with holy scripture. 212 direct quotations have been identified together with many other clear allusions to the Bible. The way, indeed, in which the Founder has steeped himself in the sacred text and has seemed to make its vocabulary his own is well illustrated by the words ministère and ministre. Both words make their appearance in the first point of the first meditation, in each case in direct quotations from St. Paul, ministère in two passages from II Corinthians and ministre in a passage from I Corinthians. The Founder thus, as it were, acknowledges his source for the two terms which he then continues to use throughout the series of meditations, ministère 26 times and ministre 11 times. But reference to a New Testament Concordance shows that, in the sense in which the Founder took over the two terms, Paul himself uses 'ministry' 9 times in the letters and 'minister' 7 times: so that the Founder uses the former word seventeen times more than Paul himself and the latter word four times more. It seems a fair assumption that our Saint had been so profoundly impressed by the richness of the concept contained in Paul's usage that he had absorbed the two terms into his own vocabulary and used them freely and unselfconsciously to describe the work and role of his humble disciples — apostles in their sphere as Paul had been in his.

Concluding remark

The writer of this paper is conscious that all the above offers only a superficial and very incomplete look (based only on the substantives of the meditations) at The Vocabulary of the Meditations for the Time of Retreat. But his modest purpose is only to offer a preview of what we may expect from the great Vocabulaire of Lasallian spirituality now in process of being published. One additional point may be mentioned by way of conclusion, though this does not refer specifically to the Founder's book we have been considering. Readers who have had occasion to consult No 10 of the Cahiers Lasalliens will know that Brother Maurice Hermans has there already made use of the unpublished Vocabulaire as a means of checking the authenticity of the texts the biographer Blain purports to be quoting from the Founder. As Brother Maurice explains in a foreword: 'It happens fairly frequently that, having quoted an authentic passage of the Founder, Blain goes on to provide comments, reflexions or amplifications which seem to be in a different vein, even though the biographer is presenting them as the teaching of the Founder. Recourse to the Vocabulaire lasallien makes it possible, more than once, to detect a use by the biographer of words and expressions which never appear in the written work of John Baptist de La Salle'. The examples which occur in CL 10 of this method of checking Blain's dependability in particular cases provide an additional reason for feeling grateful to the Region of France for undertaking the publication of the Vocabulaire, as well as (it goes without saying) to Brother Maurice and his collaborators who laboured successfully to provide students of Lasallian spirituality and pedagogy, within and outside the Institute, with this magnificent concordance.

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS: EMULATIONS AND REWARDS

The preceding two leaflets had to do with classroom relationships. In a certain way, rewards and corrections pertain to the same topic. In order to better understand what is said in The Management of Schools, it seems to me that it would be useful to say something about the situation of the family and the children with regard to the school, near the end of the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth.

ELEMENTS OF THIS SITUATION:

Regarding attendance of classes

Instability, frequent absences from class, dropping out of school before the course was over were rather common. If school attendance was theoretically obligatory, in practice it was hardly observed. After centuries of more or less whimsical and irregular individualized instruction, the student body was not very well prepared to adjust to requirements and school behaviour required by simultaneous teaching. We know that one of the main concerns of John Baptist De La Salle and his first Brothers was how to keep the pupils in their places and how to make them more stable and regular.

Here are a couple of ways given them to arrive at this:

— Strong armed methods, based upon strict discipline or upon corrections were expected to act as deterrents. But we know that this type of «dissuasion» had uneven effects: many pupils quit the schools or left the teachers who made use of it!

— The softer way, which, it seems to me, was the choice which the Management of School favoured. What are the best ways of attracting the children, of making them interested in school, of getting them down to work, in spite of having to impose certain constraints on them to assure their continued progress? In this regard, you could not rely very much upon the parents for any help because they themselves had never experienced such a situation and they were not always convinced that staying many years in school had any value to it.

Interest in school work

The Management gives ample witness to the useful nature of the Lasallian school. This school should achieve good results so that the children, and especially their parents, would be convinced that attending classes regularly was not a waste of time.

The obvious success, preparing the children for occupations after they are finished with school, are the guarantees that the schools are useful. If certain pupils need further help and encouragement, then there should be no hesitation in providing such.

These orientations certainly explain to a great extent the success achieved by the first Lasallian schools. This success was attested by public opinion, by the proficiency of the students in these schools and by their stability. Here we present some of the concrete means proposed by the Management of Schools to achieve these results.

THE MEANS PROPOSED:

In the first place, the help given to the children individually:

«The teacher will help the pupils to apply themselves completely to catechism, which for them is not naturally easy and which is ordinarily of short duration, and they will achieve this by the following means:

1° They will take care not to scold or confuse them, either by words or in any other way, when they are unable to answer properly the question they have been asked.

2° They will encourage them and will even help them to say what they have difficulty in recalling.

3° They will offer rewards, which they will give from time to time to those who have been the best behaved and the most attentive—sometimes even to the slowest pupils who have made the greatest efforts to learn well. They will use various other similar means, which in their prudence and charity they will be able to find, to encourage the pupils to learn Catechism more willingly, and to retain it more easily». (page 133-134).

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

They will make use of a «pedagogy of success»: Nowadays, the study of motivation and conduct acknowledges the importance of success, and of encouragement to facilitate the progress of the pupils. The organization of lessons and the methods used in the first Lasallian schools led to a normal assurance of success. Here are two significant passages:

«They shall be careful not to present any pupil to the Inspector for promotion who is not qualified. Pupils are easily discouraged when they have been admited by the teacher but have not been promoted by the Inspector». (p. 67).

Regarding those who have not been promoted, we have another passage on the way of encouraging them:

«They will persuade them by means of some reward, by assigning them to some office, such, for instance, as Head of the class, and making them understand that it is better to be the first, or among the first, in a lower grade than the last in a more advanced one». (p. 68).

Frequent Evaluation:

Today, along with incentives and motivation, frequent evaluation and its positive results are equally stressed.

According to the Management, the procedures in the Lasallian schools call for constant and immediate evaluation. However, it gives special solemnity to the monthly changing of the order or the lesson. This is not only a frame of reference of the pupil's progress but also a strong motivation and a positive re-enforcement of the learners.

Direct Emulation:

This depends not upon a search for equality but one of distinction. To create more dynamism in the class one must rely on mutual help, «the appeal to big brother» as certain psychiatrists say, to the model, to the «locomotives» who help along the less advanced, to help them become a part of the group:

«The teachers will come to an agreement with the Inspector upon those who might be promoted, but whom it would not be opportune to promote at that time: either because they are too young or because it is necessary to leave some in each grade or in each section who know how to read well enough to stimulate the others and serve as models for them; to train them to express themselves well, to pronounce the letters, syllables, and words distinctly, and to make the correct pauses».

«The teachers will take care, some time before the day the promotions are to be made, to inform those pupils whom the Brother Director or the Inspctor has agreed not to promote—either for their own good, because they are too young or for the good of the class and the grade, so that there may be some who can support the others. They will do this in such a way that these pupils will be content to remain in the grade or in the section where they are». (p. 68).

REWARDS, PROPERLY SPEAKING:

These occupy a very restricted place in the Management of Schools: only two pages, as if to indicate that recourse to such external and artificial means of emulation or motivation should be closely limited.

Elsewhere these recompenses aim more at the child's general conduct in school rather than towards his work properly speaking, his comportment being directed, in the language of that day, by «duties».

«From time to time, the teachers will give rewards to those of their pupils who are the most exact in fulfilling their duties, in order to incite them to do so with pleasure and to stimulate the others by the hope of the reward. (p. 160).

«There are three kinds of rewards which will be given in the schools: First, rewards for piety. Second, rewards for ability, Third, rewards for assiduity». (p. 138).

Further on, it specifies that the rewards for piety ought always to be the biggest and most beautiful of the prizes. Next comes assiduity, and finally, capacity. The objects given as rewards are equally classified into three categories: books, pictures or sacred texts. The books mentioned are always «book of piety» and sometimes constitute a way of making up for certain financial inequalities by giving them to the most needy.

«Hymn books and prayer books, Diocesan Catechisms, and other books that are used in the Christian Schools, may be given only to poor children. These will not be given to those who are able to buy them».

«Rewards for ability will be given only once every month. There will be but one for each grade. Every month, a reward may also be given to the pupil of the entire class who has excelled in everything, that is to say, to the one who has shown the most piety and decorum in church, and, during prayers, the greatest ability and assiduity». (p. 161).

IN CONCLUSION:

The last citation reminds us of an essential aspect of the educational aim of John Baptist De La Salle and can serve to conclude this brief study: whatever is proposed to the pupils never stops at the mere human level but tries to come into close contact with the child of God and to help him to become, more and more each day, a «true disciple of Jesus Christ».

ST CASSIAN'S CENTRE, KINTBURY, ENGLAND: TEN YEARS ON. (3)

In the second part of his article (continued from the last Lasalliana), the first Director of this retreat centre for young people offers an outline of a typical session at St Cassian's.

For the first couple of years, the sessions were less structured than they eventually became, and included a few elements which we later discarded. I'll omit the details here. Called to formulate the theology of the Centre and to describe the process for a team which eventually came to include a few new members each year, I used to talk in term of the four «Becomes»: I. Become relaxed. 2. Become aware. 3. Become reconciled. 4. Become good news. In a few paragraphs which will not do justice to the variety of ways of opening up this pattern, let's try to show its internal logic - of how one «Become» leads to the next.

1. Become relaxed

The first task facing the team meeting a group of young people, coming to the centre from two or three different places, is to help the newly forming group to relax together. Fear, nervousness, self-consciousness and shyness are of course comon, especially on a first visit to the centre, and the work of the first evening must be to overcome these barriers which affect not only individuals in various degrees but the whole group. That means meeting in a big circle, after the evening meal, and introducing ourselves to the whole group — a painful business for many. The team tries to lead the way by offering models which the young people can use to talk briefly about themselves, their family, their special interests, and so on. Often a question, directly related to the main theme of the retreat, may be included, for instance «Can you remember ever getting lost or feeling lost when you were a child?» or «When you look back over the past few months, can you identify a high point and a low point?»

A few practical instructions and rules about the centre will follow, including such essential points as «no smoking in the bedrooms», «no disturbance at night», etc.. Then there is a chance to continue the discussion informally, mingling with new people before the evening ends with a night prayer. After singing some modern hymns (the participation being a good indicator of how relaxed the group has become!) and a couple of short readings and reflections, we would usually sit in darkness and pass round a lighted candle, each one being invited to make a short prayer before passing the candle to their neighbour. Prayers might range from «Please help my mum to get better from her sickness!» to «Thank you, Lord, for bringing us here!». to «God, I don't know if I believe in you!» to a period of silence, which might be awkward and embarrassed or reverent. Sometimes the silence spoke louder than words. The leader in introducing the prayer must recommend honesty: «Don't be afraid to be yourself!». Of course it may take some people the whole of the three or four day period to become relaxed, but if they make that step eventually (and the whole atmosphere of the centre is geared towards helping them to do so) they will have made a truly significant step, even if it is only the first one in our series.

2. Become aware

The task of «becoming aware» occupies the next full day of the retreat programme. After an informal morning prayer on the theme of the retreat (including some suitable Scripture, music and guided reflection), a presentation of the theme chosen for this retreat is offered by the team: the person directing this programme may give a talk, perhaps illustrated by extracts, music or slides, and often including a worksheet to be completed by individuals and then discussed after a coffee-break in small «sharing-groups» of about eight people (led by members of the team) to which each one is assigned, and to which they will belong for the rest of the retreat. The presentation is designed to help individuals become aware of themselves, of other people in their lives, of God (insider or outsider?) and to write down some answers to share in the small groups.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Having become aware of myself and some others, I can now become aware of these other members of my group and how they see life, what problems they face and where they look to find solutions. As time goes on, these groups can develop an intimate atmosphere of personal trust. This is always the intention, and much will depend on how skillfully the group is led — on the leader's self-confidence and sensitivity, including the ability to talk and be silent at the appropriate times, to encourage the shy and the reticent, to control the talkative, to challenge those who are hiding behind masks, to respond to and influence the dynamic at work in the group, and to encourage relationships to develop and deepen. You lead by example, of course, so you must be ready to share something of your personal story, if you are to ask others to do so. At the same time you must learn when to respect silence and how to help others handle silence and become at ease with it. Members of the team learn this by practice and by imitation, and by the mutual encouragement they offer to one another. Some have a natural gift for it, and their personal qualities make them fine leaders.

The growth in awareness of self, of others, of God in my life, is celebrated in a lively evening Eucharist, the different parts of which have been prepared by each of the small groups. The chance to work creatively together (say, in choosing readings and music, in preparing a collage or a mime, or in devising a penitential rite or a thanksgiving rite) enriches the relationships within each small group (even if it's often hard work and is another test of the leader's skills!), and the whole group benefits from this by celebrating a liturgy which is usually enjoyable, prayerful and lengthy (though the time is not usually noticed by the youngsters until the Eucharist is over). Exclamations of delight and surprise follow this unexpected success, which helps to consolidate further the life of this community which has existed for not much more than twenty-four hours, but which has been moving forward together — almost always at a rate and in a direction the young people had never dreamed of. We have just celebrated one of the communal and invididual highlights of our life together.

3. Become reconciled

It is to be hoped that the movement of the group has brought its members to the third stage, where the challenge is to «become reconciled». The increased self-awareness of the previous stage normally includes some sense of what is incomplete, unhappy, inconsistent, unhealed or wrong in my life. «Things go better with peace», so how do I find peace? How do I become reconciled? A considerable part of the next morning will be spent facing this challenge as an individual, but the whole group and then the small groups must explore the need for reconciliation and the various ways of seeking this. Each one will be helped to prepare a personal programme for a quiet period (of about one and a half hours), which might include a period of personal prayer and reflection outside in the gardens and woodland or in the attic prayer-room, where the Blessed Sacrament will be exposed. Selected portions of Scripture and personal experience, and sometimes creative writing (eg. a letter), might help. There may be an opportunity to go for an «Emmaus walk» with one other member of my group, with whom I choose to share more deeply my story and my problems; or perhaps the chance to have a chat with any member of the retreat-team I choose; or the opportunity to book a slot with the retreat chaplain for a personal experience of the Sacrament of Reconciliation. This latter opportunity became an increasingly popular feature of the retreat, as the centre developed. It is a sensitive and delicate area, and its success depends largely on the help of a sympathetic priest with whom the young person can relate and can trust. This is far more important than the mechanics of the Sacrament, though these may need to be explained and simplified to help and encourage those who fear this often unfamiliar and abandoned territory, which, if I can become sufficiently relaxed, may open up for me an unknown country which turns out to be the land of the Lord's healing and liberating love.

Very occasionally, friends might want to celebrate the sacrament together; more rarely a young person might want to invite a non-clerical member of the team to accompany them a very touching invitation, which I have experienced. For me, the theological model of the Sacrament of Reconciliation is to be found in John 21, where around the charcoal fire, Peter's symbol of failure and denial (See John 19, 15-18, 25-27), Jesus offers a new start to his friend, whom he calls by the name which recalls their first meeting (cf, John I, 42) and to whom he gives another chance to say a threefold Yes, in love and friendship which will take the relationship beyond that threefold denial, as well as healing it (John 21, 15-17). The conversation makes Peter «saddened» or «deeply moved» (verse 17), but this is a positive experience which ends with a new call to «follow me» and undertake a dangerous journey where he «would rather not go», an inevitable feature of his commitment to be a good shepherd of Jesus's lambs and sheep. The consequence of this third step may well be the difficult task of going home and making peace, perhaps with a member of the family with whom one's relationship has become sour or empty, and which Jesus wishes to heal.

ST CASSIAN'S CENTRE: TEN YEARS ON (4)

4. Become good news

To try building up such a relationship is a good example of taking the fourth step - to «become good news», a step which follows the retreat and which is the main challenge of re-entry into the familiar world, which will not have understood my retreat-journey. The experience is, after all, not a «one-off experience», but an invitation to understand that this opportunity has been given to me so that it can be shared. The sharing starts at home and in school, in my place of work, among my circle of friends and acquaintances, wherever I belong. First I may need to hear some explicit good news about myself, and this will be the purpose of the evening activity in the small groups, which follows a Eucharist on the theme of Reconciliation, designed to offer a communal opportunity to acknowledge our guilt and ask for forgiveness. This second Eucharist of the retreat is a rather quieter experience than last night's, but, instead of helping to prepare the liturgy, each person will be invited to participate by responding simply and personally at key moments of the Eucharist which will draw on their personal experience of the third step, around which the day has been centred. There is no room here to present a detailed description.

For many participants, the affirmation experience of hearing good news about oneself turns out to be the most powerful experience of the whol retreat. Before the small groups are resumed, the leader explains the point of the forthcoming session to everyone and tries to create a suitable atmosphere. A rather theatrical but highly effective method I often used was one I picked up from Australia. I would start with a blank sheet of white A4 paper and tell the circle, «Imagine this is you, at 7-00am!» Then I would take them through a typical day, starting with a parental call («How many more times do I have to tell you to get up? You should go to bed earlier. And look at the state of your room! It's a disgrace.») and quoting remarks from other members of the family, teachers, schoolmates or workmates, and so on - which amounts to a constant chorus of criticism and depreciation. For each comment, I would tear off a small piece of the paper and drop it on the floor, until by the time the character whose day I was describing had ended up in bed, I had nothing left in my hand except a tiny corner of the once beautiful and complete page. And from where I stood, surrounded by «junk», I would remind the audience (who had been howling with laughter and recognition of the familiar situation) that when others fail to run us down we are accustomed to take on the role for ourselves, helping the destructive process by which we get torn to shreds each day by the hurtful criticism which we have been taught to level against ourselves. And holding up the little corner of paper left in my hand, I would quote St Bernard: «Man is become like nothing, brought to nothing. Indeed he is nothing... But how can he be nothing when God makes so much of him? How can be nothing, on whom God's heart is set? If we are nothing in our own hearts, there is another opinion of us hidden in the heart of God». (Bernard of Clairvaux, Sermo V, In dedicatione Ecclesiae).

The groups would then be sent off to help their members discover that «other opinion» hidden in God's heart. Called to be God's voices, we would tell each member of our group what we liked or appreciated about them, what we felt to be their gifts or positive qualities. There were only three rules: one, that of honesty - it was essential that the exercise did not become insincere flattery; two, that the appreciative comment must not be qualified, or the entire effect would be destroyed («You have been very patient with me... most of the time!»); three, that the positive compliment must be accepted by the recipient and not denied («Oh, but you don't really know me!»). To start this conversation may not be easy — Another task for the leader's skills! — but once the youngsters start to lose their inhibitions and embarrassment, the effects can be extraordinary: tears of delight, broad smiles... When everyone has been complimented, the second half of the exercise begins. Each one thanks the group for the good news and is then allowed to speak briefly about one area in their lives with which they are dissatisfied («I'm lazy», «I don't get on with my younger brother», «I don't like such and such a person», «I'm very shy», etc). The group then prays with that person individually and aloud, asking the Lord to help them resolve the problem, heal the suffering and show a way forward. The experience of ministering to one another's needs in this way (unfamiliar to most of those who first take part in it) often proves to be a powerful and deep experience of Christian love, as it is described in I Corinthians 13.

The final morning of the retreat would involve all those who came from the same place meeting together to evaluate the retreat, discussing its high points, low points, values and challenges, and deciding in what way it had been good news. As a group, they would then be asked to work out one or two specific projects that they might apply to their situation at home, in school, in the parish or locality, with a view to sharing the good news. Each group would announce its intentions, plans and hopes (as «the Gospel according to so-and-so») in the course of the liturgy of the Word, during the final Eucharist - a liturgy of thanksgiving and looking to the future, before the final meal, preparations for departure and farewells, full (sometimes dangerously ful!) of tears and songs and promises, which marked the re-entry into the familiar world.

In the next issue of Lasalliana, J shall conclude this account of St Cassian's Centre by describing the effects of the experience in a few lives, as well as giving a description of the series of Yesweeks held each summer at the centre.

LA SALLE
TEN YEARS IN THE AMAZON

Necessity and Hope

Two reasons can be adduced to define the presence of the Brothers of De La Salle in the Prelature of Xingu: one of local character and the other provincial.

The Prelature of Xingu with an area of 350,000 km 2, more or less, has the biggest territorial extension in Brazil: It is rooted in the State of Parana, between 05 and 9.8 degrees south latitude and between 53.5 and 55.6 west longitude. It extends from the majestic Amazon river to the State of Mato Grosso. In Brasilian terms it means a territory four times bigger than the State of Santa Catarina. In European terms, it surpasses in size all of Italy and a good part of Austria.

In 1975, this vast pastoral region was governed by a bishop with the help of 8 priests and a little more than a dozen religious sisters, the majority of whom were working in the school. With the designing, construction and opening of the Transamazon Highway, in September of 1972, which divides the Prelature of the East from that of the West, along an extension of more than 500 kilometers, many cultural, social, and pastoral problems began to arise. There was a veritable avalanche of immigrants from various parts of the country, giving rise to many serious problems: each family entrenched along the highway or its surroundings, came with its own peculiar customs and with its popular religiosity deeply embedded in their heart.

It so happened that the loneliness of the virgin forest unleashed a tremendous nostalgia for the homeland. The hopes of many immigrants were transformed into phantasms of poverty and misery and a spectrum of ignorance. In all this immense territory there was only one secondary school, situated in the city of Altamira at a distance of many kilometers. The improvisation of teachers was such that the families, in an almost desperate gesture, were confiding their children to a semi-illiterate whose pay was so ridiculously low that it hardly covered his transportation costs and his stay in Altamira where he had to go each month to collect it.

If these and other needs suffered by the people of Xingu brought us to the Mission, it is not less certain that these were not only reasons. Brother Francisco Alberto, Provincial, and a good group of Brothers of the Province looked upon this project as a sacred dream. They knew that it would awaken in the Brothers an impulse of renovation and would withdraw them from the routine of everyday life in the School.

The Church Brothers

Another factor which contributed and facilitated the choice of the Lasallians in the Province of Porto Alegre for the Mission in the Church of Xingu was, without doubt, the recent plan created by the Church Brothers. In Brazil, this movement originated in the Diocese of Caxias do Sol. In 1972, conscious of the soundness of this innovation, the CBNN took up the plan of approving the sending of missionaries of the South and Central region to the Amazon, totally deprived of anyone to care for their pastoral needs. The Archdiocese of Porto Alegre was able to adopt the Prelature of Xingu. In June of 1974 they sent the first two missionaries to Xingu.

The Lasallian Province of Porto Alegre, belonging to the March-Misionera-Interna, Movement for Local Missionaries, in March of 1975 sent its first contingent of missionaries to the city of Altamira in the persons of Brother Adelino Ferranti, student, Vanderlei Marostica, and Brother Pedro Bohnenberger, who was in charge of this small community.

The duties of the three were to serve in the formation of a faculty in the Maria de Matias Institute and to assume the pastoral and vocational care of the youth. In the latter work, for many years we accepted the direction of the Minor Seminary which was given over to the Clergy in 1981.

Missionary Anguish

The years passed by and with them we discovered that the activities in mission lands are ample and absorbing. The number of priests and religious have increased since 1975. Still, the 19 priests and the few dozen religious are hardly enough to attend to a population of 220,000 inhabitants scattered among 7 municipalities and 17 local towns. We Brothers are no longer 3 but 6 and we are totally submerged in, and in communion with, the local church, the establishment of the Kingdom of God. Here where the various and spectacular contrasts of nature live in harmony, a union of heart and mind are not always found among the people. The poverty and ignorance of the oppressed majority are the result of the ambition and the accumulation of wealth by some few privileged individuals. We feel that it is difficult to say «no» to the continual new pastoral needs. In fact, one cannot easily resist the pleadings of the heart when it is enamoured with the cause of the Kingdom. We have come to the point of discovering that the committed missionary, rather than sinning by omission, feels himself tempted to sin by the accumulation of pastoral tasks and activities.

Education

In the city of Altamira, the Brothers have a headquarters whose administrator is Brother Beno Benemberger who also renders his services to the Community of Our Lady of Nazareth, in one of the sections of the city. His brother, Brother Pedro is committed to pastoral work at the Cathedral and also takes care of the Means of Social Communication of the Prelature.

In 1977, Brothers Waldemar Wolmann, Beno Benemberger, and Lucio Pauli opened a new community 180 kilometers from Altamira, close to the Transamazon Highway, in the very heart of the forest. There they took charge of the new public school, Malvin Jones. The then simple hamlet is today a respectable city with strong leanings toward political emancipation in a short while. Brother Ilirio Bertuol, who is in charge of the school today and who is assisted by Bro, Raimundo Zandomeneghi, has the responsibility of directing the 40 teachers and administrators and a school population of a bit under 1,000 in the complete elemntary school and in the lower section of the secondary school.

Since 1978, in addition to his responsabilities at the Melvin Jones school, Brother Waldemar took over the supervision of the schools along the Transamazon Highway and Alrededores from kilometer 180 to 235. Today, Brother Renato Thiel is in charge of this work. Since 1983, Brother Raimundo Zandomeneghi has been fulfilling the same function as supervisor in the State schools from Kilometer 130 to 180. These two Brothers serve a total of 57 schools, 145 teachers, and 3,023 pupils.

Upgrading Teaching

This contact with the teachers led Brother Jerónimo Brandelero to a new endeavour, starting qualifying courses for teachers during the summer months. They needed courses to complete their elementary education in order to facilitate their being admitted for secondary education. More than 100 students took the Basic Curse and of these 68 qualified as teachers. These studies were offered at the La Salle Formation Center in Uruara, km 180, which had been constructed by Brother Francisco Alberto. Other courses given there were those of «Literacy», Art Education, leadership, Hygiene, Secretarial, and Administration.

Keeping in mind the minimum value which the public authorities give to the teaching profession and the lack of solidarity among the teachers, Brothers Renato and Marino Testaolin dedicated themselves to organize the teachers and parents for the defense and restoration of their rights for the amelioration of the schools and of education. This work reached its zenith with the creation in 1985 of the Association of Educators of Uruará, ASSEDUR. Another Association of Parents and Teachers was organized also for the territory between km 130 and km 240.

Various Types of Evangelization

All the Brothers are engaged in pastoral activities outside of the schools. In Altamira, Brother Pedro gives courses on the «Christian Mystery» and partly cares for the finances of the Minor Seminary, Sao Joao Vianey, and since August 8, 1980, he has been daily directing the morning radio program, «Praying the Ave Maria». On Fridays, after the homily by the Bishop, «The Voice of the Pastor», Brother Pedro gives a brief commentary on the Sunday Gospel and gives a brief news report about the local, National, and Universal Church. The Brothers of the two communities are engaged in the formation of catechists and in catechesis for children, youth and adults, they animate the Bible Clubs for groups of youth in the neighborhood. In the absence of the priest, they lead the Sunday services.

In spite of the various types of work which do not facilitate the matter, nevertheless, the promotion of vocations is not neglected. This work for vocations is done through personal contacts in the Melvin Jones school and in the supervised schools.

Difficulties

During the year there are only two regular seasons, the rainy season and the sunny season. During the six months of rain, in the older houses, like our house in Altamira, the walls are damp, the whitewash comes off the walls, the roof becomes black, the floor begins to rot, and day and night the house has a mildewed smell. The streets, all of the land, are rarely in even a reasonable condition. In winter (the rainy season) there is much water erosion which enormously damages the surface of the streets.

In the summer there is soil erosion everywhere. There is clay and dust everywhere. A bus ride between Altamira and Uruará, which normally should take seven hours, can sometimes drag out for an entire day or more, but finally you make it. During the months of the heaviest rains, the only transportation company withdraws its vehicles from service. The sick, the sale of products, the buying of materials of prime importance, urgent messages, etc., all have to wait for their due time. The Air Transport Company, TABA, which brings the missionary to Belèm, Para or to the Mission at Xingu, does so in old and poorly maintained planes. It is so bad that recently TABA deserved to have its name mimicked as Transporte Aereo Bastante Arriestado, Air Transport Rather Dangerous.

There is one factor which we cannot omit: Among the good will of all those working in the pastoral mission in order to assume the «Preferential option in favor of the poor», and to put into practice liberating evangelization, there have arisen certain internal tensions which have caused a bit of difficulty in the work of the some of the Brothers. But we can say that this problem is now practically overcome. The 5000 or some kilometers which separate us physically from the other La Salle Brothers of the Province of Porto Alegre and the 200 kilometers full of difficulties which make our more frequent meetings between our two communities rather difficult, have in no way diminished our love, union, and enthusiasm for the Brothers, the Province, or the Congregation.

BROTHERS AT THE SERVICE OF DEAF YOUTH

For the past 140 years, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, together with a team of lay people, have been educating children and youth with defective hearing, particularly those profoundly deaf from birth, who cannot perceive the sounds of a word. They are, in fact, «those EXCLUDED from ORAL COMMUNICATION, those EXCLUDED from modern COMMUNICATION, which is so rapidly changing. These young people cannot speak at all or they speak very poorly, but that in no way means that the auditory deficiency exists only in the «one speaking». As with all people, to be in dialogue, there are things to be said, and the vital needs of relationships.

Our objectives

In terms of ages, our pedagogical and educational work endeavours:

— to make the very smallest children become aware of a «communication relationship» and to lead them to it.

— Through sight and touch to teach them the phonemes of our language (vowels, consonants, syllables) to lead them towards words, and then phrases.

— to introduce them to «lip reading» so that they can understand the message of those who speak to them.

— to teach them the oral and written French language, mathematics, science, etc... as other children.

— To give them, eventually, schooling, a professional formation which will allow them to take their active place in society.

This absorbing and difficult work always requires the teacher or the educator to be simple and precise in the use of the means of communication, following in this the advice of John Baptist de La Salle:

«You must study to word the questions and answers... in so clear a manner that they will be easily understood». (Med. 33,3).

For a specific total formation

The main purpose which a specialized teacher should have is to lead those with hearing deficiencies towards a complete mastery of the French language, to give them a place in the world of work, and to make them share as fully as possible in the mainstream of life. Still, to over-stress this aspect of things, there is always the risk of misunderstanding the deep realities of the handicap. A famous American psychiatrist has very correctly observed that «people who can hear decide what is to be done for deaf children and adults, without taking their real conditions of life into consideration». (H. Furth).

Deaf adults themselves, after many years, try to lay claim to «their right to be different»: What deaf adults are seeking... is that you help them to be TRULY deaf adults and not a hybrid, a hearing personality grafted onto a deaf body». (R.M. Raynaud).

The judgement is severe but, nevertheless has a partial basis. For it is true that a great number of specialists work in behalf of those with hearing deficiencies: doctors, audioprothesists, orthophonists, social workers, administrators, professors, psychologists! They are all dedicated to different kinds of research, all kind of divergent initiatives which unfortunately sometimes lose sight of the fact that a young deaf person is someone to be educated as a TOTALITY. And this is not always easy to say and to live! For example, when a father or mother discover this handicap, they are traumatized and thus tend to zero in on this difference — the absence of hearing — «they deny this initial wound» (R. Diotkine). They want, at any price, that their child should speak the same as others. They forget that other ways of true communication exist:

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

«In giving a prime importance to the word which her child cannot hear, the mother loses the capacity of changing in another way, as she did without her own knowledge, when she spoke naturally to her child at a time when she did not know about his deafness... If this gap is prolonged, it can have serious repercussions on the communicative and linguistic abilities of the deaf child». (D. Bouvet).

This concept of totality finally implies that beside the proper techniques towards oral communication, our educational team should also allow the culture which specifically belongs to the world of the deaf to be developed and encouraged. This culture proceeds with the knowledge and mastery of «sign language», which is truly a language. This sign language allows those with defective hearing to see themselves as «different» but not «isolated». Two years ago a deaf teacher joined the teaching staff, and the proposal that there be frequent contacts between the school and associations of deaf adults seems to be a good one. Thus the young people will be able to identify themselves, and have a «model» or «reference», with someone who lives the same difficulties, the same hopes, and the same joys as themselves.

Further, the average time of studying in our school is between 10 and 14 years. For our former students, the school remains as «their home». They willing come back there, at first to renew acquaintances, and then to exchange views with their former teachers. They reveal their concerns and seek explanations and help. The discussions are always lively. A fraternal dialogue is establishedbetween the deaf and those who can hear.

Pastoral activities

While being attentive to the total education of the deaf, we do not neglect their spiritual and religious formation. Even more than in other fields, the RELIGIOUS AWAKENING of the young requires the catechists to understand the psychology of the deaf youth very well and to perfectly master all the means of communication at their disposal. It is for this reason that the team is essentially composed of both Brothers and lay people who are «specialists».

Catechism is taught to the youngest children, with the consent of their parents. Encounters and retreats are available to the older ones. They come willingly, but the difficulties of adolescence, peer pressure, etc. make the task rather difficult. All the preparations for such encounters require a lot of time and technical means: slides and also written texts have to be projected on a screen, significant gestures have to be studied, and simplified explanations of the riches and depth of our faith have to be present above all.

Another concern with regard to the city and the region is the support and deepening of the Christian life among deaf adults. A monthly Eucharistic celebration brings together the deaf community: adults, children, parents, and friends. This celebration is prepared by a mixed team: those who are deaf and those who can hear. Once a trimester, the group meets, together with the chaplain, for a day of prayer and reflection.

Once a year, to celebrate Easter together, a great group of former students from all over France come together within the premises of the Institution. Here, about 180 to 250 people can be seen together in a warm atmosphere of faith, friendship, and solidarity, erasing the barriers of space and time.

Within this spiritual domain, we also are called upon to live the difference. Of the 114 children who frequent our center, 28 belong to the muslim religion. A professor, who himself is a muslim, helps them in prayer and during the feasts called for by the Koran. Together, and with joy the Christians and the Moslems commemorate, by a little celebration, the great liturgical moments of each religion.

Conclusion.

In the nineteenth century, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, conducted five institutions for deaf children. Today, only one remains in France. Far from lamenting past history, we continue this apostolic work which fits in so well within the frame work of John Baptist De La Salle's initiatives in favor of the poor and which responds so well to the «Declaration of the Brothers in the World Today» (34,2).

For the service to the poor cannot be separated from the poverty which is a Christian attitude of mind, the humble acceptance of the gift of Christ, the response of love for Christ, and for all men. It also requires a genuine participation in the life of the poor, and effective union with them.

THE LASALLIAN APOSTOLATE IN THE COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES OF THE USA

In the United States of America, the Brothers operate seven institutions of higher education:

Manhattan College (NY), La Salle University (PA), Lewis University (IL), St. Mary's College (MN) Christian Brothers College (TN), College of Santa Fe (NM), and St. Mary's College (CA). In these seven post-secondary institutions, there are a total of 169 Brothers, who with a large number of religious and lay colleagues are engaged in educating 21,500 students.

These colleges, several of which were founded well over a century ago, represent an authentic expression of the Lasallian charism. They were begun at the call of the Church, as expressed by American bishops and clergy, and in response to «signs of the times»: the need of the immigrant American Catholic Church for institutions to preserve the faith of young Catholics and to enable them to take their place in American society with competent intellectual and professional preparation.

They continue in existence today, in spite of the unfortunate conflict over the «Latin question»; they are an important part of the American Catholic educational enterprise as well as of the Brothers' apostolic work, as Brother John Johnston, Vicar General stated in his address to the United State/Toronto Regional Convocation in August, 1984:

«I would favour giving high priority to our colleges in the United States. I am convinced that Catholic higher education is an important element in the mission of the U.S. Church and that many Brothers have a gift for contributing on this level. At the same time we must participate actively in the continuing search for the meaning of the Catholic college and university and commit ourselves to strengthening the identity and character of our institutions as Catholic. Furthermore, I believe the Brothers in the U.S. can help the Institute articulate the relationship of the FSC to higher education, an articulation that has not yet been done on the Institute level».

The Brothers' colleges offer degrees on the Baccalaureate and Masters' degree levels. These degrees are in almost all academic and scientific disciplines. All the colleges have teacher education programs, to prepare instructors for elementary and secondary schools. Candidates for the Institute receive their baccalaureate-level training at the Brothers' institutions for the most part. Higher degrees more often are earned by the Brothers at other Catholic and secular universities.

The principal source of operating revenue for these colleges and universities is the tuition paid by the students: they are aided by government grants and loans available to those who need financial aid to pay the college costs. Through this means, along with assistance from funds solicited by the colleges from benefactors, large numbers of low income students are being educated at the Brothers' colleges and universities.

The Brothers' colleges and universities are today fulfilling the call of Pope John Paul II when he spoke to representatives of American Catholic higher education at the Catholic University of America in 1979:

«...to be what it ought to be, a Catholic university must set up among its faculty and students, a real community which bears witness to a living and operative Christianity, a community whose sincere commitment to scientific research and study goes together with a deep commitment to authentic living». John Paul II.

The Holy Father's call to community is one to which the Brothers can respond with all the richness of our tradition of living and working as a corporate entity in the Church. Members of the Institute have been characterized as having a basic character of community, resulting from the nature of our apostolate in common, and from our concern for persons and for the needy. This communitarian emphasis affects the manner of learning, the growth in faith, and the way of living on our college campuses.

Certainly a concern for community is shared with other religious groups and the dioceses who sponsor Catholic colleges, but the Brothers' approach has a unique Lasallian cast. It is derived from the presence and witness of the community of Brothers on campus, who bring to the college their spirit of faith and zeal, together with a profound concern for the disadvantaged and the poor, in whatever guise such may present themselves. This is expressed by the manner in which the Brothers and their colleagues strive to build a five-fold community, one that is caring, just, ethical, theological, and believing.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

A Caring Community

In response to the fundamental call to «love thy neighbor», the Brothers work that their student and all on campus live together in love, concern, respect, and sensitivity. Today's youth, as well as adults, seek an environment where these qualities are present. The Brothers strive to be the guardians of community on campus, with the students as well as among faculty and staff. This serves to counter the natural spirit of competition which exists among students and faculty, and helps all to go out to the «lost sheep»: the poor, suffering, and discouraged on campus.

A Just Community

The Brothers strive that life on the campuses of our colleges exemplifies upright living in every way. Justice is observed, with everyone paying to God, to neighbor, and to self what is due, and each one's rights to his property and his reputation are safeguarded. Certain moral evils can be present to a marked degree on a campus because of the age level which predominates. The Brothers' tradition of «vigilance» is a powerful force in guiding students to moral maturity and preventing dehumanizing actions from holding sway over individuals and groups. They serve to guard the moral health of the community as well as of individuals.

An Ethical Community

The Brothers in the American colleges realize that they must not only see to right living while students are with them, but also do everything possible to prepare them with solid and upright consciences for the future, so that they will «walk in the ways of the Lord» as parents, as citizens, and as professionals. Ethical concerns are multiplying in every field of endeavor. Social justice issues infringe upon almost every academic discipline. It is possible on the college and university level to study intensively the ethical concerns relating to poverty, racism, nuclear armaments, genetics, pollution, and the like. The Brothers bring their ethical and moral sensitivity to these matters and their zeal for a better world into their classes and faculty meetings, and to their personal conseling of students. They play a prophetic role in the campus community in this regard.

A Scholarly, Theological Community

A Brothers' college aims at becoming a cohesive community of teachers and learners whose effects are crowned by a high regard for theology, the «queen of sciences». Whatever their academic discipline or administrative role, the Brothers are called upon to be philosophers and theologians. As «Apostles of the Catechism», Brothers individually and as a group on campus, see that theologians are in dialogue with scholars in all fields. They encourage students to confront religious questions and explore the religious dimensions of life. College departments of theology are given strong support. The Brothers are concerned that this area of intellectual study avoids the extremes of anti-intellectualism which might appear under guise of religious orthodoxy, or, on the other hand, religious indifference in the name of academic purity.

A Faith Community

In virtue of their zeal to make faith a pervasive element on the college campus, the Brothers in our colleges strive to form faculty, staff, and students into a community of believers, mature in adult faith and who acknowledge, respect, and strengthen faith throughout the life and learning of the college. This is manifested publicly by worship and celebration, and by the offerings of campus ministry staff who provide opportunity for faith growth through prayer and sharing. All of the colleges give priority to liturgy and prayer opportunities for the Catholic students and staff, while also providing ecumenical events and services for the many non-Catholics who attend our institutions. In many classes, the traditional recalling of the presence of God, followed by a brief prayer, is held in honor.

In addition to their direct efforts for faith growth, the Brothers exert a powerful influence in this regard by their presence on the campus. The witness of their individual consecration and the example of their community life incarnate the mystery of God and His action in the world for all the campus to see. The Brothers thus are «living symbols» of faith.

Uniquely American Community

The Brothers' colleges and universities in the United States have come to be challenging opportunities to carry out the Lasallian charism in an educational milieu which is highly significant to the American Church and to American society. These institutions largely serve the workers' and middle class, but the sacrifices of the Brothers, the generosity of benefactors, and, especially, the financial aid available for needy youth from government sources, enable large numbers of disadvantaged poor, black, and Hispanic youth to attend our schools. These, as well as all the Lasallian students, are empowered to take their place as active leaders in American business, industry, and professional life, as responsible citizens of our country, and faithful members of their Church.

Such is the contribution of the American colleges to the Lasallian apostolate in the world today.

SOME INITIATIVES FOR THE FORMATION OF OUR YOUNG BROTHERS IN AFRICA

1 - A long way to go

The RELAF (The Lasallian Region of Africa) has just taken some common measures in view of the basic formation of their young Brothers. They had to travel the relatively long route of about fifteen years to arrive at similar decisions which are in operation throughout the world. This was so, for these decisions were the results of long and difficult negotiations and agreements.

It was in 1972 that the first meeting of those responsible for the Institute in Africa was held, and this was done with the effective assistance of the Central government of the Institute. A certain number of problems which are common and specific to the Lasallian religious life in Africa were thus grappled with. After this, more frequent meetings have been held and more exchanges and contacts have been established, sessions of permanent formation were organized in a systematic and regular fashion. Thus the CLAF (The African Lasallian Center) meets every two years with some twenty Brothers or other interested educators coming together to renew their ministry, their community life, and to reflect upon the inculturation of the Lasallian charism in Africa...

All of this enabled many Brothers to rise to a Continental level, permitting them to meet and get to know one another. It has contributed to modeling and making more precise the image of the RELAF which is made up of districts, sub-districts, and delegations which are so far away from one another geographically as well as historically.

Thus initial formation had been for a long time subject, if not a victim, of this disparity.

2 - Sporadic and mutual assistance

At the beginning of their history, the various Lasallian sectors of Africa relied very much on the founding districts of Europe and America for the initial formation of their Brothers. However, of late, for several reasons which can not be brought up here, because of the lack of time and of place, the African houses of formation had to appeal, no longer to people abroad, but to the Brothers in their own sectors. Thus was born a change of approach or an alliance among the neighboring African districts to solve the problem of the basic formation of their Brothers. The initiative for this mutual assistance first became a reality in 1977 in Upper Volta, which today is known as Burkina Faso.

The novitiate of Toussiana received the novices from Cameroon and Rwanda and received help from Madagascar to complete the staff. Next, it was the big island itself which opened its novitiate in Analabe to initiate Rwandese and Cameroons into the Lasallian religious life.

We must take note of a pragmatic characteristic of these initiatives. There are no available formateurs on the scene, and yet there are young men ready and waiting to begin their novitiate. Well then! They send the young men first to a fellow district which has a formation staff available and a novitiate which is too large for its own subjects.

3 - The Urgency of a common formation programme

The first initiatives of cooperation are waiting, however, to be completed by better thought-out planning. If you put novices from different sectors together into the same formation program, it is first of all necessary that they all have similar formation and background, enabling them to follow the same instructions in a common novitiate.

Thus, concretely, beginning with the actual practice, it can be determined that the postulancy program of such or such a sector is at fault because it is too short, does not have enough postulants, because the religious formation is too rudimentary, etc.

From these critical considerations was born the idea establishing one common formation program; and this idea would be all the more urgent because the orientations and suggestions coming from the Center of the Institute recommended taking the initial formation of the Brothers very seriously. It is a priority and must be handled as such.

To take up this challenge, the conference of the Brothers Visitors of Africa called together all those responsible for formation in the various districts, at Yaoundé in 1982. This meeting drew up a document, the biggest part of which dealt with «Orientations for Initial Formation». It is a document of reference intended for the councilors of districts, vocation committees, and for those responsible for houses of formation. These directives encompass successively the contents of the program of initial formation, their fundamental objectives, the means of realizing them, and the amount of time to be devoted to them. It is above all the formation of the novices which gave this group of formateurs the most to think about; they tried to determine the principal objectives of the novitiate and to suggest the best means of attaining them. To avoid a long and drawn out presentation, we shall point out only the main titles and their objectives:

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

— To follow Christ by living the spirit of the Beatitudes.
— To enter ourselves into the life of the Church.
— To form a Lasallian community.
— To form Brothers for today, capable of preparing the adults of tomorrow.
— To endorse the inculturation of our religious life into the people where it is present.

With regard to the pedagogy to be followed, the following was recommended:

— Take great care in beginning with life and finishing with life.
— See to it that each Novice takes a hand in his own formation.
— Discover the needs of today in order to undertake new modes of educational presence to the poor.

A summary of the programme is drawn up following these objectives in order to give the formateurs some concrete guidelines for implementing them.

4 - The decision is taken for a regional novitiate

The implementation of this common program could have been given to each district as its own responsibility. However, this would require sufficient personnel, which is not available in these Lasallian sectors of Africa. Thus, the idea came up of grouping the novitiates together and thus make use of the competence of the various formateurs available. This would also enable the Novitiate programme to be extended to two years, which had been the object of serious discussions and frequent dialogue between the Center of the Institute and the RELAF. Finally, during its annual meeting, held in 1983, the conference of African Visitors decided upon establishing a regional novitiate in Kinshasa. It would assure two years of initial religious formation for the young African Brothers belonging to the various districts of RELAF, following the formation plan established by the regional conference. At present, this decision is being implemented in the following way:

Some twenty novices, coming from five districts, sub-districts, or delegations, are following a common formation programme in Kinshasa. The direction is confided to a team of four Brothers of four different nationalities. Of these, two are Europeans and two are Africans.

This is a great accomplishment of the RELAF. It is hoped that it will last and that it will develop for the benefit of the initial formation of our young African Brothers.

We can point out, also, that the Visitors' Conference of the RELAF is already looking towards extending this cooperation even to a Post-novitiate. For the moment, the organization of this Post-novitiate is left up to each district, the professional or academic studies which the young Brothers should pursue during this time being the function of the official programme of each nation.

Still, the preparation time just prior to perpetual profession is again assumed by the Region. Thus, the decision has been made to create a Lasallian African Center (CELA) beginning in 1986. The CELA will be designed for all the Brothers who come to the year of their definitive commitment. It is proposed that they follow an entire year in order to deepen their sense of religious consecration, the meaning of the vows, the ministry of a Brother, to help them in inculturating the Lasallian charism within the African context. This decision still remains in the planning stage. But the young Brothers who are preparing for this definitive commitment are there. They are awaiting the opening of CELA. The problem is in providing the staff.

Conclusion

The RELAF is without doubt one of the most diverse and least homogeneous of the Regions in the Institute. In spite of this, it is always obliged to meet together and to do certain things together, not only to affirm its existence, but also to express its dynamism and its will to life. Thus, the CLAF (Lasallian African Center) has continued to function until the present. Still, it is for the benefit of the formation of the young, those Brothers who will carry on the work in the future, that the RELAF has centered all its attention during the past few years. Without doubt, there exists a willingness to listen and to implement the orientations coming from the Center of the Institute on the Apostolate of vocations and initial formation. (cf. Circ. 418). But, at the same time, it is felt that the Region is seeking to find itself further; it is exploring the need of reflecting together on the Lasallian religious life in Africa; it realizes the urgency of restating a programme of serious formation in order to take care of the young people who in sufficient numbers seem to be interested in our way of life. It is this above all which has justified these different decisions of the RELAF. However, not everything has been accomplished; very much remains to be done. Cooperation should be further developed and opened to the other Regions of the Institute.

PASTORAL CARE OF YOUTH IN THE CONTEXT OF LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY (1)

«If the meeting did not devote as much time to Lasallian Associations as to lay staff, it was through shortage of time rather than lack of interest. It was indeed evident from the discussion that the associations are experiencing the spirit of renewal in many areas. It is affecting former pupils, parents and sympathizers and is evidenced not so much by campaigns for a numerous membership as by an increased interest in the Founder and in the Brothers and by increased generosity in sharing our mission. It is more especially groups of young Lasallians who are making their presence felt in a number of regions and with a pronounced inclination to prayer, brotherhood and the cause of justice.

To speak of a Lasallian spring would perhaps be an exaggeration or too rhetorical. But it is true that «something» is taking place under our very eyes. The discussions enabled the representatives of areas where such movements are occurring to inform those where they are not of the apostolic interest aroused and to show them that it is possible everywhere provided that one takes the local circumstances into account.» (P. 26-27).

In the document just quoted, it is affirmed that «'Something' is taking place before our very eyes» and it is important to see it and discern it with clarity. When the Brothers Visitors met in 1981 they did not have time to analyze the theme, as affirmed by the General Council, but since that time until 1985 many things have happened which will give a much more significant importance to the theme in the forthcoming General Chapter.

What is this Lasallian Youth Movement, with its various names, styles, and methodologies, which seems to be spreading all over the Lasallian world in such a significant manner? How far can those Brothers go, without falling into a trap, who try to «free themselves» from big and complete structures so that they may serve the poor better? Is it not a new attempt to continue to forbid the young to get involved with the local church? What does that have to do with being a Lasallian?

Without doubt, these questions, and many others, could be asked at this time by those of us who are working and by those simply witnessing the development of these Lasallian youth groups which often strive, even without the help of the Brothers themselves to establish a faithful enthusiasm for St. De La Salle.

Youth Pastoral Work and the Brothers

This article is being written in Argentina, at the very southern tip of Latin America, a continent which, since 1978 has established two priorities in a joint apostolate: the option for the poor and the option for youth.

We in no way exaggerate when we say that this is an option in which the majority of the population is united, seeing that the greater part of the population is young and poor.

Pastoral care for the young, in one form or another, has always existed in our Institute. Nevertheless, what is really new is a definitely Lasallian profile in the style and formation of the very leaders of these movements. Let us look at some of these characteristics.

My district, during the last chapter, set up Youth Pastoral work as a priority area and assigned two Brothers on a full-time basis to take charge of the emerging MOJULA, as this movement is being called by the youth. The principal task was to form leaders (animators, conselors) who would arise from among the Brothers (especially, the young Brothers) at first and then among the older students.

Little by little, the style of this very Youth Pastoral went on affecting other areas of the District and mutually enriching them by reflecting on what has been accomplished in each one of these (the Apostolate of Adults, Education, Catechesis, formation, etc.).

The entire district gave its explicit support to this «model» apostolate, in the meeting of all the Brothers of the District in 1984.

Lasallian characteristics of the lasallian movement

What seems to give the meaning and solidity to the Lasallian Youth Movement is its possessing a spirituality and a mission.

The Profile of a Lasallian Animator

Our youth leaders, who are anywhere between 16 and 24 years of age, at present, possess these characteristics:

— A great love for the Founder and a more or less good knowledge of his life.

— A life of faith expressed by a frequent and lively consciousness of the presence of God, daily reading of the Gospels, attendance at the Eucharistic celebration and sacrament of Reconciliation.

— A «plan of life» which is centered on the love to follow Christ in some virtues which He practiced or in the practice of a particular aspect of each of them, which is transformed into an important element of discernment.

— Active service to the Movement expressed in the weekly participation in the community meetings, in the preparation and animation of the younger groups, participation within the activities organized for the strengthening of the life and and commitment of our Movement.

— A disposition of service to the Church and her People, particularly to the most poor which is expressed in the realization of «Lasallian Service». Lasallian Service is the name given to the mission carried out in the rural areas, far from the large urban centers, camps and outings for poor boys and girls, support for poor schools or poor neighborhoods of the city, in many capaigns of solidarity, leadership courses, etc..

— Participation in pastoral activities on the local Church level as well as on the national level.

— A desire to be helped in their own personal spiritual growth and discernment, which is often neglected because of the lack of counselors or Brothers who understand these matters and are willing to get involved in them.

— A sincere attachment to the Brothers' Institute and its works. It is an attachment which does not prevent them from being critical in situations which they cannot understand or find in contradiction with the life of the Brothers.

A Common Mission

The movement assumes distinct types of commitments in keeping with the mission received from God through our Founder, Saint John Baptist De La Salle. These activities differ according to the needs of the place and the abilities of the groups. Among these, we consider that the most important ones are helping slow students with their school work, catechizing their own companions, the children in areas near Lasallian centers, help given to children's homes, etc..

Other possible activities:

— COMMUNITY ACTIVITIES, that is, those done as a group, not individually. Planned, carried out, and evaluated as a group.

— CHRISTIAN-ECCLESIAL, that is, something beyond mere philanthropy or good fellowship.

— EVANGELICAL-EDUCATIONAL, that is, engaged in what we refer to as the ministry of the Word, in harmony with Lasallian spirituality.

— DIRECTED ESPECIALLY TOWARDS CHILDREN AND YOUTHS OR TOWARDS THE FORMATION OF PASTORAL OR EDUCATIONAL LEADERS.

— CARRIED OUT PREFERABLY AMONG THE POOR.

These activities are carried on by the older of the members of the movement but are supported in various ways by the younger groups.

Following the example of the Founder, their activities have the mark of authenticity by being gratuitous.

PASTORAL CARE OF YOUTH IN THE CONTEXT OF LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY (2)

Some difficulties and challenges

We believe that in this pastoral work, recently done, we are beginning to detect certain common grounds for the future. This pastoral work cannot be planned «from the drawing board». It is a question of living among the youth and to discover the way together with them. It is the youth themselves who best understand the realities of evangelization.

We believe that the Lasallian Youth Movement does not have for its objective to be a life-long commitment in the Christian life on the part of those who join it. There are already movements in the Church for those who want to live their Christian life «within a movement». The Mojula is a stage in ecclesial incarnation and discernment. Our youth ought to find «their own» place of commitment with the world and with the Church. We have to rediscover the meaning of «being secular», of being in the world. Our Latin American people possess too great a richness of cultural values in order to start on another road which is not that of encarnation to revivify the evangelization in them.

Some youths, nevertheless, will discover that the «Lasallian style of living the Gospel» is what God is inviting them to embrace. How? Where? With Whom?

There are some timid responses and other spirited witnesses, but this is only the beginning.

Among the poor to whom we are offering some educational services, members and leaders continue to emerge who give us a new pastoral style which is more suited to the poor and the deprived. How do we respond to this new reality?

The young people of the movement who open our schools to the poor areas often come into conflict with some of our Brothers. Some among us are literally stuck by the internal working of a school, which beside overwhelming us, does not permit us to see what it going on 100 meters away from our lecture halls. This creates conflicts. How can we profit by this instead of allowing it to destroy us?

The Brothers, so scarce and tired, see in these youths the illusion of a reserve of future replacements who will finally allow the work to carry on, which they have continued up until now with so much sorrow and sacrifice. How can we make them accept the fact that our young people want «another thing»?

At times, some Brothers find these youth leaders and animators to be closer and easier to understand, more in tune with their own ideals than their own Brothers in the community. What do we do when confronted with the risks and problems which are evoked by such a situation?

Associating with the older youth necessarily implies a greater or lesser involvement in the realities in which they themselves are living. Sometimes these are union activities, university, political, and economical matters, etc.. These activities invite our participation in spite of our rules and the strong resistance on the part of many Brothers. What can be done so that the Brothers who are working with youth will not be rebuffed or criticized by their own community?

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

In summary, the challenge facing us here is the relationship between the Institute and the Youth Movement. The document cited at the beginning of this article manages to deepen the reflection on this matter which cannot be resolved in these few lines.

Youth pastoral apostolate and recruiting vocations

I have left for last this topic, which, unfortunately, is for many the only thing at present worth talking about. We are not engaged in the Pastoral Apostolate among Youth so that there may be more Brothers. This is not fair in itself. It is not a question of changing the method of «recruitment», and instead of showing a swimming pool and a house of formation to now show a Brother playing a guitar because it is more attractive to the young.

It is the intention of our Youth Pastoral Apostolate to have all the young people in our group find in themselves the elements which will lead them to discern and choose the life style which will let them find their own vocation, in its most profound and widest sense: to put into reality their Plan of Life.

Still, with the same force with which we affirm that we cannot be forced into a trap or be subjected to pressures of any type, we say that we believe that in the measure that our young people go on learning our spirituality and sharing our mission, they will have the elements which will allow them to freely choose to «associate themselves» with us within the Institute.

This is not a question of a theoretical affirmation. Those who said this same thing many years ago without being able to prove it, suffered very much. Today, thanks be to God and to the efforts of many, our novitiates continue to be repopulated by youths belonging to these youth groups. This is cause for hope and rejoicing.

But our joy is just as great when we see so many young men and young women opting for teaching among the poor as a way of life, by becoming catechists, by choosing service to the Church, by a commitment to the liberation of our people. Both God and our Founder wish that we in the Church of today should take up this challenge of our times. The Institute must take up this challenge if it wishes to be faithful to God, to the service of man, and to the dignity of life, according to its charism.

HOLISTIC SPIRITUALITY AND THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS

Einstein, the physicist, remarked that we did not need to think more in this age, but we need to think differently: we need a new paradigm for the sciences. Carl Rogers, the psychologist, calls for a new paradigm in the human sciences. Fr. Mattew Fox, O.P., a theologian, calls for a new paradigm in theology. Much has been gained to this end by looking to the American Indian and to the Orient. The new paradigm sees life holistically: as unified, interrelated, interdependent — a rhythmic, cyclical, dynamic harmony between polarities (yin and yang). Jesus was born in a culture of a similar perspective. From the late Plato and through Augustine, however, thinking in the West evolved to be dualistic; and with the writings of Descartes and Newton the separation of body and mind and spirit became absolute. The body and all of nature (including women) were denigrated as being nothing but machines to be manipulated and eventually dominated and brutalized. In the language of the Orient, the West exaggerated yang and diminished yin. An imbalance and disharmony was had.

What does that have to do with spirituality and the Christian Brothers? My contention is that our spirituality suffers from this inheritance. It is overly intellectual, and in its denigration of the body (and therefore nature) is incomplete and inadequate. One needs simply to remember the lives of the saints as portrayed by hagiographers of dualistic thought. Saints were praised for not having seen the windows of the church, so great was their asceticism. Confessors to women were touted as never having looked a woman in the eyes. With the elevation of the intellect, spirituality suffered from a lack of grounding—was a thing more of image. Perfection was the image that was used. But perfection is an abstraction, an illusion. Illusions cannot be lived by human beings: and when it is tried and the illusion becames apparent, depression, disillusionment occurs. Nothing in nature is perfect: but in nature harmony exists. The Indo-European root, hal, gives us the words whole, hale, hearty, holy, health and hello. A saint is sano: whole. Wholeness is about harmony—a dynamic functioning of parts in a system: it is not about perfection.

What are some of the practical applications that might be offered to Brothers about living a whole life? It has been my observation that much of what we did in formation and our lives previously were the right things done for the wrong reasons. The difference is in the attitude with which life is lived; we need to think differently. The difference comes with adjustment. Fritz Perls, founder of Gestalt Therapy suggested that we «Lose our minds and come to our senses!» With the marriage of the body and the mind, we have an organismic wisdom—a whole knowing. «If the Lord speaks today, harden not your hearts». Much of the new direction in Humanistic Psychology and its psychotherapy has to do with an emphasis on the body. This is a result of the general fact that people do not listen to their bodies. They have bodies, but they are not their bodies.

People would sooner have their symptoms diagnosed as a physical ailment than one of the mind—the mind is really me; the body is not, and therefore there seems to be less shame involved. Re-owning our bodies (and all of nature) puts us in touch with the Cosmos which is made of the same stuff. «The Kingdom of Heaven is within». It is in our bodies that we live in the moment, can hear the stirrings of the spirit, have the accumulated wisdom of our predecessors. Alexander Lowen, the founder of Bio-energetics, writes that faith is rooted in the body. How else does one know? Where else is revelation made apparent? One need only to read Meister Eckhart or Julian of Norwich to see that the mystics were practical and of the earth. With the collusion of the Church and Science: the spirit belongs to the Church; the body and materiality belong to science—we relegated the spiritual life to the intellect and lost touch with the rich mystical tradition of Christianity up to the 14th century.

Therefore, the following samples are suggested by way of thinking and living our spiritual lives differently. Fasting from foods cleanses the body which eats its own poisons; thereby creating a cleaner receptacle for the whisperings of the Spirit. Chanting resonates—includes the body-mind. Chanting in a foreign language diminishes the tendency of the vernacular to address the intellect. Talking dulls our senses; reflect on sermons one has heard. The body-mind is opened, made receptive by sound such as Gregorian chant (which has on occasion been the vehicle of conversion for individuals). The body was designed for movement; sitting still needs to be varied or atrophy sets in. In prayer this suggests that we have alternatives to stalls or pews which physically and psychologically tend to imprison the souls. Movement opens the potential of the person to hear within. Note how this emphasis shifts from the tendency to put the source of truth outside: in catechisms and pulpits. Conversion rarely comes from exhortations. For every action there is an equal and opposite re-action. Force of oratory has short lived and often adversarial effects.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

We are what we eat. Eating of red meats, sugars, chemically treated foods, mineral-depleted grains dulls the senses and leaves one feeling less than alive. How can one be joyful in the Lord when the body is clogged and not free to be spontaneous. Spontaneity is from the body. In this spontaneity is playfulness, creativity, compassion, free flow of energy—aliveness in the Spirit. This body needs to exercise, to move, to breathe, to obtain adequate oxygen (aerobic effect), and to open up the free flow of muscles and emotions. With the typical routine of the average Brother—as with most professionals—we become sedentary and preoccupied with thought. While we are intellectualizing, we are not capable of focusing on and not present to our inner (kinesthetic) senses. To this extent we lose out on the moment, and the opportunities for awareness—and it is awareness that frees us from the restrictions of life conditioning and our environment. Because of the body-mind-spirit connection (touch the one and you touch the other), what we do to our bodies is done to our mind and spirit, and vice-versa. How we think and how we formulate our attitudes is incorporated into our nervous system and musculature. Our character is written into our bodies. Through the use of many possible body-mind modalities such as Feldenkrais, Alexander Technique, Rolfing and massage, we may find the more natural and grace-ful way our body-minds may be in the world. Trauma of earlier life and rigidity of character can be freed, often together with counseling, creating an open temple for the divine presence. Massage may be thought of as an exterior meditation. The Chinese have a meditation form in tai chi. Might we not do something similar?

The modern physicist is dialoguing today with the mystic and theologian. They are noting the unity of being at the atomic level. In the new age, we are at a crisis of survival as a human race. We, as Brothers, see ourselves in crisis in terms of a Congregation—will we survive? The Chinese characters for crisis are composed of two words: danger and opportunity. We are being thrust into a challenge. If we do not creatively accept the challenge we will surely not survive on any level—including the religious life. Many are hungering for rich spirituality with their whole being. «As the hart pants after water; so my soul pants for Thee, O Lord». In misguided ways, youth look to alcohol and drugs. Jung called alcoholism a «lowgrade spiritual disease». Perhaps we could look to this notion as we study the problem of alcoholism within religious orders.

The suggestion is being made here that true spirituality will be enhanced by the perspective that sees the unity of the cosmos—that sees an Incarnate spirituality. «The Word was made flesh». As Francis knew, the birds and beasts, sun and moon and all of creation are our Brothers and Sisters. It was Francis who apologized to «Brother Ass» for abusing it, on the eve of his death. It was Francis who called Death, Brother; knowing that death is an integral part of life. Our spirituality will, then, make us ecologists who speak for the rights of those creatures which have no voice in a society that vaunts the intellect and the wealthy. When the Earth and the feminine (yin) are diminished, then we are all diminished. Do we, as Brothers, adequately own our feminine component? Holistic thinking is not linear thinking, but cyclical; it sees the interconnectedness of all events. We cannot be unconcerned about the proliferation of nuclear weapons or the suppression of people's rights. Death is not the end of the line, for us, but the cyclical dimension of life with its continuous comings and goings. Poverty will mean simplicity when we own our bodies; bodies know that they need but the basics of food, exercise, rest, and human connection—not the illusions of images. Obedience comes from the word ob-audire; to listen. Listening requires being «yin» or soft to our inner and outer worlds. Holistic spirituality knows that we do not end at our skins, and that when we are most alone (celibate) we are most one with all. It has long been said that grace builds on nature. In a changing world—a new age—perhaps more of the young will see and be attracted to whole men who practice in the world such spirituality as this.

CAMPUS MINISTRY (1): «... the grace to be able to touch hearts»

ST. LA SALLE.

«Hey, Brother, got a minute?»

«Good morning, Brother; can I see you today? It's really important... I just need to talk».

«Bro. I got accepted at the University! Thanks for that recommendation you wrote».

«My grandmother's being operated on today, Brother. Would you say a few prayers for her please?».

... And so my day as coordinator of campus ministry begins. I haven't even unlocked the door of my office yet, but I've learned to expect the unexpected. I've learned to listen for what young people are not saying. Often it is in their silence that my role as minister is born.

Most of my time is spent organizing a four year sequential retreat program and coordinating the Christian Service of over 275 seniors here at La Salle Academy. It's a challenge, but one that I accept with the humility of knowing that I'm not in this alone. Because of his intense belief that the Gospel must not only be studied but «experienced», Brother Jerome Corrigan, our principal, has provided four full-time Campus Ministers. We are fortunate to have one Dominican Sister of Blauvelt, New York, and two Diocesian priests. Together we serve the pastoral needs of La Salle's 1,200 boys and girls and almost 100 faculty and staff.

Just what is Campus Ministry? This is certainly a tough answer to pin down but can best be addressed by taking a look at the different areas which comprise the work. It should be noted here that Campus Ministry most often reflects the talents and resources of the minister. One person may approach it from a religious-political view point and direct efforts to Advocacy stances. Another may see the role as purely pastoral ie counseling in areas other than college guidance. Yet another may stress service to community and liturgical celebrations. The list could go on. Here at La Salle we try to integrate the different modes by providing an experiential religious complement to the rest of the school's curriculum. It should further be noted that while addressing most of our attention to the students themselves, the faculty, administration and staff are also served through this ministry.

The four areas which form the nucleus of Campus Ministry at La Salle are: Retreats, Christian service, pastoral counseling and special projects.

1. Retreats

Each of our students is expected to make a one day retreat every year. We conduct the retreats by homeroom which means that each group numbers about 30. The homeroom teacher is invited to attend with no responsibility other than equal participation. I have found this invaluable for gaining teacher support of the program. Teachers themselves marvel at the rapport they are able to enjoy in a non-classroom environment.

All retreats are conducted by our campus ministry team in the recently dedicated St. Miguel Retreat Center located in the Brothers' House adjacent to the school. The facility houses four small group rooms decorated with student-painted murals and one large conference room decorated with student-painted murals and one large conference room for presentations, movies, lunch etc.. There's also a modern chapel and a screened-in porch where students can relax and recreate. For retreat purposes, I strongly recommend using the sections of the Brothers' House that are no longer occupied. This brings students into the house who may never have had the opportunity to see how the Brothers live. Also, it saves time and the cost of transporting students by bus or car to a retreat center.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Many weeks we find ourselves conducting more than one retreat. Because of the size of the school, about 50 retreats per year are needed. All retreats begin at 8:30 a.m. and conclude at 2:30 p.m. Students must bring their own lunch.

The approach on each retreat is an integration of theology, spirituality, psychology, and group dynamics. The Freshmen day's theme is Belonging: to God, to school and to family. The Sophomores' day deals with Values. While the Juniors address the question of Personal Identity, the Seniors look to their future in a experience of My Dream. Large group presentations and small group discussions and/or exercises punctuate the day. Every retreat concludes with a Eucharistic Celebration tying together the day's theme.

I would also like to mention here that much of the Freshman and Sophomore program is conducted by trained Seniors. In January of each year a letter goes out to interested seniors to solicit help with the underclassmen. Actually, the seniors come into my office as early as September asking when they can sign up for the workshops to be trained. This is peer ministry at its best. The seniors give most of the talks and run the small groups for their younger classmates. An adult is always present to provide encouragement and guidance but the students themselves minister to their peers.

2. Christian service

The Campus Ministry center coordinates a 9 week Service program for each senior at La Salle. This is a requirement for graduation and exposes the student to direct service with the poor. Two days per week are spent in a classroom setting teaching a spirituality of ministry as a gospel response in today's world. Once a week for 2 hours, during school time, each student is involved with the poor in some way. They are grouped in car pools and travel to work with the blind, the hungry, the mentally handicapped, the illiterate, the abandoned and the abused of our community. Later in the week they gather in small groups to process their experience and share their feelings. Sister Liz Engel, O.P. and myself not only teach the class but visit all of the agencies, almost weekly, to encourage the students and witness the many miracles which they perform in the hearts of the poor. However, the grace of the program rests in the transformation that takes place in the hearts of our young people. They are changed. Even the toughest kids who almost refuse to go out to serve are soon won over by the warmth of a child who needs them or the hollow look in the eyes of a woman who hasn't eaten for days.

The Gospel comes alive for the first time. They begin to see themselves as «holy» people. Learning that they can make a difference in the life of another person calls forth the best from them. Now Jesus doesn't seem all that distant or impersonal. He visits His people through them.

3. Pastoral counseling

When I am not on retreat or accompanying the seniors on their Christian Service, I am usually found in my office listening to the needs of individual youngsters. Each day before I enter school, I pray the words of St. La Salle - «Love those entrusted to your care with all the affection of your heart». Some days this is easier said than done. Some days my heart is overwhelmed by the pain and confusion these young people must endure. For some it is physical or mental abuse at home, for others it is the pressure to succeed that causes them to hurt. So much of their suffering these days is self-inflicted and seemingly hopeless. Many talk of suicide, alcohol and drug dependency, abortion and crime. They cry out for adults who are compassionate and willing to walk along with them as they make sense of their lives. The moments when a young boy or girl allowed themself to be vulnerable with me have been among the holiest moments of my life. Their trust in me continually shows me a new face of God; I am called to recognize Him again and again.

CAMPUS MINISTRY (2)

08-C-34

4. Special projects

Before I launch into a particular project of this Campus Minister allow me to mention 2 projects that the priests on our team accomplish. We have a high percentage of students from singleparent families in our school (i.e. over 50%). Father Roger Gagne conducts a ten week group session for those students who wish to explore their family situation vis-a-vis themselves. Hundreds of students take advantage of this peer situation to find solace in the fact that they are not alone. My fear is that this need will become much greater in the future.

The second project is directed by Father Jim Hamilton. His hope is to make the liturgy more accessible and meaningful to the students. He visits each religion class 2 or 3 times a year asking for a small group of student volunteers to plan a liturgy based on the current theme of their course work. This gives him an opportunity to educate the students to good liturgy then to actually celebrate the student planned service the following week. Both of these programs have received wide-spread approval from students and teachers alike.

A special project of mine is Christian clowning. My office is «cluttered» with clowns; sad clowns. I take very seriously St. Paul's exhortation to be «a fool for Christ's sake». Only the fool knows the price of fidelity. Only the fool can laugh in the face of despair and see hope. And so.. I'm a fool'.

Many times I put on the white face of the clown to portray in mime and dance that the Gospel is possible, personal, joyful and demanding. My clowning leads me to many diverse audiences in many different places, but one point is always clear: The fool merely captures the attention of the crowd so that it can then be directed toward the main act. My role as clown and brother is always to call others to the presence of God and never to be ashamed that I am His. The best way for me to do this is just to be myself. This is really the core of my ministry. It invades all that I do.

