With the recent stress on the "Lasallian School", instead of on the "Brothers" school in the Chicago area, the question as to the role of the Brother in the schools is being asked by the lay staff, by the Religious, and by the Brothers themselves. Some may feel that the downplaying of terms such as "Brothers School" and "Brothers Boys" may be the signal that the Brothers are planning a quiet exodus. But, in truth, the Brothers in the Chicago District still intend to keep their schools as their preferred educational work.

The Lasallian school is to be a place where the Brothers, Lay Faculty, Religious, and Priests are all completely involved with the whole school — with teaching, with catechesis, with apostolic and service organisations, with administration, and in extra-curricular activities. As Brother Peter Clifford, Provincial of the Long Island/New England District, wrote to his communities in June, 1986: "We are all aware that our colleagues, lay, religious, and priests, are more than replacements in our institutions for the Brothers, or unavoidable alternatives. They are men and women interested in our work and in our mission. We owe them the same attention and opportunities for growth in Lasallian thought and idealism as we owe ourselves. In addition, our mission becomes more important as it expands through teachers, volunteers, parents, and alumni groups, and other forms of the Lasallian Family".

The Brother who is the school administrator has the power to set in motion programs which will make the "Lasallian Characteristics" come alive. Faculty members need to be encouraged to hop on the academic escalator to become master teachers or department or committee chairpersons. Teachers might consider becoming exchange teachers in other Lasallian schools, or become consultants in their particular discipline for other area schools. Some may wish to enter intern programs for school administration. It will be the principal's vision as to what the Lasallian school might become that will determine just how vigorous this whole movement will be in each school.

The teaching Brother should be one of the school's visual aids in the art of teaching. The Brother should also be an energizer to the faculty. As the scope of the teacher's responsibility broadens to that of human service eductors, teachers will at times be counselors, group leaders, designated thinkers, but always stimulators of the human potential in a variety of ways. The Brothers need to take the lead with their religious, academic, and social vision, and their strong commitment to education, to truly be the animating influence within the school and to the wider community.

The Brothers need to lead the faculty in discussing the great work that all of us are doing. Neil Postman reminds teachers of their importance: "The role of teachers, it seems, is to attempt to show youth that the young enter adulthood, not by TV information, but by having their questions. answered. We now have a society of students who have answers to questions they never asked. Unless students can lean on adults, especially teachers, they will not be hope-filled, courageous, or disciplined. The violence that is now revealed over television (their 1 curriculum) is seldom mediated by a mother's voice, is not modified to suit the child's age level, is not governed by any theory of child development. Teachers who are seen by their students as role models, listeners, value people, interpreters of society's mad violence and vulgarities, in addition to their competency in teaching, are needed today perhaps more than ever".[1] Brothers, we have our work cut out for us!

ACTION FOR CATECHETICS

Two items contributed by Brother Damian Lundy FSC, a leading figure in English catechetics. They were originally written for the District of England "Newsletter" and are presented here in slightly adapted form.

A. Catechetical weekends in Kintbury:

For several years now, the District Catechetical Commission has been organising a series of weekends at St Cassian's Centre, Kintbury.

These sessions are for teachers, catechists, adults of different ages. They draw together forty or fifty people from different parts of the country. Not all the participants belong to De La Salle establishments, but some of our regular participants come from schools like West Park, St. Helens, De La Salle, Salford, and St Peter's Schools, Bournemouth, where lay colleagues as well as Brothers are regular participants.

Topics treated during recent sessions have included Prayer and Religious Experience in the Secondary School; the Psalms, St Paul and the early Church: new perspectives; Liberation Theology and Britain Today; and — most recently — A Journey into Easter: the new Rite of Christian Initiation. Sometimes, the content of the sessions is offered in traditional lecture form, but more generally teaching-methods which invite full and active participation are favoured. This was the case with the most recent session on Christian Initiation during the 10th-12th October 1986. This weekend was led by two first-class presenters — real adult educators who invited lively participation and received a full response: learning proved to be very enjoyable, because there were no passive spectators — we were truly learning together, sharing experiences and reaching significant conclusions. The two Sisters who led this session were Céline Murphy (from Middlesborough) and Mary Bernard Potter (from Bradford). They really brought the best out of us all. Let me quote from their letters, reflecting on the week-end!

Mary Bernard wrote: "It was wonderful working with such a sensitive group at St Cassian's. Thanks for all your affirmation and good humour. I personally gained a lot from the experience".

And Céline commented: "So much to be grateful for and only a 'thank you' card to express my thanks for such a beautiful weekend. In every way, you and the Brothers were so right. Indeed the whole spirit of St Cassian's took us all over — and I know it was a Holy Spirit. An enriching few days like that won't easily be forgotten. I am so glad I was there and I can't get over my luck to have been invited!"

Two of the most interesting learning-experiences were an extensive role-play in which we became the early church in Joppa, receiving two new members into our community, and an excellent video of an international conference in Belgium which explored, from the point of view of different societies and cultures, "New Ways of Being Church". A reflection on the Joppa experience was written by Anthony McNamara, Head of English at St. Peter's Bournemouth, and it was read to us before we prayed together at the end of the weekend and received our commission to take the good news back to our local situations. This reflection is printed here:

On being the Church in Joppa:

It was a happy experience. We enjoyed seeing the living bricks being moulded and coming together to build a living church. We felt we had a part to play in the process rather than being spectators ("members of a congregation"). The church into which we welcomed the newcomers, Edmund and Margaret, was a reflection of what our faith meant to us and the joyful way in which it expressed itself. This was a persecuted church of signs, mysteries and revelations; yet everyone in it seemed to be laughing.

We felt a sense of wonder. Was this new world where people discovered and shared each other's gifts as "ministries" really "the Way we were"? Instead of a linear process along which we appeared to be discarding ancient traditions for novel forms of expressing our identity as Christians, we discovered that we were returning, almost as if it were along a full circle, to the very roots of the church — mustard seed from which the mighty tree had grown.

We felt we would be moving into a period of tension and confusion.

There was in the church a hierarchical structure that was, perhaps quite understandably, threatened by the proliferation of ministries and by the reaffirmation of the church as community rather than the Pope's divisions, complete with generals and poor bloody infantry. The laity had lost its sense of worth. It would need patience, inspiration and real skill, both imparted and assimilated, to bring those ministries out.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

It ministries represented new roles for the laity, the emerging communities in which they were embedded represented new structures — a challenge to ours, the most rigid of christian traditions. Basic communities in places such as Brazil and the Philippines were flourishing against all the odds and were now being grudgingly accepted by the Church. Perhaps the RCIA (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults) would be the catalyst for new communities in Europe. They could not be imposed from on high, however. The growing-process would be uneven, and would ultimately depend on the amount of leaven locally available.

B. Planning a workshop to examine your school as a christian community

1. Concerns of education

I. Aims and underlying principles and differing expectations: What are we trying to achieve? Any conflicts of interest? Sources of such conflicts?

II. Knowledge and skills:

What is to be learned and why? How?

III. Persons involved in the process:

Who are learning? Who are teaching? How do teachers and learners relate?

IV. Society:

In what kind of society does our educational process take place?

How do our culture and society affect the educational process (in obvious and less evident ways)?

2. Vision statements:

I. Do they exist? Could we name them? Do we read them? Do we understand them?

II. How do we use them? How do we modify them and apply them to our situation?

Cf. three Lasallian documents: La Conduite des Ecoles; Meditations for Time of Retreat; the 1967 Declaration.

Cf. three Roman documents: Vatican II's Declaration on Christian Education; the subsequent documents on the Catholic School and on Lay Catholic Teachers.

3. Possible workshops

I. In which we examine our own school now by listing and exploring problems we experience and by proposing solutions;

II. In which we draw up our own vision statement and work out how it could be applied in the day-to-day running of the school: What Kind of school do we want? What makes a Christian school "different"?

III. In which we examine changes in society, school, church, and investigate new needs which have arisen and work out how the school can help; for instance, in Herman Lombaerts' ecological model, the "ecology" of the Christian school in our society is examined: what supports life? What threatens life? What are our priorities for the future?

IV. In which we investigate the values of the Christian school (or the Lasallian school) and then use these as a checklist to evaluate our school; this involves going back to (or even discovering) our origins and sources and considering the present situation here;

V. In which we select one or two of the possibilities already indicated but limit our enquiry by concentrating on a specific group of persons within the process of education: eg. teachers, pupils, parents, administration...

4. Running a workshop

Who will choose one of the above workshops for our school?

Who will participate in the workshop?

Who will direct the process?

What do we see as the stages of the process?

How long will it last: one day; residential weekend; series of meetings?

Will participation be optional? If so, how do we attract participants?

5. An outline of Groome's praxis method

a. We state what we intend to do or explore in the process — we name the course of action we want to adopt;

b. we reflect on some of our recent experiences as a way into the course of action;

c. we study some aspect of our history, tradition, vision, with the help of suitable input;

d. we ask how our present experiences and the tradition/vision relate to each other;

e. we look to our future action, indicating concrete steps or plans to be adopted in the light of our workshop.

THE SPIRITUAL GROWTH OF THE CHILD (1)

The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is the only religious congregation which is an "active member" of the BICE (Bureau International Catholique de l'Enfance, International Catholic Bureau of Children). This may seem somewhat paradoxical being that teaching congregations, in principle, are concerned first and foremost wih children. Consequently, they should unite their efforts to those of this international Catholic organization in the defense of the rights of children and for the promotion of their well-being, their dignity, and their spiritual and human growth.

The readers of Lasalliana perhaps are not totally familiar with the activities of BICE. This organization is not essentially a funding agency as are so many other international organizations, but rather it is an organization which thinks about the problems related to children, comes to a deep understanding of them and then proposes and initiates action in view of ameliorating the conditions of children throughout the world.

With a view to making the programs which they have implemented more effective, the BICE maintains active relations with other organizations in the Church or in the United Nation which are also concerned with children. These numerous relations directly contribute to the impact of its action. Here are some recent examples of this.

Among the "Major Programs" recently initiated and implemented by the BICE, we refer to:

* The International Year of the Child (1979), an initiative of BICE which aroused considerable awareness throughout the world because it was accepted by the UNESCO and its various organizations;

* The problem, which is so great and lamentable these days, of "children of the street". For the past several years, the BICE has contributed to arousing a consciousness of this problem through colloquies which were organized, for example, in Marseille, Bogota, Bombay, and Abidjan. Thanks to this awareness and sensitivity and to the publications which flowed from them, various kinds of concrete assistance programs were inaugurated. It became necessary to create a new international organization which can continue to pursue the activity. This organization is "Childhope", which was temporarily based in New York but which is now based in Guatemala.

For the past four years, the BICE has been carrying out efforts on the vital but complex theme of "THE SPIRITUAL GROWTH OF THE CHILD" in today's world. Several particular programs within the greater overall program are already in progress. This was the object of a first evaluation and reflection of inner working organizations at the last General Congress of the BICE, held in Rome at the beginning of 1986.

These programs concern the following problems:

* the child and the spiritual life within the family;

* children and the media;

* the incultural and interreligious education of the child;

* the spiritual and non-material needs of children refugees;

* the spiritual growth of children who are handicapped physically, in their sense, or mentally;

* the spiritual growth of children deprived of a normal family life;

* maltreated children;

* child prostitution and pornography;

* one child helping another child: an older child looking after the health and welfare of the younger children.

With this as the framework of thought on particular problems, the BICE has drawn up a preliminary general text on "the Spiritual Growth of the Child" which can be read here below at length.

It seems to me that this text, in whose elaboration I participated, will be of great interest for all the Brothers and for all other Lasallians whose main task is to work together for this spiritual growth of children who are under their care in school, in group movements, and outside of schools.

As one can see by reading it, this text adopts a large perspective the only true one — with regard to the spiritual in the child and in every human being. Because of that, it seems to me particularly interesting for the understanding of our apostolic ministry of education, above all for those of us who work in a milieu which is largely non-Christian and who ask ourselves sometimes about the meaning of our activities and about the orientations which we give to them. It will be easy for us to find in these thoughts of BICE a field of action which is as vast as it is fundamental for the education of youth and a rich choice of elements for an educational project in common with our colleagues of different religions or even with non-believers.

Preliminary remarks

1. Since tens of millions of children in our times are growing up in a world which attributes little

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center

place to spiritual concerns, a positive answer should be sought for the varying demands deriving from such a situation. It is therefore essential to search for ways and means to give spiritual nourishment to those children. It is imperative, not only to satisfy their material needs such as food, sports, health, etc., but also to respond to their intellectual, cultural and spiritual needs; school, pastimes, arts, religion, etc.. Such nourishment inevitably raises certain problems related to the child's environment.

At the present time however, the ICCB has to face a more fundamental question. It is aware of the urgent need to set free the spiritual energy within each child, that source of growth which will enable the child to build its own spiritual life a growth process that will continue throughout its entire lifetime.

2. Such action touches a decisive and radical aspect of the child's identity as a human person; for the ICCB it is a specific part of its mission. Indeed, the ICCB believes very firmly in the spiritual dimension of the child as part of its very being, its nature, the dynamics of its growth. Created in the image of God, man became inhabitated by the Spirit at the very moment he emerged from animality. Because the child is the offspring of man, it is of divine race.Therefore, the child is unable to attain fullness of being, balance and happiness unless it has developed spiritually as well.

3. Although the ICCB is quite conscious of its specific task as an International Catholic Organisation, it feels that the ideas which are expressed hereafter do not follow exclusively from the Judeo-Christian tradition. The faiths specifically derived from that tradition are based upon the Bible and hold that in the spirit there is a divine seed, the image of both God and man. There are other creeds arising from other spiritual traditions, be they Islamic, Buddhist or still others. There are moreover agnostics and men of goodwill who, even if they do not always make explicit reference to the Judeo-Christian interpretation neverthless recognize the spiritual dignity of man.

The Spiritual Growth of the Child

Every child is born with a sum of basic physical, psychic, intellectual and emotional potentialities, but also with an innate spiritual potential. The development and the accomplishment of its being in its uniqueness, its entirety and its authenticity, are nothing other than the full achievement of its potentialities. That is the condition for the child becoming "in all truth" a human person. However, we should ask ourselves several questions: what is the meaning of such spiritual growth? Which is the way toward it? Who are its authors?

I - The sense of spiritual growth: analysis and description

The "spiritual" in the human being is of such density that, to analyse it, one needs to distinguish three different aspects, which have to be globally united afterwards, such as three facets of a diamond or three tributaries of one and the same stream.

1. The anthropological or constitutive aspect: TRUTH of the BEING.

This is the most fundamental aspect of the "spiritual" in that it answers for the specific nature of the dignity of the human person, as source and principle of human rights. This aspect is to be recognized in the founding event, which makes man, that is the moment when he emerges from animality. It is indeed in that sudden original mutation which produces him that the spirit enters man. The attentive observer will recognize three major expressions of this "spiritual":

— the passage from the instinct based on capture and enjoyment to LOVE, which is sacrificial and freely given. Man as an animal is possessed by the instinct to take more to have more: that means that he wants to grow in being through possessing more: such is his instinctive drive. However there is also a different movement in man, a drive which is also innate as the expression of the spirit and which tends to give, to offer, and consequently to lose: this is love, which may be defined as an act of "having less" in order to "be more". Through loving, one becomes more human.

— The passage from sensitive knowledge (by images) to abstract knowledge (by ideals). The second fruit of the spirit in man is the emergence of INTELLIGENCE, which consists of reflecting (i.e. conceiving ideas), reasoning (articulating ideas), judging (discerning among ideas).

— The passage from determinate and automatic conduct to the FREEDOM of choice by freeing oneself from enslavements and servitudes and mastering caprice: in man this is the third fruit of the spirit.

— This threefold ability for love, understanding and freedom is the constitutive element of man's specific nature, of his dignity and his identity: such is his fundamental spiritual being. Therefore it is of the greatest importance that the "servants" of children seeking their development "in truth" should give priority to this emergence, this awakening, this coming of he spirit. From this point of view there exists at the present time a terrible void, which brings about a regressive evolution leading in turn to human degradation and menacing the human species as such. Urgent action is needed.

THE SPIRITUAL GROWTH OF THE CHILD (2)

2. The religious or relational aspect: ALTERITY IN FUNCTION OF GROWTH.

This is the most factual of "the spiritual". This aspect lies in what the psychologist Lacan defines as the passage from "the fusional state" (the child in the mother's womb) to "the relational state" (the child engaged in the pursuit of autonomous fulfilment). It is true that fulfilment is always conditioned by "the other". One has to define oneself in relation to the Other by viewing him as being "other", that is different from "me", but also as being the Other one in his alterity, that is, as a being endowed with an autonomy fully his own, in the same ways as I am myself.

This necessary alterity is a condition of development, fullness of being, happiness. Alone man cannot reach fulfiment. In order to liberate him from the permanent temptation of returning to the fusional state, the relational state must become "communional", and so we recognize the three main choices in human existence, which are the most explosive expression of the density and the originality of the human spirit:

— the choice of the conjugal partner: the couple and the family;

man develops through communion with the other;

— the choice of the social partner: society and profession;

man develops through communion with the others;

— the choice of the religious partner: the absolute and the infinite;

man develops through communion with the Other.

It is clear that, while these three choices have to be distinguished as such, it does not follow that they are always and necessarily separated in each person. There will normally be association and mixture of choices.

This is the second aspect of the spiritual existence of the human person. The demands of the spirit which prompt a human being towards achieving full development therefore guide him towards relation, communion, the choice of a partner, with whom he establishes, "community" in order to reach achievement. This threefold choice which consists in exercising freedom, as far as man is concerned, is therefore the major expression of man's spiritual being.

Thus, the religious aspect of the spiritual is a dimension of the destiny of man who develops through his relation to the "Other". In this sense man is a "religious element". "Man is a fallen God, who remembers Heaven", man is searching for the other side. He needs something absolute to feel he is alive; he senses that he came from elsewhere and is bound for that elsewhere. He finds his finitude unbearable. Those other places in which he seeks evasion are called alcohol, drugs, sex, travel, suicide. Those "absolutes" which seduce him are science, trade, power, good causes. Those other places which satiate him are sects, religions, faith.

Whereas the anthropological or constitutive aspect of the spiritual is the most fundamental, the religious aspect (or the relational aspect) is the most universal. As was the case at certain periods in the past, when powerful empires and great cultures fell apart, the present time also shows signs of dwindling religiosity, of religious disinformation as well as of religious fanaticism and imperialism. All of these create a serious danger for the human being. There is a disquieting spiritual void. Urgent action is needed.

3. The Christian and Evangelical aspect: the MYSTERY OF FAITH

This is the most original aspect of the "spiritual", which in this case and in this case alone should be written with a capital "S". It cannot be detected, unless by grace, that is, in the light of the Holy Spirit, the good tidings of the Gospel and the meeting of the Lord. This is the divine LIFE which is deposited as a seed through baptism, fecundated by the Word and nourished by the Sacraments.

In this sense the "Spiritual" consequently is the life of Faith, that is to say, a new life, which, as all life, is born from the contact of two seeds: the Word of God which is revealed and the freedom of man, which decides. When faith impregnates human existence in the entire person, both body and soul, it is an eminently spiritual activity.

It cannot be doubted that at this point in time the end of our century, a crisis of faith and hence a crisis of the Spiritual is weighing upon Western countries. This third aspect of the spiritual void raises a challenge for the ICCB, just as the other two aspects. This however touches ICCB more particularly a a Catholic organisation. And in this case too, urgent action is needed.

And so, as in the three panels of a triptych, the three aspects of spiritual growth of the child unfold in the promotion of:

— the spirit of its being human — the spirit if its being religious — the spirit of its being Christian

Given its specifically Christian nature, it is only natural that the ICCB places a particular emphasis on the Christian and evangelical aspects of the spiritual growth of the child. As already indicated in paragraph 3 of the preliminary remarks, this does not imply that it thereby rejects other religious or spiritual currents, which, eventually, may associate with the ICCB's project.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

II - Path of spiritual growth: education and pedagogics

The spiritual exists in the child as a seed and a source, as a potential and an energy. Growth then means a pedagogy of arousing and of threshold; a pedagogy of promotion.

We can distinguish two levels:

1. The spiritual awakening and promotion: anthropological and religious action

— This may be accomplished in two directions:

I) The values of deepening consciousness and autonomy

— The birth of interiority for awakening conscience. This is an educational pedagogy which gives its density to the personal mystery of the child in the consciousness of its "I" and its "me". A reflection on the right use of active methods, audio-visual techniques, as well as symbols, silence, arts, might be put into motion in this perspective. In this way conscience, that science of the interior being, comes to life.

— The taste for effort through the joy of surpassing oneself. One only becomes oneself through concentration and transcendence. That goes for sportsmen as well as for artists, for researchers as well as for creators. Effort has no value as such, in human beings it is but the liberation of the being to be born.

— Learning discernment in the search for truth. Credulity as well as contestation are full of risks. A critical spirit implies questioning and evaluation. Full truth is never acquired, one approaches it through reflection, judgment, dialogue and sharing in patience and humility.

II) The values of relation and communion

— The sense of nearness in the practice of goodwill. The bringing about of community comes about through the mutual recognition of the other who has some value: one cannot be and develop unless one is recognized; this comes about through goodwill, by which what good there is in the other is recognized. And finally it comes about by the riches resulting from differences and the positive management of conflicts.

— The sense of generosity in a perspective of gratuity. In a world where everything bought and sold, the binding tissue of community is fed by the oxygen and the fresh blood of gratuitous acts which are carriers of love.

— The sense of solidarity in terms of responsibility. The privileged and the profiteers produce sterility in any community. A community cannot live nor can it progress unless every one of its members is servant to the commonweal and shares in the common task: responsibility fecundates the community.

These six fundamental values are efficacious signs of the spiritual growth of the child.

2. The arousing and the promotion of the Spiritual:

— an education in grace:

As any life, the life of faith cannot come to birth, nor can it be promoted uneless it is borne by a community which fosters it, and it is grafted upon or nestled in an amalgamating tissue for nourishment: this shows the importance of the family.

— A quality seed:

This is the Word of God revealed in the Good News in catechesis.

— An initiation in the Sacraments:

This means discovering signs and symbols, a meeting of man with God..

— An education in contemplation:

which means the most complete search of the Absolute.

III - The agents of spiritual growth: action and concertation

What is at stake today is spiritual growth and it is of such paramount importance that it requires vigorous and concerted action. The ICCB should promote such action.

1. At the level of structures and institutions: the educational communities

Research in that field should start in the family and the school.

2. At the level of environment and climate: the educational factors

An emergency programme is needed for promoting the spiritual growth of children:

— by media: press, literature, audio-visual means, cinema. T.V., video-cassettes;

— by free-time activities: sports, children's movements, tourism, art.

3. At the level of Churches and Catholic agencies at the service of children — in communities of catechetical renewal, — in apostolic children's movements.

AN INTEGRAL LASALLIAN FORMATION COURSE

PRESENTATION

The formation plan which we are offering here arose, for the most part, out of the insistent desire of numerous seculars, as reflected in the Directives of the Mexican Lasallian Federation, of receiving a solid formation so that they might better cooperate in the educational task of the Brothers.

This impulse led to the re-enforcement and the offering of perspectives to those Brothers who were trying to find a more effective way of bringing about the participation of seculars in the work and mission of the Institute, particularly through so-called "educational communities".

Lasallianism, being an evangelizing movement, inspired by the spirit of faith and zeal and in a community projection, making seculars participators means, above all, promoting Christian faith in them, arousing their apostolic zeal, and making them capable of apostolic community activity.

Included among our fellow workers were those who, in obedience to a special call of the Spirit, wanted to make themselves in some way like the Brothers, which implied also, in a certain way, the Brothers' formation process.

Thus then, the contents of the program presented offers elements of an integral Christian formation leading to evangelizing activity in a Lasallian educational community.

With this end in view, the program includes five fundamental areas which are intimately joined together in such a way that they are complementary parts of a whole, which imply and presuppose one another.

1. An anthropological reflection which intends, beginning from Revelation, to reveal man to himself and to locate him in a salvific way, in earthly realities.

2. A societarian insertion of man and his conversion into the Christian community life started by the apostles in the same manner as his projection through the different forms of making the Church present in the world.

3. The Ministry of the Word in the History of Salvation, its urgency- ever present and the conditions of its effectiveness.

4. Evangelizing education as a process of humanization in the perspective of salvation, and in the Lasallian way of exercising the Ministry of the Word.

5. The historical circumstances which, from the Founder to our times, has forged Lasallianism as an evangelizing movement of education, moulded in the spirit of faith and zeal and in community activity.

As can be seen, the first four areas are common to any kind of solid and complete Christian formation. Only the last one is distinctive in presenting a particular style of evangelical life. It is an opportunity for locating and rooting persons in a defined historical context and at the same time for guarantees of apostolic fecundity.

For the purpose of invoking a total vision which is at the same time synthetic in plan, we arrange a picture in which the themes are set out by areas and cycles. It can be noted that the programed contents can be included according to areas or according to cycles, indistinctly, without substantially affecting the general object of the program.

Normally, the didactic procedure and the development of the theme will be inspired by:

— the magisterial exposition.

— Discussions and or studies in small groups or meetings.

— the help of appropriate didactic material.

— reading and investigation.

Each of the themes will have a "didactic package" consisting of:

— the general object and specific object.

— A synthesis of the expositions.

— A basic bibliography.

— An instrument for evaluation.

Finally, at the end of the course and as proof of the completion of the requisites, La Salle University, Mexico City through its Institute of Religious Sciences, will award each participant a corresponding Diploma.

Project of the instrument of formation for members of Lasallian associations

What is it?

A practical and systematic means put at the disposal of those who wish to benefit by them of the contents, methods and indispensible activities for their adequate and effective integration into the Lasallian Associations, for the purpose of carrying out concrete tasks in the educational apostolate of the Brothers.

Why?

— The finality proposed today to the Lasallian Associations of collaborating in the educational tasks of the Brothers, requires an increase in basic Christian formation.

— There are ever more insistent appeals on the part of Lasallian Associations of starting a systematic and thorough process to know and live the Lasallian movement for the purpose of participating more effectively in the educational works of the Brothers.

— The objective adopted by the Mexican Lasallian Federation is: to take the necessary means to successfully provide a better formation to the members of the Lasallian Formation for the purpose of making them capable of collaborating in the work of the Brothers.

— None of the Lasallian Association taken separately, is in a position to integrally satisfy this need for Lasallian training.

For whom?

— Members of the Mexican Lasallian Federation.

— Members of the Association of Lasallites.

— Collaborators in Lasallian educational work.

— Interested person with proper prerequisites.

With whom?

A THEOLOGY OF MISSION FOR THE LOCAL AND UNIVERSAL CHURCH (1)

Early in 1974, I wrote an essay on the theology of mission entitled, "The Theology of the Overseas Apostolate (Missions), Yesterday and Today". Now, more than ten years later, I have been asked to revise that essay. I welcome the opportunity because the topic is so essential to our lives as they effect our students, associates, and the Institute. Furthermore, this is a perennial topic for the universal church, e.g., the synod of bishops planned for 1987 will have as its theme "The Mission of the Laity in the Church and in the World".

As I review the 1974 essay, I find that the basic thrust of its theology is still valid. However, there are three glaring (even embarrassing) faults. First, the language is blatantly sexist. Second, I refer to the other Christians as "non-Catholic" and to the adherents of the world religions (i.e., the Buddhists, Hindus, Jews and Muslims) as "non-Christian". In view of our more sensitive ecumenical attitude, these negative terms are obviously pejorative. Third, there is a total disregard of the Holy Spirit! Never once do I refer to the Spirit, the one who distributes charism; who assists the church's office-holders; who, as the Paraclete, not only defends the cause of Jesus Christ against the world but also teaches every believing Christian; and who directs the church's mission.

The brothers and mission

Everything that concerns the mission of the Brothers as Christian educators was reaffirmed at the 40th general chapter in 1976. In "The Acts of the 40th General Chapter", the Brothers are reminded that they "must integrate personally, as well in their communities as in their institutions, the components of Christian education, the ministry of the word, the service of the poor, and action on behalf of justice in the world" (p. 74). Furthermore, Community and district planning must create adequate guidelines for assuring the fulfiilment of our mission of imparting Christian education by association. Only in this way can the Brothers consider themselves, at one and the same time, "personally called and communally sent" (p. 42). Finally, the Brothers were seriously urged to "share their Lasallian spirituality and leadership of their works with all the members of the educational community" (p. 76). This last injunction, a firm reiteration of the 1967 Declaration (section 46), signaled a striking shift from the concept of "a Brothers' school" to "a Lasallian school". The reasons for the change of emphasis were obvious: As a group we are rapidly declining in numbers and our colleagues are increasingly aware not only of the apostolic dimension of their calling as teachers but also of the wisdom of our Lasallian spirituality.

In Circular 419 (April 30, 1984), the announcement of the preparations for the 41st general chapter in 1986, it says (p. 32): "The question of most interest to the Brothers is the future of their mission". I must leave to the general chapter the elaboration of the specifics of our Lasallian mission and how we can best integrate it into the local and universal mission of the church. The purpose of this essay is to outline a theology of mission that can serve as a basis upon which to build those specifics.

Developments in theology

But before getting to the revisions of the 1974 essay, it is necessary to outline four significant developments since then within society and/or theology that now nuance the mission of the local and universal church.

1. The growth of atheism: in 1900, a mere 0.2. percent of the world was atheistic. Today, some 21 percent of the world is atheistic. About 33 percent of the world's people are Christian, a percentage not likely to change by the year 2000. This indicates that the opportunity and challenge of mission have probably never been greater in the church's long history.

2. The development of political theology: the political, social, familial and economic issues of our day (e.g., abortion, world hunger, nuclear war, women's rights and dignity, the ever-widening gap between the rich and poor peoples and nations) have forced the church to listen to the victims of society, to analyze the structures of society that produce this victimhood, and to examine the extent to which Christian tradition, institutions, and language participate in these structures of sin. Bishops through their episcopal conferences have published social messages on such topics as the preferential option for the poor, nuclear arms and peace, and the economy which have evoked considerable debate within and outside the church. Furthermore, Paul VI and John Paul II have reiterated often the church's commitment to justice and mercy.

3. The emergence of the world church: in 1971, Walbert Buhlmann published The Coming of the Third Church, a book that is a phenomenological study of the notion that Vatican II marked the emergence of the church as a world church. However, in 1979 Karl Rahner (1904-1984), the eminent Jesuit theologian, produced a brief essay which has become the locus classicus for the discussion of this question and its far-reaching consequences. Rahner divided church history into three periods: 1) the short period of Jewish Christianity (30-49 C.E.) when Christianity was proclaimed in Israel and to it; 2) the period of the church in a distinct cultural region, namely European (and North American) culture and civilization (49-1962 C.E.); 3) the present period in which the sphere of the church's life is in fact the entire world. Rahner was fully aware that the church has always been a world church in principle because its mission has always been universal. But at Vatican II, due to the influence of the Spirit, the church appeared for the first time as a world church in a fully official way. This means that the church now recognizes and accepts the essential differences among cultures and is attempting to find ways not only to formulate the gospel within each cultural setting but also to learn about the risen Christ from the various cultures. In other words, every country is now mission territory. Finally, Rahner warned that if the church does not become de-Europeanized and de-Romanized, she will remain a Western church and so in the final analysis betray the meaning of Vatican II.

4. The emergence of the church as a community of disciples: as a mystery, the church is irreducible to any single image or model. After Vatican II there was considerable stress on models of the church, especially the five enumerated by Avery Dulles in his Models of the Church; namely, communion, herald, sacrament, servant and institution.

These five models are complementary and not exclusive. When they are interrelated, they denote that the institutional church is an interpersonal community as well as a missionary community with a threefold purpose: to teach the gospel, to witness the Kingdom of God, and to serve the needy and the oppressed. But something is lacking in this description; namely, the personal dimension. Is not the church also composed of individuals who personally respond to the God of Jesus in faith, hope and love? This dimension is important because at this level, although all women and men receive different gifts of the Spirit, all are equal in dignity and freedom. At this level, all women and men are followers and learners; all must embrace the cross; and all must appropriate the Spirit of Jesus and his mission. This model identifies the universal church a a worldwide community of disciples.

John Paul II stressed this model in 1979 in his first encyclical, Redemptor Hominis (see no. 21) and Dulles wrote a perceptive essay about it in 1981. More than in previous generations, the discipleship model corresponds well to the situation and needs of the church in our own time. Because of the pervasive influence of atheism, secularism and anti-Christian values as well as the attractiveness to many of the world religions, Christians will only participate in the church and its mission to the extent that they have heard a personal call and respond in a free, self-conscious manner, allowing the risen Christ to be the focal point of their lives.

The church has always been missionary. It has gone forth at Christ's command and under the impulse of the Spirit to evangelize and baptize all nations. It has proclaimed to all men and women the gospel of Jesus and its belief that he is the principle of eternal life, the meaning of history, and the model of what it means to be human.

The theology of the mission has always changed to meet the needs of those being evangelized. In our day there has been an intensive study of missiology. A theme of contemporary missiology is that there were two major weaknesses in mission activity and theology before Vatican II. First, missionaries brought the Christ of their own culture to the peoples they were evangelizing without much adaptation to the new culture. We lacked an appreciation of cultural pluralism We are not a world church in a fully official way. Secondly, missionaries strove to convert all nations and all religions to Christianity, based on the belief that Christianity was true and the world religions were false. We lacked a theology of religious pluralism.

Christ and cultural pluralism

Evangelization is the activity whereby the church proclaims the gospel in order to awaken living faith among those who do not know Christ and to deepen the faith among Christians.

There are two aspects of evangelization that have been questioned recently. One concerns the methodology of evangelization. In the past there may have been a rather widespread disregard for the autonomy of each culture. When a missionary went from the West to the East (or from the North to the South), it was understood that he brought the Western image of Christ and his church to the new culture. Before Vatican II, missionaries did not permeate an autonomous culture which already existed with its own human values and traditions so much as create their own type of society artificially.

Today there is a greater appreciation of the fact that the gospel can and must be adapted to all cultures. Not only can a foreign culture be enriched by the discovery that its true values and traditions can be referred to Christ as their source, but the missionary's own relationship to Christ can be enhanced as he discovers Christ and his Spirit already present to the people and their culture. If, in the past, missionaries thought they had much to give and teach, they now acknowledge they have much to receive and learn.

It should be noted that this change in approach to mission countries is simply a manifestation of a greater change taking place throughout the world as a result of a rise in nationalism and a development in conscientization. For example, the countries of the Third World have challenged the success of the Western nations for placing themselves at the center of the earth, for controlling the greater share of the earth's resources, and for understanding human history along an axis that passes through their own immediate past.

The other aspect of missionary activity that has been questioned is an evangelization that has been strictly spiritual and religious. It is argued by some that evangelization cannot take place if the political, social and economic structures that are inhuman and oppressive are not denounced and changed.

It is in Latin America especially that various liberation theologies have developed.

Liberation theology does not seek to be another department of theology. It is a serious reflection on the perennial Christian themes, but from within the experience of participation in liberation struggles. What the various liberation theologies have in common is their desire to reappraise the Christian gospel from the perspective of the poor and the oppressed and those who have been banished historically from theological reflection. Another change is that, whereas the theology of Vatican II concentrated on intrachurch reform, liberation theology in its various forms is committed to fundamental challenges of the liberation process within society.

At the present time, those influenced by a liberation theology have some serious questions to answer. Many enterprising missionaries have involved themselves in the political, social and economic spheres of the country. This involvement has brought some of them into revolutionary activities that involved acts of violece. They now question how revolutionary and political they can be. They want to know if they should restrict their activities to those which are strictly pastoral. It does seems — as with Jesus — that living the gospel faithfully by imitating his threefold mission of teaching, witness and service of the needy is the most revolutionary stance one can take. Furthermore, this way of interpreting the life of Jesus is in accord with the latest scripture scholarship which is trying to refute recent attempts to portray Jesus as a political revolutionary. The gospel says his kingdom was not of this world, i.e., the world as distorted by the history of sin.

It is not clear where liberation theology will finally rest. Nevetheless, what liberation theology has made clear is that those who teach and preach the gospel must be very conscious of "the sin of the world": there is a sinful situation of oppression, domination, and exploitation that must be denounced and overcome if the Christian gospel of brotherhood/sisterhood, justice and peace would be established.

Christ and religious pluralism

There are many religions. From the Catholic church's point of view, it has been customary to group them as "non-Catholic" and "non-Christian". The church's dialogue with these two groups has had a different scope. The church's dialogue with the other Christian churches is directed towards reunion and fuller communion in Christ. The length of this paper does not allow space for a discussion of recent developments within the ecumenical dialogue. It is sufficient to point out that the dialogue between the Catholic church and the other Christians seems to be moving in the very same direction as the dialogue with the world religions, i.e., towards a theology of religious pluralism.

Since the relationship of the church to the world religions is more complex and also more significant than the dialogue with the other Christian churches for an understanding of the theology of mission, it is this relationship which will be outlined here.

In recent times the church has moved through two paradigms to a third in its understanding of itself in relation to the world religions. These changes, pivot around Vatican II and are usually labelled as preconciliar, conciliar and postconciliar.

Roman Catholic missiology has moved to a new plateau because deeper consideration has been given to some of the most basic concepts involved in the ministry of evangelization. It will be possible to understand the present missiology after examining the changes that have taken place in our understanding of four interrelated areas:

1. salvation
2. mediatorship of Christ;
3. conversion;
4. true and false religion.

1. Salvation

All men and women have found themselves in a state of alienation from self, from others, and from God. Salvation consists in being delivered from alienation to integration, human community, and divine love and life. Christians declare that Jesus of Nazareth has brought salvation through his life, death and resurrection. Jesus' salvific life is found in his church.

The preconciliar understanding of salvation was that members of the Catholic church had available to them all the means of salvation. Membership in the visible church was the ordinary way to be saved. The duty and responsibility of the church were to preach her message of salvation to all peoples so that they could be converted and saved. If followers of a world religion remained in their religion, they could be saved if they practiced their religion sincerely and honestly. However, their salvation did require the extraordinary intervention of God in their lives.

At Vatican II the church moved away from this ecclesiocentric view and acknowledged the salvific value of the world religions. It declared that God and his Spirit have been working through these religions and not in spite of them. The world religions were legitimate and had a proper place in God's salvific plan (1 Tim 2: 4-6).

The conciliar view of salvation maintained that the world religions were the normal and ordinary way of salvation and that Christians, being so overwhelmingly outnumbered during the four million years humans had been on earth, had been given the extraordinary grace of knowing Christ. Christians should be a sign that all peoples are saved in Christ.

The postconciliar understanding of salvation for those not Christian is much more radical than the conciliar view. For one thing, there was a certain uneasiness and even dissatisfaction with the theology of the "anonymous Christian". When Christian theologians and missionaries started using this term in their dialogue with the other religions, the Jews and Muslims found it offensive and the Hindus and Buddhists found it incomprehensible. It would be like whites in the U.S. trying to express their esteem for Martin Luther King, Jr. by saying that he was anonymously a white man (or for men to say that women are virtually as good as men). Furthermore, it seems that to read Christian ideas into the world religions does not do justice to the distinctiveness of these faiths. What we encounter in each religion is a different faith and, therefore, different patterns of behavior; different standards and ideals of ultimacy, happines, and salvation; and different claims to present the truth about God, the universe, and the nature of our humanness.

The act of faith is the basic foundation of each religion. Each religion has its own identity and autonomy because of the specific epistemological nature of faith, i.e, because of the "absolute" certitude that faith confers upon the believer concerning the content of his faith. When the Muslim, for example, makes an act of faith, he stands in a relationship to Allah, to the Asolute, which is in no way less immediate than that of the Christian to the Trinity.

The postconciliar theology of salvation states that the gospel of Jesus Christ is only one way of salvation. The preconciliar understanding of salvation was ecclesiocentric: salvation in the Catholic church alone. The conciliar understanding was christocentric: salvation in Christ alone. The postconciliar understanding is theocentric: salvation in God who works in the heart and history of each person.

Theology has taken this theocentric position for two reasons: the church is relative to the kingdom of God, and the work of Jesus and his Spirit is relative to the work of the Father. In other words, our theology of salvation has shifted its focal point from the specifically Roman Catholic to the total Christian community — and, now, to the entire human family. The reason for this shift is the rediscovery of a basic fact about Christ: He calls all people to be totally open to their humanity so as to receive the grace of his Father. Christ says all people are of infinite worth to the Father.

Some question this theology of religious pluralism, fearing that it is really indifferentism and a denial of the primacy of Christ. This is not so. Christians still evangelize knowing that every religion affects the quality of a person's personal and communal life. Those in other religions need to hear how Christian life is distinctive from their religion.

How is Christianity different from other religions? Christianity does not add new truths to people's knowledge of God, but it does create a transformation of consciousness whereby a person acquires a new awareness of all history, self, others, the world and God. All history is lived from its eschatological dimension. Christians believe that their daily lives are filled with the glory of the risen Christ and his Spirit. Jesus Christ has transformed reality. He has brought about a new creation. The risen Christ is present transforming all space and time so that life, death, suffering, love, work, food, sexuality, etc., are understood and lived in the light of his resurrection. Christian life conists in sharing Christ's transforming love. Christian life consists in living with and for Christ as one lives with and for others.

So, while this theology of religious pluralism clearly rejects indifferentism, it does state that it is not necessary for others to join the Catholic church to be saved. A theology of religious pluralism argues that God's mission to transform people and make them whole can be carried forward through any and all faiths — although it is far from complete in any one of them.

The conclusion from a theology of religious pluralism is that the aim of the missionary's message is to free the adherents of other religions for a saving contact with the best of their own religious traditions. The missionary helps these people solve their own problems, humbly, genuinely, openly, with respect for their traditions and a willingness to learn about God from them.

2. The mediatorship of Christ

The church teaches that Jesus is the principle of eternal life, the meaning of history, and the model of what it means to be human. The function and mission of the church follow from the function and mission of Jesus.

In the preconciliar church, the missionary taught that Jesus founded the one true Catholic church and this is where he is present, mediating the Father and sending his Spirit. There was a radical discontinuity between Christianity and the world religions. Jesus was the world's exclusive savior (Acts 4:12).

At Vatican II there was a refocusing of the scriptures. As a result of this refocusing, it was seen that Jesus is the fulfilment of the world religions. The authentic seeds of the gospel are contained within them. Christianity is not discontinuous from the world religions, but the leaven which is interior to all of them. The relation of the church to the other religions of the world is not one of competition, or an effort at substitution. It is one of sublimation. The mission of the church is to take what is holy and true in the world religions and show its fulfilment in Christ. He is constitutive of these religions.

In postconciliar theology the universal mediatorship of Christ is still maintained, while respecting the pluralism of religions. This is no simple task since a theology of religious pluralism accepts a diversity of mediators and avatars whose relationship to Christ is more equal than had been thought possible before in the history of Christianity. Postconciliar theology retains Christ's universal mediatorship by pointing to the fact that the crucial decision regarding the divine is made by people in their relationship to the human community. The Gospels say that in people's relationship to the human community they are open to the Spirit, are addressed by the Spirit, and can commit themselves to it. When the missionary teaches people to love all peoples, especially enemies, he is actually evangelizing them.

In our postconciliar theology, Jesus is the normative mediator. This term is not without its difficulties. It can seem to be no more than another version of the "exclusive mediiator" of the preconciliar theology. The best explanation I have seen is that of James Redington: Jesus is the one who illumines for the missionary as he encounters the other religions "other ways in which God has saved and is saving people". In other words, Jesus is the touchstone by which other religious experiences will be examined and related.

A THEOLOGY OF MISSION FOR THE LOCAL AND UNIVERSAL CHURCH (3)

3. Conversion

Conversion consist in changing from one way of living to another.

In preconciliar missionary theology, overt conversion from a world religion to Christianity was the goal. Missionaries went forth in the name of Christ and his church to baptize every individual in the Spirit and to make every nation Christian.

At Vatican II the Catholic church adopted a policy of "mergerism". Since the world religions prepared the way for Christianity and since thay possessed elements that could be fulfilled in Christ, the dream was for a gradual convergence of all religions into one.

This theology was hardly acceptable, especially to those not Christian, because it meant a union by absorption. In postconciliar theology, there is greater respect for the autonomy of each religion. In view of the tenacious persistence and steady growth in numbers of the world religions, there is an increasing tendency to accept religious pluralism as part of the divine dispensation. The primary conversation that the missionary tries to effect is that each believer should be converted within the framework of the religion he/she already professes. The initial task of the missionary is to help the believer live his/her religions more integrally and honestly.

4. True and false religion

Religion pertains to the relationship of God with humans. Every religion declares that God has revealed himself through its sacred persons, signs and symbols. Every religious group thinks that it has received the true way. Each religious group often has little use for the other religions.

In preconciliar theology the Catholic church professed to be the home of the one, true religion. It could point to "the marks of the church" as the signs of its veracity. The other religions were considered to be natural, imperfect, and ultimately, erroneous. The missionary attempted to prove the superiority of Christianity over the other religions.

In conciliar theology, as the church moved from an ecclesiocentric to a christocentric position, it acknowledged some truth in the other religions. This truth had its source in Christ who is the fulfilment of these religions. The missionary attempted to explain the developments required for each world religion as it evolved towards the Christian ideal.

In postconciliar theology the concept of true/false religion is approached not from a study of the quality of ecclesiastical doctrines, but from the conviction that true religion humanizes and reconciles persons whereas false religion dehumanizes and fragments the human community. This is a theocentric approach to religion. It begins with the fact that God incarnates himself in every human person, above every religious barrier.

Jesus taught a theocentric religion. He said that a person does not relate himself/herself to God in worship (a religious practice) and then, as a second step, seek the right relationship to his brother/sister (Matt 5:23-24). What is revealed in Jesus is that in people's relationship to the human community, people are related to the Father. The Father is love and anyone who does not love his brother/sister does not know God (Matt 25: 31-46). The ultimate test in the struggle between true and false religion, then is the reconciliation of persons in community. Anything in the church that hinders human community is false religion.

This understanding of true and false religion does not demand that the members of the world religions become Christian. When the missionary helps peoples overcome whatever fosters egotism, hatred, and injustice, he/she is evangelizing.

Summary

The postconciliar missiology summarized in this paper is different from two other understandings of missionary activity and purpose. On the one hand, a liberal but secular approach maintains that there should be no Christian missionary activity because this is an age of religious pluralism. Jesus is not the way. On the other hand, very zealous evangelicals insist that there is to be missionary activity directed towards conversion to Christianity, because not only is Jesus the way, but also all the other religions are not legitimate for salvation. The liberal position rejects the universal mediatorship of Christ; the evangelical position rejects the salvific character of the world religions.

The missiology outlined here states that, from one point of view, Christian evangelization has three dimensions: human, religious, and Catholic Christian. The Catholic church evangelizes both Christians and others on any (or levels, depending on the circumstances and the needs of the people.

The Catholic church evangelizes on the human level by teaching Christ's call to all people to accept their humanity and to accept all persons as their brothers/sisters. "The church promotes the human by evangelizing, and the church evangelizes by promoting the human".

The Catholic church evangelizes on the religious level by teaching that any religion is true to the extent that it contributes to humanization, liberation and reconciliation (James 1; 27), and any religion is false to the extent that it contributes to superstition, injustice and exploitation.

The Catholic church evangelizes on the Catholic Christian level by teaching that people can know Jesus Christ through a living tradition that is guarded by a community of disciples, and people can respond to Christ through this community of disciples.

Conclusion

Christian Brothers are always missionaries "personally called and communally sent", whether they are active or retired, and whether they educate in their native country or abroad. They have the opportunity to teach the gospel, especially to their students and colleagues, on three levels: human, religious and Catholic Christian.

On the human level, the Brothers have the opportunity to deepen the humanization of society through education. To teach languages, arts, science, history, philosophy and religion is to help students develop as human beings. It should be remembered that the humanization of persons is itself a dimension of salvation and not simply a tactical prelude to teaching the gospel. In Evangelii Nuntiandi (Dec. 8, 1975), the document that was a follow-up to the 1974 synod on evangelization, Paul VI taught that whatever helped people become more human was already evangelization "although in its initial and incomplete stage". Furthermore, in view of the developments in political theology, the Brothers must at times take a countercultural stance. They will have to educate their students about those sinful structures of society and church that foster racism, sexism, oppression and violence.

On the religious level, the Brothers have the opportunity to witness by word and deed to Christ's call to universal brotherhood and sisterhood by their own community life and the kind of community they foster in their schools. People should experience us as communities of disciples genuinely open to the power and presence of the Spirit. True religion reconciles people; false religion divides people, creates injustices, and destroy community. The Brothers should teach the differences between true and false religion.

On the Catholic Christian level, the Brothers have the opportunity to teach about Christ as interpreted in the long and rich tradition of the Catholic church. When serving in a foreign country, the Brothers will have to discern Christ as he is present in that culture. If the Brothers teach Christ so that he is simply a replica of the Christ they discovered in their own culture, their teaching would be a positive countersign: it would signify that the Catholic church, far from being a world church, is essentially bound to the civilisation of the West. The heart of the Brothers' teachings about the risen Christ, then, should point to Jesus as brothers, friend, teacher, example and liberator. Jesus is the principle of eternal life, the meaning of history, and the model of what it means to be human.

"YEAR OF CALLING"

On 20 April, 1986 the Old Collegians' Association of De La Salle College, Malvern, Victoria, Australia held its Annual Reunion Mass and Dinner, a highlight of its constant and varied activities. This particular occasion was of special significance, for it marked the 40th Anniversary of the reformation of the Association which took place in 1946 at the end of the Second World War. (The Association, which was first constituted in 1929 seventeen years after the De La Salle Brothers began at Malvern, had been in recess during the War Years).

The 1986 Reunion was also the occasion for the launching of the "Year of Calling" programme, aimed at increasing awareness of the need for Vocations to the Priesthood and the Religious Life, and also seeking prayerful consideration of the ideal calling in life for each and everyone, especially those students of the Brothers who are presently completing their schooling.

Some twelve months ago, one of the older members of the Malvern Association made an offer of a substantial donation for the purpose of preparing and distributing a special card with appropriate prayers for vocations which could be made available to students of the College and to members of the Association. In due course, after discussion at the Committee level, it was decided to accept the offer and to augment the donation with additional funds so that the widest distribution would become possible. At that time the National Federation Secretariat, which had previously distributed book-mark cards and memento cards for the Canonization of St. Miguel Febres de Cordero F.S.C., both bearing prayers for vocations, agreed to design the card and to utilise such capabilities as it has to contact all the Brothers, Houses in the Australian District for the purpose of requesting the Directors and communities to participate in whatever way they could. A decision was made to print 10,000 prayer cards to begin and to commence the distribution to those attending the Reunion and then to widen the circulation through the entire District.

A Brother Moderator on the Association Committee came forward with a theme which was adopted for the initiative - it reads

"All are called to a Vocation

All are called to a degree of Religiouus Vocation

All are certainly called to what is, for each, a good vocation".

Two prayers were selected. The first is "To know my vocation".

In the Divine Plan everyone has a special role in life and it is in the fulfilment of that role that the greatest happiness will be achieved, both spirituality and materially. It is essential to know how each and every one should fit into the role for which each is best suited and in the prosecution of which one's God given talents can be utilised. This is something to pray for and about, so that in all our actions we might be guided by Providence. The second prayer is "For special Vocations". These are Vocations to the Religious LIfe, so this prayer asks God to call many of our youth to become good priests, Brothers or Sisters in the "vineyard of the Church" and as an extension of that request seeks the graces necessary for those who are so called to accept the challenge, in order that the work of the Church may go on.

In the case of our own Institute, the figures prepared for the 41st General Chapter, recently concluded in Rome, indicate some vital facts. The steady decline in the number of our Brothers is a matter for real concern. A comparison of figures taken from the early 1970s with those for the early 1980s indicate that we now have almost 4000 less Brothers and further there are currently 100 less novices than was the case fifteen years ago.

The average age of our Brothers throughout the world at 31 March, 1986 was 57 years and 7 months. 190 Brothers died during the course of 1985 and 139 having either perpetual or temporary vows left the Institute during that year. With greater calls than ever being placed on the available personnel, this situation must be reversed if the Institute is to survive. This is grim reality. If Vocations to the Institute do not increase dramatically, how long can the work of the Holy Founder continue? "The harvest is great, but the labourers are few".

What applies to the world scene, certainly applies to Australia, where Priests, Brothers and Sisters are far fewer than needed and considerably less than 30 years ago, whereas the population is increasing and the pressure of educational advancement is placing more and more stress on the Catholic Church and the education system which it has fought to preserve and maintain. Since their arrival in Australia in 1906, the De La Salle Brothers have been leaders in the field of Catholic Education, despite the fact that their numbers have been historically less than many other religious congregations having education as their principal work.

The "Year of Calling" programme provides an opportunity for our students and alumni along with our associates and friends to join in prayer to the end that our greatest need, that of increased vocations, will be fulfilled.

Other Districts, all of whom are experiencing the same difficulties to a greater or lesser degree, may decide to follow this initiative and embark on a similar programme, for "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of".

It can be anticipated that many individuals and groups with the advancement of the Institute and its works at heart will come forward with offers of assistance for such a programme which aims at involving as many people as possible in the simple effort of regular PRAYER FOR OUR NEEDS.

Continued prayer moves God and touches men- St. John Baptist De La Salle.

Prayer to know my vocation

Heavenly Father, You have created me to fulfill some particular work which nobody else but me can do. Enlighten me, O Lord, to know my vocation in life, then give me the courage and strength to follow that enlightenment. Whatever you want me to be and do, I, like the prophet, Isaiah will say, "Here I am, Lord, send me".

Prayer for special vocations

O Heavenly Father, Your Son Jesus Christ said; "The harvest is plentiful but the labourers are few. Pray therefore, the Lord of the harvest to send out labourers to do his harvesting". Therefore, we beg You to invite many of our youth to become good Priests, Brothers, Sisters, and lay apostles in the harvest of the Church.

Amen.

BROTHER ARNOLD: TEACHER, CATECHIST, EDUCATOR

A Teacher "of great knowledge and total dedication".

Such were the qualities attributed to Brother Arnold by one of his former students. However, when, at the end of his novitiate, when he was sent by Brother Enthyme, Visitor of Champagne-Lorraine, to the boarding school in Rheims to handle classes, more than one person was surprised. What was this ungainly 24 year old farmer who had not set foot in a school for the past 14 years going to do in such a flourishing educational institution? I have previously spoken of his success in the examinations for the Elementary Certificate and of the Superior Certificate and that he aroused the admiration of his students and of his fellow Brothers with his "great knowledge". "We often asked ourselves", wrote one of his colleagues in Rheims, "but from where, then, has he been able to collect so much material for his lessons which made them so interesting and so captivating even to the most rebellious temperaments? Sciences, mathematics, languages, his avid intelligence and his quick assimilation provided him with a treasury of knowledge which made of him a living encyclopedia".

Intelligence, memory, yes. Strenuous work also and a pedagogical sense, no doubt! All this put at the service of whoever had recourse to him. The Brother ever available! In his 14 years at Saint Joseph, he had taught children and then youths French and German, geometry and algebra, physics, chemistry, botany, anatomy, and agriculture. He prepared students for the entrance examinations for the School of Arts and Trades at Châlons-sur-Marne and they were accepted. He prepared "Volunteers" for the examination which reduced military service from five years to one year and they also were successful. He took upon himself to teach the agricultural course whose founder, as Brother Arnold wrote, acquired a "colossal reputation". Yet, Arnold maintained the same excellent level of instruction.

A teacher of rare quality, Brother Arnold, ever faithful to his Founder, knew that he should afford the same care in teaching the Christian faith as to teaching secular subjects. Today, his students in the boarding school come from "Practising Catholic" families. Tomorrow, in the Noviciate, he will be concerned with youths wishing to consecrate their life to the Lord. He will not disappoint either of the two groups. Both of these, when asked for their recollections of him, will join together in the same praises: "His catechism lessons were taught in such a simple and convincing manner as to edify the pupils", is how one of them sums it up.

Nourished by Holy Scripture and by the liturgy, Brother Arnold has recourse to the most serious theologians. He puts at the threshold of his students the doctrine which he has assimilated in his study, reflection and prayer. His method is inspired by two centuries of his Institute's traditions. It is these which surface in the plans of his conferences to the Novices on the teaching of catechism. To initiate them to that "ministry", Brother Arnold simply tells them what he himself has done.

His well-balanced charts are, however, only weak echoes of teaching which ought to be, he writes, "instructive, interesting and practical". His teaching was perfectly in accord with the Gospel, which was always open to a good passage for it had been meditated upon and lived by an apostle who possessed the gift which Paul desired for the Christians of Rome and De La Salle desired for the Brothers of the Christian Schools, "One who is a teacher should use his gift for teaching; one with the power of exhortation should exhort." (Rm. 12, 7-8; MTR. 193, 11).

Concerning a little treatise on know-how

An excellent teacher and catechist, Brother Arnold is also an educator who is concerned about leading the young people who are confided to him today towards the adult life which they will live tomorrow. Also in this, he is at one with the Founder of his Institute for whom the school should be an instrument for total development. The conscientiousness with which Brother Arnold taught the human sciences and religious sciences are a testimony of this.

Another witness to this is the 152 pages covered with a fine script which constitutes a little treatise of know-how. Neither greater or less original than the 140 pages of his agricultural course, the former owes much to "The Rules of Politeness and Christian Civility", written previously by Saint De La Salle. The disciple is set apart from his master by a less biblical inspiration and by quoting authors who had been ignored by his predecessor. The objectives pursued were the same. The young students of today will be tomorrow's merchants, industrialists, and vine-growers. The former farmhand whom life had taught very much, puts them on guard against whatever might render them offensive. He teaches all that would make of them men of esteem, and since they are Christians, witnesses of humility and of evangelical charity, two essential components of an authentic politeness which they should consider, as St. De La Salle had written 160 years earlier, "as a virtue with regard to God, neighbour and one's self".

Have I said enough about it to give you patient LASALLIANA readers a desire to read between pages 112 and 159 of my book the testimonies presented by his confreres and his students about this skilled teacher and excellent catechist, of this remarkable educator who was in Rheims from 1863 to 1877, Brother Arnold? And will you be astonished when you learn from the next article that the Superiors confided to him at 39 years of age the direction of the Novitiate at Champagne-Lorraine, and then from 1879 the animation of the spiritual retreats organized in this same district for the Brothers about to make their perpetual profession?

BROTHER ARNOLD DIRECTOR OF NOVICES AND ANIMATOR OF SPIRITUAL RETREATS

"An Institute in a storm"

In 1880 during a conference to retreatants Brother Arnold asks:

> "Who gives us saints? Not simply those holy men who are good hearted and pleasant to deal with, but true saints, united to God, dead to themselves and who are the great resource of the Institute during the storm».

A violent storm was indeed stirring up the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools and the entire Church at the same time in the native land of St. John Baptist De La Salle for the past several years. And the waves, far from calming down, washed away all the prospering apostolates to the point of expulsion in 1904 until it arrived at the separation of Church and State in 1905. What would become of these men battered about by the turbulence, especially the youngest among them?

Brother Arnold, who had been named Director of Novices in 1877, two years later added to his duties those of animator of the spiritual retreats held during the summer school vacation. To these retreats came not only aspirants to perpetual profession to invigorate their soul, but also already professed Brothers in need of spiritual revitalization. Both novices and retreatants were all in the same boat and were asking the same question: "What does tomorrow hold for us?" To this anxiety, Brother Arnold had only one reply: "Be saints and you will have both the light and the strength to make the necessary decisions". This answer was understood by the majority. Some left France to go "on the Missions". Others stayed where they were; changing the robe for a business suit, at great personal sacrifice, they maintained the works, which without their dynamism would have disappeared in the storm. Some others, of course — could they have done otherwise? — returned to their family.

"A Guide as sure and energetic as he was discreet"

Nevertheless, at Thillois from 1877 to 1885, and for the next five years at Courlancy, the captain of the crew did not panic nor did his passengers. The firmness of his faith shone through a spiritual direction which steered towards the essential. All those who sought his advice, his former pupils, novices and retreatants, the Brothers who helped him in the novitiate of the Jesuit Fathers who preached the retreats, all recognized in him "a guide as sure and energetic as he was discreet».

His reputation was such that the Brothers in charge of religious formation had recourse to his direction or at least to his occasional advice, and priests consulted him on cases of conscience or they would simply come to spend some days or hours in contact with the strength and serenity of his interior life.