In August of 1984 four other brothers and I mimed and danced the Last Judgement story from St. Mattew's gospel for over 600 Brothers at our Regional Convocation in California. The response was profound. From the youngest to the oldest, the brothers were inspired by the reverence, creativity and imagination shown. It was a new way of worship for us; opening up new avenues and freeing the creative spirit in prayer.

This past spring Brother Michael McKenery (Auxiliary Visitor L.I.N.E.) Sr. Liz Engel and I worked with 20 students to put on a Holy Week Mime Experience for our student body. Listen to a student's reaction as it appeared in the school newpaper:

«On April 2nd the La Salle Student body filed into the school auditorium expecting a boring and drawn out prayer service. We did receive a prayer service, but it was in no way boring or typical. When the students settled down the lights went out. Bro. Charles appeared dancing on stage wearing fluorescent gloves and clown make up. Rock music and wild dancing appeared throughout the play as the parable of the Prodigal Son was retold through popular songs. Then there was the retelling of the crucifixion as the fool for Christ, played by Bro. Charles, was brought down by imaginary gunfire while scenes of war and famine flashed on a screen. A resurrection followed; the fool brought back to life by the power of God, gathered the other clowns into a circle of light with him. The resurrection occurred, the narrator recited a message of celebration and sharing of our love. In brief, this was the most creative, ingenious and enthusiastic play I've ever seen...».

A reporter from our local paper had this to say:

«Peppered with colorful costumes, intricate dance steps, an engaging opening number complete with black light and a fog machine and a variety of pop and rock tunes depicting scenes from the Gospel the show was a delight to the senses yet delivered an important message - that fools for Christ's sake can make a difference in this world».

The show ran about an hour and a half and demanded everything we had. From the day I began to write the script to the final bow on the stage it was a prayer. The message was always clear: By putting on Jesus Christ we can touch a world that so desperately needs us.

The spirit was contagious. We presented the service on another occasion for parents and raised $ 850.00 for our missions in Ethiopia. Students are already asking to be included in the next service planned for the Spring of '86! This ministry of clowning has enabled me to find creative and innovative ways of expressing the age-old symbols of our faith within the culture of our own day. To mime, to clown and to dance are each a strong part of me. Now I use them to be brother, to be minister and to be teacher.

In conclusion

My work in Campus Ministry has provided me with the freedom to expand horizons; my own and those whom I serve. I think the task is vital in any school that calls itself Catholic and especially one that is declared Lasallian. The gospel must be the core of the curriculum and permeate each discipline. St. La Salle inspires us to pray «for the grace to be able to touch hearts». Isn't this what it's all about? We have to educate minds but if we can touch hearts at the same time - that is Christian Education!

SIGNUM FIDEI'S VISION: A FAITH-FULL RESPONSE

In a beautiful example of the way scholars can build on and refine each other's work, the writer unfolds a vision through a review of the life of St. John Baptist De La Salle, the founder and inspiration of the Signum Fidei Association, selected documents of the Church and the Institute of the Christian Brothers.

St. John Baptist De La Salle's life is a glowing example of deep faith and profound dedication. As one goes through the stages of his life, he can systematically draw-out the processes he had gone through in developing that kind of faith. A review of his life explains the schema that led the founder to be a man of faith and zeal. Consider the following highlights in his life which moved toward relevant dimensions in building and extending his work:

— Known as wealthy young French priest he gave away his fortune and abandoned his promising career in church;

— People misunderstood him, maligned him and many of those who were his friends deserted him. Often discouraged, nonetheless he never lost faith;

— A few supporters who later became his disciples understood what he was trying to do. He called them his brothers and trained them to become good teachers;

— With his trained teachers he established several schools open to everyone at a time when education was a privilege for the rich;

— As a leader he ably encouraged his disciples to follow him. He did all this because he felt called by God to give the poor and the young the good news that God loves them. His life is what it means to live the gospel.

Following the patron's journey, important implications easily surfaced which are related to the problems of today's world. The analysis below show some important components necessary to build that vision.

— A radical decision in one's life is a real challenge if one takes the responsibility of following Christ and serving this disordered world.

— Conflicts should not in any way discourage one to continue to lead. Prayer is a must; indeed an essential part in this process. Acting in faith is the response of a person to God who reveals himself in the twists and turns of life.

— Good leadership and good followership including a good organization can help deliver good results.

— A prayerful life and increased apostolic commitment are ingredients for greater faith and service.

— Members' modeling of perseverance, dedication and confidence are characteristics to be considered if one wants to succeed in recruiting members to the Signum Fidei Association.

Citing passages from Church documents like «Gaudium et Spes», «Populorum Progressio», other Vatican II documents, directives from local Churches, conferences of bishops and inspired priests will help strengthen the point being stressed here - the great lack of faith. A situation where the most serious threats weigh on the fundamental values. Man has accomplished much in scientific knowledge and technology but at the same time is confronted with serious problems of materialism, power struggle, economic disorder, injustice and social imbalance. On the other hand, on the spiritual side, attacks on human liberty and dignity, rise of atheism, and the wave of secularization are getting more and more prevalent.

In the light of all these circumstances the writer traces some attributes and traits of the founder that can help alleviate this situation. He demonstrated faith and zeal in his life. There are two dimensions of faith to be considered, they are the development of:

— faith in the ability of ourselves and others to improve and grow;

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

— faith in God, that He is at work in this world. That man discovers the Lord when he discovers what is best in himself; and when he discovers other persons and give them the chance to live, grow, and develop.

Of particular interest are some statements from the documents of the Institute of the Christian Brothers. Directions are seen to be directed toward the organization of a project that will help the Institute and the Church.

— Schools must be aware of the ubiquitous, political, social and cultural changes taking place and consequently are given us no other alternative except to update themselves in their objectives, programs, and methodologies.

— The Brothers strive continuously to «awaken a greater sense of universal brotherhood among individuals and peoples». As such they will do all in their power so that the young who live in affluence and good fortune understand their responsibility to share their resources with those who are poor, deprived, oppressed, and exploited.

The La Sallian family or the La Sallian Brotherhood lives in the ideals of St. John Baptist De La Salle. These are notably, the Signum Fidei, members of a young association solicitous of promoting Christian education.

La Salle schools can act as the nucleus, the center for the development of the Spirit of Faith needed in the world today. Through innovation of school programs and projects, the La Sallian teachers, parents and students can emerge as leaders in propagating the association in this troubled land. Important events that will involve a greater role of the Signum Fidei, Philippines are envisioned; to wit, — An innovative school will emerge and take the lead in building, and propagating the work of the founder.

— Programs and projects for teachers, parents, and students will be launched as basic tools for the development of faith.

— A strong nucleus will take a radical stand that will bring forth good leadership and good organization.

— Conflicts which are inevitable will not discourage the majority of the members because of their deep faith in God.

— Organized activities will be launched inviting other schools to participate. National and international assemblies will also be witnessed.

— Various chapters will be organized in different La Salle schools and will even spread to other non La Sallian schools and parishes.

— Cooperation between the Christian Brothers and the Signum Fidei will be felt more in almost all areas of the Brothers' apostolate.

In conclusion, there are several interpretations yet to be considered, particularly with respect to the growth of the association and these are being addressed by other La Sallian associations. This analysis will help the members to continue the search and build stages of developing and extending the work of the founder. At this point, the work of the Signum Fidei seems clear. There can be no further doubt that the association can and will be able to accomplish what God and the founder would want the believers in his ideals to do. Lastly, this association deserves favorable attention from all those who are in search of the propagation of faith that leads to the salvation of mankind.

«TAKE UP YOUR PALLET AND WALK»
In the service of young wanderers

1. A Personal Odyssey

«Consider that the usual thing in the case of laborers and the poor is to leave the children free to live like vagabonds, running hither and thither, until such time as they are old enough to be applied to some trade. Such parents take no interest in sending their children to school, partly because poverty prevents them from paying teachers, and partly because they are obliged to go out to work and thus must of necessity leave the children to their own devices.

The results, however, are disastrous, for these children become accustomed to a life of idleness, and afterwards find it difficult to acquire industrious habits. Moreover, through evil associations, they learn to commit many sins from which they subsequently have great difficulty in disengaging themselves, owing to the strength of the habits whose growth has been of many years' standing.

God has been pleased to supply a remedy to so sad a condition by the establishment of Christian schools...» (Med. 194,1).

This text has been engraved in my memory since my entrance into the Brothers. It has made such an impression on me that it constitutes for me an almost continual reference. What St. John Baptist De La Salle expresses here coincides perfectly with my personal aspirations. It is more by a natural leaning than by an ideal that I have always taught the weakest students, that I have tried to be attentive to their problems, their feelings of frustration, their fears, and their aspirations and that I have tried to encourage them always. It is also by natural taste that aid to the Third World has always been one of my sidelines, without, however, having heard the call to a missionary vocation «from afar». My mission country has been my own.

At the age of 35, I wanted to perfect my education and the study of languages appealed to me. For this purpose, I enrolled in an American University. As luck would have it, at this time I was in charge of an extremely difficult class. All during the year, I accompanied my lessons with experimental psychology in my scholastic work. The result were very positive. This happening became a «SIGN» for me. I decided that I would make a study of curative pedagogy and psychology. In my Thesis at the end of my studies, which were devoted to Saint John Baptist De La Salle, I pursued two objectives: to study deeply the thoughts of our Founder on the «maladjusted child» and to do a historical study on the «reform school» at Saint Yon, a work established by the Founder. This work fascinated me and became rooted in my ideal of a BROTHER.

Having become in charge of the District of Swiss Brothers, I tried to share the best I could the thoughts which were animating me. This was a time of intense research. The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian School has always been in full evolution and in search of identity: who are the poor with whom De La Salle would be concerned today? what works would he found if he were living here today? How can the Brothers rediscover the charism of the Founder in this final part of the Twentieth Century? While this type of questioning is fruitful to give us a true prospective, it also engenders incertitudes and all kind of problems.

After my term of office ended, it was only logical that I should return to the center for the rehabilitation of drug addicts, which the Brothers of our district had founded, a few years previously, in the locality of our «Abbey of Fonatine-Andre. It was with great enthusiasm that I rejoined this work, but conscious all the while of the fact that cures for heroin addiction cannot be improvised. I applied myself the best I could... It was a very difficult apprenticeship. After a bit more than a year, I became convinced that my place was not there, especially because I could not truly identify myself with the existing concept of the Center. Disappointed and totally uncertain about my future work, I found myself in the dark and full of qualms of conscience that I, just like three other Brothers before me, had abandoned our confrere who continued to work there alone.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

I set out in search of the LIGHT. Among other things, one day I packed up my bags and went to spend a week in the mountains. I prayed quite a bit... Sometimes I bewailed my troubles as much as I articulated my hopes... I struggled with God and with myself. But, alas! the mountains did not provide me with the light I was seeking, so it was with feelings of dissatisfaction that I took the road back. (On the way, I stopped at the place of a friend of mine who was a clinical psychologist and, at great length, revealed my troubled inner feelings. It seemed to him that I was showing rather evident signs that my future was not in the Brother's vocation...) That only increased my confusion...

At the railroad station in Zurich, by chance I bought a newspaper... and suddenly I saw the light! I read a long article about a center which cares for runaway youth in this city which was founded two years before by two courageous women. Suddenly I felt a stirring within myself, within the very fibers od my being: this is the work which answers all my longing. I had very clearly determined that this work would be the ground of my future apostolate. Hardly a year later, I rejoined the Brothers community at Zurich and I began my work at Schlupfhuus. Such was my odyssey.

The Schlupfhuus (house of refuge) of Zurich was founded in 1980. In five years more than 1,300 young people passed through there. At present the animation team is made up of five women and four men. There is also a small team of voluntary helpers. The house is open 24 hours a day and is frequented by youth between the ages of 12 and 17 who have run away from home. The average age is between 14 and 16. Girls are the most numerous. Many of the teenagers, before coming to us, have spent several days in the streets and have met for the first time the hard realities of the streets in a big city. All those who come to Schlupfhuus must do so voluntarily. All they have to do is ring the bell and say that they need help in their present situation. They. They must authorize us to take care of them. We are able to help a number of young people to get off the streets and to find solutions for their future which will be acceptable to themselves as well as for their parents. In this sense we are preventing future trouble.

About two-thirds of the young people who come to us get back to their families the very same day or two or three days after their arrival. It stands to reason that for a short time we remain in contact with the «walk-in» cases and their families. About one-third categorically refuse to return to their family. The length of stay of our «permanent residents» varies from a week to two and a half months, even three months. On an average each night of the year we give shelter to five or six youths. In order to avoid financial complications, the first week is free. The assistants of Schlupfhuus have then a double role: that of counselors and a pedagogical function as in any other boarding school. It is the young people themselves who have to look after the kitchen and the cleanliness of the house.

In the role of counselor, our task consists in resolving the bitter crisis between the teenager and his parents. The first objective which we pursue is always the reintegration of the young person into his family. In those cases where such proves to be impossible, it is necessary, with all those concerned, to find another suitable alternative. We could also add that the Center has an SOS telephone. Many young boys and girls make use of this for making their first contact with us; some distressed parents also call us... Schlupfhuus is a private institution which is subsidized in the amount of 60% by the government.

«TAKE UP YOUR PALLET AND WALK»

2. A Lasallian apostolate

Allow me to enumerate the problems which I face here. Crises in puberty, run-aways, drugs, pregnant girls, juvenile prostitution both among girls and boys, suicide attempts, self-inflicted wounds, states of depression, problems tied up with divorce, abortion, contraception, rape, school problems, generation gap conflicts, etc. I must admit that all this was something new for me, a 47 year old Brother who had lived mostly in a school atmosphere. An almost entirely unknown world was suddenly revealed to me. The text of St. John Baptist De La Salle, quoted at the beginning of this article, suddenly took on a new hitherto unknown dimension. For me, without any doubt: these youth are «the farthest from salvation»; it is they whom we must help to «live good lives», «to straighten out their lives».

Schlupfhuus is not a Church Institution, although it receives financial support from both Protestant and Catholic Churches. Still, religious qualities do not play a role in my work. Only professional and humanitarian qualities are taken into consideration. Nevertheless, the team of animators, the greater part of whom are non-practicing Christians, were perfectly aware of my religious state, even before I joined them. In spite of these differences, I feel that I have been accepted by both the men and women who operate the shelter as well as by the young people. I know that seeing me in this work, these young people have a new experience with a man of the Church which is quite different from the image they had of us.

Some of my confreres ask me what a Brother could be seeking in this institution. For them, I am doing laudable work but one which is not Lasallian. I have to explain myself: They find that there are two essential Lasallian elements missing in my work, that is: proclaiming the gospel and working «in association» with other Brothers. I am not insensible to this criticism.

The best response, undoubtedly, can be found in the stages or steps which progressively led me to this work. It might be well if I recalled them briefly:

— The first step was the personal reflection and self-examination. It was not the end of this phase of delving that set the process into motion.

— After much thought and counsel, I made the first verbal contact with the Zurich Center, simply for informational purposes, without any obligation on my part nor on the part of the Center. It was necessary to know something about what really goes on there beyond what one can read in the newspapers. This first contact proved to be very positive, but was by necessity limited.

— After a discussion with the Brother Visitor of the District, I met together with him and with the administrators of the Center and we decided upon a month's trial period without any obligations on either side. This allowed me to get better acquainted with the people and the concrete conditions of the work. This stay was very positive and it served as a good evaluation of the Center by me, and of me by the Center. This mutual satisfaction led to a firm offer on the part of the Center, when it had to replace a collaborator who left in May of 1982.

— Before accepting, I referred the matter to other Brothers in Switzerland
  - The Council gave its consent, specifying that I should be a part of the Community in Zurich.
  - By a circular letter, I next consulted the meeting of Swiss Brothers. Meeting in General Assembly, these Brothers voted in the majority in favor of this project, without doubt with

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

some hesitation on the part of some of them, which explains the questions mentioned above.

— The project having been confirmed by the Brothers, I became a member of the Community of Zurich. Upon my arrival, it numbered only two Brothers. The community was a bit jammed after that. I believe that the Brothers of this community accepted my work very well, and strongly wished that I continue to live with them, even though other interesting possibilities could be envisioned in Zurich.

— The activities of each of the Brothers were shared in community, even with the Brothers of Neuchatel. Because of the diversity of apostolates, this important sojourn was also a way of working «by association». We had to find a better rhythm in our community life, one more adapted to the diversity of our activities. It is true that in my work I did not display my quality as a Brother and in 90% of the cases I was not explicitly proclaiming the GOOD NEWS of Jesus Christ. If I had done so, I probably would have been opening the door to my departure. In fact, most of the time I was dealing with young people without any Christian background, even though they may have been baptized. When they spoke about church, it was in rather a derisive and aggressive way. I would not say that they are totally closed to the faith, but still, I did not think it wise to address them in missionary language when they come to the Center.

First of all, it is necessary to help them become upright people. After having spent three years in this work, I have learned that the youth run away from home not because of the poor conditions existing there, but because of the number of times that they have felt helpless in ameliorating the situation. They run away because they are discouraged: they think that there is no viable solution for them. I often think of the numerous healings related in chapters 8 and 9 of St. Mattew's Gospel. Jesus is very much concerned with the health of people. He wants them to be «upright» persons. «Take up your pallet and walk». As far as I am concerned, to help these young people to regain confidence in themselves and in a viable future is a Christian task, it is announcing a part of the «Good News». A number of former clients come to see us and tell us about their difficulties and success. Thus, slowly sincere friendships are formed. These reacquaintance meetings are propitious occasions to talk about faith and about God. He who plants, and he who waters is seldom the one who harvests...

In going to work on my motorcycle, I almost always get caught in tight traffic. Amid this noise and confusion I often hum out loud:

«Lord, you are my strength and my patience, my light and my counsel, it is you who dispose the hearts of those young people confided to my care. Do not abandon me to myself even for one moment. Give me for my own guidance and those of youth the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and fortitude, the spirit of knowledge and piety, the spirit of your holy fear and zeal, ardent for procuring your glory. I unite my work to that of Jesus Christ, and I pray the Most Blessed Virgin, St. Joseph, the Guardian Angels, and St. John Baptist De La Salle, to protect me today in the fullfillment of my duties. AMEN.

THE GENERAL CHAPTER

On Monday, April 7, 1986, one hundred and seventeen Brothers of the Christian Schools will gather together at the Mother House in Rome for an assembly whose duration is expected to be about two months: This is the General Chapter.

Who are these representatives?

The composition of the group of 117 representatives originates from three sources. First of all, there are eight members by right: the present Superior General, the former Superior, Brother Nicet Joseph, and the six Brothers Councilors, elected in 1976. The second group is the most numerous: 105 delegates elected by direct vote by all the Brothers in the 64 Districts and the 8 Delegations which constitute the administrative elements of the Institute. Finally, four can be designated by the Brother Superior General and his Council. The maximum number then is 117, which will be verified, but there may be a few delegates less because certain delegates may find it impossible to attend.

What does the Chapter do?

The Chapter fulfills two principal functions. The first is elective: to choose the Superior General and his Councilors; the second is legislative: the Chapter is the only authority which has the power to decide upon the norms and the orientations which regulate the life of the Brothers and that of the communities.

But before doing any electing or deciding upon directives, the Chapter must first define its policies. To do that, it begins by verifiying the impact of the decisions of former chapters, the manifest needs of the apostolate, as well as the conditions of individuals and communities which make up the Institute. It will particularly give an attentive ear to the suggestions which every Brother or every group of Brothers has the right to propose. From this investigation as a body, a general program of action will be decided upon which will be broken down by Regions and Districts. It is only after having defined this general political set-up that the Chapter will be able to choose the men capable of translating it into reality.

The Chapter meets every ten years, but there are quite a number of suggestions for reducing this period so that the Institute can benefit more often from the impetus which such as assembly generates.

A particular task for the 1986 Chapter

One particular task incumbent on the Chapter of 1986 is that of approving a «Rule» which will be presented to the Holy See for approval. Actually, a Chapter does not invent all the legislation which governs the Brothers. Every religious family possesses «Constitutions» or «Rules», which are a combination of spiritual texts and regulations expressing what this Institute is, what it does, and how the life of the Community and its religious are organized. Generally, these texts come from the Founder and have been approved by the Church. Still, the ravishes of time render some of these regulations burdensome or even warped.

Therefore, Vatican Council II has asked that all Institutes rejuvenate their Constitutions. Accordingly, the Brothers adopted in 1966/67 a provisionary Rule. After twenty years of experience, the moment has now come to enact a definitive text which will be submitted to the pontifical organization which concerns itself with religious: the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes (C.R.I.S.).

The essential for the Chapter

The alert reader will already have noticed that every serious enterprise which is preparing for a general assembly sets up a parallel apparatus. It suffices, in the case of religious, to sprinkle about a little bit of prayer and the model seems ready for operation. It functions so well that it constitutes a trap into which more than one Religious Order has fallen. While it is necessary to oil the mechanism, one must go a step further to what is most essential.

Still, the essential lies elsewhere. It is tied up with the original nature of the vocation of the Brother and that of his Mission. Vocation and Mission come from God and from Him alone, but He has confided it to men of flesh and blood. Vocation and Mission include a human profession, socio-educational activities, and the like.

The essential work of the General Chapter, is then to take into account this original reality which has sown the divine seed in the ground of human realities. The Chapter ought, at one and the same time, to listen to God and answer the appeals of men, then to decide in favour of both. This is possible since the Risen Christ has opened the way.

Faith enables the Brothers to evaluate everything in this world in the light of the Gospel. They see that the totality of creation, with Christ as its centre, is ordered to God and destined through His love for the happiness and salvation of all mankind.

The above quotation, taken from the Brothers' Rule, demonstrates that this task should not take the capitulants by surprise, for it is nothing other than putting into operation the spirit of faith and of zeal, which is the spirituality of the Institute, The Rule continues elsewhere in these terms:

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Faith makes it possible for the Brothers, little by little, to see in everything that happens, in every person they meet, especially the poor, the unwanted, and the persecuted, a sign and an invitation of the Holy Spirit.

The capitulants, therefore, are called upon to live together the spirit of faith and of zeal in the three well-known stages: beginning with realities, seeing the spiritual meaning in them, and translating them into action.

...Beginning with realities:

A Chapter never leaves ideological positions, but rather examines: the youth, particularly the poor ones, together with their needs and their appeals—the living conditions of the world in which we exercise our apostolate—the paths and the obstacles which educators meet—the daily life of the Brothers—the appeals and aspirations of the lay people around us—the Church and its demands, etc. In brief, a «cloud of witnesses» which are invisible to the eyes of the capitulants, but very much present to their heart, since they constitute this part of Creation confided to their care.

...Discern the spiritual meaning:

Our God is not the Sphinx questioning Oedipus. Discernment is not the deciphering of an enigma, but the result of listening and a coming together. It is listening to the word of God in silent meditation, and the convergence of the elements of response perceived in the course of this meditation. Nobody possesses the Spirit as his own exclusive property, but it is given to those who come together in the name of Jesus. The rise of these con vergences is one of the most impressive moments in the course of Chapters: the group of capitulants little by little gets together on the manner in which such and such an event, which depends on us, can be directed so that it will serve the cause of justice and truth, and will lead to God. Little by little it becomes of one mind on the way of helping youth, the Brothers, our friends the laity to give to their life the fullness of the love of God intended for them, without forgetting about their individual human differences.

...Translate the spiritual meaning into action

The Brothers have enough texts at their disposal, so they would rather get down to practical measures. For example, the Chapter of 1976 refused once more to define the ideal community. On the contrary, it asked each community, at the beginning of the school year, to come together to decide their prayer program, apostolate, and social life. These are practical measures which concern daily life, but they are also inspired means, carrying with them clear spiritual significance: the unity among the Brothers and among those with whom they come into contact.

By way of conclusion

As far as we can determine from listening to the Brothers and from reading their suggestions, this is a rapid review of the great agenda to which the Chapter will probably address itself:

1 - The Chapter of 1986 is not going to discover America, others before them have already done this so it will be up to them to fall into step lest they become incoherent. It seems useless to launch into new endeavours and seems more profitable to bring to fulfillment those already started.

2 - Spiritual renovation seems to be the major priority: we must take the time to pray better and to better discern the meaning of events. Certain currents of renovation lack inspiration, or, at least, the inspiration, which is the Holy Spirit: we must take the time and make the effort to receive it and listen to it.

3 - Service to the poor and the promotion of justice through education has greatly caught on among the Brothers. It is hoped that it will reach a «critical mass» in which the majority of the Brothers will be engaged in this work. A true contact with the poor ought to inspire the prayer of the Brothers, simplify their life style, and direct their activities better.

4 - The Brothers participate in the educational ministry of the Church. The Chapter will set about drawing all the logical conclusions from this participation: the practical priority of catechesis and evangelization, more «pastoral» relations with youth, mutual enrichment between the religious life and the proclaiming of Jesus Christ, more decided overtures toward the Church for constructing faith communities, etc..

5 - For the past fifteen years or so, a growing number of lay people have been discovering in Saint John Baptist De La Salle a source of inspiration. This will be one of the major questions to be discussed by the Chapter and one which will lead the Institute to pass through a historical stage: that of sharing, without any confusion, our spiritual richness and our apostolate with the laity.

6 - The Institute is making an effort to extend its service to the young countries. In other countries, the Institute is ageing. Elsewhere its presence is sparse: how can mutual help be better organized from the center towards the communities and between the districts and the regional centers? How can we better assure our service to the Church by a better cooperation between sectors and with the local Churches?

7 - Finally, the question of vocations, their awakening, their growth, and their formation are all linked to all the movements of renewal. The Chapter will give the Brothers an opportunity to more clearly give witness to who they are and will invite them to enthusiastically transmit this appeal for future service within their ranks.

If some of these paragraphs have proven of interest to the readers and has moved them to pray that the Kingdom of the Lord progress among the youth, then this will be the first positive result of the Chapter even before it opens!

THE PROTO-CHAPTER OF THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS, SPRINGTIME 1986

At least three times, at Rheims, Vaugirard, and then at Saint-Yon, St. De La Salle called a number of Brothers together, to form a deliberative assembly to study the current situation and to make several major decisions. Without perhaps being designated as such, these assemblies were in fact «General Chapters».

The last two are known, not only from the accounts given by De Maillefer and by Blain, but also from the register of vows and even from the first capitular register which we possess even until today. The first assembly, that of Rheims, is known to us only from the accounts of Brother Bernard, and of two other biographers.

1. A Slight Doubt: 1686?

The four accounts of the first biographers, Bernard, Maillefer 1723, Blain, Maillefer 1740, are unanimous in fixing this first assembly around the feast of Pentecost. Still, they are less in agreement when it comes to fixing the exact date. Bernard seems to waver between 1686 and 1687, the two Maillefer acounts adhere to 1686, and Blain mentions 1684 twice. Yet, Blain does not hesitate to contradict himself, not only in the matter of chronology, but even when he brings up the deliberations and decisions of this same assembly.

Explicity, for example, he sets this first assembly as following the return of Adrien Nyel to Rouen. This departure obliged De La Salle to take over the schools of Guise and Laon. Because he was already in charge of the teachers in Rheims, Rethel and Château-Porcien, in the future he would also be seen as the head of a little congregation, to use the very words of the biographer. It is precisely because of this new fact, that De La Salle takes the initiative of calling the Brothers of the different communities together to meet with them on a certain number of points concerning community practices. It is, therefore useless to fix this assembly to the date 1684 or even before the Autumn of 1685, since Monsieur Nyel, at the time, was still running the schools in the Diocese of Laon.

There are other contradictions: Blain contradicts himself in affirming that the Brothers assembled there made only the vow of obedience, since this biographer elsewhere claims that since 1684, the Brothers had taken the vows of obedience, stability in the society, and teaching gratuitously. All this anticipates by ten years the pronouncement of vows at Vaugirard in 1694, in such a way that there would be no need to further delay such a formula of profession.

If we discard the date 1684, the year 1686 seems to offer the safest guarantees, which explains why it is generally accepted as the actual time of the first assembly convoked by De La Salle.

2. An attempt at a calendar.

Neither here are the biographers perfectly in agreement. Yet all of them assert that the assembly from the outset was a common retreat. Certainly deliberations were carried on, but only in the climate of a spiritual retreat. And this would remain a constant factor of all General Chapters of the Institute: the chapter always opens with a retreat, which is often extended beyond one week.

According to the biographies, the assemblies of 1686 and 1694 were essentially times of spiritual retreat. There were not two separate times, first a retreat, and then the chapter; the deliberations were rather included within the retreat program as another spiritual exercise. It is true that these deliberations had to deal with questions which were vital to the community: the rules (in 1694) and the vows (in 1686).

Two of our accounts set the beginning of this assembly-retreat on the Feast of Pentecost; two others have it begin on the vigil of the Ascension. For these latter two, it was supposed to close on Pentecost Sunday, but it was extended another week to Trinity Sunday, the closing day then being unanimously fixed for this same Sunday, the first after Pentecost, and the Feast of the Blessed Trinity. This would give us for the year 1686, successively, May 22, as the Vigil of Ascension, June 2, as Pentecost Sunday, and June 9 as Trinity Sunday.

3. The Participants.

Twice we read, «The Principal Brothers»; and even «The twelve principal Brothers» according to Blain; which again seems to be an anticipation. In 1694, The Brothers Capitulants would truly be twelve in number. But in 1686 how could there be twelve principal Brothers when the total number of Brothers hardly passed that figure by two or three?

The two accounts of De Maillefer try to be more precise: the superiors of Laon, Rethel and Guise, with those of the house of Rheims made up the complete assembly, he wrote in 1723. «The principal Brothers were distributed among the three cities where they had schools», he wrote in 1740 to which we have to add, without any doubt, some Brothers or maybe even all the Brothers of the house in Rheims.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

De La Salle, then, did not call all of the Brothers, but he reserved to himself the choice of some Brothers in preference to others. He must have done the same thing for the assemblies of 1694 and 1717. Following suit, the first general chapters convened by the successors of De La Salle, also seem to have been made up of Brothers designated by the authority of their superiors. The Bull of Approbation of 1725 limited itself to merely fixing the number of capitulants, without specifying how they should be chosen.

What can be understood by the «principal» among the Brothers of 1686? The «superiors» of whom Maillefer speaks? The word «directors» would have been more in line with Institute language. Could it refer to still other Brothers who, by their age or by their seniority in the community, were designated as those who could speak in the name of all? How many would this be? The figure of twelve, proffered by Blain, and repeated more than once in his account, could be a maximum one, and there are strong reasons for considering this an exaggeration. One thing appears to be certain, and that is that each of the five or six houses which made up the Community was represented by one Brother or another.

4. The Object of the deliberations.

The Community of the Brothers had already been given a name and religious habit; the details of the exercises of the house and of the school had already been set down in a fixed schedule. With regard to the rules proper to the Community, De La Salle considered that it was still too early to propose the first codification of these. It was necessary first to follow the experience of the first years, to at first loyally live this life of laymen consecrated to the ministry of education, before dreaming about formulating concrete needs and their guiding principles.

Still, it was necessary that this Community be given an ever stronger coherence, to affirm its identity, to call it Brothers of the Christian Schools, to wear a habit which was a way of professing that it was a religious community, in fact if not by law, and that the members of this family were already bound together. Yet, in 1686, nobody, not even De La Salle himself ever dreamed that the community had to be guaranteed by a new title or by several formal observances. Therefore, written into the agenda of the assembly was the following reservation: should it be proposed to the Brothers that they bind themselves by vows? If this should be answered affirmatively, then by which vows? Should they at once be perpetual vows, or should they only be temporary? What should be the object of these vows?

Such an agenda came to the knowledge of the biographers almost in this form. But how were they informed of this since they wrote about thirty years after the event itself, and for two of them, nearly forty years after. They wrote at a time when the Brothers were not familiar with this period of beginnings and had not taken part in the assembly of 1686.

5. The interventions of De La Salle.

The biographers themselves present an opening address: Bernard and Maillefer are rather concise, Canon Blain is prolific, as usual. We can very legitimately refuse to accept his account when he pretends to reconstruct the propositions of De La Salle, word for word, and even and especially when he puts them within quotation marks, which for him never had the precise meaning that we are accustomed to giving them today.

But then, should we deny all credibility to the account given by this canon biographer? That would be excessive and pitiful. Still, looking at other passages by the same author could help in determining a just assessment of things. In 1717, for example, at Saint-Yon, Canon Blain is in the house itself where the assembly of the Brothers takes place. He is in the house but not in the chapter room. This in no way prevents him from extensively reproducing the speech which he attributes to the Founder. Very fortunately for us, he further adds: «With these or similar words, the Servant of God put his disciples into the disposition which he desired for them». (Blain, II, p. 135).

It does not then seem offensive to the memory of Canon Blain to evaluate such an avowal each time we gather from under his pen the words he himself puts into the mouth of De La Salle: «these words or others similar to these»!

All the same, it is in May-June of 1686 that De La Salle and the Brothers grapple with the question of the vows. Immediately, it seems, the Brothers present wish to bind themselves by the three vows common to religious orders: poverty, chastity, and obedience. Such a proposal on their part should come as no surprise. For the past two years at least, the Brothers' community had taken on the aspects of a religious house. The Brothers were certainly not the last to notice this ever stricter affinity which was absorbing them into the religious life. Not only were they aware of it, but they accepted it whole heartedly, and they wanted it to become ever more perfect. From this frame of mind came their proposal to bind themselves by the three traditional vows.

It would take the authority of De La Salle to convince them not to press so soon for the realization of their desires. This intervention of the Founder seems to have been decisive and for the next forty years, the Brothers would not pronounce the vows of povery and chastity. With regard to the vow of obedience, it was binding for a limited but extensive time: three years, with the possibility of renewing it each year for another three-year period.

De La Salle himself, bound himself by vow, and he took his obligations to obedience very seriously! This time he was vowing obedience not to his ecclesiastical superiors, but to the superiors who were within this little community, and then soon to Brother Henry L'Heureux whom the Brothers would elect to replace him. This took place the following year, in 1687.

BROTHER SCUBILION (3)
Catechist of Slaves:
A Gospel of Freedom.

Inthe previous article in the Lasalliana, we introduced you to the Missionary, «the Brother called to those afar»: far from the big city, far from salvation. In Brother Scubilion we have found a precocious and authentic apostolic vocation, a true passion to evangelize, which burned throughout his entire life. He had been a missionary at Bourbon, La Reunion, with his Brothers, and as his Brothers, he shared their modest task as teachers and catechists. But he went further than they in the gift of himself, tormented by the desire to always do more good, which was a bit difficult to do within the framework of the school which completely ignored the world of the slaves who, we should not forget, made up half the population of the island.

So what did he do? Without any special mission, but by a true instinct for evangelization, he gave himself to the disinherited, he went to become their indefatigable catechist, also to teach them the rudiments of education. Such catechetical and elementary instruction was forbidden for slaves at that time in 1843 when he arrived in Saint-Leu, which was located in the West and which had the richest coffee and sugar cane plantations on the island, and therefore, had the biggest number of slaves. From the depths of his vocation as a Missionary Brother was born his true vocation: Catechist of the Slaves. This in the future would be his name, his identification; in due time it will become his veritable title of glory. But to understand the difficulty of his task, the obstacles and efforts to vanquish him, and to judge the merits of his apostolic work, we must study the true situation.

Slavery? Much has been written about this sin of «Christian» nations from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century, the ignoble but lucrative traffic in «ebony timber» (the black slave trade) practiced on a grand scale on slave ships, to furnish cheap manual labor for the colonies and for the cotton, sugarcane, and coffee plantations of Louisiana, the Antilles, La Reunion, and other places. That Islam preceded the Christian nations in the slavery is a historical fact but not an excuse. People can go out of their way to justify the unjustifiable even by theological reasoning, but, behind all the beautiful rhetoric, we always find the profit angle. People have tried to legalize slavery, to define the slaves' rights under the law to avoid excesses, but perhaps all they were doing was legalizing barbarism. Once the slaves arrived at their destination, they were sold like cattle, they became mere chattle of their masters, without any real rights, simply tools of labor. On the Island of La Reunion, the masters were Christians, yet they tolerated religious instruction only after working hours, that is after a burdensome day... but only if you could find some catechist who would be interested in teaching them!

Brother Scubilion was one of those. He had lived through the time of slavery. He had lived during the transition period, which was inevitable, especially around 1840, from slavery to emancipation. This emancipation, which for a long time was restrained by vested interests, finally became a reality in 1848. The courageous and persevering anti-slavery politicians (Victor Schoelcher, among them) had forced the decision; the strong influence of the Church and her missionaries assured the non-violent passage from slavery to freedom.

Among these missionaries, the Brothers, as a rule, played a more discrete role in their schools: the primary instruction of the children of settlers or free creoles. Brother Scubilion had, of course, in his little class, to rigorously steer clear of this movement and to follow the traditions of his institute. Yet it was at this time that he was going to, we might say, «invent» together with God his specific vocation. Without being disobedient, he was going to be daring. What he was going to undertake was not a chance happening, nor a passing fancy, nor a desire to be different but it was rather to be a profound faithfulness to the intuition of his Founder. In effect, he was not going to «invent» catechism for the Blacks, for Father Alexander Monet had already been the pioneer in this domain since 1840. Rather, Brother Scubilion was going to start night classes to catechize the slaves in the school itself, beginning in 1843 at Saint Leu. Without doubt he would continue to teach the lower class. But he would add to this, catechism classes for the slaves. How does one explain this change, this conversion to the Blacks? It is very simple, now that we know a little bit about Brother Scubilion. Instinctively, he had a great love for the most abandoned: his zeal, his secret longing, his quest was to enlarge the horizons of his ministry. He did not have to go very far to search for this. Numerous slaves populated the rich plantations and, we might add, made them profitable. The truly poor were not too far away: they were at the doors of the school without having an access to the school. This was no time and place for a directly evangelical type of action: go toward these outcasts. I deliberately say «go toward...» because the planters and their slave bosses, and supervisors would not look very kindly upon having their manual laborers leaving their place of work to attend catechism lessons which would lead to who-knows-what? Perhaps, in the long run this could be truly dangerous for these slaves to become conscious of a certain dignity, that of being sons of God, and to inhale a few breaths of the air of freedom.

So there we have Brother Scubilion, leaving his school, which was not very readily seen among the Brothers, to go to visit the rich colonists, to talk with them, to exhort them in the name of the Gospel and request of them a few hours of free time for their slaves. Elementary classes during the day and catechism classes for the Blacks in the evening (which would be unthinkable during working hours). There we have, to use the words of Monsignor Aubry, Bishop of Reunion, the completely devoured «Slave of the Slaves». Thus, little by little, like Saint John Baptist De La Salle, he allowed himself to be led by God, event after event, until he was totally absorbed in the service of the Blacks. For him, it was not enough just to be inclined towards the slaves, but more effectively he had to do much more: in a sense to participate in the innermost part of their distress, not as a mere pretence, but in true imitation of Christ who «took upon himself the condition of a slave». Scubilion was assimilated into them: he the free slave of Christ, taught them that they were all freemen in the Lord. This was a marvelous transformation of roles already formulated by Saint Paul: «A slave who has been called by the Lord is the Lord's free man: in the same way a free man who has been called by Christ is his slave». (I Cor. VII, 22).

To catechize the slaves was perhaps the best way of preparing them for their liberation without knowing that the time of their emancipation was now very near. It would be at Saint-Leu that he would be living with the slaves and their children on December 20, 1848, the day of the abolition of slavery. And when, in 1850, he would leave Saint-Leu for La Possession, he would find a number of freed slaves whom he would make into ardent catechists: they would be exclusively catechists to their own people, this is the epitome of the missionary vocation. For the other Brothers there were day classes; for him there were evening classes for the newly-free. This happy division of labor was not a personal whim but was a work sanctioned by his Superior, Brother John of Matha, who recognized in Brother Scubilion an evident charism for the religious education of the former slaves. This was the apostolate to which the indefatigable catechist would concentrate his maximum effectiveness. He did not allow himself any other respite or break other than to multiply elementary classes and religious instruction for the slaves. It was probably more difficult now teaching the new catechetical pupils and more difficult to assemble them than it was during their time of slavery. Now they were far from the plantations, so replete with bad memories for them. The greater majority of them were now scattered in the Highlands of the Island. He had to go looking for them, and once having found them, he had to intreat them, convince them, and finally to lead them to the evening catechism classes, during the week, and to those given on Sunday before divine office time. These were the «Apostolic excursions» of Brother Scubilion.

What should we say about the Catechesis of Brother Scubilion? Their content interests us the least. The subject matter is more or less fixed. It is the style, the manner, the art of the catechist that make the big difference. He knew marvelously well how to adapt his lessons to these simple, totally illiterate people. He knew how to teach the slaves, and later the free people, the great truths of salvation, the commandments, the Sacraments which they were called upon to receive, and the Christian prayers which were to be recited each day. Brother Scubilion made all of these ingeniously inventive. His catechism classes were lively, with dialogue, a round of questions and answers, sometimes alternated between choirs, and topped off by a refrain given by the entire class. Besides the words there was the chant: The Creed was engrained in their memories because of the natural rhythm which the Blacks have in their blood.[1] But let us listen to Brother Scubilion himself talk about his lessons in catechism:

«Yes, I was the happiest with those good former slaves, and when I was seated among them it was a place better than to be seated on the throne of the greatest monarch in the world; they listened to me speak of God as if they were listening to God Himself, speaking through my mouth. These poor unfortunate ones took great pains to learn the main truths of our holy religion. They would say to me in their own language: «I understand what you are saying to me. You tell me that there is only one God. He made me to love Him and to enter into His paradise...».

For the Saint's catechism lessons, before the Sunday office, there were sometimes as many as three hundred Freedmen who gathered around him. Then, during the first pastoral visit of Msgr. Desprez to La Possession, in 1854, «His Excellency was amazed by the success obtained by Brother Scubilion in the teaching of catechism. More than six hundred Blacks were chanting in chorus and in a most admirable manner the principal truths of our religion». And the witness continues: «His Excellency cited this as the most moving episode in his pastoral tour. Long after that he talked about it and was always pleased to hear some news about Brother Scubilion».[2]

Let us say again, that even at Sainte-Marie, during the last eleven years of his life in «active retirement», he remained the catechist of the poor up to the very end. In the territory belonging to the parish there were still a number of people who had not been evangelized. There were many among the emancipated slaves who were more or less ashamed or recalcitrant, or who just neglected being instructed and baptized, and there were others who were «hired help» who came from India, Africa, or Madagascar to work on the plantations or in the sugar mills. They were free in principle, and by law, but how unprovided for they were! Once again Brother Scubilion would travel around the countryside, visiting the sugar centrals, searching out the poor, convincing them and leading them to his night catechism classes, preparing them for baptism, and later for a Christian marriage, and for many it was only after many years of delay.

I shall finish this very long testimony about Brother Scubilion, the catechist of the slaves and emancipated, with the account given by a young Brother of 22 years who met the «old Brother» for the first time in 1865: «Brother Scubilion, I might say, took possession of me, and inspired me to devote myself to the glory of God. When I told him that I was teaching catechism to the Blacks, his already smiling face became radiant. Then he explained to me his method of teaching catechism. Then he taught me how to sing the Commandments of God and taught me the melodies of two or three religious songs which he either gave me or had me copy».

The poor people whom Brother Scubilion evangelized must have had good memories. Perhaps that is what explains why even until this day, he is still venerated by the people in La Reunion.

FOREWORD

Many of the readers of Lasalliana must have received the recent issue of "Documents and Witness" regarding "The Catholic School Throughout the World".

If you have had the curiosity and patience to read this publication, you have probably come to realize how many diverse questions Lasallian schools throughout the Institute are facing. You can get an idea about which of these problems we ought to face:

— in an individual way,

— in solidarity with all other Catholic schools.

I would simply like to underscore some of these:

1) The recognition by the various governments and the respect of freedom which Catholic schools either enjoy or are demanding. In a number of countries there are the threats of reducing or suppressing these legitimate freedoms.

2) How to maintain, or even enrich and develop a Lasallian educational plan in schools where the number of Brothers is diminishing? How to help and work along with schools which wish to remain under Lasallian inspiration and affiliation when the Brothers are no longer there or are not there? In certain regions of the Institute this case is multiplying.

3) How to continue to work "together and by association" when State contracts introduce very strong constraints in the exercise of the Brothers' teaching careers or when the employment situation within the country practically no longer permits moving from one school to another?

4) Financial aid from the State allows the Brothers to more easily admit the poorest students. This then is a positive aspect because it permits us to get back to gratuity. But how do you "proclaim the Gospel" when the schools are submitted to tight controls by the public authorities and when these demand neutrality as the counterpart to their aid?

5) The contracts with the Government also give us a professional status which can allow us to work with greater solidarity with the educational efforts of the country. Our schools then can operate as being complementary to the public schools, and no longer as being parallel to them or in opposition to them. What are the positive aspects of this collaboration? What are our contributions to the betterment of the educational system?

6) Normally, a Lasallian school is characterized by its attention to the needs of the young and to their future life and professional career. To what extent do these schools contribute to pedagogical research? What accomplishments can we show in this regard?

7) Often, the Brothers's schools enjoy an excellent reputation thanks to their organization, efficiency, and the quality education which they provide. Do we always avoid the risk of a certain complacency which such success brings? Are our schools careful about regularly evaluating their operation and pedagogy?

8) We know that the success of a school depends above all upon the quality of those who teach there. Are we careful about the training and up-dating of our teachers, lay teachers as well as Brothers? This is the key to renewal and progress.

Other questions also certainly present themselves. Lasalliana can help find some solutions to these problems by proposing some reflection on our profession and ministry, various accomplishments, and by accounts of a variety of personal and communitarian commitments to new educational endeavours.

So, we count on your fidelity and zeal to make Lasalliana known to others. THANK YOU!

With this Issue No. 9, we complete our third year of publication. See you next year!

AT PARIS, 31 MAY 1686

Soon, it will be exactly three hundred years ago that a Minim religious of great reputation, Father Nicholas Barré, reached the age of 65.

Ever since, his name has without fail continued to figure into the biographies of Saint John Baptist De La Salle. Truly, he was for our saint a trusted counselor, even though their personal contacts were not very numerous. The austerity of the Minim religious was not at all displeasing to the canon from Rheims. His initiatives in favor of the education of poor children further recommended him to the one whom God was leading to create in his home town the community which would become the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

1. Some particularly significant dates

On December 17, 1621, at Saint-Germain d'Amiens, Nicholas was baptized, the son of Louis Barré.

On January 31, 1642, in the convent of Nigeon (Paris), Nicholas Barré made his religious profession in the order of the Clerics Regular Minims of Saint Francis of Paul.

In 1643, at Place Royale in Paris, the young professed cleric began a stay which would continue on until his departure for Rouen in 1659. He had hardly been ordained in 1645 or 1646, when he was named preacher and confessor.

Here, as later in Rouen, he merited the confidence of his superiors and of his confreres in religion, under various titles as librarian, professor of philosophy, then of theology, local superior, provincial, etc..

Besides that, he would be appreciated above all as a confessor and spiritual guide.

In 1659, Father Barré was in Rouen, and he would remain there for a dozen years. It was there above all that he would become interested in the work of the schools and the training of women teachers for the various types of teaching which he advocated: elementary, trade, and Sunday schools, catechetical schools, normal schools for the training of women teachers.

In contact with Canon Nicholas Roland, with Adrien Nyel, and Madame Maillefer, he would encourage the opening of a free primary school in Rheims before working closely with John Baptist De La Salle for at least two attempts. On December 27, 1670, Françoise Duval and Anne Le Coeur, who were working in Rouen in a school for little poor girls, arrived in Reims by the order of Father Barré so that they could take charge of the good work begun by Canon Roland and which would become the "Congregation of the Holy Child Jesus" of Rheims.

In 1675, Father Barré was to return to Place Royale, Paris. It is there that John Baptist De La Salle paid him a visit more than once and especially during the years 1681-1683.

Between 1678 and 1679, at Rouen, Madame Maillefer, another benefactress of the work of Father Barré, organized the departure of Adrien Nyel, up until that time the econome general of the poor, and sent him to Rheims to open a charity school there.

In 1679, very probably in March, Adrien Nyel met Canon John Baptist De La Salle for the first time.

In 1679, or a bit later, Father Barré took a great interest in the training of some men school teachers whom he envisioned to even form a community similar to that established for the women teachers of the girls' schools, which he had brought to such a success.

This plan is clearly affirmed in the texts. It is more difficult to find out what point of success it had reached. The teachers had, without doubt, considered themselves as followers of Father Barré. Yet, it seems that they did not really form a "community".

In 1685, the Statutes and Regulations of the Christian and Charitable schools of the Holy Infant Jesus were published in Paris. This draft was planned and drafted by the women teachers even if once or again explicit mention was made of men teachers to whom it would equally apply. Such a reference is already found in the complete title of the pamphlet. It is not found in another draft of the "statutes", which remained in manuscript form and which seems to have appeared in the year 1677.

In 1687, a work was published in Paris, entitled, Meditations for the Teaching Sisters of the Charity Schools of the Holy Infant Jesus, of the Late Rev. Father Barré, Minim, Principally for the Time of their Retreat and their Spiritual Exercises, on the Principal Duties of their State; Which can Serve also for all Men and Women School Teachers to Make them Aware of the Importance and the Obligations of their Profession. By R.P.P. Giry, Exprovincial of the Minims and Director of the Same Institute.

In 1694 the work, An Abridgment of the History of the Institution of the Charity Schools of Father Barré... Spiritual Maxims of Reverend Father Barré was published in Paris.

In 1697, also in Paris, appeared the work, Spiritual Letters of Reverend Father Nicholas Barré, a Religious of the Order of Minims.

2. Barré and De La Salle

The first information that we have is that of Brother Bernard when he mentions Nicholas Barré in his account of the "Admirable conduct of Divine Providence in the person of the Venerable Servant of God, John Baptist De La Salle". (Cahiers Lasalliens 4, which reproduced the manuscript of Brothers Bernard after a copy date of 1722).

Brother Bernard, who wrote in 1721, was aware of the existence of the Congregation of teaching women which Barré had been the soul of until his death thirty-five years earlier. He twice recalls that Barré dreamed not only of the education of young girls but he wanted to join to this work men teachers whom he would train for boys' schools.

"Having happily succeeded in the schools for young girls, he wrote, those which he had established for boys in several places and above all in Saint-Gervais, where he had six teachers, were not, in fact, very successful; for the teachers were so disorganized that soon they succumbed to all kind of disorders and all of them left, one after the other (Bd. p. 37).

Bernard was not a historian by profession; but he was able to discover and present a certain number of "memoires" concerning events which he himself had not known personally. Sometimes he expresses himself rather awkwardly; but his unpretentious style is perhaps the best guarantee of the respect with which he treated some sources. If we indeed cannot ask him to give here a perception of all the initiatives which De La Salle may owe to those of his predecessors, we cannot help but appreciate the veracity with which the Brother biographer recounts the two interventions of Father Barré in close associatio,n with the Canon of Rheims.

The cause of beatification and canonization of Father Nicholas Barré being at the threshold of the Roman Congregation for Saintly Causes, a thick volume of XC-618 pages contains the efforts to gather together all that might serve to justify the introduction of this cause. The wish to be thorough is seen all throughout the 700 pages of this "Positio". But it falls short of having all the "proofs" given being of equal value. They would have to be approached with a sound critical spirit, especially perhaps in what concerns a claimed continuity between some Parisian school teachers pertaining to Barré and the disciples of De La Salle.

There is no doubt, that directly and through intermediaries, John Baptist De La Salle got wind of the educational work founded by Nicholas Barré. Also, without doubt, at one time or another, some thin connection could be made between certain passages in the writings of the two founders. Perhaps the most remarable note of the apparent connection could be found in some of the spiritual maxims of one and the other. And it could be said that this spirituality of abandonement to Divine Providence which so deeply marked the existence of these two men was of their initiative and their apostolic endeavours!

But all this must be re-set within a much larger context before trying to establish a connection between two works which could have benefitted each other by helps other than those held on to by the authors of the "Positio".

3. Two decisive moments in the life of De La Salle

A few precise points given by Bernard fortunately confirm the role played more than once by Father Barré in the beginning of De La Salle's work. De La Salle was examining himself then on the meaning of the renouncement which God seemed to be asking of him.

"Seeing, says Bernard, that he had rented the house for the teachers for only a year and a half, that is, until the feast of Saint John the Baptist of the year 1681, six months before the end of the lease, he hesitated about continuing to rent a house for them or to lodge them in his own house so that he could look after their conduct more closely and have them lead a more regulated life... In this perplexity, God furnished him with an opportunity of making a trip to Paris for certain affairs. He took advantage of this to go to visit Reverend Father Barré who at that time was at the convent of the Reverend Fathers Minims at the Place Royale. He related to him all that had transpired in Rheims with regard to the school masters. This worthy son of Saint Francis of Paul, full of experience, did not hestitate in a similar predicament and at once advised De La Salle to let the school masters live with him in his own house". (Bd pp. 36-37).

The Canon hesitated no longer. When the lease expired, the following June 24, he received the teachers under his own roof. This was the beginning of a common life which would lead him ever more strictly to share the conditions of some young men who had been recruited, however too quickly, to run the three schools in Rheims. And a modern commentator has remarked: The fact that De La Salle lived among his first companions had to be the determining factor in the birth of a true comunity. His position as a secular priest allowed him to do what Father Barré, a religious minim, could not have envisioned for himself. Obliged to live apart from the teachers, he would not be able to assure them of the support of his presence and of a type of formation which was indispensable for them.

But De La Salle had the means. Should he use it for "founding" schools and above all his community of teachers? Many of his friends advised him to do so. But, Bernard continues,

"He was dissuaded from this by Reverend Father Barré whom he often saw when going from time to time from Rheims to Paris, and who told him that he should not fund the schools, because, when Our Lord Jesus Christ said in the Gospels: the foxes have their dens and the birds of the air have their nests but the Son of man has not where to lay his head, he meant by the foxes the people of the world who are attached to the goods of this earth, by the birds of the air, the religious who have their own little cells, but those who set out to establish schools should have the same lot as the Son of man". (Bd p. 48).

This paraphrasing of this text of the Gospel could very easily be rejected, but the council was clear, and De La Salle resolved to follow it, he would sacrifice his canonry and personal fortune. Again, Father Barrré led De La Salle down the narrow path. He shared not only the daily existence of the first Brothers, but voluntarily, he chose the poverty or at least the insecurity which would in the future be their common lot:

"This community, De La Salle would later write, is at present founded on nothing else but Providence". (Treatise on the Habit).

And this "at present" would last for the entire lifetime of De La Salle. No matter how decisive they may have been during these early years, these directives of Father Barré do not warrant making of the religious Minim a true "spiritual director" of the canon of Rheims. Bernard and other biographers furthermore are quite explicit in this regard when they make, and with what authority, this director intervene in the transactions of La Salle in renouncing his canonry.

A simple counselor, if you will, Father Barré is not less than one of those who helped John Baptist De La Salle the most and best in recognizing what was "the will of God in his regard", this will which, on his death bed, our holy Founder would adore in all things.

DE LA SALLE'S DEALINGS WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF HIS TIME (1)

Contrary to what often appears in works concerning schools for the poor, it is not true that Louis XIV was not interested in charity schools and purely and simply left them up to the Church and her clergy. It is certainly true that the royal authority delegated the right and the mission of supervising the elementary schools of the cities to the bishops and precentors, who were the forerunners of our present day Diocesan Directors of Schools. Yet, the King, religiously consecrated in the cathedral of Rheims, held the highest authority over all school matters. It was the royal authority which, by an edict of December 1606 (article 14), periodically renewed, required the school teachers to have the approval of the parish priest or of the ecclesiastic in charge of such matters. But in case of a disagreement, each party had a right to appeal to the king for justice. The royal justice alone decided definitively. We are limiting ourselves here to the scholastic period during which John Baptist De La Salle lived.

1. The King or the church?

There is a royal edict, registered by the Parliament of Paris, 12 January 1686, which requires that children of Protestants "between the ages of five and sixteen" should be placed with the Catholic families of their relatives, if they have any. If they do not have any Catholic relativies, then the judge will assign them to families which will rear them. It was Louis XIV who asked the bishop to increase the number of gratuitous schools in their dioceses and drew the necessary funds for their support and development from the revenues derived from the assets of the Protestants who had emigrated. It was he who gave the orders on 13 December 1698 that men and women teachers should be assigned to "all the parishes where none yet exist, for the instruction of children", and especially for the children of former Protestants, and that they should be taught catechism as well as the reading of scripture. He specifies that teachers' annual salary should be guaranteed by local taxes. Article 10 of this "Declaration" specifies that school attendance will be obligatory "until the age of 14", without prejudice, however, to the right of families to hire their own tutors.[1]

After 1651, in fact, Louis XIV reigned as an absolute monarch. Theoretically, all the legislative, executive, judiciary, and financial authority and even the possibility of operating within the religious domain, depended on him. Let us, therefore, not be too hasty in blaming the Church for certain situations which she rarely had complete control over in the seventeenth century.

2 — The interventions of Louis XIV and of Louis XV

All appearances to the contrary, the royal authority was implemented by intermediaries who strangely rendered them democratic. These were the people "elected" by regions, those who bought parliamentary seats as one would today pay to study law or would buy a law office, the "Assembly of clergy", town magistrates or councilors, always elected, the "notables" of the parishes, etc. who proposed the decisions to be taken or presented their "objections". Often some or other of these people were not restrained from implementing the point of their objection, with the understanding that it would eventually get royal approval. In fact, everyone thought that a decision could not be judged good and therefore liable to approval unless it was first put into a life experience to demonstrate that it was worthwhile.

If it was not easier to approach the king to ask a favor of him than it is today to personally ask a favor of the President or one of his ministers, still everything went up to him. They got all the way up to him the same way as the execution of royal decisions passed through a number of intermediaries who could, if they so wished, cause some difficulties. The State Secretaries, military governors, managers, all had their little say. It was essentially through such intermediaries that John Baptist De La Salle approached Louis XIV and the future Louis XV when he was still a child.

2.1. Financially. Louis XIV considered as normal the annual salary of 150 pounds for men teachers in the charity schools and only 100 pounds for lady teachers. To maintain the same purchasing power in spite of inflation, Louis XV would raise this amount up to 250 and 200 pounds. La Salle accepted these financial conditions in the contracts for his founding gratuitous schools. This was with this provision however: each time that four classes were founded, he would have to provide the school with a fifth Brother without asking the least remuneration for him. This "extra" Brother was intended as an assurance of the school's continuity when a teacher is sick or to oversee the entire school and assuming its direction. This revolutionary pedagogical innovation was possible only because of the vow of poverty which the Brothers obliged themselves to follow, in 1694, "to live on bread alone" rather than require the pupils to pay.[2]

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Blain declares with reason that Louis XIV did his utmost to multiply gratuitous schools all throughout his reign. He was a witness to this effort. At Calais, upon the insistence of the magistrates, the king ordered the financial services to pay the Brothers 450 pounds a year, which was the salary of three teachers. It was Louis XIV who offered them the land needed for the construction of a school. At Boulogne-sur-mer, also, the land for the school was provided by the royal authority.[3] At Alès and at Fontainebleau, it was likewise the king's order which guaranteed the financing of the teachers. In the first city, the funds were raised by the "clipping" tax levied against land owners. In the second, a capital of 10,000 pounds was raised to provide the annual payment of 500 pounds for two Brothers who would be provided for a Lasallian school. This latter school was not opened until after the death of the King, but without him it would not have become a reality so soon.[4]

Under the Regency, the proposed payments to the Brothers of Calais seemed to have been forgotten. A renewal by royal decree was often needed after the death of a monarch to preserve the executive binding force. Also, after the time Louis XV had reached his majority, the requisite funds were again blocked. It was he again who stood up to the various enemies of the Lasallian schools, within his Council, to award "Letters Patent" to the Brothers. These conferred a legal personality with the right to receive legacies and to acquire property. Louis XV did even more: he gave his agreement to the Pontifical Bull which approved the Institute. He pressured the Parliament to register it. As usual, a cascade of intermediaries came into play in both cases, but the will of the King and strong arguments overcame their opposition.

2.2. Pedagogically and Morally, Louis XIV on many occasions moved the bishop of France in general, an sometimes certain bishops in particular, to watch over the continuance of the separation of boys and girls in the schools. He also took many measures to see that the ecclesiastics could never be suspected of the least familiarity with young women. Louis XV acted in the same way.[5] The pupils who learned to write in the charity schools were sometimes between 12 and 14 years old. The men and women teachers held their hand to guide it. Even in the Lasallian schools, in this field, the method could not help but be individual, after a more or less collective instruction. This sociological context with its moral and psychological consequences, hardly concerns us today except, perhaps, with regard to instructing illiterate adults. We would have to take this into consideration in our evaluation if we want to understand the advice and prudence of the king.

On the other hand, the question of the liberty of conscience, at this distance, seems to have been misguided. In the area of Cévenol, the number of former Protestants who had become "new Catholics" after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, was quite large. The children were baptized as soon as their parents had declared that they were renouncing Protestantism. These were the children whom the king obliged to attend the Brothers' gratuitous Christian schools in Alès, Mende, and Vans. The governors, administrators, and local authorities were pressured into having the royal decrees respected. The Protestants — it is too often forgotten — retained the right to rear their children in Protestantism because the legislation imposed fidelity to Catholic convictions only upon those who said that they no longer belonged to the "Pretended Reformed Religion". In fact, there was a lot of hypocrisy in all of that: not all the children thought, at the age of 12-14, as their parents. The catechesis of the Brothers in a milieu so disturbed by the general insincerity was not easy. The royal pressure, with its financial sanctions (fines) or its transfers of parental authority to the judiciary authority (placing chilren in homes) only increased the difficulties of evangelization and of a true Catholic education.

2.3. The king also worked through intermediaries who were anxious to please him or at least to please personalities who had a great influence over him. Thus, Achille de Harlay, President of the Parliament of Paris, did not even for a moment dream of displeasing Madame Maintenon, whom Louis XIV called "his firmness" when she wrote to him on July 3, 1698 (or 1699 'it is not certain').[6] "Sir... I am not afraid to make a recommendation to you today in behalf of the charitable schools of the parish of Saint Sulpice... The men and women teachers sometimes cause trouble there... I therefore, beseech you, sir, to procure the relief of the parish priest of St. Sulpice".

It was thus that La Salle won the case which was filed against him under the pretext that he was receiving gratuitously children who were not entirely poor. He absolutely refused to follow the demands of custom which would make his schools into ghettos reserved for the poor. This was a radical innovation because it made the least cultivated pupils come into frequent contact and conversation with the favored class of pupils who had come to profit by the exemplary educational value of his schools.

A short time after the interventions of Madame de Maintenon, Louis XIV who was protecting the Irish friends of the king of England who had been expelled from their country by an anti-Catholic persecution, asked Cardinal de Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, to look after the education of some fifty immigrant children. The usual cascade of influence poured down from one level to another. The Cardinal passed on the request to the parish priest, and he, in his turn, referred the matter to De La Salle. Financially, it was evidently the royal treasury which re-imbursed the parish priest for the advances which he had to make.[7]

In 1709, "by order of the king", the Duke du Maine, the illegitimate son of Madame de Montespan and of Louis XIV, grandmaster of the artillery and lieutenant general of the army, gave the Center for the Training of Country Teachers, which had just been established at Saint-Denis near Paris, the gracious permission to allow passing troops to be lodged there. It is known also that his mother, who died in 1707 after many long years spent far from the temptations of the Court, had greatly shown her devotion for the thousand children who, about 1698, attended the Brothers' schools in the parish of Saint Sulpice in Paris.[8] More than strict regulations, more than legislation, often enough quite flexible, it was human relations which allowed institutions to be established and to prosper. In this regard. La Salle is seen to be at one and the same time a prudent and determined founder and a polished diplomat, very sure of his arguments based on experience as well as on strict reasoning.

DE LA SALLE'S DEALINGS WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF HIS TIME (2)

3 — The role of the administrators

After the king, there were Administrators of provinces who served as relayers of the central authority. On the 31 provinces, only ten Administrators, or one-third, were involved with Lasallian activities. These implemented royal ordinances. Such implementation did not always truly reflect the intention of the king. Thus, at Macon and at Moulins, the local authorities obstructed the wish of Louis XIV of extending the benefits of free elementary education to the entire French population. But at Guise, the Administrator obliged the municipality to support the school of the Brothers. At Calais, the Administrator Bignon implemented the royal decision of an annual disbursement of 450 pounds to the Brothers. At Boulogne-sur-mer, the sub-delegate of the Administrator used his personal rights and his own authority, to establish a second poor school for the sons of sailors. At Saint-Yon, it was a visit by the Administrator, accompanied by the First President of the Parliament of Normandy, which permitted the Brothers to pursue their educational work jointly for the most needy of the region and the children of merchants capable of paying tuition. At Mende and Alès, Lamoignon de Basville, the Administrator got the bishop to develop Catholic schools to permit these schools to receive, without any restrictions, all the children of the "new converts" whom the royal ordinances constrained to attend Catholic schools. The Brothers were limited to accepting the children presented by those parents who were forced to do so by the constraints of the law. They did this with great care to educate these children with all pedagogical and catechetical independence.

At Vans, in the diocese of Uzes, it was again the Administrator Basville who paid a visit to the little village in order to assure himself that a peaceful climate existed between the "former" Protestants and the Brothers' schools. Sad to say, the conversions were not sincere. The families asked the Brothers to treat their children, who were baptized Catholics, "as if" they were still Calvinists. The Brothers put up with this, believing rather naively in the supposition of the sincerity of their conversion. Here we can see the distortion between the sociological position taken and deeply-felt convictions. This reminds us of Vatican Council II speaking about the freedom of conscience. Consciences are always individual. It is at the age of seven, canonically defined as the ordinary time for reaching that age of reason, that "freedom of conscience" is born.[9]

4 — The role of the governors

Of the 39 territories ruled by Governors which existed between 1679 and 1719, twelve of them availed themselves of the services of John Baptist De La Salle and his Brothers. In 1705, at Dijon, it was the principal officer of the Governor of Bourgogne, who was in charge of the military, who settled on the spot the disputes between the royal administration and the local population. The tactics of Louis XIV were actually very centralized. It consisted of inviting the great Lords who theoretically governed the provinces to Versailles and then finding some pretext for keeping them there. Thus their local representatives would have to refer back to Versailles for all important decisions. When it was a question of Dijon setting up a Lasallian school, the officer in charge, Claude Rigolley, personally intervened with his authority. But, financially, he did not have to appeal for public funds because he relied upon his own personal contributions.

It was quite different with Armand de Béthune, lieutenant general of the government of Picardie. Thanks to his intervention with the royal authority, the city of Calais easily obtained both the authorization and the funds necessary to introduce the Brothers of the Christian Schools in the city. When the Jansenists' disputes broke out following the precise doctrinal definitions of the Bull Unigenitus (1713), it was the Governor of Calais who defended the Brothers who were opposed by certain members of the clergy hostile to Rome.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

In the same city, it was the Marquis de Collemberg who defended the Brothers. He represented the Duke of Aumont, the legal Governor whom the king kept at Versailles. He did not contribute his personal fortune but all the public services which he directed. Among these, he favored the creation of a second school which had become necessary because of the success of the first school. Plans were drawn up. A location was chosen for the new establishment. Certain materials were given without charge. All of this was done with the collaboration of La Salle himself.[10]

Conclusion

Tis quick examination allows us to conclude:

a) Contrary to the contentions of Marxist theorists, Roland Mousnier has clearly demonstrated that the society of the seventeenth century was not a "class society" rigidly and unchangeably fixed by exclusively economic barriers, but it was rather "an ordered society". Individuals were differentiated, in fact, not by the laws of economics, but by a hierarchical order which was based on the differences of functions among those who prayed (the clergy and religious), those who worked (the bourgeois and common people) and those who defended the country and maintained peace (the nobility). The king was "the father" to one and all.

b) This hierarchical society permitted social progression for the betterment of living conditions. This was an amelioration which supposed instruction and an apprenticeship, theoretical and practical knowledge, without forgetting the "know-how" of good manners to which La Salle paid so much attention for he knew that it was indispensable to all social mobility.

c) In a context marked by a fierce fight among various trades and professions as well as among privileges of all kinds, La Salle did not want his Brothers to benefit either by the "privileges" of the clergy or by those enjoyed by "religious with solemn vows", or by those of the nobility. He wanted them to be like the poor people with whom they worked, without excluding those who were not so bad off, all of whom were immersed in the mass of the French populace.

d) Instead of relying primarily on alms from the people or on rich benefactors, the Saint demanded of the local, regional, and national authorities the amounts which the State, and each city had the social obligation of giving to the poor schools which wanted to be gratuitous without the civil authorities intervening into the religious domain and without interfering with the free choice of parents in their God given right, by natural law concerning their responsibilities toward their children. See also Blain (Cl 7 and 8), t. I, Page 81, 372; t. II, p. 53. It is important to point out that the harsh edict of January 1686, starting with the error on the number of Protestants remaining in France without any desire of being converted to Catholicism, was hardly applicable. Consequently, from the month of May, Louis XIV wrote to the Administrator of Paris instructing him to no longer speak about "Protestants" but only about "new Catholics", in order to get him to observe the edict about their attending school. If one neglects this most important fact, then later decisions, which were less radical than the initial official legislation forebode, could no longer be understood.

THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (10): CONCERNING CORRECTIONS (2)

1 — An Overview

> "The correction of students is one of the most consequential aspects of the Schools and concerning which much care should be taken that it be administered properly and with good results, not only on the part of the one receiving it, but on the part of the one administering it as well; for this reason there are many procedures to be observed if the use of punishment in the schools. We will speak about these in the following articles, after having explained the necessity of joining kindness with firmness regarding the conduct of children". (Cahier Lasallien 24 - Page 140).

Schools where Good Order and Meaningful Work Prevail

The entire second part of the Management of Schools is devoted to the following theme: "Means of establishing and maintaining order in the schools".

This insistence on establishing and maintaining order without doubt gives the early Lasallian schools a severe and rigorous image. Games, enjoyment, play, etc. did not seem to have a very big role here.

A text to get the setting in time

It will be sufficient to observe what is practiced today in various countries or what we learn from the history of education, to be convinced that the idea of school discipline and recourse to certain punishments depend essentially on what is practiced in this sphere among the people in general and particularly in the family.

The school cannot but help being a reflection or echo of society and its mentality. To mention it is not to render a value judgement.

It seems to me, however, important that there be a homogeneity between the school's system of punishment and that of the society, if not, the child would be disorientated or would favor attending that institution which he feels is the most favorable. It can easily be verified that a permissive society engenders a school with liberal discipline; a liberal milieu brings about a let-them-do-as-they-please school atmosphere, etc. Thus, the concept of authority and the ways this authority is exercised are revealed. It is the education of the child's personality which comes into play here.

"The Management of Schools" does not escape this school-society inter-relationship. The history of education and the scholastic iconography of the seventeenth century often present us with teachers as possessors of a discipline which they are supposed to exercise without weakness. Their main teaching aid is often the whip or the rod, symbols and instruments of their authority. "Corporal punishment" is taken for granted, but they can be substituted for by an arsenal of reprimands, punishments, penances, dismissal, etc.. It even seems that certain teachers abused these sanctions to the point of discouraging some pupils from attending their classes regularly. This was one of the reasons for the instability of the schools of this period. The rough character of certain pupils, the poor organization of the school, the occasions of mutually dragging out the time between one lesson and another, etc., were, without doubt, excuses for such conduct. It would be hypocritical to be shocked today by an authority which seemed to be so natural to the parents of that period.

It is, therefore, in such a context that the chapter "On Corrections" in the Management of Schools must be read. However, the topic must have preoccupied the authors of this work because they devote to it no fewer than 40 pages, after having spent only 2 pages "On Rewards".

The following is the dilemma in which John Baptist De La Salle and the first Brothers who produced the Management faced:

— How to establish sufficient discipline in school to have the good order necessary for serious work;

— All the while avoiding any abuse of punishments which would so discourage the pupils that they would quit school?

This discipline also contains various considerations regarding the personality of the child; respecting him as a child of God, touching and winning his heart, making him see the punishment as being just and accepting it as coming from God.

This is why, these forty pages contain an abundance of explanations and precautions which clearly try to show how to prevent devious conduct on the part of the pupils so that they do not have to be punished. It is interesting to recall briefly the scope of this reflection and that it remains strongly instructional for us today.

A brief description of possible punishments

In view of assuring order and maintaining discipline in class, the Management proposes to the teachers five kinds of sanctions for possible trouble makers.

"The faults of children can be corrected in several different ways: 1. By reprimands; 2. By penances; 3. By the ferule. 4. By the rod. 5. By expulsion from school". (Cahier Lasallien 24 - Page 144).

• By reprimands:

As one of the principal rules of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is to speak rarely in their schools (Page 145):

— the use of reprimands ought to be very rare,
— it seems even much better not to use them at all,
— threats should be used only with great circumspection,
— If a threat is given, it is necessary to punish without pardon, for simple threats would not be effective, — and threats should be usually by signs, although it might be possible to speak to certain pupils in a strong manner in view of intimidating them.

• By Punishment:

"The use of punishment will be more usual in the Schools than corrections, they dishearten the pupils less, cause less pain to the parents and will be a lot more useful". (Page 174).

Punishments should play a curative role and even sometimes a preventive one. They should never be given with ridicule, should not be limited to mere words, and should be administered without disturbing the silence or good order of the class, and without wasting time. They should be give principally to those repeatedly late, those distracted during the prayers, catechism or Mass, those who make mistakes in reading, those not following the lesson, who show negligence in the writing exercises, have a bad posture, lack proper decorum during the religious office, have not learned their catechism, or have not fulfilled the duties of their "office" well, etc.. In the these circumstances the punishment should fit the fault committed. However, "The penance which would be the most appropriate and the most useful is to give the pupils something to learn by heart". (Page 179).

• By the ferule:

"The ferule is an instrument consisting of two pieces of leather sewn together. It is about from ten to twelve inches in length, including the handle, and ends in an oval of two inches in diameter. The inside of this oval is stuffed, so that it will not be completely flat but somewhat rounded on the outside". (Page 146).

The teacher can have recourse to the ferule when the pupil has not followed the lesson or is fooling around, when he has arrived late for class, when he has not obeyed the first signal, or for other similar reasons, that is to say, not too serious.

It is prescribed that the teacher should give only one blow, never more than two, on the left hand so as not to bother the writing hand, and never to one who has a bad hand, to avoid further injury.

• By the rod:

the reasons justifying recourse to this correction are:
— for not wishing to obey,
— for the habit of not following or not studying one's lessons,
— for scribbling in the notebook instead of writing there,
— for fighting in school or in the street,
— for not having prayed in church,
— for lacking decorum during the catechism lesson or at mass,
— for being absent from school, Mass, or the Sunday catechism lesson.

Still, it is important to have recourse to such corrections with the greatest moderation and presence of mind, without allowing one's self to get carried away by "passion". The punishment is ordinarily three blows, and never more than five without the particular order of the Director.

• By expulsion from School: This is the supreme punishment. It ought to be rare and justifiable.

"One can, and sometimes must, dismiss pupils from school; "Pupils may be, and sometimes ought to be, sent away from school; but this should be done only upon the advice of the Brother Director. Those who should be sent away are the dissolute who are capable of ruining others; those who absent themselves often from school, from the Parochial Mass or from Catechism on Sundays and holy days through the fault of their parents, and with whom it is becoming a habit; the incorrigible, that is to say, those who, after having been corrected a great number of times, do not amend their conduct. It should, however, be an extraordinary occurrence to send a pupils away from school". (Page 148-149).

In Summary

It is necessary to act

"in such a way that you are firm in order to get the desired results but gentle in the way you achieve it; you should act in such a way that it is evident that it is a great act of charity, accompanied by zeal, you must have great perseverance, without allowing, however, the children to try getting away without being punished or letting them do as they well please, for in such matters there should be no gentleness; you must know that gentleness consists in never allowing any harshness or anything whatsoever that savors of anger or passion appear in your reprimands, but showing therein the gravity of a father, a compassion full of tenderness, and of a certain gentleness, which must be, however, lively and efficacious; let it be made clearly to appear by the teacher who rebukes or punishes that it is a species of necessity and that it is out of zeal for the common good that he does so". THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS (11)
CONCERNING CORRECTIONS (2)

2 — How not to punish

"If it is desirable that a school be well regulated and in very good order, then punishments must be rare". (Page 149).

1) Some preventive means:

It seems that it is the teacher who is the cause of the need and frequency of corrections in the class because of the way he conducts the group, how he exercises his authority, and by showing mediocre teaching methods. This is why the Management affirms:

"To avoid frequent punishment, which are a source of great disorder in a school, it is necessary to note well that it is silence, restraint and watchfulness on the part of the teacher that establish and maintain good order in a class, and not harshness and blows. A constant effort must be made to act with skill and ingenuity in order to keep the pupils in order while making almost no use of punishments". (Pages 149-150).

Other means are likewise pointed out:

— do not always use the same method, for you run the risk of having the pupils get used to them

— however, in this regard, if a teacher wishes to make some innovations, he should first have his ideas approved by the Brother Director.

— If circumstances should constrain him to have recourse to "extraordinary punishments", then he must receive authorization for such:

"and for this reason they will defer them, which is, at the same time, a very proper thing to do, in order to have enough time for thinking about it beforehand and to give more weight to the punishment; thus causing it to leave a greater impression on the minds of the pupils". (Page 150).

2) Concerning dissuasive conditions:

"In order to be useful to the pupils, punishments should be accompanied by the following ten conditions."

The Cahier Lasallien 24, pages 151 to 152 can be consulted to find these ten conditions which are simply mentioned here. Punishments ought to be:

— Pure and disinterested, that is to say, administered for elevated and religious motives — Inspired by pure charity: "He who loves well, chastizes well".
— Just, and should appear so to the eyes of the pupils;
— Appropriate to the fault committed;
— Moderate, that is, neither too light nor too strong;
— Given and received calmly;
— Prudent and free from any subsequent anger by the pupil;
— Voluntarily accepted by the pupil who recognizes his fault;
— Respectful on the part of the pupil who receives it with submission;
— Silent, both on the part of the pupil and that of the teacher.

The needs prerequisite to each punishment are then very numerous. Before punishing, we must take these into consideration before punishing and we should recognize that punishment should be a last resort and one almost impossible to avoid.

It is significant to likewise note the religious and moral components which enter into account. In the seventeenth century, in the schools, one meted out punishment as exercising God's authority. Those who broke the laws were indebted toward God because they compromised their own perfection and also gave bad example.

On the personal plane, it should be understood that correction ought to show the self-mastery both of the one receiving it and of the one dispensing it. The subjective elements of the desire for revenge, anger, passion, or indignation and resentment, should never come into play. This self-mastery is one of the essential objects of education, in particular in the search "of good manners and Christian politeness", as the title of another work of De La Salle indicates.

Accordingly, the punishment should never sever the good relationship existing between the teacher and pupils, nor their mutual affection.

3) Punishing with discernment:

This chapter on punishments also contains an article concerning "Children who should not be punished". It is an attempt at a psychopedagogical differentiation, which was the result of prolonged observation and the experience of the Brothers who re-edited the "Management".

"There are five faults which ordinarily must not go by without punishment, 1. lying, 2. fighting, 3. stealing, 4. impurity, 5. poor behaviour in church".

The Management next gives some explanations of each of these five "vices". Still, it can be easily seen that these deal with "relational" conduct and not with personal conduct: these failings concern either pupils or God. Here again, the idea of "good example" re-appears as it does so often in the Management. Each student, as well as the teacher himself, must unceasingly give good example in his relations with others and in the worship he is called upon to render to God.

It is for this reason also that penances or punishments should be given and administered publicly, for they have an "exemplary" value. It is precisely this exemplary-value which justifies the unbending attitude expressed in this paragraph.

On the contrary, the psychological observation ought to dissuade one from punishing certain pupils if it is judged that the punishment would be ineffective or even would lead to negative consequences for the child. Thus, one should avoid punishing:

— stubborn and ill-bred pupils who could be brazen, insolent, haughty, or frivolous.
— The stubborn who resist or murmur.
— Excessively timid children and those who are meek, dull, or pampered by their parents..
— Children who are sick, the smallest ones in the class, new-comers who are not yet familiar with the set up in the school.

Definitely, here we run the risk of having a large number of pupils "exempt" from punishment. It is very interesting, in the context of the period in which the Management was written, to examine the reasons which are given each time to justify these exemptions. It shows that the teacher ought to develop, through a series of empirical observations, what we would call a psycho-pedagogy.

4) Faults to be avoided in punishments:

Still, sometimes necessity obliges a teacher to correct certain pupils. However, in view of avoiding any abuse, error, or over-haste, it is fitting that certain rules of prudence be respected. On reading article 4 on Corrections, one can see more than fifteen elements to be taken into consideration:

— Judge whether or not the punishment will be advantageous for the pupils and his companions.
— If possible, and after consulting the Director, see if the punishment could be deferred.
— Be sure that the punishment will in no way be harmful to the pupil concerned.
— Be sure that it does not lead to disorder in the class nor cause such bitterness at home, that the child will quit school.
— Examine yourself to be sure that you are not led by a certain aversion or lack of esteem for the one about to be punished.
— Do no correct after the pupil has shown a lack of respect or out of spite.
— Do not talk to the pupils too familiarly when meting out punishment nor use language which is too domineering.
— Do not use any words which are injurious or unbecoming.
— Do not use any other punishments that those planned.
— Moderate your anger and do not strike the pupil on the head.
— Do not exceed the number of blows authorized.
— Do not make any swift punishment, nor when moved by anger or impatience.
— Do not permit or allow any unbecoming posture, etc..

It is quite evident that the teacher who respects the prerequisite conditions, who exempts certain categories of pupils, who has enough self-mastery to respect the above rules, should not have too many occasions for punishing!

5) Instructions on moderation

The preceding phrase finds its confirmation in some passages of the Management. In fact, here are some definite ones:

— That the ferule should not be used more than three times in a half-day, in a class of less than fifty pupils, "and to be used the third time, there would have to be some extraordinary reason". (Page 149).
— That usually only one blow should be give, with a maximum of two, and always on the left hand so as not to interfere with the pupil's writing, and never to any pupil who has an injured hand.
— That the rod should not be given more than three or four times a month, and generally three blows, or five, at the most.
— That a teacher who is less than 21 years of age cannot use the rod without the permission of the Director or whoever else is in charge of the school. Such a person should watch closely what goes on in the schools and should report to the Director twice a week.
— That teachers who are over 21 are subject to the same prohibition during the probationary period of six months and during the entire first year of teaching.

In conclusion

The wealth of precautions very evidently show that the teacher ought to really examine himself when he finds himself confronted with the question of punishments.

The essential thing is in the conducting of the class and in the affirmation of a serene and balanced authority. I do not think that anyone could speak about the first Brothers having a repressive pedagogy, for the Preface of the Management exhorts them in the following way:

"The Brothers will apply themselves with great care to being faithful to observe all that is contained and prescribed for them herein, persuaded that they will have order in class only to the extent that they are exact in not omitting anything, and that they receive this book as being their gift from God, through the instrumentality of their superiors and principal Brothers of the Institute". THE "CONDUCT" WAS BORN IN LIFE

«If I had but known...»

V.O.

Not an exception

These words that Canon Blain has put in the mouth of St. John Baptist De La Salle are indicative of his conduct as founder and of his complete abandonment to the hands of Divine Providence. The full river that the Institute came to be began to flow in that quiet parlor of the College of the Most Holy Infant Jesus.

The daily happening, through his entire life, culminated in the royal and the pontifical recognition of his Institute.

The code of rules which he left to his sons, the Brothers, was begun with a pen dipped in the inkwell of the daily duties fulfilled in the very lives the ones for whom the rules were intended. It was set to writing only after having been fixed by innumerable experiences and even then was left open to further and well-thought out amendments.

La Salle wanted the Conduct to be what the Rules were for the Brothers. Like the Rules the*Conduct* was written by students and teachers in their everyday fulfillment of classroom duties; it took on shape in "the experiences over several years of the Brothers who were the most competent in the classroom". All that it contained had been tried out by them and proven effective. They constantly weighed the advantages and inconveniences of what was prescribed. The founder himself approved the revisions and adaptations whenever they were shown to be necessary; a measure dictated by the changing circumstances of place and time.

It begins with life itself

Contrary to today's practice, the Conduct required the student to know how to read both French and Latin correctly before he would begin to write. Shouldn't we transpose this practice to the revision of the Conduct?

Life speaks to us though living beings. We have to learn to read it in those signs. Humanity wrote down the signs and gestures many centuries after they existed in fact.

The Conduct, like a precious stone, was prised from the quarry of life. Many years of experience went by in which teachers practiced in the classroom what was later put down on paper. Before the regulation, was the practice; before theory, experience; before the inert letter, student life. Such was the ordinary procedure of De La Salle.

Vital structure

The reader who looks for an organized treatise on pedagogical principles in the Conduct will end by being disappointed. The same thing will occur to the one who looks for subtle disquisitions on theory and methods of teaching in the Conduct.

But what is found by an attentive reader is the organism of a being which is quickened by a collective soul and the vivifying breath which that soul has given it. Such is the structure of the Conduct; the vigorous life that flows through each of its pages.

Open the first chapter with "The entrance of the students in the School and the beginning of class": this is school life as it begins each morning. In an uninterrupted litany it goes on to describe in detail all that the students must do, until it arrives at the matter of the following chapter.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The second chapter is devoted to "Breakfast and the Morning Snack": These are pages enlivened with the responsibility,liberty and social participation of the scholars.

After their breakfast, they continue with "Reading", which is the third chapter and which is described in the most minute detail. It goes on to specify all the prescriptions for "Writing" with the same attention to the least detail. "Arithmetic" and "Penmanship" are the subjects of the fifth and sixth chapters respectively.

The seventh chapter, entitled "Prayer" goes on to ennumerate all the occasions through the day in which the children pray in class and is the invisible, vivifying chain that binds together each and every one of the activities that Lasallian students perform in the school day.

The morning session in the school of De La Salle would generally finish with attendance at Holy Mass. Here too the Conduct enters into a wealth of detail to demonstrate how the children should actively participate in the Mass. This is all treated in the eighth chapter.

The culmination of the afternoon session is constituted by the explanation of the catechism class which is the meaty part of the text. No student was excused from this class and in the ninth chapter both catechists and students of catechism have their duties clearly spelt out for them for the time of catechism class. The "Singing of Hymns" forms part of the explanation of the catechism and the Conduct treats of the matter in chapter 10.

The scholastic day is about to come to an end. The doors of the Lasallian school which opened at seven-thirty in the morning are going to close at four-thirty in the afternoon. If entrance into the school follows its ritual and importance, the departure in the afternoon is given equal weight and is thoroughly treated in the eleventh chapter which is the last of the first part of the Conduct. Day after day, with the uniqueness of the living organism which can never be repeated, all takes place against the unchanging background of the Lasallian school.

The second and third parts of the Conduct are devoted to behavior, norms, attitudes and pedagogical procedures which should be applied within the existential framework of the first part. The very expression of each chapter speaks of an experimental praxis rather than abstract theory. Thus: Of the signals that should be Used in the Christian Schools (2nd part. C.2.); On Absences (3nd part. C.6); On the Admission of the Students (3rd part. C.2); On the Transfer of Students from one grade to another (rd part. C.4):These are based on real, living situations.

Once again, the realistic, empirical and pragmatic manner of De La Salle is set forth in his authorship of the Conduct. Its pages channelize the torrent of teaching experiences of the most competent Brothers whom De La Salle could count on in the beginnings of the Institute.

ST CASSIAN'S CENTRE, KINTBURY, (5)

In the last two issues of Lasalliana, I tried to describe how the retreats at St Cassian's developed a pattern, and style which seemed to work very effectively as an instrument for youth ministry. I left the Centre in 1982 to undertake further studies in theology, and I know that things have continued to develop at St Cassian's, as new people have come to work in the team, bringing new insights and modifying the vision and techniques they have inherited, to suit changing circumstances. That is how it should be. It shows that the Centre is alive and growing. Here I want to conclude my account with information about two other aspects of youth ministry as it has been exercised by those associated with this Lasallian development in England.

1. Are the aspirations of the centre being realised? How can you tell?

When people ask if the aspirations of the Centre are being realised, obviously I cannot offer any objective way of judging that. No professionally-conducted survey has ever been made, but I can point to the hundreds of letters received by members of the team over the years, in which the young people who have visited the Centre express (often very movingly) their joy and gratitude at the difference it has made to their lives. From the early days, a constant question was whether the effect would be lasting, and obviously it would be foolish to generalise. Neverthless from the number of Kintbury contacts who still write to me from to time, and from the stories and bits of news I hear in various places, I have reason to believe that a high proportion of those who have experienced a retreat at St. Cassian's have been permanently affected by it in a positive way, some quite spectacularly, especially those who came back to deepen and continue their search for the new life. At times it was necessary to discourage some from returning, and to point them away from the tendency to treat Kintbury as a kind of drug, suggesting an alternative future direction for their search and a more realistic approach. All shrines and retreat-centres tend to collect their share of "groupies" (as pop-singers and filmstars do) and the team must act responsibly and charitably to help the people who develop an unhealthy fixation with the place. A small number of young people have been actually banned from returning to the centre. Of course., most of those who become friends of the centre eventually come to realise when the experience offered by Kintbury has served its purpose and look for other ministries to serve their present needs. Sadly these can be hard to find.

To illustrate the successful way in which Kintbury has helped those who have used the centre, I can mention three or four examples from recent correspondence with people who are now in their middle twenties. To avoid any possible embarrassment, I will change all the names (except for David's, whose letter prompted this account).

Jack, who is studying with a view to training for the priesthood after some years of setbacks and disappointments, including bad health, wrote to tell me of coming across one of my letters to him encouraging him to thank God for his personal gifts and not to waste these. I cannot recall writing the letter, but its effect, after some months of darkness, was to lead Jack into praying again. Let him speak for himself: "Through this new deep prayer I had begun, I found I was like a new born child, searching for answers to unasked questions, In the Book of Sirach, chapter 2, the words, 'Accept all that happens to you' struck very deep. I realised that he had not left me but rather had been supporting me; he left me to find him, my own way... I felt I had to let you know that I found my path in life. Whether I achieve the priesthood or not, my path is always with and for God".

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Silvia first came to us as a young police-woman, shocked by the Brixton race-riots which she'd been called upon to police. In Kintbury, at a key moment, she experienced God's healing love very deeply and learned to pray more personally, a feature of her daily life to which she has remained faithful. Having left the police, she's now doing a two year programe of youth and community studies, which she finds very challenging as her tutor is a Marxist. She is searching for a vocation to which she is almost ready to commit herself. She writes very openly: "It's a funny feeling — I definitely feel I have some kind of vocation — but he's not letting me know yet — which is fine by me — I'm enjoying myself — perhaps it's to be a youthworker — something that I've always had my heart set on — so we shall see... I still blame you for getting me into all of this — so thank you — I always remember you during my prayers".

I have already spoken about David, in the fourth year of his education degree. He worked with us on the Kintbury team for a year, after leaving school (not a particularly easy year, either!). You'll recall that I'm answering his questions here, which have stimulated me to go back over the familiar territory and re-tell Kintbury's story. I think David will make a fine teacher, and I found the concluding paragraph of his letter very moving: "While we are on the subjet of St Cassian's I suppose that it would be only right for me, once again, to thank you from the very depths of my being for the chances you gave me to help me to become alive! We must sit down one day and I'll tell you an interesting tale of a young man's growing awareness of the God not out and beyond him but at the centre of his being".

"Work-in-progress"

What interests me about all these examples is that they are extracts from a "work-in-progress". The search is not concluded and the young adults know they must keep moving. Is it unrealistic to see these examples as the tip of the iceberg? I don't think so, for I could quote many others. Let me offer one more, from Judy, in her final year as a student nurse, who received a great deal from Kintbury and came back to help us a few times with our summer programme. She writes: "I think of you often and remember with affection the time that I have spent at St Cassian's over the years. You and many others had a profound influence on me during those often troubled times. Thank you!".

To Jack, Silvia, David and Judy, what can I say in my turn but, "Thank you!" (the Eucharistic dimension of Kintbury memories and the letters in which these are expressed)? What they, like so many others, have taught me is that to accompany others in the way of faith is always as much a matter of receiving as of giving; and that where "two or three meet in my name, I shall be there with them" (Matthew 18,20) is a promise that we can know to be "a saying that you can rely on" (I Timothy 3, I).

ST CASSIAN'S CENTRE, KINTBURY (6)

2. One way in which the centre has tried to deepen the initial response it evokes

The articles would be incomplete without at least a cursory account of the summer programme of "YESWEEKS", five of which are organised each year between late June and mid-August at St Cassian's. I am delighted to say that the custom has spread to other centrs, and even to other countries. They have been devized as a follow-up to the usual three to four days retreat and their origin lies in two events. The first was the wish expressed by a number of those who had been to St Cassian's during its first year to return for a week's reunion, open to anyone who had made a retreat before. The team organised a special programme for this group, and the following summer two such weeks were arranged, the numer increasing year by year until the present total of five weeks each summer was fixed in 1980. This was when the Brothers were celebrating the Tercentenary of our foundation and were encouraged to look for some needs which we were not meeting and to respond creatively to them. For us at Kintbury it was an opportunity to revise the formula of these weeks (until then popularly known as "jamborees") and to redesign the experience, giving it a more positive and challenging spiritual character. As a name for these attempts to deepen the initial retreat experience, we hit upon the term, "Yesweek". "YES" was an abbreviation for "Youth Encounter Sharing", although this was soon forgotten with the "YES" coming to mean its standard positive sense of openness and willingness to respond to the invitations and challenges provided by others and by God. The idea is beautifully expressed in 2 Corinthians, when Paul swears "by God's truth, there is no Yes and No about what we say to you. The Son of God, the Christ Jesus that we proclaimed among you... was never Yes and No: with him it was always Yes, and however many the promises God made, the Yes to them all is in him. That is why it is 'through him' that we answer Amen to the praise of God". (2 Cor. I, 18-20).

The "Yesweeks" attracted a significant number of tertiary level students and young workers or unemployed. They were designed to cater for the sixteen to twenty-six age-group, with the understanding that many taking part would have left school and would have chosen to come to St Cassian's as individuals or with small groups of friends. The weeks are a joyful experience but sometimes a difficult one, since they are intended to encourage further growth rather than to pander to a sort of re-living of the original Kintburuy experience, as though this were some kind of drug to "get high" on. Each season of "Yesweeks" has been based on a theme, usually the exploration of a particular New Testament book:

1980: My Relationships: Yes to others, Yes to myself, Yes to God.
1981: St John's Gospel: deepening my Christian life.
1982: Colossians and Philemon: Paul's vision of life in Christ.
1983: The challenges of St Luke's Gospel.
1984: The sacraments in the Christian life.
1985: (projected) An exploration of Acts.

Facing the challenges which life presents

The study of the Scriptural texts follow imaginatively designed patterns, and though these are soundly based academically, to show that my religious education does not stop when I leave school behind but moves into a new phase for which each one must assume personal responsibility, the real point of the week is to face the challenges which life at home, at school or work, in college and in society generally offers the individual who is trying to live a mature Christian life. We need the help and support of our brothers and sisters as well as of Christ to grasp these challenges, and the "YESWEEK" makes this available. This is not the time to go into details, but one aspect of the experience deserves special mention: the practice of devoting one twenty-four period in the middle of the week to examining the implications of the theme being explored for one's sexuality, especially in view of the choices which young adults face in our society. Obviously this is an important aspect of life which most who come to Kintbury need to discuss, though usually the lack of time and the nature of the situation do not allow the topic to be opened up by groups during the standard retreats. Remember that the retreat-centre attracts young people from a wide variety of backgrounds and points of view (including many which are confused) and that the intention is to cater for sinners rather than for saints, so all can feel at home here (as they are at home in the gospels). I shall never forget the moment at the very beginning of an early "Yesweek" when, during the introductory meeting, I asked for a volunteer to give an example of a personal problem or difficulty they wanted to face during the week, and an eighteen year old girl whom I shall call Kathleen announced immediately, "Well, my problem is very clear-cut: I'm in love with Mike, a married man who at this moment happens to be serving a prison sentence. Do I leave home and move in with him, when he comes out! I know how my parents will react". (So did I, since I had come to know her devoted and strictly Catholic parents!) The temptation is to *over*react and speak out in a very condemnatory way, or to *under*react and fail to speak out at all. I have lost touch with Kathleen, but I do know that she eventually moved in with Mike, though fortunately she did not totally break relations with her disapproving and concerned parents. I think about her from time to time, and I pray that her life will be happy and that she will not lose touch with Christ, whatever becomes of her. For me, Kathleen was another invitation to stand beside so many anxious parents and educators and share their anxiety as well as their childrens'. Elsewhere I have called it "sharing the darkness". But to return to the "Yesweek", needless to say other members of the group were encouraged by Kathleen's willingness to share her problem so openly and frankly. She made it easier for them to share their own, and to keep a sense of perspective.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Another point about the "Yesweeks" is that the team insist that the last twenty-four hour period of the week be dedicated to coming to terms with the practical implications of what one has discovered during the week in relation to everyday life, the context in which I live with my needs and my gifts and my choices. This may be a strong contrast with the Kintbury atmosphere of joyful personal support. Kintbury is not about escaping from life, but facing up to it. The danger for all retreat-centres, as I have said, is that they can become havens for those who are seeking refuge from realities which are too hard. The challenge is to show that God goes with us, goes before us indeed, inviting us to move forward. Marcos wrote from Chile (to which his family had eventually returned from political exile in London) to tell us that the memory of two visits to Kintbury was a continuing inspiration for him to try to do something about the desperate poverty in which some of his fellow countrymen were living and to try not to lose sight of God in the whole mess, because "life without the love of God is too hard".

After a "Yesweek" in 1982, Jim wrote from South Wales about his efforts to work with friends to organise some lively youth liturgies in his own parish, of his continued praying over the topics discussed in the retreat, of further reading to deepen his own faith ("Now I'm in the middle of a fascinating book by Thomas à Kempis called Imitation of Christ..."), and of his discovery of the needs of his older spastic sister, whom he has taken for five walks in her wheelchair: "I really thank God for that sister of mine and I really love her a lot". He goes on to reflect about the meaning of suffering in human life, especially in his own experience, to which Kintbury has opened his eyes.

A final point about the connection between centre and school. We have seen what the centre is about: opening eyes and broadening the vision. In my view, too often the education given in school seems to be about narrowing the vision; not in theory, of course, but that is the way it can work out. The pressures to conform (in terms of curriculum and pedagogical method) must be resisted, and the experience of a few days in a retreat-centre may offer a necessary Christian alternative, which could otherwise be lacking. In my view, the centre need not be too concerned about tying in with existing patterns in school-based R.E. Let it concentrate on opening up a fresh vision and experience of what the Christian life is really about for those who choose to try it outside the organised sphere of classrooms, assembly-halls and so on, and, in opening up that vision to present a personal challenge to "choose life".

THE SPRINGBOARD: REPAIR SHOP FOR SCHOOL DROPOUTS

This is all about a private school, started through the initiative of two Brothers of the Christian Schools of Quebec. This school comes to the help of young people who have prematurely abandoned their regular school course, especially the first cycle of the Secondary school, but who want to make it up, either so that they can continue with the regular course or to more easily get employment which requires the completion of the first cycle.[1]

We also accept youths who, during the pursuit of their courses in school, find some difficulties particularly in French, English, mathematics or the sciences. The latter take courses either at night or during the summer vacation.

I — The history

1 — Upon returning from Africa, two brothers noted the amazing phenomenon of some 50,000 young school "droupouts" each year, that is, youths who leave school prematurely during the first cycle.

2 — After seeking advice and after getting the authorization from the Superiors, in October 1981, they began giving private courses at first to two students. By the end of the year, 23 young people between 16 and 25 years of age were taking advantage of these courses.

3 — During the second year, we were helped by other confreres, then by some religious Sisters and by a Marist Brother. Some young people got interested in our service and spontaneously offered their collaboration, free of charge.

4 — At the time we are writing up this report, 26 October 1985, around 200 boys and girls have taken lessons with us.

A first Observation

We are aware that we are working on behalf of young people who can not principate normally in the development of their potentialities in scholastic life as it exists today.

What also encourages us is the testimonies furnished by the students themselves. We should like to cite a few here:

a) "Seeing that my course begins at 9 a.m., I have to get up early. Before, I used to get up at noontime because I used to go to bed at two or three in the morning. Now I feel better disposed".

b) Many have indicated that they found confidence in themselves once again because of the attention given to each one as a person, which is the way at Springboard.

c) Certain ones say that they have found answers to questions on religion and on life in the world today, even though no courses are given on these subjects.

d) One of them writes: "In order to work, I must have a calm atmosphere, and here I have found the atmosphere I need".

e) "I have found a moral support which I have not found elsewhere. I feel myself freer and more at ease with myself".

f) "I have confidence in my abilities, and with this help, I can progress in my classes and thus have a good future".

g) "Since coming here, I have been getting along better with my family".

h) "I have learned to work; now I have a method for working".

i) "Here, they take the time to explain the difficulties which we find, the reasons for our mistakes". (a student from the GEGEP).

These testimonies speak for themselves

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

II — An idea of the results achieved

a) Many of our former students have proceeded to the GEGEP and even to the University.
b) Some have re-enrolled at the polyvalent, either in the general course or in the vocational course.
c) Three have taken the Secondary VI intensive course, and now are in the market for a job.
d) Some are now attending the Boudralut school in Quebec which receives them beginning with Sec. III.
e) Others have returned to work better equipped than they were before. Already some of our former students come to visit us.

III — The weak points of our organization

a) The young people who come from unfavorable environments or from difficult family situations are still at the mercy of the same milieu.
b) Many "dropout" again, for the same causes produce the same effects. Further, the offer of a little work, even at a reduced salary, attracts a certain number of them.
c) Often the fathers do not fulfill their role towards the boys. It is too often the mother who has to take the initiatives. At the beginning of last year, we had in our course six boys, and only one of them had a father living at home.
d) Also, if the two parents work outside of the home, the child is often left to himself; he does not get up in the morning and his homework is neglected.
e) If, upon leaving the classes, these youths again find the same gang which had an evil influence of them before, nothing has changed and their work is haphazardly done at home and the young man or woman come to day dream here in school.
f) It is not easy to find experienced teachers who will accept the work willingly, to be patient towards the youth whom life has misled but who are trying to make a comeback. We mentioned that we are being assisted by three religious Sisters of St. Louis of France and by four young people who are more advanced but unemployed. This week, a Marist Brother begins to give courses here in French.
g) Sometimes, we have grouped students of the same level: five, six, and even eleven students in the same course. However, experience has taught us the fact that they are not on the same level and that they do not work at the same speed at all. It is therefore evident that we ought to take them individually, or at the most, we could take two at a time. The students feel that they are better undestood and their output is at least doubled.

IV — Financial aid

A question which is frequently asked is "Who supports this gratuitous service?" It is neither the State, nor the local school system. The Brothers' community supports us but we should like to strongly underline the fact that our former students have supported our service. They have offered money for the sake of less fortunate students and, only recently, they have made a big financial investment and they have worked willingly to assure us an adequate location. Probably a rather rare enough phenomenon in the annals of Associations: our students have endowed the Service as a small school. They devoted a number of days of work, going out to round up a few more students helping us find some new teachers of good will.

Conclusion

The Springboard is a humble organization in face of all those who need our help; but, as many confreres have affirmed, this work seems to fully correspond to the wishes of Saint John Baptist De La Salle. It is a great consolation for a retired Brother to be able to continue on for a few more years in a work which demands all his strength and which keeps him in the orbit of De La Salle and of Christ, up to the age of 70 and beyond.

[1] In Quebec, the secondary course is divided into two cycles the same as elsewhere, but these are found in different schools and in different places. The first cycle is given in schools called "Polyvalent"; the two other years are taken in schools names GEGEP (Collège d'études generales et professionnelles) Schools of General Studies and Vocational Studies.

THE LASALLIAN YOUTH CENTER: Gallipoli

Foundation and purpose

In the past few years, a series of unfavorable conditions led the Roman Province of the Brothers of the Christian Schools to close some institutions which were operating in Southern Italy: Benevento, Torre del Greco, and Salerno. As a consequence of this, the Provincial Chapter of 1981 decided upon the orientation of creating something which would substitute, at least in part, for the previous presence.

The introduction of summer camps into the vocational program suggested a different way by means of which the Brothers could come into contact with the youth in our institutions in a way beyond the class room contact and in a more diversified way. Such a novel method brought to maturity the conviction of the possibility of a work which, without having the school as it primary scope, could open itself to youth by offering opportuniites for contact and education different from the traditional kind.

Upon the fertile soil of such availability fell the seed of Divine Providence. At Gallipoli, in the province of Lecce, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd were no longer able to maintain one of their works because of the lack of personnel. Wishing to preserve, in keeping with the wishes of the Bishop, a Christian presence, they turned to various religious congregations hoping that one of them would be interested. The offer which was sent to the General House of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, was forwarded to the Rome Province. This request was given serious consideration by the Brother Provincial and his council, and after careful study, an affirmative decision was reached.

On September 18, 1984 the doors of the LASALLIAN YOUTH CENTER "Villa Rosa Virginia" were opened. The Community is made up of three Brothers.

The scope of the institution is to offer a place for getting together for the youth and children of the city; a place where they can meet and make friends with one another; a place where, as they while away their free time, they can grow physically and intellectually, but above all, morally and spiritually. Hence, the Community is open to any type of recreational, athletic, cultural, or religious activity.

It was not difficult to start. It was enough just to open the doors, prepare the athletic field, set up some meeting rooms, and above all to show our availability to dialogue and to "waste time the boys".

No official invitation was necessary; in fact, there was no advertisement or notice at all. The boys and girls just came spontaneously, calling their friends in turn. Now, that we are in the second year of operation, the LASALLIAN YOUTH CENTER is frequented by more than three hundred boys who find herein an outlet for their physical exuberance, their need for friendship and appreciation and for their thirst for a consoling word in their sorrow, insecurity, or confusion, just a little bit of help along life's difficult path.

For a sizable group of children and youth, the Center has become a kind of second home, where you cannot help but go everyday, a door to be looked upon longingly should it be closed.

Activities which have developed

We are convinced, first of all, that the main activity and the most efficacious instrument are our being kind and understanding, our being available for whatever kind of intervention or help: simply being together, helping them in their studies, and counselling and giving them educational guidance.

In particular we offer:

a) In the field of religious formation.

— Every Saturday there is a course in catechesis for all the children divided into three groups according to age. This is followed by a half hour of singing in preparation for the Sunday liturgy.

— Every Sunday the Holy Mass is celebrated, festively enlivened by the boys.

— The liturgical seasons are strictly observed with prayer encounters and special celebrations.

— The observance of Holy Week is notable with a well attended and well prepared celebration and with the organization of a spiritual day of retreat.

— One Brother prepares a group of children for First Holy Communion.

b) In the area of sports and recreation.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

— Introductory courses are organized for playing and for tournaments in football, volleyball, basketball, track and field, etc. We take advantage of every opportunity to offer our youths time for relaxing and for enjoyable games.

c) In the area of Culture.

— The boys can come to us to do their homework assignments and can avail of our help in our fields of competence and they can use the library, which is at their disposal.

— At Christmas time and during the Carnival we have had very successful performances.

d) Activities outside of the institute.

— By the invitation of the Bishop of Gallipoli, two Brothers teach religion in the State secondary school to children between 11 and 14 years of age. In their twenty classes, they teach more than 500 students. Their teaching is very much appreciated by the students, their families, and by the school.

— Whether as a community of Brothers, or as a Youth Center, we strive to be present and involved in various civic organizations and we contribute toward the organization and accomplishment of various presentations.

Entrance to the Lasallian Youth Center and participation in the various activities is open and absolutely free of charge. Its facilities are offered to the youth of the city without any distinction. However, this does not preclude having the boys regularly sign up for the various activities to guarantee the seriousness and the accuracy of their involvement.

Evaluation and prospective

The journey through the first year of activities naturally registered the type of difficulties characteristic of new operations, and especially because it was a type of work completely different from that usually done by the Brothers of the province. Things progressed with trial and experimentation, attention being paid to the fact that the activities should be enjoyable to the boys and girls and should offer them opportunities for growth. The Brothers were always available to increase or to subsitute the activity offered depending on whether or not it responded to the needs of the young. It is thus that we proceeded gradually in the organization of sports, of periods of instruction, and then more varied activities. The children and youth were given the widest latitude in participating in the various activities proposed and the great variety of activities they belonged to could be noted; from the curious visitors to those who occasionally participated in something; from those who regularly frequented a course to those who where habitually found to be open to any kind of suggestion. Among these last mentioned, it was laudable and encouraging to see a group of bigger boys who not only took part in everything but who also actively cooperated with the Brothers in making things easier and in bringing about an increase of initiatives. To these youths we express our approval, gratitude, and best wishes; together may we follow a path which will help each one to grow and mature and to express, with the help of the Lord, what is best in each person.

Our obligation for the immediate future is to make sure that those things which were born, perhaps too hastily, can now be consolidated. Now that the euphoria of the beginnings have passed, the necessary consistent measures must be taken to guarantee their permanence.

There are some parents of our children who help us so much by their availability and their enthusiasm, but in general, so far there exists only a limited dialogue with the majority of them. We propose, as the opportunities present themselves, to find together with them the best means of knowledge and cooperation for initiating enterprises which could be beneficial even to the parents themselves.

We truly wish that our Center will become the center of true and meaningful life where the needs, preoccupations and joys of this part of the city find an adequate resonance, and within the necessary limits, prospective solution and direction.

BARTOLO LONGO INSTITUTE OF POMPEI (1)

The sanctuary

The story of the Madonna of the Holy Rosary of Pompei begins in November of 1875 with the arrival of the "picture" and its exposition for the veneration of the countryfolk in a dilapidated country chapel within the estate of Countess Marianna De Fusco.

The reconstruction of the Sanctuary, which was necessary because of the great number of the faithful coming there, was done in 1891.

The fact that in such a short time such a lively devotion developed, attracting a continual influx of pilgrims, is truly incredible. In 1985 more than 3,000,000 pilgrims had come from all parts of the world, 11,000 Masses had been celebrated during which about 612,000 received Holy Communion, 5,211 people were Confirmed, and 764 pilgrimages were officially registered.

In mentioning then the "Sanctuary", we should also mention its auxiliary institutes, with more than 500 young guests, the shelters, elementary, junior high, and high schools, a community for elderly women, and a center for drug dependents. Caring for all of these are 150 Religious Sisters, 40 priests, 20 confessors, 17 Brothers of the Christian Schools, 70 lay teachers, and some one hundred employees and workers.

Attorney Bartolo Longo

At the beginning of all this was a layman who was a lawyer by profession. His name was Bartolo Longo and he was born in Latiano (Brindisi) in 1841. As a child he had been educated as a Catholic, but at the University of Naples, where he had gone to study Law, he became so anticlerical that he enrolled in a spiritualistic association and participated in some of the most vociferous antiCatholic demonstrations which were quite common in Italy during the second part of the nineteenth century. Then came the change brought about in him because of his frequent contact with Catholic intellectuals who aroused in him an interest in the theological and patristic studies which transformed him into "God's Cyclone" which he thereafter remained.

Atty. Bartolo Longo was named one day as the administrator of the financial estate of a gentlelady, the Countess Marianna De Fusco, in the Pompei countryside, on the outskirts of the ancient city which had been buried in 79 BC by the eruption of Mount Vesuvius. It was there that the young professional slowly turned towards the faith, discovering the life of the country people—or rather, their non-life. He saw how they were isolated by the lack of good roads, completely ignored by the authorities, exposed to banditry, illiteracy and to all kinds of illnesses.

That all this must change was his Christian reaction to this sum total of injustice. With the support of Countess De Fusco, who would become his wife in 1885, Bartolo Longo began battling for the restoration of the human dignity of those country people: he obtained streets, drainage, two railroad stations, two police stations for the security of the citizens, and he gave them the initiative of meeting together, of learning, and also of celebrating festivals which molded those people into a community. All of this, however, was engrafted upon the spiritual life, upon prayer, and especially upon the rosary. Longo started the Confraternity of the Rosary at the end of 1875 and this ran parallel with his realization of a multi-graded school, geodynamic and meteorological observatory, a Vesuvian museum and scientific stations. This battle for the emancipation of this people was linked with the national and international struggle concerning the problems of people. Longo wrote, polemicized, participated in congresses in Italy and abroad, and took up anthropological and juridical compaigns which ran absolutely counter to the existing situation.

The liberation of man from the network of crime was one of his greatest battles. At that time, the scientific theories and studies linked with atheistic positivism were riding high. These claimed that criminality was a species of irreparable damnation in which the structure of the brain determined physical and moral behaviour. Not only that, it even claimed further that the children of criminals were also hoplessly beyond reclamation.

Bartolo Longo was indignant at this. God is the Father of all, God redeemed all, and the Blessed Virgin protects all. And so he unleashed not only a spoken and written counteroffensive but even hurled a loud

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

challenge to the positivists: give me these men and their sons, let us treat them with justice, as well as with Christian love, let us give them respectable work and we will see that they will become exemplary citizens. He took the sons of those in prison and confided them first to some of his zealous collaborators and then to the Brothers of the Christian Schools. For the girls he himself founded a Congregation of Religious Sisters, the Dominican Sisters of the Holy Rosary. The results: the first "reclaimed" boy became a priest and then later a pastor in Calabria; all the others became craftsmen, employees, managers, religious, and also disciplined and scrupulous keepers of good order. A resounding victory!

Bartolo Longo was the firebrand also of another institution: the reformed children, in their turn, could save their own parents. In fact, at the end of the first years of the functioning of this institution, the sons became ambassadors of good for their parents, because Longo, in addition to the frequent correspondence which he encouraged between the boys and their fathers, each year had them accompany him in visiting their fathers in the jails. He gathered together in a volume entitled "The Work in the Pompei Valley, and the Moral Reform of the Prisoners", numerous letters from the directors and chaplains of the jails attesting to the great amount of positive fruit, which resulted from such methods.

And as a result of all of this, there was such a change of public opinion that Bartolo Longo instituted the so-called "the fathers of children orphaned by the law", persons, that is, from all classes of society who, at Confirmation, took one of these children of prisoners as a "godchild" and followed his progress not only during his stay in the school but possibly for the rest of his life. This tradition continues on even until today.

"The Educational Hostel for the Sons of Prisoners" and the Brothers of the Christian Schools

Among the works which have sprung up under the shadow of the Sanctuary, the one which has aroused the deepest echo within the world and which continues to be the greatest victory of faith operating through charity is, without doubt, "The Educational Hostel for the Sons of Prisoners".

On May 29, 1892 the first stone of this great building which opens onto the Via Sacra was laid and in May of 1893 the first little group of 15 boys entered the new institution.

The continued growth of the pupils imposed upon Bartolo Longo, who in the opening days had confided the few children to the charitable works of his zealous collaborators, the problem of assuring their education with bigger and better means.

At this point we begin the dealings between Bartolo Longo and the Brothers of the Christian Schools. In truth, he had thought about the Brothers even before the beginning of the grand construction, as is evidenced by the answer which the then Visitor, Brother Casimiro sent to the lawyer, dated August 2, 1891. Again, in 1894, the same Brother Visitor answered Atty. Longo, who was insisting that he send at least one Brother to help him with the direction, in this manner: "Our rule forbids a single Brother to live outside of the community. I would ask you, who are so much favoured by the protection of the Virgin, to recommend our Institute so that we may obtain an increase in our personnel...".

Then Bartolo Longo tried again with a letter of recommendation and for this he had recourse to His Eminence Cardinal Monaco La Valletta. But even this was not effective and he had to resign hmself to waiting longer.

In 1907 the direction of the Sanctuary and the Works of Pompei were entrusted to the Pontifical Prelate, Monsignor August Silj. He, taking into account the need for stability, in keeping with the wishes of the Founder, and the definite systemazation of the Hostel, appealed directly to the Holy Father, Pius X. The Pope immediately arranged for the sons of St. John Baptist De La Salle to report to Pompei. To the Brother Visitor who bewailed the lack of personnel, he answered "Nothing should be impossible when the Pope wills it".

Thus, in August of 1907, the first Brothers arrived in Pompei. Why was there so much insistence on the part of Bartolo Longo in wanting the Brothers that he discarded "a priori" all other collaboration? Because the sense of education which he possessed, found its surest and most reassuring counterpart in the educational norms of the Saint from Rheims and the method adopted by his sons over the past two centuries. In his celebrated discourses which he delivered on May 27, 1894 and May 23, 1894 on the occasion of the "Civil Holiday", initiated by him, can be found the cardinal principles of his educational concepts. In these discourses he affirmed that in the choice of children, he intended to follow only the rule of charity, receiving and loving all without distinction, as was practiced and taught by the Divine Master.

With regard to the educational method, Atty. Longo insisted on three points: Prayer, Study, Work. But above all, Love, that love for children which exacts a total dedication and continual sacrifice; which requires that one live the life as that of the child in order to be always ready to receive him, to correct him, and, if necessary, to punish him with dignity and firmness.

These were the ideals which the Brothers of the Christian Schools represented for Bartolo Longo, "the pious, modest and hard-working Sons of St. John Baptist De La Salle... belonging to a remarkable order because it is made up of all laymen, without any priests, which disposes them for only one mission, humble in appearance but most noble in reality: the moral and intellectual education of children...".

BARTOLO LONGO INSTITUTE OF POMPEI (2)

Organization

The one who gave the efficient and definitive organization to the Work was Brother Regolo Battaglini. He directed it for the first time from 1908 to 1916, the year he was called by the Superiors to direct the Province of Rome as Visitor.

He put discipline into the inner operation of the house and wisely set up rules to govern all the complex activities of the Institution. One of his first acts was to abolish any notion or atmosphere of "prison" out of honor for the principles that the educator rather than command fear, should make himself become loved if he wishes to succed in his mission; that is, he should know how to put himself into the soul and intelligence of the young with perception that only the heart can give.

A very effective imprint on the place was made also by Brother Adriano Celentano, who was a Neopolitan by birth. Attached to Bartolo Longo by a deep and devoted admiration, he brought to the work the enthusiasm and innovative activity which his great heart suggested to him. He had new facilities built and was helped in this by Brother Costanzo Daudet, who was a talented architect and artist. He also established the Professional Training Courses in a very systematic and more complete and reasonable way. Thus, he established courses in typing, bookbinding, mechanics, metalware, carpentry, cabinetmaking, tailoring, and shoemaking. Amid all this, the boys cultivated the art of singing, and learned to play musical instruments so well that they were able to be included in the School Band which was to become one of the most admired artistic elements of the entire Institution. He, moreover, through his interest and knowledge which led him all the way to the person of Mussolini, obtained permission for the territory of Pompei to be constituted as an autonomous Commune. This earned for him quite a bit of animosity on the part of the administrative authorities of Scafati and of Torre Annunziata, because these two communes had to cede part of their territory to the nascent Commune.

The celebration of the 25th anniversary of the arrival of the Brothers in Pompei was an important moment for retrospective reflection. The Brothers and students prepared a grandiose scholastic, professional, and historical exposition which gave promincence to the work that had been done in the first 25 years of their permanency in the Institution.

Thousands of pilgrims came to visit the place, including illustrious government officials, directors of Houses of Correction, teachers, prelates, and religious of all kinds. Among the thousands who have signed the Golden Book of the Exposition we read the names of those who in themselves resound gloriously in the complex educational and rehabilitative activities of the Institution.

Among the most illustrious visitors who have come to the Institute during the course of its history, we should like to single out Prince Umberto of Savoy, The Honorable Luigi Einaudi, President of the Italian Republic (30.9.1948), The Honorable Alcide De Gasperi, Head of State (29.12.1949), the Honorable Giovanni Leone (on June 3, 1951, he gave the keynote address for the Third Centenary of the birth of St. John Baptist De La Salle; 9.10.1975, he returned here when he was President of the Republic); numerous Cardinals and other high-ranking Italian and foreign prelates.

Statistical Data

Since its foundation, the Institute has admitted 2,544 boys from the age of 5 to the age of 20. The number of those admitted annually has risen from about 10 in the first years of operation to 400 in the years following World War II. After World War II, the Institute began accepting orphans.

At present, the Institute accepts only 130 boys because in 1966, the boys of the elementary classes were transferred to another building and confided to the care of the Sisters of the Holy Rosary. At present the sons of prisoners form only a small part (20 of the 130) of the students. The others are orphans, abandoned children, children belonging to very big families which are poor, and boys who have been sent by the Courts for minor offenses.

At present the boys attend the Middle school, beginning with the first grade of that level, for three years and the Professional Institute for Industry and Arts for three to five years, with the possibility of choosing between the specializations in Electro-mechanics and mechanics. Specialization in Graphics, which for many decades was the pride of the Institute, is being phased out as an official academic course. It will remain as an apprenticeship department for some students who lack the capability of taking the two required academic courses officially offered in the Institute.

In all, 419 Brothers have served in the educational apostolate of this school. Among the first ones were 15 French Brothers, followed by 6 Germans, 3 Greeks, 3 Eritreans, and one Austrian. The scholastic courses offered and the diplomas received by the students after completing these courses, are equivalent to those of the State schools.

Conclusion

From what has been written here, it is easy to understand the great contribution made by Blessed Bartolo Longo * to the education of abandoned children. Here in Pompei, such children are found in four Institutions: an elementary school and kindergarten for boys and another one for girls. A junior high school and high school for girls, and the same for the boys. It is this school for boys which bears the name of its founder "Bartolo Longo".

This is the "New Pompei": a hundred years ago it was an inhospitable and unhealthy place. Today it is a country town pulsating with life, a majestic temple with a monumental belfry, and within, the marvelous charitable works, supported by the Christian solidarity of the faithful, flourish.

FOR THE PAST 120 YEARS: THE BROTHERS IN MONACO

To better understand the following text, particularly the initials and names used, some preliminary explanations are necessary.

In the French school system, at the secondary level of instruction of the first and second cycle, classes and sections of study are provided with the view of accepting students having scholastic difficulties. The school in the Principality of Monaco functions along the same model.

We find, therefore, in these establishments:

The "College" level for students between 11 and 15 years old.

- S.E.S.: Section for Specialized Education.
- CPPN: Classes at the Pre-professional level.
- C.P.A.: Classes preparatory to Apprenticeship.

At the "Lyceum" level for students between 15 and 18 years old, there exist a number of possibilities of professional training, with various type of specializations, among which are:

- C.A.P.: Certificate of Professional Aptitude.
- B.E.P.: Brevet (Diploma) of Professional Studies.
- G1, G2, G3 leading to the Baccalaureate in Management, Accounting, or Secretariate.

After a rather long time, the Brothers of the Region of France have decided to develop these types of study because they see them as a means of taking care of "the poor" within the school system.

Speaking about Monaco-Monte Carlo today is often equated with speaking about the richness of the gambling Casino, the gold of the great hotels or the celebrations of such or such an international festival. However, the Principality of Monaco, today as in recent years, and despite a rather recent demographic and architectural explosion, is inhabited to a large extent, by people somewhere between the rich and the poor, and where the permanent element is not so prosperous as the tourists who pass through.

The Brothers of the Christian Schools were invited to Monaco by the Sovereign Prince in 1868, during the generalate of the Most Honored Brother Philippe. There, they were to open a primary school, which was popular from the very outset and whose school population increased very rapidly, going from 3 Brothers teaching 110 pupils in 1868 to 13 Brothers and 322 pupils in 1899. Then there was the establishment of three schools, primary, complementary, and commercial, so that it was true that wherever they were established, the sons of Saint John Baptist De La Salle adapted themselves to the needs of the young, moving by instinct toward the type of instruction most helpful to the least favoured and the most abandoned children.

A decisive change: 1969

One hundred years after their arrival in the Principality, the Brothers were invited by the government to fuse their work with that of the Sisters of Saint-Maur in order to work with them in a co-ed institution capable of educating both boys and girls together who were not studying towards getting their classical baccalaureate from the Albert I Lyceum.

Thus, it was up to the Brothers and the Sisters, who established their respective communities in the two wings of the new building to receive, instruct, and educate all those who had no attractation for philosophy or for pure mathematics.

Within the same building, with the same happy atmosphere, under the same direction, with the same teachers, 1,200 students from 11to 21 years of age attend 17 classes in the College, 15 technical classes (G1 and G2), 3 classes of S.E.S., one class of CPPN, 2 classes of C.P.A., 26 classes preparatory for the C.A.P. and B.E.P. of the industrial, commercial and hotelery sections.

What is most significant among the 64 classes of the establishment, is that 47 are classes of youth who either abandoned, or who were rejected by the "classical" type of education. And so, it was with great reason that a lay teacher declared to the Brother Director upon his arrival in 1976: "In this school we accept for admission to the second cycle or for the end of the first part of the first secondary cycle, the students who failed elsewhere, and we make them succeed". Yes, they do succeed. In great numbers they qualify for entrance into professional life with a CAP or a BEP or a Technician's certificate. But they succeed above all in blossoming within a homogeneous student population, with all its diversity, by pursuing studies at the level and according to the system which is most suitable for them.

For many students, life is not all "roses"! Daily, or almost daily, we entertain the questions of distressed young people who come to the Director or to another Brother seeking advice which will be instantaneous solutions to their problems. A young lad from the "4th Preparatory" comes and says, "In the last two months, I have changed "fathers" four times and I really do not know where I live, so how do you expect me to do any serious work?" There is another student who can no longer bear the humiliation of being compared to another boy his age whose parents vaunt his scholastic success in a neighboring Lyceum: "Tell them that I am not a mere nothing and that here I am perfectly happy to be preparing myself for a trade". Then there is the student of the Ist G who by his manual work at night supports his unemployed mother who stays at home with a handicapped young child. Then we have one in the third year of CAP who by the third month before the examination is completely lost and we are the only ones who can restore his self-confidence.

But the students' confidence is restored once they have discovered the spirit of the true Lasallian teacher in their teacher-pupil relationship. Then they feel that being better understood and counselled, they can begin to live better lives. Each student is conscious of the confidence which is placed in him as well as being aware of the spirit of companionship which binds the students one to another within a given section. Above all, no one is isolated and it is one of the characteristics of the school that it creates opportunities and occasions for the students of the SES, CPPN, CPA, CAP, and BEP to meet one another. They mix together in the same corridors and in the recreational activitiés, as well as in the documentation and information center. The social-educational facilities are open to all. This recreational hall, in particular, which is open to 26 different Clubs, multiplies the possibilities of meeting together and having friendship and cooperation flourish.

For everyone the instruction is entirely gratuitous because all the services, facilities, and equipment are paid for by the Government of Monaco.

Not only is the teaching gratuitous, but it is also Christian teaching: the time of religious instruction forms a part of the regular schedule and the periods of catechesis are taken care of by the Brothers, Sisters, some lay people and two chaplains.

An ideal situation without problems?

Certainly, the working conditions are very favourable.

Still, for this abundant harvest, the workers are becoming too few in number and are getting old. Such a propitious field of endeavour and the young people themselves need a rejuvenated Lasallian community.

YOUTH RETREATS

"Hello and welcome to your senior retreat here at the Christian Brothers Retreat House in St. Helena. I'm Brother Richard Moratto, and on behalf of our staff, I am happy that each one of you decided to say YES to making this 3 day retreat. Let's pause for a moment as we sit in an unbroken circle here in this little chapel and remember that we are in the Holy Presence of God...".

Thus begins one of the most important personal and spiritual experiences we are able to offer teens during their four year career as high school students. Its importance can be found, if you will, in the invitation of Jesus to his own first disciples following their recent involvements..." come aside awhile with me and rest" (Mark 6).

The tensions, stresses, secular values and frantic activity of our day-and-age have truly filtered down to today's teens. It is they who have told us of the importance of "coming aside awhile to rest..." and to think and to feel and to pray in a retreat atmosphere that allows them to review and re-direct the best of their desires, values, hopes and dreams. It is they who say to us, "these 3 days of retreat have been the best experience of my 4 years of high school", and at the end of the retreat, "do we really have to leave; I wish we could stay a day or two longer", and, "I have been closer to God on this retreat than at any other time in my life". Such frequently heard testimonies have convinced the Brothers in California that the investment we made in our student retreat house way back in 1962 has been more than worth it.

It would be impossible in this short space to write about all the things that we do with the students while on the retreats, or to attempt to capture the exciting movements of the Spirit as we observe and accompany the students as they go from initial moments of shyness, incertainty and even, for some, apprehension when they first arrive to a true deepening and flowering of the Spirit within them by the end of the three days. It is important, however, to offer the reader a sense of what does take place that aids the students in such a transformation.

The students, usually, in numbers of between 40 and 50, arrive at 4:30 in the afternoon. Following their registration and assignments to rooms in the dormitory, they are formally welcomed to the retreat in the chapel. Introductions of our staff and a slide presentation are then given in a room in our old mansion. The slides act as the on-sight orientation. After supper, they have a recreation period (there are a number of these periodically placed throughout the three days) which is followed by an activity called "icebreakers" — a fun and nonsense time intended to help them become more relaxed with one another in this new and strange place. They are then divided usually into four or five small groups of eight to ten each with a staff member as facilitator. It is in these small groups, especially, that they are invited to explore the theme of our senior retreats: "Journey — where I am at this time in my life with self, with friends, with family and with God". During these three days, these small groups meet four times. The final small group will deal with how their goals were accomplished on this retreat and an affirmation of each by their fellow students and the staff-facilitator.

Other activities (large groups) include a trust walk, a dyad (an exercise in the skills of listening), a period of community recreation and a number of specifically religiously oriented activities. Among these, we include creative and imaginative morning and evening prayer services (themes center around the topics of hope, praise, thanksgiving, service.. etc.), a quiet time/meditation in chapel the second afternoon, an informal Liturgy of Reconciliation (among the most popular of large group activities) and a Liturgy (the Mass) as the culminating event on the final day. This liturgy is prepared by the students with the guidance of the staff members. A particular period of time is set aside the night before and labeled "liturgy prep" on the schedule. Students select both scriptural and non-scriptural readings (often to be presented in a dramatized way), the prayers of the faithful, the offertory gifts (bread and wine plus other symbolic gifts of the retreat). They further prepare the music and create several decorative posters for the walls of the chapel.

For the 17-18 year old seniors we offer a two nights/three days retreat. For the 15-16 year old juniors we offer a one night/two days retreat. Junior retreats, usually done in the Spring of the year, have Values as their theme. The juniors are asked to participate in large and small group activities in order to explore just what it is they value most. These exercises in values clarification help them to understand and appreciate more fully not only what they believe in but how best, as Christians, they may put these values into operation in service to their fellow human beings. We consistently find that most juniors return to the retreat house with much enthusiasm for their senior retreat the following year.

I would be remiss if I failed to speak to speak of our staff and the unique gifts they bring to our retreat ministry, especially in terms of their strong Christian and Lasallian orientations. It is our belief, as a staff, that we are firstly a Christian Community from which we derive the positive psychological and spiritual energy to minister to the 2000 to 2500 teenagers who come to us every nine months. We are a community of men and women, lay and religious who take seriously and enthusiastically both the message of the Gospels and the spirit and intent of St. La Salle. The students come to us for only two or three days, we give wholeheartedly of ourselves, and then they are gone! This is, at times, difficult and draining. Yet, it is through the strength we derive from being a sharing community of student retreat ministers, and it is in the knowledge that we are a significant part of the students' overall experience of the person and message of Jesus in their lives that we find the faith and energy to keep this special ministry alive and well. If at the end of their retreat the students are more trusting, more caring, more personally honest, more Spirit-filled, then their two or three days with us is a grace we are more than happy to have shared with them. A grace we have come to find out, for most, lasts for many years after.

In his book. Adolescent Spirituality, Father Charles M. Shelton, S.J., speaks frankly of very clear trends, interests and values of today's youth:

"Noted pollster George Gallup provides an insightful overview of adolescent religious behavior. In an address before the National Family Life Conference, sponsored by the Department of Education of the U.S. Catholic Conference, Gallup noted that youth are very concerned about meaning and prize human friendship. He stated that young people (1) tend to be more tolerant than their elders toward persons of different races, religions, and backgrounds; (2) continue to be remarkably service-oriented in their occupational choices, with many seeking careers in medicine, teaching, social work and other "helping" professions; and (3) are a particularly religious segment of the population. Although they tend to be "turned off" by organized religion, their levels of religious belief and practice are as high or higher than those of their elders.

Gallup urges that strong support be given to family life because of its centrality in youth's development. He also finds that two encouraging areas for ministering adolescents' spiritual development are Bible study groups and youth retreats. Both of these activities are highly popular among youth today and obviously need fostering in youth ministry programs".

And for we who choose to minister to today's youth, these words of challenge and encouragement:

"Since you are ambassadors and ministers of Jesus Christ in the work that you do, you must act as representing Jesus Christ himself. He wants your disciples to see him in you and receive your teaching as if he were teaching them. They must be convinced that the truth of Jesus comes from your mouth..." (Meditations/Retreat-3).

TOWARDS A PLAN OF LASALLIAN FORMATION

In the Lasallian Region of Spain and Portugal, two positive realities have come to be the cause of a new profile of the Lasallian formation of the Brothers. On the one hand we have the awakened interest in a knowledge of the Founder and of his work, and on the other, the presence of a fairly numerous group of Brothers from the several districts in the novitiates and scholasticates. Both realities were carefully considered by the National Commission of Formation, made up of all the Brothers of the Region who are encharged with the formation of Junior Novices, Postulants, Novices and Scholastics, as well as the Pastoral Teams.

1. The Process of Drawing up the Plan

The National Formation Commission together with Brother Saturnino Gallego undertook the task of elaborating a possible plan. The first version of the plan basically brought together:

- b.4 Books and materials suitable for the formation teams.
- b.5 Suggestions for methods: Time sequence, activities, readings, tasks to be accomplished.

In a later development, each district assumed these program guidelines, adapted for their own specific character, and looked to implant the program in their formation groups. Several of the Spanish Districts, having already joined for the two-year Novitiate and one year of Scholasticate, decided to concretize and adjust the Formation Program according to that fact and, consequently combined for the two years of the novitiate and three years of Scholasticate. This Plan is presented in the following outline as section 2.

PERPETUAL VOWS AND INCULTURATION

Introduction

This article does not attempt to present a theoretical study on inculturation; it will merely limit itself to recounting some related facts which have been experienced in different periods of history. It deals with the perpetual profession ceremonies of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. If the deep significance of the vows has remained unchanged, for they continue to be a total consecration of one's self to the Lord, the rite or the manner of pronouncing these vows has changed enormously, especially in the course of the last ten years, during which much has been said about inculturation. Thus, during one of his African visits, Pope John Paul II himself said: "Africanization encompasses a wide and deep domain which as yet has not been sufficiently explored, when it comes to the language in which to present the Christian language in a way which will touch the spirit and heart of the Africans, and when it comes to the catechesis, the theological thought, and the expression best adapted to the liturgy or sacred art, and the communitarian modes of Christian life".

What follows here is precisely a presentation of a Malagasy experience of this "more adapted expression" of the ceremony of vows.

1 — Concerning a clannish ceremony where everything is a mystery to the uninitiated

I should like to recount here a personal experience. In 1958, I pronounced my perpetual vows in the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools in the course of a ceremony in the private chapel of a community of Religious Sisters. During the course of the ceremony, I was well surrounded by my Brothers in religion, both local Brothers and foreign missionary Brothers. They were both happy and proud to accept me as a another member who would definitely commit himself to the Society for better or for worse.

As regards my parents, whom I discreetly invited on my own, they occupied the last pew in the chapel. They were like silent and mute spectators during this ceremony which interested them so deeply but whose significance escaped them; either because they were so far behind the human curtain formed by my religious Brothers or because it was a ceremony which was carried out in a language foreign to them. They were the uninitiated and so they could not understand the language of our "clan". Furthermore, is the religious life not conceived as an abandonment and a forgetting of one's own and a world apart which rises above all cultures? It did not have any other points of reference except tradition (the classical view of the religious life). One can be inculturated only within the patrimony of the clan.

2 — Towards a more ecclesial celebration

Now we are in 1978, that is, twenty years later; Brother So-and-so is also pronouncing his definitive commitment to the Brothers of the Christian Schools. But, the rite has taken on a different appearance. The ceremony takes place in the original parish which prepared for this happy event for some entire weeks, with a catechesis concerning the vows of religion and the meaning of consecration.

Now it is not only the parents who have been invited, but the entire family and even the entire parish, with privileged guests being the young people and the students. The celebration will be intensely spiritual, but as is said here, there cannot be any kind of a celebration without "vary be menaka" (rice and a lot of other food) with each one bringing a little something for the meal of all those present. For the religious celebration, it is the bishop himself who presides at the Eucharist; an imposing number of men and women religious are present; but above all the large parish church is packed to the doors with the ordinary faithful who make up the ecclesial community.

Invited by the Brother Visitor to approach the altar to pronounce his consecration, the young Brother rises and after bowing respectfully towards his parents, asks them for their blessing.

The voice of an old man, the oldest person in the family, arises like an enchanting hymn calling the grace of God down upon "their child and their Brother", asking also for the protection of ancestors and for the benevolent love of all the living. The extraordinary silence which pervades the immense assembly during this moment speaks eloquently of the weight and value which the Malagasy people attach to the paternal blessing. For many this is not only the most moving moment of the ceremony but also its summit and culminating point. However, the rest of the ceremony is followed with enthusiasm and sustained interest by this Church which sings with full voice and praises God in dance.

Doubtlessly, there are certain things which would have to be clarified, but the fact remains that it was the entire people of God who took part in this act of consecration of the Brother. This event was not the private act of a closed religious community acting alone, but it was rather one of an entire ecclesial community which made this consecration of vows an authentically public act expressed within the Church.

3 — The vow celebration embraces the Lasallian family

If inculturation is a rather recent movement in the Church, the notion as a reality is even more so in the Institute. Yet, more and more young people and adults feel themselves attracted to the mission and spirituality of De La Salle;

Documents of the Christian Schools — Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
The Archives of the Christian Schools — De La Salle Christian Brothers — Napa, CA — USA

they experience a wish to draw a bit more closely to the Brothers; they desire to share a bit of their live and participate in their mission. The parents of the Brothers themselves willingly subscribe to become members of this Lasallian family, following the lay teachers, former students, the youth, and other sympathizers.

Now we are in 1985; God continues to send vocations in the District of Tananarive; and thus it is that five young Brothers are going to pronounce their perpetual vows. They are prepared for this by a month of spiritual reflection and prayer. It is interesting to note that some years before, this spiritual month, or thirty days' retreat, was directed by a preacher who was competent in his own right, but who said nothing or almost nothing about Lasallian spirituality. By contrast, the spiritual month we are referring to here was a preparation for perpetual profession largely animated by the Brothers or by other spiritual guides who were open to our family spirituality of the Founder.

And now comes the day of profession. The parents also have been advised some days earlier so that they also can prepare for this grand event of definitively offering one of their children to the Lord. Time truly, the parents did something more than to bring us into the world. Were they not the first ones who initiated their children into the Christian faith? Had not their example influenced our choice of a vocation? Are they not interested in our religious process? Why then should they not be involved a bit more in this definitive decision which perpetual profession truly is?

It is in this perspective that the five Malagasy Brothers who are making their final profession have conceived of a ritual where the parents, the Institute, and themselves enter into a dialogue which includes and concerns everybody in this final profession.

It is not possible for us to relate here everything that was said on that occasion. We shall merely transcribe a summary of what was said in such deep and captivating Malagasy that we cannot give a translation which would do justice to the original.

The parents addressed the Institute and then the Brother Visitor in words suitable for the occasion, and then a bit later, they pronounced the following words:

"Here in our presence, Brother So-and so and Brother So-and-so are ready for their wedding; it is not a question of taking a wife, as required by our ancestral traditions; but it is one of binding themselves forever to Jesus Christ in the Congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. This congregation and our sons have known, studied and mutually appreciated one another for the past seven or eight years. The time for reciprocal probing has come to an end; now comes the decisive day when they will bind themselves to the Institute until death, for better or for worse. We wish to make it quite clear that they are making this commitment without any constraint or force upon the part of anyone. This commitment is being made because of the love which binds them to the Lasallian Congregation, by the love of God, love for children, and by love for their Brothers in religion...".

Acceptance by the Institute

The Brother Visitor, in the name of Institute, then speaks up and expresses himself in the following way: "The Congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools expresses its gratitude to you, dear parents, who have succeeded in your educative mission and have come here today to offer back again to the Lord, the sons he had confided to you to rear. It is neither gold nor silver, nor any other material things which you are offering today; you are offering your own children for the extension of the Kingdom of God, through the education of children especially poor children. The Lord Himself will surely reward you a hundred-fold for the sacrifice which you have offered to Him".

Then addressing himself to the young men themselves, Brother Visitor continues: "I address you, young Brothers. The people of God is here assembled because of you. Your parents have expressed their intention to offer you to Christ, to espouse you to the Brothers of the Christian Schools. But we want you yourselves to tell us of your deep intentions. The people of God here present await a clarification from you, to which they will be the witnesses. Tell them of the profound meaning of the commitment you are about to undertake; they await that testimony for their own edification and to motivate the intentions of the prayers which they will address to God for your behalf".

Declaration of future profession

"It is willingly and with full knowledge that I commit myself definitively to the Institute. I sufficiently understand its history, its way of life, its apostolate, and its spirituality. I have gotten to know the Brothers well enough, having lived with them in community and having together with them worked for the Christian education of youth. These experiences seem to me to be sufficient and conclusive. Hence, I herewith decide to bind myself forever to them as a witness in the world today of a truly evangelical brotherhood for the service of youth".

Combined blessing by the Family and by the Institute

After these declarations of intentions, the Brother Visitor as well as the fathers and mothers of those about to pronounce their perpetual vows, bless one after the other, the young Brothers seated in front of the altar, facing the people. This blessing is spontaneous and charismatic. Placing their hand, moistened with holy water, upon the head of each candidate for profession, each pronounces a formula, expressed in the words which spring from their maternal and paternal heart under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

Thus, fortified by this blessing as well as by the prayers of the congregation who took part in this ceremony, the candidates for perpetual profession join in the eucharistic celebration, during which they will pronounce their perpetual vows according to the traditional formula of the Institute.

This experience is unique in its kind, so there is no general conclusion to be drawn from it. What is proposed is to become aware that the ceremony of perpetual profession, which is highly ecclesial in nature, should be something truly significant for those participating in it.

Now it is up to each one to devise a procedure in conformity with his own culture to arrive at this desirable objective.