His theological knowledge and his spiritual experience aided by a pedagogical sense to which I have already referred at length, worked marvels in an otherwise delicate area, it is true, as the teaching of mathematics and the natural sciences! Young novices and the more experienced professed Brothers could tell all their problems to this elder brother who was so humble and so clear that he seemed to understand the maladies of the soul as well as those of the body and could treat them with tender and firm charity.

One recognized in him such concern for wanting to direct all towards the one Master that one felt confident in making whatever effort he exacted. If someone gave up on trying to reach the proposed height, still he remained no less attached to this guide whom he lacked the courage to follow. It also happened that a person following his directions, changed the pathway yet all the while aiming for the same summit: thus some of his generous novices became diocesan priests in France or in America.

"A perfect copy of the Holy Founder"

In 1888, John Baptist De La Salle is proclaimed "Blessed"! Brother Arnold had not waited until the Founder of his Institute was officially proposed by the Church as an example and object of veneration of the faithful to pray to him and to make him his model. Now the time had come to offer him as a model to his disciples. He had not waited until he was named Novice Director and retreat animator to study the life and writings of De La Salle, or to permeate himself with the Founder's spirit and to live according to it. It was simply that this wonderful news revealed openly what his approach led one to surmise.

Henceforth, he felt himself obliged — and with what filial joy! — to share with his disciples what he called "our homemade bread», which he had saved up until this time and which he now presented to them for them to savor. How interesting it is to find in those conferences and letters of direction written by his pen what he knew and thought about such a biographical trait or of such or such a writing of the Founder!

In particular, his practice of the Method of Mental Prayer impressed the young people whom he initiated into prayer. They felt — in a strong sense of the term — how much he understood prayer intellectually, no doubt, but how much more because he lived it.

What can we say about the humility, poverty, obedience and devotedness of our Brother Arnold if not that these virtues which he had practiced in his youth took on a Lasallian hue from the day on which he discovered De La Salle? Perhaps this imitation seems to us to be too realistic after the same manner of certain French painters, his contemporaries. Would it be fair not to take into account the spiritual atmosphere of the 19th century to which Brother Arnold himself belonged?

In this regard, looking more closely, how could we not ascertain that the Lasallian dynamism of Brother Arnold is the spirit of the Founder? In a few phrases — we could certainly quote others — Brother Arnold writes:

"We cannot renounce certain positions, nor even practice certain acts of virtue which he practiced, either because of a lack of circumstances or because of a lack of moral perfection, but we can and should take upon ourselves his spirit. We are Brothers of the Christian Schools to the extent that our Blessed Founder's spirit is in us".

BROTHER ARNOLD "IN THE SHADOW OF THE SPIRIT"

"By the movement of the Spirit of God"

If there is one recommendation of Saint De La Salle which our protagonist followed to the letter, it was that of Chapter two of the Rule of 1705 inviting all the Brothers of the Christian Schools to do all their actions "by the guidance of God, by the movement of his Spirit and with the intention of pleasing Him".

It can be said of Brother Arnold what is sung in a recent liturgical hymn about the Blessed Virgin Mary, that is, that he lived "in the shadow of the Spirit". Do we not hear him express the meaning of this verse when he writes:

> It is the Spirit of God who brought about in Mary the divine work of the Incarnation by the creation of the sacred humanity of Jesus Christ.
> It is again He who returns to accomplish in us the precious fruit of the holy life brought by Jesus Christ to the world".

For Brother Arnold, the third Person of the Holy Trinity was not, as He had been for so long in our Church and as He was called in 1921 by one of our well known confreres, "the Divine Unknown".

It is interesting to discover the progression with which his story unfolds, how from Landroff to Courlancy the Spirit of God, received in baptism, made his imprint increasingly more demanding and at the same time more tender on this generous soul.

The frightful austerities with which the servant of God wove his nights and days were not blind masochism but the "wisdom of God" such as that defined by Saint Paul (1 Co. 1, 22, 23)). Penetrated with the so-called theology "of compensation" so much valued in the nineteenth century, Brother Arnold, as he exhorted his disciples, offers > "with steadfastness to the Heart of Jesus the sorrowful compensation exacted by sin".

"An enlightened charity"

However, this "Lasallian ascetic", as he is called, has too much common sense and evangelical sense not to place fraternal charity above mortification. Sketching the portrait of a mortified man, he speaks about an "enlightened charity" as a lamp before one's steps or of a proof of truth.

His confreres, students, later his brothers and sisters, his companions in schools and those who worked with him are all unanimous in underlining the place held in the life of Jules Reche by the "fruit of the Spirit: love, joy, peace, patience, goodness, benevolence, mildness, and self-mastery" (Ga 5, 22, 23). And these manifestations of an "enlightened charity" help them acknowledge the other panel of the diptych: "Those who belong to Christ have crucified their flesh with its passions and desires". (id. 5, 24). They recognize the bonds which unite "Austerus" and "Agape" in the same man whom they admire: "If we live in the Spirit let us also walk under the impulse of the Spirit", concludes St. Paul in the same letter (5, 25).

Living by the Spirit, Brother Arnold seemed to all who shared his existence or those who met him occasionally, as a charming man, pleasant and full of good humor, delicate in accepting others, and attentive to all, especially to the timid and those most deprived.

His relations with his family were such that he wrote to them often, paid them visits, and shared their joys and sorrows. He suffered deeply over the partitioning of Lorraine in 1872 which made the village where he was born German territory.

Going back to his students and confreres of the Rue de Venise, and to the novices and retreatants of Thillois and Courlancy, they all pay homage to his "indefatigable devotedness". It was a devotedness which really overlooked nothing, especially to the sick to whom he consecrated himself, even during the night if needed, so that his Brothers would not be fatigued or be irritated because of missing their sleep.

Still, what struck his students the most was the patience of this educator. He had patience to the point that his students believed that he had absorbed this difficult virtue "with his mother's milk," as the pious hagiographers were wont to say. Nothing is further from the truth! Many attest that this seemingly jovial fellow was quite violent by nature. Then suddenly, it seems, he becomes mild with his very tender infancy from "the Holy Spirit who was been given to us". Brother Arnold received from Him the request of the liturgy of Pentecost: "Come, Holy Spirit... make supple what is rigid, warm what in us in frozen...".

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

"... seeking together with Him to whom we pray"

> "We can be sure that it is never alone that we pray so well. Someone is living within us... It is He who creates the words within our heart ... He makes us ourselves say the psalms, the hymns, and spiritual canticles... It is the Spirit within whom we pray all the time, through every prayer and supplication...".

It is with regret that I cut this quotation short for it is a beautiful text written by Brother Arnold. It is a text with a Pauline resonance which brings us to the keystone of his spiritual life: the HOLY SPIRIT. He revealed to him Jesus given by Mary; He guided him to the wisdom of following the Crucified; He taught him the unique love of God and men. It is again with the Holy Spirit that our protagonist rejoins his Savior in prayer.

We do not in the least doubt that the Spirit was already guiding him as a child, as an adolescent in Landroff, as a young worker in Charlesville. "Led into the desert" of the religious life by the same Spirit, Jules Reche in a favorable climate brought to fruition this gift long known by his family and comrades, and later by his students, his confreres, and his novices. All of them equally speak of the long hours consecrated to prayer by the young pupil, the farmhand, the wagon driver, and the religious apostle.

At what source did he supply this insatiable thirst for praying? The same source that Catholics for the past fifty years have found to their taste: the Bible and the Liturgy. We do not hesitate to say that in this domain, Brother Arnold was a precursor and merits our attentive recognition.

His knowledge of the Bible and in particular the New Testament was that of one possessing a prodigious intelligence and memory; furthermore, he had a heart which beat to the rhythm of the word of God, not morally meditated upon, but contemplated, lived in the slightest detail of an existence totally dedicated to His service. He held a preference for the psalms which expressed his praise, his contrition, his supplications.

A compatriot and contemporary of Dom Gueranger, restorer of the Roman liturgy, Brother Arnold exhorts his novices to "pray with the Church", as we would say today":

> "I beseech you, he writes to one of them", use the prayers of the Church; they are so beautiful and so well adapted to the needs of our soul, for it is the Holy Spirit Himself who teaches us the way to pray with His Church".

We are thus led to the Holy Spirit! Cardinal Marty perceived this primordial action in the existence of Brother Arnold. He explains it at the conclusion of the preface which he so kindly agreed to write for my book;

> "The Holy Spirit ever breathes among the Brothers of the Christian Schools. Pentecost happened yesterday in Judea; Pentecost is presence and action of the Holy Spirit at every stage in the life of the Church. The testimony of Brother Arnold is a luminous arrow on the spiritual and apostolic highway for all Christians".

1 October 1987

Dear Lasalliana Readers,

This Issue Number 13 will also be the last one to appear. The number of subscriptions should be sufficient to cover the cost of printing the LASALLIANA.

This had been the case during the first year of its appearance. Subsequently, the fluctuation in the dollar's rate of exchange, the progressive diminution in the number of subscriptions, the normal increase in production costs have made it impossible to cover expenses, despite two successive increases in the annual subscription price.

After studying this situation and taking into consideration the prospects for the year 1987-88, the General Council decided last June to stop further publication with Issue Number 13.

During the course of the last four years, the LASALLIANA has tried to make the diversity and richness of Lasallian activities and initiatives throughout the world better known. At the same time, it has presented some aspects of the life and thoughts of Saint John Baptist de La Salle. It was thus a place of mutual convergence and knowledge, an instrument of exchange and a contributing factor of interdependence and communion for us all. Thanks to the LASALLIANA, quite a number of Brothers and lay people were able to express their views, at the Institute level, thus contributing to illustrate what we call "together and by association".

This final presentation is for me, therefore, the occasion for warmly congratulating and thanking all those who have contributed to the existence and to the interest in this review:

* the authors of articles for their availability and contributions;

* the faithful subscribers who showed their interest and confidence;

* those who read and made use of the articles;

* those in Rome who handled the correspondence with the authors, kept track of the subscriptions, translated the texts, did the proof reading, posted the issues, etc..

For the style and form of the LASALLIANA was truly a shared and fraternal endeavour.

A sincere word of gratitude to each and everyone.

1. A long wait.

John Baptist de La Salle died on Good Friday, April 7, 1719 and was buried the next day in the church of Saint-Sever in Rouen. It was Holy Saturday and consequently the funeral ceremonies were without solemnity. But still, those who knew him did not hesitate to venerate him as a saint. The first transfer of his mortal remains, which took place a few years later, attracted a large crowd as the clergy and faithful of Rouen hastened to render him the homage of their veneration and gratitude.

We can very justifiably be astonished to see the Church wait nearly two centuries before authorizing his cult by proclaiming him Blessed. Without doubt, between 1700 and 1900 beatifications and canonizations were rather rare. Those who were proclaimed as Saints or Blessed waited a long time for their glorification. They waited as long as De La Salle and some even longer than he.

In the Bulletin of October, 1950, Brother Felix Paul († 1952) took up this subject with a bit of humor in his "a Palm of Paradise", where he placed, according to the duration of their wait for glorifiication, the servants of God canonized or beatified over the past three centuries. Beginning with Sister Therese of the Infant Jesus to the Founders of the Servites, the waiting period stretches from 28 to 488 years. All this locates John Baptist de La Salle in a rather good place, being exactly 23rd out of a total of 42.

2. A baseless suspicion

Still in Rome and elsewhere, some have thought that this long delay was to be attributed to a certain negligence on the part of the Brothers who were not solicitous enough about promoting the introduction of the process of beatification of the Founder. Brother Felix Paul, already referred to, rectifies this assertion. From the very year of the Founder's death, Brother Barthelemy, Superior General, set about gathering testimonies from the clergy and faithful who knew the deceased. Two years later, the first biography appeared. It was the work of Brother Bernard, who submitted it to the De La Salle family. Brother Bernard did not hesitate to speak of the "sanctity" of his hero, but in so doing, he was careful to in no way preempt the judgment of the Church to which alone belongs the task of recognizing and proclaiming the sanctity of an individual in two forms.

It seems that it was foreseen that Brother's manuscript would have a second edition. It would be the first part of a gathering of documentation in view of the beatification.

In the next few years, we see the Brothers of Saint Yon carefully publishing the greater part of the Founder's works which up to that time had been in manuscript form. They are very careful about keeping all the objects which belonged to him. They entrust Canon Blain with writing a new Life of De La Salle, and they urge him to complete this "life" with a fourth part designed specifically to extol the virtues of the Servant of God. The presentation of this fourth part leads one to consider it as the kind of positio super virtutibus which is required by the Roman Curia during the canonization process.

3. Initial Probing

As soon as the two large volumes of Blain are published, two parcels of the entire work make their way to Rome where the Brothers in charge see to it they reach the hands of several officers of the Pope and also of the King of France who eventually might be requested to intercede with the Congregation of Rites which is specifically charged with causes for beatification. On his part, Brother Timothy, Superior General, has attestations of several favours, particularly some cures and the multiplication of bread, attributed to the Founder's intercession, properly documented.

It would not be superfluous to recall here the interpretation of certain texts regarding the beatification process. Since Urban VIII (1623-1644) canon law forbade the recognition of the heroicity of a Servant of God until at least 50 years after his death. Consequently, some considered it obligatory to delay until the expiration of this period any presentation to the Curia. John Baptist de La Salle had died in 1719, therefore the earliest that any presentation could be initiated would be in 1769. Was this interpretation given to the law by Brother Timothy and the Brothers of the first generations? That is not unlikely. Later, however,during the generalship of Brother Florence (1767-1777), we still do not see the Brothers initiating the introductory process which they judged should be deferred.

Others have interpreted this regulation about the delay of fifty years, as pertaining not to a required delay before the introduction of the cause but rather for the conclusion of the Roman process regarding the Servant of God's reputation of sanctity and virtue. Following this opinion, one could introduce the cause prior to a half-century's delay. Meanwhile, the Brothers of the eighteenth century, personally and on behalf of the Institute, missed no opportunity of presenting to the goodwill of the Roman Pontiffs pertinent texts but without any mention of a request for the introduction of the cause for the beatification of the Founder.

Of course, soon would come the troubled times at the end of this century, then the upheavals of the great revolution! The Institute would survive all of this, thanks to the benevolence of the Popes, but neither they nor the Brothers could even dream about bringing up the introduction of the long process of a cause of beatification.

4. The long procedure

This matter was not taken up until the generalship of Brother Anaclet (1830-1838). What was particularly decisive here was the trip to Rome of Brother Abdon, the third Assistant. Contacts were established with the officers of the Curia. Then precise directives were sent to Paris. These led the Superior General to seek the initiation of the first process in the four dioceses where the Servant of God had lived for a long time, namely, Rheims, Paris, Rouen, and Marseille. If the fourth of these processes was soon abandoned, the other three continued on until 1838, with the hearing of the long testimonies of witnesses concerning the veracity of what they had read or had heard about the virtuous life of John Baptist de La Salle.

As a conclusion to all of this, on May 8, 1840, Pope Gregory XVI signed the decree of introduction to the court of Rome for the cause of beatification for one who from then on would be referred to as Venerable John Baptist De La Salle. Then, according to the requirements of Rome during this time, the bishops concerned drew up documentation which would seek to satisfactorily answer any objections which might be raised. It was during these years of investigation and study that the General Secretariat of the Institute had to produce some very detailed work, which was quite difficult to do during that period. The great revolution had either destroyed or dispersed too many documents, and while the items in the archives were being reorganized little by little, the Brothers were far from possessing the keys which were so indispensable to the investigation and research. So, we are not overly surprised then that it took some thirty years, years so replete with wars and revolutions, for the ecclesiastical judges to obtain the proofs of John Baptist de La Salle's sanctity. In 1873, Rome was in a position to affirm that the Venerable De La Salle had practiced the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity, and the moral virtues of prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance to a heroic degree.

5. The sanction of miracles

The Church had made its pronouncement, but awaited from God the confirmation of its judgment by the performance of several miracles attributable to the intercession of the Servant of God. In the case of John Baptist de La Salle, no eye witness to the holiness of his life being available, the rules of procedure required the presentation of four recognized miracles. Pope Leo XIII decided, however, that it would suffice to present only three. The three which were accepted were the instant and complete cure of Brother Adelminien, of the Christian Schools, of a progressive locomotor ataxy; of young Etienne de Suzanne, of a terminal capillary bronchitis; and of Marie-Madeleine-Victoire Ferry of an incurable chronic hydropericardiac, complicated by other very serious illnesses.

6. The solemnity of the beatification

The ceremony followed during that time was quite different from that which we are familiar with after Vatican II. The ceremony took place, not in the basilica itself, but rather in the so-called Beatification Hall on the upper floor above the door of the basilica. It was there that on February 19, 1888, a number of Brothers, including Brother Miguel Febres Cordero, were able to be present for the reading of the brief of beatification and then to join in the celebration of Holy Mass. The Mass celebrant was a Belgian prelate, Archbishop Felix-Marie de Neckere, who was chosen probably because of the functions which he fulfilled as secretary-econome of the maintenance of the church of Saint Peter in the Vatican.

7. The Festivities which followed

The awaiting of this first glorification of the Founder had lasted a long time. It was a waiting period accompanied by prayer and also by research and study. During the previous two centuries, within the Institute, the Brothers who could not yet publicly venerate John Baptist de La Salle, compensated for this by solemnizing the feast of his holy precursor and patron of his baptism on June 24.

The beatification opened the way for the future public and external cult and immediately triduums of thanksgiving were organized everywhere even before the celebration of the liturgical feast which was designated for May. In the houses of the Institute as well as in the parishes and dioceses, the priestly orators lauded the person and works of the Blessed De La Salle. The more remarkable of these eloquent homilies have been gathered into seven thick volumes in octavo. In song, on canvas, and in marble, artists memorialized and praised the Priest, Founder, Apostle of the lowly, Educator of little ones, and Formator of teachers. One hymn perhaps more than all others preserves for us even until today the memories of February 19, 1988. This is the hymn Honneur a Toi, "Honor to you, o Blessed De La Salle", where it is believed that the word "Blessed" was replaced by "Glorious" following the canonization of May 24, 1900.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF SAINT JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE (1)

What can a human being add to the Gospel? Nothing? St. Paul affirms: "In my own flesh, I make up for what is lacking in the sufferings of Jesus Christ" (Col. 1, 24). What could possibly be lacking there?

Perhaps, by this expression, Saint Paul is trying to divide the human act into two possible aspects: the first, a situational one which locates Jesus in the history and milieu of man and which through his resurrection creates that space of absolute and vital possibility. But this first aspect is occupied by the being of the God man. The second aspect is occupied by the existence of created man which unceasingly explores the area where human space exists and he contemplates it from his concrete historical situation. But man perceives this space as lacking something fundamental which he has not yet come to define. Man must try to join these two aspects. Of course, the human aspect produces secular fruit. When man explores it, he perceives the lack of unity and a kind of alienation from his natural destiny. Therefore, the human horizon becomes sterile if it does not make contact with the fruitful horizon of the God man.

Thus is explained the subsidiary redemptive action done by man and which is easily understood as an explicit intention throughout the entire course of the history of humanity. There is no epoch in history which does not consider this redemptive task as a vital and inevitable commitment for that time. Thus there are the geniuses, the heroes, and especially the saints who most explicitly wish to fulfill that part of redemption which they are called upon to do. That is what any person can add to the Gospel: "to do what he has to do".

When John Baptist de La Salle comes forth as a protagonist in the seventeenth century, to propose by his way of living, thinking, and acting, a new solution to the ever present human misery, he detected a need and to fill that need. In doing so, John Baptist de La Salle was doing what he had to do!

The reality was this: the needy child had no one to help him or to appreciate him. Who in the evangelical sense is his BROTHER? His parents cannot take care of him for they are poor artisans and laborers who must spend a good part of the day in seeking their daily food; little time remains for the spiritual welfare of their children. What can their blood brothers do for them? What can their peers do for them, let alone those of a different social class?

There is another reality and with which the coredemptive activity of St. La Salle is going to meet. The situation in France is no different from the life in Spain, Portugal, or on the Italian peninsula. Soon La Salle sets into motion an ecumenical movement interested in the underprivileged children of the world. For this the army of "white rabats" are repeatedly called to the four corners of the world. La Salle is the precursor and protagonist of a movement which if it has continued on until our own day, is because its substance is nourished on human necessity. This is what keeps the Lasallian world living in perpetual youth. To be otherwise would have spelled the death of an organism which could no longer operate. On its tomb would have arisen another response!

But how did La Salle give this group the strength they needed to survive up to our present day?

Among the various realities which present themselves as possibilities, we will take this one into account: La Salle saw as the strength of his group the possibility of a permanent Brotherhood. If there is Brotherhood, there is a redemptive historical strength. It is must be lived in a concrete environment and for La Salle this concrete environment is the Community. The Community is the place of Brotherhood.

Let us take this last sentence as a declaration of principle and let us treat it, in the Lasallian spirit, carefully probing what it says, without weakening anything, without opportunist, convenient or triumphal accommodations. It is really a question of a principle upon which we must begin. Today's man meets with today's Lasallian and wished to know before all else: "Who are you? and then, where do you come from? and what were you before? And thus we keep on going back until we come to the question: What were you originally? and then finally, How much of that past do you still hold on to today?

When you are beside a river, the question immediately arises: where does this river come from? Then there will follow a lesson of how things in our world our constituted, power going back to its source, always following its banks.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Then a singular calm will be experienced: It begins here! Here starts all that follows, all along the way, ever increasing, until it arrives at the sea...!

This question as a principle can be posed in various ways.

We can do this by interpreting the meaning of the word Community. Not so much what it means to us, men living on the threshold of the twenty-first century. We have to find out what it meant for La Salle. From the strength of the Community the possible strength of Fraternity is derived. If our exploration brings us to the evident proof that Community is Fraternity, the conclusion of our brief exegesis is clear: Fraternity exists only to the extent that Community exists. This leads us to a significant Lasallian corollary: La Salle's intuition of Community travelled along the current of the river of time and of life, applicable in his time only as a concrete, religious Community, and now applied by extension to what is called an educative Community. It is a Community which comprises such diverse atmospheres as that of the father of a Lasallian family and his conjugal and family Community, and of the Lasallian student and his Fraternal Community, of the Lasallian teacher and his professional Community, and of the former Lasallian student and his social Community, and of the Lasallian employee and his working Community... This concept, narrow at its starting point, already reaches an ecumenical breadth, until it reaches a universal Brotherhood.

I do not believe that one can object that these premises do not lead to this conclusion. Or what is the same: La Salle never contemplated nor did he intuit what we now obtain as a projection of his teaching under such various aspects. How do we answer this?

Words have a life of their own. Their beginning is in a stammering existence which qualify equally stammering actions: we must recall that action precedes language. Born within a precise place and determined historical time, words have special connotations in their meaning and projection. Then comes their time of full maturity, but a maturity full of the action which gave them their origin and which was elvolving towards the development which tried to encompass more than it did at its inception. This is logical. What historical movement, whether idealogical, political, or religious... lives on as it was at its beginning? And their founders are considered as heroes who never thought to raise their primordial idea to what it is today.

We have failed to advance one most important idea: the Community is not made up only by men and women who have come together of their own free will. There is no community if the God Abraham, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is not present.

Now we can explore what Community is for La Salle. La Salle does not give definitions. He seeks God in the happenings where he finds the manifestation of the Spirit according to which he allows himself to be led. His meditations are where he shows his particular way of thinking, allowing us to see two powerful points which illuminate and at the same time explain his thinking: his meditation on Holy Scripture and his experience in dealing with his Brothers. These two points make up the strength of his theology of Community. Two lines converging at the omega point: Christ in the person of the Brother.

The Community is the "place where God gathers together those whom He has chosen as His own (6.1).[1] La Salle affirms in the same text: "If we leave this sanctuary it must be only because God so wills it, because we are called upon to go and preserve the life of Christ in the hearts of those whom we have to instruct" (Ibid). In a religious Community, you are in a house where prayer should be your chief occupation. The spirit of God will dwell therein, and God will shower His blessings thereon, only in so far as it is a place of prayer. As soon as you lose the spirit of prayer, and a love for this holy exercise, God will cease to look favorably upon you, but will consider you rather as one unworthy of your employment, which is really His own work, and as one who is turning His house into a den of thieves (62.1). This spirit of prayer is manifested in the practice of two virtues: obedience and the union of hearts (charity) in view of "helping one another to be of God" (113.2; cfr. 65). La Salle asks with exquisite delicacy: "Are you at one with your Brothers? Do you speak to them and treat them with love? Do you not hold any ill feelings or grudges? (Id.). The Founder at this time holds up as a model the early Community which Luke tells of in the Acts of the Apostles (4,32). La Salle does not create a utopian illusion. He knows full well that perhaps there are those who joyfully commit themselves at first, something like newly-weds, but, how many remain faithful until they end? La Salle points out the reason for the desertion: one is that a person has failed to learn how to pray and another is the failure of being careful about the observance of the Rules. He says with a calm realism "As there are few in religious houses who acquit themselves perfectly of this double duty, there are many who have not the graces necessary to persevere and to preserve the spirit of their state, and who therefore belong merely to the body of the Community, and whom it is necessary to cut off as dead members, as being a source of corruption for the others" (72.1). Is this not the situation, unfortunately, in human groups: between husband and wife, family members, working groups, school Communities? If there is a lack of prayer and if there is infidelity to common norms, there is no fundamental fidelity. The richness of the group lies in persons. It is the Spirit of Jesus Christ who animates the human spirit. Each Community ought to be a gathering of those men and women animated by the Spirit of Jesus who make up the Church of Jesus Christ.

We have already given some of the elements which are the means which must be always present in a Community in order to further the Brotherhood, prayer, mutual love, and perseverance. Let us proceed a bit farther with a deepening of this idea. It is clear that this spirit in community requires a special type of "living member". La Salle makes an allusion to this in referring to obedience as the foundation of Communities and if it is lacking "they soon find themselves in ruin" (7.2). The practice of this virtue establishes "...order, union, peace, tranquility" (Id.) What happens in a human group when there is no hierarchy? Is horizontalism possible? It is obvious that new modes of authority-obedience have been appearing, but the binomial authority-obedience of whatever shade is a social fact which is not limited to the religious life. La Salle sees the absence of authority and a lack of obedience in a Community as "the abomination of desolation in the holy place" (15.3).

There is another way of posing the opening question. It would be a question of capturing from the thought of La Salle what would be the prototype of Brother which our religious congregation and our civil society need. We are within the same schema: we run down the road along the river, with rapid steps, very rapid ones, among which there are too many questions to be asked. Still, we profit also by the successes which we have achieved up to this time: 1) La Salle wrote for the Brothers of today; 2) La Salle's thoughts on Brotherhood are implicitly found in his writings on the Community; 3) the doctrine on Brotherhood transcends the religious Community of consecrated Brothers and embraces whatever type of human Community which is searching for the installation of the kingdom of God.

The force of a group is shown, the dynamic society tells us, in the interdependence of its members in view of a common destiny. If those bonds which unite the members with one another are strong, the group will be perceived as indestructible; difficulties are obstacles which are to be overcome, and never obstacles which are unbreakable barriers. Crises invigorate! If the Community of Brothers has its purpose clearly in view, if the bonds which unite the members are sufficiently strong, the Brother's Community will have the strength to continue on permanently.

One has to be a fighter in order to be considered a member of a Lasallian Brotherhood. The person as an individual is difficult and the human environment is not easily overcome. Misunderstandings spring up spontaneously; it is not difficult to recognize the fact that there is something in man which cannot be contained. Man has a weak nature from his origin; this has caused disorder at every level of man's life. How much it costs a new order to succeed! The Brother is asked to show patience which is a powerful reconciling force. "There are many religious who wish to see miracles and wonders in their Brothers, in the sense that they would like to have to suffer nothing from them, which is a thing quite impossible... Do not, therefore, be so lacking in sense, so unreasonable and so unchristian as to pretend that you should not have to suffer anything from your Brothers". (73.2). In a human group there are all types of personalities. "... one will have a capricious temper, another will be combative, one will be too obliging, another will speak his mind too freely; others will be too reserved, or dissimulating or critical".

To allow the Founder to speak on this theme is somewhat of a delight. "Some perchance will say: 'I do not mind suffering such a thing from my Brother, but as for this other matter, I cannot bear it;' ... Think well on this. If you fancy you can live in Community without supporting the defects of your Brothers, you are mistaken," (74.2). He speaks of burdens to be borne which are the defects of others (73.3); he recommends good example "because the Brothers continually observe you" (69, 2; cfr. 180, 1), but one should not act out of human respect; the pharisees and Herodians praised Jesus Christ because he taught "without human respect" and La Salle adds sententiously: "Those who live in Community have special reasons for imitating Our Lord in this respect" (75, 1; cfr. Mat. 22, 15).

La Salle misses no opportunity in the daily life of a Brother to put him on guard against possible lapses, and apart from pointing out the danger, he recommends the remedy: to rise above one's evil inclinations there is no better remedy than retirement and prayer which "are the means which you can use to overcome your inclination to evil and to consecrate yourself to God without reserve". (161, 1); ... in order to fully possess the spirit proper to your state and in order to persevere in it, nothing contributes so much as obedience which gives the soul solidariity and constancy (12, 3; cfr. 7, 2; 89, 1). "Obedience is the most necessary and principal virtue... for all who live in Community" (Col 44) [2] Obedience as a "virtue by which one submits his will and judgement to a man as being the representative of God" (id). Who obeys whom and why in the family, school, political Community? Within guarded proportions, there are serious reasons for thinking about revising those fundamental spiritual attitudes which will contribute much in creating harmony within the human group... to make others more aware that you are risen with Christ and aspire to lead a new life for a Brother ought "to order his conversions well, seeing to it that they are holy and agreable to God" (30, 1). "As the disciples of Emmaus, do you leave these conversations, burning with divine love, better instructed in your duties, and encouraged to acquit yourself more competently thereof? (Id; cfr. Mat. 24, 32).