THE LASALLIAN ASSOCIATION IN FRANCE

1 — Introduction

The decade of the 1970's saw the progressive development in France, to the level of Lasallian middle and secondary schools what had existed up to that time in the primary schools and in certain middle schools: The transfer of the Direction of these Institutions from the Brothers to Lay persons.

Often it was the case of conferring such Direction on a layman who had been with the Brothers as a student or as a teacher in a Lasallian school having a community of Brothers.

In other cases, a lay Director, who has not had this "Lasallian experience" takes charge of a School which still has a Community of Brothers. Such lay Directors between 1970 and 1980 could be called the "First Generation", that is those having known and lived in one way or other within the Lasallian educational climate under the strong influence of Religious.

2 — The origins of the Association

Around 1975, some lay Directors of Lasallian elementary and secondary schools of France wanted to reflect together on their mission as well as on the future of the establishments which were confided to their care. After having met together several times, they opened themselves to the influence of the Institute of the Brothers and were particularly well received and listened to in their search by the Brothers in charge of the Institute in France.

There was a period of concerted study and openness over a three year period which led to such very diverse questions as:

— A Lasallian pedagogy for today

— The connection between pedagogy and spirituality

— Openness to youth, especially the most deprived.

— What connections exist between the Institute and the Lay Directors? How can these ties be strengthened... Where can new ones be created?

— The isolation often strongly felt by lay Directors — In case of a conflict between a Lay Director and members of the Educational community, does a way of seeking arbitration exist?

(This type of protection is hardly talked about at present).

— How to find and form successors to the Directors?

In the course of these exchanges, the Brothers and the Laymen were very attentive to one another and probably each had to go out of his way to better understand the "other fellow".

The Brothers Visitors participating in these meetings insisted on the fact that John Baptist De La Salle made as his plan that of working "together and by association".

They understood that the lay people — in their present position — wanted to bring the Lasallian educational message to youth, and in particular wanted to be attentive to those students having difficulties in these schools, "open to the world", where an evangelical climate is developed. The Brothers very rightly underscored the point that the Founder was solicitous not only of pedagogy but he also was a guide prompting us to bring to the world a "view of faith and a view of love".

If not everything was simple during these dialogues (still the educational stakes were important and the questions profound...) we could say that all the participants enriched their life and their love for education during this period.

3 — The creation of the Association

In 1978, conscious of the necessity of working "together", the De La Salle Association was created. What were its original aims?

— Object of the Association

The purpose of the Association is to develop the educational and spiritual values proposed by Saint John Baptist De La Salle and by his Institute, to maintain and promote a Christian education for the young within educational institutions, such as are described in the document "Points of View on Christian Education and on Education in the Faith" (Please refer to the General Chapter of 1967 and to the National Chapter of 1969).

For this purpose, The Association multiplies the links of mutual help and cooperation between, on one part, the members of the Congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, and on the other, the Directors named or recognized by it to direct the school establishment and those who wish to belong to this Association.

In 1979 another role of the Association was carefully studied: that of a trusteeship of the members institutions, the Brothers Visitors of the French Region having adopted the following two resolutions:

1. The Congregation of the Brothers of the Christian School can also exercise, through the La Salle Association a trusteeship when a school run by a layman belongs to the Association.

2. For this relationship, the Brother Visitor of the District within the territory where the school run by a layman is located, should first of all give his consent to the Administrative Council of the Association.

It must be noted here that when a school hands over its trusteeship to the Lasallian Association, an agreement is signed between the Association and the Diocesan Community for Catholic Education in the diocese where the school is located in order to establish good cooperation between the two entities.

4 — The composition and function ot the Association

— Composition

The Association is made up of founding members, associate members, and corresponding members.

a) The*founding* members are:

— The members of the Conference of Brothers Visitors of France, members by right;

— The lay directors of the Catholic schools, who together with the Brothers Visitors, had set up the Association.

b) The Associate Members can be:

— Everyone who exercises the function of head of a school or of an Academic Director;

— A representative of the management of the institution whose statutes are in keeping with the aims and purposes of the Association;

— The national secretaries of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools;

c) The corresponding Members are those physical persons who have proposed their candidature and have been accepted by the Council of the Administration.

— Its function

The Administrative Council of the Association meets on an average of twice per trimester. It is composed of eleven people: The Brothers in charge of the Region, five other Brothers, and five laymen.

The President is always a layman and the Secretary is a Brother. In order to collaborate more closely with the Association, the Institute has released a Brother for the post of "Secretary of Education".

Our reflections and our common Brothers-Laymen endeavours have led the Secretariat of Education to publish regularly a magazine "Lasallian Educational Activity". This magazine contains numerous educational topics and pays great attention to the daily existence of our Institutions.

In 1981-82, a "White Book" entitled, "Schools for the Young", about the Lasallian Schools, was published and widely diffused, in particular to selected regional and national institutions, as well as to the Ministry of National Education.

The Association and the Secretariat for Education have taken the trouble to organize meetings of Directors, both Brothers and lay, and each year some Lasallian week-ends to which all educators are invited. It was during these national and regional meetings that, among other themes, the deepening of the Lasallian educational plan in all its different forms, was tackled, work has been the object of an article in the magazine cited above.

In 1984 and 1985, meetings were organized in each district of France.

Occasionally, the President of the Association and some lay members of the council are invited to one of the meetings of the Visitors' Conference of France.

Likewise, the Assembly of the Brothers of the Region of France received a delegation of lay Directors during its meeting of 1982 and devoted some time to the work of the Lasallian Association.

As can be seen very well, the Brothers and the laity have thus decided to cooperate with one another in the study of the living tradition coming down to us from the Founder.

These meetings with the members of the Institute are also a privileged opportunity for the lay people to have an exchange with the Brothers in all simplicity.

Still, there is yet another mode of action which is very important in the Association and that is the Visits to the Institutions. These are of two kinds:

a) When a school asks to join the Association, an "Introductory" visit of two days is made to the place. One Brother and one lay member of the Council of the Association, accompanied by the Brother Visitor of the District, come to the school to meet the administrators and all the others who make up the educational community.

The Director is invited to prepare the programme of the two days which delves also into the financial and administrative conditions of the school as well as the spiritual and pedagogical matters, future plans, etc..

Recommendations are made on accepting the institution into the Lasallian Association.

b) Periodically, the member Institutions are visited, usually for a day or for a day and a half. This is an opportunity of strengthening the ties, of mutual examination and of enrichment.

A report, drawn up in collaboration with the Director, is sent to the Council of the Association.

At present, six institutions spread throughout France are Associate members of the Association. They educate close to 15,000 children, of which a relatively important proportion are in Technical Training.

LASALLIAN ASSOCIATIONS IN AFRICA

During the months of November and December, 1985, I made a trip through the French-speaking countries of Africa. I visited some of the works of the Brothers in seven countries: Burkina Faso, Togo, Cameroon, Zaire, Rwanda, Madagascar, and Egypt. As you can imagine, I returned with my soul filled with memories, experiences, hope, and gratitude. I discovered things which left me astounded and filled me with respect. I should like to share with the Lasalliana readers some of my experiences because I feel that everyone will find satisfaction in finding out about Lasallians far beyond.

Purpose of the trip

I am the Brother Moderator of the Lasallian Associations and a bit of an "animator" of the Signum Fidei spiritual movement. For both of these, it seemed that it was opportune to make contact with the various African Districts in order, on my part, to clearly explain to the Brothers the scope and the evolution of the Associations and the meaning of Signum Fidei. Also, I wanted to offer to our secular Lasallian friends the possibility of being integrated into these Lasallian movements, in case they have not already been so, in keeping with the changes and progress in the spirit which has taken hold recently within the Lasallian family.

Common characteristics

So that I do not repeat myself in some important things, I want to cite a few of them which were the leit motif in all these countries:

— The Brothers, and especially the Visitors, everywhere, received me fraternally: they always made me feel that I was among Brothers. But, I was among, let us say, "special" Brothers who give their life's strength, living at times in very difficult and poor circumstances, even the most poor. The Brothers went out of their way to help me. The local Brothers are not only our hope but are La Salle Brothers of the highest calibre.

The Lasallian lay people paid close attention and showed extraordinary interest in my "message".

— In each District, arrangements were made for me to meet with numerous secular organizations.

— With these groups I had meetings, friendly, leisurely chats, about La Salle today.

— The immediate result everywhere was full acceptance, far surpassing my fullest expectations.

— I believe that in each case, I left with a new understanding of the local Association.

— I think that I have left the basis which, with time and goodwill, will lead to the founding of a national federation.

— The Signum Fidei has been for many a pleasant surprise and the seed of this organization has been well sown.

Other kinds of Characteristics

The work of these districts shows an extraordinary vision of the future, and at the same time, and in the founders, there exists a total confidence in the result of a quality Christian and human education.

— Many of the buildings which were constructed from the very beginning of the Brothers' activities are very astounding. They are big, well laid out, quite functional, and architecturally aesthetic. It is evident that the districts of origin gave themselves heart and soul to their missionary work, and it is equally evident that the local Brothers, lacking the personnel of former times, use their innovative genius to carry on these same activities with many students and with the cooperation of lay teachers who work together with a notable Lasallian spirit.

— The "inculturation" of our communities in these countries is evident.

— Equally evident is that our schools are packed with a multitude of students who are hungering for education and learning. They are full of life and joy, very versatile and curious about the young people in the old world.

— Still more outstanding is the desire to be joined in La Salle with so many friends from other places and together to seek the realization of what De La Salle had envisioned in this world.

— Finally, what was very striking was the identity of the Lasallian spirit which I was able to appreciate in the Houses of Formation: postulants, novices, and scholastics. It was great to see the fascination of these young religious who are thinking of delicating their life to the same ideal to which I, myself, and so many other Brothers have dedicated ours. This was a source of joy and hope. It is no wonder that Africa is called "the Continent of Hope".

BURKINA FASO — (Upper Volta) — I visited Ouagadougou, Bobo-Diuoulasso, Tunuma, and Tusiana.

Everywhere it was a delight to see the afternoon dismissal from class. And you think about how, thanks to the Brothers, these countries are made up of well-prepared and responsible citizens. Thanks to the Church, they are good Christians. In Ouagadougou and Bobo Dioulasso, after dismissal, another wave, this time adults, enter the same classrooms to learn how to read and write. It is the students from the final year themselves who help their fellow countrymen to rise from their illiteracy. Admirable! I met a multitude of them in Tounouma, a smaller group in Ouagadougou, and I talked to the boarding students in Toussiana. This is beautiful work because all of these students are admitted free. Brother Dominique, Visitor, promised his assistance.

TOGO — I visited Lomé and Togoville

In Lomé, I had a meeting with the National Lasallian Directory, who were well disposed and attentive. In Togoville, there is another great spectacle of a new large school for young people, right along side the common people who are still guided by mysterious ancestral tribal rituals. What a contrast! Here, the Spanish Brothers are carrying on some extraordinary work. I spoke with a young promising group, had a dialogue with the Postulants in Lomé and spoke with various classes of students in St. Joseph's.

CAMEROON — I visited Yaundé, Duala, Mbanga, Bafang, Efok. The Brother Visitor was my guide.

I had many meetings in Yaundé, Mbanga and Bafang which were outstanding. Still, one of the best of these was in Duala where I was told that more than 300 Lasallian youths already have a meaningful association. I saw various groups of the Signum Fidei and Lasallian Cameroonian Youth. This was a very fruitful as well as enjoyable encounter. Apart from this, De La Salle College of Douala, for example, is very impressive in every way: its shops for trades are first class as are its classrooms, campus, building, and its room with 20 computers, which the young students operate so very well."Cameroon would not be what it is without the Brothers, "Brother Pouliot, Visitor remarked. In Efok, the Brothers offer help to the farmers in the region. I spoke with the postulants and scholastics. I met with another Group of well disposed Lasallian Youths and with another fervent Signum Fidei Group.

ZAIRE — I was in Kinshasa, Tumba, Boma, Matadi, Mbanza...

All these names are very important in the history of the Brothers in Zaire. The Lasallians there impressed us with their great openness to, interest in, the "new" Association, which is less new for them because two of their friends who had attended the meeting in Mexico brought news back. Many alumni hold important government posts and among them is the Prime Minister, who received us graciously. Also, the Bishop of Boma, who invited us for dinner, offered words of welcome and sent his regards to the Brothers who had forged the great center at Boma and he expressed his desire that the Brothers return there. There was a visit to the center with Brother Visitor, who promised this return of the Brothers. There were meetings with Lasallians in Boma, with an encouraging group in Kinshasa, Matadi and Tumba. All these places have good buildings filled with students. I had the pleasure of talking to the French-speaking novices and postulants of Africa who are in Kinshasa. It is a good and promising group. I spoke to them about our mission. A thing of great interest was the Museum of Zairean Modern Art which is under the care of Brother Michel and the Ancient Art, under the care of Brother Cornet, National Director of Museums. I am grateful to Brother Visitor who prepared my work schedule and acted as my guide.

Here is another interesting detail. I had brought with me from Rome some copies of the Draft of the Rule for the Brothers to discuss prior to the General Chapter. The communities in Zaire had not received the copies sent to them by mail. However, one former Brother came to the Provincialate to give the Brothers a copy which he had found and purchased at the public market!

RWANDA — I visited Byumba, Butaré, and Kigali.

Byumba is a big boarding school for poor boys and is well taken care of by an excellent community and outstanding faculty. I had a long conversation with the former students, with the "Lasallian Family" and with many students. In Butaré I met with the Rwandan Federation Directory with whom I had a long dialogue. Brother Visitor accompanied me and promised to help form a national Federation. Brother Willy Joegens will help also from Butaré itself. I took the opportunity to speak with the Brothers Scholastics who are studying in this university city. There are about ten of them and they are very promising. Kisaro is an agricultural school. Rwanda is a country of a thousand hills. When it rains, soil erosion causes quite a bit of damage. The water saturates the ground and ends by eroding it. The Brothers direct the Agricultural School and teach the boys how to convert the hillside into terraces. There are two planting sessions and two harvests each year. The young students learn how to select seeds, raise animals, make flour, sausages, bread, etc..

MADAGASCAR — I visited Tananarivo, Tamatava, Ambositra, Analabe, Soavimbaoaka, and Moramanga.

In the absence of the Brother Visitor, the National Moderator of the Lasallian Association, Brother Edmon, was my mentor and excellent guide. We visited Tanarive where the schools of St. Joseph, the oldest of the Brothers' schools and Holy Family school are located. Here I was overwhelmed by the warm reception which I received. The house of formation in Soavimbaoaka contains aspirants who are now my friends and Brothers who refuse to retire. In Tamatava I set a new record for meetings, having given six hours of talks in one day in the three magnificent Lasallian schools which have more than 3,00 pupils. It also has a "Lasallian Family", three sections of graduating students with more than 60 students in each section. We visited the provincial Governor who expressed his admiration for the education in La Salle. Here the pupils sang "Honneur à Toi" very enthusiastically even though they did not understand the meaning of the song.

Analabe is the place of the Novitiate where a dozen Novices offered an emotional and unique liturgy. In Ambositra we visited with some forty teachers connected with the school of Saint Louis. We met for another two hours with the Lasallian Family, presided over by General Councilor Brother Vincent Rabemahafaly, and the meeting was impressive by the quantity and quality of his help. In Madagascar there were three Signum Fidei groups, headed by Brother Marcellin. Together with him, we prayed and reflected and encouraged one another to continue in our fervor. In Moramanga I spoke with students, alumni, and teachers in St. John of Matha College. The Sunday Mass and the meeting and prayer with the La Sallian family were memorable.

EGYPT — I visited Cairo (Daher) Khoronfish, Alexandria, and the Regional Novitiate.

Also here, the Daher community received me fraternally, the head of the Region, Brother Regis prepared contacts for me, and Brother Raymond Berzi took me to the various meetings. The Association of Daher in full session took part in my presentation of the Lasallian Association. The chapter is young and well oriented. In Alexandria, in the famous St. Mark's College, the Association explained its activities, among which is blood donating, which is very difficult in the muslim atmosphere. There I saw their social hall, full of young people. We had a meeting about the new Association and the idea was received without reserve. I visited the Regional Novitiate for the Near East and met there with four Lebanese novices and one Egyptian who show high hopes for the future. I had a meeting with some young people which was called, "Youth-Brothers" with Brother Yves in charge. This meeting left me very impressed. They spoke of the Brothers' vocation as a blessing for Egypt. In Egypt they prepared for me a visit to the sounds and sights of the pyramids. It was magnificent!

CONCLUSION — In Africa I found the loyalty to the Brothers, devotion to the Holy Founder, and the acceptance of the "New Association" on the same high level as in Europe. We met alumni everywhere, even et the airport where they facilitated certain formalities.

— I sincerely wish that I have left as good memories as those which I have taken with me.

— My purpose was to awaken an understanding of the Association and I believe that I have succeeded.

— I wish to express my astonishment at the work being done by the Brothers who are giving their health and life to present the Christian and Lasallian message in such exemplary and fabulous schools.

— I must express my gratitude for the overwhelming hospitality I received everywhere and in return I affirm my respect and admiration for the richness and generosity of the African spirit.

HELP TO CHILDREN WITH DIFFICULTIES IN STUDIES

Project

After ten years of teaching regular classes on the primary level. I asked myself in what apostolate I should continue my work. Three possibilities presented themselves to me: become a missionary in Cameroon, teach teenagers in the secondary school, or continue on in the primary but directing my attention only toward that clientele of children having difficulties in adapting themselves to their studies. After discussing the matter with my Brother Visitor, I decided upon the third option.

Seeing that I lacked the scholastic credentials for working with such children, I enrolled at the University of Sherbrooke where I received my Masters Degree in Education, with orthopedagogy as my major. I sought employment at the Educational Commission of Rivière-du-Loup, where we have a community. My services were accepted at once.

Now, for the past eleven years I have been engaged in this work.

The task consists of coming to the assistance of pupils who have difficulties in learning and in adapting themselves at the beginning of the primary course. I do this work in two public schools. "The Open Class", which is the name given to my class, indicates my availability to accept for three to five lessons a week, pupils from the Home Rooms of the first three primary grades, in view of giving them personal pedagogical help.

Special Pupils

These children, who are usually intellectually gifted, are referred by the subject teacher and those in charge of the school, because they are presenting some problems or have a very slow rhythm in language learning, in reading (this is the majority of the cases), in mathematics, and sometimes in writing.

The length of the special help varies between three months and two years. When the child attains the level of reading or of calculation equal to his proper grade level, when his language usage has become adequate, he ceases little by little to profit by this form of help.

From the first meetings, I evaluate the level of each child by a diagnostic test. The results obtained serve as a guide for the assistance which I will give to each child.

For the help sessions, the child comes either alone or together with one or two other pupils experiencing the same difficulties.

Main activities

On the language level, the children are at first given exercises in articulation in view of loosening up their jaws and tongue, in view of mastering such or such a sound. Other exercises develop proper respiration and the quality of their hearing. Then they are led to pronounce everyday words better and better. Progressively, through game activities, their oral communication develops.

The syllabic method is further used as an aid to reading. The child goes from the level of letters to that of syllables or sounds, then to words, and finally to phrases. A certain number of words are learned totally. A reading program is adapted for each child.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The children arrive at an understanding of mathematical systems by learning how to handle slide rules and logical blocks. Also they learn to correctly perform the arithmetic operations according to their level of studies.

In the course of the meeting, some psycho-motor exercises give the pupils a little rest from their effort and help them to acquire greater self-mastery. Certain exercises develop a better awareness of their body, its symmetry, equilibrium, the coordination between the hand and the eye, and the loosening of the wrists. From other exercises they learn to relax.

Some reactions

The parents are invited to work together with the school during those times when special attention is being given to their child. They can come to meet with me especially when they return the "scholastic bulletins". These relations with the parents are important for the development of the child himself.

All the pupils benefiting by the "open class" appreciate the help sessions and they always find the time too short. The initiatives for helping them are personalized as well as multisensory. Because of the climate of confidence and the motivating framework which surround the sessions, the pupils, beside learning how to speak better, read better, and count better, feel better "in their own skin", are more open and happier to be alive.

Development

After some time, the helping formula evolved. Thus, in the two schools where I work, the teachers are in charge of a double class. That is to say that they have two groups of pupils of different levels. To free these teachers and to achieve a better pedagogy, I work with one of these two groups.

Sometimes I take the ten best pupils of a class of the same level, the homeroom teacher works with the others. On occasions, I help the teacher during the French or mathematics courses, staying with him in the same class room, as a type of "team-teaching".

Conclusion

I really like my work in the two schools which were assigned to me by the Education Commission of Rivière-du-Loup. It has been for me a great joy to assure a good start, at the beginning of the primary grades, to those pupils who need assistance in their first school training.

To collaborate with the teachers, parents, and school administrators, all of whom are solicitous of giving a quality education to each child, is for me also an elevating task and very Lasallian.

BROTHER SCUBILION (4): BROTHER SCUBILION'S SPIRITUAL SCHOOL: PRAYER AND DEDICATION

What are we going to do with Brother Scubilion once the Church has glorified him by declaring him Blessed? That is a big question. For the Church intends, by this distinct honor to a very modest teacher and catechist, to present him to us as a model and guide. Yet this was a man who never aspired to diffuse avant guard messages, but tried to grow ever more closely (like Christ with regard to the lepers) to outcasts of a slave society. Thus he practiced the Gospel, and nothing but the Gospel, and so he is able to arouse in us evangelical attitudes.

Before trying, in conclusion, to bring some of the traits of this attractive figure out in relief, I should like to draw attention to what seems to me to be the unifying factor of this life, in following Christ: prayer and dedication. By his fidelity to prayer, even if the form of certain of these prayers is no longer in vogue, he modeled himself after the Heart of Christ the Saviour and was dedicated without reserve, like Him, "to teach the Good News to the poor".

Now numerous authoritative voices (the hierarchy, theologians, pastors, etc.) are today forcefully proclaiming the indissoluble links between prayer life and the dedication towards one's mission, with the preferential option of the most poor. This dedication is, as it were, the evangelical test of the authenticity of our prayer. An eminent present day theologian writes: "He who prays and seeks redemption in the name of Christ, cannot come to terms with oppression. And the more Christians dedicate themselves to the lives of the hungry, the rights of the oppressed, and in association with the forsaken, the more deeply they are led to incessant prayer". To pray and to dedicate one's self are two complementary beats of every Christian heart.

And Helder Camara, so well-known for his firm but non-violent stance in favour of the oppressed among his people, affirms in his turn: "Prayer and Christian dedication are but one. A horizontal arm, by itself, will never become a cross; neither is an arm raised vertically a cross; there must be a crossing of the two to have the cross of Christ, the total of the love of God and of love for men".

On this subject, Brother Scubilion could help us to acquire the Christian reflex and to unite in an indissoluble way in our life and prayer, "the spiritual life" and dedication. I should very much like to resort to a term which, without doubt, would be astonishing because it never figured into the vocabulary of that epoch: a "mystical dedication", on the part of an adorer, a contemplative, a searcher for God, hungry for prayer; on the other side, an indefatigable servant of the most oppressed of his Brothers.

He was neither a thinker, nor a theologian, nor a theorizor on service. But he was an image of God which he would certainly not disavow and which thoroughly inspired his humble service to the slaves; an image of "that God, so poor, so great, so vulnerable, that no one can love him without loving man, and whom one can wound so gravely by wounding man". (Liturgical Hymn "Who Then is God?").

At a time when, in the Church so many people are talking about a "preferential choice in favour of the poor", Brother Scubilion could light the way for us, he who, with a very sure theological instinct and without "reasoning things out" joined them in their distress, in the name of that God who Himself has declared that He is affected when a hand is laid upon them or harm is done to them: "God hears the cry of the poor!" (Psalm 34,7). "Will all these evildoers never learn, they who eat up my people just as they eat bread?" (Psalm 14.4) Without any theory, without any perception of the social order, spontaneously (evangelically) he addressed himself to the real needs of these people, and he brought himself to love the most poor: the slaves and newly liberated slaves. The permanency of his memory in La Reunion finds herein, to a great extent, its explanation.

Brothers Scubilion was not a "politician". He did not campaign for the suppression of slavery, which he felt was above all so inhumane and constituted a defiance of the Gospel. He was not a militant abolitionist after the manner of a Victor Shoelcher, of the same period, in the Mother land and in the Antilles.[1] But when slavery was officially abolished (1848), he had personally and a long time before, abolished any distance between himself and his friends, the slaves: 1848 was as much his own celebration as theirs! We shall recall that he was then at Saint-Leu.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

After the emancipation, he was not a firebrand, after the manner of Father Joffard, who was the parish priest of Saint-Leu, only for three months (February-April 1849), then his own parish priest. Eschewing the polemics of this confused priest, Brother Scubilion led a more discreet activity with the liberated populace, which exercised a real influence over them and which irritated the colonists and led to his departure for La Possession (1850).

Thus, in action, as well as in prayers, Brother Scubilion invites us to follow the path of the Gospel which he followed. This is a path which each must discover for himself, "rediscovering" it in another way than that of the nineteenth century. For the poor and the victims of injustice are still among us. How do we find them and attach ourselves to them?

On this point, by his attitude and practice, Brother Scubilion could help us acquire this sensitivity toward injustice, to feel this "raising of the heart" which leads us to resist and combat injustice by our pedagogical, social, civically adapted, and effective activity inspired by the Beatitudes: these are the weapons of those fighting for justice and peace.

We do not ask this mystic, this devotee of the Holy Eucharist, the Sacred Heart, and Mary to instill in us and bog us down with lethargic devotions, because purely personal and timid devotions merely lend themselves to the acceptance of an unjust social order. Contact with Brother Scubilion is not meant to assuage our conscience but it rather ought to awaken in us at the same time a more authentic prayer and a concrete and effective evangelical solidarity.

Of course, there are numerous Christians, especially in La Reunion, who confide to the saint their sufferings and their anguish, and ask of him a favor of a cure. But perhaps we ought to turn the problem around and ask ourselves how each one of us today can become a sign and witness of the tenderness of God for those among whom we live, and thus accomplish for others the true "miracles" which only, and in secret, the Father in heaven will see?

In conclusion, I shall try to put into digest form some of the characteristics of the spiritual physiognomy of Brother Scubilion. Being a man who was a "transparency of God", as a witness, he communicated what he lived so deeply. He had a simple heart and a life devoid of artificiality or complication. Faced with the situation of his time, He did not advance weighed down by problems or armed with abstract principles, but with the quiet certitude of faith.

He has been called the "smiling ascetic". His devotion to the cross goes a long way back. We know for certainty what Jean-Bernard's bed-side book had been for nearly twenty years. It was a book of not less than 270 pages of Meditations on the Passion, wherein one reads "Whatever you want to know, you can learn from the cross". He was impregnated with this doctrine, leaving to others less generous, "bargain basement graces". He lived a rough life: the climate without doubt was rigorous, at least during some months in the suffocating tropic heat of the coast, but there were also the voluntary privations he imposed upon himself. "He was very strict with himself, never given to self-pity, but he never carried mortification to a point where it would render him incapable of fulfilling his duties and obligations".

Even if Brother Scubilion shared in effect the rather lugubrious fervor which was in the spirit of that period, it was above all in the perspective of mission, as St. Paul writing to Timothy. "Suffer along with me for the sake of the Gospel". He lived under the seal of the cross, the tree of life.

Brother Scubilion was also a man of peace and reconciliation. This is not to downplay our own troubled times when recognition cannot be achieved without confrontation. Our missionary never practiced the Manicheism which classifies, judges, opposes black and white, rich and poor. "He refused to engage in an apostolate of classes and of races. He gave himself to everyone", (Msgr. Aubry, Bishop of La Reunion, homily of April 17, 1983). This was prompted by an evangelical impulse, we repeat, which directed his energies toward the pariahs of his day. Brother Scubilion quite naturally furthered the "grace of dialogue" for La Reunion. He can address the same fraternal message to everyone, not of course, to dissuade us from justifiable political problems or social action (cf the present position taken by the Church in Latin America), but so that they would be treated in the manner and spirit of the Gospel.

In conclusion, we express the wish that, beginning from the Island of La Reunion (where his reputation is well established), throughout the whole world, and among the Brothers, in any case, the apostle of the humble, "the slave of the slaves", be better known and that his message — not written but lived — would arouse us from our tepidity, and render us docile in spirit, daring, and inventive.

FOREWORD

The LASALLIANA launches into its fourth year...

During the General Chapter, we profited by the presence of most of the Brothers Visitors here in Rome to conduct a little evaluation of the first three years of this publication. We submitted a brief questionnaire to them to get their personal opinions of the publication and to solicit their suggestions for the future of Lasalliana.

We received 37 responses to this questionnaire, which represents about 50% of the Districts and Delegations. The capitulants who were not Visitors believed that they should not respond, and this was regrettable but understandable. Å greater percentage of responses would have had a still greater value.

By way of a foreword to this number, we should like to present here a faithful echo of the responses to the first question: "What is your personal opinion of the Lasalliana?".

All the responses were positive. They expressed appreciation of the following aspects:

★ The Lasallian vitality, the richness and diversity of topics presented by the articles.

★ The instrument of communication and information which gives the readers a better knowledge of the Founder and of the Institute today.

★ The brevity of the texts in no way, however, detracts from the seriousness and profundity of the subjects because they are the result of research or personal experience.

★ The useful, practical, and concrete aspects of the articles lend to their being used with groups of Brothers or Lasallian lay people.

★ The summaries of Lasallian spirituality, the exercise of the ministry, and the pivotal points of education which can be found here.

★ The stimulating dimension these articles hold for the readers and, without doubt, for the authors themselves.

★ The convenience of classification and reference, thanks to the type of format and the enumeration of each article.

This collection of responses reveals also the main uses which can be made of this material, even in those countries where the texts must first be translated into the national language. It can be further garnered:

— that the use of the articles is often selective: the texts chosen are those which essentially are more directly adapted to local situations. That is both natural and legitimate and very much in keeping with the purpose of the publication; — that the formation groups are the most frequently cited;

— that the articles are also used for all kinds of Lasallian encounters;

— that the various constituents of the educational community can also derive profit from this publication.

Sometimes this general satisfaction was continued on with expressions of gratitude not only toward those in Rome who are responsible for its publication, but also towards the authors who have contributed articles thus far. I am happy that these authors were also thought of because it is they who give this review its true value.

Among the expressions of gratitude, I should like to quote verbatim one of the opinions received: "The Lasalliana is the best publication which we receive from the Motherhouse. It is appreciated by everyone!"

The 41st General Chapter was very much marked by the theme of the "Interdependence" of the Institute. It is encouraging to ascertain that the Lasalliana seeks to be a means of expressing and spreading this interdependence.

THE FIRST NOVITIATE AND TRAINING SCHOOL FOR COUNTRY TEACHERS

At Rheims Three Hundred Years Ago:

1. Continual Formation as well as, and in addition to, initial formation

When he deals with the history of the initial years of De La Salle's Community, Brother Bernard observes that as yet there was no noviciate. And he adds a few words which we could find quite humorous:

> "It was enough for an applicant (later on called, 'postulant') to have been about a fortnight with this holy man to be prepared to be sent out teaching, such were the examples of virtue that he gave them; he and his Brothers were such an inspirations". (BD 79)

When these two weeks, which, let us say, were spent in an optimum manner, were over, the young Brother continued to live quite close to De La Salle; in contact with him, the young man's formation continued for many years.

Here is how Brother Bernard explains the opening of the first novitiate:

> "Since he was a man of faith, he looked for the hand of God in everything that happened to him, and this is what could be noticed in what we are about to relate. A young man, fifteen years of age, who had presented himself for reception into the Institute, was sent to the Servant of God while he was still in Rheims. He was accepted even though it was not customary to receive candidates so young. After a short time, three more like him came. Then, the Servant of God, recognizing in the acceptance of these young men that God was offering an occasion favourable to the Institute, decided to establish a community with these four plus any others like them who would subsequently come. It so happened that God so blessed this enterprise that in two months this little community was composed of twelve young men, for whom a rule was provided and an older Brother was assigned to live with them in order to win them over to Christ, according to the example of the Apostle". (BD 84)

Maillefer and Blain also speak about the opening of this "little community".

> "This little seminary, 'writes blain' served as a preparation and as a novitiate for the Institute... The schedule there was somewhat like that followed today in the novitiate". (I.280)
> "The exercises followed there", adds Maillefer, "were a bit like those in practice at present in the novitiate of the Institute". (Ms Re, 68)

These clear affirmations made no impression on those in the nineteenth century who would be the creators of what was then called the "Junior Novitiate", presented as the restoration, after 150 years, of the institution created in Rheims in 1686 or 1687. This often led to treating these "little novices" as if they were equal to novices and to giving them a schedule of rules and practices which could very well have the validity of the canonical year of formation.

2. A certain lack of precision: 1686 or 1687?

The first three biographers, Bernard, Maillefer, and Blain, place the opening of this novitiate before the departure of De La Salle for Paris. That, then, would be before 1688. Their accounts lead us to believe, that this was not a last-minute operation: The Founder certainly would have valued following the initial steps of these three in the novitiate above any advantage he might gain in Paris.

On the other hand, our oldest register of admissions contains, for the year 1686, the admission in October of that year of a youth named Jean Jacot (or Jacquot), the future Assistant of Brothers Barthélemy and Timothy, who was then only 14 years old. He was probably one of the first novices, if not the very first. No other name of a 14 or 15 year old boy appears in the register for that year. Still, we have to be prudent because we do not have the actual register of that distant year in its original form, rather we have merely a compilation dating back to 1714 which does not contain the names of all of the Brothers then living in the Institute.

Until we are better informed, let us leave the choice between the year 1686 and the year following.

In 1689 or 1690, when he would write the Treatise on the Holy Habit, the Founder would present the novitiate at Rheims as an institution in full operation:

> "Also in this community, youths of good disposition and piety are trained, and when they are judged to be, and reckon themselves to be, prepared, they then enter one of the teaching communities.
> They are accepted into the formation community at the age of fourteen or older".
> "They are trained in mental prayer and in other exercises of piety. They are instructed in all the catechetical materials and they are taught to read and write perfectly". (MH, 7)

3. A Seminary for Country Teachers. A Training School for Country Teachers

The Brothers of De La Salle would go only to the towns; only there could they lead a community life which was for them so indispensable. Still, very soon, the Founder demonstrated his concern for the needs of the rural population. It was said that he was available to take charge of the training of young candidates who intended to become teachers in rural areas. Thus, since April 2 1683, in a statement made by the above mentioned, Canon Remi Favart declared:

> "He did not wish to retain any right over the said house (acquired by him) which would be used by the venerable and discreet person, John Baptist De La Salle, priest, doctor of theology, canon of the said church, for lodging there gratuitous schools begun in the said place in Rechtel, and to lodge the teachers who apply, even to establish there, if he can, a training school for country teachers for the said diocese of Rheims". (Cf. BEC 161, April 1960).

It was not until 1685 that De La Salle formally committed himself, and this twice, to furnish "Brothers" for the training of school teachers for rural areas: the first time was for the diocese of Rheims, the second time for the diocese of Laon, but each time it was for the land of the Duke de Mazarin. The first contract would not be valid without the agreement of the Archbishop of Rheims; when the Archbishop met the Duke and De La Salle, he unceremoniously showed them the door: "Both of you are fools", he told them. Now, the second contract for a foundation outside the diocese of Rheims, appears to have never even gotten started.

Yet, in 1686 or 1687, things changed: it was no longer the Duke, a persona non grata with the archbishop, but it was the priests of the diocese of Rheims who asked De La Salle to train auxiliaries for their parishes who would also be at the same time school teachers. This time the Saint could no longer escape.

For Bernard, the opening of this training school for country teachers followed that of the Novitiate (Bd 85) but remained prior to the departure of De La Salle for Paris. Maillefer holds on to the year 1687 (Ms Re, 68). For Blain, the novitiate and the training school were opened "about the same time". (I 279)

In his "Treatise on the Habit", the holy Founder presents the "Seminary" with a certain detail:

> "Here (in this community) efforts were made to train teachers for country schools in a house which was separate from the community and which was called a seminary.
> Those who were trained there, lived there only for a few years until they were entirely trained in piety as well as in the work.
> The only habit they wore was that worn ordinarily by people of the world, except that it was black or at least very dark brown, and they were distinguished from other lay people by a rabat and by wearing their hair shorter.
> There they were taught to sing, read, and write perfectly. Without any charge, they were given room, board, and laundry. After that they were placed in some town or village where they acted as clerks; once assigned there, they no longer had any contact with the community except for some friendly social one. However, they were accepted there to make their retreat". (MH 4, 5, 6).

Thus it was that three hundred years ago, that would be from the very first years of its existence, the Lasallian work appeared happily diversified: the Brothers themselves took charge of the children in the city parishes; by their training of clerk-teachers, they assured the education of the children in the rural parishes, which perhaps had been more neglected. Upon their entry into the "Community", the postulants were trained under the eyes of the Founder in a novitiate where it was desirable that their preparation be well adapted for what they would do next.

A PEDAGOGY BASED ON PARTICIPATION

As man goes along unveiling the secrets of Mother Nature and taking charge of her resources, he discovers the necessity for cooperating with his fellow man in order to speed up and intensify the fulfillment of these objectives.

Communication, dialogue, participation and exchange of views-these are all activities that have been coming to the fore in all organizations and social groupings. The multinationals, diverse international scientific projects, political bedfellows, and the Common Market are but a few everyday reminders of this phenomenon.

The school, in its several levels, must prepare its students for a critical apprenticeship and a future exercise of this active participation. For this, there is nothing more effective than the application of practical exercises with the students. Such has been the method of the Lasallian school from its very beginnings. A cursory perusal of the Conduct of Schools amply attests to this. Consequently, I will omit the pages that deal with the "Officers" of De La Salle's school; I will limit myself to refer to passages which are less known but none the less significant.

From the moment the Lasallian school opened its doors at seven-thirty in the morning until they were closed again at four-thirty in the afternoon, the cooperation and participation of the pupils in their scholastic activities, both personal and group-oriented, were active and constant.

The students were accustomed to enter the class a half hour before the teacher. The minute regulations that governed this waiting period didn't leave a moment to chance that disorder of lack of discipline would take place; rather, as small boys are mightily tempted to act up, the Conduct foresees such an eventuality in this fashion:

> "The first master and the inspector of the schools will name one of the more sensible pupils to take note of the students that cause noise while they are arriving. His job is to simply write this down without saying anything. He will afterwards pass this information on to the teacher in such a way that the other students do not realize it". (Cf. 1st part, Chap. 1, art. 1, page 8).

The most effective way (to avoid) disorder in the schoolroom is to restrain curiosity; for that end, the students reviewed their lessons before class; and in order that the little ones would not waste time:

> "The teacher should designate two students from an upper level to teach them the letters and syllables". (Ibid., page 9).

Now classes have begun. After the prayer comes the reading period. During this class the pupils help the teacher constantly. If one of the little boys does not know a letter:

> "The teacher will ask another child who does know it". (Cf. 1st part, Chap. III, art. 2, section 2, page 31).

When the student is breaking words down into syllables and mispronounces a syllable, if he is not able to correct himself:

> "The teacher will point to another so that he may correct it". (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 1, art. 1, page 119).

A bit further on the Conduct indicates just what the limits of this help should be:

> "The teacher will only intervene when there is no pupil that is able to help his companions". (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 1, art. 3, page 124).

During breakfast and the morning snack the students would review their lessons and the catechism. As the teacher had to attend the general order of the class:

> "He would name a boy to help him who, for this occasion, at least, would be be the inspector". (Cf. 1st part, Cap. II, art. 2, page 15).

If someone had to fulfill a punishment for being absent without permission:

> "A companion would be named to proctor his reading". (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 6, art. 4, page 198).

Even more than the reading class, the maths lesson lent itself to the practice of mutual assistance among the pupils. In a case in which a student would make a mistake in doing one of the functions:

> "The teacher would indicate to another boy of the same grade or of an upper level to do the correction. And only when there is no child that is able to do so will the teacher himself make the correction". (Cf. 1st part, Chap. 5, page 74).

What teacher hasn't had to pick up, just about every day, objects that can distract the attention of the class to the matter at hand? The Conduct indicates that, in these cases:

> "There be a student in charge of picking them up, putting them away and, at the end of the class, will give them to the teacher who will then return them to their owners or do with them what seems most proper". (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 1, art. 2, page 121).

In spite of the fact that the Conduct recommends that teachers punish their pupils very little (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 5, art. 2, page 153) it does recognize that there are times when they must do so, but not

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

during the catechism explanation, prayers or Holy Mass. At these moments:

> "a student will be encharged with taking careful note of those that deserve a punishment, that will be given to them at another time". (Cf. and part, Cap. 5, art. 9, section 1, page 178).

There were cases, of course, in which the teacher should have to apply a punishment at a later time and would possibly forget it. To avoid that situation:

> "The teacher would name one or more of the pupils to observe that a punishment would be carried out, and if such were not the case, to remind the teacher". (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 5, art. 9, section 1, page 178).

While assigning them to places in class the teacher will take into account the help that some will be able to lend to their companions.

> "He will place the newly-arrived at the side of those that fulfill their duties very well, so that they will learn by their example". (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 5, art. 6, section 4, page 169, and 3rd part, Chap. 3, art. 1, page 250).
> When a child would begin his ABC's...
> "So that he can learn to follow in the book while the others are reading, the teacher will assign a companion to teach him how to follow. He will give him this help for as many days as are necessary". (Cf. 1st part, Chap. 3, art. 3, page 35).

The teacher will adopt this same strategy on assigning places for the writing class:

> "As far as possible he will place the students who are being promoted a grade at the side of those who are able to make elegant flourishes so that they can learn from them". (Cf. 3rd part, Chap. 3, art. 2, page 253).

The participation that the Conduct proposes to the students borders on the heroic when it suggests that they consciously and freely not be promoted a grade so that:

> "they may contribute to the progress of their companions and the good order of the class by remaining in the grade which they have completed". (Cf. 1st part, Chap. 3, art. 1, section 3, page 27).

So the class day ends; however, even outside of class the Conduct demands the collaboration of the students in the task of education. The attentive and discreet vigilance of the teachers couldn't reach to all the streets and squares that the students would cross on their way from school to home. For that reason:

> "Since the teachers could not observe what would go on in the streets other than the one in which the school stands, the director or the inspector, in agreement with the other Brothers, would assign certain boys to take careful note of the happenings in other streets, especially the ones in which most of the students lived, and to report back the information that he would have jotted down". (Cf. 2nd part, Chap. 11, art. 3, page 114).

Conclusion

The above lines are but a pale reflection of the participation that the students contributed in the De La Salle school, for we have omitted to mention the most original and detailed part-the OFFICERS who had such outstanding responsibility for the good government of the classroom. What is treated here is a mere completion to all that has been already written about in this regard.

If we wish to answer today to the charism of La Salle and his first Brothers we must look for ways to bring about the active and intense participation and cooperation of our students in the good management of our centers with a view to their preparation for the future.

A FORGOTTEN MISSION (1)

The section of Brother Superior's 1985 Christmas Letter which he entitled, "Our work for the more distant poor through our Missionary Service" lends a special interest to this account of a Lasallian missionary venture of some seventy-odd years ago. It shows how a small group of German Brothers sought to respond to "the logic of the gospel and the logic of a religious profession" referred to in the Superior's letter. We are glad to be able to offer readers of LASALLIANA the author's own summary of a more extended account, based on original research and soon to be published.

LASALLIANA

Between April 1914 and April 1921 a group of German Brothers of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools conducted a special school within the mission complex of Vunapope, in what is today the East New Britain Province of Papua New Guinea, but which was, in 1914, the German colony of Neupommern or New Pomerania, part of the German Protectorate of Melanesia and Micronesia.

Because of the historical context in which the foundation was made, and because of the untimely withdrawal of these German Brothers after the conclusion of World War 1, the history of this mission seems to have been largely forgotten.

This article is an attempt to make some atonement for such neglect or oversight.

There has always existed within the Australian District of the Institute a tradition of the existence of this mission, and in 1984/85 I set myself to find out what I could, including a visit to present day Rabaul and the still-flourishing mission centre of Vunapope.

But, first, to glance at the antecedent history of our German confreres:

As may be found from a study of Rigault (Tome VIII) our German Brothers were, after 1879, because of the Kulturkampf, in diaspora. About one hundred of them, at their highest number, were scattered throughout various large boarding schools conducted by the Brothers of Belgium where they set up German language sections for their faithful clientele from the Fatherland. Eventually they managed to set up at least one establishment directly under their own control, the Johannineum at Grand-Halleux, near to the Luxembourg frontier.

They also had succeeded by the early 1900's in getting entry into the Reichland (the Imperially – controlled annexed territory of Alsace Lorraine). At Guénange, a village in German Lorraine, they were allowed to take over an orphanage. This establishment under the direction of the vigorous Brother Philippus Neri, quickly developed into a de facto Mother House for the German Brothers dispersed throughout the Reichland and Belgium.

To return to the foundation of the Vunapope mission: at the end of 1913, in reponse to repeated requests from the Vicar Apostolic of New Pomerania, Monsignor Louis Couppé M.S.C., the Superiors of the Institute agreed to send a community of Brothers to assist in the mission's educational activities.

One factor contributing to the choice of German Brothers was first, and obviously, the fact that Vunapope was a German mission in a German colony, staffed — as German colonial policy demanded — almost exclusively by German nationals, with an admitted objective of promoting German language and culture as well as implanting the Gospel.

But further to this, within the Institute itself, in May 1913 at the General Chapter held at Lembecq in Belgium, a German Assistant had been elected, the remarkable Brother Petronius who took responsibility for the communities of Central Europe, within the Hapsburg Empire and beyond, where German was the accepted common language. In October of the same year, Brother Philippus Neri of Guénange was named Visitor for the German Brothers, though as yet there was no German District in the geographic sense.

There was also very probably a political calculation, the establishment of a successful educational mission in German colonial territory might eventually be used as means of assisting the re-establishment of the Institute in the Fatherland itself.

So, by February 1914 a group of five Brothers had been designated, and having been farewelled at Guénange, they made their way by train to Genoa where on 23 February they embarked upon the North German Lloyd Bremer Steamer, the Roon, for a seven week voyage to New Britain. They travelled in company with a group of German M.S.C's, from Hiltrup, the German M.S.C. Centre, who were returning to the same destination.

Our F.S.C. group consisted of five Brothers whom we shall now introduce individually:

... the Director was a mature age man of forty-four, Brother Viktorinus Bruggemann, a religious of considerable experience in the teaching apostolate, and at the time of his appointment, teaching at Metz-Montigny (which may possibly have been at that time a Scholasticate for the young German Brothers).

According to his subsequent Notice Necrologique Brother Viktorinus was not an original choice, but was named to head the mission when the original leader-designate fell sick. Among his confreres Brother Viktorinus enjoyed a reputation of being "a true son of De La Salle" as exemplified in his unswerving regularity and his equally uncompromising insistence on having the Rule observed by those in his charge.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

... Brother Bonald-Urbain Hinkes (whom I shall call Urban) was a man of twenty-seven, who had also had several years' teaching experience, and was possibly the Sub-Director, though at this time he was not yet finally professed.

... the remaining three were younger men; of these Brother Otto Franz Thalheimer was the youngest. Though he was remembered afterwards by some of his pupils as the physical culture expert, he was in fact a man of poor health, who suffered sea-sickness on the way out, was frequently unwell during his stay in the tropics, and whose poor health was one of the reasons urged upon the Superiors for the withdrawal of the — remaining — Brothers after the end of the War. (We shall return to Brother Otto later).

... Brother Hermann Hahn (officially known as Macédone-Adrian) has left little impression other than that he played the organ at Church services while Brother Urban directed the singing. Like Brother Otto, Brother Hermann was not yet twenty at the time of arrival in Vunapope.

... the last is Brother Edmund Hubert (Peter Noss). Brother Edmund was twenty-three at the time of his coming to the tropics. He seems not to have been happy in his community relationships, and at some time during the war years withdrew from the Institute (probably at the expiry of his temporary vows). It seems that he took up employment on the property of a neighbouring planter, a Herr Wolff, a man of considerable standing in the local community. After that he is lost to memory. There is presumption that he lived and died in the area, but there is no mention of his death or burial in the local Church records.

To return to Brother Viktorinus. It seems he suffered ill health on the voyage out, though his surviving letters give no indication of this. He also contracted malaria early after arrival, but what occasioned his early demise on 21 November 1915, was septicaemia arising out of a tropical ulcer.

The death of the Director occasioned appeal to the Superiors of the Institute – not easy in war-time conditions. But the result was a visit from the Provincial of Australia, Brother Paul Andrew, some time in 1916. In May 1916 Brother Urban, after making his perpetual profession was designated Director of the remaining group. (Whether Peter Noss' withdrawal was before of after the death of Brother Viktorinus and the visit of Brother Paul, there is no evidence to determine).

The three of them, Brothers Urban, Hermann and Otto continued as best they could to run the school which had been entrusted to them but already now working under quiite different conditions, drastic reduction in their own personnel and a changed political situation, with the colony being under the administration of the occupying Australian military forces, and with English coming gradually to replace German as the medium of instruction and the language of future development...

The school of which our Brothers were given charge was the Sacred Heart School for Mixed Races (a title which contained fewer pejorative overtones in the colonial world of 1914 than it would today). Up till now, since its establishment in 1898, this school had been conducted first by the mainly French Sisters – Daughters of Our Lady of the Sacred Heart, and then, since 1902, by the German Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart. It was the boys' section — consisting of some fifty lads of a wide-age range — which was to be the Brothers' charge. One of the Brothers' pupils in 1914 is still alive today, living on the Mission property where he has been employed all his life as a motor mechanic.

This Sacred Heart School catered for the offspring of European settlers and traders and native women, whether legitimate issue or, more probably in most cases, otherwise.

Bishop Couppé had great ambitions for this group of children. He hoped that because of their racial origin they might come to serve as a bridgehead for wider contact with the native population and that they might be educated to become the nucleus of a Catholic peasantry (whom he would settle on Church-acquired land as small proprietors) in a Catholic indigenous culture. Unfortunately for these hopes of his, history moved too fast and within a generation these "demi-blancs" were absorbed into the indigenous mass. But it must be admitted that many such men and some women lived to take positions of relative prominence, especially in the period of de-colonisation that followed the Second World War.

A FORGOTTEN MISSION (2)

The Brothers' charge consisted of some fifty boys, ranging from school beginners of five or six up to the "grands garcons demi-blancs" one missionary Sister (O.L.S.H.) referred to in a letter describing the situation. This figure of fifty is derived from the official returns sent by Brother Urban to the Generalate at the beginning of 1919.

Our Brothers taught as best they could a German elementary programme, but there was also considerable emphasis upon trade skills, in the imparting of which they co-operated with the M.S.C. lay-Brothers. One very old gentlemen of mixed race who assisted the Brothers in their work died only a few years ago. His son is today a prominent man about the mission.

When the Brothers withdrew in 1921 the M.S.C. Sisters who had continued to run the girls' section of the School for Mixed Races resumed charge of the boys' section. The girls' section of the school has continued its existence under change of names and locale until the present. The boys' section more or less petered out in the early '30's', and forms of schooling for the native Catholic population replaced it.

Vunapope was a flourishing centre of a very active and extensive missionary endeavour, at that time under the guidance of its first Vicar Apostolic, Monsignor Louis Couppé (Bishop from 1890 to 1923). Monsignor Couppé was an outstanding administrator and, despite the fact of his French nationality, succeeded in working harmoniously not only with his German missionary colleagues but also with the German colonial authorities. And during the Australian occupation his French nationality proved of considerable assistance in helping the continuance of the smooth running of the mission.

Scarcely had our Brothers been established in Vunapope (they arrived on April 12, Easter Sunday 1914) than World War 1 broke out; Australia moved in to the conquest of this isolated German dependency, and by the end of 1914 the whole of the former German holdings in present day New Guinea were under Australian administration. Happily, the German authorities, who had so little military resource at their disposal, saw the futility of sustained resistance and the mission complex suffered no damage or disruption beyond a little initial excitement.

Under Australian military occupation the German administrative structures were allowed to continue to function and the planters were left in possession of their estates for the present. At the Sacred Heart School instruction went on as before except that gradually (as the fortunes of war on the European front became clearer) English came to supplant German as the medium and content of instruction. (The oldest surviving witnesses of that era among the native population are still able to recall their German).

Unhappily for our Brothers, as has been mentioned earlier, Brother Viktorinus died, on 21st November 1915, and some time probably soon after this Brother Hubert (Peter Noss) withdrew from the community and the Institute.

Following the death of Brother Viktorinus, Monsignor Couppé, unable to make contact with Europe, appealed instead to Brother Paul Andrew Phelan, the Australian Provincial. Exactly in what sequence is not clear, since on the Australian side there seems to be no record remaining. Brother Paul visited Vunapope and, on his recommendation to the Superiors (via the American Assistant), Brother Urban Hinkes was named Director. In subsequent correspondence Brother Urban dates his obedience as Director from May 1916. Some time subsequently, probably in 1917, Brother Fridolin Blackwell visited Vunapope as Brother Paul's deputy.

The community now consisted of three Brothers, one of whom, Brother Otto, suffered progressively worsening health.

With the ending of World War 1 and the definite loss to Germany of her colonies and overseas dependencies, the position of our German Brothers' mission was quite uncertain. The Australian civil administration which replaced military rule was less benign; the German planters were expropriated and extradited to Germany. For some time the fate of the Vunapope mission was in grave doubt, since there was question of expelling all German nationals. However, by the end of 1921, the Australian administration had decided to grant the missionaries seven years' reprieve (and before those seven years had elapsed their continuing presence was conceded without further difficulty).

In Germany, Brother Philippus Neri was still Visitor, and he was anxious to avail himself of the opportunity afforded by a more tolerant Republican Germany to re-establish his "District" in the homeland itself; and seeing that the Vunapope mission was now in alien territory and noting the evident distress of the three remaining Brothers, decided to bring them back to Germany. Because, however, of the canonical complexity of the mission structure and the natural reluctance of the Vicar Apostolic to lose the services of the Brothers, negotiations dragged on until 1921.

Finally at some date not now ascertainable (but towards the end of April or beginning of May 1921) our Brothers sailed via Australia, to Europe and reached the newly established provincial headquarters in Kirnach-Villingon, Baden before the end of July of the same year.

On return to Europe one member of this group of three left the Institute within a few months (he was still in temporary profession). This was Brother Hermann, whose official religious name was Macedone-Adrian (also known in Germanic style as Leonhard-Siegfried) and whose civilian name was Georg Hahn. It is sadly ironic that, despite his seven years of missionary work in the Institute, there is practically nothing recorded of him other than this exotic range of names.

Of the remaining two, Brother Urban Hinkes spent another four or five years teaching in various schools in the newly constituted District of Germany; he also made his second Novitiate at the Generalate in Belgium in 1924. After considerable hesitation (including leaving and returning) Brother Urban finally left the Institute at the end of 1925. He became a school teacher in the state service and eventually a primary school principal in the region of Lake Constance. It was there he died in 1975, having survived the vicissitudes of personal and national life until the advanced age of eighty-eight.

Brother Otto Thalheimer returned to study to acquire the qualifications which his early departure for the mission field had precluded his obtaining before. He then taught for some years in various parts of Germany, though his health continued to be uncertain, and was for a short time Director of a community. In the late thirties, foreseeing the Nazi menace, he transferred to the London Province of the Institute and was a member of the Beulah Hill community for two years, 1937-1939. Again, probably foreseeing the ambiguity of his position in the case of the inevitable war between Britain and his native Germany in May 1939, he moved once more, this time to the mission fields of South America. He spent the next decade of his life in Columbia and Equador, exercising various charges and was for a short time Director of the community of Riobamba. Finally in 1950 he went to Chile to join a community where there were other German refugees like himself. By this time, however, he was suffering from terminal cancer and he died 4th November 1950. Despite the Impression of instability which his wanderings suggest, Brother Otto seems to have left behind him in Germany and in the various parts of South America where he lived the memory of a fervent religious and a devoted teacher. We may with some confidence assume that his many uprootings had contributed to a corresponding spiritual detachment, and that his wanderings may be interpreted as a determined loyalty to remain true to his original religious commitment, (which is not to discount or overlook the many individual German Brothers who have served so generously in so many mission fields).

To my knowledge the foundation of Vunapope was the only missionary enterprise founded directly on the initiative of the German Brothers as a District. Hence the greater need to appreciate and preserve its memory.

The Australian District has a special interest in the venture. First, by reason of the intervention in its fortunes of Brother Paul Andrew, Visitor and his deputy, Brother Fridolin of Mary, in the years 1916 and 1917, and second, because the Australian District in 1946, after a lapse of a quarter of a century renewed the Lasallian presence in New Guinea, even if in a different region.

It is the Congregation of Christian Brothers (of Ireland) who may, with some historical credibility, be considered to be the real successors to the German Lasallian Schulbrüder of the First World War period, in-so-much as with their secondary school at Vuvu and their Teachers' College at Vunakenau, as well as other enterprises within the area of what was originally Bishop Louis Couppé's jurisdiction, they have realised most of the hopes that vigorous and courageous prelate entertained for the Christian education of the people of New Britain.

The De La Salle Brothers thank and congratulate them for taking up the burden which historical and human circumstances forced them to drop.

SOCIO-CULTURAL ANIMATION AT THE SAINT CHRISTOPHER AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE (1)

The innovative school schedule at St. Christopher's, based on eleven class days and three holidays, requires close attention to the organization of the daily routine of the boarding students especially after school hours.

In fact, having 640 young boarding students living together requires strict cooperation between grown-ups and youngsters. Sports and leisure activities play an important role in school life and are the source of equilibrium in the lives of the youth. From the teachers who work within such a framework, this requires a great deal of availability.

ORGANIZATION

The adults play a prime role in initiating, maintaining and coordinating activities. To the best of their ability, and for the sake of the students, they try to find within this framework a certain rhythm of activities which are smooth flowing and precise. This is most remarkable in the field of sports. There are twenty-nine sports teams at Saint Christopher's with eight additional teams only for adults. This calls for effective participation and help among the young people in the scheduling as well as in the training and refereeing.

All the teachers, both lay people and Brothers, meet together once a week to coordinate the activities for the following fortnight and to mutually share problems which might be encountered. The group in charge is made up of 5 gymnastics and sports teachers, the chairman and seven members of the socio-cultural department who help in the animation and effective participation, those in charge of the various scholastic cycles, the Brothers, the Chaplain, and the General Supervisor. All these, plus the Director, add up to some twenty adults.

SOCIO-CULTURAL ACTIVITIES

These activities are as diverse as possible so that they can involve the greatest number of youths. Their essential purpose is mutual cooperation, but also openness to others by taking on meaningful responsibilities, and exposure to the world outside (trips, conferences, various excursions), the creation of a family spirit, where each one contributes whatever he can by participating in the preparation and the celebration of Christmas Eve, and the School's Foundation Day, for example.

For the first and second scholastic cycles, some fifteen conferences are programmed each year with big and well-known associations in the country, such as "Knowledge of the World", "People and Images", "Great Report", or with conferences on current and relevant subjects.

The Cinema: among the scope of activities for Sundays, six full-length films are shown each year in the school auditorium for those who are interested. These films have an essentially recreational value and are shown near the end of the afternoon. The recreational facilities of the school remain open for those who are not interested in the films. The average attendance at these films is about 350 pupils per film.

The Cine-club: During the week, on Thursday evenings, film showings for the older students of the second cycle have been organized. The seven films which have been scheduled are of a more serious nature than those shown on Sundays. They possess an educative value and are artistically superior. They form the basis of thought and discussion between the teachers and the students in class after the film has been viewed.

Presentations, Dramas, various Socials: In general we provide two performances each year either of the classical theatre or modern theatre, performed by one of the theatrical groups of the region. We also have social gatherings in the boarding students' recreation hall where there are audio-visual presentations, a raffle, video cassette presentations and dances. All these depend upon the initiative of the individual classes. There are also informational presentations such as "The Church in Distress", "Amnesty International", or talks on various careers and professions.

Trips and excursions: For the past few years, the students of the terminal year have organized trips abroad, with the help of the teachers and more particularly those in charge of the cycle. Thus, three trips were organized to Tunisia, three others to Italy and Greece, one to Yugoslavia, two to Morocco, and one to Spain. These journeys take about twelve days and take place during the Easter holidays. Other shorter trips, of three or four days, are likewise organized each year to England and Spain for the younger pupils, who are accompanied by the language professors.

During the vacation in February, two teachers organize skiing trips to the Pyrenees, and during the summer, to the Basque territory along the ocean, for other volunteer groups.

Those in their final year of the short cycle vocational course make a six to eight day trip to Paris and the region around Paris during the International Agricultural Exhibition.

Finally, during the Sundays of Winter, a ski club, organized and run entirely by the students themselves, arrange regular trips to the mountains.

CHRISTMAS EVE AND THE SCHOOL'S FEAST DAY

The pre-Christmas holidays constitute a very special time of vivacity for the first scholastic trimestre and in a spirit of joy they finish off the first three months of the school year. Three performances are organized by the students with the help of the Socio-Cultural services, as well as of the administrators and teachers. Each of the three performances are prepared by a group of the same grade level.

Parents, former students, and friends are invited to these festivities, and the 630 seat auditorium is too small to accommodate all of those who are interested in coming. This is especially true for the festivities of the older students. These performances are free; however, collections are taken to finance particular projects: Truckloads of goods for Poland, sending grain to Sahel, constructions for teaching literacy in Rwanda, etc.

The programs for these evening festivities include modern dances, folkdances, and classical dances, depending upon the year level; there are dramas, modern songs and folksongs, orchestral music, gymnastic performances, and poetic montages. Many of these numbers are created within the school itself, either by the students or by the teachers. These performances thus allow a significant number of students to express themselves, to create, and even to discover talents which they never knew they possessed. The atmosphere which is created progressively with the repeated performances are often excellent and greatly promote personal rapport between the youth and the adults.

The School's Festival, which takes place on Ascension Thursday, brings together within the premises of St. Christopher's between 2,000 and 4,000 persons on one day. The students participate in the creation, decoration, and animation of numerous stands for games or performances given in the open air or in the auditorium: dances, gymnastics, synchronized field demonstrations, etc. The more spectacular performances are open to the public: The cow-chasing contest, maiden helicopter flights, parachute jumping exhibition by the army, etc., according to the theme chosen for the festival.

FACILITIES

For all of these activities, St. Christopher's makes use of rooms and equipment adapted to the purpose:

★ three important rooms as the students' recreation centres: one for the girls, the other for the short cycle, and the third for the second cycle. The equipment in these centres have been improved over the years: intellectual games, table tennis, electronic games, television sets, tape recorders, etc.;

★ an auditorium fully equipped for films, music, theatre and a sound and lighting system largely set up and operated by the students and teachers;

★ audio-visual rooms for courses or for use by small groups and for class meetings;

★ outstanding audio-visual equipment such as over-head projectors, slide projectors, video cassettes, films, etc.

All of this equipment is used for the above-named activities, but also for the enlivening of the Wednesday and Sunday activities, for it is important that the 600 young people who live there can participate to the fullest and thus avoid becoming bored. Efforts are made to develop in the students the ability to use leisure time well, which is an important part of their human and social development.

Other young people prefer to express themselves through shortlived clubs. They appear and disappear each year according to the tastes and whims of the group: cycling club, electronic club, manual activities, music club, judo, horses, tennis, model airplanes, and other miniature model making, etc.

The Socio-Cultural Service coordinates these various activities and participates directly or indirectly in their animation. They are financed by the annual dues of each student and to this are added the receipts from the school festival and from the snack bar. The cultural activities are usually free. The socio-cultural service is closely related with the sports services which is the other important factor in the animation of the lives of the young people at St. Christopher's.

Of course, we must also speak about the Christian animation of the institution.

SOCIO-CULTURAL ANIMATION AT THE SAINT CHRISTOPHER AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE (2)

SPIRITUAL ANIMATION

Masseube Saint Christopher, being a Catholic School, religious animation there has by no means a neglected place. Still there is always room for improvement.

The "Big Family" spirit which was given to this place from its very inception, even after some forty years, is still maintained today in spite of the considerable increase of its boarding department.

The Brothers' community has been the "leaven" and remains the "dynamo" and the "soul" of this institution with regard to the students as well as with the team of teachers. A great number of lay teachers have joined into the work of the Brothers' community now that the latter has gone down so much numerically. Still this view of religious education is shared by the majority of the teaching staff so much so that the cooperation is close and effective, and this explains the reality which is St. Christopher's today.

Moments of Lasallian spiritual formation sets the rhythm of life in the school for the parents, by certain meetings called by the Brother Director, for the teachers, either at the beginning of the school year or during the course of the year, and also for the older students by regular meetings and contacts with the Brothers. The Mass on the Feast of the Ascension, the school's official festival day, allows us to reach in an outstanding way a great number of persons, parents and friends, and indirectly, is for us an auspicious time for passing on this Spirit which animates us and which leads us to advance.

For the teaching staff (which is composed of some twenty lay teachers and Brothers) there are six to eight times a year, where we take out two hours to work, reflect, share our thoughts, and pray together in order to weld our team more tightly together and not be content with the professional and disciplinary aspects of our teaching but to breathe a new soul into all of our educational activities, based upon the Gospels. For two years we worked on the Old Testament, keeping alive the connection between it and our present era. For the last two years, we took "Gaudium and Spes", the Church in the world today, which is not without its close relations to our life as Educators in the Faith.

For the young, the hours of "CULTURE AND FAITH", or CATECHESIS, are still an element of formation which we hold on to. The rhythms of the classes are different but we relish these privileged moments which are for the Brother his Mission of priority. The chaplain, as well as a priest from the outside, help the five out of eight Brothers who teach catechism, administrators as well as teachers. The young people of 14 and 15 years of age are guided toward the Sacrament of Confirmation which is a phase of deepening and commitment in the life of Faith. There is also the Youth Eucharistic Movement (M.E.J.) which reaches a number of youths, and there are regular activities which oblige the students to get involved in the work of problems existing outside of the school.

Every other Sunday, the students remain at the college and we have two Masses because the chapel is too small to accommodate 600 pupils. We see to it that all the students attend because it is the only religious activity we are called upon to celebrate together. This initiative was well thought out and discussed many years ago in consultation with the parents, older students, the teachers, and, of course, with the Brothers themselves.

There are religious services by class level on a voluntary basis, according to the liturgical season and the presence of the youths in school.

At present the atmosphere is not conducive to the religious plans and practices of twenty years ago, so we must restudy, reformulate and adapt our Faith Education to the youths we accept into our schools. This is a problem we have had to face especially in recent years. Because we are working together in a common apostolate with Haute Vallé du Gers, to which we belong, we ought to adapt our instruction to counteract the "bad faith" which is becoming ever more prevalent.

ANOTHER NEW PROJECT

The Brothers' community up until this time has always been intertwined with the school. (We use the same buildings). The community was completely immersed in the care of the young, the good running of the school and its activities. Perhaps we have been "sinning by excess". This was so much so that the community was perceived by the youth only in its professional work; our life of "Consecration" completely escaped them.

To remedy this situation, we have taken over a small section of a building which has become "the residence of the Brothers Community". The Brothers will thus have a place to live a meaningful community life together. The community will be able to invite, and receive, others and will be able to share our life with them. Thus we will have more visibility with regard to those who live around us. We can even go so far as to say that "we shall be called even more" to this Mission which the Church has confided to us.

ACCEPTANCE, HELP, PRAYER: A COMMUNITY AT THE SERVICE OF YOUTH

In the religious life it can happen that obedience coincides with the deep aspirations of a Brother. I actually had the opportunity of experiencing such a situation when the Brother Visitor assigned me to a new community created in the heart of Lyon, on the border of neighborhood with a large immigrant population.

The origins of the community

The community was started by the Brother Visitor and his council in response to a directive of theDistrict Chapter of 1982, in joining two initiatives into one perspective where the spirit of FAITH and the spirit of ZEAL overlap:

★ an initiative of FAITH, in receiving large groups of young people between 17 and 25 years of age, and giving them spiritual encounters from time to time and weekly periods of prayer, but putting this work into practice requires contant ZEAL;

★ an initiative of ZEAL at the service of less-favoured youth and notably teenaged immigrants, but this zeal, in its turn, presupposes a solid FAITH, to advance against all hope.

It is ardently wished that these young men for whom this double initiative is intended could associate with the Brothers and live in community and become their "observers"; likewise that the young girls could enter into relations with such or such a congregation of women.

But we have not gotten that far yet!

The community

At first, four Brothers were assigned by Brother Visitor and they were gathered together with a community plan which was just summarized in the preceding paragraph. Although there was a consensus at first, we must recognize that two of the Brothers have their principal activities outside of the quarter. And then when, at the beginning of the first year, there was a partial change in the community, still there were only two Brothers at the service of the Maghrébin immigrants. But, on the contrary, the entire community gathers together to receive the students or young workers who come to pray with us.

As far as creature comforts are concerned, the community lives rather simply. We do our own cooking, cleaning, and maintenance. We are living, under a precarious lease, in an old building scheduled for demolition. Our relations with the other tenants in the apartment are cordial. They are so much so that the majority of the tenants, representing five nationalities, came to our modest New Year's reception.

Despite the difficulties in scheduling, arising from the variety of our commitments, we try to find time for prayers together, office, mental prayer, as well as for a weekly community meeting. Taken up by so many activities, we hardly have time to watch television!

Receiving more mature youth

We should say a few words about our weekly prayer meetings in which an average of twelve to fifteen young people take part, even though this is not the purpose of the present paper. Actually, the two initiatives of the community are inseparable, as we have underlined above; and the attention given to the students supports our activities in favour of the least privileged adolescents, as will be explained later on. And what is more, playing host to these youths allows the entire community to share in the same activity.

To get these meetings going, we took advantage of the great fortune of being able to tie in closely with some forty young students in Lyon even before the establishment of the new community. These youths whom we knew, generally former students of the Brothers, had already taken part in weekend recollections — which continue to be held about twice each school trimester — so it is quite natural that certain ones among them should get into the habit of meeting together each week to pray with us.

The Immigrants' Quarter

As a result of various circumstances, and notably because of the failure of the local government to make any provisions, a veritable ghetto has sprung up in the very heart of Lyon. The workers are packed into this quarter, which has never been maintained, and to make matters worse, in the course of the past ten years, entire families have come to join their fathers who were working alone in France. The packing has reaching an unbelievable density: for example, a family of six or eight persons can be found occupying a small apartment of twenty square meters!

Ever since this populace has been afflicted by unemployment, crimes of all sorts have grown up and delinquencies have spread among the 20 to 25 year-olds who are so often unemployed and without hope.

Our entrance into the quarter

It was not very simple to effectively set our selves up near such a locality. We were able to do so because we met at the very beginning a number of people who accepted us and set us on the right track. On our part, that demanded of us some initiatives and contacts made with great simplicity in favour of people at all levels, with the Christians as well as with the non-Christians: priests, social workers, nurses, public school teachers, association heads, etc. On the part of all these people, there was a quality of remarkable acceptance: they inspired us with confidence.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Youth Problems

We have mentioned above how the reuniting of families in the past few years has attracted to Lyon women, children, and teenagers, certain of whom have grown up. A serious examination of the situation pointed out the need for a number of activities in favour of these people, which we have carried out over the past dozen years. By contrast, there exist very few initiatives designed to help the older youths. Therefore, we Brothers let it be known that we will willingly be available to work for the good of youth.

And so, two months after our arrival, Brother Gerard Coudoir, the former director of a technical school for the poor, was asked to work as a voluntary monitor in one of the "quarter's shops". This shop, set up by a local group, provides young boys between twelve and sixteen years of age with some activities after school. The role of Brother Gerard is in the carpentry section. He guides the young men in their various work which they have undertaken to fabricate certain articles which they want.

In my regard, I had to wait a much longer time: I had to wait for seven months after we got ourselves established before I received a definite request to help in the scholastic training of some immigrant adolescents. The request came from the "Association of Immigrant Families" of the quarter. The beginnings were quite modest with four to ten pupils entering in January and June, 1985. We had no place for our classes. We had to depend upon the good will of the association itself which itself was very deprived of means and we had to suffer from the cold during the severe months of January of 1985! We went through some difficult times until September of 1985 when the situation was remedied thanks to the kind intervention of the president of the General Council who put an unused place at our disposal and thanks to the District which assumed the costs of repairing the place.

Educational support for youth

Since the month of October 1985, there have been plenty of young people. They have been directed to our place by the Social Assistants as well as by the moderators of associations. At present we know about forty youths between 12 and 17 years of age, half of whom come to us regularly, that is, two or three times a week. The help which we give them is usually individual, but sometimes we take them two or three at a time if they belong to the same class.

We have to recruit monitors. We seek out students for this and quite naturally we do so among those whom we already know. Thus, it is in this area where much interaction is found between the two initiatives of our community plan. Right now, there are eight student volunteers who devote an average of two hours per week helping in school. We also are benefitting by the services of a young girl who has finished her higher studies and whom we have assigned to help within the framework of "Work for Mutual Help".

We have set up a formal association. Our costs are minimal but, all the same, there are a lot of expenses, especially for heating. At present those helping us the most financially are the former students of La Salle, Lyon.

Our relationships with these young people are very close. Without seeking them out particularly, they come to us with their problems, not only scholastic ones, but also, for example, their concerns about their living accommodations or work for their families. It sometimes happens that we speak about God during the course of the explanation of the lessons. The student monitors also have excellent relations with their pupils and often enough we exchange ideas on their volunteer work as well as on their progress in their own studies. All of this is quite enrichinjg for a Brother.

Relations with the families

The families appreciate very much having someone concerned about their children and having someone help them in their studies. This brings about an easy access to the adults. They do not hesitate to ask for help, for example to help a single person move. It is likewise because of this simplicity and openness that they have asked me to become the treasurer of the "Association of Immigrant Families" of the quarter, which entails a certain number of duties and initiatives far surpassing the simple keeping of accounts.

By way of conclusion

I shall limit myself to a few remarks:

★ Having been away from teaching for some years now, I should like to express, first of all, my joy in having students, and pleasant students at that.

★ For the first time in a long time, I know that my work will not bring in any income for anyone (neither for the community nor for me): so I feel that I am therefore "a Brother maintaining a school gratuitously". That is possible because, having reached the age of retirement, I receive the corresponding pension.

★ The greatest joy that I experience in this work is that I find myself engaged in a truly Lasallian work, because I am at the service of the poor.

SAINT MARY'S PRESS: MINISTRY THROUGH PUBLISHING

Around the world, the Brothers of the Christian Schools are involved in many forms of ministry. Essential to our charism is that we are "catechists by vocation". A natural extension of our vocation is publishing. Saint Mary's Press of Winona, Minnesota makes its focus very clear in this Mission Statement approved by its Advisory Board on 16 January 1986:

Mission Statement

"Saint Mary's Press is a contemporary expression of the traditional educational apostolate of the Christian Brothers. As an activity of the Christian Brothers of Minnesota, ... the Press is a working community dedicated to publishing materials that advance the catechetical ministry of the Catholic Church, primarily as that ministry relates to adolescents...

"In pursuit of this mission and ministry, Saint Mary's Press seeks to accomplish the following specific tasks:

1. Our development tasks are to acquire and to create materials that further the ministry of the Word in school and parish settings. This ministry, which centers on initiating adolescents into the Catholic Christian community, encompasses pastoral as well as educational concerns.

2. Our marketing tasks are to promote, sell, and distribute materials to religious educators and youth ministers as well as to provide customer service before and after sales.

3. Our production task is to provide attractive and durable materials on schedule and produced at reasonable cost. ...

A Brief History

Saint Mary's Press began in 1943 when the Catechetical Commission of the Lasalle Brothers asked Brother Alphonsus Pluth, to write a series of high school religion texts that would replace the Catechism of Christian Doctrine (1911). Brother Alphonsus brought enthusiasm to the task because he was aware that teachers and students had a great need for materials to help make religion classes more alive and meaningful. By the end of 1943, he had finished writing Living with Christ, Course I for first year high school students. Courses 2, 3, and 4 followed in due time.

In 1953 Brother Alphonsus bought a used printing press and spent his Saturdays as an apprentice in a commercial printing plant, becoming proficient in the printing craft. Thus, he not only wrote and edited, but also, printed Living with Christ and a journal for religion teachers that developed a national following. In addition, Brother Alphonsus taught full-time at De La Salle High School in Minneapolis.

In 1954 Brother Alphonsus moved to St. Mary's College. Working out of a small basement room, he published a steady stream of religion textbooks and guides. In 1967 the Press moved into a spacious new building. Seven years later, after thirty-two years of leadership, Brother Alphonsus resigned as President. Brother Damian Steger assumed direction of the Press.

Scope of Press Publications

Publishing high school religion textbooks has been the central work of the Press since its foundation. This work continues, but it is now complemented by other areas of publications. Sharing by Thomas Zanzig is a comprehensive parish religious education program for high school students. It is the most widely used parish program in the U.S. In addition, the Press published books and manuals for use in parish youth ministry and in campus ministry. PACE (Professional Approaches to Christian Education), edited by Mary Perkins Ryan, is an award-winning monthly journal for religious educators. Saint Mary's Press also publishes resource books for catechists, like the Sourcebook for Modern Catechetics edited by Professor Michael Warren. Recently the Press has begun publishing books on prayer. Finally, Ministry Management, a complimentary, quarterly newsletter, is sent to all high school principals, campus ministers, and chairs of religion departments.

Saint Mary's Press is always looking for new areas in which its publications can be of help. Consequently, a resource manual for those ministering to young adults is being prepared. Frequently young adults are a large, overlooked portion of the church community. There is a growing awareness in North America that these people need to have specific programs to meet their unique faith-development needs. Presently there are no other sourcebooks for young adult ministry available. Another area of development at the Press is a parish religious education program for junior high school age adolescents: those in grades seven and eight. Research into the needs of students in this age-group is being undertaken, and an entire religious education course will be published for them. In the immediate future, the Press will undertake research into the religious education and ministry needs in the ever-growing Hispanic community in the United States. One estimate says that by the year 2000, one-half of all U.S. Catholics will be of Hispanic origins. The Press will try to develop materials specifically tailored to this community.

The apostolate of religious education is flourishing at St. Mary's Press. Thousands of teachers and hundreds of thousands of Catholic students are benefiting from the work begun in a small basement office over forty years ago by Brother Alphonsus. Given the success of the Press, the work of publishing in the Lasallian tradition will continue into the indefinite future.

POST-SCRIPTUM: Some weeks after sending us his article, Brother Carl has written to inform us that Brother Alphonsus Pluth, the founder of Saint Mary's Press, died peacefully in his sleep on 23 April 1986. Brother Carl adds the comment: "This was sad news for those of us here at the Press who will have to work on without his inspiration and good cheer". May he rest in peace.

THE A.C. SOCIAL ACTION MOVEMENT

The great City of Mexico, the capital in which the economic, industrial, artistic, and cultural development of the nation is centred, is not removed from the multiple problems of inadequate housing, unemployment, the lack of basic education, and in general, it cannot escape from the hundreds of thousands of persons who, in one form or another, fall within the ranks of those who are barely-subsisting.

As the centre of cultural development, Mexico City has large universities where the desire for scientific and liberal education reigns. These are educational centres which strive to educate people and to enable them to become useful to their society and to their country.

Among all these universities, we find our own La Salle University, whose objectives render it different, original, and unique, being that it is striving after the human and intellectual advancement of its members and to this end promotes its ideal of Christian formation; this is to look further and beyond itself; to come into contact with all the realities and, above all, to commit itself to the poor, to those most in need, to those who make up this "sub-society" of the barely subsisting.

In order to establish a concrete plan of social action, rooted in the knowledge of the realities of those most in need, there exists in La Salle University (ULSA), the movement for Social Action, A.C., known by the acronym MAS.

WHAT IS MAS?

MAS is a lay association whose fundamental object is to make the students of ULSA conscious of the social, economic, and cultural realities and thus to harmonize theory and practice.

Although MAS ought to fulfill its obligations as well as any other institution within the university, it considers its obligation to do so to be even more exacting because of the fact that ULSA is a Catholic university.

Education must not only bring about the development and spread of a sense of obligation which teachers ought to fulfill in a Christian manner in the economic and social field, but also it must see to it that they learn the method which renders them capable of fulfilling this obligation.

The best education is one which is realized through continued activities, that is to say, putting into practice in the ordinary dealings of life the principles which have been learned. The formation of a definitive conscience in order to know and transform reality requires that the education be simultaneously an act of knowledge and an activity upon the reality in order to transform it.

The university zealously prepares professionals who are very much aware of their human quality, the obligations of their destiny, and the purpose of their knowledge and science. The ULSA, by means of the MAS, endeavours to have its students commit themselves to society and to face up to it, not in a shallow and fleeting manner, but in a way which will permanently transform it.

MAS endeavours to make the commitment of our young university youths surpass the simple and paternalistic "social work" in forms of projects, and urges intense, deliberate and strongly critical actions which can analyze and transform society. MAS seeks to combine an interaction of dialogue between the academic disciplines and research on one hand and the concrete practices of society on the other.

Educational institutions such as ours, orient the teaching of academic content towards the synthesis among science, life, and faith ordered toward the attainment of justice. To attain this, there is nothing so effective as to personally participate in the concrete situation of the deprived and barely-subsisting people in the urban ghettoes and poor neighborhoods through demonstrations, campaigns, and by living among the people themselves, as does the MAS movement.

Love of our neighbor, charity, and justice are the essential elements of Christian thinking, but if these values are not carried over into practice, they will remain nothing but empty concepts. The programs of MAS develop along these lines and their inclusion in the training of the students to a certain extent succeeds in contributing to the purpose of the University of serving the community. This is done, not in a cold and formalistic manner, but rather in the sense in which this service becomes a permanent and heartful activity of social change, which cannot be accomplished without an understanding of the realities which make up living together.

THE BASES AND OBJECTIVES OF MAS

Social service ought to be formative and educational, and therefore must have the following bases and objectives:

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

1. An understanding of reality. That is to say, TO UNDERSTAND people, the community, the realities among which life devolves-their life, to know their history, etc... this knowledge should be objective and free of all prejudice.

2. A prioritization of necessities and human values. That is, to ACCEPT people as they are; to understand, even if you do not agree.

3. A knowledge of existing institutions, groups, and social works. That is, TO RESPECT A PERSON in his reality is to promote his growth, it is to progressively help persons take possession of their own decisions and responsibilities, it is to further initiative and creativity.

4. To inform and question those people affected by poverty and to make them think about their problems, courses of action, and possible solutions to them. In a word, to discover the needs in themselves, in others, in groups, institutions, and societies. To not only discover the obvious needs, but rather the deepseated needs.

WHAT MAS REALLY DOES

Since its foundation in 1969, MAS has been able to establish social action programs based on a formative model of analysis and research for concrete solutions to the principal problems of the present person; building his field of activities at the urban or rural level.

Among those which continue to work at the urban level, the most notable are those devoting themselves in the areas of assistance and rehabilitation. Among these are those working with the mentally deficient, with young drug addicts and those working for the integration of adolescents and adults suffering from infantile paralysis.

It would be proper to mention the S.O.S. Rescue Squad, which at present glories in the service of young men who provide first aid services in times of disasters or catastrophes. This group received national and international recognition for its services rendered during the recent catastrophe brought about by the earthquake of September, 1985.

The infrastructure at the level of volunteer groups among the students of ULSA, organized by MAS, has given assistance since last September and continues to give assistance to more than 35,000 earthquake victims in Mexico City.

In the rural area, the Social Action Programs for the country people have gone on developing in a gradual manner for more than the past eleven years, in the Sierra De Xochicoastlán, in the State of Hidalgo, as well as in the Sierra de Ayahualulco, Veracruz, where Brother Enrique Pizarro and his community have succeeded in uplifting the lives of the country folk at all levels.

At present, MAS is cooperating in setting up a project for creating a "Town" for extremely poor children and youths in the Guadalupano Children's Boarding Department, under the direction of Brother Enrique Pizarro. This work gives our students a chance to become aware of the fact of hundreds of barely subsisting children and youths with whom some volunteer groups of young people periodically work.

By means of social action in which the students implement activities proposed by MAS, we try to fulfill our most necessary Christian commitment, in such a way that integral education will produce the agents for the most permanent and organized change so needed by our society, through civic and political formation inspired by the social teachings of the Church. THE DON GNOCCHI CENTER OF PARMA, ITALY

This year the "Don Gnocchi Centre of Parma" has celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of the death of its founder. This event was particularly marked by the celebration of a solemn Mass in the Cathedral of Milan, during which His Eminence Cardinal Martini officially announced the introduction of the Cause for the Beatification of the Servant of God.

The "Don Gnocchi Centres", which were founded right after World War II, were intended by their founder to answer the urgent need of that period: that of accepting young people who had been mutilated by the war, and attending to their instruction and education.

Don Gnocchi, who had been the Chaplain of our Gonzaga Institute in Milan, confided this work, to a great extent, to the Brothers of the Christian Schools. As the number of disabled people began to diminish these were replaced by young people afflicted with polio. Eventually, thanks to the spirit of adaptability of those directing the operation, these institutions were transformed into Medico-Social Centres, accessible to all the citizens of the land. The Brothers, given the lack of vocations, were constrained to gradually withdraw from these establishments.

The Centre at Parma, where the Brothers have worked since 1949, is the only one we still have under our direction. This centre has also undergone changes dictated by the times, and its facilities once occupied by more than 400 youths, have been completely modified to respond to the present day needs of the Medico-Social Centre. This apostolic engagement represents a very particularized type of work. Without any doubt, it is an authentic service to the poor and is in perfect harmony with the indications of the General Chapter, which asked that we be sensitive to the appeals of those less favoured to such an extent that such service would become a fundamental element of renewal for each district. Our community accepts three distinct groups:

HANDICAPPED YOUTHS

This group is made up of boys and girls — some forty of them — the majority of whom are paraplegics who look to us to help them in the promotion of their health, but above all to help them ameliorate their human and social conditions in the fields of education and work and to extricate them from the isolation to which they are often condemned by their family and by society. The young people confided to our care, beyond the indications of their physical pain, bear themselves the pains of moral trials: some of them are without family, others have been simply rejected because of their handicaps; and one can merely guess at their economic situation. In us, they seek to find what they are deprived of: family, guidance, instruction, and a window to the future. To prepare them for the life of tomorrow and to render them autonomous, home-like experiences are used: small groups — always helped by the Centre — living together with former students who are already established and financially independent. This is the group of youths which receives most of our time and attention and which best justifies our presence in the Centre. Despite the notable diminution of these youths and considering the gravity of their handicaps — we also accept deaf-mutes — the presence of the three Brothers who are dedicated to this work is amply justified.

— To those in need and to those who suffer, our Centre offes AN ENTIRE GAMBIT OF MEDICO-SOCIAL SERVICES: Visits by medicals specialists, therapy to counter pain, rehabilitation of the spinal column, respiratory rehabilitation, therapeutic sports, radiology, psychometric and orthophonic therapy. An impressive number of persons — above all the young — profit from these services, especially in the form of clinic care.

— For the past four years, our Centre has been offering "Hospitalization Service" to those persons who, afflicted by grave handicaps, need rehabilitation. There are some fifty of them who have spent time in our hospital even for as long as two months. The Brother's presence is a witness to the Gospel, and it is very much appreciated and sought after. One particularly significant moment is that of the Saturday evening celebration of the Holy Eucharist, in the corridor of the Hospitalization Section: it is quite moving to see these patients, both young and old, seated around the altar (they are unable to stand) to offer their sufferings in union with Christ who renews His own sacrifice!

This service of rehabilitation, both physical and moral, is very much appreciated by the local Church, by the Civil Authorities, and by the public at large.

OTHER ACTIVITIES OF THE CENTRE

— Following the explicit wishes of Mons. Benito Cocchi, Bishop of Parma, the know-how and devotion of a group called "The Friends of Don Gnocchi" gave birth to the "Brotherly Meal". The parishes in turn each evening send from ten to fifteen volunteers to serve a complete meal (entirely free) to some thirty poor people. The first anniversary of this was celebrated last Christmas. His Excellency, the Bishop, was with us. Many people participated at the Holy Mass: The Friends of Don Gnocchi, volunteers, guests in the house, etc. Up until now, this new activity has been able to distribute more than 10,000 meals.

THE DON GNOCCHI SPORTS COMPLEX

This was started in Parma on January 2, 1983.

Sports Offered: Swimming, ping-pong, athletic games, volleyball, basket-ball, and water polo. The courses and competitions are carried out in wheelchairs. These are specially-designed wheel chairs and are operated by pressing the arms. Training in swimming takes place in the swimming pool and the young people, using only the strength of their arms, are able to do some extraordinary things. "The Sports Complex" is run by a team of friends of the Centre —:

— it is intended to be open to all. It even entertains those who do not belong to the Centre; — activities are organized for the purpose of guaranteeing the handicapped psychophysical and social rehabilitation;

— it is allied with other sporting federations for meetings, cooperation and competition.

Since its foundation, the "Sports Complex" has been always moving ahead. Training and competition continue on. Victories multiply and this is attested to by the cups and trophies.

A friend writes: "Living along side them, I have learned many things. They have enriched my values, sentiments, and moral strength. Sports should not be an end in themselves, but they ought to make us discover the values which unite us in fraternal friendship".

BY WAY OF CONCLUSION

In this beautiful assemblage of people, our walking along the long corridors and being passed by several wheelchairs as we go to the sick-beds, are the occasion of explaining what duty is all about; the Brothers, with their lay fellow workers-by their ATTITUDE, their KIND WORD and their SMILE help their guests to live with serenity these words of our Holy Founder:

"I adore in all things the will of God in my regard".

A LASALLIAN APOSTOLATE AMONG THE HANSENITE PATIENTS IN TALA

1. TALA: An Evolving Community for Hansenites

The history of Tala began in 1940 when the government bought the property and a hospital was built for Hansenites. After World War II, 500 Hansenites from San Lazaro Hospital in Manila were transferred to Tala.

For many years, Tala was a closed community where patients were not allowed to leave the hospital compound and their immediate families could not live with them. But in the mid-60s, when it was discovered that leprosy was not hereditary and could not be easily transmitted, the Director of the hospital started the practice of allowing non-patients, normally immediate family members and relatives of patients, to live in the leprosarium compound.

At present, the leprosarium covers a land area of 130 hectares with a population of about 10,000 to 12,000 people. About 2,500 of them are Hansenites and the rest are family members who are non-patients.

A pressing problem is the economic difficulty of the people in Tala. Only about 20% of the population are employed. The rest of the 80% are unemployed and this often leads to boredom and idleness. Some are self-employed as jeepney or pedicab drivers, vendors, pig raisers, etc. Hansenite patients are entitled to free daily food rations from the government hospital. But this is sufficient for the patient only and not enough for the members of his family. There are a few cases in which a parent would be happy to discover that her child has signs of leprosy because this would entitle the child to free daily rations. Aside from the food rations, the government also provides the following privileges to the lepers: free medicine, the rights to a small piece of land to build a house in the hospital compound, rationed water supply and electricity for the homes. But due to the irregularities in the management of the hospital, the medical and social assistance from the government is inadequate. The Church tries to supply the needs of the indigent patients through projects like a feeding program for malnourished children, housing assistance for patients, piggery projects, and food supplements for poor families.

Another problem among the patients is the result of the government's practice of providing what the patients need for survival (food, medicine, shelter). This is the attitude of dependence and lack of initiative. The government's practice of providing the basic needs of the patients may be due to the physical handicap that the patients suffer. Their deformities and the social stigma that is attached to the disease have prevented them from finding employment and a source of income. There is also the attitude among leper patients that the disease has made their lives meaningless and their future as hopeless. Since these people were "separated" from the rest of society, the government had to take care of them and provide for their material needs. This led to their tendency to be very dependent and develop the "give me this, give me that" attitude.

In 1950, a Dominican priest opened the Holy Rosary Vocational School, which was later changed to Holy Rosary College. Initially, admission to the school was open to leper patients only and they had to be given a daily allowance by the priest to encourage them to go to school. At present, it is a purely charitable institution for Hansenite patients, their spouses and children. The school offers a high school and a complete collegiate course leading to the degree of Bachelor of Science in Education. Through the years, many patients have benefitted from the school and are now employed as teachers in the various schools around Tala.

In 1984, the Brothers opened a new community in Tala to assist the hospital Chaplain in the administration and teaching work in Holy Rosary College.

2. The De La Salle Brothers Community in Tala: Who are we as a community group? Why are we here in Tala?

We are a group of Filipino La Salle Brothers, called to a life of religious consecration and service in the education of youth, especially the poor.

Fully conscious of the thrust of the Church which calls for a preferential option for the poor; of the Institute's re-orientation towards direct service of the poor; the special charism of St. John Baptist de la Salle; and in response to our District Corporate Plan that called for the establishment of a community among the poor.

We have volunteered to live and work among the community of Hansenite patients at the Tala Leprosarium... a community that is poor because of the truly adverse economic conditions of its population... a community that is poor because the disease that afflicts many of its members is one that causes the dread and rejection by society.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

We are here in response to Christ's call to serve his poor, with Him as our example and guide.

What do we expect to do with our life and activity?

— Through faithfully living our religious consecration individually and as a community, to give existential witness to Gospel values.

— Through our dedication to our tasks as teachers in school, to contribute to the quality of education in Holy Rosary College.

— Through our availability, to share our resources to the community through involvement in pastoral activities to the community of Tala.

— Through our solidarity with the local Church and with the people, to support the initiatives, efforts, and programs set up and carried out by other groups (religious and lay) working in Tala.

— Through our sharing and communication with other communities in the District, to enrich the lives of the Brothers and of the Institute with our experiences and graces of working with the poor.

— Through prayer and by being available for visits, live-ins, and talks to students and youth, to promote vocations to the priestly and the religious life.

3. The Brothers' Involvement In School And Community Activities

a) Holy Rosary College

The Brothers volunteered to work in Tala primarily to teach full time in the school. All the teachers are lepers and are graduates of the college. Due to their physical condition, they could not possibly find employment in schools outside Tala. Hence, they preferred to teach in Holy Rosary. The Brothers handle almost all the religion classes in the high school and college. Efforts are being done to strengthen the campus ministry program to deepen the spiritual formation of the faculty and students.

The students are composed of leper patients and children of patients. Not all the students who graduated from high school go on to college. They either do not want to become teachers or they did not pass the requirements for the teacher training program. In order that these youths do not become idle, a vocational training program in electrical technology and electronics was established. Hence, even if these students do not go on to college, they can receive some training and find employment as skilled workers.

b) Youth Ministry

A potential problem in Tala is the out-of-school youth. Due to the lack of training and qualifications, they cannot find employment. Some manage to find temporary work like repairing roads or digging canals. But when the projet is finished, they are again jobless and idle. There were efforts in the past to organize these youths and involve them in worthwhile projects, but these were not too successful. A Brother has taken over as Coordinator of the youth ministry. At this stage, plans are being made to come up with activities that will be meaningful and meets the needs of the youth.

c) Organizing Exposure Programs for Students of other La Salle Schools

Tala is an ideal place to bring students who come from affluent backgrounds to expose them to the living conditions of the poor. They visit the patients in the hospital wards and cottages, go to the homes of patients, and have dialogues with the students of Holy Rosary and other youth leaders. The results of these exposures have been very positive.

AN EXPERIENCE OF EVANGELIZATION

I) CHRONOLOGY

For four years now in Togo and more recently in Equatorial Guinea, missionary experiences in evangelization have been taking place. They are similar in their general objectives but distinct in the specifics as we'll try to show further on in this article.

II) PROJECT SITES

As has already been stated, these projects were undertaken in Africa, concretely in Togo, Upper Volta and Equatorial Guinea.

III) PROJECT RESOURCES

Human Resources: The majority of the participants have been De La Salle Brothers who have wished to evangelize and be evangelized by the Third World. Normally, different persons comprised each year's teams so that the number of those sent has already reached some three-hundred.

Together with the religious men and women, young people of both sexes have been chosen and have worked under the supervision of the religious.

Material Resources: The biggest budgetary items had to do with construction as well as travel expenses. School supplies and medicines were generally brought along.

IV) OBJECTIVES

General Objectives:

— To place oneself at the service of others.

— To create a sense of community among peoples that have been forgotten, outside the "mainstream", "marginated". To point up interests that will move them to unite their efforts in solidarity for their own promotion.

— To cooperate with the local Church in the establishment and consolidation of the Kingdom of Christ.

— To sensitize and awaken the ones sent to the problems of the Third World and the Missions.

Specific Objectives:

— The updating of teachers and catechists.

— The tutoring of suspended students enabling them to make up their grade.

— The tutoring of students who are behind in their school work.

— Catechetics in the villages.

— Liturgical animation in the villages.

— First Aid in hygiene and sanitation.

— The experience of living with the native people.

— Social promotion.

— The construction of chapels, schools and social centers.

V) CRITERIA FOR BRINGING THE PROJECTS ABOUT

1. Criterion of "fulfillment". Cf. "Ad gentes Divinitus".
2. Criterion of CHURCH. "In communion with the local Church".
3. Criterion of "Inculturation".
4. Criterion of "Group", Team, Christian Community.
5. Criterion of "Viability". Work that can really be done.
6. Criterion of "Being" as opposed to "Doing".
7. Criterion of "Evaluation".

VI) DIFFICULTIES IN THE FULFILLMENT OF THE PROJECTS

1. The geographical location and the climate.
2. The precarious situation of housing for the groups.
3. The lack, at times, of the most elementary human necessities.
4. The different mentality of the Western world and that of the African.
5. The insufficient knowledge of the psychology and customs of the peoples to whom we were sent.
6. Frequently, the ignorance of the languages, on both sides.

Most of these problems were resolved:

a) through the generosity and commitement of the ones sent;

b) through the welcome and the receptivity of the natives.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

VII) TESTIMONIES OF THE PARTICIPANTS

- We have reached a greater personal sensitivity in dealing with people who are poor, but who are, at the same time, extremely hospitable and affectionate.
- The contact and the contrast with the culture of poverty has enriched us when we came to place a value on the things that we possess and our wealth.
- The Eucharists that we lived in the villages revealed to us the piety and the religiosity of the African people.
- The satisfaction of having set up a social center for the human promotion of the "Gourmanché" women.
- The experience of our own teamwork has been very positive for us and for the native people.
- The experience with native teachers has been highly positive, both on the human and the educational planes.
- The work has been one of mutual conversion, both for the Brothers and the Natives. Here the spirit of union reached very sincere, simple and cordial relations.
- The openness of the natives and their proverbial welcome to us will not be forgotten.

VIII) PRACTICAL RESULTS

With regard to the human, social and evangelical good that came about with the native; and with regard to the constructions that remained behind us, we will mention:

1. The TESTIMONY which the "Ones Sent" have given to the natives. In Togo, they have noted the increased numbers of pagans that have been attending the Christian chapels, built during the summer. The fact that "white men" did this sort of work has been a source of admiration. There must be something great behind all of this!

2. The youth, the lay teachers, upon returning from the experience, have become apostles of the missions in their milieux and in their classrooms.

3. As a De La Salle Brother, I can attest to the fact that in my Institute, because of these mission experiences there has been a real flowering of a movement in favor of the Missions — and this on every level — Superiors, Brothers and students. What is being offered for the Third World is noteworthy and of optimum quality.

EDUCATION FOR THE POOR (1)

De La Salle and Education for the Poor

Let us be conscious of the fact that, in such fields as human promotion, development, justice, and the rights of the individual, the Church wishes to always be at the service of man, and of man in the light of the Christian anthropology that she has made her own. She need not have recourse to systems and ideologies in order to love, defend and assist in the liberation of man. In the very heart of the message which has been entrusted to her and which she proclaims is found the inspiration to act in favor of Brotherhood, justice and peace, against all dominations, slavery, discriminjation, violence, attacks on religious liberty, aggression against man and all that is injurious to life itself. (His Holiness John Paul II, Opening Discourse, Third CELAM Conference Puebla, Mexico. 28 January, 1979).

I) THE SPIRITUAL JOURNEY OF THE FOUNDER

Can the evangelical journey of St. John Baptist De La Salle cast some light on the choices that the Brothers of Latin America must make about their educational activity both now and for the future?

This basic question finds some answers in the document called "The Charism of De La Salle: A Reading from a Latin American Viewpoint" drawn up by a team of Latin American Brothers.

As they do, we point out that the first biographers of the Saint felt that the beginnings of the teaching vocation of our Founder are to be found in the scholastic and catechetical currents that characterized the life of society and of the Church in the 17th Century.

Our Founder was thus marked by — and incarnated in — an historical movement that gives rise to the popular Christian school, and the best preparation of its teachers.

All of these efforts are unmistakeable signs of an awareness that was had of an urgent need, as well as a firm will to remedy the situation. The teaching communities that they tried to form are each born in very different circumstances but are never conceived as fleshless projects. Rather they are rooted in the needs of children and young people that were economically and spiritually deprived.

"In speaking of this process it's best to thinks of it as reciprocal multiple influences. Each of these founders could see what the others were trying to do; they could mull over their successes and their failures; they communicated their own ideas; they asked questions and visited around. Finjally they adapted, putting the stamp of their own genius on the projects that local imperatives called for". (Brother Yves Poutet).

Persons, events and concrete institutions then, little by little catch De La Salle up into this movement of catechetical and school renewal. It is enough to remember Canon Roland in Rheims, Father Barré in Rouen, the Seminary of Saint Sulpice, Adrien Nyel himself.

"Two different circumstances (says the Saint in the 'Memorial') caused me to become interested in schools for children: they were a chance encounter with M. Nyel and a request made by this lady (Mme. de Maillfer). Previous to these, I hadn't the slightest notion of schools even though several of Canon Roland's friends tried to suggest the idea to me, but it never really entered my head, nor did I have the intention to take up such a work". (Paragraph cited by the three biographers of the Saint: Bro. Bernard, Maillefer and Blain).

To perceive an "historic trend" and to become involved in it little by little under the guidance of the Spirit seem to be "God's pedagogy" in the case of our Founder. (Cf. Circular No. 412, page 67 and foll.). Might not this also be the experience of the De La Salle Brother in the Latin America of today?

II) POPULAR EDUCATION AND CURRENT EDUCATIONAL TRENDS IN THE LATIN AMERICAN CHURCH

A. Popular Education

The concept and the experience related to the expression POPULAR EDUCATION have been much more thoroughly worked on outside the realm of Catholic education. For that reason it's important to fix our parameters for the term. This isn't an easy task. It is a term in constant evolution and it is loaded with ambiguities, according to whatever angle it is studied.

In general the expression "popular education" includes a consciousness raising for the people involved and their organization as a human community. In other words, we strive to form up a critical conscience of the reality in which we live, which leads further into the planning in community of an "historical project" for a just and free society-and to furnish the efficacious means to bring this all about.

Circular No. 412 points out a certain resistance among the Brothers to an analysis in depth of what we've stated, and even to the use of some of the terms, as if they had become hopelessly "contaminated".

"... Some even seem to deny the very existence of such a world, believing it is merely an extreme fringe of society... The formation received, in effect, caused us to grow up in the protected world of the religious life. Now we must become more aware of current ideas that will help us appreciate the situation of the men of our times. (Circular No. 412, page 26).

Nevertheless, to be on the side of the interests of the poor supposes that we'll be with them in their "historic project" which is precisely where their interests have crystalized. If this isn't the case all that we will be doing is applying band-aids to mortal wounds.

The defense of the poor is not an itself popular education. Popular activity, popular promotion and popular education are a much broader working reality, which includes educational processes but which is not hemmed in by that term.

True popular education has a strong political load, and we must understand that term in its original and

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

broad sense. It is a societal project. Popular education can never be assistentialism nor any direct or veiled form of paternalism or protection of the poor.

The basis of popular education is "awareness". From this springs the perception of self, of the world, of what I am expected to do in the world (subjectivity, objectivity, inter-subjectivity). From here rises the historic response: the social praxis in the form of a societal project.

So, then, the term "popular education" can include cooperatives, basic literacy programs for adults, popular medicine, popular press, technology, etc. Its validity as popular education is in direct proportion to its relation and coherence with the project of society towards which the group tends.

There are two tendencies in popular education:

a) the cultural or pedagogical tendency: This is abstracted from the concrete conditions of injustice; it is the end product of an historical project;

b) the radical tendency (going back to the roots): this starts out from the concrete conditions of injustice in order to begin and deepen the historic project and, from within that, the educational process. It supposes a critical knowledge of society, a correct and concrete theory of change, and a continuous relationship between theory and practice.

It is from within this second perspective that educational techniques must be applied so that the poor are made to feel that indeed they can, that they are able, that they are capable of organizing and directing their own destiny.

Authentic popular education comes to fruition in planned activity. It is for this reason then that so many co-called "thinkers" cannot enter into real, live contact with the popular sectors.

Once the initial insecurity has been overcome, the poor person can discover in himself his enormous capacity of thought and action. The learning process comes about through a confrontation with the world that surrounds him: persons, happenings, social phenomena. So he goes on discovering and interpeting his reality. There is no "Knowing" which is true and complete if it not be accompanied by "Doing". To learn is not a matter of memory but of creativity. In popular education any technique is valid which promotes the full exercise of the personal faculties, the free expression of feelings, ideas and projects.

Popular education carries with it a theory of education, strategies and methodologies which are consistent with the historic project that has been adopted. If this be not the case we would be left with mere activism or theory. Action alone does not have in itself the necessary elements to formulate theory and methodology. The clarity of the objectives depends on the initial vision of the project, and its position with regard to the poor and their world. If this doesn't take place one never gets beyond good intentions and there can be no popular education there.

Concrete steps

1. A real command of the situation in which the sectors where we are working happen to be developing.

2. Priority for those sectors where injustice is the most evident.

3. The adoption, from the very beginning, of a pedagogy of participation in which the target group has a real rôle in their own process of education and struggle. Thus a bureaucracy is avoided in the planning, and all the while a greater autonomy is achieved between the groups and the exterior support persons: they learn to define and confront their own problems and acquire skill in the use of methodology and the necessary techniques.

4. Training on different levels:
   a) at the ground level, for joint action;
   b) at the level of leaders that form from the base groups;
   c) at the level of popular educators.

Popular education needs to study and systematize experiences. It isn't enough to get wrapped up in populist activism.

Techniques

a) For the illiterate = popular art, audio-visuals, graphics, socio-dramas, popular theater.

b) For the literate = popular reading materials, popular press...

The dynamic process of an authentic popular education implies then: consciousness-raising, organization and the struggle for a societal project.

It is truly curious to note that these three elements are present in the following paragraph of the "DECLARATION OF MEXICO" (December of 1979) drawn up at the end of the Regional Conference of Ministers of Education for Latin America and the Caribbean and sponsored by UNESCO:

"What is of the greatest urgency is to intensify educational action as a necessary condition to acheive an authentic development and to steer educational systems along the imperatives of social justice, in such a way that they contribute to form consciousness, participation, solidarity and organizational capacity, especially among the less favored groups".

Doesn't it look like they were defining the concept of POPULAR EDUCATION without using the term as such?

EDUCATION FOR THE POOR (2)

Characteristics of the POPULAR EDUCATOR

1. He has above all made a clear choice in favor of the oppressed, and has made a life commitment to be with them, a commitment that may be motivated by religious, political or simply human considerations.

2. He possesses a high degree of interior openness, which implies a great respect for the process of search and understanding of the others.

3. He is an "instigator": He generates (provokes) a process of reflexion among the people given the challenges that dynamism itself imposes.

4. He gives the example by his own life, being of a spirit in constant search. He educates more by his personal witness and his coherency than by his words.

5. His methodological principle is a process which serves to systematize jointly with the people his experiences and reflexions, causing the people to become critical, creative, active and organized. A prefabricated methodology that works in all cases of popular education does not exist. Operative models must be set up for each concrete reality, and based on different experiences. These models must be constantly re-evaluated to conform most efficaciously to the very dynamic of reality.

6. His pedagogical resources will be those which:
   a) in the first stage permit that the people achieve a better grasp of their own problems. Example-theater, audio-visual;
   b) in a second stage, permit greater depth and systematization: short courses, popular press, workshops.

With these conceptual elements in mind we may now better undertake a comparative study between the "mainstream" of popular education and the educational currents promoted by the Latin American Church, in order to see the likenesses and differences and to decide if they are of substance or simply of form.

B) Current Trends in Latin American Education sponsored by the Church

1. Point of Departure: Diagnosis of the problem.

MEDELLIN

— The vast sector of "marginated" persons, isolated from the mainstream of culture.

— Grave defects in the educational systems.

— Abstract and formalistic program contents.

— Educational systems geared to the maintenance of existing social and economic structures rather than to their transformation. (Source: Official Document of II Conference of CELAM, No. 3 Education, Bogotá, 1968).

PUEBLA

— Education in a situation of social and economic change. (No. 1014).

— The situation of poverty correlated with educational processes.

— The inadequacy of existing educational systems: impractical, they tend to act as a mechanism that uproots from, and evades, the community (1015).

— The accelerated demand for education owing to demographic growth (1016).

— The need for unconventional new forms of education (1018).

— The pressure applied to education by ideological influences (1021).

— Tendency towards the educative community or city (1023). (Souce: Official Document of III CELAM. Puebla, Mexico, January of 1979).

2. Educational responses.

1. Liberating Education (Medellín).
2. Evangelizing Education (Puebla).
3. Popular Education, Interamerican Congress of Catholic Education (CIEC).

Liberating Education (Texts cited from the official document, No. 3):

— To train (the culturally marginated) so that they themselves, as authors of their own progress, in a creative and original way, develop a cultural world in accordance with their own qualities and which is the product of their own efforts.

— Education geared towards "Being More" in the joy of self-development through service to others.

— Education which is based on dialogue, creativity, foretaste of the new style of society sought by Latin America, enriching in the sense of human dignity, favoring self-determination and a sense of community.

— An asystematic education in all that contributes to the creation of a certain popular culture and the increased will to change.

— Education that liberates from the social, economic and political servitudes which are opposed to the development of the Latin American man.

— Education which favors dialogue across the generation gap, which attests to the wealth of local and national culture and which promotes the integration in the pluralistic unity of the continent and the world.

— Education capable of producing leaders who will bring about the organic and permanent change needed in Latin America.

Evangelizing Education (Texts cited from the official document):

— Humanizing and personalizing.

— Integrating itself in the Latin American process.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

— Exercising the critical function proper to true education, striving to regenerate, from the perspective of education, the cultural mores and the norms of inter-action which will make the creation of a new society, truly sharing and fraternal, possible, that is, an education in justice.

— Converting the student into the subject, not only of his own development, but also of community development: Education for Service.

— Producing the agents for the permanent, organic, change needed in Latin American society, through a civic and political formation inspired in the Social Doctrine of the Church.

Popular Education

"Human promotion implies activities which serve to make the consciousness of man in all possible dimensions and, using his own potential, to become the principal subject of his Christian and human development. It is education geared towards a living together in community; it enhances the Christian sharing of goods; it helps towards communion and participation in an effective way. (Puebla No. 477).

In this extraordinary paragraph which has gone all but unnoticed are to be found the fundamental elements which define POPULAR EDUCATION from a Christian point of view.

These guidelines are then completed by another paragraph which is no less extraordinary.

"To give priority in the field of education to the innumerable poor sectors of our society, people who are deprived both materially and culturally, directing to them the educational services and resources of the Church in accord with the local Ordinary". (Puebla, No. 1043).

"The education of leaders and agents of change is equally important" (Puebla, No. 1044).

"To accompany marginal groups in their literacy education with skills that help them to communicate efficaciously; to become aware of their duties and their rights; to comprehend the situation in which they are living and discern its causes; to train themselves to organize in civic, trade union and political fields, and to thus be able to fully participate in the decision-making processes that pertain to them". (Puebla, 1045).

What may be called the elements of a POPULAR EDUCATION from a Christian perspective may be drawn from these guidelines:

— To broaden the popular base.

— To raise consciousness.

— To take part in decision making processes (societal project based on Gospel values = Builders of their own history).

— Organization, planning for action.

— The living of Christian values: living together as one, sharing of goods.

— Training of leaders and agents of change: Formation in trade unions, politics and Christianity.

What else does the Latin American Church tell us that might have some bearing on POPULAR EDUCATION?

"Without neglecting the present school commitments it is most urgent to respond with generosity and imagination to the challenges that today and in the future confront the Church of Latin America. These new forms of educational action can't be the product of superficiality or improvisation but must include sufficient preparation for their agents and be based on diagnosis of the needs as well as an inventory and evaluation of present resources". (Puebla, 1046).

We conclude this paragraph with a quotation from the final document on POPULAR EDUCATION taken from XIII Interamerican Congress of Catholic Education (CIEC) held in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic in January of 1980. The Theme of the conference was METHODOLOGY FOR EDUCATION IN AND FOR JUSTICE.

"The option and commitment of Catholic educators to an education in justice demand that they set a top level priority on a dedication to popular education". (no. 24). These promotional-type projects must be based on a concept of the transformation of society, and tend toward the formation and development of teams of popular organization. They will develop along the lines of a horizontal concept of learning, with regard to the local cultures, and with a methodology which is congruent with the whole liberation of man and of society. (No. 25).

"These projects, which have been drawn up and carried out by grass-roots organizations, are geared towards raising the scientific, cultural and organizational levels of the popular sectors". (No. 26).

"Catholic educators and their organization (school center, federations, CIEC) recognize and commit themselves to promote popular education as one change which is valid to educate in and for justice and place their resources and means at the service of this educational and evangelical option". (No. 27).

"So that this commitment may truly be translated into a reality, it is recommended encounters be held on the national level to share the experiences of those that are engaged in popular education, and to study the most effective ways to give priority to this urgent action". (No. 28).

EDUCATION FOR THE POOR (3)

III) WHAT CAN LA SALLE BRING TO POPULAR EDUCATION?

1. Based on Christian faith, a dynamic vision of the work of the Spirit in history

"Fidelity to the specific intentions of the Founder and to the tradition of the Institute is confided to us as living men. It is we who carry on the task of discovering how fidelity to his charism can be lived in the present time". (Declaration: The Brother of the Chrisian Schools in the World Today, 7.1).

"... the signs of the times stress the urgency of their mission in the world today, the necessity to renew their religious life, their apostolic ministry, their presence among men". (8.1).

"Since they have chosen to work for the salvation that comes from Christ, they should let themselves be guided by the Spirit of God. It is he who stirs up in the Brothers the desire for renewal; it is he who speaks in a mysterious fashion through the events that transpire in the world and through the hopes and aspirations of its people". (8.2).

"These notes have helped the thirty-ninth General Chapter to recognize in the Institute a strong desire to play a much more active part in the life of the Church, a desire for a more determined adaptation of our life and work to the geographical, social, cultural, political and religious circumstances in which the Institute finds itself". (9.2).

"Another element that can be drawn from the notes is the expressed will for greater flexibility in the commitment of personnel to institutions so that when more urgent educational needs present themselves the Brothers will be readily available". (9.3).

"This world has more need than ever, even at the very center of man's temporal pursuits, for a witness given by people who are consecrated and who know and love God as a living being. It is more necessary than ever that an international Institute should exist for the educational service of the people throughout the world". (11.4).

2. A spirituality for Christian educators of the people

We refer to the numerous recent documents that crystalize the thought of Saint John Baptist De La Salle on the Christian Educator'. It will be sufficient to remember these basic themes:

— God's plan for the salvation of all men.

— Christian educators are God's "ministers and ambassadors" so that that plan may become a reality for children and youth, especially among the most abandoned.

— The Christian educator ought to let himself be guided by the Spirit of God, nourish himself with prayer and meditation on the Word of the Lord, and find his support in a community of educators that share his faith, his life and his educational activity. (Faith, Brotherhood, Service).

3. A style of education best adapted for the service of the people and enriched by three hundred years of experience — Pedagogical realism: starting from life, it adapts itself creatively to reality.

— Child-centered. The subject is the center of the process.

— Personalization of the educative act: follow-through in the case of each student.

— Professional and spiritual training of the educator.

— Relations between teacher and students based on friendship.

— A physical atmosphere of serenity and order; maximum use of time of instruction.

— A will to make the school truly efficacious; a real preparation for life.

4. Concrete experiences

"Concern for the poor ought to lead to the modification of some of the programs we are now conducting and to the complete transformation of some of the others". (Declaration: 31.1).

"There is also need for both individual and community effort, based on creative sudy, to discover new and adapted forms of education to meet the needs of those among the poor who are most neglected". (33.1).

"The General Chapter, then, invites all the Brothers to be responsive to this need in the world today. It expresses a strong desire that in every region there will be many among us who will be qualified and anxious to serve the people of the developing countries". (33.4).

The audio-visual services of SECOLI (SEAV) has put out a whole series of concrete and imaginate slide presentations as to how these guidelines are being put into practice by Brothers in different part of the globe. For a yet deeper treatment of the topic

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

we refer the reader to Circular No. 412, page 1;7 and following pages.

5. Favorable conditions for a proper experimentation

"Programs for the training of the Brothers, however excellent they may be, can never dispense with the responsibility which each Brother has for his own formation. The achievement of a personal vocation is the life-long task of every individual through fidelity to the continual guidance of the Holy Spirit". (Declaration. 15.2).

"In these conditions, you can understand that the General Council wants to use the opportunity provided by the reports to stress the URGENCY OF PURSUING THIS CHANGE, decreed by the Chapters, and to try to do this with a new enthusiasm: THE PROMOTION OF JUSTICE IS AN OBJECTIVE THAT MUST BE ACCEPTED IN PRACTICE IN THE ENTIRE INSTITUTE SO AS BETTER TO ACHIEVE THE SERVICE OF THE POOR. In the field of education, SERVICE TO THE POOR is an integral part of the PROMOTION OF JUSTICE, but this latter goes beyond that. It is not content simply to help the poor, it seeks to fight against the things which unceasingly cause poverty and injustice, even in the richest nations". Circular No. 412, pages 65-66. Upper-case emphasis comes from the document itself.

IV) SUGGESTIONS

1. A whole plan of basic information for all the Brothers and especially for those that are in their time of initial formation, on the doctrine of the Church on such themes as: Faith and Politics, Faith and Ideologies, Human Promotion, Popular Culture, Christian Liberation, Effective commitment for Justice, etc., in order to avoid simplistic arguments and to clear up ambiguities that seem to be the most paralyzing factors (doubts, fears) for an option for the poor among so many Brothers.

2. A greater sharing of Lasallian experiences in popular education, under whatever heading, and the possibility of evaluative interchanges.

3. The creation of nuclei of teachers and students, as well as parents, who take on a commitment to the promotion of Justice.

"That is why the creation of a core group of animators seems necessary and realistic if the school is to accomplish its objectives concerning service of the poor...". (Circular No. 412, page 33).

PEDAGOGY FOR LIFE

Everyday experience shows us that the school of today shapes the society of tomorrow; revolutionary movements, of whatever stamp, set the conquest of young students as their primary objective.

The primordial task of the school is to form man as a person and as a social being. In the school, as a general rule, students discover their professional vocation when they are properly guided. It also is the job of the school to train them for the competent and responsible exercise of that profession.

From its beginnings, Lasallian pedagogy was careful to form the students for life, not just for school. So that what has just been said will not be a gratuitous assumption, we must go to the Conduct of Schools, De La Salle's pedagogical treatise, to listen to what it testifies.

WHAT DO YOU WANT TO BE?

If the student that came to the door of De La Salle's school is already a "young man", the Director is to ask his parents: "What trade do they want him to learn and in how much time?" (Cf. 3rd part, Chap. II, art. 2, page 242, French edition).

The consequences that this question imposed on the school are clear: it is obliged to program contents and learning time for this new student. When the Conduct specifies how the teacher "should classify the students that are learning to write in italicized letters and the different grades of arithmetic (Cf. 3rd part, Chap. III, art. 4, page 257), it then goes into detail with regard to programs and learning time for these pupils. (Ibid. page 257 and 11).

And in another place, it states: "The students will write in rounded letters and in italicized letters according to their aptitudes, age and the profession which they want to enter and the time during which they will attend class" (Ibid., 3rd part, Chap. I, art. 2, page 234).

ACCELERATED LEARNING

The schooling of small children was very deficient in the time of St. La Salle. His classrooms took in students whose chronological and intellectual ages were not in accord — children of six or seven mixed in with others of twelve or more years. What then to do? The answer was to fit or adapt the teaching to the present and future need of the students. "If a student is twelve years old or older, and has not yet begun to write, he may begin before he has learned to read in Latin — always under condition that he does read correctly in French, and, according to the judgement of the teacher, that he not be obliged to attend (other) classes so that he may learn to write well. (Cf. 1st part, Chap. IV, art. 1, page 47).

In exceptional cases, for reasons of age or in consideration of the future of the student, the schedule may be altered. "If some students may only attend classes for a limited time, and need to write more than the others, they can be authorized to write during the entire time of class, except when texts are being read aloud, during prayers and during the catechism lesson". (Cf. 1st part, Chap. IV, art. 2, page 52).

It will not be out of place to include something about the Sunday School in this section. It was begun by De La Salle for the human and spiritual promotion of young workers of twenty years and more. Maillefer writes in this regard that: progress was so fast that in a short time the (Sunday Schools) reached some 200 students who studied, according to their aptitudes and capacity, drawing, or arithmetic, or, for the least advanced, reading and writing". (Maillefer, page 193). There was a realistic view of the amount of time during which these schools could function, adapting to the schedules of the students and arranging the contents according to their professional needs.

Would it be rash to apply to this procedure of the Lasallian School the present-day term "Accelerated Learning"? And, why not, "Personalized Education"?

WITH A VIEW TO TOMORROW

The mystery of tomorrow is the engine that thrusts mankind forward. The stutoo, who is mańbecoming, consciously or not strives to build a better world of tomorrow. The school, if it is going to respond to this fundamental human desire, must structure its content and methodology for that end.

The teaching that the Lasallian school imparts attempts to be practical and useful for the ones

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

for whom it is destined, not only during the learning period but, principally, for the morrow. Reading and writing took up the major part of the students' time and effort. For both of these activities the Conduct prescribes exercises that will redound to the advantage of the students when they leave the school.

For the spelling class, "they will be assigned to copy texts each day which contain information that will be useful for them to know for the future". (Cf. 1st part, Chap. IV, art. 3, page 55). A little further on it invites the students themselves to compose "letters, contracts... and other documents which will be useful at some future date". (Ibid.).

La Salle, the consummate psychologist, complains about parents for their negligence in demanding attendance at class. He particularly singles out the poor. To that effect he goes on to exhort his teachers with these lines that are worth a whole treatise in themselves: "The teacher must persuade parents of the obligation they have to see that their children receive instruction and of the serious harm they will cause the children if these do not learn to read and write, because they will never be of any use for future employment if they do not know how to read and write. (Cf. 3rd part, Chap. VI, art. 1, section 2, page 188).

There were at that time parents who would withdraw their children from school so that they could begin to earn something even though they were still too young and with little formal instruction. For these cases De La Salle recommended that the teachers urge the parents in these terms: "Consider how much you are going to harm the child and how important it is for a worker to know how to read and write, for, however slow the child may have been for his studies, if he knows how to read and write, he will be able to do anything". (Cf. 3rd part, Chap. VI, art. 1, section 2, page 189). That is to say, he'll be able to make his mark in life.

What is more, the Lasallian school, in its desire for human and Christian promotion, went beyond the limited programs of the "Petites Ecoles"and of the "popular schools", because they imparted "all that had to do with commerce, finances, architecture, and mathematics; in a word, all that a young person ought to study, except Latin". (Tableau de Rouen, 18th century).

Maillefer, with the authority of an eyewitness, will conclude this exposition with a testimony that once again shows the solicitude of De La Salle and of his sons for the human and Christian destiny of their students. Referring to the Irish boys that were taken in and educated by the Brothers, he writes: "De La Salle put them in the hands of Brothers who would instruct them and impart the necessary knowledge to each one, according to his condition; so that, in a short while, all were able to competently handle the different employments for which they were destined". (Maillefer, page 135. Cahiers Lasalliens, No. 6).

EXPERIMENTATION WITH THE INSTRUMENTAL ENRICHMENT PROGRAM OF REUVEN FEUERSTEIN

The "Work of the Guénange-Richemont Association" consists of two establishments situated in France, on both banks of the Moselle River between Metz and Thionville:

— the Educational Centre of Richemont for students between ten and fifteen years of age;

— the Professional Training Centre of Guénange for adolescents between fifteen and eighteen years of age.

Founded on May 28, 1891 at Guénange by the Abbé Thilmont, the establishment was confided to the Brothers of the Christian Schools in 1902. In 1968, the academic section was established at Richemont. Following a period of adjustment, the establishment became The House of Specialized Education for the Protection of Children and Troubled Youth.

The centre accepts boys who are social cases having trouble with their deportment and having difficulties adapting themselves to the family circle or in school or vocational circles.

The Establishment consists of a Boarding Department as well as a Vocational High School which, in a three or four year course, offers general education and vocational training which qualify students for the following trades:

— Printing;

— Mechanics-electrical, metalwork, and lathe work;

— Construction: Carpentry, painting, masonry.

For this purpose and for the training of the young men accepted, the school uses adapted pedagogical methods.

For the past two years, we have been experimenting with the Instrumental Enrichment programme of Professor Reuven Fuerstein, which is nothing other than the application of what the author calls "The experience of mediative apprenticeship". This mediation of the apprenticeship experience is a type of human experience. It is provided by the parents and by the teachers in giving the students the necessary structures for adapting themselves to their environment. In fact, in the opinion of Professor Feuerstein, it is the lack of this mediative apprenticeship which impedes the transmission of cultural values to the child, as well as the habits and modes of conduct, thus leading to a cultural deficiency and making the child a "culturally deprived person". Thus with the Enrichment Method, thanks to the personal mediation given by the teacher, the child "who functions on a low level" is changed by a direct exposure to a substitute of the mediation of the apprenticeship experience, which is an intensive and systematic substitute.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PROGRAMME

General Objective

To modify the cognitive structure of the subject "operating at a low level" in such a fashion as to render him sensitive to, and subject to, modification by direct exposure to the stimuli met with in the circumstances of daily life and in the formal situations of apprenticeship.

Through Specific Objects

The correction of cognitive function deficiencies. The acquisition of vocabulary, terms, concepts of operation and the relations concerning the programme. The formation of habits. The production of intrinsic motivation. The capacity to judge and reflect. To change his role from that of a passive reproducer of information to that of a creator of new information.

Population Envisioned

Age:

From ten years of age until adulthood for those culturally handicapped.

From eight years of age until adulthood for ordinary people with specific problems.

Nature of Material

An exercise note book and pencil. Each instrument is designed for a particular cognitive function but it may also be interchanged with others.

Nature of the Exercises

The absence of content in the sense that the content is not an end in itself, but only a vehicle

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

to directing attention towards the cognitive functions which ought to be corrected, developed, and enriched.

Nature of the Activity

Discovery, apprenticeship, and reproduced application in the diverse situations of relations, or regulations, of principles of operations of strategies and other foreseeable exigencies in a becoming cognitive functioning.

Scholastic Results

These do not enter into the process. Certain instruments are accessible to individuals who are entirely illiterate.

Scholastic Framework

This process complements the regular school programme. It complements the apprenticeship discipline of the basic school instruction and the mastery of such skills as those of reading and mathematics for those who are incapable of apprenticeship. There are materials for extra school activities to be administered outside of regular class time.

Nature of the Inter-action Among the Pupils

The definition of the shared problem. Participation in the divergent proposals for a solution. Group discussion for a subtle interpretation of the PEI activities and of general tasks and specific mutual help and interaction.

Interaction with the Teacher

Presentation of the task: an explanation of terms, presentation of an individual research project of processes and strategies. Production orientation of a capacity for judgement and reflection, teaching of a specific content whose elements are necessary for PEI: Production of motivation in re-enforcing initiatives of inter-activities among students and the creation of a footbridge in the various areas and in life in general.

EFFECTS OF THE PROGRAMME

On the Teacher

The training and experience of PEI brings about changes in the teacher in the perception he has of the child, in his evaluation and in his attempts for making modifications: in his attitudes regarding the capabilities of the retarded subject, in his diminution of the use of the concrete for the benefit of the abstract, in the search for processes instead of results. Understanding the cognitive structure can make the teacher more aware of the aspects of indispensable education for the changing of structures or dimensions in understanding as well as in personality.

On the Child

The increased will to master school work. Increased motivation and assiduity in school work. An improvement in his self-image.

On Parents

In view of the children's success, the parents can modify the level of their initiatives in behalf of the child and can modify their image of the child.

MANAGEMENT OF CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS: A LAYPERSON'S VIEW

This article has been written for lay administrators in the hope of sharing a layman's view of management and administration of school organizations and a leadership style in consonance with the La Sallian concept of education. The model is heavily influenced by the culture of the community established by the founder and organized into sequential processes using management adaptations and insights into the reality of today's conditions.

A strong leader, St. John Baptist de La Salle possessed an ardent zeal, a tender and compassionate charity, agreeable manners and a boundless love for penance. All qualities he had which were necessary for his mission of establishing his Christian community.

Following the founder's style of organizing the community, some highlights in his life as a leader were selected which reflected the kind of organization in dire need today with the increasing number of lay teachers and administrators in our La Salle schools.

Consider the following elements which lend themselves easily to effective leadership and followership in any structural organization.

— St. John Baptist de la Salle organized the first group of teachers bringing them all together and teaching them the operation of a well-managed community.

— He educated the Brothers to have one mind and one heart to enable them to live in great harmony and assist each other with a tender and compassionate charity. All they possessed they had in common: even their interests were shared so that their attention was undivided.

— This kind of organization proved effective for sometime, but he noticed one serious drawback: the Brothers' great solicitude for the future. They worried occasionally about their prospects, thinking that they had embraced a lowly profession.

— He revived the Brothers' failing courage by talking to each one of them about faith in the Divine Providence. He reminded the Brothers that God knows their needs and will not fail anyone provided they remain faithful in their service to Him. His concept of organization hinged largely on submission, dependence and humility which at that time proved to be, effective.

Going through the patron's experiences some important implications have surfaced which are related to the high and low points in managing his community. The analysis below shows some important dimensions using the high points as best features which should be adopted, and where appropriate intervention strategies are prescribed to effect the low points:

— Leadership style as part of the school culture is largely influenced in successful institutions by the caracter and reputation of the founder.

— An organized community is like a well-knit family. The "give and take" process or mutual support of the members of the family can be learned by the members of the administrative team who act as models to all faculty members.

— The best results are obtained when teachers work together with a sense of commitment to one another as well as to the organization.

— Organization by formal or informal groups with unity of purpose is the main distinguishing feature of an outstanding organization.

— To be effective, each group, unit or department should have the same characteristics as the administrative team. Among these are:

1. A group, unit, or department is regarded as a whole component. It is made up of students, teachers and administrators as well as their support staff forming a cohesive team.

2. It is educated. Though teachers may have personality clashes and differences of opinion, the teachers have to learn to interact and to share with one another. They have to forego or relinquish their individual objectives to achieve a common goal.

3. It is supportive. Each teacher supports the others. If there is a group project everybody works to make the activity successful. If it fails, failure is assumed by all.

4. It is inspiring. The actions, values, and attitudes of the teachers inspire other members to greater efforts and achievements.

5. It is enjoyable. Teachers enjoy being one. They like the sense of unity, the sense of belonging and fun of being in a group.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

— This kind of organization demands a greater coordination rather than mere compliance or sheer conformity. A member must coordinate his function with the team plan and the rules of the organization.

— The building of a strong team calls for teacher participation in the decision making process, working arrangements, setting targets, and quality control. Emphasis rests on task specialization to make the most of the potentials and skills of each member of the team.

— One of the biggest hindrances to this kind of organization is identity problem since recognition is normally given to the whole unit and not to individual achievements. This could be overcome if the administrator pays close attention to individual growth in the form of a well-organized faculty development program and reward system.

Generally, lay administrators must be aware that it is not the individual but the team that is the instrument of sustained and enduring success in this type of management. A team can renew and regenerate itself by new recruitment as individual team members leave or retire. This is parallel to St. John Baptist de la Salle's experience of letting some Brothers leave the community when their enthusiasm in their work has slackened. His patience in training new recruits together with the others who have remained faithful paved the way for the formation of a new community filled with good will, fortitude, fervor, and piety. Lastly, the effect of this leadership style is the building up of a store of shared and collectively owned experiences, information, learnings, and decisions that can be analyzed, improved, and passed on to fellow administrators who may wish to follow the founder's footsteps in managing a La Sallian school community.

NEW CREATION COMMUNITY (1)

The tragic incident at Brussels caused by crowd violence before the football match between Liverpool and Juventus in May 1985 ensured that the serious social problems which have disturbed the life of Liverpool, North West England, received a lot of international publicity. At around this same time, Brother Damian Lundy received an article for the Youth Column in the magazine of which he is the co-editor, The Sower, which he thought would be of interest to readers of Lasalliana. The article is written by Brother Ray Raine, C.B.C. (formerly known as the Irish Christian-Brothers) and it describes the NEW CREATION COMMUNITY, founded by Ray in recent years. With it is an account by Gavin Evans, aged nineteen, who is a member of the community, and texts of the Community's Prayers. We are glad to share some Good News from Liverpool, shared by a Brother who does not belong to the De La Salle Brothers but who shares the Lasallian gospel with young people in different parts of England, and is glad to share it with our readers.

The feature is reproduced from The Sower with permission.

NEW CREATION IN LIVERPOOL

Ray Raine writes: In 1978 several Brothers, experiencinjg conversion in their own lives, decided to start prayer groups for young people in the senior section of their schools. These took place once a week and consisted basically of hymns, Scripture reading, a sharing of their prayer and experiences, and intercessory prayer. The Brothers weren't too sure about the methods of running these meetings but were convinced that the desire for prayer was very strong among the young people. Once a month or so these groups were brought together to share a celebration of their faith. About three hundred young people took part in these days. Over the course of these three years the leaders of the prayer groups used to meet for prayer together every two weeks to seek guidance from the Lord as to which direction the prayer groups should take. Let me show briefly how three things (among several others) came out of this.

SIGNS OF LIFE

1. During 1981 riots broke out among the predominantly black area of the inner city of Liverpool, where the Brothers had moved in 1977. So the youth days were moved to this area. Out of this move emerged meetings between the black youths and the more "privileged" young people of our suburban schools.

2. Over the course of four years we brought four hundred young people to Taizé, home of the ecumenical Brotherhood in France and international meeting-point for many thousands of young people who want to share their lives and their faith. Our visits prompted us to ask the basic question: "Why is it that we Christian Brothers cannot be the centre of the prayer-life and activity of the young?" (Little did we know what was going to happen!)

3. The Brothers started to organise frequent retreat weekends for young people. The outcome of these retreats was that many youngsters had experiences of Jesus which led to new beginnings for them — a life of frequent prayer, Scripture-reading, reflection and, most important of all, a witnessing to others of what the Lord had done in their lives.

A NEW TYPE OF COMMUNITY

In 1981 I, who had been involved in all this and was convinced that the old methods of seeking vocations to our religious Institute were now past, decided to base the formation programme for our contacts (which I had been asked to direct) on two basic ideas:

1. the renewal of the Christian life of young people in our Brothers' schools: in other words, the calling of young people to become CHRISTIAN before inviting any of them to consider becoming "religious";

2. the evangelisation of youth by youth.

With this in mind I invited two young men who had just completed their high school studies to take a year off before they pursued their tertiary studies. At this stage neither had any idea of joining the Brothers, but they were committed Christians who were praying regularly and were fully involved in all that had been happening in the prayer groups of which I have written. They were to be asked to help me with my work in forming prayer groups, running retreats, leading days of Awareness in our schools and any other activities which my job entailed.

The two young men were invited to live with the Brothers in the inner city community, sharing our life of prayer, our meals and our recreation. This was very innovative and, therefore, somewhat confusing for the Brothers at large, since they were never too sure (despite my attempts to provide a full explanation of the situation in our provincial Newsletter) whether these lads were postulants, aspirants or heaven-knows-what. The problem only deepened into greater mystery when it became clear that one of them had a girlfriend and when, at the end of the year, both left for university.

The following year two more young men came along, and in the third year four young men offered their services and together with three Brothers they moved into the Brothers' house in Birkenhead, near Liverpool. And so the NEW CREATION COMMUNITY BEGAN.

WHAT WAS THE BASIS OF THIS COMMUNITY? I POINT TO FOUR ASPECTS:

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

1. an experience of community-living;
2. a deepening of one's prayer-life;
3. a deeper knowledge of one's faith through teaching;
4. the apostolate of evangelising young people in our schools.

In 1984 eight young men offered themselves. During the course of these four years (1981-85) the prayer groups had continued to grow and most of the young people who had been involved with the original scene had passed on to university and maintained their deep searching for God.

KEEPING IN TOUCH

During 1983-84, when the NEW CREATION COMMUNITY began, it was decided to hold a day per term for all those who were away at College in various parts of the country. The day was to offer a support for them who were trying to lead their Christian lives under trying and, at times, really difficult circumstances. These days were so well attended that in September 1984 it was felt that these "associates" should have some form of identity, so they were invited to commit themselves to the Lord for a year, through a commitment which involved prayer and service and some form of association with the New Creation Community. They were called disciples, since they had been commissioned by the Community in twos and threes around the country. At the moment (May 1985) there are over sixty NEW CREATION disciples who meet to pray in different parts of the country. I keep in touch with them by visits and by newsletters frequently. These young people (boys and girls) are perhaps at a half-way stage towards a formal association with the Brothers.

In September 1985 the New Creation Youth Community will move to the inner city of Liverpool to be associated with the Brothers' work there and to form a new cente for youth along the lines of the San Egidio community in Rome. There is also the possibility of setting up a girls' community in the same part of Liverpool. We see what is happening in Liverpool as part of the movement in our Church towards a new lay form of Gospel Community.

NEW CREATION DISCIPLES

Prayer of Commitment

(to be recited as frequently as possible)

Blessed be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us with all the spiritual blessings of heaven in Christ.

Before the world was made he chose us, chose us in Christ to be holy and spotless and to live through love in his presence. (Eph 1:3-4).

Jesus, I praise you for living within me forever.

I thank you for having chosen me to carry out your will today.

I thank you for the gifts that you have given me to do your work today.

I thank you Jesus for the people and the situations that you place before me today.

Increase within me, Jesus, the gifts you have already given me so that I may become the person that I was called to be.

I place myself now into your hands this day so that whatever I do, whether I eat or drink, whatever I do at all, I do for your glory. (1 Cor 10.31) Give me an increase in faith so that I may have the courage and strength to carry out your will today even in the most difficult and trying circumstances.

Help me now, dear Jesus, to make a commitment to be a faithful disciple of the New Creation Community. Help me in my daily prayer, in the reading of your Word and in serving those in need around me.

Watch over and protect all disciples of the community today (mention here any in particular) throughout this country. Make us one with you in mind and heart so that we can experience always the love and peace which only you can give.

Help me to be faithful to my promises so that I may grow and 'increase in wisdom, in stature and in favour with God and men'. (Luke 2:52).

So I ask you, Jesus, to accept my life today as a disciple of the New Creation Community until ...

Glory be to him whose power, working in us can do infinitely more than we can ask or imagine; glory be to him from generation to generation in the church and in Christ Jesus forever and ever. Amen. (Eph. 3:20-1).

Mary, mother of Jesus, pray for me.

Live Jesus in our hearts forever.

NEW CREATION COMMUNITY (2)

GAVIN Evans, a member of the 1984-85 NEW CREATION COMMUNITY in Birkenhead, tells us what the experience means to him.

There are eleven of us living here in one of the Christian Brothers' houses in Birkenhead. We are a community which includes three Christian Brothers and eight young men. Having finished school, we are taking a year off before going on to employment or further education this October. I myself, Dave, Matt and Andy are from Plymouth, John and Andy Mac from Crosby, Damian from Manchester and Rob from Stoke. Quite an assortment.

But we all have one thing in common. We all consider our faith to be important enough to us that we can spend one year of our lives living in community — even though we have no intention of entering the Religious Life ourselves.

So how exactly are we spending this year out? Well, first of all, we consider the experience of living in community to be of primary importance. It is a chance to discover not only one's faults and failings, but more our strengths — in fact to realize one's true gifts in life; to discern one's mission in life as a Christian. By sharing our lives together, our meals, our prayer and of course our work, we have come to know one another and ourselves more fully, growing individually and as a group.

And indeed we see our work as essential to this community vision, as well as an expression of our faith. Our main work is our mission to schools, running Awareness days and weekend retreats. Ths is an opportunity to share our faith with other young people, in the hope that they too may grow in their faith. Our main work is in Christian Brothers' schools around the North West of England, although we do undertake a fair amount of travel around the country. Venues so far have included Plymouth, Stoke, Bath, Twickenham, Salford, Atrincham, Sunderland and even Dublin.

However, not all our time is spent praying and running retreats. Much of our time is free which gives us the opportunity to exercise our own initiative by becoming involved in community service, in whatever capacity and to whatever extent we choose. Dave and I help out in a youth club in inner-city Liverpool, for instance, and we all get the regular chance to give the Mother Teresa Sisters a hand with their work for the homeless. Four of us help with the local prayer groups; four visit the local primary school and help at the nearby youth club. And all of us are encouraged to help out in the local parishes, visiting old and lonely people or giving a hand to the parish priest.

TIME TO REFLECT

Apart from all these activities, we do have time for our own personal study and reflection. Two mornings a week are set aside a few lessons on topics ranging from the Prophets to St. John's Gospel to Vatican II. Here is an invaluable opportunity to reflect upon and consider the full implications of our religion as applicable to our future lives. And time is provided for us to read up on those which particularly interest us, not forgetting the subjects we are due to be reading as from October.

For me, my year off is providing me with a golden opportunity to step back from the "rat race" before rushing headlong into life. Furthermore, that I have chosen to spend a year in a Christian community is of particular significance. It is a chance to be of service to others through the work the community undertakes, and also a chance to reflect upon and consider my own mission in life — how best I can live my faith in my future life. Indeed I consider this year to be part of my education — an education for life. To young people of my age, I say, "I believe the New Creation Community is worth considering. It could be for you".

Next year's community will be in a new venue, in the inner-city of Liverpool. It is also hoped that next year there will be four such communities in other parts of Liverpool, one in Manchester and one in Cambridge, some in the eighteen age group, some postgraduate communities and some university student communities.

So there's a good deal coming up in the near future for the New Creation Community...

(Gavin's account was originally written for publication in St. Edward's school magazine, Liverpool. We are grateful for the chance to give it wider publicity).

DAILY PRAYER FOR NEW DISCIPLES

INTRODUCTION

The time recommended for this prayer is late afternoon or after the evening meal if said in pairs or a group; or during any time in the evening or night if said singly, when you have the quiet to pray.

The following 3 steps are suggested

1. THE PRESENCE OF JESUS

To help you to open yourself to the presence of Jesus, say the following short prayer peacefully and slowly, three times.