So much could be said about human conversation! One modern writer claims that more people are killed by words than by bullets. How much the human community would gain by guarding its words! When a society goes astray, the first thing to be done to reform it is to control the tongue. The care which La Salle took in this matter is evident on many occasions. Thus he offers the Brothers an "exhaustive catalogue of topics for conversation during recreation time". Whose purpose was to preserve the Brothers from the corruption of their day: (Col. 59); he recommends how the Brothers can become interior and he prescribes the following necessary privations: 1) from human conversations; 2) from useless words (Col 109). Why should we deprive ourselves of human conversations? Because they "drain the soul of the spirit of God", and if anyone speaks, "let him speak the words of God" (Col. 116). La Salle, knowing the weakness of human nature and the words of St. James: "if anyone fails not in words, the same is a perfect man" (3,2), insists upon silence as a virtue which brings one close to God and withdraws one from the world (16,2). What a surprising thing it is, says La Salle "it is in solitude and silence that one learns to speak well" (135.1). Going into the least details, he asks the Brothers "Do you want your students to be silent? Then keep silent yourself" (33,2).

What possibility exists for today's society to observe a measured discipline, in the way required, which is going to entail the control of words? There can be no possibility of Brotherhood in a society where words cease to have their proper significance. The word is the house of the person, but if this house is invaded by undesirable tenants, what hope is there for living a fruitful Fraternal life if there is not peace within it?

Conclusion

For La Salle the consideration of Brotherhood is closely linked with the idea of Community. Whoever says B*ROTHERHOOD,* says Community; whoever says Community, says Brotherhood.

La Salle, finally, traces a rather severe sketch of the Brother who lives in Brotherhood, a profile which applies to every other person who aspires to a universal Brotherhood.

If La Salle was able to add something to the Gospel: he did what he had to do!

AT THE SERVICE OF INTERDEPENDENCE THE DE LA SALLE FOUNDATION

The interest of the Montreal District in mission countries goes back at least to the year 1927 when the superior of the Dominican Fathers of Canada expressed to His Holiness Puis XI their desire of getting the cooperation of Canadian communities for the diocese of Hakodate, Japan, the administration of which they had just accepted. From this moment appears the first exchanges between the authorities of the district and other groups engaged in missionary activities.

Beginning in 1932, the Montreal District decided to invest men and money in the formation of several men, and in sending them and maintaining them, at first in Japan, then in the Cameroons, in Guadeloupe, and in other countries under the jurisdiction of French or English speaking Districts of Canada.

It would be difficult to come up with statistics concerning the financial contribution made by the Corporation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools of the Montreal District over the past fifty years. The total sum goes into eight digits in Canadian dollars.

In 1974, a field in the missionary apostolate was opened to the French speaking Brothers of the Canadian districts and the FSC Corporation of Montreal assumed the financial responsibility for this field. We are referring to Haiti, a small country in the Antilles. Because at that time, benefactors began getting more interested in the development of this mission, the Procurator and Visitor of that time considered making use of the privileges offered by the Canadian Government and the Government of the Province of Quebec in the development of works of charity.

Notification of the registration of a charitable organization

On January 1, 1978, the sector for Canadian Taxes and Revenues released a NOTIFICATION OF REGISTRATION of a charitable organization which would be called "Lasallian Missions: Haiti, Japan, Island of Tortuga, etc.". The notification carries the following mention:

"In the calculation of their taxable revenue, the donors can claim as reductions the gifts given to charitable organizations or associations starting from the date of effectivity, in conformity with paragraph 110 (1) a) of the law of taxation upon revenues to the extent provided by the dispositions of said paragraph, if the gifts are supported by a receipt containing all the required information by part XXXV of the rules on the taxation of income".

A corporation duly recognized by the law on Companies

In 1980, the Montreal District Council decided to go even further by transforming the already existing charitable organization into a corporation duly recognized by the law of companies of the Province of Quebec. This transformation would allow for changing the name of the organization, of forming an administrative council with laymen recognized in their circle as upright and devoted administrators, and of going in search of benefits and rather interesting concessions from the Canadian Agency of International Development (ACDI) and other funding agencies. Here are the reasons given for the founding of this corporation, as they are defined in the official document:

1. To further the development of education in Haiti and in other countries of the Third World;
2. To contribute to the material help of underprivileged people in Haiti and in other Third World countries;
3. Without prejudice to the Law on private education (L.R.Q. 1977 ch. E-9) to enact, encourage, and promote activities regarding the education and instruction of underprivilged persons;
4. To facilitate the introduction and re-integration of deprived people into society;
5. To administer, manage, finance, and subsidize all activities, operations, research, studies, and projects leading to the realization and execution of the objectives of the corporation;
6. To acquire, keep, sell, give, administer, or manage movable or immovable goods to be used for the accomplishment of the objectives of the corporation;
7. To collaborate with any organizations having similar objectives;
8. To initiate fund raising drives in favor of the corporation;
9. The objectives above mentioned do not permit however the corporation to offer to the public plans for singular or periodic contributions whereby contributors or fund raisers are re-imbursed or benefited in any form whatsoever for the money they have donated to the corporation, except as a remuneration to be paid on occasions to certain persons working as officers or administrators.

A corporation: The De La Salle Foundation

On March 15, 1980, the organization "The Lasallian missions: Haiti, Japan, Island of Tortuga, etc." became The De La Salle Foundation, an independent corporation, administered by a council made up of Brothers and Laity. The administrative council names a Director who periodically renders an account of his administration to the council members. At present, the director general is an unsalaried layman.

The Income of the De La Salle Foundation

The De La Salle Foundation derives its income from three principal sources:

1. Personal donations;
2. Grants from the ACDI and other funding agencies;
3. The Corporation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

With the view of presenting an annual budget which testifies to the importance and seriousness of the organization, the Brothers of the Christian Schools Corporation of the Montreal District sends to the foundation the total accounts which have accrued each year for the Haiti mission. The foundation becomes the intermediary between the F.S.C.. Corporation and the mission.

An understanding with the F.S.C. Corporation of Montreal

To make the relations between the F.S.C. Corporation and the Foundation Corporation official, an agreement has been approved and signed which specifies the functions in the transactions between the two corporations.

A tacit agreement between the Foundation and the missionaries also exists. When the missionary receives an in hand donation or through the intermediateship of the Bulletin of the Foundation, the account is remitted to the Foundation which issues a tax receipt in the name of the donor, endorses the donation in the name of the missionary and sends the sum of money back to the latter who uses it according to the norms set up by the mission council.

A director of communications

To assist the director general, the Corporation has named a director of communications, at present a Brother, who edits an informational bulletin which is sent to benefactors four times a year. The director of communications also maintains relations with those in charge of the missionary apostolate of the dioceses and of the region of Montreal. On occasions, he will give a homily during the Sunday Mass and realize some funds from the special collection which is usually taken up on such an occasion. To do the above, he must receive permission from the local ordinary and from the parish priest.

Sending out goods by container

We should mention that the Foundation also looks after the sending of good of all sorts to the Haiti mission. These shipments contain anything from teaching materials all the way to heavy construction materials. Two Brothers work the year round in receiving and packing, materials, and then twice a year they send such by ship in the special containers made for this purpose. Occasionally, these two Brothers are helped by missionaries who are passing through.

"Trust" funds

Certain benefactors prefer that their gifts be invested only progressively. They therefore choose for their manner of donation loans held in "trust" or wills and testaments.

The Foundation authorities have therefore created a "Trust" fund which at present is approaching the amount of 100,000 Canadian dollars.

These funds, invested in the City Savings Bank of the District of Montreal, is further augmented by the following gifts: a) personal gifts; b) gifts left in wills; c) gifts from "lost funds"; c) others. For tax purposes, an official receipt is issued to the benefactors for the interest received from these placements.

The accomplishments of the De La Salle Foundation

Each year sometime near the month of May, the mission council must draw up, after consultation and according to the order of priority, the list of projects which will figure in the annual budget for the year and which are financed by the donations received by the Foundation.

The list thus drawn up is sent to the director general who sends the necessary amounts for the realization of these projects, as rapidly as the reception of donations will permit. Up until the present, the salaries of our lay teachers in our religious schools have received the top priority. Many other request have been considered but the list is so long that not all can be accommodated. The projects realized are similar to those which missionaries carry out everywhere in the Third World countries.

Conclusion

The accounts over the past three years indicate that the total gifts received annually from donors are about 100,000 Canadian dollars, with some variations, which would then put the total budget recorded in our books as between 500,000 and 1,000,000 Canadian dollars. That means that the material help realized by the F.S.C. of Montreal in Haiti since 1983 is only partly attributable to the De La Salle Foundation.

It is up to the De La Salle Foundation only to lighten the burden which the district would have to assume if it alone had to pay for the realization of all the projects carried out by the missionaries over the past few years.

The De La Salle Foundation has allowed the F.S.C. to receive, not only for the District of Montreal, but equally for the District of Douala, the governmental subsidies which these districts could not have received without the intermediacy of a foundation. Many donations are received only because the Foundation is authorized to issue receipts which are considered as tax credits and are deductible from the amounts due to the State. Finally, many of the donations come in as a result of the publicity transmitted by the trimestrial bulletin published by the Foundation.

For all the reasons enumerated above, it is advantageous, in the Canadian context, to create and preserve the existence of an organization which is certainly profitable materially, but which is equally for the spiritual profit of countries on their way to development.

THE SCHOOL OUTSIDE THE WALLS

A progressive discovery

Ever since 1980, as a De La Salle Brother, following the footsteps of Saint John Baptist de La Salle, I found myself progressively involved in a mission to the poorest of the poor. First of all, this was with students of a "pre-professional level" which, in France, regroups children in difficulty; and at the same time I made my first contact with gipsy children through the influence of the diocesan chaplain in charge of this pastoral mission.

On All Saints' Day in 1981, in company with the regional chaplain of the Travelling People, I met the Romanies for the first time. That meeting, I firmly believe, was for me, very frankly, a revelation, a sign from God. I was seduced, conquered, by the very simplicity of these folk, by their sincere and friendly approach.

The Chaplain had introduced me to these pauper families, but now I had to make my way alone to get to know them personally. That wasn't easy! I wanted to contact them, but what was I to say really? What was I to do? I was a teacher; I had done many things for children which had taken up much of my time, but here, I felt drawn by a call towards these folk on the margin of society quite, quite different from those I had been in the habit of meeting normally.

I knew I would have to deal with another world, other life-habits. I felt that I had to get rid of ready-made, inbred ideas. I would go to their "school" and learn everything from them. I would have to listen and observe very hard indeed and keep my counsel. I was taking my first steps in a society about which I knew absolutely nothing. The world of the poor was near at hand and near at heart, I couldn't escape from it.

Courage for the Encounter

In order to meet the Romanies, I took my courage in both hands and drove slowly up and down the streets on the outskirts of the city. I found them near the public dumps, in isolated spots, in empty lots. I made acquaintance with them, passed the time of day, discussed things with them. We got to know each other... to appreciate each other... in a way "to tame" each other. Little by little, some families came to our community to spend a time here, to share a meal and to sing. These links of friendship continued to grow until the day when one family asked me to become godfather to their sixth child.

That day I understood the long road I had traveled. Until then, despite so many meetings, I had remained an outsider, but with the baptism of Heïdi, three years old, I became for that family the "kirvo", the godfather, which obliged me to become more "of the family", nearer to them all.

Since then, we have lived unforgettable times. Amongst these the greatest were First Communion days, pilgrimages to Lourdes, times of misery and troublesome court actions. Today after six years of meetings, exchanges and mutual listening, we are ready to go a bit further along the road of education, for we have been talking together from the start about schooling, reading, etc.. School for the travelling people is no part of their lives. Everything goes along day by day as if the school never existed. It was much too remote for them or they were made to feel unwelcome. The parents and the clan take care to initiate the youngest children into the simplest things, but they are all unable to read and they depend on friends to discuss written plans or decipher official letters.

A Travelling People

Since January 1987, I have been going into this "wild" terrain three afternoons weekly. The vehicle bought by the District allows me to take in six to eight children at a time. I keep them for an hour and a half and teach them the first elements of reading, writing and arithmetic, normally working in groups, often dealing with them individually.

For the time being, my job is in an experimental stage since I am working individually before requesting the State educational authorities to create an official teaching position for someone who will take care of the schooling of the travelling People's children, as has been done several times for the Brothers in the Paris region.

I have a total of about twenty children whom I meet and instruct. These poor children who have no access to the official or "obligatory" school, can now get instruction because the school comes to them. The "school on wheels" is their means of learning, of becoming a little bit like the "gadgé" (the nongypsies).

The children wait impatiently for the arrival of the school-bus and don't have to be begged to take their places in this little "world of knowledge".

An adapted type of education

We owe the methods we have adopted to the extensive pedagogical research of Brother Etienne of Nantes. These very simple and highly motivated methods give very fast and positive results. The pupils learn to read by means of a card game. On the cards are depicted (in drawing and writing) the ten fundamental sounds of the French language: ON, IN, UN, OI, AN, OU, EN, AU, AI.

The children are given a permit to read and when three or four stages are passed successfully, they receive a kind of scholarship of 100 francs. Thus, at the ages of 10, 13 or 16 years, they can go for the first time to a bookstore to buy books.

Up to this time, the Bible, given to each family, is the book where the children take their first steps as young readers. And what a joy it is to be present at a Mission and to see and hear a youngster reading a passage from the Word of God in front of all the grown-ups!

This is the result of many an afternoon spent in the mobile school, afternoons that the youngsters could well spend running about the country side. But they come gladly and are not in any hurry to leave this haven of knowledge. Rather they often oblige me to stay on beyond the regular time to go over a problem with them or read another story.

If only the pupils in my ordinary classes at school had the same appetite for learning!

In the Lasallian tradition

The "travelers" understand perfectly why I do what I do. They know that I am a "schoolmaster" as they say and they trust my professional capacity, but they are also aware that I am a religious, a Brother of the Christian Schools and therein they discover the real meaning of my dedication. After having seen the film "La Rencontre de Parménie" (the English title is: "Who Are My Own") during a faith-encounter, they understood better all that the Brothers stand for. They saw how Saint De La Salle loved poor children and they were happy to see that in 1987, his work continues.

Maybe it's quite a modest job! But it is work being done now more and more by others. In Perpignan, several young Lasallians preparing for the Congress of "Quebec 87" have already volunteered their services part-time to work with gypsy children. Some teachers at the school have also offered to help. Actually, although it may be a small thing, the "travelling children" and their instruction are definitely a part of my "ministry" as a Brother of the Christian Schools.

The love for the very poorest, of which the Founder speaks, is ever present in my life today, and in my plans. Besides this work of teaching reading and writing, I belong to the Parish group in charge of the Gypsies or the "Travelling People". Our frequent meetings are mutually enriching and help us to further the Kingdom of God in a marginalized society. And this Kingdom is not necessarily built by words alone; more often by action where the qualities of the poorest are recognized and appreciated.

BROTHERS OF THE THIRD AGE AT THE SERVICE OF THE HANDICAPPED

The Community of Lachine (Montreal) numbers seven Brothers, six of whom are retired.

To quote the words of Father Alfred Ducharme, S.J. the Director of the District retreat in December 1986, "Retiring age does not mean that the moment has arrived to stop everything and just go on living". And then he adds that the religious, by his profession, has given his entire life to the service of the Lord, not just up to the age of sixty-five.

Aging should not be an obstacle to the spirit of faith and of zeal which always animates the Brothers. On the contrary, belief in the values we are called upon to make known and to develop will always help us find a field of apostolate in conformity with the Church and the spirit of the Institute.

In the District of Montreal, teams of all ages dedicate their talents, their time and their physical capacity to the service of poor. Naturally, men in the prime of life, go toward organizations where more strength and activity is needed, while older men look for quieter jobs of general interest where the most important point is to listen to others.

Speaking again of the Community of Lachine, the principal fields of action are: the mission of Haïti, handicapped persons, helping the poor, students with special problems in their studies, regular courses and immigrants, etc..

At the request of LASALLIANA, the article will treat of the handicapped persons whom Brothers Albert and Réal Lanthier are taking care of within a club.

Beginnings and growth of the organization

In the spring of 1976, several handicapped persons got together with the intention of taking matters into their own hands so as to convince government authorities to have their own organization in the area with all the rights and advantages then existing.

They invited several volunteers to form a temporary council and to work toward realizing their project: recruiting, seeking resources, organizing transportation, drawing up a charter, etc.

Things went on so well that by December 8, of the same year, the Club for the Handicapped of Lac Saint Louis received official recognition from the government, with an approved charter.

The Club for the Handicapped of Lac Saint Louis is a nonlucrative organization with the following objectives:

— To regroup the physically handicapped regardless of age;

— To provide activities during their leisure moments;

— To favor formation in cultural fields or in sports;

— Diffuse information concerning their rights to various services: health, transportation, work, education, lodging, etc..

The Club operates with the help of volunteers, it is 80% self-financed and receives aid from government authorities, local organizations and personal donations.

From six beginners, the Club now has sixty-eight beneficiaries. This well demonstrates the need for an organization in this milieu to brighten up their situation and help them find their place in society on an equal rights basis.

One large family

The Club is their second family. So say its members and they are happy to do so.

There are different types of handicapped persons in the Club; some were that way from birth and others became thus in the course of life: paralysis, muscular dystrophy, accidents while working, the effect of illness or operations, amputation of limbs, etc..

Two categories of handicapped persons come to the Center: those who have only their home or an institution to share and those who after an illness or an accident have had to abandon their work, slow down their activity and adapt themselves to a new style of life.

After having taught for decades of years, it is now our turn to take lessons in accepting life, in being resigned under tribulation and in courage to face the difficulties of everyday life.

The animators and their Commitments

The religious belief of the ethnical groups in this milieu make it easier to offer different religious celebrations: the Eucharist, the sacraments, prayer groups, etc.. The presence of priests or religious does not bother them at all. On the contrary, they are considered as messengers of the Good News, always ready to understand, to listen, to encourage, to help physically and even in a special way morally.

Activities are not lacking. In fact, the Club is considered an active organization by its very nature: swimming, craftsmanship, typing, meeting days, trips, summer camps, participation in the city's community activities, sports competitions, telethons for the different groups, cultural expositions, social evenings, etc.. In internal as well as external activities, an active participation is encouraged rather than simply being present as spectators.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The participation of the handicapped is all the more comforting for them since they feel happy to be with others in thier competitions, outings, trips, public assemblies, etc..

How did Brothers Albert and Réal Lanthier come to get interested in the handicapped? As sons of St. de La Salle, the spirit of zeal is naturally in the heart of all Brothers. Having given of themselves all through life, retiring age lends itself to continue the process. Then too, occasions and organizations are never lacking.

As for Brother Albert, a request came to replace a priest who was called away to another ministry. Following a funeral service in the parish church, Brother Albert and I (Réal) went to visit the Club for the Handicapped in the adjacent hall. This first contact started a series of visits that has lasted ten years.

Brother Albert, already retired, was more available than I. Secretary-Treasurer of the Club's Council, he also directs the Club on working days, buys the food and materials for the workshops and accompanies the handicapped when they have to move about either in the city or on outings. By his very function, he is in contact with the group all day long. Thus he can freely exchange ideas with them.

To be available to these people who are alone or confined to institutions is the most important point. Giving them the opportunity of changing their horizon, of leaving their four walls for a few hours is gratifying to them.

Formerly, handicapped persons hid themselves or were hidden from the public eye. Today, mentalities have changed. Since adapted means of transportation exist, one finds them everywhere now: in shopping centers, restaurants, universities, etc.. However, priority where transportation is concerned must be respected: medical services, workmen, studies, leisure, etc.

Access to public buildings has been greatly improved as well as facilities for moving around outside by means of a wheelchair. The international year for the handicapped had done much to sensitize authorities and the population toward treating them on an equal basis. Of all the years dedicated to this purpose by the United Nations, 1981 will remain outstanding.

Concerning myself (Réal), as I was still teaching, I could be at the Club only during free periods or at meal time. My first contact with the handicapped, however, was previous to the founding of the Club. I had handicapped students in my daily typing classes and in my night courses for adults.

One day I was given the task of revising the three regular textbooks the Brothers used to teach typing. I decided to make special adaptations for the handicapped students. These appeared for LEFT HAND, RIGHT HAND and ONE-EYED in two languages, French and English.

Naturally, when a typing teacher appeared at the Club with textbooks he had composed especially for the handicapped, students were never lacking and they were delighted. Some of these at present write their own correspondence, do certain jobs, or better yet, find employment in offices as secretaries.

Besides teaching typing, part of my time is spent in the secretariate or with printing, photography, the news, etc.. What is left of it is devoted to accompanying the members of the Club in thousands of ways that are necessary in an organization of this kind.

Mutual evangelization

Our help as volunteers dates back to the founding of the Club. We number about thirty, depending on our availability during the week, in the evening or on week-ends and also during the vacation week in a camp especially adapted for the handicapped.

Thinking of others is a first step; giving to others is another, but taking on a personal, voluntary commitment brings incalculable joys and consolations. One understands better that there is greater happiness in giving than in receiving.

The handicapped show us signs of gratitude that are sincere and spontaneous. How often they tell us that they keep us in their prayers, in thanksgiving for what we do for them and ask the Lord to give us the health and the strength to remain with them a long time in the big family of the handicapped in Lac Saint Louis.

INTERESTING LASALLIAN MISSIONARY WORK IN THE ANDES (1)

How it began

In 1977, three of us, Brothers of the District of Bilbao, Spain, presented a project for greater dedication to the poor. The Brother Visitor and his council approved it. The choice indicated was some poor area in Ecuador where our presence would be useful in various ways. The Brother Visitor and his Council received us graciously.

We joined the Azogues community where two elderly Brothers were running a primary school and a secondary school. We three Brothers made use of the weekends for making contact with the native country folk, so numerous in that area and with some less numerous ones at the school in the provincial capital.

We were going to a nearby farm community to do some work towards literacy. This simple experience was enough to learn the deep causes of the underdevelopment which was all around us. We then decided upon a plan of action for the benefit of these local country folk and we also involved the Brothers of the Bilbao District in the work. Their response was truly exemplary.

During the summer vacation groups of Brothers and secular helpers began pouring in. They worked not only in catechesis and evangelization, health, and advancement, but they were also making a well thought out evaluation of the work. The conclusion was this: "Enough of this petty almsgiving; we must have a group of Brothers and co-workers to live among the local people so that this strength in personnel and economic help could achieve a maximum of usefulness and could be a witness of the dedication which the poor deserve and which the Districts ought to offer".

So, since 1983, a team of three Brothers and four co-workers are doing this varied work.

Among the local people

During the mornings, we work in the school, which needs religious personnel so badly. This also provides us with some funds for our subsistence. Right after lunch, we go to the nearby high Andes to live among the local farm people and to share with them our faith in Jesus.

The choice of a place was not made at random. After studying the needs and possibilities of more than 40 villages, we chose, with the agreement of the local ordinary, the most poor, cold, deprived, and pastorally neglected place. The center of operations is found in Aquarongo: a small farm community at 3,500 meters altitude. The field of activities goes all the way up to 3,800 meters. The climate is very cold all year round. The soil is poor and the lands are the edges of the large estates. Still, for these country folk it is their only treasure; I say treasure because this is the first time that they have been owners of land.

Almost all here are immigrants from the nearby villages. They are a people with a will to work, with an immense desire to improve their learning, to create new sources of work, to better themselves, and to take better care of their families.

At the root of our first contacts with these people, we were asking the following quuestion: "What do you expect from missionaries?" The answer was always "We want them to talk to us about the Word of God and of things of the Christian faith".

Hardships

An initial investigation and visit to each of the families made us see clearly the grave problems which they were complaining about:

— High infant mortality.

— General illness: intestinal parasites, lung aliments, respiratory infections, cerebral hemorrhages, skin diseases of bacterial origin, etc..

— Deficient and unbalanced nutrition.

— Illiteracy.

— Superstition and magic.

— Sub-human living conditions, a deplorable lack of hygiene.

— A serious lack of infrastructure: they had no electrical current, no running water, no toilet facilities; many houses had no beds or furniture.

— Medical attention was distant and costly.

What should be done?

The feeling of inadequacy was enormous. We really felt ourselves poor in face of the magnitude and variety of the problems we had to resolve. But the strength of the Spirit and the confidence of our team encouraged us.

One rural family let us rent their poor house for the team's lodging. We moved in. They went to live in a nearby very poor hut. It was not possible to convince them to do otherwise.

Our team took periods of prayer and reflection in order to program the work we were going to do, confronted as we were with such an amount of work.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

We beg the readers' kind indulgence for stating in schematic form the fields of activities in which we are now engaged. We just want to say that these activities are carried out in the following country villages: Aquarongo, Yanochocha, Chiripungo, Cungapite, Charón, Curuquinga, S. Francisco, Quinuapata and La Tranca.

1. Christian animation

The urban center of the area and the 40 country villages were being attended to by a 94 year old priest. Therefore, the need was both serious and evident. We have been working in various ways:

Evangelization: the Brothers and helper, two by two, direct weekly reflection meetings in all the villages. They do this with the help of slides and other visual aids. They also help in the liturgical celebrations.

Catechesis: each week a Brother gives a two hour lesson on catechetical methods and content to 18 rural catechists, two from each village. Each week an evaluation is made of the progress made with the children. Now we are working towards the formation of Christian animators from the rural communities.

Youth Groups: there is one basic point which we are aware of: the country villages will be renewed, in all their aspects, to the extent that we prepare the young. Because of this we take special pains to look after the young people: Every fortnight we have a morning or an entire day dedicated to youth animation with an attendance and participation which we never would have dreamed of.

2. Culture

Taking into consideration the fact that, because of the non-existence of schools in the area, practically all the adults are illiterate, we have been meeting this problem with literacy courses in five villages. At this moment all those instructed are already literate and have had their courses officially recognized on three levels. We have continued on with:

Regular courses: With official recognition:

— electrical courses;
— carpentry courses;
— courses in cutting and sewing;
— care is also given to having a bit of humanistic culture.

Monographic courses:

— cooking, balanced diet, and culinary preparation;
— general and specific hygiene;
— childcare;
— accounting and basic administration.

3. Health

Upon our arrival in this zone, we observed a truly lamentable situation in this regard. Sickness was widespread throughout the population: intestinal parasites, colds, skin infections, lung maladies, and children dehydrated by diarrhea, etc..

Through the team's nurse, emergency aid, the study of causes, prophylaxis and health education were begun.

However, seeing that much of this was beyond our abilities, measures were initiated with the Regional Delegation of the Countryside Social Security as well as well as with a campaign to make the country folk interested in getting into health organizations. The work succeeded in getting the majority of them into this social service. This includes, among other things: free medical care and medicine, retirement pension, and also free surgery. A doctor and nurse offer their services in the zone.

Also a course for country nurses is given which has up to eighteen students. For our part, we continue to give special assistance to children between two and five years old. A large hothouse is being put up in view of cultivating medicinal plants.

4. Nutrition

The nutrition is very unbalanced. We notice grave deficiencies in protein because of the failure to eat meat and fish. Meat is sold to buy cheaper food such as corn, rice, and other cereals and for clothes, heating, minimum schools supplies, etc..

There is also a lack of vegetable vitamins. The cold weather does not allow for the cultivation of garden products. For this reason one of the big tasks of the Team was the installation of a hothouse. Various experiments were carried on and at present the production is significant. In order to provide meat, the raising of guinea pigs called "Indian rabbits" and poultry has been promoted. The hothouses have succeded in producing lettuce, cabbage, garlic, turnips, carrots, and leeks. Along the same line, facilities for fish production are being undertaken.

INTERESTING LASALLIAN MISSIONARY WORK IN THE ANDES (2)

5. Organization

One of the problems in this missionary zone is the great dispersion of the population. Isolation, lack of communication, the lack of organization, all constitute great problems in various villages.

Therefore, the Team set about encouraging awareness and participation: organizing directing teams for the internal functioning of each village where they did not exist before; support for those already in existence, the promotion of joint meetings within the zone; common projects for all the villages. The projects, their planning, solicitude, their accomplishment, and benefits have constituted an important factor in organization and cooperation: this social organization is yielding important fruit.

Equally the internal life of each village has been optimized by means of:

- courses for leaders.
- Formation of catechists and evangelizers.
- Two rural nurses.
- Specialized courses in the husbandry of large herds, given by a veterinarian.
- Those in charge of the construction of small shops.
- those in charge of the hothouse.

6. Togetherness

— This togetherness is expressed in three ways:

The most evident means for the native people and the most effective means is to live with them. This is what they most need and most appreciate. It is also a condition for the realization of all the other projects.

— Being together with the public officials and those in authority: until recently the native country folk were looked down upon in public offices and in centers where things are decided.

The Brothers, through their commitment to the poor and through their educational prestige, are very much appreciated by the Authorities and by the common people. And the Brothers of the Team take advantage of this not to supplant the farmers but to support them. When the village representatives present themselves in some office accompanied by a Brother, success is always assured.

— Technical and Administrative cooperation: It is not sufficient merely to do things. Follow-up and evaluation are indispensable. Because of this the following offices, free of charge, operate in the mission house:

* law office: a lawyer (incredibly, the Provincial Fiscal).
* Animal husbandry office: a veterinarian.
* Agricultural office: an agricultural chemist and Engineer from the Ministry of Agriculture.
* A data bank.
* Office of the adviser on accounting for the Community Stores and cooperatives: sales and marketing.

7. Training centers

This is one of the greatest sources of developing the potential of the local village dwellers, particulary the youths.

Throughout the zone, the menacing shadow of immigration has already begun to creep in. The country folk who flee to the big cities along the coast in hope of finding a livelihood are easy bait for exploitation and food for corruption. It was imperative to avoid this scourge. Therefore we endeavored to create an in situ place of productive work, as an alternative to the present rudimentary rural economy.

The Training Center consists of:

- a carpentry shop;
- an electrical shop;
- a hydraulic engineering shop;
- a sewing and cutting shop;
- a shop for administration, accounting and typing;
- a popular library.

This Center is more educational than productive in purpose.

8. Agricultural and husbandry farm, educative and productive

This farm with an area of 25,000 square meters is at present in the process of being established in the following way:

- a poultry section for 500 chickens;
- a section for raising 500 guinea pigs or Indian rabbits;
- six large hothouses;
- a fish production pond;
- grazing land;

9. Spreading the production centers

We realize that it is not enough to set up sources of production and to create beautiful model centers. It is indispensable to increase the amount of bread. Therefore, we are going to set up production centers in various villages:

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

- Aguarongo: besides the centers mentioned above, it will also have hothouses and a Community store.
- S. Pedro: carpentry, cutting and sewing, block-making, and baking.
- Yanacocha: Hothouse.
- Carón: community store and dairy.
- Cungapite: dairy, piggery, slaughterhouse, and sausage making.
- Chiripungo: community store.

10. Infrastructure promoted and supported by the team

— The installation of electric current: no house had this basic facility before. It was only in the planning stage. We Brothers, together with the country folk, have paid several visits to the Regional Manager of the Electrical Company. At this time, all the villages are provided with this service.

— Installation of running water; practically none of the houses had this facility previously: because of representations made to the proper authorities, today almost all of the villages have clean running water, coming from little springs.

— Medical care: as previously mentioned above, the Team carried on an intense campaign of awareness and appeal with the health authorities. This service is now fully functioning.

— Roads: these were in a deplorable state. At this moment, all the roads in the area have been properly widened and rendered suitable.

11. Generous benefactors:

Without any fanfare nor prior conditions, we have received valuable economic assistance. We should like to take this opportunity to thank:

— the Lasallian District of Bilbao, Spain. Not only does it provide personnel to the missionary team but also supplies whatever they need, underwriting the general expenses of all the activities. It has sent thousands of items of clothes, medicine, shoes, and books. It also partly finances the shops in San Pedro. The travels of the Brothers and co-workers are also financed by this District.

— Miserior (the bishops' conference of West Germany:

This organization has provided the vehicle used by the Team. The pavilion used by the intercommunal stores and part of the food.

The Training Centers in their totality.

The Agriculture-animal husbandry with regard to the hothouses, various installations and part of the poultry.

Kirche in not: Bishops of West Germany:

— catechetical courses, library books and materials, various catechetical material.

— The Mission House and furnishings (partly).

— La Salle, New York: Food for the Community stores.

— La Salle of Austria: for the construction of the poultry, for hens, fish raising pond. Financing of Catechetical courses, materials, visual aids, etc..

— La Salle, Switzerland: Mission house (partly).

— La Salle-Villa Flaminia, Rome: Medicine.

— La Salle-Malta: Food for the Community stores.

— La Salle-Ireland: Hothouses for the villages.

— La Salle-North Mexico' upkeep of the Cultural Center.

— La Salle-Ecuador' the encouraging presence of the Brother Visitor, and his Council and the representatives of all the Lasallian schools in the country and their generous help and collaboration.

Parish of San Anton, Bilbao: the initial experimental poultry.

Parish of Albalate del Arzobispo, Teruel, Spain: community house and community store in Chiripungo. Father Oñate (brother of a co-worker), Bilbao: Medicine. De La Salle Brothers of Bilbao: individual donations, the results of their personal and community sacrifices.

Ecuadorian Institutions: they are many: Provincial Council, Ministry of Agriculture, Reconversion Center of Austro, Literacy Office, Municipal Councils: Soil removing machinery, wells, technical personnel, tip-carts, etc.

And an important place is occupied by SECOLI, which has accepted, channeled, and supported our project request through Brother Pedro Arrambide.

Aguarongo is not only the name of a village. It is a ecclesial and Lasallian fraternity where painfully the Kingdom of Heaven is being developed.

GIVING AND RECEIVING

Brother Gregory is at present head of RE at St Anselm's School, Basildon, Essex. He has been engaged for several years in facilitating opportunities for young people to work in the developing world from his own school. In this article he describes why this particular scheme is somewhat different from other similar ventures, and through the young men and women who have already participated sets out some of the teething problems and the rewards such a venture can give.

Community service at home

It is my experience that all young people have a latent generosity. This is easy to observe in the lower age groups of a secondary school when you have a surfeit of willing volunteers for almost anything you care to propose.

In the upper part of the school the response is more reflective and selective; just as these young people are learning their identity as adults and are tentative about career, relationships, beliefs, so too the same searching occurs in the areas in which they give of themselves.

At St Anselm's, the response of the staff has been to offer variety and opportunity. Sixth Form RE, for example, uses most of the time allocated to it in offering a number of different forms of community work.

After 11 years learning about Christian principles, these young men and women are timetabled to engage in some form of Christian practice. This has resulted in the development of their own maturity, has been of benefit to the local community and helped them reflect further on their own commitment and beliefs.

The developing world

An extension of this "variety and opportunity" has been to offer those who wish the chance to work in the developing world. For the last three years several sixth-formers have deferred university entrance and have committed themselves for a year in either Jamaica or Thailand. Soon it is hoped to send our first young people to Africa.

But to what purpose? Is it just a bright little adventure? Or is there a deeper significance or motivation? It was here that we learnt our first lesson in setting the scheme up.

From the point of view of the school the starting was that first hand experience of the developing world was infinitely more valuable than reading about it in books or watching TV documentaries; that upon their return these young people would have gained something for life and would influence their families, their colleagues at work, their fellow parishioners. In short, the young Christians emerging from such an experience would be aware of and wish to be part of a "global Church". This may, in time, be achieved.

In fact there were other unplanned spin-offs. The young people going out provided a quite outstanding witness for their families, their parish and their school. At least two kept up a regular "newsletter" correspondence with their parish; also, half of those who have returned to this country have already made arrangements for further work in the developing world.

Developing the helpers

This was not necessarily the motivation or the altruism of the young people who volunteered for this work before departure. In fact, the motivations as to "why" they wished to work in the developing world varied, and in at least one case was not clear even before departure. The problem of "programming" these young men and women adequately for their specific project also proved elusive. Consequently, the difficulties encountered varied from person to person.

CARL: "For me the isolation of the school I was working at and the lack of facilities to recreate in a fashion previously enjoyed by myself. Also, trivial though it seems, I wish to God someone had told me to bring boots, they were indispensable at the school.

CLAIRE: "The most difficult emotion to deal with, and the most frequent, was that of insecurity. It was frightening to think of what lay ahead: trying to "fit in", unsure of how much you had changed, whether people would accept this "new being", whether you would still be able to relate to others after so much isolation.

But now having returned, what do they think they gained from the experience?

PAUL: "My imagery of the Third World and its problems was very simplistic and black and white before I left the UK. Now I am more aware of its complexity and subtlety; most important of all, I can perceive it in human terms. Also, I found that my efforts in teaching English soon became outweighed by the love I received from pupils and frinds.

CARL: "My homesickness developed into a deeper and objective appreciation and care for people that I had somewhat taken for granted in the past. Before Jamaica, I would say that I was actually aware of the Third World and various countries (including my own) making efforts to help in small ways... But, to be honest. I always regarded these actions as good extras that First World societies performed "on top of all OUR problems". That has changed. Now, I know (not believe) that it is our duty to try to help the Third World, and we don't necessarily deserve a pat on the back, or recognition, when we do something.

Resources

An important question, frequently asked, is are these young people mature enough and do they have enough qualifications to be of any significant help in the developing world?

It is clear that an eighteen-year-old adult is going to be less mature than one, say, in his twenties; none have any degree qualifications, and their suitability for the work would depend on what their aptitudes were and the type of work being offered. But the primary purpose of the project is not to send a much needed helper into the Third World — though there must be worthwhile work for them to do — but to learn and understand and grow.

Here tribute must be paid to those people who, knowing what the purpose of the project was, still accepted these young people into their communities; in particular the Sisters of Mercy in Jamaica and the De La Salle Brothers in Thailand and their associates who shepherded them through their difficulties — and there were genuine difficulties, of culture, of homesickness, of isolation.

The romanticism of work in the developing world quickly wore off. The support and help of those receiving them was incalculable.

Special contribution

For this type of project fills a vacuum. The aid agencies and voluntary organisations such as VSO or VMM do largely require qualified young people and rarely below the age of 21. This makes sense when considered from the point of view that urgent help is needed in the developing world in nursing, education and agriculture, etc.

However, many generous young people lose out because while they are able to make that offering of themselves at 18, they may never be qualified enough or may have contracted other commitments by the time they are old enough to be accepted.

Also, the primary purpose is different — it is still basically about Christian education, of helping to develop a shift in awareness of our interdependence in the world so that most of the world will have a chance to truly develop.

How did they go about the project? The most urgent problem was raising the fare. The agreement is that the young volunteers would be given free board and lodging but would have to find their own way out there.

Early in the final school year a scheme is planned with each volunteer, for different fund raising ideas. These are many and varied: sponsored schemes, parish involvement, direct requests to local businesses, support from parish priests, weekend jobs and promotions such as local radio. These schemes are then time-tabled so as not to clash with each other or with their impending examinations.

In Jamaica, the volunteers worked at St Don Bosco School at Hatfield, near Mandeville. It is an establishment run by the Sisters of Mercy with the cooperation of some De La Salle Brothers.

It is run on the lines of a Boys' Town and contains youngsters from the ages of six to 18 years who have been put in care by the authorities or abandoned, or have been in trouble with the police.

The plan is to develop their skills in agriculture and to give them a basic education, thus leaving the establishment with the chance of a job.

The volunteers (five in the last three years), worked in the classroom and on the farm.

CLAIRE: "I shall always remember the chicken kill. Putting your hand up the backsides of eight-hundred chickens, the plastic dustbin full of innards and the smell...

In Thailand the activities were more varied, working in a secondary school in Nakon Sawan; teaching English to some of the children of the Karen hill tribesmen and working in an orphanage. Here the introduction into Thai society was preceded by developing at least a working knowledge of the language. Staying with a Buddhist family who knew no English was the speediest inculturation for Paul.

From my own school there have been a couple of volunteers each year, with a number of applications coming from elsewhere. For anyone who has pupils thinking of doing the same thing, I let Paul have the last word:

...For those going on to higher education, the experience is simply brilliant and has given insight and impetus to my studies. Good luck to all those who have the privilege to go on future projects.

A CENTER FOR MEETINGS AND FOR PRAYER

Origin

The dream of having a special House of Prayer where young people would be welcome was not new when in 1981 and 1984, the District Chapter for South-Belgium expressed the wish that a Prayer Community be founded near the Mutien-Marie Center. This idea was approved and encouraged by the Superior General and his Council.

The retreat at Orval in January 1985, made it possible to set up the project. Previously, the Visitor had made inquiries to find out what Brothers would be willing to participate in new foundations. At the Visitor's request, and led by Brother Jean Thomas, four Brothers got interested in the project: Brothers Pierre Golard, André Rousseau, Joseph Verdegem and Roger Maloir. Brother Maurice Dachet who was finishing his career as a teacher, was also available.

Almost every Wednesday during the first trimester of 1985, these six Brothers met at Malonne from 4:30 to 6:30 to draw up a community program. To succed in such an enterprise demanded considerable consultation about the style of life, the times for prayer and the mission of such a Center.

Once the community program was drawn up, it was decided that the inauguration of the new Community would take place on Holy Thursday, April 4, 1985. In the presence of Brother Visitor, a representative of the District Council and of some Brothers who had helped arrange the building, the six candidates committed themselves to live the Community program. Four of them were to be permanent members. Brother Jean Thomas, the Directory of a nearby Community, accepted the responsibility for the house and took part twice a week in Community meetings. Brother Roger joined the Community on Saturday evening.

The Aim

The name of the Community, chosen by the Visitor, indicates the aims pursued. Prayer and welcome are the key words, the raison d'être of our living together.

As a meeting place, it welcomes persons of all ages, particularly young people, who want to share the life of the Community by spending several hours or several days of recollection there. There are seven rooms available so the Community can receive small groups of young people for retreats, or groups of religious who are looking for a place to get together. Our prospectus proposes an adaptable schedule for these people according to the demand.

The Community is very open to the parish. Animators of the liturgy and groups of catechists have a comfortable room for their meetings. Several Lenten activities take place there.

The community is a house of prayer in the first place for its own members who assure three special times for prayer each day: morning, noon and night. Complete independence with regard to television allows time for dialogue among the Brothers of the Community. Free time for adoration is foreseen each evening. Guests are invited to share our prayer life.

A library for spiritual reading is open to the public and to persons residing in the house. Records, cassettes, audio-visual montages offer the possibility of spiritual enrichment. Documentation on different themes is available for students.

Functioning

One Brother having been named to another post, the Community actually numbers three: one permanent member, one working half-time and another who teaches full time.

The Community welcomes visiting Brothers, acquaintances looking for a place of retreat, small groups or parish groups. The center has been functioning a year and a half and is slowly becoming known. A group of secondary students stayed there for a night; a team of young Focolari organized a week-end. The groups that stayed overnight with us have not been numerous so far, but we hope, next year, to welcome retreat groups from our schools and organize several week-ends for young people who want to share Lasallian community life. One experiment was made.

Days of great affluence at the Pilgrim Center in honor of Brother Mutien Marie and parish activities (visiting the sick or teaching catechism in the parish) are fields of apostolate which complement our specific mission.

Every month, at the Mutien-Marie Center, our House of Prayer organizes and animates a prayer-vigil for vocations. The Brothers from near-by communities and some parishioners participate. On this occasion, a periodical, "Prayer and Vocation", is written and sent to each community of the District.

Our house could also become a place to accompany young people in search of their vocation or during their postulancy.

Insertion

Insertion into the parish of Malonne was accomplished progressively and happily. The Community is very well received. It has just opened its doors to a group of parishioners who want to have a sewing room. A priest from Zaire who works in the parish on Saturday and Sunday is welcomed and lodged in our home.

We hope to establish contact with the students of Saint-Berthuin's Institute, located in front of our house. We have pointed out to the teachers and professors how we can be useful to them. During Lent, several prayer meetings and group exchange discussions were held in our oratory.

The day of prayer proposed to each community in preparation for the District Chapter furnished us the occasion to make documentary posters on the Founder, the Institute and Young Lasallians and to invite some of the professors to our chapel.

The Directors of the Institution have been very kind to us, but so far it has been hard to establish contact with the students. The layout of our house does not help matters. We hope, however, progressively, to increase contacts, especially through the library. Some parishioners undoubtedly will also come to share our prayer.

Conclusion

It is too soon to make an evaluation of our experience. If all our dreams have not come true, partly because of the layout of the house, the result is still positive. The Brothers of the Community are happy; the parish appreciates our collaboration; our guests are happy with the welcome they receive.

May prayer help us to discern and to carry out the will of God in our regard.

PRINCIPAL ORIENTATIONS IN THE EDUCATION OF THE YOUTHS AT ARAVACA

Introduction

The La Salle University School for Teacher Training in Aravaca, Madrid, is a school which has its prime purpose the training of teachers who will teach in Primary Schools: in our case, teachers intended for children between 5 to 14 years of age.

This school, named La Salle and forming part of the Madrid District, has a total of 627 students. Of the 30 professors on the faculty, 9 of us are Brothers of the Christian Schools.

The students who study in our school are between 19 and 22 years and they have the choice, within the common three year program, of one of the following five specializations: Sciences, Philology, Social Sciences, Preschooling, and Special Education.

If the general objective and reason for existing of these University schools in Spain is the preparation of a faculty which is going to impart an education to children between 5 and 14 years of age, then it is easy to deduce that the general objective and, at the same time, the specific objective of our school, is the Education of authentic Christian educators according to the charism of Saint John Baptist de La Salle and the present orientations of the Church and of the Institute.

In this form, our specific objective contains, assumes, and embellishes the general objectives of these official schools in Spain, and for us is converted into an adequate indicator and into a fountain of inspiration of the orientations of This School.

In summary, they would be the following:

1. The student is the nuclear point of our educative style

We concentrate essentially on the person of each student as being unique and unduplicatable. We strive to know him and to help him in discovering himself and in knowing himself profundly. From this the acceptance and appreciation of his own person and the self-confirmation of his aptitudes and professional motivations will arise.

So that this orientation will not remain merely speculative, the school administrators, free of charge, administer a battery of tests to any students who want them. These tests are quickly corrected and interpreted, and are explained to the interested parties through a personal interview with the psychometrician of the school.

In addition to this technical service rendered to the person of each student, the School offers a Tutor-Guide who can guide him in orienting himself and can help him in his studies as well as in his personal life, and eventually in his career.

Prior to his admission into the School, each student is accepted as an individual person because of a personal admissions interview in which he explains his philosophy of life as well as the main thrusts of his activities.

2. Liberty, responsibility, two essential values in integrating our student as a future teacher-educator

Once our student recognizes and assumes his own personal "I" and discovers and accepts his vocation as a teacher and educator, there is a line of activity which summons him into the dynamics of the School: the balanced combination of the LIBERTY-RESPONSIBILITY binomial. Here is the program which is presented to him as a challenge and which commits him in his being and his work: I am a free person called upon to enlighten free persons. On my self-formation depends, to a great extent, the process of integrally perfecting many pupils who await and need the motivating influence of my person as a teacher.

The response to this real and hopeful commitment is called responsibility.

Toward this end, the School creates areas of liberty and endeavours to make each student aware of his person, his vocation, his future mission; of his time, his personal and group work; of the methods used, and of the materials at his disposal; of the explanations of the professors and of his own personal research and discoveries; of the observation and acquisition of experiences of every type, etc. etc..

A student in our school who knows well who he is, who discovers and interiorizes the true goals and his life and who commits himself to them, from his own personal identity and with his destiny is a person who makes of his liberty a permanent act of responsibility.

3. Discover and identity oneself with a world of a hierarchy of values

Every human person, and for that reason the teacher-educator, comes from a society structured by norms born of a philosophy and sustained by an order of values.

A question spontaneously arises: is our School identified, in its task of formation, with the world of values which defines and propels society today?

Also are we convinced that the mission of the School is the training of teachers whose task is, or is going to be, to forge the men of a new society.

Each year our students reach the conclusion that discrepancies and even contradictions exist between those values maintained and put forward by society and the principles and values which they discover and consider to be creators of a more just and beautiful society. How can we succeed in making the necessary re-adjustment?

Here arises the great unknown which has to be discovered and which constitutes the challenge for the School. Yes, we must prepare men, but for which type of society?

In order to respond to this interrogation, our School endeavours to form future teachers motivating and helping them to observe and analyze situations, to reflect deeply on what they hear and what they read, to develop a critical sense with regard to theories, events, and conduct, to hold respectful but open dialogue with all, etc. etc.

Thus, although not without difficulties, the student will come to discover and further his own hierarchy of values, obliging him to define himself and assert himself. Relatively soon, he will come to the conviction that his profession is not private but public, that his teaching is worth little if it is not going to be accompanied by his personal witness and that his influence on the students will be infinitely greater by what he IS than by what he merely says or teaches.

Materials such as Anthropology, Philosophy, Pedagogy, Theology, etc. in their content as well as in their type of work on one side, and all types of visits to Centers and Organizations, personal work of a reflective nature and various experiences on the other, are the means by which the School collaborates with the students in the acquisition of axiological principles which will rule his life and educational undertakings.

4. The educator cast in the lasallian mold

In reality this objective has its framework in a previous setting. But so that it would be a particular feature which would define the proper characteristic of our School, I have wished to underscore it and give it its own personality.

The specific end of this School, the Statutes state, "is to train professionals in education, based upon a Christian concept of man and of life".

In the very first interview granted to the future student, he is informed of this and the school is presented to him as a School of the Catholic Faith.

By the manner and focus which is given to each discipline, by the respectful and friendly guidance and instruction given to each person, by the availability and spirit of answering the needs of each one who seeks help and accompaniment in his problems, etc., the School endeavors to present its Christian character. In all things there is love and service.

The subjects of Theology and Catechetics, presented at the informational and catechetical levels, work of individual maturation such as "My fundamental option", are some of the ways which are offered as means of fostering thought and commitment.

Every year, within the school, there is a convocation, by way of invitation for the students who so wish to be able to join Christian study groups with apostolic and social polarization.

The Vocational program, the Eucharistic celebrations and the celebration of the Word at the various liturgical seasons, etc. are some of the means the School offers to its students to awaken, cultivate, and testify to their faith and their Christian commitments.

In spite of these activities, so in keeping with the identity of the School, we are convinced that religious formation and Christian commitment are generated within the inner soul of each person as a personal response to the action of the Spirit.

We attempt to succeed in casting the students into a Lasallian die essentially by our contagious witness and our personal form of existence, in our life and teaching.

In all its forms, the figure of La Salle appears as much in the subject of pedagogy as in the Lasallian cultural week which we organize to celebrate the feast of Saint John Baptist de La Salle, special Patron of all teachers.

5. Pedagogical methodology embodied in a serious and family organization

In the School there is a climate of work invested in a festive atmosphere of acceptance and friendship. This close relationship and pleasant and friendly treatment among teachers and students is one of the distinctive characteristics of the School. I think that this easy and friendly communication facilitates not only dialogue and understanding but also serious and satisfying educationl work.

The methodology which is followed is a mixture of the Traditional with the New School. The magisterial classes are carried on simultaneously in personal and group work. There are themes which are developed personally as well as group activities under the orientation and supervision of the professor. Small nuclei of scientific investigation and physiconatural experiences as well as working and cultural visits and excursions is only an indication of some of the activities which we undertake and which run the gamut of different methodologies for the training and education of these youths.

What we are trying to achieve in this variety of methodologies is to succeed in having our students undergo diverse personal experiences so that they can successfully make them a part of their personal lives and then communicate them in a creative way during their teaching activities.

6. Obstacles in the formative process

A situation which dims and militates against the objectives which the School proposes is the lack of job openings for those finishing the course of studies.

The deep motivation and desire to work which is found in our students who go on dedicating the best years of their lives to the task of education, are all too frequently frustrated by their inability to find work which is consonant with their preparation and vocational capabilities. For this reason, a sufficient number of them follow their studies in the University, to which they have access, in the fourth year of their career, by means of preparatory courses.

Final summary

It is time to state that these orientations or lines of action which have been briefly described, strive to achieve a UNITY in the process of the educational activity. That is to say: the building, the faculty, the methodology, etc. are the instrumental means which help each student achieve his educational formation according to the model of the man and the society which the School presents to him.

The student is the focal point of all that the School does. He is the principal agent of his own formation. Everything converges on him; but it is he who must make the selective synthesis in order to arrive at the desired integrating UNITY.

Here you have, in its more outstanding features, the dynamics of this Lasallian University School which, like other Lasallian Schools, strives to realize, here and now, the charism of Saint John Baptist de La Salle: to educate youth in the spirit of Christianity.

THE TEACHER AND THE PROFESSION

Public opinion pools tells us that the teaching profession is perceived as one of our most essential professions. These same sources, however, indicate that the profession lacks prestige. It is good for our ego that literature has from time to time sprung loose teaching personalities who have captured the reader's imagination. Chaucer speaks of the clerk "whose talk centered on moral themes, and gladly would he learn and gladly teach". One of Goldsmith's influential figures in the English shires before the herders drove out the dwellers was the village schoolmaster whose body language said it all: "Well had the boding tremblers learned to trace the day's disaster in his morning face". And Carlyle gave kudos to anyone who graced the classroom as he wrote that teachers should be world-honored and treated as generals or field marshals.

As mentioned, the profession has not generally received good publicity. Through the years teachers too often have been considered pedagogues in the original sense of servants who lead children to and from school. In ancient Greece, the philosophers were the honored teachers while those who taught reading and writing were generally ignored. In the traditional Chinese school of old, the schoolmaster was by definition a person who had failed intellectually. The Russian theological seminaries expelled their undesirables who were then assigned to teach in the common schools under Peter the Great. In Frederick the Great's Prussia invalids were assigned to teach.[1]

The poor opinion of the teaching profession spread to the New World in the seventeenth century. This could be seen by the low prices that the newly-arrived indentured servants commanded in the market place. Teachers were not considered to be valuable investments. And today high esteem still eludes the profession. This may be due to society's prevailing bias, the short-preparation period for teachers compared to that of other professions, and the union focus which causes people to wonder if our work truly qualifies as a profession.

But, let's face it! We all can remember being influenced by great teaching. The power of these good teachers is difficult to measure because their influence continues to grow in us. We must not forget that our classrooms also are filled with "students who are the messages that we send to a future we will not see".[2] So, let's sit back for a moment, relax, read, and enjoy some reflection on good teaching and the legacy that each of us can leave to those who come into our classrooms.

Marva Collins, the lady who started a private school in Chicago's west side ghetto, is one of the great ones. She states that she is pushed on by experiencing the feeling of epiphany in her students. She jolts her students, and they feel that they are leading a more quickened life because of her enthusiasm. She takes the dropouts of the public and private schools and starts them reading Emerson's Essay on Self-Reliance. She gives her students a pride, a belief, a hope, and these students soon discover that they too can learn.[3]

Martin Buber once stated that the greatest thing that one person can do for another is to confirm the deepest thing that person has within him/her. And following up on this idea, Douglas Steere, observes that there is little more to say about the greatest thing that a teacher can do for a student. That teacher can believe in the student; he/she can have faith, especially at times when all the conventional indicators point the other way in the student; he/she can affirm the deepest thing the student has within himself/herself. "That teacher lit my candle".[4]

A recent journal article in reflecting on good teachers said: "When teaching is artful, one sees a sense of wonder, and excitement in the subject matter, the free play of the imagination, a what-if vision of the world, an evoking of the unknown, and synthesis".[5]

Jonathan Kozol described the hidden curriculum as the teacher's own integrity and lived conviiction. The most memorable lesson is not what is written by the student on a sheet of yellow lined paper in the lesson pad; nor is it the clumsy sentence published in the official text. It is the message that is written in a teacher's eyes throughout the course of his or her career. It is the lesson which endures a lifetime.[6]

A good teacher is self-confident. Teaching being on show. It is challenging a student's ideas, an arrogant art if you are not well informed. It is being an oracle, passing along truths to less knowledgeable folk who depend on their teacher's accuracy. It is playing God, because a teacher's attitudes and expectations can profoundly affect young people, particularly the most vulnerable among them. You are reassured when your students do well on other people's tests or when they use in their future education the skills you taught them. You are reassured when students seek your advice, or when colleagues watch your students and your classes and respect what is happening.[7]

And one of my favorite teacher stories... "My boy wants to spend five months at your school", the farmer said to Professor Grundvig, founder of the famous Folk School in Denmark. "However, I've looked over your course of studies, and I see only such courses as history, literature, civics, geography, and science. Nothing about farming. Tell me, will my son be a better farmer after he takes this program with you?" Professor Grundvig was silent for a moment, then replied quietly, "No, your son won't learn how to make better butter at our Folk School. But all his life he will be ashamed to make bad butter".[8]

Good teachers like these cannot be ordered out of a catalog!

COMMUNICATION AND VALUES MILIEU FOR COMMUNICATING VALUES

One of the currents of pedagogical thought being most investigated today is the theory of "milieu", especially in the field of games and creativity. This means of communicating values applied to an educative context has hardly been investigated despite the research done in recent years concerning educational values. To introduce ourselves to the theme, we might use Alfonso López Quintàs's concept of "milieu" as > "a playing field created by the structural interaction of elements which join to make a system more or less strict in form (...) A milieu or atmosphere arises when various elements integrate in such a way as to create a field of free expression (...) The milieu or playing field is made up of every reality that can be co-related by means of converging notes or the interplay of diverse tendencies".

Values need a milieu: this milieu is created by the value's own interior dynamism. A value has its own field: spiritual, ethical, esthetical, social, cultural, material, etc.. Because of this, it exists historically in a continuous flowing. Thus, man who is subject to values, uses his own milieu in a vital manner to create other milieus in the field of liberty, judgment, communication, behavior, interpretation of reality, etc.. But above all, values create a "meeting ground" in any educational system that unites a number of formal or informal elements that become a powerful force in the larger milieu which is society, composed of the family, church, means of communication which have their own system of values where they they take on a special meaning, as we shall see.

Concerning the milieu, we can compare the reality of values to a vast circle made up of concentric circles whose inter-communication creates a field of action for known or perfectible realities by the internal force of values and by others unknown that come to light. Values don't destroy themselves, they are replaced by others. Values of pre-technical times served to lay the foundations for the values of this technical era which in turn serve as a pivot for values to be attained in the XXIst century. Thus, in the course of history, the concentric circles will interiorize themselves more and more until they irrupt in the parousia of the great Milieu, the Supreme Value which is God.

Human existence develops in an atmosphere of liberty, liberty which gives meaning to life. When one accepts this meaning of liberty in a personal and responsible way, a surrounding milieu is created, made up of commitments which take on greater force as they incarnate values or contribute to promoting values in their own field or where they project themselves by means of words, gestures or behavior: this is communication of values. The surroundings are influenced by values, but values also need a concrete world: material and human. Thus, for example, artistic values exist in literature, in works of art, in cinema, in nature, material or cosmic, etc. just as moral values exist in human relationships, and because of this, they need norms, laws, "fields of action created by the structural interplay of various elements". When communicating, values respond to the call of other milieus because they are not only to be held or possessed, but they are very specifically meant for relationship, participation, donation, recognition, commitment, presence.

From the preceding, we deduct that values give man a great ability to create fields of action which become "events" in his life: material or economic values concerning production, the just use and distribution of the things necessary for life, for the individual and for society, at all levels. Corporal values, biological or vital, related to the transmission, reproduction and maintenance of life (health, lodging, food, work, etc.) cultural values which embrace wisdom and knowledge, technology and scientific development, but above all, esthetical values which mean to create, produce, amplify and appreciate the meaning of beauty, the splendor of truth. Social and political values which mean relations and inter-relations among men or communities, and generate milieus for living in common, for communication, solidarity, subsidiarity, etc.. Moral and religious values corresponding to that totally harmonious period which situate man in a trascendental milieu. Finally, as values intermingle and interact with each other, they acquire concrete and precise meaning, and at the same time, give rise to complex situations which reflect new sensitivities to which man must respond.

N. Hartmann (Ethik, XX, 6) quoted by J.M. Méndez, says "that creative energy, productiivity and actualization proceed from values. Values are the power behind the "what should be", the center of gravity, the first entelechy of the moment".

In order that this creative process that Hartman refers to can take place, values have to be found in man: "A value is something in itself but in relation to someone", in an open, creative and communicative relationship where the person and the value are not the same reality but are inherent and inseparable.

"This creative process, says Alfonso López Quintás, is the privileged spot of self-revelation in man, because the privileged part of his constitution and his expansion within the reality of his milieu".

And he points out five concrete actions concerning milieu which man must attend to:

1. He accepts the reality of his environment, the situations that frame it, situations that helped create it.

2. He makes his option according to the environment and its exigencies.

3. He draws up his personal projects according to the demands of the environment and the resources it offers.

4. He creates milieus of inter-relationship with other realities, especially human ones.

5. He self-reveals his personal condition and promotes his personality by means of co-creating milieus.

If the life of each student is a project of values which he must carry out in a daily commitment, the others benefit from this action because communication has a very fundamental anthropological dimension.