'Jesus, I praise you within me – forever'

Spend about ½ minute in silence and peace thinking only one thing — that He is present.

It may help to open you to His presence if you repeat one word

'Jesus ... Jesus ...'

or repeat one phrase

'You within me ... You within me'

2. THE WORD OF THE LORD

Read a few verses of Scripture.

Spend a couple of minutes looking over what you have read.

Stay with any words or phrases in the scripture passage that touch you deeply — because this is where Jesus is speaking to you.

This is listening to His Word. Don't hurry this step.

Allow yourself to respond to Jesus with feelings of love, praise, and thankfulness.

Speak to Jesus about the content of the reading especially any part that touched you deeply.

(If you are in a group of two or more, you can share the parts that touched you deeply and share your prayers of response).

3. INTENTIONS

Picture some person in your mind, name that person and call a blessing on him/her using this prayer:

... NAME ... May the Lord bless you and keep you.

May He show His face to you and have mercy on you.

May He tum His face to you and give you peace.

May the Lord bless you. Amen.

My Commitment to Service .....

FOREWORD

This issue number 11 of Lasalliana is a bit special because one half of it is devoted to the recent General Chapter. That event, it seemed to us, merited such a choice. Of course, we have no intention here of recounting all that went on during the Chapter, nor of reproducing texts which have been already published elsewhere, but rather to point out the invitation which the Chapter has extended to us.

The texts of Brothers John Johnston, Superior General, and of Brothers Patrice Marey and Michel Sauvage open very rich perspectives to us and invite us to the reflection, progress, and deepening of our spirituality, our activities, and of our religious and communitarian comportment.

We shall become ever more authentic "Lasallians", whether Brothers or lay persons, if we become:

★ more conscious of our spiritual heritage,
★ guided by the inspirations of the Rule,
★ resolved to follow the paths of education in fully exercising our Christian educational ministry, together and by association.

We could see in these three pivotal points perspectives for Lasalliana in the course of the next three years.

However, we do not intend that the privileged attention given to these first three contributions should overshadow interest in any of the other articles in issue number 11, for they are, in a certain way, the illustration and the concretization on the points and about the precise places of the real life of the Lasallian Family.

1687: THE ELECTION OF THE FIRST BROTHER SUPERIOR

Truthfully speaking, a slight doubt is possible with regard to the date. The first biographer, Brother Bernard, at first hesitated, then he retracts once, before finally adopting the year 1687. After him, Maillefer also accepts the year 1687. But Blain is less precise: He sets the happening after a spiritual retreat which the Founder conducted in a hermitage of the Carmelite Fathers in the year 1686. The three biographers are well agreed, however, on one important point: the event was subsequent, more or less, to Trinity Sunday of 1686 in which the Founder and some Brothers bound themselves by the vow of obedience for three years.

1. The persons in question.

Many of the Brothers who had pronounced the vow of 1686, perhaps others also, met at Rhiems, Rue Neuve, together with De La Salle. They made the spiritual exercises of a retreat. Several of those who had made the vow of obedience were disposed to renew it. Just as in the previous year, this retreat seems to have taken place between the Pentecostal feasts and the days following.

It seems that they were taken by surprise when De La Salle proposed that they should take advantage of this reunion to choose by way of an election one among themselves who would become their superior and would be in charge of the internal government of the community. From reading the biographers, it can be noted that the Founder had a difficult time convincing the Brothers of this, which is easily understandable. However, more out of respect than conviction, they agreed to the election and their votes went to Brother Henri Lheureux.

This was a choice tjhat surprised nobody except the one elected. It was a choice which De La Salle had foreseen, and perhaps had himself suggested.

The biographers tell us about Brother Henri Lheureux's qualities and virtues. That is almost all we know about him. Was he a native of Rheims, or at least of Champagne? Probably. He was one of the first, if not the very first to enter the community at the Rue Neuve, maybe even the house of De La Salle. A perhaps not too clear passage from Canon Blain leads us to believe that in 1686 Brother Henri was 24 years of age.

From this distant period in history, the registers containing the names of those who entered the community are no longer extant. The oldest ones we have been able to compile are from 1714 or perhaps a bit later, and these deliberatedly omit the names of those who previously had died or had left the community. No trace, therefore, of Brother Henri Lheureux exists in this register. This Brother certainly died in Paris, in the parish of Saint-Sulpice, almost certainly in 1690: the parish records of this period were just as poorly kept as were those of the Brothers' communities. At any rate, the signature of Brother Henri Lheureux can be read at the bottom of the death notice of a certain Jean Morice, "died the first day of May (1687) at about 17 years of age".

This death notice is found in the parish register of Saint-Etienne in Rheims, for the years 1686-1700. This Jean Morice has been identified with the Brother Maurice to whom Canon Blain makes many references and who died either at the end of April or at the beginning of May, 1687, "at the age of twenty-two". Going especially by the date and the signature in the parish register, May 1, 1687, we can conclude that Brother Henri Lheureux was at Rheims and that he presented himself to the parish priest, Simon Lhermite, in the parish of Saint-Etienne, as the Brother most qualified to attest to the death of one who seems to have been his young confrere.

2. De La Salle's motives in deciding that the Brothers should proceed to elect one among themselves as Superior of the community.

The first biographers do not hesitate to tell us that De La Salle himself justified his reasons before the assembled Brothers. Being the only priest in a community, created by himself, and constituted exclusively of lay people, the Founder considered it most suitable if not necessary, that the superior of this community should himself be non-clerical.

> "In an exhortation which he gave the Brothers, he presented very valid reasons for the necessity of having a Brother as the Superior of the community. (Bernard, p. 74).
> He argued that, once their numbers had increased, then several among their number could be found very capable of governing the body, and that it was very important and even necessary that they choose one among themselves into whose hands he could hand over the government. (Maillefer, ms. Carbon, p. 42; ms. Rheims, p. 64).

These two themes presented by the first biographers would be amply developed much later by Canon Blain. It is regrettable that, in doing so, the third biographer insisted so much on another reason attributed to De La Salle, namely, that his wish to live out his vow of obedience in a state of subjection was incompatible with his exercise of the role of superior. Without doubt, once Brother Henri Lheureux was elected, the Founder multiplied signs of deference towards him. Equally without doubt, he demonstrated that he was particularly pleased with being able to live in that state of obedience and humility which he had deliberatedly chosen. Still, the wish to "lower himself" cannot be given as the only or even principal reason which had led the priest, John Baptist De La Salle, to have one of the Brothers elected as Superior of the Community.

3. The election of Brother Lheureux is nullified by the diocesan authorities.

Brother Bernard was the first one, albeit only after the death of the Founder, that means thirty years after the events at the Rue Neuve, to gather some testimonies from one or other of the Brothers who had lived under the superiorship of Brother Henri Lheureux. It is beyond doubt that the Abbé De La Salle, the former Canon of the Cathedral of Rheims, pushed his duty of obedience to the new Superior to its ultimate consequences. This had those out side of the community talking. Among the ecclesiastics, and especially among those who had the easiest access to the ear of the Grand Vicar, this was talked about quite bluntly and even severely condemned. It was inconceivable for these gentlemen of the higher clergy that a priest, and what was more, a former Canon, could so lower himself as to obey a simple Brother, a lay person without the slightest clerical dignity.

By the order of the office of the Archbishop, the election of Brother Henri was declared unacceptable, which re-instated De La Salle in his role as Superior. It is impossible to be specific about the level of those intervening. The election of Brother Henri Lheureux evidently had never been ratified by the ecclesiastical authorities. It was valid strictly within the community, and the intervention of the Ordinary was perfectly in order since it was a question of re-establishing the presence of a cleric within the heart of an association of the faithful which did not possess any other canonical status.

Such an intervention did not require any official act by the chancellory. So, this does not exclude the possibility that it was simply an oral notification to the persons concerned, hence, principally to De La Salle himself. This is the impression gathered from a reading of the biographers.

> Many people complained to the ecclessiastical superiors about De La Salle's conduct, wrote Brother Bernard, believing that De La Salle had done injury to his character and had in some way debased himself. That is why, to his great disappointment, he had to once again assume the superiorship which he had given up so joyfully. (Bernard, p. 78).
> They (the ecclestiastical superiors) found it wrong that a priest, a doctor and former Canon of the cathedral should unreservedly submit himself to a simple Brother not invested in any kind of distinction. The many drawbacks of such a situation were presented to him and he was obliged to re-assume the superiorship which he had given up. (Maillefer, ms. Carbon, p. 44; ms. Rheims, p. 66).
>
> They (the ecclesiastical superiors) came to the new house to re-install De La Salle, to his great regret, in the place of Superior, and to make Brother Lheureux step down, according to their wishes. (Blain, I, p. 267).
> And two pages later the same biographer writes: De La Salle was obliged by the Grand Vicars to reassume the first place, which he previously had held, much to his own disappointment. (Id. p. 270).

This last affirmation allows us perhaps to be precisely sure that the term "they" refers to "the ecclesiastical superiors", Still, all the same, we would hesitate to claim that the Grand Vicars themselves came to the Brothers' community.

4. The consequences of the diocesan intervention.

Without delay, there was a pure and simple return to the previous condition: the Brothers were governed by De La Salle, who had been confirmed in his position as Superior by the ecclesiastical authorities.

Still, when dreaming of the future, the Founder stuck to his idea that the Superior ought to be one of the members of the community as a whole. He did not want any Superior other than a Brother. He was apprehensive lest his own nomination should set a precedent, and that after him, another intervention by the Ordinary should bring in some ecclesiastic from the outside to become superior, a total stranger, who could in no way continue the spirit and traditions of the community.

His reflection and prayer convinced him finally, albeit reluctantly, to resort to a compromise solution. Brother Henri Lheureux had shown himself to be a good superior. Being one of the most senior members of the community, he could easily lead, if the agreement of the ecclesiastical superiors were not wanting. Such an agreement, without doubt, could be obtained if he were vested with priestly authority. De La Salle hence asked the Brother to prepare himself for Holy Orders. He himself taught Brother Henri Latin, and the Brother then followed courses in Philosophy and Theology, first in Rheims and then in Paris. De La Salle would then present him for ordination.

This initiative of the Founder could rightly surprise us. Everything that we know about him shows him to be a person of great discretion and prudence. His letters show that he was an extremely reserved man and that he highly respected the freedom of those whom he directed each time that they had recourse to him with a decision involving their conscience. Yet, here we have a case where apparently it is he who is deciding the priestly vocation of Brother Lheureux. Certainly, he must have followed proper procedures. Still, he seems to have substituted himself in the place of the interested party in a decision which directed Brother Henri towards a way of life different from that which he had chosen when he joined the Brothers' community.

It would be only natural that the Founder would have had some reservations concerning the sound basis of his decision from the very moment he thus made use of the docility of Brother Lheureux. We are less surprised at the suddenness with which he understood the sign given him shortly afterwards at the almost sudden death of the Brother right at the time when he was about to complete his preparations for the Priesthood.

> He (De La Salle) was so touched by this loss that he could not hold back his tears and he felt constrained to give some time to the sorrow it caused him. After that, reproaching his weakness, he told the Brothers around him that, by this precipitous death, God had made known that He did not want any priests in his Institute. (Maillefer, ms, Carbon, p. 59; ms. Rheims, p. 88).

The event resulted in dispelling the doubt which had been harboured in the soul of the Founder. He thus reverted — definitely this time — to be led by his original idea, that which had led him in 1687 to propose the election of a Brother as Superior from among the Brothers' Community.

IN STEP WITH THE POOR OF THE LAND
An Original Work: TAMI

The Situation

Tami is a little village of Togo. It is situated in the Northwest of the country, some 650 kilometres from Lomé, the capital, and some 6 kilometres from Ghana, and some 20 kilometres, as the crow flies, from Burkina Faso (formerly Upper Volta). The village consists of 20 Zonkalas, which are a species of settlements made of adobe and straw, where 20 to 30 families are squeezed closely together. The town appears on the map with markings which give the place some relevance. Its importance is due to the fact that Tami can boast of being the "Cheferie" or seat of government for 22 towns or villages spread over some 70 square kilometres.

If you had the good fortune of getting an aerial view of the region, what would catch your attention would be the sight of how spread out the village is. There does not exist any nucleus, and no matter how well trod the place has been, it would be difficult for you to poinpoint Nawang, Pogmang, Kukdagon, or Bongpag. This demographic situation has its advantage: the people live on their own land. The inconvenience, however, is that of communication. This is the case especially when you try to evacuate a gravely sick person through paths which are hardly accessible to bicycles, or when children must walk 6 to 7 kilometres to and from school each day.

The climate is characterized by the existence of two seasons. The rainy season runs from May to October. The rest of the years is dry. Then the desert wind, the Harmatán, coming from the Northeast, pre-dominates. For two or three months this wind leaves a cloud of dust suspended in the air. It limits visibility to 200 or 300 meters and the thermometre oscillates between 12 and 30 degrees Celsius. This is the most difficult time of the year. At this time your lips and your feet dry out and begin to chap. This is the coolest and hardest time of the year.

The rural training center of Tami (RTCT)

It was to this unhospitable climate that the Brothers of the Christian Schools were invited by the Bishop of Dapaong, Msgr. Hanrion, and here they have established a little outpost in order to save people from their misery and to restore their dignity.

The PURPOSE of the RTCT. The school at Tami endeavours to train a generation of young farmers to become competent and capable of being the leaven of development for their respective peoples.

TRAINING. First and foremost we work right on the land. The first activity of our students as soon as they arrive at the Centre at the beginning of April is to learn how to handle the oxen. This is a rather difficult and dangerous task which usually does not result in more than a few bumps and minor bruises.

On the land, farming is learned: the use of chemical fertilizers, the types and mixtures of fertilizer according to the various crops (sorghum, peanuts, cotton, rice, soybeans) the use and multiplication of organic fertilizers, seed selection. The density of sowing, for example, is of great importance because if one does not have the slightest idea of the calendar, it just takes one good early rain to see all your work come to naught. Besides, the greater part of this sowing is on land which has not been previously prepared.

The women as well as the men work in the fields. The men have to devote most of their time there. To the men, of course, falls the hardest and dirtiest jobs. The women, although they spend less time in farming, must carry out the important role of handling the domestic chores, looking for firewood for the cooking, preparing meals, cleaning and otherwise looking after the children.

All that is harvested belongs to the students and they themselves are in charge of the marketing. All the work done at the Center is done in common.

The crop yields in the Center are two to three times greater than that obtained by the adjacent farms. To avoid having the goods obtained in the Center by our students wasted within the large family, we have agreed that at the end of the first year, all the families will pay for the ploughing on an installment basis. Likewise, at the end of the second year, all the families have to deposit a sizable sum of money which is destined for the purchase of a yoke of oxen. This amount allows them to pay more than half of the value of the team if the year has been good. The Center makes up what is lacking by giving out interest free loans, repayable over a five-year period. This system does not work too well, so another one will have to be established. Already, borrowing money from the bank has started, with the drawback that the students must pay the interest and it is we who have to act as guarantors.

What is clear is that the students must leave the Center equipped with those materials with which they have become familiar during their two years of training. Every project has its problems, and this is the big problem here in Tami.

FOLLOW-UP. Without a follow-up, the training given to the students will be of little use. In order for the training to be effective it is absolutely necessary that those who have been trained work in their own places in the same way that they have worked during their training period. Well then, once they are back on the local scene, our students run into certain difficulties. The influence of the family, that of the father and the older people in particular is in strong reaction again any innovations; the fear of what will be said and jealousy are things which hamper our former students when it comes time to actually do the job they were taught to do. It is absolutely necessary to encourage and buoy up the spirits of our students in such an atmosphere. We must hush up the older people who think they know everything and who have already reached the possible limits of doing something better than that done by their ancestors, and which they now pass on to their children.

Personal formation imparted at the center:

Apart from the agricultural training given to the students, the Center has organized activities designed to develop the human personality. Two hours a day are spent teaching men how to read and write. Because of the fact that nothing has been published in the local dialect, with the exception of the Gospel and the prayers said at Mass, we have had to teach literacy in French. This is a language unknown to these people, so one can image the difficulties this presents. After two years, very few of these emerge literate, but at least they pick up a minimum notion necessary to be able to spout out a little bit of French so that they will not be cheated at the market, because the teaching of literacy also includes learning some addition, subtraction, division, and multiplication.

The women were not interested in such lessons, so we had to come up with something more in keeping with their wishes. For them we have organized activities for the improvement of women: personal hygiene, the care and health of children, mother and child protection, courses in cooking, starting off with things they have in their own homes, sewing, and knitting.

Knitting seems to have really caught on with the local women. Every spare moment they have, they are found working away with their knitting or crocheting needles. The problem is that wool is so expensive. For the past couple of years, I have tried my hand at something.

I recall that as a child I saw in our town how the spinning wheel was used for spinning wool. In Togo there is no wool. Sheep are rarely seen here and these are used for their hides, but there is cotton here. I could come up with a spinning wheel, I could learn how to run it, fabricate it, and spread it around the country. In the towns these have completely disappeared. During the dry season, the women have very little to do, so spinning would be a good occupation and source of income.

In our Center, the ploughing is done by oxen. The Sabana region, where our center is located, is a region where animal husbandry abounds. However, in reality it is not well exploited.

Faced with this static energy, we could not resist getting involved. We were the first ones to make use of the oxen. During the 1970's, a little before we got ourselves set up in this region, there were not more than 30 pairs of oxen. Today, there are more than 2,500, thanks to our initiative and above all to the work done by the E.D.F. Project, European Development Fund, which has come here with their economic means and has been impressed by our methodology.

Other accomplishments

1. Wells. This is a work of prime urgency. During the dry season, which goes on for six long months, the women have to look for water in contaminated ponds, which are the source of innumerable sicknesses. More often, these women must trod three, six, even up to eight kilometres in order to find water fit for men and animals. Since the very beginning of our work here, we really went after this whole-heartedly. Thanks to the "Campaign Against Hunger", the "French Cooperation Mission", some La Salle schools, "Cebemo" of Holland, "Development and Peace" from Canada, etc., we have been able to equip and set up 50 wells. At present, we should be able to do about ten per year.

2. Summer projects. In Issue Zero of "Educating Today" you have a direct account of this (See Page 21); in this account, we are not informed of many works which were done previously: two churches, two chapels, two literacy class rooms, two schools of three rooms each (not counting the two schools put up this year), a house for training women, with two large halls and two adjacent rooms.

3. Help to schools and dispensaries. In our little "slush fund" we always have a few pennies to help out social works such as schools and dispensaries. It helps buy notebooks, pencils, school furniture, and medicine. Day and night we are available should it be necessary to transport some of the sick to the hospital.

Sources of funds

An Association called "Adesdida" is composed principally of students of a school in Paris and an Association of parents. They cover the costs of vehicles, generator units, the salaries of monitors and two employees, and the renovation of materials.

The Brothers of Spain take care of the travel expenses of the three Brothers present here.

Diverse groups such as CEBEMO, the Campaign Against Hunger, schools, and individual benefactors help us to finance the wells.

Some schools and other charitable souls help us to carry out the work in the schools and dispensaries.

Conclusion

Our presence in Tami is, first and foremost, the presence of the Church, a witness.

Speaking of the churches which we have constructed around Tami, I should like to cite a letter which I received just today: the Churches constructed, function as summits. They are the true focal points of encounter and the sign of a Christian presence. Around these churches the number of Christians and the work of evangelization goes on increasing.

A COMMUNITY AT THE SERVICE OF THE COUNTRY FOLK

Brief Introduction: Brother Juan Bosco Morales sends us these interesting documents from Puebla about the work the Brothers are carrying on in the mountains of Serrania de Ayahualulco. Five of them work in two different places (separated from one another by a five-hour journey) for the human and religious upliftment of the country folk.

Their words sometimes truly tap at the door of our conscience with the deep echo of an authentic "liberation theology".

"Our mission to teach the poor gratuitously impels us to seek to encounter our people who, in various ways fight against injustice and death and who re-affirm their inviolable love for life and for their inalienable right to a better life, through an evangelizing education which assures a dignified and decent future, far from all exploitation and impoverishment caused by human selfishness".

(Document: "The De La Salle Charism" 1981)

I am convinced that "the fight for justice and the participation in the transformation of the world are the dimensions which constitute the preaching of the Gospel" (Synod of Bishops, 1971).

Community project

The mountain community
Self-perception:

We are a community of La Salle Brothers who wish to fulfill a personal and community mission in favor of the poor and deprived, through a witness of faith, Christian education, counsel, and support for their integral development.

"An apostolic adventure, lived in faith, hope and love".

"An adventure incarnated in human contingencies".

"A prophetic sign of proclamation and denunciation to make Christ present in the midst of our poor and deprived brothers and sisters".

1. Principles

1.1 As Christians conscious of our potentialities and responsibilities conferred on us by baptism, we wish to commit our lives to God's cause (Service to God's Kingdom).

1.2 The possibility inaugurated by Christ of living as celibates for the Kingdom permits us to form a community. This community of faith, fraternity and service assumes a concrete responsibility in favor of those most in need.

1.3 Previous commitments, personal choices, and the needs proper to our work oblige us to organize our space and time in such a way as to be able to reconcile our vocation and our service.

1.4 Concrete circumstances (personal commitment, the dispersion of work and necessary materials) oblige us to form a community in which the work situates us in different places. This requires us to set up definite meetings in order to reflect, pray, and plan. The strength of our relation is based on faith, on the reasonable decision of communication, and mutual support.

2. Needs

2.1 Individual Needs

1. As believers:

— Continued effort to achieve a greater understanding of the mystery of Christ.

— The effort to live the needs of the faith.

— The need of counting on others for sharing the faith.

— To be up to date on the writings of the Church.

2. As religious:

— A continued effort to achieve a greater understanding of the religious life.

— An effort to live the demands of our consecrated life.

— An effort to share the faith, fraternity, and service.

— An effort to achieve a consensus in our decisions for personal and communitarian work.

3. As persons:

— An effort to be honest in our dealings with others.

— An effort to be open to others in order to understand their problems, needs, desires, and wants.

— An effort to maintain the equilibrium between work, rest, personal development, and prayer.

2.2 Community life

1. Communication among ourselves:

— To plan and be faithful to scheduled meetings.

— To establish a schedule, to respect it and evaluate it.

2. With the District:

— Participation in District and Regional events: retreats, meetings, study sessions.

— Carrying out District proposals.

— Proposals for service to the youth in our schools and to those in our Houses of Formation.

— To read, analyze, and discuss District and Institute publications.

3. Concerning association and solidarity — Being solicitous of the needs of others, offering personal resources.

— Making use of our ability to meet the needs of others.

— Sharing our moral, Intellectual, and material resources.

4. Of work:

— To establish local projects and programs and to extend to them the support expected by others.

— To give necessary information on the advances and problems of the work.

— To report properly all the items of information which should be given to the Community and District.

3. Our community arrangement

3.1 Our life:

Given the dispersion of the projects attended to, Juan Bosco and Julian Espejel live in Ayahualulco, Ver., Gabriel Salom in San Andres Yahuitlalpan, Pue., and Valerio Lopez in Puebla.

In this situation, Juan Bosco and Julian Espejel, together with their co-workers, organize their community life: prayer, meals, study, rest, etc..

Gabriel Salom, faced with the present difficulty, organizes his personal prayer, study and rest, and with his companions the meals, work, reflection, etc..

Valerio Lopez does the same thing.

At least once a month we have a meeting which consists of the following: prayer, reflection, evaluation of the program and setting up the program for the month. Brother Visitor and Enrique Pizarro take advantage of this meeting to participate in the community discussion. Also, some time during the day, we try to have a meeting with our collaborators who reside closest to Puebla.

3.2 Prayer:

Personal prayer is something which each one programs and evaluates for himself. Community prayer is practiced: in Ayahualulco, when at least two Brothers are present, and each month during our encounters.

Our sacramental life is a personal responsibility and is integrated into the life of the parish.

Every year we dedicate two sessions for a retreat.

3.3 Work:

(This is included in the semestral personal project).

A letter which I am addressing to all those on whose shoulders rests the responsibility and progress of the community.

My dear Ayahualulco:

I am writing to you, my fellow country folk, because in your own community and in one way or another, you are leaders.

A leader is one who is an example for others, who is the leaven in the mass, who is a teacher of day to day life.

A leader is one who inspires by word and convinces by action. That is you, people who fight for you fellow farmers, who, for ages, have been mistreated, deceived, and deprived.

The other day I told you and all the people who met together with the municipal authorities: The Revolution has not finished, the cry of independence will continue to be heard in every corner of our land wherever misery, hunger, ignorance, illiteracy, malnutrition, alcoholism, violence, threats, maltreatment and death continue on; while injustice continues to be the law which really prevails. The day when the "common good" will be the prime consideration of both those who govern and those who are governed, on that day the dawn will break on a New Mexico, a prosperous and free nation.

My fellow countrymen, each one of you, in a certain way, are Hidalgos, Zapatas, Morelos, capable of quietly and slowly transforming your piece of the fatherland where you live, hemmed in by the steepest barriers of our country: the mountains.

The rural areas need securities, investments, technology, but above all, they need farmers and workers determined to make themselves heard, to better their lot, to organize themselves into productive cooperatives and groups, to join together for the development and marketing of their products.

You are the leaders who lead these truly revolutionary and liberating associations, not with the weapons of a demagogue or with the violence bred of hatred for one's brothers, but rather with inspiring words, agile hands, and with the level headedness which characterizes the country people.

You know your rights and demand them in a more organized way.

You know your duties and you fulfill them more conscientiously.

Beware especially of those enemies within the home: divisions, jealously, apathy, alcoholism. Do not allow people who are selfish and greedy for money to harm the community: storekeepers, middlemen, money changers, people who abuse their qualifications or their authority.

Pay special attention to the young people. Organize them, lead them, attract them, since the future of your community and of Mexico depends upon them. I notice that many youths do not participate in the life of the people: work, meetings, problems. Rather, they go after alcohol and are not interested in the diffiicult but noble tasks in the field.

Set out to form a group of Alcoholics Anonymous and seek the help of nearby groups.

Convince your women folk to get involved in the civic and political life of the community: let them listen to those women who demonstrate wisdom and prudence.

Throughout history, women have demonstrated that they are just as valiant, intelligent, and fearless as men. They have been queens, saints, sages, writers, governors, teachers, and doctors. Without them, men become weak in body, heart, and soul.

Without them, no home or community is possible. Listen to them! Respect them!

Let us go to the fertile fields and cultivate them. Let us lead, care for, and protect our children and the elderly.

Let us discipline our children; let us listen to the elders, who, though weak in body are strong in spirit.

Congregate together to celebrate your faith, love the Catholic Church, be faithful to your baptism and to the sound doctrine which has nourished you from your childhood.

Know the Bible and live according to the law of God. Take Mary of Guadalupe as your mother, Queen, and protector. Help and cooperate with your priest. Respect one another as images of the Father, Brothers and Sisters of Jesus Christ, and temples of the Holy Spirit.

Settle matters among yourselves serenely and wisely, following the advice of prudent and honorable people not with violence, hatred, and murder.

Avoid spirituous liquor as you would a rabid and treacherous dog.

Exert your rights and fulfill your duties; love one another, help one another, and organize yourselves together in Christ Jesus, Our Lord.

May you always be protected along the way in the battle by the maternal care of the ever Virgin Mary.

Be courageous and prudent.

Peace and Well Being to all of you.

Fraternally, Your Friend,

Brother Juan Bosco MORALES

A CATECHUMENATE FOR ADULTS

Starting out from experience.

Everything that I say in this article is based on the experience of a group of "catechumens" that have been together for twelve years. This catechumenal group began in October of 1974 as a result of a parent-teacher meeting in the school where I work. At that meeting we had tried to help them see that the religious formation that their children were receiving was quite different from the one that we had received when we were children and young people.

They themselves then asked to be given a catechesis that would update them in their formation in the faith, and in that way have the religious instruction that they were trying to give at home in accord with what was being imparted in school.

We had very intense catechetical sessions for the first eight years — weekly sessions of two hours each. Since that time, we put in an hour and a half at bi-weekly meetings.

The work that we are presently doing is rather a dialogue on some specific theme which the members of the group have prepared beforehand.

The evolution of the group has been a very positive experience. All claim to have a much better grasp of the content of their Faith and a greater awareness of the message of the Gospel. They unanimously feel that their own Christian life is stronger and more authentic than before.

Two of the participants have organized their own catechumenal groups in other school centers. Three of the group have taken courses in theology or ecclesiology or moral theology, or all three in the diocesan seminary. Most of the members of the group have undertaken catechetical activity in parish centers. Also several of them have helped out in our school with special catechism classes organized to prepare our students for the Sacraments of Confirmation and First Communion.

The times, they are a-changing.

We are all aware of the speed with which times have changed for society. We might even say that these come with dizzying speed. And change is affecting every facet of human life, including the religious.

Precisely in this facet, society, our society, is asking for Christians that "know how to give the reason of their faith"; that will testify that Christ is living; that it is worth the trouble to follow in His steps; that they may be the builders of a new world.

Given the demand for "authentic Christians", one may ask with St. Paul: "But how shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how can they believe unless they have heard of him? And how can they hear unless there is someone to preach?" (Romans 10,14).

This is the question, how are there going to be committed Christians if they practically have not heard of Jesus Christ and of the Faith?

With good reason St. John Baptist De La Salle insists that among the chief duties that fathers and mothers have one of the most serious is the Christian education of their children and their instruction in their religion.

But for the most part they themselves do not properly know the Faith. Many are occupied with temporal concerns all day long besides the care of their family; others are all taken up with the need to earn a livelihood and put bread on the table for themselves and their children, so that they cannot have the time to instruct their children in their duties as Christians. (Med. 194).

One solution: The Catechumenate for Adults. When we speak of an "adult catechumenate" what is normally understood is the catechetical process through which Christians-in-name become truly Christian trying to discover a Faith which is presumed to be "adult" but which, in fact, is not for not having developed in favorable circumstances.

What is needed with great urgency today is a means to strengthen and revitalize a goodly number of those that call themselves Christians but who in fact are not because they have not received sufficient formation to be so. As we all know, the Church baptizes infants as a general practice. Logically, there can be no question of a previous preparation for these.

On the other hand, among baptized persons there are many who have not received any reliigious instruction, or very little, after their baptism. As a consequence, it can be stated that there are many who in their childhood, youth or even as adults really have not had a "proper Christian education".

For these reasons, it is clear, these baptized persons require a catechetical attention through which they may discover the faith which they have received in Baptism and which will permit them to live according to the exigencies of the other Sacraments.

The "adult catechumenate" comes to us in a specific context since it does not deal with a preparation to receive the Sacraments of "Christian initiation"; rather, it addresses itself to the development of the faith already received in Baptism, so that, as adults, these people may responsibly assume the duties that the Faith places on the Christian.

Objectives of the adult catechumenate

We will point out a few. The first objective is the passage from an unconscious and irresponsible infantile Faith to one which is developed and with the full acceptance of responsibility, which implies a true option for Christ. This is what is meant by an adult faith.

Another objective which the catechesis of adults strives to achieve is the incorporation of the catechumens in a Christian community where their faith may grow and be celebrated. If such a community does not exist it should be created. In fact, community is the key to the living of the catechumenal process.

The catechumens must live and celebrate their faith in community. Therefore, it will be an objective of the catechumenate to create Christian community or to join one that already exists.

A third objective is that of forming committed Christians, who are capable of assuming a real commitment as a consequence of their faith.

We have said the group is the key to the development of catechetical activity. A catechesis in community and in the catechumenal process seems to require as a medium in which it may come about most properly, its actualization in a group.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Dealing with adults, it seems to be in the group where the sense of Christian responsibility is best developed today.

The reason for the choice of a group catechesis is that it serves as a base on which such a group can and ought to build a magnificent experience of Christian ecclesial life.

Essential dimensions of the faith are developed in a special way by group catechetics. These are:

— the communitarian dimension and the sense of belonging to the Church, since, thanks to the group, the faith is shared in common; the common experience of the faith of the Church is created, is expressed; it becomes possible to announce one's faith to others, to return the faith that has been received as one's own word.

One feels that he is welcome in the heart of the group, he is accepted and recognized in his own personhood; he feels personally called and recognized... Fraternal love becomes possible.

— The experience of the unfathomable richness of the plan of God who acts in so many ways in different persons and who conducts the lives of men on different paths. This too can be lived in the catechesis of a group.

The education in the faith of the believer, with a view to initiate him in the Christian community, is the summing up and finality of catechesis. To accomplish that, together with the profession of faith, the celebration of the mysteries of Christianity, and the living of Gospel values, the community is the goal of catechesis.

Some characteristic traits

Which have shaped the cathechesis of adults. In the degree to which the catechumenate is a process through which the baptized person discovers and matures in the faith, in relationship with other catechumens, it has a structure and, consequently, some traits that define it.

I will point out some of these traits which we use in our catechumenate:

— The catechesis must be Christ-centered. There can be no Christianity without Christ who is the center — the way, the truth and the life — of the disciple so that each catechumen progressively acquires the clear awareness of his personal union with Christ.

The catechumenal group is brought together by the WORD OF GOD which supposes that the WORD is listened to, that it is made use of, that it is reflected upon, that in it is seen God's design and His plan of salvation for all men. An authentically ecclesial group is so designed that it will be in a permanent disposition to review, to change, to respond faithfully to the Will of God as manifested in His WORD.

— Community character. The catechumenal group is something more than the sum of the individuals that make it up. It must be characterized by dialogue and by interpersonal communication which are its working traits. It is also recognized by its spirit of solidarity, and by communion with regard to the goals it tries to achieve through the living-out of the catechumenal process.

— It tends to responsibility and co-responsibility, joined with and diversified from service for the neighbor. Each of the catechumens, from his own station and situation in life, ought to contribute to the building up and growth of the "Kingdom". The level of commitment, it can be said, is the level that a Christian must attain.

— Another trait of a catechumenal group must be its human face. The firming up of the community sense of Church comes about most effectively in groups or communities in which the number of the members make the interpersonal relationship possible.

★ Believers feel they are integrated into the Church when they are known by name, in a personal way.

★ They learn to share their own faith with that of their brothers, overcoming differences and varying points of view, in communion.

★ The personal attitude of each can be more active and creative.

★ The hearing of the Word of God, the Christian commitment of the members and the celebration of the Eucharist make up the places for the experience of the life of the Church. And these are what the Christian group does.

The family

A catechumen who perseveringly continues his catechesis will be prepared to live his faith in a committed way and will also be able to form others in this beautiful task.

One of the objectives of our catechumenate was precisely that — to prepare fathers and mothers so that they could in turn educate their children in the faith.

The family must be considered as the catechetical channel of primordial importance and, in a certain way, irreplaceable (Catechesi tradendae).

This is the way in which it has been considered and emphatically promoted in the tradition of the Church, especially since Vatican II.

The family is the first community in which men open themselves to a knowledge of the truth, to love, and to relationships with others.

The Christian family ought to be a space where the Gospel is transmitted from one generation to another and from which it radiates out. (Evangelii Nuntiandi)..

The Christian family has its own mission with regard to the education of its members, especially of the children. The family is "catechist" by vocation and nature.

Parents and the family as a whole are the first catechists and make up the very first catechesis of the children.

The family catechesis precedes, accompanies and enriches every other form of catechesis. (Catechesi Tradendae).

The faith is transmitted within the context of family, by word and example, by prayers which are said together and principally, by creating a Christian atmosphere. (Synod of 1977).

In fact, this education in the faith ought to begin at the very earliest age of the children. It takes place when the family members help one another to grow in the faith by means of the witness of a Christian life, often silent, but persevering throughout a daily existence lived according to the Gospel. It will be most outstanding when, in the regular rhythm of family happenings, the Christian and religious significance of those happenings is made clear. (Catechesi Tradendae).

All of this is going to require a real change of mentality in many families, and especially with regard to the education in the faith in the midst of the family.

The catechumenate of adults can be one of the formulas that give a solution to these needs.

ANIMATION OF GROUPS OF MOTHER CATECHISTS

In the two Districts of Mexico, the parents of the students have been invited to participate in the teaching of religion in the schools. According to the schools, this invitation has received a greater or lesser response. The reasons are varied and the present situation is susceptible to evolution. In general, however, it is above all the mothers of the family who agree to participate in the catechism effort.

In the District of South Mexico, three Brothers work full-time in the Pastoral Commission which takes charge of guiding and supervising the catechetical programs and at the same time looking after the vocational program, both for youth and for adults. In order to learn more about the animation of the groups of "Mother Catechists", we asked some questions of Brother Carlos Alveano, who is in charge of this Commission.

1) What concretely does this responsibility entail?

For the schools in the urbanised centres of Mexico City, there is generally a group of 6 or 7 persons who accept the responsibility of education in the faith in the primary schools. These are the groups I work with directly.

In the schools outside of the Federal District, groups of Mother Catechists. The importance of these groups may vary from a few individuals up to some forty persons.

It is always a question of volunteers, which explains, no doubt, the variations of numbers. Usually, it is the Brothers who, in each school, seek out the volunteers. Further, it frequently happens that the Mother Catechists themselves invite other parents of students to join them.

2) But does not such participation in catechesis require previous training?

Definitely. Among those who accept the responsibility in Mexico City, for example, many have followed courses in catechesis and in theology at La Salle University, which they had chosen as their electives.

For the others, we give them on-the-spot training. These sessions or series of courses are given to them especially at the beginning of the school year but they also continue on throughout the school year, in the form of bi-weekly courses.

3) What is your role in this training?

For the urbanised centres of Mexico, in which half of our schools are concentrated, I have established an annual calendar of meetings: once a month I meet with those who are in charge of each group. Beginning with a proposed working plan, these meetings are the occasion of training. Questions are answered, practical advice is exchanged, and these belong to the psychological, pedagogical, or doctrinal order: on the manner of proceeding with the children. Further, I regularly visit those in charge of catechism, in their own schools during their actual work.

For the groups in the provincial schools, I also have an annual calendar of visits and meetings.

4) How do you organise the catechetical work in these schools?

In each school there is at least one Brother in charge of working together with the group of catechists.

Each week, a meeting is called for the concrete purpose of preparing lessons. These meetings sometimes also entail courses in Bible training, as part of the overall program.

During the catechism sessions, the groups are broken down into small teams of two or three persons. It is those who are the most experienced who take charge of the pupils and assume the essential part of the work. The others are trained by this contact and little by little acquire experience and confidence in themselves.

Each catechist works in only one class and chooses, whenever possible, the level and age which suits her best.

5) There is, then, a definite programme?

Yes, five years ago, one Brother of the District drew up a program divided into the six years of the primary school. This program has been perfected with the collaboration of the catechists themselves. It has even given birth to six text books used in the schools of the District. In fact, for each level there are two texts;

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

the teacher's manual and the exercise book of the pupils.

Recently, four of these books were revised. These programmes revolve around Christology and the Sacraments, starting off with the Bible and according to a division of Liturgical themes. Added to this is the Marian dimension, so dear to Mexicans.

We must remark, however, that preparation for First Holy Communion and for Confirmation are treated separately, in a more intensive way, during the two month period directly preceding the reception of these two sacraments. Involved here are also the parents and godparents concerned. This preparation is done mostly after school hours, in the early evening, and is culminated by a retreat.

6) Could we have a more precise picture of this program?

In the first year, we offer 35 themes broken down into three parts: God is my Father; Jesus leads me to the Father; We are saved together with Jesus.

The second year is centered on the following perspective: God is among us, we celebrate this and meet Him in the Eucharist.

The third year stresses the life of Jesus so as to derive from it lessons for our own lives.

In general, we try to show that Jesus of the Gospels is present to us today, that his appeals concern us and that they invite us to reflect on our own personal conduct. This format is presented and lived according to the liturgical seasons.

7) Do you have a different program beyond the primary school?

Yes. In the secondary classes, the catechesis is organized differently. There are Brothers and certain lay teachers who take charge of religious instruction. The mothers no longer participate here. However, some of them would like to continue on into the secondary school and this, no doubt, will be implemented in the future, as is the case in some schools of the North Mexico District.

We also see that certain mothers continue to participate in the catechetical program even after their children have finished the primary school. They have discovered a certain vocation as catechists.

8) Has there been any evaluation of this work?

Yes, each year, those responsible for the catechetical program meet together for one day to evaluate their work. This is a time of weighing matters, exchanging idesas, thinking things over together, and it is a time of celebration. We generally are convinced that this exchange of experiences is very enriching. The closing Eucharistic Celebration is an expression of the quality of the work done and reveals the depth of consciousness in our work with the ministry of the word.

9) What positive aspects do you find in your work of animation?

I should like to briefly list, without any order of priority, some of the aspects which I have observed.

— The unification of the program and methods have had positive effects; — the catechists become certain that they are helping the children learn "something".

— the mothers attest to a new personal commitment of a more apostolic dynamism;

— in the schools, their Christian witness is sometimes stronger than that of the teachers;

— the catechesis in the schools has been improved;

— there now exists a small group of faith ful catechists who assure the continuity of this programme, and the less permanent members assure an enriching newness; — the educational communities have become more dynamic by the creation of a Pastoral Council in the schools. This Council is representative of the different components of the educational community;

— the catechists recognize that their work inspires them to a more Christian and evangelical life;

— in the school, for example, the Mother Catechists organise an hour of community prayer, fortnightly;

— some other mothers have also organised retreats for the teachers and parents in order to contribute to the Christian animation of the educational community.

This enumeration does not pretend to be complete. It is sufficient to underscore the importance and the interest of the task. It is a good way of sharing our ministry of Christian education with lay people.

TEACHING AS MINISTRY: A NEW PERSPECTIVE

"Let it be clear, then, in all your relations with the children who are entrusted to you that you look upon yourself as a minister of God, acting with a sincere and true zeal, accepting with much patience the difficulties you have to suffer..." (Meditations for the Time of Retreat, 9,1).

Some consider teaching a profession which demands skills, training, and knowledge of subject matter; others consider teaching an art, a skill developed through experience, observation, careful attention, and practice. It is both of these, but more as well. Teaching, within our Christian tradition, is a ministry, a gift given for the service of others. Henri Nouwen describes ministry as "the ongoing attempt to put one's own search for God, with all the moments of pain and joy, despair and hope, at the disposal of those who want to join this search but do not know how". Teaching as ministry is a way of caring and helping.

As ministry, teaching shares in each of the traditional ministries of the Church: didache, leiturgia, koinonia, kerygma, and diakonia.

Didache is the ministry of teaching the Word, revealing the "good news" to all who will listen. The teacher is called to speak the message of Jesus, a message that proclaims that each person is made in God's image and therefore has worth, has dignity, has freedom, is worthy of love, can grow, can love. The teacher touches the heart of his student when he reveals to the student that the "good news" is about him personally. The teacher accomplishes this when learning occurs and the student realizes that he has the potential to know something new; the student can sense growth at those moments of special insight. So too the teacher accomplishes this when he leads the student to recognize that his life can make a difference through some act of service. When the teacher acknowledges the uniqueness of the student, affirms his insight, recognizes him as worthy of his time and attention, that teacher is touching the heart; it is in the heart that the "good news" is experienced. That teacher who serves as God's human instrument to reveal God's message of abiding and personal love is indeed a minister of grace.

Leiturgia is the ministry of praying for and with others. The teacher is called to pray for and with his students. By bringing his students in prayer before God, the teacher makes a profession of faith that it is God who accomplishes good for and in the young people entrusted to his care; ultimately, God will bring those students to fullness of life. Likewise, the teacher prays with his students. More than ever, young people need the witness of someone who lives in the presence of God and calls that to mind frequently. When the teacher can share faith, can share praise, thankgiving, worship, can stand in awe and wonder with his students before a God who transcends all yet who is so intimately present, that teacher ministers to those entrusted to his care.

koinonia is the ministry of community-building. The teacher is called to "be with" his students, to be a focus for unity, to be in communion. One aspect of this ministry is to welcome the student; the teacher is called to be a host, to create a hospitable space so that the student can feel at home in his presence, feel safe enough to approach him in time of difficulty and need. A second aspect of this is to listen. The teacher is called to hear what the student has to say, both in word and in silence. Each student has a unique story which aches to be heard; sometimes students speak their stories in silence, in actions and behaviors that are not attended to. The teacher who is a keen listener to the hutrts and cries of the young that cannot find words is a true minister. A third aspect is to wait; the teacher is called to spend long hours with students as they seek out for themselves the meaning of life in general and their lives in particular. The teacher patiently accompanies the student as he grows and discovers and learns at his own pace; to force one's own way upon another is to violate the sacredness of another's journey. The teacher spends much time waiting. A final aspect of this ministry is partnership; the teacher is called to be a mutual learner. Students also have insights and a certain wisdom that confounds the "wise" of this world. Real teaching and learning is the mutual discovery of ideas, a sharing of knowledge so that both can see with new eyes.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Kerygma is the ministry of proclamation. This is a prophetic ministry; it calls the teacher to "speak up". The teacher must speak up to institutions and people on behalf of the young. Having engaged his students in conversation, he is aware of their need and advocates for them before the power brokers of the world. As such, he is called to challenge those things which might inhibit a student's growth or deprive a student of his God-given rights. Furthermore, the teacher is called to offer opportunities for the young to speak on their own behalf to each other and to institutions. The teacher who creates a climate in which students can engage in open, honest, and respectful discussions, who develops within his students a literacy in both word and symbol, who helps students to frame questions, who empowers students with the ability to be critical thinkers, who teaches students how to read the signs of the times, that teacher is engaged in a dangerous but needed ministry.

Diakonia is the ministry of service. The teacher is called to reach out to and serve those entrusted to his care. Following the example of the Master Teacher, Jesus, the teacher must bow before his disciples and wash their feet. This foot washing demands a humility that recognizes the great worth of those served; it calls forth the willingness to be vulnerable, to acknowledge mistakes, to forgive and allow oneself to be forgiven, to love both the attractive and the unattractive, the hopefilled and the despairing, the bright and the slow. Kneeling at the feet of another is the ultimate call to generosity, zeal, and giving without limit. However, the teacher must likewise challenge his students to follow his example and to wash one another's feet. The teacher must help his students to see that each person's gifts are for the service of others; students must be attentive to the needs of a world which so desperately looks for people of ideals, vision, and the willingness and ability to bring these to some reality.

Teaching, therefore, is a ministry. It is a ministry to the gifts of the young, a life-giving ministry which attends to the emerging creative edge of a young person's life. It calls the teacher to affirm the gifts of the young, to recognize and acknowledge the beauty of God so uniquely revealed in each student. Furthermore, it is a ministry of transformation. The teacher is called to help students turn their attention from their own, self-centered needs to the needs of the world, to challenge students to transform their apathy and powerlessness in the face of the world's suffering to compassion and solidarity. Teaching is a holy and sacred calling; surely, it is a ministry of grace, for the teacher is called to be God's special ambassador and co-worker in the building of the Kingdom.

THE COMPUTER IN A TECHNICAL SCHOOL

In a school of technical instruction like ours, for the past ten years the computer has been an integral part of the environment of both the teachers and the students. Today it is considered as a familiar and indispensable working tool. Certainly, the continual development of the performance of the computer (memory capacity, interfaces, and peripheries, software) still largely leaves open the research into the utilization and exploitation of this powerful instrument.

It is therefore, not possible to give all its multiple uses within a technical school in detail. We must therefore limit ourselves to a few particular areas:

★ Teaching with the l'C.A.E.;
★ administrative management;
★ research in the field of industrial production.

Computer assisted education (C.A.E.)

The principles of C.A.E. were defined a few decades ago by the innovators who had already perceived the various uses which could be made of a computer for programmed and individualized instruction. The appreciation given it today depends on the various results, notably in the function of the spheres of application for which it is considered. In certain apprenticeship programmes in high technology (piloting of planes, trains, or other complex machines, etc.), in the updating of already highly-qualified adults, completely conclusive results are obtained because the enterprises concerned make use of the available materials and software which allow them to derive the best results from the computer apparatus.

In the school, it is often entirely different for, in spite of pin-pointed results and isolated enthusiasm, the complete conversion of the teaching staff cannot yet be seen, at least in the second scholastic cycle. Many reasons can be found for this: Insufficient knowledge of computer concepts, insufficient apparatus available, the too rapid evolution of materials, the absence of standards; all that has impeded the creation of a convincing computerization. More serious, because here it is a question of a more durable structural reason, we are forced to conclude that the school organization is too rigid and poorly adapted towards an instrument which is designed to introduce individualization, freedom and thus flexibility.

What has happened at Baronnerie, in the C.A.E. since 1977, well enough illustrates these tendencies and these limitations. The first teaching programmes created according to the IMAGO system of the University of Louvain, functioned on a computer of moderate strength which relied upon teletype terminals. The arrival of micro-computers with cathode screen, which were more flexible, more attractive, have progressively led to the abandonment of the big system and the programmes have been translated into BASIC language. The equipment in a network room has allowed a more rational utilization and many classes have been able, in the course of the past few years, to benefit by the C.A.E.. The interest of the students has not stopped over the course of the years: pedagogical effectivity has proven difficult to measure; still, the conviction is strengthened that for students who are falling behind in the ordinary courses, the computers help them to catch up with the others.

However, the problems mentioned above are quickly met with: the modernization of material, acquisition or creation of software of high pedagogical quality, the adaptation of locations and structures for an optimal utilization of the C.A.E..

Still, the biggest disquietude is not in that area: if in technical teaching the micro-computer has found a place as a useful working tool in industrial trades, in other areas, teachers and students often look upon it as a simple gadget, it they do not relegate it to the rank of a foolish toy. There we have an annoying psychological wrinkle which will not very easily be smoothed out. And, perhaps the most sophisticated equipment will become so inexpensive that it will finally allow C.A.E. to leave its small-scale groping to attain the industrial quality which alone will allow it to arrive at a medium of instruction to rival school manuals and professional software. The micro-computer has been the victim of a galloping and anarchial evolution. What would have happened to the movie-making industry if it had known in a space of five years the technological upheavals which it has weathered in a half-century? What would have happened with phonograph records if no standards had been adopted? It would be truly regrettable if a pedagogical aid which is performing so well as is the computer should be neglected or reduced to minimum use, but I think that such a thing is highly improbable.

2) School administrative management

Our society is becoming more and more complex and the administrative support is becoming more and more important. Consequently, beginning with the initial step of counting the number of students, the computer has proven to be indispensible in order to avoid the fastidious tasks of classifying, printing circulars, addressing envelopes, keeping track of grades, not to mention invoices.

By the establishment of a bank of school information including:

★ an index of students;
★ an index of former students;
★ an index of schools of origin;
★ an index of enterprises accepting our graduates;

those in charge of the establishment have rapid

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

access making correspondence with parents and external organizations easy.

Not having the proper equipment adapted to our needs, it was necessary to conceive of software implanted in micro-computers and small autonymous system, all of which were compatible with one another, so that they could use the same tiny discs as informational support.

From now on, each service (accounting, secretariat, direction of studies) will make use of micro-computers with a system adapted to its needs. It is incontestable that, despite the inconveniences inherent in technical limitations, the computer in the field of management has contributed to the pronounced betterment of the operations of the establishment.

Beginning with this year, a telecommunication system is functioning from 2000 hours in the evening until 0600 hours in the morning and is connected with a central station in Paris, thus permitting us to rapidly exchange information among the technical schools of France. Certainly, the telex is not something new, but the special thing in this case consists in the interconnection among the various schools in such a way that banks could be set up and adapted to the needs of technical schools, with the various items either in the field of pedagogy, applied research, or administration.

3) Research applied to production

In our school we provide the initial training of higher technicians (two years after the baccalaureate) and the continued training of more advanced students (three years after the baccalaureate) in the fields of Electronics, Electrotechnology, Production, and Mechanical Manufacturing. More than the others, the teachers of various technological specialities were very quick to realize the possible applications of the mini-computer in the fields of Process Management and Production Management, thanks to the terminals connected with the micro-computers.

The parallel development of production machines operated by remote control and by micro computers has allowed for the orientation of applied research towards the flexibility of production through the realization of a flexible unity.

The flexibility in production corresponds to:

— a capacity to treat a great number of different items;

— the power to absorb variations of the rhythm of production and ought to lead to a minimization of delays in production and to an optimization of the rate of use of machines at the central plant.

To bring into focus this flexible unity of production generated by the computer, a multi-disciplinary team of research teachers has worked hard for two years, the research being oriented towards the following fields:

1. Computerization

★ interface between machines remotely controlled and the computer,

★ automatic modification by programmes by the Mini 6, example: management of tools used.

★ elaboration of programmes and software at the command of these machines.

★ focusing on the software of running all the machines and robots by computer.

2. Assisted Production and Assisted Design

★ Bringing into focus the production design programmes starting from software;

★ setting up indexes of scales and tools;

★ management of stocks on hand, management of production helped by the computer.

3. Automatism and the Use of Robots

★ management and bringing the system for conveying goods up to date;

★ automatic cleaning of parts before control;

★ automatization of controls;

★ automatic loading and unloading on machines by an electrical command coming from the factory center;

★ dimensional control of parts without contact.

Such a realization allowed the developing of ties with the enterprises of the S.M.I. (Small and Medium Industries) confronted with these problems of computerization of production and of not disposing of tools and men too often.

Such a research allowed for the mobilization of the teachers and the students of the school and allowed the enterprises to discover the technical realities hidden behind the myth of the computer.

Conclusion

Is not certain whether or not the introduction of the computer into teaching was not too rapid and, at the same time, too precocious (in the elementary school and above all in the nursey school in France at present) for, beyond the laudable concern about adapting to the modern technical world, would it not be necessary to launch a research into a substitution which is less dramatic to overcome all the evident educational deficiences.

Certainly, in a vocational school like ours, technical culture tends to become dominant but it is situated too much on the periphery to answer the fundamental needs of man. Despite their attraction, the calls to progress are not sufficient to motivate the younger generations however well anchored they may be in an ever more technical civilization. We must prove our realism and humility in our research into computer use in our instruction. We must, in effect, rediscover or maintain our educational qualities which for more than two centuries, thanks to the principles of Lasallian education, have been a guideline for those youths who are seeking points of reference.

A LAY DIRECTOR OF A LASALLIAN SCHOOL

Engagement

In September 1973 we learned that the Brother Visitor would name a Brother as Directory of De La Salle, Avignon for the last time, unless...

That same year, without being able to see any justification for the choice, I replied YES to the appeal to come to serve the youth, while continuing to teach, as the leader of around 400 students from 14 to 16 years of age. Being fond of a certain material, moral, and intellectual comfort, I did not know quite clearly what I had gotten myself into.

Sharing

However, I owed a great debt towards the Brothers' Institute, for, quite young, I had known and appreciated the dynamism of a Brothers' community, absorbed in this spirit, educated and impressed by the profundity of all that was Lasallian.

Little by little, over a period of four years, I benefited by a "direct" formation; during this time the changes were prepared regarding the Management Organization of the establishment, dealing with parents, teachers, pupils, and on various occasions, meeting with the Brothers' community. I had the chance of choosing my own assistant, who was already a member of the teaching staff, and very soon we had a real team of leaders who went into operation in July, 1977, when the Brothers gave up the Direction of the establishment.

Thanks to Brother Provincial who assured me of meaningful sharing and cooperation, I learned that the lay directors in France were seeking closer bonds, to work along with the Brothers and in elaborating upon the conditions of a real Brothers-Laymen Association. It was a question of seeing how, together, Lasallian Institutions, always so competent and up to date, could live. It was this approach which interested me so much.

At the same time, new Diocesan Committees for Catholic Education were being organized in the dioceses of France which would have for their particular mission to exercise a "Trusteeship" over scholastic establishments of Catholic Education. The Brothers' Institute and the lay directors were seeking ways of setting up a Lasallian trusteeship. This move also aroused in me a great interest. I thought that for myself personally and for the institution this idea should be spurred on. The word was spread around and then to the councillors of the school I announced my intention of starting off the process with Brother Visitor for membership in the Lasallian Association. This was an engagement desired and sought by the school who had worked along with the Brothers for some 40 years.

We wished to continue to call ourselves, The Saint John Baptist De La Salle School and College or just simply the Brothers' School. In fidelity to Lasallian values, we ought to try above all to live day by day, listening to, and caring for those who are most deprived, to try to lead all educators to diminish the distance between words and deeds. Fidelity to a patrimony, to a history, to values, all the while accepting necessary evolutions, this was the expression of our will.

Lasallian Association

I wrote to Brother Visitor asking him to present my application to the Lasallian Association which comprised other lay directors of Lasallian schools in the country. After an affirmative response, the ground was ready and a visit by the delegates of the Council of the association was scheduled in view of establishing a definite membership. As a result of this visit, an agreement was signed with the Diocesan Committee for Catholic Education. From then on, the school, with myself as intermediary, would belong to the Lasallian Association.

Concretely, how is this trusteeship of the Institute through the Lasallian Association to be lived? What can such a trusteeship do for the school? Will the teachers as a whole follow it? Such were the questioned presented by our management team.

The school management body agreed to modify its statutes in order to introduce the fact of the trusteeship by the Lasallian Association. I had the chance to work with this team which is united, dynamic, effective, and very Lasallian.

Very quickly, the school asked for a second visit which would be developed within the framework of a day of pedagogical reflection. A Brother led us to rediscover the sense of giving and of how to receive the youth and their parents and how to integrate the "Morning Reflection" with daily life, which was not evident for the young teachers. Another question dealt with was Why maintain a boarding department for 350 students?

Despite the deliberate preparation and maturation, the Brothers' Community at the school still had a difficult time adjusting to the situation: frustration, the loss of authority, sometimes personal affairs. These perhaps were for me the saddest things I had to bear alone. Still, the regular contacts with the Brother Visitor allowed for an evolution of minds and hearts. I quickly discovered new horizons, new expanses of liberty, of action, and of fraternity on several levels.

New forms of the Association

Afterwards, I happened to be elected to the Administrative Council of the Lasallian Association. It is a group at whose centre adaptations and innovations are worked out. Thus, the ASSOCIATION which De La Salle wished for his first Brothers has taken on a new dimension more than three hundred years later. Concretely, the Lasallian Association has made itself felt by timely actions of formation under the form of weekend meetings on the national plan, then by regional meetings, each time with a precise theme which facilitated an exchange of ideas and mutual sharing.

In the Central Mediterranean District a regular series of meetings have been set up, for one or two days each year, in which the Brother Visitor brings the Brothers Directors and the Lay Directors together for meetings. In the seven years that this has been practiced, I can gauge the progress that has been made: from the courtesy of sharing a spiritual, pedagogical, and educational richness, strong ties have been established, and a type of brotherhood has come about in which each one is respected according to his personal status in life.

Paths for the future

Another appeal is now being addressed to us, Brothers and Laymen: what dimension are we going to dare give to the Boards of Trustees which are installed in each District? There is much to be done, but we are not hemmed in by customs, routines, nor anything a priori. How can we together write a new page in Lasallian history?

It is urgent that as soon as possible and in a realistic and effective way, we set up a Formation Center specifically for the values, institutions, and projects of Saint John Baptist De La Salle. Those who will be in charge of the schools in the future ought to have access to such formation. This, I believe is one of the priorities of the Institute in France, not for following, but for understanding a true dynamism. So there is much yet to be done. The task which awaits us is urgent and necessary. Shall we know how to raise up from among our teaching staff persons who will be capable of carrying on the work and the responsibilities?

Looking back a bit, I can say that I am happy to belong to the Lasallian Association and to have experienced the joy of the all too little number of teachers who set it on its way.

Conclusion

As the head of a school, I am envied by others who do not find within the Diocesan Committee the same closeness, the same pedagogical sharing, and the same means of animation.

I should like to finish with the hope that the Brother Visitor, even though it is natural that he should dedicate himself to the Brothers' Community, would be able to devote some time also to look after the Lay Directors, to meet the teachers, the catechists, the administrators, the parents, the management organizations, and even the students in their classes. Conscious of my own limitations, and taken up by family cares, I should willingly accept all the help which the Brothers could afford me as well as to all who live this mission of service to youth.

The orientations and decisions of the Brothers' 41st General Chapter will, no doubt, promote this channel of effective collaboration for the exercise of the ministry of education.

THE RELIGIOUS APOSTOLATE OF A BROTHER IN THE THIRD AGE

For the past four years I have been in contact with a group of children from the nursery school up to, and including, the sixth year. I do not teach catechism to these children unless a teacher needs me to offer this service. I exercise my religious apostolate by further developing the catechesis on every level

I accomplish this work in the following way: at the beginning of my religious activity of 30 to 35 minutes, I review the theme that has been taught in class. Next, I go to the practical part of making these experiences come to life. It goes without saying that this requires a lot of creativity. This religious experience is a workshop of evangelical practices. These activities follow the catechism time fixed by the schedule. To involve all the pupils or almost all of them affords a capital importance to these experiential activities.

One example. During Lent, I prepared the fifth year pupils for the Sacrament of Reconciliation. These came to the place prepared for this religious service where I had taken great care in creating an atmosphere conducive to such a preparation: soft lighting, music to set the right tone, posters, usually done by myself, using Gospel texts, the Bible, paschal candle, etc.. We start off with some brief questions in order to review and this is followed by a hymn and a moment of relaxation. I can either read, or have read, a parable, where I ask the pupils to expand upon what is illustrated in front of them. I refer to the most important points of the parable: ingratitude, dissoluteness, jealousy, vengence, mercy, shame, pardon, according to the identity of the personages. You have recognized the parable of the Prodigal Son. I succeed in making them discover the Lord's mercy in the face of the weakness revealed in the conduct of the two sons. It is an examination of conscience where one asks himself where he has been faithful and where unfaithful to the call of God or simply to His word. At other times, I would draw up a list of Gospel texts on the points most often broken. Each one has a list of passages. The pupils express themselves spontaneously about these. When it comes to the accusation, they say to the priest: "I am a sinner. I have been particularly deficient in keep such a word of God". In other words, the Word of God is used for confessing. To illustrate further, I would give each pupil a sheet of paper on which a caterpillar devouring a leaf is drawn. They can freely write their lack of love. They give it to the priest on entering the confessional room. There follows a litany prayer to ask pardon. The pupils make up their own or use another. After confession, to the sound of soft music, there is a prayer of thanksgiving in the form of hymns, prayers of praise or by the recitation of Biblical passages.

There are other kinds of religious activities. There are those which deal with the liturgical celebrations in the parishes, especially the Eucharist; those which are done each week during the main times of the year: Advent, Christmas, Lent, Easter.

For this purpose, one hour of pastoral activities which can be devoted to each group each month is written into the schedule.

It is on the occasion of ceremonies for the Christian community that we most frequently use the biblical recitations, choreography or sacred dances. The congregation very much appreciates this kind of participation. The young could ask for nothing better. Sometimes the entire class learns the choreography. At other times, it is only the youth chorale I practice with outside of class time. Of the 240 pupils, I get about one-eighth of them to participate in it.

With regard to the recitation of Biblical texts done in the usual oral way, significant gestures add much to the Word. Most often, the Gospel and Psalms are chosen.

For example, at the profession of faith in the sixth year, the pupils, after having formulated their credo individually or by groups, recite the Profession of Peter: "Upon arriving in the region of Caesaria Philippi, Jesus asked his disciples...".

What are the reactions of the young to these religious activities? We can state them as being positive. I can assure you that they like these religious activities and they tell me so. Still, what is even more convincing is the testimonies of the parents and the teachers. It is a pleasure to hear the various accounts.

What are the objectives? They are very numerous. Ordinarily, they are pointed out following the catechetical theme. For the new program set up in 1986 for the primary course, here is a resume of a list of objectives in the religious apostolate in Quebec:

Table I - New interiorization followed in the Primary.

Reception: Consciousness - Willingness to receive - Attention directed or preferred.

Response: Assent - Willingness to respond - Satisfaction in responding.

Valorization: Acceptance of a value - Preference for a value - Commitment.

Table II - Finality of Education.

Child: Needs and interests of the children.

The Leader: Content of the animation apostolate.

Society: Expectations of society.

Conception of the animation apostolate.

Conception of the experience.
Educational Intentions.

Table III - The general content of the animation apostolate in the primary

Experience:	According to the axis:
1 - Of a sense of life	1-A Confidence 1-B Openess to life 1-C Autonomy
2 - Of the common life	2-A Respect 2-B Mutual help 2-C Solidarity
3 - Of contact with God	3-A Interiority 3-B Entry into tradition 3-C Celebration
4 - Of moral conduct	4-A Sharing 4-B Rectitude 4-C Conversion
5 - Of creative links	5-A With the past 5-B With the present 5-C With the future

I shall choose an example where the experience will be contact with God and the axis, celebration.

The general objectives will be:

Reception

1.1 The pupil ascertains the important place of celebration in prayer of the Church.
1.2 The pupil takes into consideration the need of celebration in the life of a Christian.
1.3 The pupil brings attention to the "celebration" dimension of prayer.

Response

2.1 The pupil responds to the invitation to celebrate in order to enter into contact with God.
2.2 The pupil spontaneously makes place for celebration in his prayer.
2.3 The pupil pursues with satisfaction celebration activities or those oriented towards celebration.

Valorization

3.1 The pupil finds the activity of Church celebration important.

It is upon the objectives that the evaluation of religious activities are based. It is not always easy to evaluate.

The objectives of the apostolate of religious activities, as elsewhere in catechesis, are of three kinds:

1. General objectives
2. Terminal objectives
3. Intermediate objectives, which determine the activities to be done with the pupils. Most often these general and intermediate objectives are held to.

We include here an example of what might be a religious activity.

We have spoken about our role with regard to the pupils. We must say a word on our involvement with parents.

For about the past two years, the catechesis has been divided into two parts:

a) antecedent catechesis (basic catechesis which is given in the school throughout the year);

b) initive catechesis (preparation for the sacraments which is given outside of class time, where the teacher refuses to give it). In both cases the Religious Animator is obliged to have dealings with the parents to re-teach them about the sacràment in question (Confirmation, the Eucharist, Reconciliation). To this effect, he forms an initiating committee with some parents. This committee, having received the requisite instruction, will inform the other parents concerned. Let me assure you that this is much more complicated than if I did the teaching myself. Still, we know that the objective of this method merits its continuance. It goes without saying that the meetings multiply: 4 meetings for the committee and 3 to 6 meetings for the parents. Multiply these numbers by the number of sacraments.

In addition to the committees formed for each sacrament, the school has a school religious activity committee. This committee concerns itself with the proper running of religious activities within the school. It intervenes particularly at the time when school reopens — important times of year — with difficulties to be overcome — pastoral relations and the school committee made up of parents. It can, with the consent of the principal (in order to have the necessary funds) carry out extrascholastic activities with the pupils. For example, a Saturday pilgrimage by bus.

Each year in-service training is offered for the different committees. All the expenses are defrayed by the Ministry of Eucation.

I should like to call your attention to a point concerning the sacraments. It is not that of receiving a sacrament, a follow-up must be assured.

This is how I proceed. After the reception of a sacrament, I call the pupils back to talk to them. I give examples of follow-up.

A little later, I invite them to show this follow-up before the Christian community, which is responsible for the actions of children in the Christian point of view. This is poignant and moving, but profitable for all.

In conclusion, I should like to say a word about the chorale of chilren whose activities are carried on outside of class time. This chorale is very valuable when a liturgical celebration comes up in the school of parish community. I also see to the active participation of the parents. With the parents or sometimes without them, the chorale takes care of the entire liturgical service: announcements, hymns, processions, movements, readings, the psalms, always sung, etc..

All the celebrations or nearly all take place in the parish church.

PRAYERS IN THE SPIRIT OF JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

The prayers which follow are written with particular reference to the Founder's MEDITATIONS, MEDITATIONS FOR THE TIME OF RETREAT, and LETTERS. Letter III-25, for example., refers to Letter 25 in part 3 of Battersby's "Letters and Documents". The symbol "/" indicates that the same theme is found in more than one passage.

Bro. Nicholas Hutchinson

1. Lord,
I pray that your Spirit may come alive in me since you have chosen me to do your work. MTR 4
May I be completely transformed by your Spirit dwelling within. Med. 152

2. Lord,
in your providential care
you have called me to this ministry.
Help me to put to good use the gifts and talents you have given me. MTR 1/Med. 170

3. Holy Spirit,
I thank you for your many gifts to me. MTR 7
Make known to me
all the gifts with which I have been favoured.
Inspire me to communicate these gifts to others. Med. 189
I ask you to supply what I lack, and to give me abundantly what I need. Med. 37
Give me the graces I need both for myself and for those entrusted to my care. Med. 62

4. Jesus, Son of God,
you wish to come into my heart to make me share in your nature.
For a long time
you have been knocking at the door of my heart and have been waiting to enter, and I have not wished to receive you, because I love other things
so much more than I love you. Med. 85
May I come to know myself
just as I am. MTR 13
I believe that you have a greater wish to bestow your favours upon me than I have to receive them.
Your compassion for me is greater than my anxiety. Med. 38
I place myself totally in your hands; Med. 139
do with me whatever you please. Letter II-1 Touch my heart and make me aware of what you want of me. Letter III-2

5. Spirit of God, guide me.
May I act only under your influence and not through any self-seeking. MTR 3
May I see through the eyes of faith, Med. 32 and in all things may I adore the will of God in my regard. Final words

6. Lord,
may I grow in the spirit and love of prayer, MTR 4/Med. 36/80
often recalling your presence. Letter I-36
May I always join prayer to my efforts for, failing this,
my action will have little effect. Med. 160/159

7. Lord,
if it is not you who makes me speak.
then I am no better than echoing bronze or the clash of cymbals, because all that I say will have no effect and will be incapable of bearing fruit. Med. 3
I acknowledge that this work is not mine, MTR 4 for it is in your name that I teach. MTR 3
I may plant and water the seed, but it is you who make it grow.
You are the one who brings this work to fulfilment. MTR 4
May I grow in awareness of my dependence on you because all my care for the children entrusted to me would be useless
if you did not give me the power, the quality, and the energy that is need to render my care useful.
May all my work with young people be energised by the Spirit and draw all its power from him. MTR 3

8. Father,
your Son came that all might have life and have it to the full. MTR 9
You have called me to announce your Word to young people MTR 1
an to make Jesus live anew in their hearts. Med. 157
May they receive your Word not as the word of men
but as the Word of God, powerfully at work within them. MTR 15
I pray that those in my care may come to feel their need of salvation. Med. 56

9. Lord,
may I bring your love into the hearts of those confided to my care. Med. 102/139

May I supply their spiritual needs to the best of my ability, looking upon them
as your loved ones. Med. 180
Help me to teach them to pray. MTR 10

10. God, my Father,
you are the same Lord who commanded light to shine out of darkness who now kindles a light in my heart. MTR 1
I ask for the graces I need to accomplish all things well, and to draw down the light I need to form Jesus
in the hearts of those confided to my care, and to inspire them with the Spirit of God. Med. 80

11. Lord, may I look upon those whom you have entrusted to me as your children.
May I take much more care over their education than if they were the sons of a king. Med. 133
May it appear,
by the care I take of them,
that I have a real love for them,
a great tenderness towards them. Med. 180/133
May I show them much kindness Med. 134
and may love guide me in all my actions. MTR 12/MTR 9
May I avail myself of the affection the children have for me to attract them to you. Med. 101

12. Lord,
it is you who have called me.
It is you who have chosen me for this ministry.
It is you who have sent me to work in your vineyard, entrusting me to bring the gospel to young people.
May I fulfil my ministry with all the affection of my heart, working entirely for you. MTR 9
May your love be the driving force of my life. MTR 9/Med. 171

13. Jesus, Good Shepherd, enable me to touch the hearts of those in my care. Med. 139/MTR 4
You call me to bring your love into their hearts. Med. 39/102
I raise each of them before you and ask you to answer their needs.
You are the One who can do everything and I am an instrument in your hands;
I turn to you with confidence. MTR 4

14. Lord Jesus,
you have entrusted me to bring the gospel to young people. MTR 9
I am told that my role as your minister is to write your letter of Good News not with ink,
but with the Spirit of the living God;
not on tablets of stone, like Moses,
but on tablets of flesh:
in the hearts of those in my care. MTR 9
By gentleness and patience may I lead those under my guidance into the liberty of the children of God. MTR 11

15. Lord,
I ask that I may accept with much patience
the difficulties I have to suffer, even to being ready to give my very life, so dear to me
are the children entrusted to me. MTR 9/MTR 6

BROTHER JOHN JOHNSTON, SUPERIOR GENERAL, REPLIES TO OUR QUESTIONS (1)

The 41st General Chapter elected Brother John Johnston Superior General of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools for the period of the next seven years. During the previous ten years Brother John was Vicar General of the Institute. For the benefit of readers of LASALLIANA we have been able to put some questions to Brother Superior concerning the work of the General Chapter and the prospects for the seven-year period leading to the next General Chapter. Our questions and his replies follow.

1) Brother Superior, how do you view the 1986 General Chapter in retrospect?

Several features seem to me to have characterized the 41st General Chapter and of these I would like to mention particularly the following:

★ The Chapter was a special grace for our Institute, conducted as it was in a climate of intense prayer. The Capitulants were concerned to respond to the action and orientations of the Holy Spirit and they repeatedly sought His enlightenment for a clearer discernment of the signs of the times for our Institute today.It was undoubtedly the action of the Holy Spirit which made it possible for the successive meetings to take place in the right atmosphere, with the participants ready to listen to one another, to reflect deeply on what was said, and to seek to discern the nature of our present-day situation and of the decisions that need to be made.

★ As a result the Capitulants became very conscious of the inestimable good the Lord is accomplishing all over the world through the instrumentality of the Brothers. They made it their concern to pay close attention to what they learned in this matter, a reciprocal concern which resulted in a deep sense of the solidarity which links all the regions of the Institute.

★ This sense of brotherhood, profoundly experienced over a period of two months, evoked a consciousness of the unity of the Institute which transcends the diversity of languages, cultures, ways of expression and modes of living.

★ At such times it is easy to perceive that the profound unity of the Institute derives from the fact that we are all sons of the same Father, Saint John Baptist de La Salle. We are Brothers because we share his life and because his spirit permeates our lives. It is in this sense that the Rule aptly affirms that "constituted as the image of the whole Institute, the General Chapter is, since the days of the Founder, the ultimate expression of the communion that exists among all the Brothers. It perpetuates among them the living fidelity to the special charism of the Institute" (Art. 84).

★ It is in the nature of things that this sense of fraternal union engenders joy, for a Chapter is a family celebration, an occasion of thanksgiving for the gift of vocation and for all that the Lord has accomplished in each and every Brother; it is a time for praise and gratitude.

★ Hence the circular convoking the 41st General Chapter spoke of it as a celebration, and such it has proved to be, as all would agree who had the privilege of taking part in it as representatives of their confrères.

2) What then, in the excellent conditions and spirit prevailing throughout the Chapter, were the principal themes considered by the Capitulants?

Naturally, a first mention must be made of the work that was accomplished in establishing the new text of the Rule. This task occupied the greater part of the Capitulants' time, though the work was greatly facilitated by the "Draft" produced by the International Commission for the Rule and by the many notes received from the Brothers in view of the Chapter. With the advantage of these data the Capitulants were able to undertake a lengthy process of discernment which I would summarize in the form of three questions:

— what does God wants us to be?
— what does He wish us to do?
— how does He wish us to do it?

This process of discernment resulted in a consensus on all fundamental problems and a strong majority vote on the way of dealing with each of them.

But, parallel to this important work on the Rule, certain other specific themes contributed likewise to a deepening of our understanding of our particular vocation. The Messages, Propositions and Recommendations that emanated from the Chapter have given partial expression to the richness of so much reflection. Circular 422 has provided a substantial report of the Chapter's proceedings. The themes enumerated there will largely determine our aims and priorities, our objectives and our programs of action, for the next seven years. Among these specific themes I would draw attention especially to the following four:

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

★ Association and Interdependence:

The idea of unity in the Institute was constantly present in the discussions. The Chapter underlined it with its references to association and interdependence. The spirit of unity in the Institute will be a sure guarantee of apostolic efficacy. In specific terms it presupposes our willingness:

— to grow in knowledge of one another;
— to share our personnel and resources;
— to make ourselves available for the tasks that face the Institute.

★ Our role as evangelizers, catechists and ministers:

On this theme we need only refer to the Founder and re-read his insistent exhortations regarding it. We are ministers to the young, not exclusively so, but the young remain our principal focus. We are called to be, so to speak, experts on youth, to know how to respond to their search for a meaning in their lives, for a faith. For that we must know: how to live with them as their brothers; how to help them to develop their human potential; how to bring them to an awareness of God's presence in their lives and to a readiness to commit themselves to Him and to His service; how to become more effective in telling them the good news of the Gospel.

★ Solidarity with the Poor:

In calling the Institute to greater solidarity with the poor, the 41st General Chapter has repeated a theme of its two predecessors. But instead of producing a new document specifically to that subject it invites each Brother to manifest that solidarity in acts, to choose ways and means of experiencing what it is to be poor. Certain passages of the Chapter's "Message to the Brothers" underline this theme.

★ The Lasallian Family Movement:

The Capitulants were able to recognize the importance and vitality of various Lasallian movements which have developed in various parts of the world, and they perceived these as a call of the Spirit to us to re-think our ways of relating to non-members of the Institute and re-consider the nature of their role in relation to ours. This awareness has already found expression in a "Message" and in certain capitular propositions. But these are only a beginning to what needs to be accomplished regarding the various groups that make up the Lasallian Family.

Such are the four key themes that resulted from the reflections of the Capitulants about the purpose of the Institute and about our reading of the signs of the times. And each one of the four represents a specific, important and inspiring challenge for each and every one of us.

3) Are these themes totally new in the recent history of the Institute?

No. They represent rather a continuation of what was undertaken during the preceding generalate, that of Brother José Pablo. It is a matter now of ensuring development and growth to what has already been sown. As examples of what I mean, let me enumerate briefly a few of the points insisted upon by Brother José Pablo during the last decade:

— the need for the service of the poor and the promotion of justice to become dominant characteristics ot the identity of the Brothers;

— a high priority to be given to the missionary role of the Institute;

— schools seen as the privileged, but not exclusive, instrument of the Brothers' apostolate, but schools that are more than good academic institutions, schools that are Christian communities of faith and love, creatively adapted to the needs of the students and effectively accessible to the poor;

— the wholehearted acceptance by the Brothers of their role as animators, giving the highest priority to religious education and the pastoral care of young people;

— the fostering of the growth of the Lasallian Family in all its dimensions;

— the question of our identity and mission in this rapidly evolving world;

— the challenge to the Brothers to be men of zeal, and to live this spirit "together and by association".

Such are some of the characteristic emphases of the last generalate which found reiterated expression in the discussions and decisions of the recent General Chapter.

BROTHER JOHN JOHNSTON, SUPERIOR GENERAL, REPLIES TO OUR QUESTIONS (2)

Looking ahead, then, from what has been undertaken and achieved by the Chapter, what do you see as the principal lines of action for you and your Council during the next seven years?

Obviously it would be difficult and even presumptuous to wish to be specific about what is going to happen during the period mentioned. But, with due regard to the uncertainties of the future, I would hope that our efforts will bear particularly on three concerns:

— the Lasallian Family;

— the Christian dimension of our Lasallian schools;

— the educational service of the poor and the promotion of justice and peace through education.

★ The Lasallian Family.

For some three hundred years the Brothers themselves received, lived, and passed on the Lasallian ideal, aided for a number of those years by men and women collaborators in an important but secondary role.

This traditional model of FSC-lay collaboration has virtually collapsed everywhere. It neither can nor should continue to exist. It is not a question only of a diminished number of Brothers. It is more the call to full apostolic participation of all Christians, and the willingness of so many well-formed, highly motivated men and women to respond positively to the challenge.

As the percentage of lay teachers increased in recent decades, the Brothers began to share positions of responsibility, but not without deep feelings of frustration, and even discouragement, that the schools of the Brothers, as they had known them, were things of the past.

But a number of our dedicated lay teachers were also less than satisfied, because they believed, correctly, that they had responsibilities for Lasallian schools but lacked a profound knowledge of the traditions of the Brothers. For this reason, many of these dedicated teachers in a number of countries began to express the desire to participate, not only in positions of authority, but also in the Lasallian spirit and FSC tradition. This desire was manifested also by a certain number of parents, former students, students themselves, and others associated with us.

The General Chapter of 1976 studied this development, calling it the Lasallian Family movement, and strongly encouraged it. Promoting the movement was a major priority for Brother José Pablo, Superior General, and his General Council, throughout the past ten years. What has happened in recent years is nothing short of remarkable. Numerous districts of the Institute have organized frequent and effective workshops and retreats for lay collaborators in Lasallian spirituality and ministry. The response has surpassed all expectations. There is a high degree of desire and readiness for identification with the Lasallian tradition.

The older model of FSC-lay collaboration — a triangular model, if you will — is yielding to a circular model. On points of the circumference of this circle are the Brothers, the administrators, the teachers, staff members, parents, former students, board members, friends, benefactors, students themselves.

In this circular model of Lasallian educational ministry, the FSC have a crucial role to play, but a different role from the past. This role is to animate, that is, to give spirit, support, vigor and zest, to move to action, to encourage. The Brothers exercise this role not only as individuals, but as Communities. The communities of the Brothers are called to share the richness of their Lasallian heritage.

I haven't the slightest doubt that this movement is going to grow significantly in the next seven years, because I am convinced that the movement is a fruit of the Spirit in our day. It is the Lord, in His Providence, that is to say, in His love and concern for young people today, who is calling our dedicated lay colleagues to respond to the needs of youth in the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

★ The Christian Dimension of our Schools:

The second area in which I expect to see considerable development in the next seven years is the Christian dimension of our schools. I expect our schools to become more Christian and more Lasallian. Obviously, we are Brothers of the Christian Schools, not Brothers of the Lasallian Schools. Nevertheless, we can speak of Christian schools that manifest clearly discernible elements, enabling us to speak very legitimately of "Lasallian schools".

Some of these elements are attention to persons, special concern for the economically poor

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

and for all those who are disadvantaged in any way; the promotion of justice and peace through education; quality education, whatever the educational program and age level of the students; creative and adapted education; dynamic religious instruction and pastoral service; and, perhaps the most important element, competent teachers who are filles with faith and zeal and work "together and by association". The Christian school that is Lasallian in character is the school in which the composite of these elements is clearly evident.

Obviously I am describing the ideal and the goals towards which we have been striving and will be striving during the next seven years. I am not at all forgetting that we live and exercise our ministry today in a multiplicity of religions, cultures, and political systems, and that circumstances often require realistic adjustments. But the ideal is clear. In the circumstances in which we find ourselves, we do what we can, as well as we can.

While it is essential to say that the Brother exercises an apostolate whenever he truly educates, we give the central place to religious instruction and to the pastoral service of our young people. We are called to be experts on this, but whether we are specifically engaged in teaching religion or not, we can be actively involved, part-time or in out-of-school time, in leading youth groups of prayer and Christian service, in helping with youth retreats and gatherings, in counselling and the spiritual direction of young people. I think that in the immediate future we are going to see a marked increase in the number of Brothers directly involved in pastoral service of the young, and a marked improvement in our effectiveness.

★ Service of the Poor and the Promotion of Justice:

Finally, I think that during the next seven years our service of the poor and our commitment to promote justice and peace through education is going to become more significant. Past Chapters have called all of us to solidarity with the poor, whatever our particular function or service. I think our religious family has made very significant strides in this solidarity with the poor during the past decade, and I expect this awareness to continue to deepen, and our activities on behalf of the Christian education of the poor to increase in number and effectiveness. This call to solidarity with the poor obliges us, as well as all other members of the Lasallian Family, to become more aware of the poverty and injustice that exists, to "feel" this poverty and injustice and be shaped by it, to know the social teachings of the Church today, to be sensitive to our own attitudes, feelings, prejudices, and be disposed to confront them and, when necessary, to change.

This solidarity with the poor obliges us to develop in our schools, at all levels, programs that effectively help to inform our young people of the realities of this world, that train them in the teaching of the Church, and that give them the opportunity to serve the poor directly. In some parts of the Institute such programs already exist. But much remains to be done in the years ahead.

This commitment to solidarity with the poor is a challenge to every region, district and individual Brother to make more significant our direct service to the poor. Our new Rule obliges us to plan in such a way that direct service of the poor will become, in fact, our evident priority. During the past decade a significant number of Brothers — including Brothers legally retired from teaching — have made themselves available for such service, in their own countries as well as in other countries. I expect this list of Brothers serving the poor at home and abroad to grow during the years ahead. For my expectation to become a reality, regions, districts and individual Brothers will have to respond to the challenge of the 41st General Chapter and make the sacrifices required. I believe my expectations will be realized, because I have great confidence in the Brothers.

LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY: OUR HERITAGE (1)

Brother Superior, Brother Delegates:

Invited by the Preparatory Commission to speak to you on this morning, my first reaction was to refuse. A pessimistic humourist once stated: "Beware of the first impulse, it's the best". While I was trying to prepare this talk, I had a feeling of dizziness and panic. I was tempted to agree with the humourist and give up.

Lasallian spirituality? How would it be possible, in a few quarters of an hour even to simply define what the term means, let alone attempt to outline its content? Our heritage: how could I even pretend to take stock of it by myself during such a short period of preparation, in view of the General Chapter, which is itself the Institute in its most exalted expression? If there is a Lasallian heritage, it only exists in the living body that we form as a community, and this community utters no more authentic declaration concerning its identity and its mission than that which flows forth from the exchange, the confrontations and the prayer of the members of the Chapter (Declaration 7, 1-3). Finally, how could I add anything this Saturday morning, after such an intense week enriched by the contribution of exceptional men?

In order to prepare for this morning, I reread the Lasallian texts: the "Method of Mental Prayer", the "Collection", the "Meditations" and even the "Letters". As I advanced along these paths which I'd so often followed, I had the feeling of walking in an unknown land, of discovering a familiar and yet strange universe, where a different language is spoken, not that to which we are accustomed. The question that arose was not so much "How to speak of John Baptist De La Salle today?", but "Why?".

We have come here, bringing with us all the questions and the uncertainty of the worlds we left behind. In different ways, these worlds are all marked by the economic crisis and the surge of technical changes which produce unrestrained competition and present tremendous ethical problems in the field of genetics, of respect for life, of nuclear arms.

Socio-economic mechanisms make it possible for the "rich to become richer at the expense of the poor who get poorer". To be aware of this fact takes nothing away from the dramatic reality it denounces. Violence, terrorism, fanaticism and intolerance continue to create havoc. Almost everywhere, the Church finds itself is a situation of Diaspora. Indifference and secularism progress, while at the same time erratic, and more or less irrational, forms of religiosity make their appearance. (see J. Rigal: "Le Courage de la Mission", p. 28). The hopes, the searching, the aspirations, the anguish of the youth of the close of this century, live with us; they worry and stimulate us. At the same time we are preoccupied by the disillusioned relativism of some young people, by their fatalism caused by a feeling of helplessness and by their allergy to long-term commitments.

John Baptist de La Salle gives us no answers to these questions, nor to many others that one could enumerate. Why then should we make a detour by way a spiritual authour who is three hundred years old? Isn't that wasting our time, or worse still hiding behind an alibi?

As a matter of fact, there is a lot of talk nowadays, more and more explicit, about "refounding" religious orders. It would be easy to demonstrate how the last two General Chapters engaged the Institute in such a process of refoundation. They did so in conformity with the orientations of the Council on the renovation of religious congregations. The paradox is that the Institute, like the Council, only considered a "refoundation" in the light of a greater fidelity to the charism of the Founder.

A paradox? Only in appearance. What would become of the tree which is the Institute if it uprooted itself from the soil of its first planting? What would happen to the river if it cut itself off from its primary source? What could be the viability of a composite organism whose members are more and more diversified, decentralised, and autonomous, if there were no common point of reference to the original inspirational force to keep it united?

That is why, confronted with a deeper and deeper mutation, and a greater and greater diversification, this Chapter will often unite in a common effort to scrutinise the spirit and the specific intentions of the Founder, according to the terms by which Perfectae Caritatis characterised fidelity to our origins. Thus, my intervention at the end of this week of beginning the Chapter, is worthwhile, and has a symbolical significance. It constitutes the sign of your common desire to make Lasallian inspiration one of the essential principles of the dynamics of renewal which will inhabit the 41st General Chapter and which will animate its work. For my part, I can measure the frailty and the precariousness of this fleeting, momentary sign: the principal object of this intervention should be to permit a sharing among yourselves, the Capitulants.

Foundation - Refoundation: like the Church, the Institute must be constantly re-born in the world, and even of the world. However, it is by being faithful to its own deep identity that it must be re-born. The simple idea that I would like to leave with you this morning is that the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools arose in history like a spiritual uprising which became a living body. In this sense, indeed, it is first of all to the force of spirituality that we can attribute our existence today, and it is certainly, and primarily, from spiritual dynamics that we must hope for renewal and re-foundation.

Among these spiritual dynamics, I think it is possible to retain four:

1. Setting out, as a Founder, to start a movement which is both powerful and fragile, de La Salle roots his Institute in the experience of the Spirit. He wants to build it on interior men, that is, men of the Spirit.

2. Led on an unforeseen path, to depart from his familiar universe in order to embrace another world, he perceives this step as an invitation to continue a journey of incarnation in the footsteps of Christ, and an ever-growing conformity to His mystery as Saviour.

3. Associated first, and quite by chance, with a group of teachers, he is led to making them his brothers, and to become their brother himself. He views the society that he wishes to establish, not only as a functioning body, but as a communion of persons in the image of the primitive community of Jerusalem, and he refers to it as to the unity of love in the Trinity.

4. Living this foundation, searching and feeling his way along, being constantly aware of its frailty, facing repeated crises which threatened to ruin everything, being led twenty times to the brink of ruin, living the precarious situation of each day, and the uncertainty of the day that would follow, de La Salle becomes one of the most peaceful and perhaps also one of the most pacifying witnesses of abandonment to God and to hope.

The limited time I have at my disposal and some personal fatigue will oblige me to shorten this programme which was too ambitious. I will only develop the first two points, and in conclusion I'll try if possible to speak of de La Salle's abandonment to God. At any rate, the idea of communion, which I will not speak about, will be taken up I hope in the question period which is to follow later this morning.

While speaking about what I call founding spiritual dynamics, you have understood that, if I read Lasallian texts correctly, I was even more attentive to what history can tell us with regard to progression in the Spirit, about which de La Salle remains very discreet, and which is largely a matter of interpretation. This already rejects an understanding of the word "spirituality" as defining a conceptual system more or less elaborated from the writings alone. We can't ensure fidelity to the Founder by drawing from a collection of texts, or by clinging to certain expressions which are powerful and essential, no doubt, but which, separated from the living context which gave them birth, risk becoming ridiculous or turning into slogans.

I can assure you that I took time and expended the necessary effort to prepare this intervention, according to my present capability. But you don't expect me to give you something really new this morning. It's the same field that I've been ploughing for more than thirty years. Let's hope that new ploughmen come forth, because with the Lasallian heritage, as with the treasure in the fables, each generation must re-invent it, re-discover it, appropriate it as its own, not be discovering it intact, like a cassette, after digging in the ground, but by the same action of the ploughman, untiringly renewed, in communion.

LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY: OUR HERITAGE (2)

1. The foundation of the Institute, a creation in the experience of the Spirit, by interior men, men of the Spirit.

The first biographers of de La Salle lingered to study the group of schoolmasters at the time when they seemed to be emerging from their initial chaos, and were taking on a certain consistency, before acceding to an identity, or claiming the denomination of "community". A word from the Apocalypse, quite unexpectedly, came out of Blain's pen: "Behold, I shall make all things new. I renew all things through my servant". A formula that sums up the essential in Lasallian history and which the biographers will continue telling. At the end of his life, de La Salle appears to them as a man in whom a creative power was at work. Creative forces, dynamics of renewal, which erupted but not without struggle, in a closed society, a dull, sleeping world, an installed Church.

2. Creative forces present in the founding of the Institute

It is true, and let us repeat it once and for all this morning, because we are more and more aware of it, that there is no question, in any phase of Lasallian activity, of a creation "ex-nihilo". Thanks to numerous and serious works, we now see clearer than ever that the pedagogical, educational, ecclesial and spiritual work of John Baptist de La Salle benefitted from existing sources. It is inscribed in a living context. It develops in a propitious milieu. This play of influences, or reciprocity, of multiple interactions did not prevent the Founder from playing his own role, from pursuing original realisations, from often finding himself alone in his options, from arousing considerable opposition, from instigating change, sometimes in a decisive manner, and after accepting bitter struggles.

At the end of de La Salle's journey, his biographers could take stock of the "novelties" he introduced, thanks to the creative force he knew how to use wisely, with courage and stubbornness.

a) In renewed educational activities:

Creative forces. These can be seen concretely in the history of the youth of the times who were, until then, abandoned. The multiplication of schools and their diversification, the intransigent fight for effective gratuity, the reform of teaching methods, the transformation of the educative relationship all of these changed the situation of the youth in de La Salle's schools. It became possible for these young people to accede to a minimum level of culture, to hope for a professional career, to have a decent human existence, to the beginning of a consciousness of solidarity, to an opening toward the Gospel. Thanks to these creative forces, the means of salvation were put within their reach.

b) In the appearance of new ministries:

Creative forces: they can be seen concretely in the history of the schoolmasters, until that time poorly prepared, poorly motivated and poorly appreciated. The creation of a community, and then of the Society of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, made it possible to strengthen the vocation of the masters, to consolidate their professional formation, to implant their aims and their educational attitudes in the Gospel. The personal attention paid to them by him whom they called their father, his prophetic vision of a renewed Church, similar to that which St. Paul describes, introduced them, little by little, to the living realisation of the importance of their work. Still humble schoolmasters, they are not surprised to hear their founder call them ministers of God, of Jesus Christ and of the Church. These new words rejoin, elighten and announce the profound change the masters have experienced in the exercise of their profession and the discovery of their identity.

c) In the birth of John Baptist De La Salle to a new Church.

It is first of all in his own personal history that de La Salle experiences these forces of creation, or re-creation, of founding dynamics. "Behold, I shall make all things new". Blain has recourse to this quotation from one of the last passages of the New Testament to characterise the upheaval brought about by de La Salle's final, decisive option. He had just given up his canonry in order to share his existence with the schoolmasters, irrevocably and unconditionally. It is with them and through them that he will go ahead with this work which he now sees as the work of God for him.

Through this decisive option of separation and of commitment, a creative power can be seen in the person of John Baptist de La Salle, leading him to fulfil a prophetic passage: "Behold, I shall make all things new". De La Salle leaves an old, immobile Church to accede to a new one; or at least, having freely consented to the creative force acting in and beyond him, he allows himself to be re-born to a new way of living the Church.

c1): From an established Church to a Missionary Church. As a Canon, he spent long hours, sitting in his stall, reciting the Divine Office. Once committed to live with the schoolmasters, he literally dis-installs himself, he leaves a "closed" Church and sets out on an adventure, the adventure of a ministry quite unheard of. From then on he will use all his talents on behalf of children and youth whom he often describes as abandoned and far from salvation. It can be said that in urging him to prefer this venture with the schoolmasters to the reassuring tranquility of his canonry, a creative power made de La Salle emerge from an established Church to a missionary Church.

c2): From a Church for one self to a Church for the World. As a Canon, he lived familiarly with classic theology. His assiduous study of it led him to a doctorate. He chooses to risk his future with the schoolmasters; day after day he accompanies them in their field of action; he gets involved in creating a form of priestly ministry which he had not counted on in his plan of life. The Gospel he announces is going to become through him a force that will transform the lives of these men, a power of promotion for the abandoned youth they are serving, a leaven of justice and liberation, a source of upheaval in a closed society.

These "novelties" or innovations will not be introduced, thanks to the creative forces which are pushing de La Salle, except by also bringing about a renewal of his own centres of interest. The doctor of theology will use his talent in favour of catechesis for the children, of the poor and the spiritual formation of his brothers. It seems only just to observe that without fuss and as if it were only natural, de La Salle uses his competence in theology to work out a plan for the Brothers' consecration, their ministry, their commitments their educational responsibilities, their community life, and all this based upon their manner of life. In this living experience, he furnished them food for thought, be it Christological, ecclesiological, pneumatological, eschatological or moral. In short, he took ready-made theology out of the books, to experiment with it in a new ecclesial situation.

Besides all this, we see this priest discovering and putting to good use his talent in the field of pedagogy. From the assiduous sharing in the experience of his companions, he will produce the Conduct of Schools, the Duties of a Christian, the Rules of Politeness. The creative forces to which he has actively submitted himself have extracted him from a Church occupied with its internal problems only. The new Church, into which they have introduced him, is to be concretely committed to the evangelical transformation of the world.

c3): From a powerful Church to a serving Church. As a Canon, his usual companions belonged to the world of ecclesiastics. He shared their culture, their language, their preoccupations. A good number of them, like himself, were related to influential families of the city. After the death of Roland, and in order to help the Sisters of the Infant Jesus, de La Salle used his powerful influence in that particular milieu. This same milieu was surprised and scandalised when he renounced his position as Canon of the Cathedral Chapter. Henceforth what he will share is the humble condition of the schoolmasters, whom the milieu he has left prefer to ignore or to belittle. He will learn to make their daily worries his own as well as their pedagogical activities, their strivings to announce the Gospel to youngsters who are often difficult to handle. With these masters he will build a new school, little by little, and a new style community will appear in the Church. He will not try to found this new work on the support of the old milieu he has left behind. He will write later on in his Memoir Concerning the Brothers' Habit, "The Community is presently established and founded on Providence alone". In leaving the Cathedral he tore himself away from a powerful Church to accede to the evangelical and creative force of a frail and servant Church.

c4): From a clerical Church to a Church of the people of God. Finally, he gave up being a Canon because he felt the incompatibility of that state with the requirements involved in the assiduous sharing of the daily life of the schoolmasters. Henceforth his usual companions for lodging, for meals and for conversation, will be laymen. He will help them to measure up to the dignity of their condition in the Church. He will show them that, through them, that Church will see a new form of evangelical ministry come alive. With them, he will maintain and defend the formation of a new kind of community whose members are consecrated to God and commit themselves to remain as laymen and to admit none but laymen in their midst. Should we not recognise, that in this small group animated by de La Salle, a creative power has made them pass from the clerical Church to the Church of the People of God?

LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY: OUR HERITAGE(3)

12 - In the experience of the Spirit

"Behold, I shall make all things new". John Baptist de La Salle was aware that a creative power was acting in him. He was aware of the changes it was bringing about in his own being as in society and in the Church. It seems to me that the quite exceptional importance he gives to the Holy Spirit in his spiritual teachings is closely linked to this creative experience of which he is both the beneficiary and the instrument. I will limit myself to four different leads to guide your reflection on this subject, and in a very simplified form, because to develop these perspectives would take very much time. In the margin I will indicate some references from Lasallian texts.

1. First lead: Recognise the gift of the Spirit

We all remember the famous passage where John Baptist recalls his decisive commitment to the adventure of the schools and the establishment of the Brothers' community. He recognises that it was God who guided him, from one commitment to another, with wisdom and gentleness, without forcing his will. God, by His Spirit, detached him little by little from his familiar universe, from his manner of living the Church, to engage him on a path where he would accompany him to create a new world. The Founder will often say to his disciples that their Institute, their particular vocation, is first the work of the Spirit who spreads his gifts among men for the realisation of God's salvation. (Two key texts: MR 201,1, 193,1).

First of all, it is necessary to recognise the gift of the Spirit, and the term recognise takes on numerous spiritual harmonics. To recognise the gift of the Spirit is, of course, to become aware of it day after day, and this celebration in memory of the Spirit does not and will not cease to renew and to actualise this gift. To recognise the gift of the Spirit is to know how to be moved by it in order to give thanks, and here we are orientated towards a spiritual attitude which is fundamentally positive and which can be dynamic when we are tempted to dejection or self complacency because of our insufficiency or our difficulties.

To recognise the gift of the Spirit, is to situate it in the immense and overwhelming action of the Spirit, in the movement of the Spirit, as the Founder says, which produced the prophets, which presided at the birth of the Church, just as it surveyed the genesis of the universe (two key texts: MD 43,1 - 2,1). There can be no question of turning a nostalgic eye to a marvellous but outdated past. You must recognise the passing of the Spirit in our history today. To recognise the gift of the Spirit is also to put it to work, to use it without fear and with enthusiasm, and here we are committed to spread forth the creativity that the Spirit inspires and sustains in us. (MR 193,2) We should mention here how John Baptist de La Salle knew how to set the Brothers on the road of this creativity. We can feel it in reading the entreaties, not untainted with impatience, which he addresses to Gabriel Drolin. (Letters 14, 8-10 and 16, 6-7).

To recognise the gift of the Spirit is to recognise the Spirit of God Itself as the principle of life and action which is given to us (EMO: 18-19). Here we could add several texts of the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer and from the Meditations. It is most important to be able to show the Founder as a spiritual author who, under the influence of St. Paul and of St. John, repeatedly calls us to welcome and to serve life, to believe obstinately that the powers of life are once and for all victorious over the powers of death. (MD 45,1).

2. Second lead: to be available for the gratuitous and unforeseeable action of the Spirit.

While recalling the story of the change of orientation in his life, de La Salle took pleasure in recognising the unexpected, the unforeseeable, the disconcerting character of the manifestation of the creative power of the Spirit. "I thought nothing about it before". Besides, he was impressed by the fact that the Spirit manifested itself and intervened where he least expected it. It was not the Archbishop who encouraged him to give up his canonicate, but rather, humble laymen.

The Gospel reference that Barré pounded into his consciousness and which he himself repeated to his companions to invite them to abandonment, did not become the word of God for him in the flesh until he felt within him the brutal questioning of the schoolmasters who were completely closed to any kind of dialogue without an existential consistency. We would continue: at the time of the crisis of 1690, it is really thanks to the contract of association that he signs with Vuyart and Drolin that de La Salle is projected once more in his vocation of Founder: at the same time as he pronounces his vow of association, he sets out gain for a new creative action. It will be the same at the time of his doubts in 1710: it is through his Brothers that the Spirit will send him back to finish his work. The first effect of the Spirit of faith: to look upon all things with the eyes of faith. In the light of these powerful experiences, I think that certain spiritual teachings of the Founder take on a very different resonance: the teaching on the spirit of faith first, and the invitation to recognise the presence and the action of the Spirit in people, in situations, in the events of everyday life, and in the history of humanity. Once more, we are invited, not to an attitude of drawing back before what may upset us, but to a spiritual attentiveness to the invitation that the Spirit is addressing to us along the path of renewed fidelity we are living. "Because it is life, personal and collective life, which is the place where God calls, the place of conversion and the place of witness". (J. Rigal: Le Courage de la Mission, p. 50).

In the second place, I would like to call your attention a brief moment to a spiritual teaching to which the Founder attaches considerable importance in the Collection, in the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer and in certain meditations: I refer to docility, receptiveness to the inspirations of the Holy Spirit (MF. 99,2 180,3 123, 1-2 L. 129,1 89-3 8-9. Collection 118-119 188, III. 186, XI. The expression may seem vague, if not old-fashioned; it may seem risky, subjective or individualistic. Getting a closer look, in the light of the experience of the foundation, shouldn't we see in this Lasallian insistence (which is classical) an essential reminder? The kindliness or consideration of the Spirit outdoes all assured systems and shakes up old-fashioned habits; the life of the Spirit reaches out and calls beyond elaborated programmes and accepted conventions; free action of the Spirit is not subject to fixed structures or majority consensus. To speak of the inspiration of the Spirit is to recall the experience of each individual which must be welcomed and listened to because "in each of the Brothers, the Spirit speaks and acts", and renewing creation often begins with the perception and the commitment of a person.

To complete this point, I must mention the importance of spiritual discernment concerning which the Founder has left us solid and clear criteria. (Compare: MR 100 and 118, 132,1-2 and 174,4 167 and 143, 177 and 97).

3. Third lead: The trascendent strength of the Spirit. Its powerful and creative activity is unfurled in our weakness.

There is a third, very strong characteristic of Lasallian experience of the Spirit in the Founder's story and in that of the foundation of the Institute. The strength of the Holy Spirit is displayed in human weakness, and the creative force is seen in shaky, often tentative achievements which are sometimes tainted with ambiguity. To speak of the creative force of the Spirit at the beginnings of the Institute, does not imply, according to the Founder, any confident step or steady progress forward. On the contrary, as we know, the Founder had to acknowledge and rely on the fidelity of the Spirit when in the depths of the many crises which frequently brought the Institute to the edge of collapse.

The Founder's spiritual teaching does not ignore this important dimension of the experience of creation which he himself had lived. When all is said and done, the fact that the strength of the Spirit should be manifest in the weakness of man is, for the Founder, a source, in the first place, of deep assurance, of joy and of interior peace. We can already see this interior joy in Blain's presentation of the decisive option of the Founder. The questioning by the teachers forces him into a choice. Blain then reconstructs the long prayer of discernment to which John Baptist then commits himself. He becomes aware that he can no longer procrastinate; he must now choose between his canonicate and the care of the teachers. He must decide whether to remain on the familiar bank or whether to venture the crossing of the river without really knowing what he will find on the other side, even if he should reach it.

Now whereas he always seems to live in a state of perplexity, here we find him suddenly taken up with an inner but irrepressible joy, the delight of making a surprising discovery: "Since I no longer feel any attraction for the vocation of a Canon, it would seem that the state left me before I left it... This state is no longer for me". While he was pondering over the pros and cons, the Spirit Himself had already carried him on to the other bank, as in the case of the prophet in former times, and for John Baptist it was now merely a matter of walking along that bank.

De La Salle will later explain in the Collection, in a text which though at first sight heavy is yet full of finesse: "Yes, God is asking you to be faithful in the present moment; he gives the necessary light for the step he is calling you to make. But His creative power carries you beyond what you thought yourself capable of doing". God's Spirit is greater than our heart: that is de la Salle's experience of the creation of the Institute; it was also the experience of his own spiritual evolution. It is one of the most important themes in his spiritual teaching on fidelity to the Spirit. In his teaching he tirelessly insists on our daring to take on a commitment, since His invincible strength will not fail us, and on our need to retain an interior attitude of poverty since, in ourselves, we are often fearfully weak, lazily shortsighted and frivolously fickle. But the Spirit is our strength, our light and our faithfulness, provided that we know how to pray to him with trust, how to await him with patience, and how to recognise and follow him with docility. As daring, poor and confident men we will be the amazed witnesses to the strength of the Spirit who leads us well beyond ourselves as far as a land, judged from afar to be arid, but in reality thoroughly fertile. That land where the Spirit opens us up to the knowledge and practice of a new wisdom, that of the Beatitudes.

4. Fourth lead: Living as interior men, as men of the Spirit.

One of the interior supports of the Institute is interior recollection. Let us call it interiority. To bring his teachers to live in conformity with the purpose of their Institute it was necessary for the Founder to help them become 'interior' men. He considered it a priority to devote himself to his disciples' education in interiority. His writings, especially the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer, greatly insist on its importance and its conditions. Mental prayer is an 'interior' occupation and, in order to be well founded, it should be "practised in the very depth of the soul, that is to say, in the most intimate part of man's being. (EMO 3 Cf. 26,30 34, 72).

One might be tempted, if not to set interiority and creativity in opposition to each other, at least not to envisage them as progressing together in a single movement. Some of the texts of the Founder suggest such a dichotomy, particularly a certain number of articles from the Collection on the "Means of becoming interior", which can be construed as an encouragement to withdraw into oneself and to passivity.

This is not the place for discussing at length texts from another age, shaped to fit the world for which they were written. It seems to be quite right to observe that, taken in its entirety, Lasallian interiority is not opposed to creativity — quite the contrary. Interiority liberates man from undue ties, from worries and superficial concerns. It therefore enables him to devote his energies to what is essential. Interiority focuses man on the basic objectives to be reached; it enables him to better appreciate the means to be used to that end and to launch out into action without squandering his energies on secondary activities. Interiority leads man to deepen the meaning of his action and to measure its value and importance. It makes him dynamic by intensifying his motivations. Interiority makes man sensitive to the richness of life spread out before him in his human surroundings; it induces him to associate his action with that of other people and to adjust his efforts to those of others.

But it especially seems to me that, for de la Salle, interiority and creativity are joined together most profoundly because they are at one and the same time a searching for, a welcoming of and a manifestation of the Spirit. Lasallian interiority is spiritual interiority. The depth of the soul of which he has just spoken, is the bottom of the heart, converted from selfishness and open to love, because it is inhabited and animated by the Spirit of Christ, a spirit of sonship.

Deep within man the Spirit is awareness of the personal love of the Father. It opens up to the love of others, a kind of love which is manifested in works. Deep within man the Spirit is the astonishing experience of salvation. It empowers man to go out and to try to reveal to others this salvation that has overtaken him.

In the depth of the heart, the Spirit is the recognition that strength is found in weakness and that sanctity purifies from sin; it urges man to commit himself resolutely, certain that in his commitment to others the Spirit is also manifested in his weakness, and that mercy will triumph over the forces of evil. Most of all, at the bottom of the heart, the Spirit becomes prayer, crying to God "Abba, Father" and whispering to the heart of man, "You are loved come to the Father. You are called to bear witness to this love. Go out and meet your brothers". The Meditation for the ninth Sunday after Pentecost clearly expresses this unity of spiritual interiority when it says:

> "The Holy Spirit that resides in you must penetrate the depth of your souls; it is in them that this Spirit must pray in a very special manner. It is within the soul that this Spirit communicates with it, joins himself to it and gives it to understand what God requires of it in order to be entirely His". (MD 62, 3).

The Spirit is most important

In concluding this point, I would like to remind you that the experience of Lasallian creativity is inscribed between two events whose symbolic importance seems to me to be very strong at the beginning of this General Chapter.

The first event is that of the departure of almost all of the first companions of de La Salle. From the beginning of his contact with them he had striven to establish some order in the rather inefficient chaos of the little group. However, they simply left him. To make a long story short, they discovered, in Blain's phrase, "that their freedom was too constrained".

John Baptist will ponder this bitter failure in the light of the Gospel of spiritual freedom. Once and for all, he understood that structures, though essential, cannot make up for the lack of vocation nor the absence of an interior assent when it is a question of a vocation and an evangelical project. An institute cannot be founded by imposing readymade structures on its members from without. At this point some young men present themselves to the Founder. They are anxious to "know Jesus Christ Crucified and devote themselves to a ministry in favour of the poor". The Founder will hence-forth dedicate himself to changing them into new men, interior men, men of the Spirit. The movement of educational and apostolic creativity and the task of the organisation of the community will be inseparable from his efforts as guide and spiritual teacher.

Inspiration will be the soul of any structures that are set up, while the enthusiasm of the members taking flesh in the structures that issue from their living communion, will find a new strength in it. From the reality of their own world, the consciousness of their calling and of their mission, men trained in the interior freedom of the Spirit will be able to invent a new way of living as Church and humbly contributing to the evangelical transformation of society.

The second event is a text, the prologue of Chapter II of the Rule. De La Salle added it only in 1718. The newborn community can now, it seems, mark the end of the period of foundation. Brother Bartelemy is Superior General; the Rule has been definitively set down and accepted by all those who were also its authors. As to structures, the Institute seems to be prepared for the long haul, and the Holy See, a few years later, will reinforce its existence by recognising the originality of its charism rather more than by approving the details of its rules.

And there rings out again, almost for the last time, the prophetic voice of the Founder. It resounds as in the beginning of the Rule in a Prologue which does not appear in the text before 1718. The theme is solemn and we all have it engraved deeply in our memories. Even as young novices, we sensed its unique importance, as if the Founder, on completing his work, cautioned his sons when he passed on to them the (partial) results of this long process of creation.

"Brothers, do not fail to appreciate the creative powers that have been bestowed upon you to exist and to grow. Do not underestimate the forces that will permit you to live as persons consecrated to God, as evangelical servants of the young, and in brotherly communion. Here is the Rule that you will observe since we drew it up together throughout the 40 years of our foundation. And do not forget — it is not this Rule which is the most important thing. What is most important and to which the greatest care should be given in a community, is that all those who are a part of it have the spirit which characterises it; that the novices apply themselves to acquire it; that those who are engaged in it should endeavour above all to preserve and increase it in themselves:. For it is this spirit which must give life to all their actions and animate all their conduct".

LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY: OUR HERITAGE (4)

The Foundation of the Institute: An Incarnational Dynamism for the "Salvation" of abandoned young people, following Jesus Christ.

21 - The founding shock of the Institute.

Each time I read the first point of the Second Meditation for the Time of Retreat (194), I feel, as it were, the shock wave by which the Institute came into being, the creative shock which engendered John Baptist De La Salle in his own vocation, by the power of the Holy Spirit, the creative shock from which he set out on his evangelical journey as a disciple of Jesus Christ.

a) A cultural shock between two worlds.

We know this text well. It begins with an invitation to the Brothers gathered together on retreat to "consider" clearly — almost clinically, we might say — the concrete situation of forsaken youth; and the early Brothers who were listening to this reading could call to mind the faces of children that they knew and give them their proper names.

> "Consider that it is only too common for the working class and the poor to allow their children to live on their own, roaming all over as if they had no home... The results of this condition are regrettable for these unfortunate children have great difficulty when the time arrives for them to go to work..." (MR 194,2).

A creative shock. In John Baptist De La Salle's case, of course, it can be taken as a cultural shock, a harsh confrontation between two worlds which existed side by side in the same city with each unaware of the other because everything kept them apart: the normal channels of human relationships, social status, cultural possibilities. Speaking of John Baptist's father, Maillefer tells us that he had endeavoured to give his son "an education suitable to his birth". As a result of his contacts with the masters, De La Salle was suddenly immersed in the reality of an entirely different type of youth in Rheims; he was astonished to find that, for a whole class of children in his city, receiving an education suited to their birth amounted practically to being excluded from even the most modest places of learning, the charity schools. And, from that point, his lucid outlook on the reality of things obliges him to foresee the "distressing consequences" to which this situation will inexorably lead: the children of the working class and the poor are prisoners of the vicious circle in which their family situation and social condition enclose them. This forsaken world is doomed in advance to go on repeating itself indefinitely in the same form.

b) A shock between the world of faith and the world such as it is.

The first phrase of the second section of this text reminds us, should we have lost sight of it, that we are in meditation. That is to say, for the Founder, that we are in the contemplation of the mystery of the living God, of the saving God. And this word resounds like a shout of victory — life has vanquished death.

> "God has the goodness to remedy so great a misfortune by the establishment of the Christian Schools, where the teaching is offered free of charge and entirely for the glory of God". (MTR, p. 50).

Thanks to the intervention of the living God, of the God of Life, of the God of the History of Salvation, here and now, those children can be "saved". They will be fit "to put to work when their parents wish to set them to it". And the point of the meditation ends with a double invitation: to give thanks for the foundation of the Institute which has come into being as the response of the Brothers to God's call; to renew their impetus for the evangelical service of education of youth.

> "Thank God that He has had the goodness to call upon you to procure such an important advantage for children. Be faithful and exact to do this without any payment; so you can say with St. Paul: the source of my consolation is to announce the Gospel free of charge, without having it cost anything to those who hear me". (MTR, p. 50).

We do know that, to some Brothers, to the Institute itself in the course of its long missionary history, similar shocks like the one of its origins have continually imbued it with a new creative force, a renewal of life, an ability to invent new educational structures. The Institute would have disappeared a long time ago had it not renewed itself unceasingly by the acceptance of that frequently disconcerting encounter with new cultures, with new countries, with unpredictable young people. It was challenged in the diverse forms of distress: material, emotional and cultural distress, lack of goods, difficulties arising from school dropouts and unemployment for young men, criminal manipulation by drug pushers and white slavers, distress coming from doubts about the meaning of life, indifference, incredulity, the choking sensation from within bloated societies blinded to any transcendence, or the distress of helplessness in the face of famine or under oppressive regimes.

But the basic message, which is brought home to us here, from both De La Salle's act of foundation and his spiritual teaching, is that this is a question not only of cultural shock but of a clash between the reality of the world and living faith.

The passage I have quoted reminds us that the Institute was born from "the goodness of God". "God has had the godness to remedy so great a misfortune".

The thrust of the Meditations for the Time of Retreat, and more generally the whole spiritual teaching of the Founder invite us here to place ourselves in the heart of the Mystery of Jesus Christ. De La Salle is fond of the word "mystery", enshrined at the very centre of the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer. And there it is for us to ponder what he means by it.

c) Understanding Lasallian Christocentrism in the movement of the founding shock.

Lasallian spirituality, like that of his days and like any authentic spirituality, is Christocentric. John Baptist ceaselessly invites his Brothers to contemplate Jesus Christ, imitate His virtues, strive to grow in conformity with Him and to dwell in Him, We could quite easily build a kind of synthesis of his spiritual teaching — rich, dense and solid in that respect. However, it seems obvious to me that such a synthesis loses its originality as well as its creative force if it is assembled without taking into account that Lasallian Christocentrism springs from the founding shock of the Institute. In other words, the Christ that John Baptist de La Salle speaks to us about is an evangelical Christ, emphatically the Christ of the Synoptic Gospels, of St. Paul and St. John. But his contemplation of Him is continually pierced through by what he has discovered, and what he still discovers in his present world. For if the salvation of God was accomplished once and for all through the Incarnation and in the Life, Ministry, Death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, if the salvation is made available by the Spirit today and within the Church, he cannot but note that for young people, those that he meets each day, all this reality of faith, the reality of the other world which animates the Brothers also, appears to be distant, unattainable, unreal.

In their reality, the world, such as it is, mocks and damages their faith. Hence, one can doubtless see that, feeling threatened, faith will shrink into itself, the contemplation of Christ tends to detach itself from a human experience which seems to contradict it, and prayer shuts itself in, even when it stands in wonder before God's mystery. One could also see how, in a more or less conscious way, a faith thought to be obsolete and incapable of transmission might be shunted aside, placed between brackets, while the importance of positive, concrete education for the material progress of youth is clearly seen.

De La Salle's attitude, such as I see it, both in his journey of foundation and in the dynamism of his spiritual teaching on the Mystery of Jesus Christ, accepts neither of these points of view. For the Founder, it is the silent work of the Spirit in their hearts that has made himself and his Brothers sensitive to that spiritual and cultural chasm that separates the young children they know from that which is proclaimed by the faith which is theirs. The first effect of the spirit of faith is an entire change in the way one looks on life — to see everything through the eyes of faith. The clinical sharpness of the analysis of the distressful situation of youth cannot lead to despair because the Spirit causes the Brothers to recognize in those young people the presence of Jesus Christ Himself, an invisible, tenuous but hopeful presence. Their faith is challenged; it is also stirred by the power of the Resurrection. In that respect, one must read once again the many lasallian texts that invite us to "recognize Jesus Christ beneath the tattered clothing of children", and calls upon us to respect in those forsaken youngsters the dignity of the children of God.

At the same time, out of this contemplation of a reality both enlightened and challenged by faith, there wells up in the heart of the Brother the certainty of being called by God to those young people, just as they are. What it comes to mean is that the founding shock is that of a clash between two worlds while at the same time it is a shock produced in their inner selves by the bursting into flame, in the heart of the Brother, of a spark from the heart of God. "That is the reason why God kindles a light in those called to announce His word to children to enlighten them by making the glory of God known to them". (MTR, p. 47) 193.I.

d) The founding shock of the Institute is produced in the heart of the living God.

It is necessary to go beyond, or rather to return to the very origin of the founding shock. According to De La Salle, it appears as a prolongation or manifestation in the history of mankind, of the "shock" which God felt in His love for men.

Here we should read again the extraordinary text of Med. 201. In fact, it repeats the message of St. John:

> "You must imitate God himself to some extent, for He so loved the souls He created that when He saw them involved in sin and unable to free themselves, His zeal and desire for their salvation led Him to send His own Son to rescue them from their miserable condition. This is what made Jesus Christ say that God so loved the world that He gave His only Son so that whoever believes in Him may not die, but may have eternal life". (MTR, p. 76) 201.

It seems to me that it is from this point that everything starts, or rather that it is here that the impulse of the educational service to the young must ceaselessly reinforce its dynamism and renew its self confidence. That which founded the Institute following the lived experience of John Baptist de La Salle, that which still founds it anew each day in its sure and true bursting forth, is the love of God in Jesus Christ, which has its beginnings in Trinitarian Love.

But we are very far from the divine impassivity to which the abstract treaties of theodicy coolly refer; the kind of love of which we speak has nothing in common with the static contentment jealously shared only by the Three (Persons) which some meditations on the Trinity sometimes seem to evoke. For the Trinity has been revealed to us only by the Son who lived amongst men. And this mission of the Son, as well as the sending of the Spirit, is seen by the Founder as caused by the unbearable suffering of God in presence of human distress. When all is said and done, it is the Cross of Christ that manifests not only what is God's love for men, but Love such as it is lived within the Trinity, that is to say, at the very fountain of all love. A lasallian spiritual vision, formulated in the 17th century, but to which many present-day theological studies on the sufferings of God have given a renewed actuality, a modern resonance.

22 - The founding shock of the Institute: the Brother minister of Jesus-Christ.

I would willingly consider this contemplation of love in the heart of a God open to human distress, in Mental Prayer and Lasallian Spirituality, as the equivalent of the "foundation" in the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius. Whatever the case, from this fundamental contemplation of the heart of God, the spiritual and apostolic thrust will spring up or gush forth from the Brother's heart by taking on very realistic form in the exercise of his humble ministry. The text of our meditation goes on as follows:

> See what God and Jesus Christ have done to restore souls to the grace they have lost. What must you not do for them in your ministry if you have a zeal for their salvation". (MTR, p. 76).

Once again, let us note, if the Founder immediately sends his disciples back to the reality of their daily occupations, or rather to the effective accompaniment of the children entrusted to them, it is by opening them up to the inventive creativity that he brings them back to their activities. "What must you not do for them in your ministry". The true, patent, unavoidable realities for the Brother are those of the mystery of God's love and of the reality of the young just as they are.From the tension between the two, and because the Brother already belongs to both worlds, there continually springs forth the "ministry" of the Brother, but seen as a capacity for creativity and inventiveness. "What must you not do?": You must never cease to begin again.

a) Christocentrism of the ministry of Jesus-Christ

What is important, I think, is to stress the fact that it is here that the real Christocentrism presented by John Baptist de La Salle to his disciples finds its roots as a deep spiritual dynamism. Such Christocentrism is that of a "minister of Jesus Christ", for "what God and Jesus Christ have done", once for all and for the whole of mankind, you must do it again, you must actualize it here and now, for the portion of humanity that has been entrusted to you.

You are the ministers of Jesus Christ for them. That means you have constantly to reenter into the movement of the Mystery of Jesus Christ such as it unfolded, and such as it is presented, for example, in the Christological hymn of the Epistle to the Philippians. Therefore it is not a matter of imitating the actions of Jesus Christ, or of a union with Jesus Christ seen as something static and individualistic. "As you represent Jesus Christ for the children confiided to your care, you must become one with Him, enter into His views, His intentions and, by the power of the Spirit given to you, reproduce today the very movement of His mystery.

b) The mystery and ministry of Christ.

What appears to me as essential and original, difficult to express and still more difficult to live — though it deals with a kind of dynamism to be renewed unceasingly — is the fact that John Baptist de La Salle does not dissociate the interior, mystical dynamism of the mystery from its very concrete, often prosaic, actualization in the exercise of the educational ministry of the Brother. Besides, one must indeed be conscious of the constant interaction between the exercise of ministry and the personal growth of the Brother in the mystery.

"Undoubtedly, we are familiar with the dynamism which goes from the mystery to the ministry: "If you want to be successful in your ministry, often give yourself over to the Spirit of Jesus Christ". But one must not fail to recognize a mutual dynamism: if you want to grow in Jesus Christ become more and more God's sons in the Spirit, dedicate yourselves to your everyday tasks; they will enlighten you, set you free and lead you on.

LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY: OUR HERITAGE (5)

23 - In the ministry, becoming conformable to Christ in his mystery.

In broad terms, for I can only point out some approaches likely to stimulate a renewed reading of the lasallian spiritual teaching, I would like to follow the stages in which the mystery of Jesus Christ was accomplished such as they are evoked or implied in the Hymn of Philippians, and I will show how for John Baptist de La Salle (who so often quotes from the text of Philippians), those stages become actualized in the several dynamisms through which, in his ministry, the Brother seeks to conform himself with Jesus Christ. I will speak of the dynamism of Exodus and Incarnation; of the dynamism of the liberating and prophetic announcement of the Gospel; of the dynamism of the struggle for justice and the accepting of persecution. And I will conclude by speaking of the need to conform to the interior dispositions and the Spirit of Jesus Christ, and finally by opening out onto the spiritual dynamism which is at the end, as it was at the beginning, of both the mystery of Christ and the ministry of the Brother, of which it is the very soul in daily life: a dynamism of impulse towards the Father, of adhesion to His will, of service for His Kingdom, of passion for His Name; in a word, the dynamism of an existence consecrated to the Father, offered up to His glory.

a) Dynamism of Exodus

It is this dynamism which founds the Institute, since de La Salle is wrenched from his world to launch out in the discovery of the other world he has discovered. The dynamism of Christ that the Founder contemplates, for instance, in the event of the Circumcision or of the Transfiguration of the Lord. He left heaven to come down among men. The dynamism of Christ, the Good Shephered, about whom John Baptist de La Salle reminds us that he left the ninety-nine faithful sheep to go in search of the lost. You too, he goes on to say, should "try every means to bring back to God those who are far away from Him", for "such is the will of your Father Who is in heaven that none of these little ones should perish". (MD 56,1).

The dynamism of Incarnation, the foundation of the Institute in John Baptist who, at the cost of arduous struggle, made himself as far as possible like those masters for whom in the beginning he had felt such aversion. The dynamism that the Founder contemplates in the light of the Letter to the Hebrews for example: "He is not ashamed to call us His brothers... He made Himself in everything like His brothers... to the extent of being tempted... which allows Him to come to the help of those who are tempted". The frequent invitation of the Founder to "bend down towards the young, to meet them where and as they are, to put yourself within their reach, to become like them in poverty, for example, and to speak their language. (EMO. 65 MR. 197,1 198,1). Incarnation, proximity of insertion, not mere chance realities, but which surge from the heart of the Brother who is "Good Shepherd", from the one who lives among his sheep, who knows everyone of them by their name, their social milieu and their personal history. Incarnation, proximity, which implies a harmony of heart: to win their hearts, show them tenderness... such expressions which are typically lasallian. (MD. 115; 3 and MD 33).

b) Dynamism of the liberating and prophetic proclamation of the Gospel

Foundational dynamism of the Institute: to put the means of salvation within the reach of abandoned youth. For that end, there is the "liberating" action of the Founder and his Brothers, who stubbornly ensure the gratuity of instruction, who transform their school so that it may be acceptable to youth through education, and so that it may be an experience of human dignity for them, of solidarity and friendship, a school which prepares them for a useful, competent life of service.

The dynamism of Christ, Good Shephered and Servant, who cures man and sets him on his feet again, liberates him from his alienations and fears, reinstates the outcasts, restores the bonds between men. The teaching of the Founder about education in freedom, about tenderness towards the young, about the care for quality in their instruction, about personal attention and desire for the smooth running of the school... It is through this transformation of human realities, in this effort for the advancement of individual persons that the Gospel is already announced. For the Gospel is the power of salvation for every man and for the entire persons. "The Church considers this solicitude for man, for his humanity, for the future of men on earth and therefore for the orientation of development and progress, as an essential element of her mission". (John Paul II, Redemptor Hominis, n. 15).

To place the means of salvation within reach of those young people is to announce to them, as far as possible in their own language, the Good News of the Gospel, the Christian message. Even more precisely, it means working for their christian initiation, in all its dimensions. The Founder's meditations ceaselessly come back to this key dimension of the ministry of the Brother. We must add however that the Founder often directs the Brother's contemplation towards Jesus Christ, in the exercise of His prophetic ministry, in His passion to go from city to city and announce the Gospel; He devoted His daylight hours to this task whereas He dedicated His nights to solitary prayer, thus living out the double yet single movement of adhesion to His Father to Whom he was united in order that He could then manifest Him. (MR 200,1).

Certainly, we must emphasize another key dimension of this participation of the Brother in the Mystery of Christ Prophet, what may be called its dimension of challenge: on the one hand, with regard to these young people, he must not hesitate to announce to them the authentic Gospel, including the paradoxical mystery of the Beatitudes, the announcement of the Folly of the Cross, the insistence on a life which is well lives when it is given as gift. And on the other hand, the prophetic ministry of the Brother also includes an aspect of denunciation when freedom becomes abuse and the young allow themselves to be enslaved again by the forces of death. In a meaningful way, when speaking of correction, the Founder refers to the prophetic character of the Old Testament personified in Nathan. Still more meaningful is the reference here to Christ Prophet, wrathful and fearless supporter of the rights of God and the truth of man. (MR 204, 2-3 and MR 203, 1).

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

c) The dynamism of the battle for justice and the acceptance of persecution

The founding dynamism of the Institute was tested by many forms of hostility, which we could call the forces of death, without prejudicing the good faith of de La Salle's enemies. If the Institute has known so many crises, these were often caused, or at least accentuated, by the fact that the Founder and his disciples strove to give witness to the transforming force of a new world, in a Church and society where they were not yet accepted. It is not at all surprising therefore that the evangelical theme of persecution should be so often treated by the Founder. We could show how he invites his Brothers to interpret and live these trials as a participation in the mystery of Christ fighting for justice, persecuted by those who were opposed to it and finally eliminated by their combined forces. This is the Scandal of the Mystery of the Cross, but the Founder takes great care not to separate it from the power of life and Resurrection. "Make it known by your whole conduct towards the children confided to your care that you consider yourselves as the ministers of God... enduring with great patience the pains you have to suffer, glad to be despised by men and persecuted to the point of giving your life for Jesus in the exercise of your ministry". (MR 201, 1 and EMO 111).

Like Jesus, and so that they might have life, to consume your entire life. Thus is expressed, in the context of the daily exercise of the ministry, the communion of the Brother with the Mystery of the Incarnate Christ, Good Shepherd, with the Mystery of Christ, Servant of men and their Liberator, Prophet of a new world, strength of salvation for the present world and Power for the new beginnings in this restricted world. Thus is expressed the communion of the Brother with the mystery of Christ persecuted for justice, suffering and dying on the cross, offering up his life for the salvation of the world. The Founder also invites the Brother to take on the profound dispositions of Christ living out this mystery in humility and gentleness with scarcity of means, in a refusal to resort to worldly power and with immeasurable respect for the dignity of every human being and of his freedom before God.

It remains to welcome the Spirit of Jesus Who progressively leads the Brother to the very heart of the Mystery of Jesus, to the threshold of His special relationship with His Father. Jesus turned towards His Father, from the deepest recesses of His Being, by the welcoming of His Love, the impulse of thanksgiving, the union with His Will, the offering of His Life. Growth in Christ through the exercise of the ministry is firmly linked to contemplation, to the prayer of praise and supplication that continuously flowed from the Heart of Jesus, as Von Baltasar has so well written: "If Jesus had not withdrawn so far in solitude with God, He could never have moved so far in the community of mankind".

It is in this perspective, I believe, that we can re-read the following lines from the Explanation of Mental Prayer, biblically so rich and affectively so warm:

> "I unite myself to You, O sweet Jesus, to your interior dispositions when you were meditating; You were then really in Your Father and Your Father in You; You were then thinking what He was Himself thinking; You then loved what He loved... In the same way, do in me what you want me to do; You yourself please present my meditation and make known my needs to the Eternal Father". (EMO 56).

Without any commentary, I place alongside these words that conclude the 201st meditation. They express the main points concerning the founding shock of the Institute and probably the vocation of the Brother:

> "Tell them again what Jesus Christ used to say about the sheep whose shepherd He is and who must be saved by Him: I have come, He said, that they may have life and have it abundantly. For it must have been the ardent zeal you have for the salvation of the souls of those you have to instruct that has inspired you to sacrifice yourselves and commit the whole of your life to give them a christian education and procure for them the life of grace in this world and Life everlasting in the next".

Abandonment to God for a period of renewed founding.

Foundation, refoundation. These words undoubtedly contain something both stimulating and exciting. However, we have learnt that reality is difficult, fragile, often uncertain. And nothing allows us to expect a bright future. I have spoken of creativity in foundation. But we also know that De La Salle experienced successive crises, that he had probably been often tempted to despair and had experienced being abandoned by God in silent darkness.

Like every Assembly of Brothers, this General Chapter constitutes an act of hope. As it begins, I feel that our Founder is inviting all of us to take on the attitude of surrender to God, an attitude which, according to Father Rayez, the Founder so well represents. I simply leave for your meditation and prayer these lasallian texts: they seem to me to apply to your General Chapter, to our Chapter, as it is the General Chapter of the Institute.

1. "The Brother Director must be fully united to God and filled with His Spirit, for it must not be by his own spirit that he must behave in his task, but it must be the Spirit of God that acts in him and in the community. To that end, he must... have abandoned himself to the Spirit of God in order to act only through His inspiration and movement or rather, to let His Holy Spirit be really the principle of his action". (Avis I, 2).

2. "Prepare yourself today to receive Him fully (the Spirit of Christ), by giving yourself up completely to His guidance and allowing Him to reign over all your interior movements in so perfect a manner that it is no longer yourselves who live, but Jesus Christ who lives in You". (MD, 22, 2).

3. "... There would seem to be great faith in the spirit of detachment since one gives oneself up to God's Providence, like a man who would take to the wide sea without sails or oars". (MF 134, 1).

Pray to God that He may grant you TODAY the same grace
as He gave to the holy Apostles
(in the Upper Room) and that after having filled you with His Spirit to sanctify you that He may communicate it to you also for the salvation of others. (M.D. 43, 3).
Send your Spirit to give us a new life and
You will renew the face of the earth. (M.D. 42, 3).

THE RULE OF THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS (1)

Speaking about the Rule

Speaking about the Rule in a magazine which is open to the laity as well as to Brothers, raises a certain number of questions.

In fact on one part, Religious have over the centuries maintained a hermetical reserve concerning the internal life of their Institutes. Further, the Rule is the soul of this internal life: it officially designates what Religious are, what they ought to do, how they should govern themselves, how individuals should be accepted into the community how they should be trained, and what duties they should fulfill throughout their existence.

With regard to this, the laity manifest little interest in these texts, written in a language which is largely foreign to them, making allusions to things of a religious nature, with which they have not been familiar.

The situation changes from the moment when both parties concerned evolve. The "Lasallian reality" is seen today throughout the world. The laity are interested in the spirituality coming from John Baptist De La Salle, and many share in the Brothers' apostolic work: now, it is the Rule which makes this spirituality and apostolate "official". It is then, an act of confidence in the Lasallian laity in presenting this Rule in their assembly and leaving to the local Communities of the Brothers the task of eventually presenting a more elaborate understanding to the lay people associated with their spiritual life and mission.

The situation evolves also on the part of the Brothers. At the very outset, they are aware that in presenting the Rule, they are inviting a public judgement, at least within the circle of their friends, who are going to note the difference between the ideal prescribed by the Rule and the reality lived in practice. Still, the Brothers in ever greater numbers are willing to accept this risk: it is that of the Gospel. The Rule, in fact, derives its meaning and strength from the Gospel. These practical prescriptions have no other purpose except to help the religious to live their daily lives according to the Gospel. And such deeds should not be hidden under a bushel. The consecration of religious calls upon them to "profess" their vows. In the measure that they accept this challenge in His name, they have the right to call others to account: "Where do you stand in your life, with regard to the Gospel?".

The true challenge is that of transfering the Rule from the static legislative text to the strength of service of the Spirit.

Three Rules in three centuries

Since the time of Saint John Baptist De La Salle, the Brothers have known only three basic Rules, even though various editions have been presented with minor retouching. These three Rules are those approved by the successive Chapters of 1718, 1967, and 1986.

The Rule of 1718.

This rule was duly voted upon and approved by the second General Chapter, in the presence of the Founder. This Rule had been previously lived experimentally by the Brothers and was largely based upon their views.

This Rule underwent a number of additions and some retouching. The two most notable ones, were those of 1726, after the approbation of the Institute by the Pope, which added a Chapter on the vows; and 1923 when, at the request of Pope Pius XI, a chapter was modified allowing the Brothers to teach Latin thereafter.

Substantially, this Rule would remain in force until 1967. It underwent 13 editions, the last of which was in 1947.

Such longevity can be explained: the Brothers remained (and still remain) very attached to this text coming from their origins, where the source of their original strength, the spirit of the Institute and their own identity, as it was conceived and lived by the Founder and his first companions are expressed.

The Rule of 1967.

However, the source of the Spirit is channeled into practical settings. After three hundred years the letter became archaic. It was paralyzing the Spirit and making the entire Rule fall into desuetude.

It was in 1934 that a General Chapter recognized the desuetude of "several points" of the Rule. It recommended a revision which would be so conducted that it would be finished and presented to the General Chapter which would take place in 1946, right after the war. The revision was too timid, a truly futile attempt. On that point, the following Chapter, in 1956, called for a complete and substantial recasting.

The Rule which we present here in these lines is the fruit of the impulse given in 1956, but an impulse which was put in step with, and singularly amplified by, the orientations of Vatican II. (The Decree Perfectae Caritatis on the adaptation and renovation of the religious life, and the practical guidelines in "Ecclesiae sanctae" of 6 August 66).

In fact, the malady of ageing was general among Religious families. The Council called upon them to hold a special Chapter to revise their "Rules" or "Constitutions" and to bring them up to date, but still in accord with the Founder, with the mind of the Church and with the needs of the times. This revised Rule would be provisionary and would be submitted to experimentation before being evaluated, rewritten, and presented for the approval of the Holy See.

The 39th General Chapter established this provisionary Rule during the two sessions of 1966 and 1967.

The experimentation of the provisionary Rule went on until the Chapter of 1986. Moreover, its text will remain in force until the Holy See approves the one established in 1986. Still, since 1982, Brother Jose Pablo, Superior General, launched with all the Brothers the work of evaluation. These Brothers turned out several thousand of notes, which were then collected, classified, and synthesized in 1984. In 1985, a Committee for Revision worked together with the General Council and drew up a "REVISION OF THE RULE". It was sent out to the entire Institute at the end of 1985 and even to several of their friends, priests and laity, to find out what they thought about it.

The Rule of 1986.

★ The three contributions:

It was with the material gathered between 1984 and 1986 that the capitulants worked. As a result, the RULE of 1986 was the fruit of THREE CONTRIBUTIONS:

— The contribution of the "original" Rule of 1718;

— The contribution of the "experimental" Rule of 1967;

— The contribution of the experience accumulated between 1967 and 1986.

The contribution of the original Rule (1718)

The word "contribution" is weak in describing what the Rule of 1986 owes to that of 1718, which is in fact the Mother Rule: no one in fact, in translating the contents, can willingly dispose of the heritage of Saint De La Salle. The work required by the Council consisted of restating in today's language the original thought of the Founder, and, in his name and under his inspiration, taking the positions and making the decisions imposed upon us by the new circumstances in which we live.

Three attitudes

Regarding the text considered, the capitulants adopted three attitudes:

1. The Rule of 1718 contains a certain number of texts replete with inspiration. They bring out the finality of the Institute, its spirit, and the meaning of the Rule. The capitulants of 1986 preserved these almost integrally, as we shall see a bit further on, whether in adopting a direct quotation, or in expressing the thought in modern terms.

2. A second sector is composed of texts dealing with regulations, and it is there that one loved to find the breath of inspiration: community, consecration, and prayer. The capitulants of 1986 did not reproduce these texts. Still, they were inspired by the thoughts of the Founder expressed in places other than the Rule of 1718: they "Lasallianized" these chapters, if I be permitted this neologism.

3. Finally, the Rule of 1718 contained numerous regulations, calendars and time schedules for the schools, the prayer life of the Brothers, meals, daily life, as well as guidelines for politeness and personal conduct. All these referred to usages and customs of the Golden Century!

Three Procedures

The direct spiritual heritage from Saint De La Salle, gathered from his writings or from the examples of his life, is present in the Rule under three types of procedures:

1. Quotation:

★ The Rule begins by quoting two long and important passages from the original Rule:

Before even introducing the official text, the Rule presents the Chapter of 1718 on the spirit of faith and of zeal which ought to characterize the Institute. This passage does not form a part of the Rule: it is, as it were, the "umbilical cord" which affirms the filiation with the Mother-role of 1718.

★ After this integral passage, the Rule begins with an exergue, literally borrowing nine-tenths of the passage from the Rule of 1718. It makes the meaning of the Rule precise: to help those who practice it to live the love of God and neighbor.

★ More often, the quotation is shorter, inserted within the modern text. The procedure is frequent in the first chapter, and that is significant because this chapter defines the purposes and the spirit of the Institute: here, for example you have the spirit of the Institute (note the importance of the words within the quotation marks) Article 5: "The spirit of this Institute is a spirit of faith" which leads the Brothers "to look upon everything with the eyes of faith, to do everything in view of God and to attribute all to God".

2. The modern restatement of the text of 1718

This procedure is used for an essential article, one which defines the finality of the Brothers' Institute. One quickly perceives the reason for the solicitude over affiliation affirmed throughout the literary procedure: it indicates a fundamental aspect.

The Rule of 1718 said: "The end of this Institute is to give a Christian education to children; it is for this purpose the Brothers keep schools, that, having the children under their care from morning until evening, they may teach them to lead good lives, by instructing them in the mysteries of our holy religion and by inspiring them with Christian maxims, and thus give them a suitable education".

In 1986, as we shall see a bit further on, it was necessary to remain completely faithful to this finality: Christian education, all the while accepting a certain openness to the principal means: the school. The text attests to this double solicitude in its very literary form: "The end of this Institute is to promote a human and Christian education for the youth, especially the poor, according to the ministry which the church has entrusted to it... The Christian School, which has always to be given new vitality, is the preferred field for the activity of the Brothers. The Institute likewise explores other possibilities for teaching and education that may be more adapted to the needs of time and place".

3. Recourse to the totality of the Founder's thoughts

The Rule of 1986 did not limit itself to finding its wealth in the Rule of 1718: it was further inspired by the life and other writings of the Founder, either directly or by a clear reference. The solicitude over "lasallianizing" the Rule was ever present and this was manifested in two themes: first by the abundant references to the De La Salle heritage, secondly, by their "strategic importance".

It is thus that almost all of the Chapters open with an explicit reference to what the Founder has done or has said, situated in a strategic place: that of definitions. This is true, for example, in the first article, which summarizes the main historical features of the foundation. This is again true of the first article of Chapter two on the Institute's Mission.

The tenor and importance of the preliminary article can be verified in the same way: in Chapter 4, which deals with the Community, and in Chapter 6 on Formation, in Chapter 7 on the General Chapter, and in Chapter 10 on the Vitality of the Institute.