The communication of values is the communication of an "ego" who lives certain values and not simply the communication of value contents which would be a cold state, without life, or as I. Lepp would say: "the communication of an être de raison". A value is not only a norm of conduct but it also orientates conduct both for the person living it and for the one who comes under its influence: this is solidarity of values which goes much further than simple sociability of values which would be the social resonance of optional values. The solidarity of values is living with others the plenitude of values chosen in common, which, in a school milieu, takes on a very special meaning: the choice of values and a personal commitment to them becomes an offer made to others; this is what caused Sartre's anguish: for him "hell is the others". The attitude of solidarity where values are concerned is expressed in a communicative manner by means of connotative language because the reality of the environment influences others, the group, depending on one's personal concept and experience of the reality. But it must not only be connotative communication (let's also call it cognitive) to avoid a manipulation, it must be accompanied by emotional and sentimental communication where objectivity and subjectivity find a good equilibrium and generate an authentic model of communicating values with interaction of persons and society.

There is a difficult which consists in drawing the lines which separate the two milieus of values: personal and social. In passing, it is to be remembered that the objectivity and subjectivity of values are their philosophical aspect and their aptitude to change and modification are their sociological aspect. Values are objective when considered as goods or aims; and subjective when taken as pleasure or personal preference. Consequently neither objectivity nor subjectivity, but rather objectivity and subjectivity; neither permanence nor change, but rather permanence and change. Thus real man prepares himself for a society full of possibilities of change.

Thanks to human nature, the mutability of values is a privilege which makes it possible to evaluate, reform and perfect scales of values that have been preconceived or inscribed in determined historical or cultural eras. To educate is not so much to create a scale of values as to "furnish the individual possibilities of constant change and renewal, including values".

THE LASALLIAN FAMILY ENCOUNTERS

For the past several years all types of meetings with members of the Lasallian Family have been in vogue. I believe that in all this, the Holy Spirit has had an important role.

Various Facts

— As I have said, it is a fact that there is truly an abundance of Encounters of this type these days. It is also certain, that one well-conducted meeting leads to another of the same kind. The meeting which has left a good savor in the mouth of the participants suggests another of the same quality, and so the chain continues on.

— Everywhere. A first Encounter, Parmenie, for example, led to another there and another in Canada. A meeting in Los Teques, Caracas, led to a movement in a chain of meetings in Latin America. The meeting in Borassart at the world level led to the resolution of repeating the experience every two years, leading to the meeting in 1987 in Toulouse.

— Still more. In addition to this, these "major" Encounters inspired a multitude of "minor" meetings, geographically speaking, at the national level, and numerous such meetings at the regional, local, and other levels.

An encounter is a place for fostering:

* Brotherhood: and this alone is a worthwhile product. One afternoon in Mexico in the World Congress of 1984 was enough for the spirit of the Lasallian Family to triumph in spreading the law of friendship among all the participants despite linguistic difficulties. This always happens. Lasallian Brotherhood is a stimulating fact which enormously facilitates the work of the Encounters.

* Prayer: We must not fail to recall the example of Brother Athanase Emile in New York, when in front of a crowd of some two thousand former students, in order to call the attention of the crowd for the prayer before meals, simple said into the microphone: Let us remember that we are in the holy presence of God". The group immediately fell silent. In the meetings, when the organizers want attention and preparadness, prayer quickly brings this about. It grows and even achieves high levels of concentration. This leads to extra hours of nocturnal adoration. And I think that this is not so mysterious. Someone has said: "Wherever two or three are gathered together in My name, I am there in the midst of them". And when the apostles, together with the mother of Jesus, were united in prayer, it was the favorable occasion for the Holy Spirit to descend upon all and to fill them with unction and courage. When our Lasallians are gathered together full of good will they attract the Spirit of Jesus. This might seem to be a mere theory. No, it is an experienced fact and sometimes amid great emotion.

* A meeting with the Founder: This is a section which deserves an entire article, but we must go on. Still, if there is one fact upon which the Brothers should reflect deeply it is this: the Founder exercises a mysterious, irresistible and impassioned influence on Lasallians of every age and condition. Saint John Baptist de La Salle is for our seculars "our Father and Founder". And they say so. In Mexico a slogan which became popular with the young people (and they made up 40% of the congress) "We are La Salle today!" When people come into contact with La Salle, "it is like a virus" which enters you and stay with you. From this comes the frequent appeals from our secular friends: "Speak to us about De La Salle". In these meetings there should never be lacking a Brother who is informed enough and devoted enough to St. La Salle to be able to explain him to the groups. If he is well presented, everyone finds in the Founder a model for their convincing and enthusiastic "radicalism".

Types of Encounters

Based upon what has happened up until now, I shall explain the different types of Encounters:

* Workshop for the leaders of a National Federation. This takes place for three days in some kind of retreat house, for a group of about 40 persons and the purpose is to train group leaders.

* Beginners' Workshops. When it was not possible to have a three day workshop as listed above, the solution was to meet on Friday evening, spend the entire day Saturday and end on Sunday with Holy Mass and closing exercises. Then the "team" reported to the Association which accepted this group. The number, as always is a maximum of 40 and an minimum of 20. This has to do with a workshop of "Lasallian awareness". These have been very numerous, around a hundred of them.

* Assemblies, National and International Congresses. This is another very distinct type of encounter. They do not seem to be very deep but at the moment of truth, they generate enthusiasm and open new roads for their sectors.

* Youth Encounters. These have been growing in numbers and density. Contrary to what might be expected, these meetings usually have good content, serious prayer which is at one and the same time alive and joyful and yet serious. In these meetings, the Founder exercises a great fascination. In fact, these Encounters of youths are giving a typical Lasallian meaning to those groups and even to those sectors which are also benefiting from them.

* Encounters with secular teachers. These will increase because of the enormous interest the Institute has in offering to these "collaborators" the spirit of De La Salle which will guarantee the continuity of the "Christian School" where there is a lack of Brothers.

Parents' Meetings. These parents are very interested in the schools and they do not limit themselves in their meetings to disciplinary aspects and school needs. These meetings can be and some are, special moments of communion with the school and its Christian ideals.

Meetings of Former Students. These traditional annual meetings are today becoming ones of some more substance than just the traditional friendly get-together. These "parties" have taken on a progressive transformation more in keeping with the Lasallian spirit.

* There are more, but it seems that this listing, though not exhaustive, is sufficient.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Week-end and three day encounters

* Time and place. Look for a strategic location which will allow for optimum use of the time available. The school or some other building chosen for the occasion but a change of atmosphere is always preferable.

* The Number. This depends upon the type of encounter. For a workshop type of meeting the ideal would seem to be 25 to 35. For a Youth Encounter, depending upon the perspective, there can be 150 or 300 or even as many as 5,000. It seems that from the point of view of practicality, the number sought should be the number of those who can be personally reached by those running the encounter.

* Selecting participants. This does not demand anything special beyond good will, common sense, willingness to serve, and some kind of assurance that the desired activity will be followed.

* Encounter organizers. This is an important point. The Director should be someone well informed about what the Lasallian Family means today.

The team running the encounter should be well versed in group techniques. It is important that in the group there are some Brothers who can give a specific Lasallian tone and correct knowledge of the Founder to the group. The Brother will give the proper tone through his daily reflection.

* Punctuality. No one should be admitted who cannot remain for the entire time. People who come late or leave early demoralize the group.

* Materials for the encounter. The necessary thing is to have plenty of pens and paper. The sheet for preparation and explanation of them will be enriched as the meeting progresses with the summaries, talking matters over, results of work groups, and the like. The most practical item is that the meeting must be remembered.

* Meeting Room. This should be properly ventilated and comfortable in temperature. Everyone should be able to see one another. There should be a place for notes and diagrams, a blackboard for the presentation of themes and walls where slogans, statistics, and messages can be put up as the meeting goes on.

Within the meeting itself

* We have always taken great care to have the proper atmosphere, that is, immediate friendship among the participants and seriousness in serious matters; reflection facilitates prayer which is properly prepared, and there are opportunities to be alone with oneself and with God.

* We have had the knowhow of group dynamics leading to a deepening of experiences but without the appearance of being judges or of being stereotyped. We have been aware of the efficacy of breaking down into group meetings of six members each and into linguistic groups when such was necessary, or by age groups when this was called for.

* We have given much importance to doing everything in common such as the theme, as well as giving sufficient variation in expositions, art panels, montages, etc..

* We have encouraged extra hours of prayer especially during the night which the young people appreciate and benefit by. We have organized walks by groups where they can discuss things along the road and they claim that they went to the very limit.

* We have tried to make the Eucharist the center of the Encounters, if possible, each day and without any hurry, and with various interventions in the liturgy and in the Word which furthered understanding.

* We have given much importance to singing. In the Spanish youth group encounter in Chiclana last November, a Brother worked wonders in directing the singing.

* We have endeavored to get the groups to know one another as quickly as possible and to exchange experiences and impressions. Each individual group ought to appear as it really is, expressing its own ideas, activities, difficulties, and successes.

* We have given time for both personal and group reflection. If some delegation has decided to sponsor some idea or another, it is given sufficient time at the end of the encounter to make an application of what the members had learned together.

* Celebration. Each evening after supper, we have had a celebration organized each time by a different group coming from various places, if the entire group is made up a various delegations. It is important that the celebration be a success and that it originate from them. They sometimes last until late at night and are very joyful. There is no improvisation here. The groups have to present a plan of the schema which they are going to present. This is very important.

* In the celebration as well as in other activities of the day we always put them under the charge of the organizers of the distinct groups. In international meetings these are by language groups. This avoids repetition of numbers and favors a certain wholesome competition. Each group wants to do its best.

The theme of the Encounter

This is a point of major importance. The choice of a good theme ought to be one of the chief concerns of the Lasallian organizers who venture to have an Encounter at any level. The theme must be concrete, easy to understand, easily expressed, "with teeth". For example, for the Mexico Congress the theme was "Faith, Brotherhood, Service". It was so well received that it is still being used. For Toulouse '87, "John the Baptist the Precursor-John De La Salle, the new Precursor - Lasallian Youth, the precursor of today". It is important that each group which expounds a theme does so keeping to what it wants, even using the form of exposition which best suits it.

After the Encounter

All the efforts put forth would be useless if there is no follow-up after the Encounter. If the participants are not the object of special attention, then there will be little result in spite of the apparent joy and enthusiasm of the departure. Following up the groups which have met is absolutely necessary if we wish to further the "Lasallian spirit" and succeed in having our Lasallian groups be something more, much more, than mere groups of good friends, who continue to write to one another after the meeting. Stay with them!!!

LET US EVANGELIZE

In wishing to evangelize the teachers John Baptist de La Salle is evangelized by them

1) His desire to evangelize the school teachers, made him take their situation seriously and impelled him to tell them his own convictions regarding the faith.

11. He drew near to them, put himself at their service for he wished to see their undertakings succeed.

* What do we do personally and as a community to be close to our lay colleagues, the most deprived youths? (Visits, receiving, sharing...).

* Can we make a list of the concerns of each of the Brothers in our community — of each of our lay teachers — of the young people we know, of the most deprived — of the priests with whom we work...?

12. His solicitude for the teachers disrupted his life as a Canon. He took risks for them with regard to his friends, he kept quiet about his personal repugnances, risks in family relations...

* With whom do we share our preoccupations as Brothers?

* How do we accept, personally and as a community the important preoccupations of the poorest youth and of our colleagues? How do we share with one another in community? Within the Church? With the city officials?

* How have these preoccupations changed our personal and community life styles? In what way?

13. In order to strengthen the first teachers in the faith, John Baptist de La Salle risked in their regard his own convictions about believing.

* What words of faith do we dare to say to our colleagues, to the young, to the most abandoned youths?

Under what circumstances have we told them these things and why?

2) John Baptist de La Salle was reproached by the first teachers.

21. The teachers were able to make reproaches which had a basis.

* What would a lack of well-founded reproaches in our regard on the part of our colleagues, youth, and the poorest people signify?

* What reproaches have been addressed to us?

What reproaches have been given to us in response to words of faith? Did these reproaches seem to be well founded?

22. John Baptist de La Salle consults Father Barré.

* How do the reproaches which we meet become the object of seeking guidance, of reflection, of discernment?

23. The reproaches which he suffered became for him food for prayer.

* What about us?

24. Following these reproaches, John Baptist de La Salle opted for conversion by distributing all his goods to the poor and by relinquishing his Canonry.

* Can we say that the young, our colleagues have led us to opting for conversion? In what way?

* Can we say that we have accepted the same Gospel as those whom we have striven to evangelize.

Allow yourself to be educated and evangelized by the poor

Like John Baptist de La Salle and the first Brothers of the Institute, we believe that the Gospel is the first chance for life and human success for the most neglected children and youths and we have set our heart to bringing the gospel to them. But the Gospel is not a remedy, nourishment, or lifebuoy which is external to those who wish to bring it to others. It is the word of God which profits those who bring it as it does those to whom they wish to bring it. The Gospel is as prime for the missionary who wishes to be sent by Him as it is for those to whom he is sent. And this Good news understood by the missionary as the source of salvation for those to whom he wishes to give it, becomes also for him the Good News of salvation if he really sets about taking the means of making it understood by those whom he wishes to help; and the poor whom we wish to save become through the Gospel agents of our own evangelization.

"I would have to remain silent and would have no right to speak about perfection with regard to poverty if I myself am not poor; nor about abandonment to Divine Providence if I have financial resources protecting me from want; nor on perfect confidence in God if a good income frees me from any anxieties". (Blain 1 p. 131) "having established his schools on the Foundation of Providence, he would give all his goods for the sake of the poor while saving nothing for the Brothers' community... He gives all his savings away. Those who witnessed this magnanimity were struck by astonishment to see a man so full of confidence in the resources of Divine Providence..." (Maillefer p. 103-104).

In order to announce the Gospel to the teachers, who were just as poor as were the pupils, John Baptist de La Salle makes himself materially poor with them. He understands that "nothing can attract hearts to God as the poor and humble state of those who wish to lead them to Him". (Meditation for Christmas 3rd P.). "The Brothers, by his example, are so strengthened against mistrust and inquietude that they abandon themselves completely to Providence..." (Maillefer p. 105).

At the heart of all his riches, John Baptist de La Salle had the heart of a poor man. He took to heart bringing this Spirit to the teachers who were deprived of riches by risking the words of faith. This providential encounter had the double effect of bringing the benefits of material poverty to the missionary and to the others the discovery of the spirit of poverty within the depths of their privations.

This evangelical lesson of our Founder is an illustration of the mystery of the Incarnation: the Son of God became man so that men in their turn could become Sons of God by adoption. Those among the young who have the least chance of succeding at making their human lives into the image of God are very numerous and these are the very ones who are inviting us the most to make this teaching of God, which providentially is the foundation of our religious life, come alive. The appeal to live as poorly as possible is an invitation to us to reactivate ourselves in the source of our religious life. By accepting for the sake of God to become poor among the poor, to announce the Good News to them, we make the Gospel fruitful for them and for ourselves and we follow along the road to exaltation as did the Son to the Glory of God the Father (cf. Phil 2, 6-12).

Something to pray over

God will make Himself known to us more and more with each passing day if we try to live in His fulness (Cfr. John 17, 3).

By being accepted into His love, we have become participants of the manifestation of his Love for men in Christ (cfr. John, 4, 9); we are called in the same Spirit to the holiness of God and we have been sent to sanctify other people.

And the means by which he sends us to serve the lives of those whom he confides to us, and especially the poor for whom he has a preferance, are those by which he leads our own lives in Christ. The more we set about serving the life of those confided to our care, and especially those who are the least alive, the more we will dispose ourselves to grow in the life of God.

VOCATIONAL APOSTOLATE

The vocational Apostolate is both a priority and disturbing factor in our District Plan. We are conscious of the difficulties of having too sanguine hopes and being convinced that "it is the Lord who does the calling". The clamor of so much work and the lack of relief, and the steadily rising median age of the Brothers are things which both urge us on and disquiet us.

The vocational apostolate seems to be the duty of individuals, even being an integrated area in the general pastoral activity of each school in which each Brother should be involved.

Because every vocational work implies:

— A call to define, revise, and question ourselves and our authenticity.

— It is to discover how we are and to feel humility and courage for how little our life is convincing.

— It is to feel ourselves summoned to account for the most noble ideals of our vocation, for the genuine charism for which we have been instituted.

— It is to return to the roots of the experience of God in poverty, availability, and unconditional self-surrender.

— It is to constantly examine if Jesus occupies the center of our life, and of our Community.

— It is to determine if our life is very far from being the explicit Good News which our young people are waiting for.

There is only one way of completing this "theory": Do I INVITE others and PROPAGATE my way of life because I feel happy in it and because the ideal I am living is well worthwhile? Our Rules, art. 85 have an identical message as that of Pope John Paul II: the campaign for Vocations will be successful when:

1) The Brothers live as consecrated persons.

2) The Community becomes a brotherly home.

3) When we walk constantly toward a conversion of hearts and of total surrender to the most needy.

1. Can we talk about our vocation to today's youth?

It is credible to invite others only if we love the life we are living. A VOCATION is an experience of God, a determined form of keeping the faith, it is to take upon ourselves the salvific plan of Jesus, it is to give off signals while leaving the initiative to God, to walk in the light of the blessed, to have made a fundamental option for Jesus. If this is not the case, we cannot offer any "bargains". In order to understand something, one must live it; in order to love something, one must live it with ardent dreams and desires.

Yes, it is possible to talk to some young people. They listen with the greatest respect and interest; but an echo is found in very few of them. There are some who are interested in knowing, but they feel themselves weak, harrassed, incapable of dedicating and committing themselves. A society which lives smugly, closed in upon itself, which seeks its own advantage and individualism cannot understand commitment and gratuitous service. Today's youth is devoid of ideas other than those of the superficial, consumer society defeaned by noise. He cannot hear the whisper of the call. Youths need more good example and opportunities for silence and prayer.

The Brother, in order to get himself across to his students, must present himself as a religious consecrated to God, and not simply as a Professor. He must be a witness who speaks and expresses the faith which encompasses him, the educator who transmits what he lives, and the animator who gets himself across to youth to help them discover the values which give meaning to life. This must be done because nobody can clearly propose a vocation which is in crisis.

Today our vocation as Brothers is being called into question by our older students, by many parents, by our very fellow teachers who know us well, when we do not radiate the Gospel, when they see the Brother content to remain simply a teacher, no matter how competent he may be, when he distances himself from the other Brothers and from his home community, when he gets himself all wrapped up in his solitary and smug life.

2. The subject of the entire vocational apostolate is the community

It is the duly established Community which assumes the responsibility of inviting others to live the joys of brotherhood and of the Good News. The mother of every vocation is the community; the team or animator-coordinator will simply be the "mid-wife". The living community which prays, which plans things together, is open and can be known from within is one which will be victorious.

There exists a fear that the inauthenticity, the "other hidden face" of the community will be discovered. Who in the Community is now living through the vocational anxiety? Who is praying fervently and is warmly open to candidates to the Brothers? What is the central interest, the prime objective, and greatest joy of the community?

3. The youth are afraid

Perhaps they do not meet anyone who "throws them into the water". They tell us "we live well", but this life does not attract them... To leave their family, their comfortable life, to immerse themselves in necessary ventures, to learn to give of themselves... that is a long dark road. It seems that the youth are afraid to begin flying. In reality, they have not discovered the most elemental human values. Whatever is undiscovered cannot provoke interest or allegiance.

One needs healthy "happenings", the joys of giving and of emptying one's self, of forgetting about one's self. The youth, Vatican II reminds us, will join those who are capable of giving them reasons for living and for hope.

The choice to follow a vocation goes contrary to natural tendencies, contrary to what is easy and egoistical. A total choice liberates, integrates, and matures. And, nevertheless, the young seem to indefinitely dilly dally in their reply and vocational commitment. A total choice, they think, will curtail their liberty and field of possibilities.

4. The vocational apostolate of each brother and of each community

Such an apostolate is born of an expression of Jesus, of the presence of God maintained in a life which encompasses all:

* Our daily prayer and Eucharist in Community.

* Our openness of spirit of each day accepting our students in the reflection and in our solicitude for their formation.

* Our classes which are competent, pleasant, and motivating.

* The diversified dialogue with all our students, and with special attention to those most in need.

* The Catechism replete with warmth, and with saving and liberating meaning.

* The initiatives of formation during leisure hours, doing what arouses creativity, and initiative, in liberty and joy.

* The invitations to pray and live together, to savor silence and peace.

* Dialogue with parents and friends, opening ties of affection and of acceptance to the Lasallian Family.

5. Only thus will the brother plow the furrows of vocations:

* AROUSING, awakening Vocations, discovering the most profound joys in following God. Approaching the Gospel values by one's own witness and by one's own experiences in living its noble values.

* MAKING PROPOSALS and explicit invitations to those youths whom we find properly disposed and qualified, to follow our life.

* RECEIVING, and carefully CULTIVATING the process of growth of the seed of a vocation. Following with solicitude those uncertain and searching steps.

* HELPING the vocation GROW with its needs, invitation, and commitment; with human inquiries, serious proposals of religious formation and evangelical reflection; working along with it in the "desert" and in prayer. Furthering ideals leading to the crystalization of such a definite ideal and form of life.

* ORIENTATING the process towards a DECISION and option discerned by, and committed to, motives of faith and love. Inserting these same youths into Christian and religious groups and Communities.

6. The climate of our schools

All of our schools are training grounds of evangelization. The Lasallian ideal has to accept life as offerings in a fraternal relationship among the members who make up the educative community. Everything that goes on in a Christian school is pastoral and is repeated even day.

The healthy school climate must disintoxicate the youth from their vicious, secularized, and bourgeois atmosphere, develop a critical sense in them, and arouse their appetite for the values of the kingdom. The school ought to choose between the pastoral quality and the quantity of students and form them in an Educational Plan at every level. If the school does not define its Plan and its strategic lines of pastoral activity it is not possible for it to expect results and continuity in the process of managing a relevant Christian community.

We must avoid the extremes of sacralizing the mass or of reducing the faith to its bare minimum; we have to opt for Christian values and attitudes which will be seconded by the teachers and accepted by the parents. Our competency and our future are in the offering of Christian values and not in technology nor even in the quality of our teaching.

Communities must project this life into Christian groups which arouse an inner dynamism within their students.

7. Offerings to youth from the district pastoral program

Every pastoral activity specifies some clear objectives and throughout succeeds in having them cover every step of the maturation of persons. For the most part, the schools can maintain these offerings:

* Catechetical programs for First Communion and Confirmation.

* Beginning vocational groups for those 12 and 13 years old.

* Christian live-in groups for those fourteen years of age. Continue to form new groups to assure perseverance and deepening.

* From fifteen years on, the offerings must be more intense.

— Live-in groups, Youth Encounters, Youth Easter gatherings...

— Summer Courses: a week of intense religious, biblical, Lasallian formation.

— Workshop for university students.

— Missionary experience in Guinea, provides vitality to Christian commitment in advanced groups.

8. District structures and perspectives

A permanent inter-district communication is in operation which provides information on pastoral activities and on vocational and formation processes.

This work presupposes a network of many Brothers.

We have to restructure many pastoral projects and define priority objectives and urgencies. We must designate more potential workers, more Brothers must work for vocations.

Perhaps we have to revise the same structures upon which the collegial organization, the persons on which the burden of responsibility is based, in order to achieve other results or to suppress all anxiety in face of the impossible.

Yet, at all times, it has to be the Community itself which brings the initiative from its internal dynamism, from the gracious generosity of the Brothers. This includes the idea that the Brothers themselves will begin new ways of living which are distinct, committed, more evangelical, and which are characterized by coherence and authenticity.

It is possible for our ideal to be reborn, to spread, and to multiply because God is with us, our ideal is worthwhile and the "prime material" is in our hands. Let us have hope. Let us look alive.

NEW LIFE COMMUNITY

In Melbourne, Brother Tom Clark is striving to provide a spiritual oasis in modern society — a place where young people can come together to pray, sing and exchange their ideas about Christian life. He has formed a group called the New Life Community, which evolved for secondary students, and now includes about fifty boys and girls between fifteen and twenty.

As a teacher of Religious Education, Brother Tom saw a great need for young people to look more deeply into their faith than they were inclined to do in the classoroom, or in the Church on Sunday. The formidable pressure of the peer group seemed to make his students reluctant to seriously address those topics which are central to Christianity — relationships, the Scriptures, and prayer. He wanted to create an environment where religious conviction was accepted and affirmed instead of scorned.

The origins of New Life

With the assistance of other brothers, and some members of a local Charismatic prayer community, Brother Tom conducted each year a ten week seminar. This seminar was similar in concept to the Life in the Spirit seminar which is used in Australia to introduce adults to Christ, but it was directed at young people, with a view to a deeper understanding and faith in God. The attendants were mainly senior students from St. Bede's College and of a neighbouring Brigidine girl's school. These seminars are continuing to provide a profound experience of Christianity. It became evident, however, that the impact of the seminar rarely lasted beyond the ten weeks, and that some sort of follow-up was essential.

The New Life Seminar of 1984 concluded with a Mass, after which Brother Tom invited the participants to return the following Sunday for an evening of prayer. This small group continued to meet for several weeks until they decided to form a community — something more permanent than just ten weeks. A logo was designed and incorporated into a banner, an identity evolved, and the group grew both in size and commitment.

One of the most striking things about the New Life Community is the nature of the young people. Something almost all new-comers comment on is the welcome they receive. The friendly atmosphere is often so different from anything they have experienced that they want to stay. They meet people who are generous, out-going, confident, but still within a sphere to which they can relate. These factors are vital, for they contribute to an environment which promotes freedom and self-esteem. This environment makes one's search for God so much easier; it allows for failure, for questions, for expression, and it returns love and acceptance instead of derision and contempt.

While most of the New Lifers are at secondary schools, many of them are pursuing tertiary study, apprenticeships, vocations, marriages or jobs. The values and images projected by society often conflict so strongly with Christ's teaching that the adolescent is swayed constantly from one view to another. New Life is a firm foothold is sound values which last, and weather periods of searching and questioning.

The meetings

The Community meets on Sunday evenings to pray and sing, to mix and talk. The meeting can take various forms, but usually begins with songs of praise, followed by some sort of presentation. Everyone in the group is encouraged to give a talk or present something on a Sunday night at least once. As well as providing an ideal learning experience, it ensures variety and interest. Brother Cal. Cusak also attends the meetings, and recently presented an insight into the life and philosophies of St. De La Salle. Each year he also shares some very profound thoughts on Lent and Easter. The issues of faith, prayer, community, the Eucharist, relationships, sexuality and family, as well as more immediate events like the Pope's visit to Melbourne, the La Sallian Youth Festival in Sydney, along with major events in the Church's calendar are presented in original and provocative ways by the members themselves. They then like to discuss the topic, either altogether or in small groups. About half an hour of shared prayer concludes the formal part of the meeting, then tea, coffee, biscuits and 'Milo' circulate with the conversation and news.

Other activities

These Sunday night gatherings, however, are not the only contributor to the invaluable growth and development that take place within the New LIfe Community. A great deal of careful thought goes into the planning of many other activities. An important feature of New Life is the weekend camps and retreats which take place each year. The success of these is increasingly due to the young people themselves, who dedicate their time and creativity to choosing a theme, and presenting it through music, prayer, talks, discussions, reflections, booklets and a Mass. About fifteen of these camps have been held already. They invariably build a phenomenal community spirit, and bring each person closer to the Lord.

The practical details of running New Life are entrusted to the members of a council, who are elected by the group and meet each week with Brother Tom to plan the meetings and bring forward new ideas. This council was only initiated about six months ago, but has proven extremely successful. In addition, there are several smaller groups which meet fortnightly for prayer. These cater for the older members of the group who now need more than New Life offers. Instead of leaving the Community for want of a deeper experience, they have formed strong, lasting bonds with each other; together they pray for one another and the Community, they discuss problems that arise, and they minister to each other's needs for support in their struggle to be like Jesus. The faith of these people has grown remarkably through their association with New Life.

Ministering to youth in crisis

Brother Tom is also the director of 'Vaugirard', a home which welcomes young people with family difficulties or personal problems, who need some time to reflect and sort things out. These people come mainly from the La Sallian schools in the area, but boys and girls are also referred by local parish priests, social workers, counsellors, Community Policing Squads, the Catholic Family Welfare Bureau, the Department of Community Services, school principals and the Children's Court. Vaugirard, named after La Salle's property in Paris, is very much a community centre. The New Life members are encouraged to drop by often, and they have a profound influence on the guests who stay there. New Life has also been the instrument of many fund-raising initiatives for the hostel, such as cake-stalls in the parish, competitions, raffles and a Charity Ball.

The New Life Community has been active for almost four years. Much of this time has been spent learning the needs and attributes of young people. One can look back over this time and begin to understand exactly what New Life is doing. These people will surely help to renew the Church, for they are taking Christ with them into the future. At New Life they listen and discover what God is calling them to, as individuals and as members of a larger body, the Church. They are finding encouragement to go out and do their Father's work.

"FE Y ALEGRIA" (FAITH AND JOY) THE EXTRAORDINARY MOVEMENT OF POPULAR INTEGRAL EDUCATION IN LATIN AMERICA (1)

"Where the pavements ends
Where the water doesn't reach
Where the city loses its proper name
That is where Fe y Alegria begins...".

Latin America is the continent of superlatives almost by definition. Unfortunately many of its "mosts" are on the negative side. As the continent draws close to the 500th anniversary of its European discovery and evangelization, an overview suggests "What might have been". The beauty of the land, its abundant resources, its hundreds of millions of inhabitants, might all have come together to form something as close to an ideal society as the real world would permit. But the weight of the real, and sinful, world has produced a present day reality in which the great majority of Latin Americans is very poor. Man's avarice and selfishness have resulted in an insurmountable gulf between the rich and the poor. Not even the Church can be entirely exempt from blame. In spite of numerous and heroic defenders of the downtrodden, as a general rule, the Church was seen as defender of the established order of things from colonial and republican times. This was true in the field of education. Church schools, the "colegios", were most often at the service of the monied classes. The poor rarely had the same advantages and, as the continent passed the halfway mark in this century, the sheer masses of the unschooled and illiterate seemed to pose an invincible challenge. The governments themselves, the ministries of education, could come together at international conferences such as the one sponsored by UNESCO in Costa Rica in June of 1983 and blithely pledge themselves to eradicate illiteracy by 1999 and ensure from eight to ten years of formal education for all children; but a deepening economic crisis, heavy external debts and grave social ills make even that target date unattainable.

What can the Church do? Even more quixotically, what can one man do? This article is precisely about one man who dared to take up the challenge of the unschooled millions — and greatly succeeded in his own lifetime. Even more importantly, his spiritual legacy lives on, his work constantly expanding. The man is Father José María Vélaz S.J., the founder of Fe y Alegria, "Faith and Joy", the Movement of Popular Integral Education in ten Latin America countries.

The time is 1955. The place, a slum neighborhood of Caracas, Venezuela, one of the infamous barrios that ring the glittering towers of the city center, clinging precariously to the hillsides. Father José Maria Vélaz, a Jesuit priest born in Chile but educated in Spain where he also entered the Society of Jesus, is visiting again with some of his university students. They have been coming for a good while now, helping out with catechism classes and some of the corporal works of mercy, but it is like writing in the sand at the edge of the sea, so easily is a day's effort forgotten by the time of the following visit. The grinding poverty makes a mockery of any little improvement they felt they had made. The young students begin to think that it is all hopeless but Father Vélaz has been thinking, praying, looking for a solution. He now feels that he can put his finger on the root cause of the injustices and inequalities that they see. It is ignorance. "It is absolutely necessary for us to start a school", he says. "Otherwise, we are just wasting our time".

The pronouncement is overheard by a cement mason. Abraham Reyes is an extraordinary man; already the father of eight, he would eventually have thirteen of his own children plus some twenty adopted children that for a time at least would form part of his family. He has expanded his house on the side of a hill so that each of the two levels can be entered directly from the street. At the moment his family is only using one of the floors. "I can offer my house", he says. And so, a sign is hung over the door announcing that a school accepts boy students. Thus, Fe y Alegria is born.

For the Brother of the Christian Schools, for the Lasallian Family, that chance meeting, that analysis, that generous response, have an echo that rolls back almost three centuries to the city of Rheims in France. A young Canon of the Cathedral Chapter, John Baptist de La Salle, met that enthusiastic sower of charity schools, M. Adrian Nyel, on the doorstep of the Sisters of the Divine Child. Providence would weave a web of persons, places and events and John Baptist would follow faithfully what he came to see as God's will. The result, thirty-seven years later, was the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. At the time of his death, de La Salle could count more than a score of schools, nearly 250 Brothers and some 10,000 children in the schools, all in the Kingdom of France but for one small beginning in Rome.

Father José Maria Vélaz died in 1985. What he and Abraham Reyes began thirty-two ago has had an extraordinary development, far more impressive in the terms of mere numbers than the beginnings of John Baptist de La Salle's Brothers and the Christian Schools. To introduce a few of the statistics: at the end of 1986 there were 371 educational centers in ten Latin American countries, 303,249 students, 10,799 educators (administrators, teachers and auxiliaries); the centers include pre-schools, primary and secondary schools, plants for technical and special education, radio schools and "non-formal" or adult educatio. courses. An astonishing statistic is that of the 113 religious congregations, with 791 religious — almost exclusively Sisters — that collaborate with the Jesuit Fathers in the management of most centers.

The Institute of the Brothers bears the unmistakable mark of the personality and inspiration of its Founder, John Baptist de La Salle. That fact is the condition sine qua non of the growth and vigor of the Institute. In an undertaking of the scope of the Fe y Alegria Movement, the imprint of its founder has assured the strength, the unity of vision and growth of the whole system. What sort of man was José Maria Velaz? He is described by a fellow Jesuit, Father Fernando Gutiérrez Duque, National Director of Fe y Alegria in Guatemala, as a "good priest and religious", "an efficient poet, all that he dreamed of for Fe y Alegria, he brought about". It seems that he had an uncanny intuition for striking the responsive chord in possible collaborators and gaining their support. Here the superficial parallel with the life and work of St. John Baptist de La Salle does not carry through. Father Vélaz's itinerary is not marked by great crises and failures. There was some criticism and isolation. He was often charged with the "fetish of numbers". Nevertheless, from the small beginnings we've already seen, the work quickly burgeoned; he succeeded in attracting the support not only of private enterprise and international agencies but also managed substantial subsidies of governments that had done little for private education and have even acted in a decidedly anticlerical spirit. Towards the end of his life he was recognized as an educational pioneer in much of Latin America and had begun to be awarded honorary doctorates.

With his own Society of Jesus Father Vélaz passed through three distinct moments with regard to Fe y Alegria. The first was isolation. Here was a professor of humanities in the university who suddenly was dabbling in schools for slum dwellers. "He must be crazy but let him get it out of his system". The next moment was one of interest, but still from a distance. "Well, something is certainly happening. Let's see how it develops". It might be pointed out here that Vatican II had taken place and its interpretation for Latin America as the preferential option for the poor and for youth had been pronounced by the Bishops at their Medellin and Puebla Conferences. The traditional Jesuit apostolate of schools for the future elite was being examined critically. The notion of schools for the very poor and disadvantaged seemed to make good sense. The final moment, which Father Gutiérrez Duque smilingly dubbed "the most dangerous of all", was the full recognition on the part of the Jesuits of Latin America of the worth of the Fe y Alegria Movement. The "danger" was that the work would be taken over by the Society. Actually, Fe y Alegria is independently incorporated in each country in which it is present. It is all bound together in a loose federation of national directors and by the spiritual legacy of Father José Maria Vélaz who participated in the drafting of the "Ideario" or basic philosophy of Fe y Alegria. The commitment of the Jesuit Fathers is in personnel: nine of the ten national directors are Jesuits and, of these, five have been provincials. Financially, the Society has never made direct contributions.

How then has Fe y Alegria evolved in the thirty-two years of its existence? The Movement identifies itself as popular, integral education born of, and dynamized by, a living out of the Christian Faith which, faced with situations of injustices, commits itself to the cause of the poor and neglected in the building up of a more just and fraternal society.

The term popular seems to be applied rather loosely to most modern educational movements. For Fe y Alegria it has specific meaning: It is experiential rather than academic; it is geared to work, to production, to usefulness; it is, besides, gratuitous as are the public schools but with the stress on that quality education that private schools can offer; it is inculturated in the marginated, unattended, areas; finally, it offers diplomas, recognizing the fact that, for the poor person, the title is important for his or her self realization and for purposes of employment.

Integral applies to the entire person, at every level: faith, intellect and human values. It might be mentioned here that there is no discrimination based on ethnic, economic or religious considerations. Especially in these latter, Fe y Alegria provides an ecumenical meeting place for the many religions. It is a well-known fact that, in recent decades, evangelical and fundamentalist sects have made tremendous inroads in the poor barrios and villages of Latin America, precisely the target areas of the Fe y Alegria Movement. As a result, up to 50% or more of the student population is identified as non-Catholic. The parents and children are aware of the Catholic origins and administration of Fe y Alegria but they also know that the non-Catholic sects receive due respect even in the religion classes and class prayers.

In an interview, Father Gutiérrez Duque stated that for some years he has studied the conferences of Father Vélaz and had, besides, numerous personal contacts with the founder of Fe y Alegria. He has reached the conclusion that the essential character of the movement can be distilled in two concepts, alliteratively termed "Marginality and Multitude".

The first of these has to do with the absolute fidelity Fe y Alegria has had to its objective of quality education in the abandoned places, the zones of greatest demand and within the reach of the population that has the fewest resources.

The second, "multitude", is probably Father Velaz's sharpest intuition and his response to the "challenge of the millions". He firmly believed that Fe y Alegria should continually stretch its capacity because, for him, it is volume that increases the possibilities of quality. Against all the voices that expressed doubts or counseled prudence, Father Vélaz achieved official recognition for his schools and substantial government subsidies for his teachers' salaries. This help varies from country to country and also has some disadvantages but, in general terms, it has meant a per-student cost that is one-third of what is required by state schools. The wisdom of Father Vélaz's intuition is demonstrated today by the impressive panoply of human and material resources cited earlier in statistics.

Death came to José Maria Vélaz July 19, 1985, in the jungles of Venezuela. El Masparro was his last Fe y Alegria school and, to the very end, his mind teemed with projects and ways to serve more and more poor children. The spirit of this practical poet is captured in his testament.

TESTAMENT
of Father José Maria Veláz, SJ

"I am thinking of you,
you that have yet to come.
I have been raising up Schools and Shops for a new Youth, Marking out paths for footsteps that will not be mine.
Piling up books of Art that are filled with hope, because beauty is the mother lode of hope, readying teachers who will regard you as their own sons for you will be their heirs.

I have been thinking about flowers may they bring joy to your lives in the fragrance that permeates your hearts.
I have been planting trees whose gentle pity might soon shade my tomb, forming the woods
that will embrace the mountainside, transforming it into a Sanctuary of peace, of power, of harmony.

For you that will come,
whom I do not know, but already love, for you who have not yet been born, for the sad little girl that has never known a caress, for the orphaned child, graduate of the University of neglect, for those who have no advocate to defend them, for those of you that have never seen a house where Love can dwell.

Of the wild forest
I want to make a park, where the pleasant ways and paths may explore the secret of the great stands of trees, may bring forth the word that is now heard only as Far-off rumors, moans and cries, a word that will translate the language of the biting wind, and of the gentle breeze, that may comprehend the profound voices of the calm and the silence.

I want to invent
All sorts of cabins and shelters, that have a welcoming air about them, where the warm and eloquent solitude will receive the new arrivals as brothers, and will teach them to delve deeply into the forest of their own selves.

I have a dream of harmonizing all in one single theme the Forest, the Shops, the Books, the teachers and the Counsellors, Faith, Landscape and Prayer, the great Projects of the Future,
Art, Hope and Love.

How high can inventiveness, Illusion and hopes soar?
I would want to have an heir of my great desires, for whom the barrier of death is farther off than it is for me, so that the pressing tasks may multiply,
the horizons broaden,
and the heartbeat of my dream continue to throb so that, from the dormant power of this land,
a redeeming new start may spring.

The snow of these heights refreshes the hive that is my brow, teeming with projects.
The breeze stirs new life and its murmur is my solitude.
In the niche that is this humble paper,
in this fleeting moment,
I leave hidden the testament of my impotent striving.

Perhaps it will find those who will carry it through.
Perhaps this spark may one day be a conflagration.
It is a seed, nothing more,
that seeks the soil, the soil of multiplication in dying first...".

"LA RELEVE": A SPRINGBOARD FOR THE YOUNG

1. Birth of the movement

The other day, I was talking about LA RELEVE (Relief) with one of my friends. Before I had the time to recount the experience which I have had among the young, he asked me: "LA RELEVE? What is that?" Because the movement is not very old (It has been in existence for only four years in the diocese of Quebec) I was not surprised by the question. However, I said to myself that perhaps the time has come to make this movement better known!

LA RELEVE is a Catholic movement, set up by the cursillistas (members of the CURSILLO movement, which is for adults) in the diocese of Saint-Jean d'Iberville during the years 1975-77.

La RELEVE endeavors to gather together young people of 15, 16, and 17 years of age who wish, together with youths of their age, to set out on the path to becoming at once human and Christian. These "adults of the future" are in charge of the movement and they are responsible for animating the activities. The adults who work along with them have as their mission helping them to get organized and to persevere in the activities which they undertake.

Some reflections on these youths

* They adore the "La Relève" weekends.

* Several of them are a bit timid during the first contacts with the community.

* They recognize that they need the adults so that the group functions well.

* They are lively enough, sometimes excited... this is not serious, merely a reflection of their age.

* They lack toughness. Their thoughts are not yet entirely formed. They sometimes allow themselves to say almost anything arising from poorly-based opinions. They must learn to correct themselves because that is necessary, and they must learn to accept certain "untruths" from time to time.

* They very much appreciate being able to share their faith. When there is a climate of respect and acceptance, they express their prayers easily enough.

* They are spontaneous and they make no bones about expressing their disagreement.

* They easily forget. They have to be constantly reminded!

* They always want someone to help them to persevere in carrying out their projects.

* They are not always very weak.

* They are never "in a hurry". They often wait for the last minute.

* They like to be able to meet socially occasionally.

* They appreciate the values of respect, being heard, liberty of expression, fidelity, punctuality, and responsibility, even if they, like us, do not always practice it.

* Finally, the more the adult couple interest themselves in the community, the more the community is dynamic and the more the young people appreciate it.

(N.B. They does not mean the young people but some young people).

3. The weekly meetings

In order to share the movement, some young people, boys and girls often are invited by one of their companions, who are already members, to live the experience of a resource weekend. This experience is prepared and animated by a team of both youths and adults and is lived at the Youth Hostel of Saint-Augustin-de-Desmaures. This house has been maintained as a center of pastoral animation for the past 16 years by the Brothers of the Christian Schools who generously collaborate in various ways in the activities of the movement.

So that this weekend experience will not be just a "flash in the pan", the youths can continue on their way in an already existing group called the "community". At present, there are six communities and a seventh will be established very soon. They are located in Beauport, Limoilou, l'Ancienne-Lorette, Saint-Romuald, Saint Jean Chrysstôme, Sain Anselme and soon at Sainte-Catherine-de Portneuf.

Each community meets every two weeks. The meeting is usually animated by two young people who have previously submitted their project for the evening to the couple in charge and to the spiritual animator of their group. Of course, the meetings touch upon the concerns of the young. It is they themselves who choose the themes of the meetings. However, they are asked to reserve a moment to enter into a more spiritual part. Thus, these young people can progress in their faith life.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Two or three times a year, the young people from all the communities come together to live the time of renewal: it can be held on a weekend at the beginning of the year or as an evening in preparation for the Feast of Easter, for example.

Up until now more than 350 youths have live this experience on 14 weekends. There are about 160 active members in the movement. There are 25 adults who generously devote themselves to helping these young people discover the presence of the Lord in this world. We sincerely believe that the LA RELEVE movement can be for the young a springboard which will allow them more basically to participate in the building up of the Kingdom.

In conclusion, allow me to thank all those men and women who have contributed to setting up and promoting this movement in our diocese. May the Lord fill them with His graces. Thanks also to all our readers for the support, of one kind or another, which you have given us.

January 1st 1989

FOREWORD

The first number of LASALLIANA appeared in October 1983. After that, three issues appeared regularly every year until October 1987 when LASALLIANA n. 13 was published. This number signalled the end of all further publications.

However, Brothers from several parts of the Institute wrote to the General Council to express regret at the decision taken. They had found in LASALLIANA not only much food for thought but also a means for making the Institute better known to the lay staff and the pupils in their colleges as well as to friends and benefactors. Also, groups of individuals interested in Lasallian education made effective use of LASALLIANA in their meetings and group discussions. All concerned have expressed regret at no longer being able to count on this resource.

The General Council, therefore, considered it desirable that LASALLIANA be re-published. This task has been entrusted to the Secretariat for Mission Education. Hence, from now on LASALLIANA will again appear regularly in January, April and October.

LASALLIANA n. 14 will be the first of this new series. In offering it to you together with our best wishes, we would like to avail ourselves of the occasion to remind you kindly of two points:

a/ that these leaflets on Lasallian themes are intended for the use of all members of the Lasallian Family. Some of these papers will be of immediate use to the Brothers, others will appeal to the secular teachers of the college, and others again to the parents of the pupils. But all have a common denominator: our mission as Christian educators living our origins and traditions in the world of today. Hence, it is our earnest wish that LASALLIANA be widely diffused, read and used and not be consigned to oblivion in a library or hidden away in book-shelves.

b/ that all members of the Lasallian Family who wish to co-operate by contributing articles have free access to these Lasallian leaflets. For those who wish to share their experiences, views and opinions with members of the whole Institute, articles on the following themes will be most welcome: the Founder, the History of the Institute, the mission educator, the teaching vocation, the world of pastoral education, etc., etc.

As we begin the publication of this new series of LASALLIANA, it is but right and just that we pay tribute to two Brothers to whom we owe a debt of gratitude for the significant role they played in the preparation and publication of LASALLIANA during the period October 1983 - October 1987.

The first is Brother Leon Lauraire who, as Secretary for Education, was fully responsible for the direction and publication of the earlier editions of LASALLIANA. He measured up to his responsibilities with great success to the end of his term of office.

The second is the late Brother Maurice Auguste Hermans, who was called to his heavenly reward on July 16th 1987. He was an outstanding figure in "Lasallian Studies" and an excellent collaborator of LASALLIANA. His last contribution to LASALLIANA, dated April 30th and duly signed by him, was prepared just a few weeks before his death. It will be found included in the present issue of LASALLIANA. May our gratitude to, and admiration for him, accompany our prayers for the eternal repose of his soul.

With the earnest wish that LASALLIANA will be a bond of fraternal union between Regions, Districts, Delegations, Centres of education, Brothers, teachers, catechists, past pupils, parents and present pupils... in a word, between all the members of the great Lasallian Family,

Yours cordially,

Brother José María Valladolid, f.s.c.

300 YEARS AGO DE LA SALLE

It had not taken the Archbishop Maurice Le Tellier long to become interested in the Rheims "community" founded by De La Salle. He was prepared to give it his full support, even to contribute financially. But he laid down one condition: the community could not move out of the archdiocese. In this way he would be its superior and have control of it; he would draw up statutes for it, undertake to obtain letters patent from the King and so put the foundation on a legal footing.

De La Salle declined the offers of the Archbishop, preferring insecurity but also freedom of action. The community had only just been founded and De La Salle needed to give it enough time to consolidate sufficiently before even thinking of settling down permanently in Rheims or anywhere else.

As early as 1683, he had seen that there was a possibility of taking over one of the schools in the parish of St. Sulpice in Paris. In fact De La Salle had promised the parish priest, Father La Barmondière, that he would come and take over the school. In the years that followed, the Founder felt himself bound by that promise, even if looking after his schools in the dioceses of Rheims and Laon, and especially running his Institute, prevented him from fulfilling it immediately.

In 1687, stage one was completed: there were Brothers teaching in five towns of the dioceses of Rheims and Laon; on the Mother House premises there was a novitiate, a school for training village school teachers; two assemblies attended by the most important Brothers had been held there, had made their first Chapter decisions, had adopted several rules with regard to life in common, and had elected a superior.

De La Salle thought that he was now able to hand over various positions of responsibility to the Brothers, while he himself and two Brothers could go off to Paris and revive the fortunes of a school which had once been flourishing, but which now had fallen on bad days. This, however, was not the only reason for making this journey. In fact, for the Founder, this journey meant the transfer of the headquarters of the Institute. Once in Rheims, it would now be in Paris; once in the province of Champagne, it would now be operating at a different level, that of the Kingdom of France, and in a position to make a move to Rome. And so, what was happening had everything to do with the very character of the Lasallian Institute. This is what makes De La Salle's move to Paris 300 years ago so important for us even today.

Fortunately, the Founder's biographers can give us an accurate chronological account of this event. De La Salle arrived in Paris, in the parish of St. Sulpice, on the vigil of the feast of St. Matthias, 1688. He was accompanied by two Brothers. As it was a leap year, the date must have been February 24th. The Parish Priest gave the three travellers a warm welcome and lodged them in the school house. A short time afterwards, the Brothers tried to settle things with those running the St. Sulpice school. This turned out to be neither easy nor pleasant. As everywhere else, De La Salle and his Brothers introduced order and discipline; they enforced a timetable and regular attendance; they insisted on hard work and silence. Their approach did not endear them to those who had once run the school and who now worked with the Brothers. The Founder asked the Brothers to be patient, convinced that, sooner or later, the progress made by their pupils would convince people of their competence and devotedness.

And that is what happened; so much so that the parish school now known as the "Brother's school", created for the Brothers a very good reputation not only at St. Sulpice, but in the whole city.

Let us remain with these early beginnings: February 1988 marks exactly 300 years since the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools ceased to be a diocesan institute and became de facto before becoming legally so, an international Congregation in the Church.

For the time being, however, the "Community of the Christian Schools" was an association that was merely tolerated. Official recognition would come only in 1725 when Benedict XIII gave the Lasallian Congregation the Church's approval, making it an Institute of Pontifical Right and setting its seal on something that De La Salle had wanted as early as February 1688.

It is true that the biographers sometimes stress, perhaps a little excessively, the fact that Father John Baptist de La Salle, former Canon of Rheims, wanted to leave his native town to free himself from the influence of his relatives who held high positions in both society and in the Church. It is true also that the priest who had declined all the help available in Rheims, considered his move to Paris as a means of making his break as final as possible. There was about all this a radical approach to life that was evangelical, and it was hardly surprising in a man who had placed all his trust in God as he set about his work of founding and directing a Congregation to teach and train the humble and the poor.

This move to Paris, however heroic, was significant in quite a different way. Within the first years of his arrival in Paris, De La Salle had transferred the Institute novitiate there. It is in Paris that his work really took on its true form and scope; it is from there that Brothers left to work in 15 other dioceses; it is from there that De La Salle went so often to visit the different houses of the Institute, without ever thinking, it seems, of returning to the birthplace of his Congregation.

One cannot help feeling surprised to see De La Salle take such an important step so early on in his role as Founder. His coming to Paris meant he was leaving Brothers behind in Rheims and elsewhere who needed his presence. His Director had been in two minds about letting him go for exactly this reason: "Your Brothers still need you", he had said to him.

And in fact, once De La Salle had left for Paris, the Brothers felt somewhat at a loss: those that the Founder thought could replace him were not up to it. There was more than one instance of floundering and it was noticed by people round about. One result was that recruitment, so good up till then, came to an end.

De La Salle must have foreseen something like that was going to happen, but perhaps he did not realise the extent of the crisis his departure would provoke. The fact that he made this move shows the great importance he attached to the re-establishment of his Congretation far from those who would only too easily give way to the temptation of taking it over for themselves.

Of course, De La Salle could not foresee all the different changes that would take place in the Institute in the centuries to come, but doubtlessly, he knew, with all the intuition of a Founder, that, especially once he had gone, the Institute would need a sphere larger than that simply of a diocese in which to exist and exert its influence.

I KNOW

THREE DIFFERENT "FOUNDERS"

Strange as it may seem, the word "Lasallian" in Lasallian Family can puzzle people. It obviously comes from De La Salle, a name which serves as a rallying cry for the members of the Family. But many of these same members have no clear idea at all of who this Founder was, and yet they live according to his "spirit" and take him as their model. They do, of course, know something about his life, but certainly not enough to justify the admiration they intuitively feel for him, nor to imitate him.

And so, who was the Founder...?

The answer is not as straightforward as you may think... As a De La Salle Brother, I know I am supposed to know, but, to tell you the truth, I have come across three quite different Founders... I thought you might be interested in hearing about them.

The "traditional" Founder

Perhaps the best way to describe what I mean is to refer you to a painting of the Founder which used to hang in the hall where I took the habit, in the house of formation at Cambrils, Barcelona. In the picture, the Saint is sitting at a table, there is a sheaf of writing paper in front of him, a goose quill pen in his right hand, and his eyes are fixed on a ray of light shining down from Heaven... On the table in front of him there is a large crucifix and a selection of disciplines... The general impression created is that of a man who is a mystic, rather on the serious side, almost forbidding, a man whose chief concern is to keep the Rule perfectly, a man who lives a life of strict mortification; a man wholly engrossed in writing books like the Rule, the Meditations and the Collection. To say the least, not a particulary attractive Founder for the young person I was then. I did not actually dare to say so out loud, but I thought to myself that St. La Salle could not really be like that... at least, not only like that. To be able to do something for children he would have to be more approachable, less serious looking, less terribly grown-up looking, more childlike, as the Gospel says.

John Baptist de La Salle

And then, as time went on and I read about the fantastic research done by Brother Leon de Marie Aroz; as I read the early biographies of the Founder, especially by Bernard and Maillefer; as I dipped into Blain and the Cahiers Lasalliens, I gradually discovered that there was another John Baptist de La Salle that had been, as it were, kept hidden from us. There is another picture of De La Salle I can describe for you. Perhaps it will surprise you: it certainly surprised me.

* There is this picture of John Baptist, 17 years old probably, already a Canon, dressed up in his choir vestments, very serious looking, quite the young gentleman with his beautifully looked after hair. Bernard tells us also that he was over polite...

* The same biographer says it was difficult to wake John Baptist up and get him out of bed, and that is the reason he would come late for the Office. Funny, isn't it? That is something we did not know...

* He liked good food. When he brought the first group of teachers to eat with him at table, he had a different menu, and it did not worry him in the least. It did not worry the teachers either.

* Rosette, his favourite sister, joined an enclosed convent in Rheims. John Baptist would go to see her much too often and bring her presents quite out of keeping with monastic austerity: there were hampers for community, and especially Mother Superior's, feastday; there was a very expensive crucifix for Rosette's cell, a warming-pan, woollen stockings, books, etc.

* He had a great respect for money. His father left him quite a lot... as well as many forgetful debtors. He set about getting back the money owed him, using the police to deal with those who had simply forgotten, and the Courts for those who refused to pay. By the end of four years, as legal guardian of his brothers and sisters, he had greatly improved their financial situation by recovering a great deal of money. He left a list of outstanding debts for his successor.

* His social standing meant a lot to him. He bought back his father's noble title for himself. There was nothing about this aristocratic canon that foreshadowed the friend of the poor.

* He admires his friend Roland, a canon like himself, for founding a congregation to teach girls. Occasionally he gives him a hand, but there is never any question of his becoming involved personally.

* He thought he was all fixed up for the rest of his life. He had become a priest in spite of a great deal of opposition, not least from the purveyors of common sense –he was the eldest in the family. He was involved in a lot of charitable work. He was readily sought after to preach missions wherever they were needed. He took his priestly vocation very seriously, was faithful to his choir duties, and as legal guardian and elder brother, he put a lot of effort into looking after his brothers and sisters. What more could one ask? He neglected nothing: not his choir service, not his family duties, looking after his six brothers and sisters.

* However, we should point out also all the very positive things about John Baptist: his deep piety, his ability to make friends, his hospitality, his tender affection for his family, his determination, his intelligence, his availability, his apostolic zeal... This will probably be enough for the moment.

Saint John Baptist de La Salle

And here is a third picture which contradicts the second one, and which perhaps seems somewhat disconcerting and astonishing. A few examples will explain what I mean.

* One time when he was travelling along the road to Rethel, some robbers stole his cassock. When they had a good look at it, they discovered it was not worth stealing and they gave it back to him. As for the cassock, some time later, a seminary companion of his, the Archbishop of Chartres, made him accept a more suitable one.

* When he began to feel he was being called upon to make great sacrifices he arranged for the sacristan of St. Remi's church to lock him in on a Friday night, and he would spend the night in prayer.

* Having accepted that he was the "father" of his Brothers, he decided he would eat the same food as they. Bernard tells us he found it impossible, and every time he tried, he vomited. Eventually he decided to starve himself and his appetite in time overcame his disgust.

* Whenever a woman religious asked him to be her spiritual director, he would tell her to get rid first of all the superfluous things in her cell.

* When God asked him he did not hesitate to give up his position as canon and to give away his fortune to the starving poor during the terrible famine of 1684.

* When he was finally convinced that it was God's will, he set about founding the Institute with great determination, with all his intelligence, with his ability to organise and above all with his great capacity for love.

God... wanting to involve me... did so without my noticing it.

Towards the end of his life, the Founder summed up how it had all begun: "Before it all started it was the thing furthest from my mind... Since I considered the teachers I had to employ especially in the early days as far inferior to my foot servants, just the thought of having to live with them would have been unbearable... God who is gentle and wise in all he does and who never forces people... brought everything about without my noticing it... in such a way that one commitment led to another that I could never have foreseen".

Here are some examples of commitments which successively led him in a direction he could never have foreseen:

* When he was a seminarist at St. Sulpice, Paris, he probably taught catechism. What is certain is that he joined the "league of prayer" started up by a certain Father Bourdoise to ask God to inspire the foundation of an institute of Christian teachers. This priest used to say that whoever undertook to found such an institute would be certain to be canonised.

* At Rheims he had got to know Canon Roland, a very good friend of his, who founded the congregation of the Sisters of the Child Jesus for the education of poor girls. On his deathbed Roland handed over everything to John Baptist de La Salle and asked him to help the Sisters. He did so, obtaining for them letters patent from the King... and thought that that was all there was to it.

* In Paris he got to know Father Barré who belonged to the order of Minims, and who had unsuccessfully tried to found an association of Christian teachers. The coincidence of so many holy people trying to do the same thing must have impressed him.

* There came next his meeting with Mr Nyel on the doorstep of the convent of the Sisters of the Child Jesus. He had come to start up a school like the ones in Rouen for poor children, and was looking for a certain Mr De La Salle, hoping he would be able to help him. A relative of his, a certain Mrs Maillefer, had recommended him... He did what he could, won over the opposition, talked it over with the parish priests, and finally a school was opened, much to the delight of Mr Nyel and that of Mr De La Salle who was able to get back to his duties as canon, as guardian of his family and so on...

* The teachers hired by Mr Nyel had been done so in a very haphasard way. They lacked the necessary skills and lacked commitment even more. Teaching was just another way, and one of the least sought after, of earning one's living. There was a very fast turnover in teachers... This difficult situation left an impression on De La Salle.

When actually did De La Salle commit himself?

It is difficult to say when exactly, but I think the following three sets of circumstances were of crucial importance in making him decide.

* During the course of his frequent visits to the schools (the one school had soon become several), De La Salle must have realised that although the teachers had absolutely no training, the children were changing and improving. The thought must have surely come to him that one could do such marvellous things if only... God! What an idea!

* Year after year, De La Salle had gone along the streets of Rheims, along Arbalete Street, for example, which led from the Hotel de La Cloche were he lived to the Cathedral and back, and never had his social conscience given any twinges. That is how society was and there was nothing more to be said about it. But one day he must have opened his eyes and seen, actually SEEN, the crowds of children and young people in Rheims (and all over the world) who had no future to look forward to, no chance of education, no chance of ever achieving any kind of human dignity. He must have thought: "How easy it would be..." And the idea was beginning to develop.

* During Holy Week in 1681, he invited the teachers (perhaps a dozen or so) to make a retreat with him. For this generation of teachers, probably the third by that time, this voluntary retreat was like a Lasallian Pentecost. Grace poured down in abundance on to these teachers who had opened their hearts, and they became changed men. The effects of this were seen immediately in the schools which became from then on "Christian schools" without actually yet being called so officially. At that point De La Salle, with great astonishment, must have said to himself: "Well, if that's the way things are..."