THE RULE OF THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS (2)

The Contribution of the Rule of 1967

The Rule of 1967 is then that provisionary text, established by the 39th General Chapter, following the resolution of the preceding Chapter of 1956, seconded and confirmed by Vatican Council II. Still, this Rule cannot be considered independently of the historical circumstances in view of which it came into existence: that of a crucial period which was going to witness the effects of a considerable diminution of the Institute.

The principal concern of the 1966 capitulants was not to produce new regulations, but to come to grips with the crisis which had already begun: it was in 1965 that a considerable diminution in the number of Brothers was first noted in the statistics. Now that the crisis has abated, we can readily see what was then only an intuition: the crisis dealt above all with the identity of the Brothers, but this was quite the same generally throughout the Church: where priests, men and women religious all faced similar difficulties: the shock of modernization. The styles of the consecrated life conceived in other cultural and social epochs had to face head-on the full brunt of the secularization of the modern world.

It was urgently necessary to respond and to undertake a renewal. The questions were fast and furious: what is the truly essential element of the Brother's vocation? Is he primarily a teacher or first and foremost a religious? Is he committed to a Mission or to Prayer? What is the worth of the school in the evangelization of youth? Should the schools not be abandoned in favor of more effective apostolates? Should the Brothers continue to live and work together or should they not, on the contrary, stress the individual apostolate after the manner of secular Institutes? Only armchair strategists would consider such questions idle and would offer such stereotyped responses as, "it was only a case of...". The crisis was sincere and profound. Those who underwent it are worthy of respect.

The "Declaration" and the "Rules and Constitutions"

The Chapter of 1966 would consecrate two sessions and a fruitful interim session to respond to these questions. With 20 years of experience, these responses remain entirely valid, even if the unfurling of years has seen the affirmation of other elements which we shall consider further on. These responses are found explicity stated in a document which serves as a ready reference: the "Declaration on the Brother of the Christian Schools in the World Today". They were taken up again and codified in the "Rules and Constitutions" published in 1967, "Ad experimentum", to be experimented.

Currents which intermingle

Before quickly reviewing the responses of the Chapter of 1967, we must underline several currents which intermingled in the "Declaration". We here cite without developing: the contribution coming from the Founder which people wished to express in modern terms; the contribution of Vatican Council II on the religious life, on the laity, on the Christian school; the contribution of biblical and theological renovations and their influence or how consecrated life beginning with the evangelical counsels should be conceived; personalist philosophy which places emphasis on the person; the contribution of the human sciences; and the realities of the characteristics of modern society.

The finality of the Institute and the identity of the Brother

The "Declaration" and the "Rules" are very rich in content, but the point of their contribution is manifest under two fundamental aspects: the finality of the Institute and the identity of the Brother.

— The finality of the Institute, as we have shown above, is both affirmed and enlarged in fidelity. But, above all, it is no longer referred immediately to the school, but to Christian education, of which the school remains the privileged instrument for the Brothers. That it should be a school put at the service of the poor is recalled with vigor by these texts.

— The identity of the Brother is defined in an exemplary fidelity to the Founder. The theoretical discussions gave place to a well thought out consideration of the history of the foundation: De La Salle constantly formed the Brothers in the entire life without any order of priority, a mission received from God, a life consecrated to God, a communitarian existence. Mission, consecration and community became recognized as the basic elements in the Brother's identity, which include the state of lay religious, service to the poor, and the preference for the school. All these elements are integrated into a living unity. There is unity without uniformity, for each practice accentuates one or other aspect, without detriment to the others. A contribution situated in the heart of the Rule of 1986.

This double contribution on the finality of the Institute and on the identity of the Brother is at the heart of the present Rule, to the point of controling its structure:

— Chapter one: the FINALITY and the spirit of the Institute.
— Chapter two: the MISSION of the Institute.
— Chapter Three: the CONSECRATED LIFE.
— Chapter Four: COMMUNITY LIFE.

The structure itself reproduces the elements recalled and fixed in the Chapter of 1967. This contribution nourishes the entire Rule and it appears everywhere in an explicit manner, as in this article 10: "Each Brother takes upon himself the responsibility for integrating within his own person these constitutive elements of his vocation; consecration to God as lay religious, apostolic ministry of education especially of the poor and community life".

Another evident trace of this "trinitarian" definition of our identity: each time that the Rule takes up one of these elements, mission, consecration, community, it does not fail to make a reference to each of the other two. This creates an impression of repetition, which has been noted by many people, still, it must run such a risk in order to affirm the constituent unity existing among these three basic elements.

1976: Evaluation and corrections

1. First important innovation of the Chapter of 1976: the Annual Community Plan. The capitulants considered the texts designed for the Community as a perfect model but a bit of a discouragement for those who had to live

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

with its daily difficulties. Consequently, they proposed that each Community of Brothers, not redesign a new Utopia, but decide together, at the beginning of each year, a practical program with concrete stipulations concerning their apostolic life, their prayer life, and their fraternal life in community. Subject to regular evaluation, this "Plan" would allow for the adjustment of ideals and performances. After the initial misgivings, this method showed itself to be one of the most effective means of renewal. The Rule of 1976 devoted a large section of Chapter 4 do it.

2. *Second corrective: the "communion" of the Institute.*Subsidiarity, which was adopted in 1966 as a principle of government bore fruit particularly in the field of the decentralization of responsibility. It ignored in a rather big manner the lines which should weave all the parts of this "little Church", which is our Institute, together. The 1976 Chapter reminded us that in the bosom of the Church of the People of God, the Institute of the Brothers ought to live the "communion" among its diverse parties. Further, so that this would not remain as a mere vague concept, it reorganized the General Council as a center for promoting this communion. The General Chapter of 1986 took up this spirituality and consigned it to the Rule in such a way that it nourishes all the passages on: the General Chapter, the Central Government, its composition and role, the Region, and the District, as found in chapters 7,8 and 9 of the 1986 Rule.

Currents affirmed from 1976 to 1986

Spiritual and apostolic currents already present before 1976 underwent a significant development after that date. Our Rule 1976 incorporates them. Let us cite:

1. Care for the Young Churches: The Rule reminds us that it is the entire Institute which ought to be concerned with the Young Churches and ought to share their resources and personnel with them (Ch. 2; art. 15).

2. Inculturation: inspired by Paul VI's famous "Evangelii nuntiandi", article 18 reminds the Brothers that "the entire culture ought to be evangelized".

3. Catechesis and evangelization: It is Chapter 2 which, in its abundant and a bit disorganized richness, gives an account of the interest, attention and experience of the Lasallian world with regard to proclaiming Jesus Christ to today's youth: the role of the school, of its planning, of its community of educators — complementary roles of the explicit proclamation of Jesus Christ and of evangelization — the problem of language adapted to the young... the total difficulties and approaches which the Brothers share with the local Churches, problems at the very center of the Brothers' exercise of their ministry and that of the laymen who work with them.

4. The extension of service to the poor: The Rule consecrates the evolution begun during the course of the decade in two directions: the extension of the service to the poor in the direction of the promotion of justice which invites educators to unite their efforts towards those who in the Church and in society are fighting against the roots of poverty, — extension of direct service to the poor, in complete fidelity to De La Salle. Chapter 2 on the Mission of the Institute, and part of Chapter 3, devoted to the vow of Association for the educational service of the poor express this double extension.

5. The "Lasallian Promotion" of the laity: another great evolution of the 76-86 decade. The sharing of apostolic tasks as well as of Lasallian spirituaity is vigorously affirmed by the Rule. Article 17 gives clear orientations for this collaboration. Also, article 116, after reminding us that the gift given to John Baptist De La Salle by the Spirit, is not limited to the benefit of the Brothers, discerns in the vigorous rise in the Lasallian laity, a grace which renew the Institute's own vitality.

A triple message

Live the Spirit of your Institute more deeply, pray more: the spirit of faith and of zeal, which is presented in the first chapter with regard to finality, is not in anyway less present throughout the length of the work, and it is particularly found in chapter 2 on the Mission of the Institute ((cf articles 11,20, and 21). Still, it is perhaps chapter 5 on the LIFE OF PRAYER which offers the most original contribution. The Rule defines the prayer of an educator. As a Minister of God, he is called upon to contemplate the designs of salvation at work in the world and particularly with regard to those confided to his care; he is invited also to communicate with the thoughts of God by the practice of mental prayer so that he might be able to share the word of God with others.

Look at your personal responsibilites. The Rule proposes to the Brothers a "personal plan of life" in order to invite them to enter more freely, vigorously, and consciously into the common plan of the Institute so that they may offer it what is best in themselves (Art 48 b).

Associate yourself in the name of the Lord: from 1691 until 1694, St. De La Salle together with a chosen group of Brothers pronounced the vows of association to establish the Institute for the service of the poor. Later, this vow was reduced to its "economic" aspects by the vow of "gratuity". The capitulants of 1986 deemed it opportune to re-establish it under its original form: "Vow of association for the educational service of the poor", pursuing in that way two principal motives. Firstly, to reaffirm the priority of service to the poor in connection with the obligations taken before God by the vows. Secondly, to invite the Brothers to re-enforce their unity in a world where everything calls for dispersion.

Conclusion: The Vitality of the Institute

Chapter 10, which concludes the rule, does so under an aura of hope in the future willed by God. It does not do so in a triumphal display to the illusory sound of the blare of trumpets. It does so in an atmosphere of faith: it is God who raised up John Baptist De La Salle, and the Brothers know that God will continue this same appeal. They see this in the proofs of the blossoming of new vocations, in the emergence of the Lasallian laity movement, and above all in the needs of youth who are waiting for educators: "This Institute is one of great necessity".

The Rule does not hide the necessity of formulating a worthy response to this appeal. The total vitality depends upon the quality of each individual response. Yet, it depends also upon the support afforded by the Founder and by the graces which he continues to draw down upon his sons.

It is thus upon this filial appeal to their Founder that the Brothers commit themselves to construct that future which the Will of God is tracing out for them, as it traced out the ways, along which, three centuries ago, St. De La Salle and his first disciples proceeded.

"Today, as in the past, he challenges the Brothers, not only as the one who established the Institute but as the Founder who continues to inspire and to sustain it". (Art. 119).

DO YOU HAPPEN TO KNOW BROTHER ARNOLD?...

The topic of Brother Scubilion appeared in Lasalliana N. 6. In four successive leaflets, Brother André Fermet aroused our interest in the knowledge of this remarkable "missionary" about whom he had just written an interesting biography.

Because I have just finished relating the life of another Brother of the Christian Schools who was also called "to be elevated to the honor of the altar", Brother Lauraire had asked me to invite the readers of Lasalliana to discover or to get to know Brother Arnold, my hero, better.[1]

In 1956, Mr. Georges Rigault had written a biography of this devoted disciple of Saint De La Salle under the title of A Lasallian Ascetic. The adjective was becoming popular and the noun was still in style. I must acknowledge — the author must be turning over in his grave that I afforded little attention to this work however conscientious and well written. Neither the austere title, nor what I in my youth had heard about Brother Arnold from a jupiterian superior who had known him, succeeded in inflaming my enthusiasm.

Also, when in the Autumn of 1982, the Brother Regional of France proposed that I write a new biography of the Servant of God, I asked him to give me some time to think about it. A more serene reading of Mr. Georges Rigault, made me decide to try my hand at it although without arousing in me any enthusiasm. However, when I had read through the four huge volumes of testimonies coming from the family of Brother Arnold, from his former confreres, students, and friends, his numerous correspondence, the resumes of his conferences, some personal notes taken from his unfortunate autos-de-fe, when I visited Landroff, the Lorraine village of his childhood, not in the winter as did Mr. Rigault of old, but on a radiant afternoon in the Spring, I began to weave more sympathetic threads binding me to this confrere who was 150 years my senior. We could understand each other all the better being that we both were unconditional admirers of De La Salle and that we had the formidable honor of working in the formation of candidates for the religious life at different epochs, it is true, but just as passionately! What human tenderness there was in this rough native of Lorraine, so austere towards himself, but so tender toward others!

And under a humility which was ever on guard, what richness of intelligence lived within this solid rustic! What serene patience, what courage in work! Within the "Lasallian" spirit, what attention to live in the present an ever new ideal!

Well, Lasalliana readers, follow the guide! I propose to you an itinerary in four stages:

1 - From 1838 to 1890.

2 - Brother Arnold, teacher, educator, catechist.

3 - Brother Arnold, director of novices and animator of spiritual retreats.

4 - Brother Arnold "in the shade of the Spirit".

From 1838 to 1890

Brother Arnold lived till the age of 52. He was born 10 September 1838 about 40 kilometres southeast of Metz. This same year, Brother Philippe was elected Superior General of the Brothers of the Christian Schools and would remain as such for 36 years.

Brother Arnold died 23 October 1890 in Rheims, at a time when the Brothers were establishing themselves in Columbia, when Branly was discovering the principle of the wireless, Adler was inventing the steam powered airplane, and Renan was writing The Future of Science.

During the interval in France, the Revolution of 1848 had brought Louis-Napoleon to power and he would become Emperor of the French four years later. The 1870 war with Prussia touched Arnold closer to home because it lead to the partition of Lorraine which Germanized the village of his birth. The first Vatican Council (1869-70) does not seem to have had much bearing on his religious life, not more than the apparitions at Lourdes in 1858, the death of the Curé of Ars the following year, the death of Pius IX and the election of Leon XIII in 1878. On the contrary, he followed the progress of anti-clericalism which, in 1880 led to the laicization of the public schools of the homeland of John Baptist De La Salle, beatified in 1888 and whose disciples realized at the end of the 19th century an astonishing flourish of missionary activity.

The life of Jules Reche — that was the secular name of Brother Arnold — was quite commonplace and even strange. Until the age of 24, all his experiences were rather matter-of-fact. The son of the shoemaker of the village, Jules was the eldest of five brothers and three sisters. He attended the school in Landroff but had to quit at the age of ten in order to work on a farm. He had to help his father feed the brood in the family nest which the depressed mother often abandoned to wander around the countryside. As a farmhand until the age of 20, he engaged in the agricultural activities which changed according to the season. Life was hard at that time in the villages which lacked all comforts, where everything was done with human strength helped by the harnessed horses and oxen: plowing, planting, harvesting of crops and picking of grapes, and cutting and hauling wood. Jules Reche, nevertheless, loved this work on the good Lorraine soil in contact with nature: he would remain conditioned by it for the rest of his days.

If he quit in 1858 to become a coachman for a middle-class family, it was only to earn more money to better support the needs of his poor family. For a few months he was a daily worker to avoid unemployment. He found work as the driver of a cart hauling materials during the reconstruction of the church of Charleville. He treated his four horses as friends and divided his free time among prayer, preparing young chimney sweepers for their first Holy Communion, and taking evening courses in the Brothers' school.

After a long time he believed that he heard the call of God to enter His service'. The example of the disciples of John Baptist De La Salle clarified this matter for him and on November 13, 1862 he entered the Noviciate at Thionville.

A year later, Brother Arnold began the second period of his existence: that of religious teacher. This period had two phases: 14 years as teacher in the boarding school of Saint Joseph in Rheims and 12 years in exercising the delicate mission of formator of future religious.

Contrary to all expectations, this man who had quit school at the age of 10 in order to become a farmhand, coachman, daily laborer, and cart driver and who entered the Novitiate without any other intellectual baggage beyond the good but distant primary education and some night courses, this lumbering country boy was going to become one of the best professors of a flourishing scholastic institution. In 1868 he successfully passed the test for the Elementary Teachers Diploma and in 1873 the Superior Teachers Certificate. He prepared candidates for the School of Arts and Trades of Châlons-sur-Marne and they passed successfully. As professor of agriculture, he maintained this section on the same high level as that established by his predecessor. His former students and his confreres unanimously recognized in him "great knowledge and total dedication. An "Incomparable catechist" also.

Then when in 1877 Brother Arnold was named Director of the Novitiate of Thillois, this choice sanctioned an authentic sanctity put at the service of the young with an astonishing pedagogical sense.

FOREWORD

Amid the usual variety of subjects presented in this Issue Number 12, I should particularly underscore three articles concerning Brother Arnold. The preceding number of the Lasalliana has already introduced you to the biography of this holy Brother. At that time we were awaiting his eventual beatification. Now, the date has been set for November 1, 1987. Hence, it is but natural that we should give a particular place to Brother Arnold in this issue.

Throughout the liturgical developments of the beatification, there are certain things to think about. On reading the biography written by Brother Charles Lapierre, I became interested in the knowledge which Brother Arnold had of Saint John Baptist De La Salle and of his devotion to the Holy Founder. This is an area which might give us food for thought.

Do you not agree that the activities and engagements proposed by the Lasalliana over the past four year were an effective transmission of the charism of evangelization and of the educational intuitions of Saint John Baptist De La Salle?

For the past four years...: actually, there are 240 distinct articles which were presented for your reading and some of these were able to be used as working tools in all kinds of encounters with Lasallian groups.

As this fourth year of publication draws to an end, the Brothers in Rome who do the work of researching, translating, editing, and publishing this periodical, express their sincere gratitude to all those who have shown their appreciation for this work by submitting articles and to those readers and subscribers who have remained faithful to the Lasalliana over the years.

RHEIMS MAY 1, 1687

In the parish register of the city of Rheims on this date, the signature of Brother Henry Lheureux appears. It can be read below a certification of death which is unfortunately too laconic. We present it here, based on a recent photograph (Cahiers Lasalliens 37, p. 40):

> "Jean Morice died on the first day of May, at the age of 17, or thereabout, a native of Chesne Le Pouilleux, and was buried in this cemetery. In faith of which, I, the pastor, have signed".

This signature, duly announced, however, is not found in that place.

Because it pertained to the register of Saint Etienne's Parish in Rheims, the said pastor would have been Simon Lhermitte, who was in charge of the parish from the year 1675 until May 30, 1695.

In the absence of the parish priest, Brother Henry Lheureux signed as witness. This signature is precious to us. It attests to the fact that on May 1, 1687, the Brother was in Rheims and was particularly qualified. He was more and better qualified, it seems, than any other member of the Lasallian community. This community was composed of three groups, sometimes mistaken by people on the outside, but clearly differentiated within the group: Brothers employed in teaching, novices in formation and the guests of the Seminary for the teachers for the rural region.

Contrary to what can be read in many other death notices, our text mentions neither the occupation nor the domicile of Jean Morice. It is most likely that he belonged to one of the three groups of the community, but which of the three?

Brother Maurice or Brother Jean Morice?

In his Life of De La Salle, Canon Blain mentions a young Brother Maurice who had died in Rheims at the same time and he portrays him as one of De La Salle's favorite disciples. Earlier, he gives the date of death as May 1, 1687; at another time he gives the dates as April 30, 1687. We can close our eyes on such minor discrepancies.

Yet, too quickly it seems, some people have identified the "Jean Morice" of this death notice with the "Brother Maurice" of the Founder's biography. This Brother Maurice Blain gives as being born in Rheims and dying in his twenty-second year, after a rather long illness and six months after refusing to return to his family. The doctor recommended such a move to assure his survival, if not the cure of his illness.

Doubtlessly it is known, that the parish registers of that period did not always exert great efforts at precision with regard to the age of the deceased whenever the place of birth was different from that of the death. Still, it is difficult, in the hypothesis of identifying the one deceased Brother with the other, how the register and the biography could differ on this point when they designate the place of birth in one place as in the city and in the other in a small borough some 40 or so miles away: Le-Chesne-Le-Pouilleux (or Le-Chesne-Pouilleux, or even more simply: Le-Chesne), which is in what is now the department of the Ardennes.

We also accept the fact of not being able to reconcile such discrepancies. Yet so many things remain certain in the first years of the Rheims community, which allow us to catch a glimpse of the quality of the first disciples of De La Salle.

Some deaths prior to that of Jean Morice

Of these young, and perhaps too young, disciples, we are told that a good number of them could not withstand for very long the exhausting demands of their apostolate and of the austere practices which they, perhaps too willing, embraced. Here, no more than elsewhere can be accept the great number given by Canon Blain. Still, the names and the facts which he quotes, he no doubt got from the mouths of the eldest among the Brothers and from one or other of those priests who shared the same lodging and perhaps the life-style of that small group of Lasallians in Rheims.

> "In seven or eight years, he writes, that is to say from 1681 until 1688 when De La Salle went to establish schools in Paris, of the fifteen first Brothers who were in the Institute from its birth in Rheims, Laon, Guise, and Rethel, more than six of them died a premature death, below the age of thirty, without counting those whom failing or ruined health had obliged to seek relief outside of the house".
> (Blain, I, p. 250)

From 1681 until 1688, the Institute lost more than six through premature deaths". More than six, but how many? Canon Blain presents us with only three; but he does so with a certain amount of detail and with evident care to edify us. However, his account here and there keeps a mark of truth, which makes us regret that the biographer did not take the means to let us know these other disciples of whom De La Salle would all too soon find himself deprived.

"Brother Jean-Francois was the first to blaze the way to heaven for the others". A native of Rheims, he had given up "a rather advantageous position which allowed him to live comfortably. What won him over to God and the new house was the good example of the Brothers. Touched by their piety, their fervor, and their patience, he understood that the one at their head was a great Servant of God and he conceived a holy desire to place himself under his guidance and to enter his house. He lived there only a short time, but the way in which he lived left his name in blessed memory". And when he comes to talk about the final illness of the Brothers, the Canon biographer multiplies the "I myself can say", "I would say that;" "I say these words", thus giving the impression of being an eye-witness which he certainly had not been.

Let us focus on these few lines which give precisely the year of death. "He did not have to live a long time, since he had already reached the goal which is usually reached only after a long life, namely, perfect charity. The control he had taken over his own soul made itself felt during the rude illness which in a few days led him to the tomb in 1684". (Blain, I, pp. 251-252).

"Brother Bourlette was the second in line among the martyrs of penance. It did not take long for excessive fervor to lead him to the grave. He was from Rheims, of a family which was honorable and rather comfortably situated financially. The outstanding virtues of De La Salle and his disciples brought about his vocation. The wish to walk along the narrow path which leads to paradise was the motive which attracted him to a place which he considered as the little gate which opens to heaven. He lived there as an angel, and he died there as a saint".

The biographer treats at length of the attempts which his parents repeatedly made to make the Brother return to his family home. Having been changed twice by De La Salle to a different place to avoid the determination of his Father, Brother Bourlette soon found himself alone in a small community, because his companion had fallen ill. He did wonders in taking care of everything, "having his right foot in one class, the left foot in another, his spirit with the sick Brother and his heart in heaven". The sick Brother recovered, but "a persistent and violent fever carried Brother Bourlette off in a few days, in the year 1686". (Blain, I, pp. 252-255).

"Brother Maurice, a native of Rheims, was the third of De La Salle's children who went to take his place in heaven". (What is given here is what has already been said above, and the account can be completed by reading Blain, I, pp. 255-257).

Can some useful rechecking be done on the accounts of the biographer through the citations taken from the parish registers? A careful reading of these registers have already provided us with some rather significant indications. (cf. Cahiers Lasalliens 37, pp. 27-28; 39-40).

Signed by the Pastor of the Saint-Symphorien parish, here is a notice of death and burial which could surprise us a bit.

> "In this parish, in the year 1682, the 14th day of the month of May, Christopher, a teacher of De La Salle's school in Rheims, died after having been strengthened by the sacraments of the Church and the next day his body was buried in the cemetery of the said Saint-Symphorien Parish. In faith of which, I have signed: H. Gonel" (after a photo, Cahiers Lasalliens 37, p. 37).
> It is in fact surprising that we cannot read here any other precise information concerning the place of birth, the presumed age of the deceased, not even a definite presentation of his name and surname, for Christopher could as well be his Christian name as his family name. Another surprise is that a death took place in De La Salle's own house during the year between June 24, 1681 and June 24 1682, that would be during the only year when the Saint lodged the teachers in his home before leaving the family home with them to take up new lodgings in the Rue Neuve in an apartment which would become the first community house of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.
> Our Christopher would have therefore died barely a month before this decisive transfer. Evidently we have no way of knowing whether or not he had already chosen to follow Monsieur De La Salle and the small group of his companions to begin the first Lasallian community with them.
>
> The registers of the years 1684 and 1685 contain two attestations countersigned by De La Salle himself. Here these are presented as they can be read from photographs: (Cahiers lasalliens 37, p. 39).
>
> "The 24th of this month (March, 1684) Cosme Boiserin, died at the age of 29, the son of (blanc), a native of Mans and he was buried the next day in the cemetery here where we brought him with the usual ceremony. In faith of which I, the parish priest, have signed: (s) S. Lhermitte; (s) De La Salle".
> "The twenty-sixth of this month (June, 1685) Jean Lozart, died at the age of 28, a native of Paris, the son of Lozart and of (blanc) and he was buried in the cemetery here. In faith of which I, the parish priest, have signed: (s) Rogier; (s) De La Salle".

In what capacity had De La Salle countersigned such testimonies? The accounts of the biographers (Blain and Bernard are the principal sources here) leave no doubt in the matter: in these two years, Father De La Salle was exercising in fact, if not by right, the position of superior of the little community of teachers, the teachers who already two or three years ago had started their lives as "Brothers of the Christian Schools". Yet, this was a community which had not yet any legal status in the city, nor in the diocese of Rheims.

Could Cosme Boiserin and Jean Lozart very well be considered as members of the entire community and could they be considered in the group of "more than six" young Brothers who had died before the Founder's departure for Paris in February, 1688? Let us say, in any case, that these two young men "under the age of thirty" appear as associates in one way or another of the person of the Founder and very probably also of the work for the poor children of Champagne.

One might want to go further and recognize in Cosme Boiserin the person of Brother Jean-François, which would be clearly impossible if confidence is placed in Blain who sets the birth of the Brother in Rheims and not in Sarthe, as the testimony of the parish register which sets it precisely in Mans.

We wish we could know much more about all of this: about those who succumbed to premature deaths, as well as of the initial years of the Rheims community, of those who were able to survive, and about the others who came to fill the gap around the Founder. Only some of these are known, these workers of the first hour: a Brother Henry Lheureux, whose exceptional role has already been mentioned; a Brother Gabriel Drolin, who entered in 1684 or there about (according to a Registry of Entries compiled much later); a Brother Jean Partois, called Brother Antoine, who came in 1686; a Brother Paris, called Brother Joseph, and a Brother Jean-Henry, of whom Canon Blain has kept a more precise memory and who came to join Father De La Salle in 1683 or a bit later (Blain II, pp. 69-76).

Both those who made only a fleeting appearance and also those who served the cause of De La Salle for a long time, were the pioneers who supported De La Salle, allowing him to take charge of the schools of Champagne and to build up the good reputation of these very schools in Rheims, Château Porcien, Rethel, Guise, and Laon. Often enough, they worked under difficult conditions; sometimes they added to his voluntary austerities which Blain is a bit too pleased to present as being the cause of several premature deaths.

DE LA SALLE, MORALIST

St. John Baptist De La Salle lived during what is generally accepted as the high point in French literary culture. This age was also a period in which France contributed significantly to the European philosophical climate.

Prominent among the many aspects of this culture scene of the Grand Siècle was a highly developed moralism: i.e. pre-occupation with right conduct (even if the criteria by which right was determined were not necessarily Christian, and even when its exponents did not always embody in their own lives the moral wisdom they taught...).

I recall here the names of the following outstanding religious figures whose lives in some part co-incided with the life-span of our Founder: Pascal 1623-62; Bossuet 1627-1704; Fénélon 1651-1715.

Descartes 1596-1650 dominated the philosophical scene, and, to a lesser extent, the now largely forgotten Malebranche 1635-1715 who applied the Cartesian system to theology.

More directly relevant here are the names of:

La Rochefoucauld 1613-80; his Maximes 1664; La Fontaine 1621-95; his Fables between 1668-1694; La Bruyère 1645-96; his Caractères 1688, 1696'

All these writers were noted and admired moralists, their works noted above were all published within the formative period of our Founder's life.

The moralism of De La Salle's writings:

There is good internal evidence for considering St. John Baptist De La Salle as a moralist or, at least, to show that a preoccupation with the moral aspect of conduct is a characteristic of his mentality. In his writings designed and addressed almost exclusively to his Brothers, this moral preoccupation shows itself in his concentration upon religious life lived out consistently with its basic principles.

It would be a subject for literary study to show e.g. from his Meditations how our Saint sometimes reads very much like one or other of the great contemporary moralists noted earlier. E.g. in his Meditation No. 73 (Battersby's edition, 1953): "We Must Not Expect God To Work Miracles Just To Please Us", especially point 2; again, No. 76: "There Are In Religious Communities Many Who, Although They Have Left The World, Have Not Lost Its Spirit", point 2; and earlier, No. 15: "Of The Three Classes Of Religious Who Obey Without Having The Merit Of Blind Obedience", point 1

My thesis is that in those of his writings designed especially for the Brothers considered as religious, our Founder's principal preoccupations and inspiration are those of a (Christian) moralist for whom the primary and essential notions for consideration are good and evil conduct and moral values, sin and grace, spiritual progress and spiritual perfection.

The Collection especially:

Let me illustrate my view simply from the Collection, using Brother Clair Battersby's edition (1965 printing).

In the Preface we read:

"It is of the utmost importance in a community that the Superiors endeavour, in all things, and with all possible vigilance, to foster the exact observance of such things as are essential and best calculated to preserve the distinctive spirit, while preventing laxity from creeping in" P. 65.

Then there is a consideration of "The Obligation of the Vows" "The vows oblige the Brothers to work together in the Society... They cannot leave the Society... without violating the vows and committing a mortal sin and a sacrilege" P. 69.

What is meant essentially to characterise the Brothers of the Institute is the spirit of faith; hence the "Explanation of the Spirit of our Institute"; here, significantly as illustrating De La Salle's own mentality, faith, which is an intellectual virtue, is discussed exclusively in terms of how it motivates and actuates conduct.

"The true Christian is such because he is guided by, and his actions are performed with, views and motives of faith" P. 93. And again: "The Brothers shall always have in mind the orders and will of God... by which they shall be careful to regulate their conduct" P. 94.

While Holy Scripture is presented as affording the spiritual sustenance for animating a life of lived faith, our Founder has made what is perhaps one of his more personal contributions to spirituality by providing an arsenal of scriptural texts accommodated to many specific occasions in the Brother's daily life. It will be noted that this accommodation is nearly always in a moralistic sense.

This same moral pre-occupation is seen even more particularly in various Directories and schemas for self-examination which constitute so large a part of the Collection.

This same preoccupation goes through the rest of the Collection: e.g. under the heading "Means of Performing Our Actions Well", we are told that "if we wish to perform our actions well, with the perfection that God requires of us, we should be particularly careful not to perform any of them thoughtlessly or with precipitation" P. 114; and following on this, several specific situations of the Brother's day are envisaged and prescribed for.

Similarly, under the heading of "Principal Virtues", we read concerning "Faith": "Let your first care be to act by faith and not by caprice, inclination or whim" P. 124.

Even the vagaries of the wandering mind are to be countered: "Be careful never to apply your mind to anything through mere curiosity, or to aim solely at intellectual gratification, but apply it only to those things which befit your profession" P. 127.

Then and now: Reconciliation or Rejection?

It is true that some of the detailed moral prescriptions and programmes enshrined in the Collection had lapsed before any one now living as a Brother can remember: e.g. "Directions for Giving an Account of

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

One's Conscience" PP. 79-82; others had never been effectively operative: e.g. "Directory on which each Brother should give an Account of his Conduct" Cahier Lasallien 15, 1963 PP. 122-29; or the "Directory which Brothers should Follow when Travelling" same PP. 130-32.

On the other hand, it is remarkable how vigorous some other presciptions remained among us, at least in some parts of the world, until the early 1960's; and how deeply they had influenced our lives: e.g. "Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer" Battersby PP. 72-77; and the "Passages of Scripture which may Help the Brothers to Perform their Actions through a Spirit of Faith" PP. 101-106. These were the more influential because many of us had learnt them by heart during our novitiate days.

The strength of this outlook:

The spirituality of the Collection (as also of the Meditations for Sunday and Feasts) was a great source of our inspiration and strength and that, even if some of its prescriptions seem excessively moralistic, the general doctrine was sound.

Yet, now there seems to be presumption that not only are the detailed and moralistic prescriptions obviously out-moded, but more; that the general spirituality of which such prescriptions are at the worst merely an exaggeratedly emphatic utterance, is completely abrogated.

I put the question: how, in view of the insistence Vatican II places on the charism of the Founder, can any wholesale abandonment of a major part of St. De La Salle's spiritual legacy be regarded as valid and legitimate?

If distinction is to be made between rejection (or, at least, effective consignment to oblivion) and literal acceptance and observance, on what principles will such distinction be made?

Proposed solution:

If the Founder's charism is valid, then his express spiritual teaching may be presumed to be valid. Vatican 11 reminds us: "Therefore let their Founder's spirit and the special aims as well as their sound traditions — all of which make up the patrimony of each institute — be faithfully held in honour" Perfectae Caritatis art. 2b.

De La Salle clearly intended his Brothers to be religious. In the Collection (as in the Rule and the Meditations) there is a detailed working out of that basic intention. Such a programme is surely mandatory upon us, demanding at least our serious consideration, both as communities and as individuals.

Religious institutes — so it seems to me from the history of the past two decades — are not — immune from the danger of "revisionism" i.e. of re-reading and re-writing their history in the light of currently acceptable ideologies.

The authority of Chapters and of Superiors to interpret the mind of the Founder derives from their essential conformity to that mind; and it could be that sometimes this conformity may have to be demonstrated rather than simply presumed.

The relevance of this consideration of St. De La Salle as a moralist is that it may help us more readily to appreciate the special nature of our vocation as teaching religious or, if you wish, as religious educators.

If it should happen that the ascetical doctrine of our Founder as we find it in the Collection, seems to run counter to much of what is currently promoted as "spirituality", this might be seen a further indication of its validity' "The pursuit of perfection to which institutes devote themselves cannot consist only in certain adaptations to be carried out in relation to the changing circumstances of the world; they must instead assist the fruitful re-discovery of the means essential for leading a life completely permeated with love of God and man" Paul V1 Evangelica Testificatio 1970 art. 37.

And again, "Fidelity in the exigencies of certain fundamental options is the touchstone of authenticity in religious life" art. 12. emphasis added.

"... it must be possible to pass from external activity to the demand of the common life, taking care to ensure full effectiveness to the elements of the strictly religious life" art. 26 emphasis added.

The same insistent recall of basic essential practices may be found in the more recent Roman document: Essential Elements of the Religious life (1983), especially in articles 20 and 21.

"The local community, as the place where religious life is primarily lived, has to be organized in a way which makes religious values clear"; and there follow specific directives which embrace the ordinary recurring circumstances of such life on a daily, weekly and annual cycle".

Conclusion:

I consider that the presentation of the thought of St. John Baptist De La Salle over the past two decades has been to some degree distorted; the contemporary presentation is as much subject to bias of current assumptions as that of the eighteenth and nineteenth century interpreters of his thought, who have been severely criticised because they have read their own thought and values into the minds of the Founder. Physician heal thyself!

In particular, what seems to me to have been neglected is the strong moral/ascetical element of our Founder's views on religious life. This, naturally enough, does not come through so strongly in the Meditations for the Time of Retreat (because of their concentration on the school apostolate). What compounds the problem is these Retreat Meditations have been for some years now treated as though they constituted a canon within the canon of our Founder's writings.

To restore a balance it would be helpful to view exactly those elements of his thought which are least congenial to contemporary assumption; many of which are to be found especially in the Collection which was expressly designed by our holy Founder to be a kind of handbook - enchiridion - of spirituality - for his Brothers.

PARENTS IN THE MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS

If we want to read the Founder with today's eyes and judge him by present day standards then we must look at him in the historical context in which he lived, comparing his actuations within the situations which surrounded him. Likewise, in his writings, he paints a picture which is in no way flattering to the parents who fulfilled the role as educators of their children.

He states time and again and categorically that "among the duties incumbent on parents, one of the most grave is to educate their children in a Christian manner and to impart religious instruction to them". And in another place: "It is the duty of parents to feed, clothe, and educate their children, according to their means; to see to it that they learn a trade, or at least, find for them some suitable employment".

But it must be recognized with realism and sorrow that "the majority of parents do not possess a due knowledge of their religion" ...because they must leave the house, preoccupied with business concerns and the upkeep of their family".

A consequence of this inability and abandonment, "these poor children over several years become so accustomed to being raised in a life of idlenes, that it is with great difficulty that they can be trained to work. Besides, since they associate with bad companions, they learn to do a lot of bad things, so that later on it is very difficult for them to correct themselves because the vices and habits which have been contracted over a long period of time have become ingrained".

Based on this, La Salle time and time again urges his sons who are called upon to "substitute" for the parents, "You should look upon the children whom you are called upon to instruct as poor abandoned orphans, for although most of them have a father alive, they are as if they had not, being abandoned to themselves as far as the salvation of their souls is concerned".

This surrogation should be the exception while the children are within the school confines. A more effective and lasting solution must be found. Which remedy? To associate the parents in the education of their children. What this attained? If we compare the involvement which the parents had in the "Little Schools" with that which they had in Christian Schools, we would say, "yes". Proofs of this follow.

Answerable for their children

The father, the mother, or in their absence, a guardian were those who were to present the pupils to be admitted to the Christian school' The list of questions which they were to answer in filling out the admission form was as extensive as it was complicated: name and profession of the parents or guardia, personal data of the pupil, previous school. If then pupil were an eldest child, they were asked, "what do you want him to become, what trade would you want him to learn, in how much time, how was he in reading and writing".

We notice, in passing how the professional orientation of the pupils interested La Salle and that he wanted it to be shared between the parents and the school.

After receiving the admissions information, which included questions relative to the present and past state of health of the child, the Director or Inspector, responsible for the child's admission, explained to the parents the conditions sine qua non on the part of the parents for the admission and retention of their child in the Lasallian school. It will be sufficient here to simply enumerate some of them to get an idea of the vast field in which the parents had to cooperate with the school and vice-versa:

— that their childen always be prompt in coming to school and that they never be absent without permission;

— they see to it that their children are present for the catechism lesson each Sunday and Holyday;

— they have the children eat their breakfast and snack in school so that they can learn to eat in a Christian and polite manner.

— that the parents do not listen to the complaints which the children bring against the teacher, without speaking to the latter in the absence of their children;

— that their sons' clothes be clean and their appearance neat...

When the pupils applying for admission come from another school, the parents must give the admitting officer precise information concerning the reason for seeking a change. If they simply answer, "we just want to change", the parents should be informed that "this is enormously prejudicial to their children", and if they should leave school, they will not be admitted again.

If the change is due to a correction given to the pupil, the parents should be exhorted that they should be cautious about accepting complaints against the teacher... and they should be pleased that their child be corrected if he deserves to be so. The boy should be admitted only if the parents agree to this cooperation between themselves and the school in the future.

In readmitting pupils coming from another school run by the Brothers, the greatest prudence should be exercised, above all, if they left the school motu proprio or through the naive over credulity of the parents. In such a case, they should be made to wait sometime for a reply to their request, not so much to disregard them, but so that they would appreciate the favor being granted them even more.

Dismissal from school has always constituted the maximum punishment that can be imposed upon a pupil. Aware of this, the author of the "Management", after enumerating some reasons for dismissal, gives some reasons for trying to save the guilty one. If these do not get results, "before dismissing the pupils... the inspector will speak with the parents a few times".

For great ills, great remedies

To understand the pages of the "Management", we have to put ourselves within the atmosphere of the "Little Schools" of the Seventeenth Century. Therein,

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

the idea of study was far from being the first concern in the scale of values of the clientele, be they parents, pupils, or teachers.

Faced with this neglect, the "Management" raises a menacing voice, even to the extent of an entire chapter aimed at absence from class. Absences were furthered and multiplied not only because of the weakness and thoughtlessness of the pupils, but also through the negligence, if not the complicity, of the parents. I shall singularly refer to the conduct of the latter.

The clarity and exactness of the texts require no comment:

> The fifth principal reason for the absence of pupils is due to their parents, either because they neglect to send them to school, not taking much trouble to make them come or be assiduous — which is quite ordinary among the poor — or because they themselves are indifferent to school, persuading themselves that their children learn very little or nothing there.

Further on, we read of the practical means of remedying this by dialogue with the parents in each one of these cases, for example, making them understand how important it is for their children to learn to read and write, because no matter how little intelligent they may be, knowing how to read and write makes them capable of doing anything.

The references would be interminable, so let the following suffice for all.

> If the parents have contributed to the absence of their son, the one in charge of receiving excuses (these must always be presented by the parents, except in the case of illness) will speak to them forcefully so that his words will make an impression on them and he will not excuse them very readily.
> In addition to this, he will give them some sound recommendation on how to avoid the absence of their children. If the child has been absent because of the fault of the parents, he will point out the harm that such absence is causing the child.. warning them also that if the child continues to absent himself for a similar reason, he will not be re-admitted.

Each must do his part

The great number of pages that the "Management" devotes to the correction of pupils, considered "as one of the most responsible duties fulfilled in the school", testifies to the psychological purpose and the pratical intention of De La Salle. Let us see if this is true or not.

It can happen the teacher receives some negative treatment by the parents. There is a natural impulse in that case to take it out on their son. La Salle reminds his disciples that "no punishment should ever be given because of that".

In applying correction, the teacher must adjust himself to the type of training the pupil receives in the home, where "there are parents who educate their children with excessive softness, who grant them whatever the ask for, never contradicting them nor correcting their errors; they claim they act in that way lest they cause them pain". The manner in which such children are treated must be different from that used with pupils "whose parents are absolutely not concerned with their comportment, letting them do whatsoever they wish from morning until night; they neither obey nor respect their parents; they speak poorly of them... they do this less out of malice than out of the neglect in which they live".

The family and school without mutually disclaiming responsibility, must work together so that the correction would produce the desired effects for those who apply it as for those who receive it or witness it.

Atmosphere of dialogue

Flight from the world was on the rise in the seventeenth century; consequently, La Salle took every means to see to it that his sons maintained as much distance from it as possible: that explains the directives found in the Rule, in the Collection, and in his correspondence. Notwithstanding this, the "Management" as can been seen by what has already been stated and what follows, supposes a frequent and direct contact with the parents of the students.

It was the job of the inspector of schools to see to it that the teachers were not interrupted in class by visits; the most that could be tolerated is that they speak with the parents of their pupils when they accompany their children to class.

The existence and effectiveness of these interviews were without doubt intended to examine the contents of the personal information which each pupil had to give the teacher at the end of the course. How could the teachers keep an adequate record of parents' reactions: "if the child is not pampered by his parents; if the parents do not want the child to be corrected in class; if they are parents of pupils who are always complaining..." without this communication and direct contact with the parents?

On the information sheet of eight-year old Francois Terieux, who had been in school for two years, we read among other things, "is loved by his parents who do not want him to be corrected".

On the contrary, the personal file of Lambert du Long, twelve years of age and in his fourth year of studies verifies that "his parents would not take it amiss if he were corrected".

Other useful items of information concerning Lasallian students could have been gotten only through dialogue with the parents. Think about this bit of information, for example... "if he sleeps alone, and if not, with whom, father, mother, brothers".

Conclusion

If we should compare the FAMILY-SCHOOL relationship of our first Brothers with that of the school where I began teaching, the former have the definite advantage. What has happened to the directives of the Management?

ADULT EDUCATION IN MARIE-VICTORIN COLLEGE, MONTREAL

Marie-Victorin College has more than 6,000 students and more than 4,000 of these are in Adult Education. In this school we offer post-secondary education which is equal to the first cycle of university education. The students proceeding to the university follow the general program of instruction and those who are preparing for some particular employment follow professional programs of instruction. Marie-Victorin College is named after one of our confreres, Brother Marie-Victorin, who was a famous botanist in Quebec.

The college belongs to nine provinces of religious teaching Brothers and the Brothers Provincials of each of these make up the Administrative Council. Yet, after twenty years of its existence marked by a rapid evolution and the introduction of numerous programs, the institution can count only about a dozen religious among its personnel. However, the original purpose of the college, which was the training of teachers, has so left its mark that the social orientation of programs has been maintained. Thus, the college continues to train men and women technicians in specialized education, in social assistance, child care, specialized religious activities and the free care of the aged.

Adult education has always existed in the province of Quebec, but what is surprising nowadays is the adult population which has invaded the colleges and universities for full-time studies. It is true that a number of governmental programs encourage this movement by subsidies paid to the institutions and even by giving salaries to individuals, particularly those affected by unemployment. The efforts of the state in this regard are even more pronounced on the level of secondary studies. Parallel to this effort of permitting adults, to a certain extent, to satisfy the needs of the present economic movement, the State is trying to keep the phenomenon of illiteracy in check. Out of six million (6,000,000) people, more than six hundred thousand (600,000) persons cannot read and write in an elementary manner.

Adult instruction has been developed with programs on the post-secondary level. The types of instruction have so quickly multiplied that soon it went beyond the confines of the Marie-Victorin Campus.

At present, 75% of its adult clientele receives its instruction outside of the main campus in more than fifty (50) different sites located in general in the metropolitan region of Montreal.

The programs provided which correspond most closely to the orientations of the college are those in our Center for specialized pastoral activities. There, both men and women are trained as technicians of pastoral communication. Specifically, that means teachers of parish catechism, people for carrying out religious activities in the schools, and catechetics for maladjusted children. This year we have more than 1000 adults in these programs. We work together with organizations in charge of teaching the faith in six (6) different dioceses. It should be noted here that in Quebec, religious or moral instruction is in the program for primary instruction, but preparation for the reception of the sacraments and religious practices is in the hands of the parishes or the parents. It is there that the bishops have decided to train numerous lay catechists.

We also have a gerontology Center which has been in existence for ten years already. During the initial years, those trained there were adults who, for the most part, were already working in institutions caring for the elderly. Then a program of active retirement was inaugurated intended for persons on the point of retiring, which has already been taken by twenty times as many people as expected. This intended one-year program was such a success that many adults who followed it have asked for a second or third year to allow them to obtain their college degree. It was from within this same group that we were requested to train volunteer workers who wished to devote themselves to working in institutions for the elderly and in hospitals. This year the gerontology Center has more than one thousand (1,000) adult students.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The college offers to adults other programs which can be found also in other similar institutions. We train particularly men and women technicians in social work, in specialized education, child care, and techniques in clothes making. Of course, we also provide what is called general education. That is where Marie-Victorin College has distinguished itself in the way it carried on its instruction. Thus the flexible time schedules, the venue and the manner of instruction allow the adults, both men and women, to receive their courses locally, during the daytime as well as at night, and even during intensive weekend courses.

To this we might add, that several of these programs cited previously are given also in the English language. From this was born an entire English-speaking section which at present counts more than seven hundred (700) students. What is more, our institution provides instruction at the college level in English as well as in French to the state prisons of Quebec.

To the longer programs, training courses have been added especially with regard to economics. We have training programs in management and administration in connection with the Chamber of Commerce and a training center for professional salesman. We also offer a course in collaboration with the biggest French daily in Quebec, La Presse, through two weekly publications during each of the autumn and winter sessions.

Adult education is ever taking on more numerous and varied forms. The fact of not being linked to traditional places of an institution but of giving courses at various times and places allows for meeting the needs of various people and organizations. This is a type of popular education which is different from that intended for youth. We must add that the North American youths are very well taken care of educationally at least as far as the material resources and personnel resources put at their disposal. But the adults who have not had the possibilities of enjoying the same advantages or who further have been short changed by an economic world in development very much appreciate an education which is at their disposal and they are highly motivated in benefiting by it.

A well established institution, with good teachers and a bit of imagination in setting up adapted programs is all that is needed to pursue our objectives of popular education.

THE LA SALLE INTEGRAL FORMATION CENTER OF TIJUANA (1)

(Districts of San-Francisco and Mexico-North)

From 1978 until January 25 of 1982, the Brothers were given the task of discovering the most urgent needs of this city and they decided upon a Pastoral Center.

Tijuana, founded in 1889

This is the most visited frontier town in the world: 40 million tourists come here annually. It is the common home of more than a million and a half persons from different points of the Republic, and of foreigners, emigrants and immigrants. They belong to different social economic levels and to different cultures and religions.

Eighty percent of these people are less than 30 years of age and they study and work, battling for survival. They are confronted by such problems as broken homes, the lack of proper living conditions and conveniences, low economic conditions, and religious confusion.

As a result of the above mentioned conditions, there is frustration, bitterness, despair, and irresponsibility, thus creating the need for leaders who can, free of charge, stir up conviviality for the success of the common good and to give a meaning to their Catholic Faith.

The Brothers, well aware of this situation, designed the:

"GOALS OF THE CENTER".

These have been continually refined from 1982 until in 1986 they are the following:

To evangelize and form in the Lasallian Spirit, lay leaders, preferably those the least well off, so that from their parishes they can work together for the promotion of Christian Life in society, in response to Medellín and Puebla, as well as to Vatican II.

To achieve this objective, they have gone on seeking ways of giving basic courses which answer needs in four areas: Church, Leadership, Culture and Academics. They started off which seven courses and by 1985 it had risen to 70.

With the commitment of both Districts (San Francisco, Mexico-North), each year, each district has been sending 2 Brothers to evaluate the work. Until 1986 there have been 5 evaluations, each of three day's duration, a marvelous effort and intelligent support on the part of both Provinces.

From August 1985 until March 1986, a change was made in the work to integrate those areas within the program which were seen to be most urgent. Thus, three areas were decided upon:

1) Guidance of Catechetics for adolescents and youths,

2) Guidance of youth groups,

3) Guidance of Pre-Marital and Marital groups.

Each program consists of a basic area, a specific area, and a general area and hours of service.

We brothers are aware that this new project must be presented in such a way that the poor will be the principal option. Because of this, requisites should not close the door on anyone, but all should be allowed to join and to follow the program slowly and according to his own place until he achieves a level which will allow him to serve his community with more efficiency. We realize that not all are of leadership timber but they are all people seeking a better way of living.

What kind of students (whom we call promoters) have we?

From January 1982 until March 24, 1986, more than 2,000 people 14 years of age or older have finished a minimum period of 10 weeks of studies, with classes held twice a week.

Although these people come from all levels of society, preference is given to the more simple people, most of whom come to the center because of natural attraction or friendship rather than being sent by the parish priests.

Courses of ten weeks' duration are given four times a year, from January to March, April to June, July to August, and September to November. The reason for such a schedule is that the people who come to the Center are either working people or students; they are people seeking personal upliftment and a type of Christianity for service towards others, but they cannot count on much free time.

During the ten-week periods in 1984, 1985, and 1986, we had an average of 550 people per session. Many of them have been studying since 1982 and there are some who work in their own parish. Others do not finish the course because of the mobility of their work, studies, or living conditions. Many of them return to their place of origin or to the United States and others just lack proper study habits.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

"Mystique of the work"

1) The evangelical itinerary of Saint John Baptist De La Salle.

"I believe that this must have been the reason that God, who disposes all things according to wisdom and gentleness, and who is not wont to force the inclinations of men, was leading me to concern myself with the schools. He did this over a long period of time and in an imperceptible way. He worked in such a way that one commitment led me to another, without my having foreseen the final outcome from the very beginning".

2) The La Salle Center of Integral Formation, wishes to live the LIBERATING EDUCATION of Medellín, 1968:

— A Systematic Education which all the while contributes to the creation of a certain popular culture and to increasing the desire for change.

— Education which produces agents for transforming the community.

3) The La Salle Center of Integral Formation wishes to live the LIBERATING EDUCATION of Puebla, 1979:

— To humanize and personalize, that is, Personalized Education.

— To exercise the critical function proper to education, which allows for the creation of a new truly participative and fraternal society, that is, Education for Justice.

— To convert the student in question, not only for his own personal development, but also for the service and development of the community, that is, Education for Service.

— To produce agents of change with the strength of the Gospel by means of civic, moral, religious, and political values inspired by the social teachings of the Church, that is, Evangelical Education.

4) The La Salle Center of Integral Formation, faithful to its Founder, Saint John Baptist De La Salle, wished to live Popular Education:

— Human development implies activities which help to awaken the consciences of men in all their dimensions and to esteem themselves as capable of becoming protagonists of their own human and Christian development.

— To educate people to live together, to give an impulse to their organizations, to arouse the well being of the Christian community, and to help people toward effective participation.

— To give priority to living together, to give a new impulse to the numerous poor sectors of our population who are both materially and culturally deprived; orienting them preferably in accord with the bishop of the place, and toward the services and educational resources of the Church.

— Likewise, the education of leaders and agents of change with the strength of the Gospel is a priority.

Gratuity

The thoughts of Saint John Baptist De La Salle on this point.

1) The prime motive for gratuity is that the children of the poor might be served. Its basis is the Gratuitious Salvific Love of God towards all of us.

2) The second motive is educational service guaranteed by the Brother which in this way appears as an expression of the mystery of the Saving God, active today in the lives of people.

3) "Thank God because in His Goodness He makes use of you to procure such great benefits for children. You must be faithful and exact in doing this without receiving any salary whatsoever, so that you may say with Saint Paul: 'It is my great consolation to announce the Gospel without charge, so that it will not cost those who hear it anything'". (Med. 194.1).

4) Abandonment to Providence is founded on these words of Jesus Christ in the Gospel: "Do not be overly concerned about what you will eat or what you will drink or about the other necessities of life, for you must exclusively and before all other things, seek the kingdom of God and all the rest will be added unto you". (Med. 153,3 and Med. 134, 1).

5) We should like to finish with these words of Saint John Baptist De La Salle: "To serve gratuitiously to announce the Gospel, is then, to imitate God and to participate, in virtue of the gratuitous gift of His mission, in His free and efficacious love for all men". (Med. 201.3).

THE LA SALLE INTEGRAL FORMATION CENTER OF TIJUANA (2)

As of now, the Center has been a success:

— In forming lay leaders who help in their parishes, and even directly in the Pastoral Council of some of these parishes.

— In the integration of small bible groups.

— In preparing various Promoters who contribute their services in Institutions for the Poor and for Orphans.

— In providing Catechists serving both adults and adolescents in their parishes.

— In setting up youth groups in the parishes, achieving a large participation in the Youth Paschal Activities and movements in the Church, thus strengthening the Apostolate of Youth in the Diocese.

— A miniature La Salle is located in the Independencia Colony through promoters who have been trained in this institution.

— In helping solve the great concern of the Church, by the training of lay people who are sensitive towards their brother in need.

— Since the arrival of the Brothers, four schools have been set up for the training of the laity: A School of Theology, A Catechetical School for Children, A Pastoral Social School, and a Biblical School.

— A great number of persons have found a greater sense of self-identity.

— Better preparation among couple engaged to be married and a commitment of helping in their communities.

— Greater integration among Catholic families.

— Sacerdotal vocations (8) and religious vocations (8).

— Brothers who live their religious life with more fervour.

For the Brothers it is:

— spiritual growth in view of the gift of our work.

— Living more freely, without feeling like being parts in a machine.

— Something that cannot be qualified.

— The Christian life is better lived.

— The people induce us to live our consecration with more integrity, seeing the way they (the poor) live the Gospel.

— We believe that this leads us to live what the Institute wants us to live and as it was in its origins.

— "God will provide" is lived among us, the Holy Spirit is the One giving us light and the One Who teaches through us.

— One lives without being concerned about power or riches.

— We feel that the moving power in our work is the Gospel as our first rule.

— We must keep adjusting our life of Faith with our life of zeal, so that there would be no dichotomy, but rather a unity.

— We are invited to get to know our promoters in their barrios, homes, and camps much better.

— We have increased the love for the Most Holy Virgin Mary, Saint Joseph, and our Holy Founder.

— Gratuity makes us look upon people with greater respect.

— An atmosphere of brotherhood and equality exists among us.

— We are amazed by the gratuity of all the Animators who freely give of their time and rarely fail.

— The Foundation consisting of married couples, where many of them contribute their time as animators and seek to maintain the gratuity of the Center.

For the future:

— To detect who are the leaders among the promoters.

— To prepare those who are willing for ecclesial service in their parishes, following some program with a definite Curriculum.

— To create a plan to achieve the Church's presence among the most poor, the sick, abandoned youths, immigrants, migrants, and factory workers in a complementary area.

— To experiment with apostolic work in a "Pilot Parish".

— To create new Centers in the Diocese.

— To form leaders for the ecclesial base community.

That is La Salle very much alive in Tijuana today, 1986!

RADIO SAN GABRIEL AND THE AYMARA PEOPLE (La Paz, Bolivia)

Introduction:

In October of last year, the XV Interamerican Congress of Catholic Education was held in Buenos Aires under the theme of "Educating People according to their cultural heritage". The organizers, realizing that this theme was the same as the operational policies of Radio San Gabriel, invited it to participate. The article which follows is nothing more than a synthesis of what was presented there and which was so very well received.

We shall try to present it here in two parts:

1. The geographic and historical features of the Aymara people.

2. The cultural traits of the Aymara people and Radio San Gabriel's educational response.

Geographical features

About 2,000,000 Aymaras are distributed along the eastern and southern shores of the Great Titicaca Lake. More than half of them are in Peru and the rest in Bolivia. Some 30,000 inhabit even the heights of the Andes in Chile. Their base is the great plateau of Altipiano, whose height oscillates between 3,800 and 4,000 meters above sea level. On its eastern side it is adorned by the very beautiful Cordillera Real of the Andes with peaks up to 7,000 meters in elevation.

The zone which the Aymaras inhabit is cold and dry, with very cold weather in the winter and strong winds in August. Its five months of intense rains are followed by blue skies the rest of the year. The land is dry and without rivers but there is an abundance of water below the ground.

On its slopes, sheep, llamas and vicunas graze; in some places there are good herds of cattle.

The farmers grow potatoes as their principal crop and quinine as an additional product. Barley and beans also grow here and small hot-houses for vegetables have been springing up.

The Aymara dry and freeze meat (charki) to conserve it as they also do with potatoes (chuño).

They make their own clothes from the wool of sheep, llamas, and alpaca.

They are a self-subsisting people with neither technology nor industrial production.

Historical features

The history of the Aymara people is lost on the horizons of time. They talk about different original groups, one of which — the most important — is that of the TIAWANAKU, whose splendor dates back to the eleventh century and whose archeological remains are admired by tourists today.

In the thirteenth century they suffered a conquest by the Quechua Empire of the Incas and the region took on the name of Qollasuyo (qolliris). In the Sixteenth century the Spanish arrived and since the nineteenth century (1825) they have lived under the rule of an independent republic.

They themselves say that "they have experienced living under submission, subjugation, and exploitation, but that they have never been truly conquered". It seems that out of the mouth of each one who dies can be heard the voice of one of the oldest representatives of the Aymara Rebellion, TUPAK KATARI (1781): "I die, but tomorrow I shall return changed into thousands and thousands".

Now they already have nascent political parties: "The Tupak Katari Revolutionary Movement" (MRTK) and the "Movement of Indigenous Tupak Katari" (MITKA).

Culture and education

I shall try to present a brief synthesis which will encompass the educational work done by the Church in behalf of the Aymaras, and specifically, the work done by Radio San Gabriel.

This radio station, founded by the Maryknoll Fathers 32 years ago, has been under the direction of the Brothers of the Christian Schools for the past ten years. The educational philosophy which orientates this work is "to educate the people according to their cultural heritage". This is sustained by the consideration that "an indigenous cause cannot grow without its roots", and let us get right to the point.

a) The family structure is the firm nucleus of this people's persistence over the centuries. That is why the Church and Radio San Gabriel conduct their spiritual ministry in deepening the conviction of the "Christian family", since almost 100% of the Aymaras are believers. Of late, with strong financial backing, an avalanche of Protestant sects have appeared and this has confused, alienated, and divided the people. The RSG is at present studying strategies for confronting this new invasion.

b) The base of the Aymara social structure is the AYLLU. A group of families-even though they may live at some distance apart- make up a real "COMMUNITY". When they group together, they make up a little town.

Well then, the RSG bases all of its educational work in the CENTERS in which the "participants" group together. If, for example, they receive some personal evaluation, it is only for the purpose of encouraging and stimulating group action. Before reaching any kind of a decision, they say, "let's talk this over", in other words, let us consult the community.

For its evaluation, Radio San Gabriel relies strongly on "communitarian certification". It suffices that three authorities of the Ayllu testify in writing that the "participant" has finished his work, for example, in farming, animal husbandry, or craftsmanship, for the RSG to recognize it as such.

c) JILAQATA is the ancestral authority within the Ayllu. (However, nowadays it is not recognized by the government). The Jilagata is nominated for one year and his authority is respected by the Community. He receives no financial remuneration and is assisted by a Council of Secretaries.

Radio San Gabriel requires that each Community Center name a Leader who will direct and animate the educational work of the participants. This Leader receives no salary from the Community, from the Radio station, or from the government. The Radio station provides qualifying courses and provides the textbooks free. In the future, this ought to be the line of service provided by the Church's religious activities moderators.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

d) The economy of the Aymaras is centered on the principles of SOLIDARITY, RECIPROCITY, and PARTICIPATION.

Through the AYNI, help is freely given to those who need to build a house, for example; the one benefited becomes a part of the support group when others need his help. Through the MINK'A they lend support to the work of others, receiving in return only something in kind. In the Ayllu, there is more "community land" than land belonging to families.

Radio San Gabriel does not give away anything free. All the material and services have to be paid for by the participants, even if it is only a token minimum price. The Aymaras maintain that "nothing has done us so much harm as paternalism".

e) The Aymara people's idea of religion is eminently cosmological. The PACHAMAMA (earth) is the one who offers food to their children, it protects them during their sojourn, and receives them in death. The mountains and the heights are sacred APUS and ACHACHILAS, and to them, equally as to the earth, "payment" is offered and they are celebrated with "ch'allas" and even with "Fiestas". Among the offerings, the WILANCHA, the bloody sacrifice of animals, occupies the first place.

Radio San Gabriel tries to see in the Pachamama the sign of what is called the "incarnate and committed presence of the faith" in what is "labored at and celebrated as a community". In the WILANCHA it sees the "presence of God among His people" and the "announcing of the sacrifice of the true Lamb" in the Holy Eucharist, in which the Aymaras are so fond of participating.

f) The Aymara people are singers par excellence. During religious ceremonies they sing for long hours the hundreds of "Q'OCHUS" whose melody and lyrics they themselves compose. It is said that the songs, the music, and the dances which they present during their fiestas are the best expressions of their authenticity and liberation.

Radio San Gabriel, which has already contributed by the printing of 300,000 copies of their religious song book (between 1970 and 1984), sees in this a challenge to do the same thing with songs with are not of a religious nature. On Saturdays, even though we dedicate the entire morning to it, we cannot listen to the dozens of musical groups which present themselves to the radio station, having come from far away and at their own expense. The groups play pinquillos, zampoñas, bombos, and even guitars and small native guitars called charangos.

g) We could say the same thing about the artisan production of tiles and ceramics which RSG is encouraging with its "System of Adult Self-education at a Distance" (SAAD-RSG) and with the future "handiicraft markets" and "handicraft exportation".

h) The AYMARA LANGUAGE has been preserved over the centuries. Although nowadays, almost all of the Aymaras are bilingual, all of them continue speaking their own particular dialect. The Aymara language is agglutinative and has already been experimented with for simultaneous translation, with it being the Matrix. Its alogorithmical character leads the Aymara mentality to be rigidly logical in its view of things.

Radio San Gabriel, as a proof of its respect for the culture of the people, has the Aymara language and grammar in its curriculum. Even the certificate of literacy, recognized by the government, which RSG presents is a BILINGUAL DIPLOMA.

i) In the citadel of Tiawanaku, the richest archeological relic is the PUERTO DEL SOL which Posnazky declares to be the "great page of ancient astrology". On it engraved in high relief are the movements of the sun and moon, solstices, the equinoxes, and the constellations.

Radio San Gabriel respects the knowledge of nature possessed by the Aymaras and is one with them when they maintain that "previously we did not suffer because we were following nature". Each year RSG prints thousands of calendars in which information on the rhythms of nature are features.

j) Finally, and as the last feature, we wish to point out the extraordinary riches which the Aymaras possess in NATURAL MEDICINE. The Q'OLLIRIS plants, which grow almost to the height of the YATIRIS plant, are excellent cures for illnesses and traumas and the THALIRIS is capable of curing illnesses which border on the psychosomatic. Their herbs are their inexpensive home remedies and are always within reach of their meager standard of living.

More than 90 per cent of RSG's medium wave and short wave broadcasts are in Aymara. It provides its listeners with many prescriptions for natural medicines. As one of its health projects, it maintains a Center of Natural Medicine in the vicinity of Tiawanaku.

Conclusion

What a commitment the government, the Church, and, in our case, Radio San Gabriel, have made in accompanying this people which, after eight centuries of domination have not bowed their heads, so much so that in their songs they call themselves: "the mighty race", "the noble race", "the sleeping Giant".

In the PROJECT OF THE AYMARA PEOPLE, which is stil in its embryonic stage and which Radio San Gabriel is trying to crystalize, we speak about A JUST SOCIETY BASED ON BROTHERHOOD, even though we are convinced that this will never succeed without "returning to their roots".

We are advised to respect their "language", their "spiritual solidarity", and their "love of nature". We are invited to multiply all means when it comes to "developing their culture". They seek from us "education and liberation", and they seek "full potential and production".

Radio San Gabriel in more than fifty different programs tries to echo these needs and invites these people to participate in everything from formal educational services to a gamut of daily enriched programs such as news, advice, stories, tales, songs, musical combos, religious activities, native music, lessons, Aymara fiestas, agricultural, animal husbandry, and craftsmanship training. At present a CENTER FOR LEADERSHIP TRAINING (Ch'oquenayra) is being set up. There is also a plan for an AYMARA BANK, somewhat along the same lines as the already existing AYMARA POST OFFICE. Eventually, there will be an AMARA TV.

Does this not seem like establishing a ghetto? No, it is not. It is a question of harnessing the tremendous strength of this people to bring about in Bolivia and throughout Latin America a dynamic force capable of realizing truly revolutionary changes without weapons or violence.

"LE BALUCHON" "THE BUNDLE": EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM.

After their normal class hours, and without being attributable to teaching method or capability of the teachers, certain students — more or less numerous according to the schools — need help in assimilating the subject matter, in studying their lessons, doing their home assignments, or finding a place to study which is not available in their own family home.

These needs seem particularly important for the medium of instruction is not the mother tongue of these students who have immigrated into the country.

This is the situation in this section of Montreal populated by people of the middle class with a large proportion of immigrants. Fortunately, some people had enough imagination to respond to the needs of these students by setting up an "Educational Assistance Service", which will be outlined in this brief presentation.

"Le Baluchon"

"The Educational Assistance Program" was the serious name given to this center at its inception. It was born in October 1982, at the time of the canonization of Saint Margaret Bourgeoys; the legendary clothes bundle of the saint inspired the team running the E.A. P. For the children, the new name become even more simple. Do you not see a similarity between the pupils' little knapsack for books and the tiny bundle of clothes of Margaret Bourgoys? Both of them, poor and small, contain only the bare essentials.

The Objectives of the Center

The name already reflects the mode of the services to be offered! Close to the Metro, very close to several schools, this non-profit service, received its first pupils in January 1983. This new project, planted among ordinary and underprivileged people, wishes to help the students on the elementary and secondary levels, give them some attentive and loving help and backing up which will provide them with confidence and sustain them in their human and pedagogical apprenticeship.

This service, therefore, has the following objectives:

— to allow youth who need some individual pedagogical follow-up to progressively get control of their own situation,

— to back up the parents in their difficult task as educators,

— to do some social work of a preventive nature for youths having difficulties and to keep from delinquency.

The Baluchon activities:

— Help to primary pupils and high school students having trouble in class work;

— assistance to students who wish to do their homework assignments and to study their lessons outside of school time;

— a sure quiet corner for boys and girls who want to study at leisure.

— Educational, religious, and cultural activities offered to children according to their needs and events and within the possibilities of the volunteer workers.

— Giving the children of immigrants who are still without legal or official status, the chance to learn the rudiments of the language.

The Willing Workers

The free volunteers working at Baluchon are nearly all professional and religious teachers. They devote their free time to explaining, directing, encouraging, and supporting the students in their early educational efforts. The majority of these teachers already have full-time work. Yet, they are asked:

— to be responsible for some children on the same grade level, especialy primary pupils, for the children need to identify with an adult who loves them;

— to help to organize their assignments;

— to determine what their scholastic weaknesses are, and should the occasion arise, provide some extra help in this regard;

— to exercise patience, to listen, and to adapt themselves to the young. Many of them belong to broken homes, one parent families, and to families suffering from unemployment, sickness, and all kinds of other difficulties.

— to try to understand their instability, their aggressiveness, and their emotions;

— to put time aside for the monthly meeting of the volunteers;

— to pay attention to directives received: reading the minutes of meetings, announcements, etc.

— the willingness to cooperate with the other volunteers and with the full time workers at the Service in order to assure a better pedagogical and personal follow-up for the students; — to believe in their personal possibilities.

Organization of the Center

The Educational Assistance Service is endowed with an Administrative Council, composed of eight members of various religious congregations. The Council provides the financing for the Service and looks after the orientations it has given or which it preserves. Every year it launches a campaign for funds as well as for people who will commit themselves to work at the Center.

The entire project, which covers three neighboring parishes, could not have been born and progressed without the financial support of the religious congregations and the diocese of Montreal. The future of the Center equally depends upon these same congregations at least until some humanitarian organisation takes it over partially or totally.

Concretely, le Baluchon is open:

— from Monday to Thursday:
for primary pupils from 15 to 16,30 hours for high school students from 18 to 20 hours;

— on Fridays for cultural activities from 15 to 16,45 for the children of the last three elementary grades and the first two secondary grades.

Le Baluchon voluntarily opens its doors to visitors who wish to see how and under what material circumstances it functions. It is always appealing for the cooperation of new volunteers for a number of young people are still waiting to be helped.

THE ROLE OF THE BROTHER IN THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL

We sometimes speak of the United Nations presence in the Mid-East. We may also allude to the United States presence in Western Europe or even to a USSR presence in Cuba. When we converse in this manner we do not refer to a great number of people but rather to the reality that a certain presence is recognized. The presence is seen as exerting an influence in a specific area, it is looked upon as giving special service, and it is generally felt that this form of presence truly makes a difference.

When we review the Brothers' presence in educational service in the Chicago District, we find that this influence through presence has been quite powerful. Four schools — St. Patrick, De La Salle, St. Mel, St. George — which were staffed predominately by Brothers until the late 1950's, firmly established the Brothers' reputation for quality education. It was during the '50's and early '60's that a veritable explosion in Christian Brother education took place as the Order accepted the challenge to start ten new schools, take over the direction of four more schools which were already in operation, one of which was a college. Fourteen schools in just ten years! In subsequent years the Brothers' manpower shortage required them to withdraw from eleven of their seventeen schools. Most of these eleven schools remain alive and well today.

In this scenario we see the Brothers' presence felt by the impact of numbers in their early schools. We also see the Brothers' presence felt by the influence of a small group of Brother-educators, usually joining with a like group of Sisters, and surrounding themselves with a lay staff to establish new schools. And, yes, we even see the Brothers' 'presence' felt in their absence today as many of the schools that the Brothers started remain viable institutions today. Many educational faith communities exist today because of the Brothers' direction of these schools in the early days of their development.

Since the Brothers published their Declaration in 1967, the emphasis has been to focus on methods of making the Brothers' presence felt amid their dwindling numbers, by their influence, by their service, and by truly making a difference in their schools. The Declaration urged the Brothers to re-evaluate their school commitments and to understand that their influence in Christian schools will come more from the quality and excellence of the school than from the number of the schools which they conduct.