* During the very first years of community life with the Brothers of the Christian Schools he was able to observe how they worked and in what spirit; he saw his companions, his "brothers" doing marvellous work in slum districts; he saw some of them die in his arms, saints already, destined for Heaven.

And so he made his decision; and from that time onwards, nothing and no one would be able to divert him from the path he had chosen and which he followed for 40 years, working to found his Institute, in spite of innumerable obstacles.

One day he said:

"If God, when he showed me how much good this Institute could do, had also revealed to me the sufferings and crosses that this would entail, my courage would have failed me, and I would not have dared to touch it with the tips of my fingers, let alone take responsibility for it." "If God had not given his visible support to the Christian Schools they would have been lying in ruins a long time ago."

The nature of a vocation

What we have said should give us some idea how the Founder's vocation developed. I think also that it illustrates that the growth or lack of it, of a vocation depends on the care that is taken of it. I am thinking of writing another article for Lasalliana to examine in more detail De La Salle's vocation... and to reflect a little on the lessons we can learn from it.

THE CONDUCT OF SCHOOLS

AN APPROACH TO TEACHING BASED ON KNOWING ONE'S PUPILS

"Nosce te ipsum"

Did St. John Baptist de La Salle know that "to teach John English you have to know John first"? Whether he did or not is not very important if his teaching methods were based on a thorough and detailed knowledge of each and every one of the pupils by the teacher. There is no mention in any of his writings of "differential psychology", but the methods he used in class, the advice he gave to teachers, and the results he obtained (according to his biographers), show quite clearly that he thought a teacher ought to know his pupils well if he was to teach them well.

I have restricted myself on purpose in this article to the Conduct of Schools: it is not a closely reasoned and tightly structured pedagogical or psychological treatise, but rather a work which contains a core of intuitive perceptions which have been subsequently turned into a system and given names which are more or less intelligible to educational non-experts.

The Conduct of Schools can be viewed from two angles: its content and how this is expressed; in other words, what one aims to attain and the manner of doing so. This is not an area I can get involved with at the moment and I will leave for some other time an examination of underlying psychological presuppositions. Instead I shall speak briefly of the practical means used to get to know pupils personally and as separate individuals.

There is nothing fanciful about the titles given to the articles to be found in chapter III, part II: The School Register, The Register of Lesson Changes, The Register of the Qualities and Defects of Pupils. Our modern education gurus would, of course, use much more grandiose terms like registration, assessment, transfer, equal opportunity, medical opinion, course counselling and psychopedagogical imperatives etc. A brief survey of the articles mentioned earlier will demonstrate that they are as valid now as they have ever been.

THE SCHOOL REGISTER (Conduite, p. 133).

The title indicates clearly what is meant. There was one for each year. These registers were entered in turn into a main register. At the end of this register there was a list of all the pupils in alphabetical order. Pages 133 and 134 give clear instructions how registers should be set out. To give an idea of the psychological insight of these registers perhaps an actual example of a model register entry would be most effective:

August 31th MULOT - C (The C means he has been confirmed).

Jean Mulot joined the school on August 31th at the age of 16. He had been confirmed two years previously. Began receiving Communion last Easter. Son of Joseph Mulot, textile worker. Address: rue de Contray, St. Stephen's Parish, at Croix d'Or. Lives over the shop.

Was classed third in Writing, first in Politeness. Due in school at 9,0am and 3,0pm. Was taught two years by Mr Caba in the school on St. Stephen's Street, 8 months by Mr Ralot, a year by Mr Huysbecq and 4 months by Mr Mulot the schoolmaster. After that his parents took him away thinking he would do better elsewhere.

He has difficulty in concentrating. He is absent about twice a month –helping his mother. He does not work hard, but does not find learning difficult. He has rarely missed being promoted. He knows his catechism but not very much his prayers. He is a habitual liar and glutton. He is not particularly pious and has no idea of recollection. He was absent from school for three months during the winter, and he finally left school for good August 31st 1706 to train as a sculptor, or to be a foot servant, or something else...

If you simply changed a few words, made the report sound a bit more modern, you could probably ask your school psychologist if his present day file records were any improvement on the one quoted above. The reader himself, I am sure, can draw his own –many– conclusions.

THE REGISTER OF LESSON CHANGES (pp. 133...)

These were kept by school inspectors who were in charge of "lesson changes". Their function was to keep a check on pupils' progress in reading, writing, counting etc. Each subject has as many registers as there were "lessons" or levels of attainment. There is a model example of such a register on page 135 of the "Conduct":

WRITING REGISTER
(stage 3)

January 1st	Jacques Maturin	April 2nd
March 1st	Hubert Valle	June 3rd
May 2nd	François Duterioux	July 6th
June 1st	Nicolas Paulet	August 1st
July 1st	Louis Adam Rive	October 1st
August 2nd	Jean Grimoine	November 2nd
October 1st	Philippe Le Gendre	December 1st
November 2nd	Pierre Le Large	February 2nd

The dates indicate when each pupil began and completed the third stage in writing. Each "lesson" had three stages.

REGISTER OF CLASS SECTIONS (pp. 136...).

It was the job of the school inspector to see that every teacher had this register on the first of each month. There was very little of any interest for the psychologist in these registers as they contained only the times pupils were late, absent with or without leave, or unable to recite their catechism.

REGISTER OF THE QUALITIES AND DEFECTS OF PUPILS (p. 236).

These registers give an extraordinarily deep insight into the characters of pupils and their consequent behaviour. Keeping registers such as these implied constant and meticulous observation of pupils on the part of teachers. During the last month of the school year, the teacher would draw up a profile of each of his pupils, noting all the positive and negative things he had noticed about him during the course of the year. These profiles he would hand over to the Brother Director who would pass them on to the teacher taking these pupils the following year, but only for the first term. At this point the latter had to start making his own observations so as to be able to draw up his own profiles at the end of the year. When a teacher kept the same class for two years running because of staff changes, the register would be kept by the Brother Director. A comparison of the registers of successive years enabled the school inspector to get a clear idea of what the pupils were like and of the powers of observation of the teachers... When a teacher did not know how to write up these profiles, the Director or inspector would either help him or do it for him.

Probably an actual example of one of these profiles would give a better idea than any more description:

François de Terieux, 8 1/2 years old, has been coming to school for 2 years now. He has been on level 3 of Writing since July 1st last. He finds it difficult to concentrate. He is not very pious and cannot keep still in church or during prayers unless you keep an eye on him. He does this through an inability to keep his mind on things. His main defect is a lack of concentration. He is quite a willing lad but you have to win him over to get him to behave. Punishing him makes no difference as it does not register. He has been rarely absent from school, but he has been so sometimes without permission, having met up with some rascal friend of his and because he is easily led. He has often come late for school. He does not work hard: often he just looks around and has a rest if you do not keep an eye on him. He learns easily but he has missed being promoted twice from level 2 to level 3 through not working. He knows his prayers well. He will accept being told off by teachers who have authority but will be uncooperative with those who have none. All the same, he has not got a difficult character: if you win him over he will do anything for you. His parents love him and do not like to see him punished. He has never been given any post of responsibility because he is not very able. He is alert and could do well if he did not come late so often.

We may well ask if any of our files contain profiles as complete as this one.

HEAD OF ROW REGISTER (p. 238).

ABSENTEES REGISTER (p. 239).

The Head of Row Register, as the name implies, was kept up to date by a pupil who sat at the end of the row. He would mark down those who came late or were absent. In the Absentees Register were listed all the absent pupils who lived in the same part of town as the pupil in charge of checking up on them. The information contained in these registers was not particularly significant from a psychological point of view but provided an important element for the personal profiles.

These examples taken from the Conduct of Schools illustrate the extent to which St. La Salle and his first Brothers were keen on knowing their pupils as well as possible. Only ignorance or prejudice could lead anyone to believe that those who came before us treated their pupils as mass produced clones.

TEACHING RELIGION THROUGH SONGS

De La Salle was at one and the same time a teacher, a psychologist and a saint, and this is reflected in his writings. He was aware of the various trends in educational psychology of his day and made use of what was best in them.

As far as the teaching of religion is concerned he was strongly influenced by the methods of St. Sulpice. These he had studied, used, adapted and passed on to his followers. In the "Directory of the Associates of the Catechism of Perseverance of St. Sulpice", St. John Baptist de La Salle and St. Louis Marie Grignon de Montfort are both listed as being the most famous practitioners of these methods.

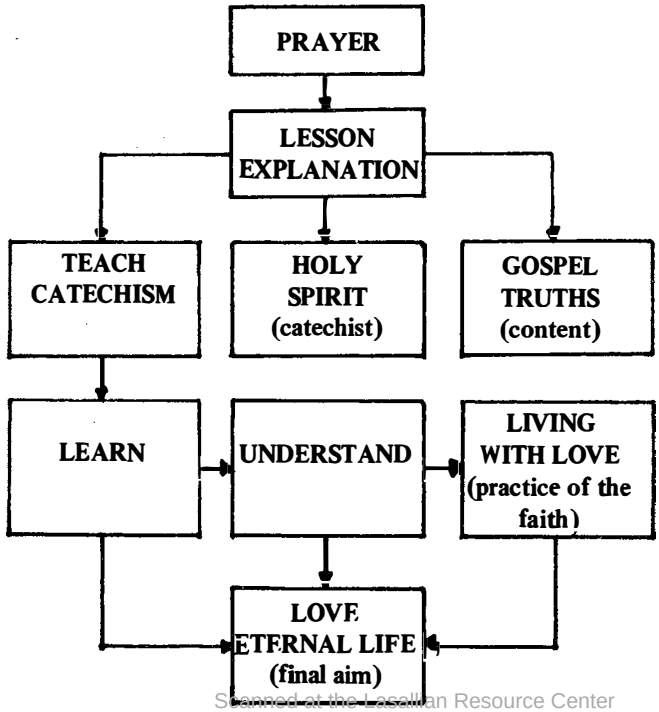
In the Sulpician method, pupils were put into the right frame of mind for their religion lessons by a combination of the presence of God, prayer and singing. De La Salle knew how effective singing could be. From a psychological point of view, it can calm a person, bring peace; it can also stimulate and motivate. From a pedagogical point of view, singing makes the meaning of words more vivid, easier to assimilate and memorise. From the point of view of religious experience and worship, as St. Augustine says: "He who sings prays twice". One could illustrate very easily the truth of all this.

And so De La Salle spent much of his free time composing lyrics for songs which fitted in with what his teachers taught in their religion lessons during the course of the year. What he wrote could not compete with Corneille and Moliere for elegance, but it contained all the wealth of knowledge and expertise of a theologian trained at the Sorbonne.

In school, week after week, the pupils learnt the truths of religion which would turn them into committed Christians, by singing the lyrics of De La Salle set to popular contemporary tunes. Each day, teachers and pupils begged the Holy Spirit to enlighten their faith with his light, a faith which they followed in spirit and truth (intellectual acceptance and good works); a faith which finds its expression in a series of truths which must be passed on and accepted with a heart full of love.

The following table will enable the reader to judge for himself the importance attached to the various concepts which are repeated over and over again in the different songs sung each day of the week:

	Mo	Tu	We	Th	Fr	Sa
Holy Spirit	x	x	x	x	x	x
Light		x	x	x	x
To enlighten	x	x		x	x
Faith		x		x
To believe		x		x
To practise	x	x	x	x	x	x
Truths	x	x	x		x	x
To teach	x	x	x		x
To instruct		x
To listen			x
To learn				x		x
Heart	x	x	x
Love	x	x			x	x



Here is an example of one of the songs, the one for Saturday which I think is one of those with the most meaning:

Lord, send me your Spirit
To make me good and wise;
To teach me about Jesus,
What a child of my age should know.

Holy Spirit, make me understand
What you are going to say;
And as you teach me your truths
Help me to practise them too.

Let us love God, however young we may be Let us do everything with love in our hearts;
Let us learn how, here below,
To love him for all eternity.

The lines are short and few in number, but the religious concepts that are included are both fundamental and numerous. I have tried to illustrate what I mean by a schematic diagram accompanied by a commentary from the writings of the Founder.

1. PRAYER

The St. Sulpice religion teacher (and his pupils) was supposed to begin and end his lessons by prayer, and pray during the lesson also (cf. Ms of St. Sulpice). In a booklet entitled: "Daily Exercises used in the Christian Schools" De La Salle bequeaths to us the sort of prayer that has been used for centuries now in Brothers' schools.

2. EXPLANATION

The reader can refresh his memory by referring to Chapter IX of the Conduct of Schools (pp. 96-109) if he cannot remember the general principles outlined there.

3. WHAT A CHILD OF MY AGE SHOULD KNOW

That is what the pupils say in their prayers. The Meditations as well as the Conduct of Schools are full of recommendations like the following: "Answers should be within the grasp of pupils, but not only of the cleverest and sharpest ones, but rather of the slowest ones. In that way most pupils will be able to answer questions without much difficulty" (Cond. Ch. 9, p. 102).

4. WHAT YOU ARE GOING TO SAY

What a frightening responsibility for a teacher of religion who really believes these words of De La Salle!

"It is likewise by the movement of the same Spirit that all those who announce God's kingdom speak even today" (Med. 3, 2).

"He wants your disciples to see him in you and receive your teaching as if he (Jesus) were teaching them" (Med. 195, 2).

5. TO TEACH ME ABOUT JESUS

This refers to Gospel sayings. Could there be a better summary of "The Duties of a Christian" than the following words?

"Because Christ wants all Christians to be perfect, he has given them and left in writing a great many Christian sayings, in his own words or in those of the Apostles. Christians should read these often and think about them so as to be able to put them into practice, and by so doing become perfect Christians" (Duties p. 192).

St. La Salle says the same thing on innumerable occasions throughout his writings.

6. AND AS YOU TEACH ME YOUR TRUTHS

On numerous occasions De La Salle repeats how important it is for teachers of religion and their pupils to know their catechism:

"Teachers will be so careful about the way they teach, that all their pupils without exception will know what they have been taught, at least, as far as what a Christian is supposed to know is concerned, with regard to both doctrine and practice" (Conduct Chap. 9, pp. 102-103). Once again the combination of theory and practice.

7. HOLY SPIRIT, MAKE ME UNDERSTAND

The main reason that De La Salle gives for singing before a religion lesson is to ask the Holy Spirit for help to be able to understand the truths that are going to be explained, and then to put them into practice.

In Meditation 193, he says the following with the psychological insight typical of him:

"For these children are simple and for the most part poorly brought up. Those who help them to save themselves must speak simply, so that every word will be clear and easy to understand" (Med. 193, 3).

8. HELP ME TO PRACTISE THEM TOO

For De La Salle as for Paul of Tarsus or St. James, faith without works is dead. This is something that De La Salle stresses very often, as in the extracts from his Meditations that follow:

"It will not then be enough to have taught your disciples the mysteries and truths of our religion, if you have not helped them to learn the chief Christian virtues, and if you have not taken a very special care to help them put these virtues into practice, as well as all the good of which they are capable at their age. For no matter how much faith they may have, nor how lively it may be, if they are not practising any good works at all, their faith will be of no use to them" (Med. 200, 3).

"It is then not enough to provide children with a Christian mentality and teach them the mysteries and doctrines of our religion. We must also teach them the practical maxims that are found throughout the holy Gospel" (Med. 197, 2).

9. LET US DO EVERYTHING WITH LOVE... TO LOVE HIM FOR ALL ETERNITY

As for the Beloved Disciple, so for De La Salle, fulfilling the Law is motivated by love. In the long and closely argued introduction to the Ten Commandments in his "Duties of a Christian", De La Salle uses as a springboard the words of Christ: "You will love the Lord with all your heart... and your neighbour as yourself". In the preface to this work, he writes: "All that a Christian has to do in this world is to know God and to love him".

CONCLUSION

I limited myself on purpose to only one religious song, one, you will agree, which is typical of the Founder's work. This whole area has a great deal to offer but is still untapped. I wonder whether prayer and the Holy Spirit are still valid in the teaching of religion these days? Or whether people could link up "What a child of my age should know" with catechesis based on the experience of the pupil? How deeply rooted are the religious beliefs of our pupils? Can modern man restrict his faith simply to a few beliefs? What is the point of frenetic activity if love is missing? Teach religion on a guitar? It is now more than 300 years ago that a certain religion teacher called De La Salle found an answer to all these questions through a happy combination of lyrics and catchy tunes.

THE CHARISM OF BROTHER

IN THE WORLD TODAY

A Charism:
To Brother Our Sisters Today

"There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither slave nor freeman, there can be neither male nor female – for you are all one in Christ Jesus." (Gal. 3: 28).

An old rabbi once asked his pupils how they could tell when the night had ended and the day had begun.
"Could it be", asked one of the students,
"when you can see an animal in the distance and tell whether it is a sheep or a dog?"
"No," answered the rabbi.
Another asked, "Is it when you can look at a tree in the distance and tell whether it is a fig tree or a peach tree?"
"No," answered the rabbi.
"Then when is it?" the pupils demanded.
"It is when you can look on the face of any woman or man and see that it is your sister or brother.
Because if you cannot see this,
it is still night."

Tales of Hasidim

In this last part of the 20th century, the words of Christ: "Repent, the kingdom of God is at hand" (Mark 1:15) take on a new urgency, and conversion becomes an imminent challenge as we face the continued dawning of new insights and understanding. In an age glutted by a daily increase of information, as Brothers and as Christians, ours is the challenge of humanizing this global, electronic village.

Through news sources and the electronic media we share daily in the events and thoughts of our planet. And with this sharing, our packaged and honored understandings and language take on new richness or fall away as inadequate.

We, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, stand approximately two years away from the experience of our 41st General Chapter (1986). We hold in our collective hands a newly approved and promulgated RULE which confirms our past 300 years of tradition, challenges our contemporary creativity and fidelity and beacons us into a yet uncharted future. We have received two messages from the Brothers capitulant: one calling us to personal and institutional conversion, the other, addressed to those who share our Lasallian world, promising that we have opened our blinders and will willingly share the rich tradition that is ours.

As Institute, the "Body of the Society" reminds us that we do not exist for ourselves. We were created three hundred years ago because of a need that existed in France. We continue because we recognize that same need, now global, today.

Like all General Chapters, the 41st General Chapter was both an end and a beginning. Its formulations contain the collective wisdom of past experience even as they thrust us forward to uncharted future experiences and formulations. We are part of a living tradition –a tradition which while finding a source of identity and basis in its past, must creatively hear the contemporary voice of need and discern therein the call of God into the future.

The early biographers of St. John Baptist de La Salle recount how he and the first school masters decided that they would be called "Brother". Blain (I, p. 241) indicates that the title was a proper one since it included "the definition of their state" and indicated "the mission proper to their vocation." The title was to indicate fraternity both among themselves and those they served.

Today, there is an echo and a development of that seminal insight in the RULE of 1986. "The members of this Institute are called by the name of Brother. By the fraternal character of their community life and their active and disinterested presence among those they serve, the Brothers witness to the possibility of creating true brotherhood among peoples and nations" (9). The collective experience of the capitulants speaks the need of this fraternal element of solidarity as both global and transcultural. Indeed, the entire RULE speaks an incarnational solidarity WITH and FOR. The three chapters on government, for example, clearly indicate this by beginning with a passage from the Gospel according to Luke (22:24-27) which rejects dominance as a characteristic of government when exercised by brothers. Collaboration and fraternity are the hallmarks of all relationships called for by the RULE of the Brothers.

But We Are Called to Recognize More than Brotherhood.

But while it is proper to call the men of the Institute to brotherhood, it is incorrect to say that we look for a world of "brotherhood", for to say this is to create a generic noun of a word that is specific in gender. What of our sisters, the women of this world? In this age of awakening social justice, are they to be forgotten, or worse, subsumed in a label that fails to acknowledge their existence? Is not the call of Christ something that transcends gender as well as culture and national boundary?

As we come to the end of this 20th century, there is perhaps no minority so oppressed or forgotten as that of women. Collectively, they span every continent and every culture. Yet, the major languages of the world use the masculine words to indicate both male and female.

Even more injust, many governments still reserve second class citizenship to women. Many nations pay lower wages to women for the same amount of high paid work done by a man.

Their "frailty" is by-word though they account for the bearing and rearing of all future generations. Even many religions ban them from sanctuaries by rule and reserve ordained leadership to men.

But, the voice of the poor cry out! (Ps. 69:33). Today we are beginning to hear the voices of women as they cry out with the power of the prophets of old. They who carry and nurture life speak out against impending nuclear holocaust with a strength that cannot be denied by those who devise weapons of destruction and strategies of war. They who dry the tears of babes speak in both silent and loud eloquence the ill-distribution of the world's resources, especially that of food.

If ours is the charism to brother our world, may we forget our sisters?

The Nature of Charism.

In his first letter to the Corinthians, Saint Paul describes "charism" as a gift in which the Spirit manifests its presence "for the general good" (1 Cor. 12:7). We have long recognized our call to be "brother" as a charism of the Spirit.

Surely, our contemporary charism to "brother" the world must include a championing of the cause of our sisters, the women of the world. Surely, in an age characterized by an almost apocalyptic "war-and-rumor-of-war" motif, we must recognize the charism of woman –the charism to nurture, the charism of lifegiving love, the charism of SISTERHOOD– and stand solidly with it in our role as brother.

The Lasallian Family: A Call to Conversion and Collaboration.

In his Pastoral Letter of 1 January, 1987, Brother John Johnston, Superior General, takes up the theme of conversion and collaboration in reminding us that we are called to a new challenge as we face the end of this century. There are no longer "secondary roles" for non-Brother collaborators in Lasallian works. The "secondary role" mentality and the structures which support it "neither can nor should continue to exist." He goes on to say that "it is important... to understand this movement – and to accept it... because I am convinced that this extraordinary development, which is not limited to our Institute, is the work of the Holy Spirit, a gift of the Holy Spirit in our day."

In championing the Lasallian Family notion, is not Brother Superior also speaking of something wider, more inclusive, when he says that this development is not limited to our Institute and is, in his observation, "the work of the Holy Spirit, a gift of the Holy Spirit in our day"? There can be no "second-class" citizens of the Kingdom.

If our call is to recognize that the charism of Christian education for poor youth which we have cherished for more than three hundred years is no longer the private province of the Institute –if our call is to recognize that "poor youth" is a generic term whose reality is both young women and young men– if we can understand this, then our mission takes on a new definition and a new urgency. It is no mere abstract principle, but the reality of the other person in need which challenges, summons, and makes demands on us now. This is a privileged time and place where it will be possible to identify again, a meaningful experience of the living God.

The call is clear; the gift is given; it remains for us to collaborate – to make God's work, the equality of our sisters, our work.

ARE TEACHERS STILL NECESSARY?

New Lasallian ventures in Amazonia

The poverty and neglect of most of the settlements in north and north-east Brazil are well enough known. Time and again, the needs of recent settlements have been highlighted, whether these are the result of official planning or represent simply the spontaneous migration of people looking for a better life.

The Brothers have accepted requests for help from the local churches of Para and Maranhao, and in recent years, have set up communities in Transamazonica, in the town of Abaetetuba, not far from the Marajo islands, and in the diocese of Candido Mendes, in Maranhao, near Para.

Apart from involving themselves in religious and social pastoral work, the Brothers have felt the need to set up courses to train teachers and village leaders.

1. Our Aims.

Basing ourselves on De La Salle's "Seminaries for Country Teachers", our aims are as follows:

– The training of teachers to work in rural areas by means of intensive residential courses in theoretical and practical pedagogy, and in community life.
– The setting up of schools completely in touch with the needs of rural communities, and catering for the needs of the local youth in such a way that they do not abandon the rural areas to swell the flood of people flocking to the city suburbs.
– Improvement in the quality and effectiveness of teaching, and the raising of the level of education in the area.
– Improvement in the quality of life through social and political action, increase in Christian commitment, increase of the influence of trade unions, and greater local involvement.
– Improvement in living standards, and the commitment of people to the struggle for social justice.
– To stimulate the growth of critical faculties, so that people become aware of their true worth, and of their strength when they unite and work together.
– An increase in wages.

2. Implementation.

The situation in Transamazonica and Abaetetuba in the Para region differs from that in Candido Mendes in the Maranhao region, but the general approach to the situation is more or less indentical, and is as follows:

* The creation of an officially approved Education Centre, able to function at different levels, in particular, to issue officially recognised diplomas to students. In Transamazonica, this Centre, known as the "La Salle Training Centre", is located in the small town of Uruara, and has a catchment area of about 450 kms. In the town of Abaetetuba there are courses, including teacher training, already being run at the Francis Xavier College. In the diocese of Candido Mendes, the La Salle Education Centre is based on a Brothers' school in the town of Presidente Medici, and extends its work to three other schools: Turiaçu (near the coast and 107 kms away), Zé Doca (106 kms away and on the BR 316), and at Candido Mendes (near the coast and 200 kms away).

* This Centre not only provides students with an officially recognised programme of studies, but it also coordinates the intake of students, their classification. the curriculum, the replacement of teachers, and the choice of classrooms.

* Depending on the intake, primary and secondary school courses are run during the holidays in July/August and January/February, and are divided up according to subject units, depending on which teachers are available. It takes 40 to 50 days to cover a unit at the rate of 10 to 12 hours of class per day.

* Teachers are recruited locally, and Brothers from the District of Porto Alegre volunteer to help and coordinate the process.

* In addition to their lessons, pupils receive free board and lodging and classroom materials, thanks to the help sent by such international organisations as CEBEMO-Holland, or by our own District.

* Students following primary and secondary school courses have also to do homework.

* The Brothers and the lay volunteers who run the courses have noticed what a great impact they have on their students. These latter may be lacking in what is commonly accepted as culture, but they have strong feelings of community, social justice, and a willingness to fight.

3. Those who benefit.

Our priority in all cases is to recruit first and foremost lay men and women, working as teachers in rural settlemens, whether in officially approved schoools or not. Settlements with no teachers head the list of priorities.

For the most part, teachers are chosen by the community itself, with the advice of the Parish Priest, religious and local pastoral coordinators.

More than 50 % of candidates are educated to about the 3rd year of primary school level. Some cannot read or write.

About 40 % are married women with children who, in addition to all the work at home, give themselves body and soul to the service of the community. Many of these women bring their children with them. More than a dozen

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

have given birth on the way to the Centre, or at the Centre itself.

In our houses we lodge not only teachers, but also community leaders, young people seeking their vocation, and even others depending on local needs and circumstances.

Teachers who have completed their secondary schooling follow more advanced courses in pedagogy.

The only condition we insist on when we accept a newcomer is that he promises to work for the good of the community, and to help the poor and destitute.

4. Completed Courses.

In Transamazonica we set up our first course for a group of 90 lay teachers and some young people with certain responsibilities in the community, and for a dozen seeking their vocation. Of these 90, 54 completed their primary schooling in December 1981.

In January 1982 we set up a course in secondary schooling for 80 students of whom 70 completed the course in March 1984. The course consisted of 5 residential sessions of 50 days each followed by further study at home.

In July 1982 we set up another primary level course in the little village of Nazare in Altamira, some 200 kms from the Centre, and 95 kms from Altamira itself. The course was for two groups of 45 students. Later on the State took over responsibility for these students, with Brothers coordinating to a greater or lesser extent. At present these students are completing their secondary studies.

In these four years the following courses also have been run either by Brothers or by the La Salle Teaching Centre: 3 courses in Art, 2 in Pedagogy, 1 in the Humanities, 1 in Mathematics, and 1 for training future headmasters.

In the town of Abaetetuba, near the island of Marajo, at the confluence of the rivers Tocatins and Araguaia, the Brothers gave their help to two groups of teachers and members of their island communities, by directing their primary and secondary studies between 1982 and 1985. In addition they helped to run more advanced courses and seminars for teachers and trade union leaders. Even to this day, the State continues to a certain extent the work begun by the Brothers.

In the diocese of Candido Mendes, the Brothers have set up another La Salle Education Centre in their own community house. This they did on seeing the extremely precarious position of education in the region, in which hundreds of local communities have no schools, and hundreds study in State schools on a salary less than 7 dollars. This Centre has jurisdiction over the whole diocese. Courses began in 1984 with a group of 65 students in the town of Presidente Medici (also known as Santa Teresa do Parua). These students finished their primary school course in 1985, and the secondary course ended in August 1986, with 49 students remaining.

In answer to a request made by the Bishop, Mgr. Guido Maria Casullo, some Oblate and Holy Family sisters have set up a course in secondary education exclusively for a group of seminarists and novices at Zé Doca. This group has now reached the stage of preparing directly for the teaching profession and will finish their work in August.

In April 1985, following a request made by the Parish Priest of Turiaçu, Fr. Antonio Foggia, a primary school course was set up for rural leaders and catechists, and consisted of 7 sessions of 30 days. This group will finish its primary school course in July this year.

Several secondary school pupils belonging to the parish of Turiaçu, have undertaken as a special project to run a course for 30 pupils, in sessions of 15 days each every 2 months.

A new community of Brothers is moving in at the present moment into Candido Mendes with a view to running an agricultural centre. There are plans to form a group of primary school teachers for the month of July.

5. Some Results.

Although we have, for a variety of reasons, lost some of our students, and accept that some more thought will have to go into preparing our courses, yet we can list some positive results:

– an increase in status for teachers;
– inolvement on the part of many teachers and group leaders in trade union action, in teachers' associations, in supporting claims for social and community rights, and in the struggle for social justice;
– involvement in political campaigns supporting candidates fighting for the rights of the common people;
– greater coordination and efficiency in work;
– improvement in educational standards in the area and in the communities where projects have been run;
– creation of new schools on the initiative of already trained students.
– a stimulus to local teachers to improve their own intellectual and pedagogical standards.
– the stimulation of local authorities and regional Secretaries of Education to look into alternative forms of educations; – preparing the ground for vocations among the young people in the schools.
– the cultural readjustment of Brothers and lay volunteers working in formation.

If there were more people involved in coordinating work and giving time to the students, the result would certainly be greater efficiency and work of a more lasting nature.

Finally we think we can say that we still have a lot to learn from the first schoolmasters of 300 years ago, especially in our return to the "poor" Founder.

WHAT IS BAMCREFOUNDATION

BAMCREFOUNDATION stands for Bro. Andelino Manuel Castillo, FSC, Religious Educational Foundation, Inc. formerly known as the De La Salle Catechetical Center. It is primarily engaged in giving Religious Instruction in the Public Elementary Schools of Manila and its suburbs. It is an extension of the De La Salle Brother's apostolate and is supported by a number of local and international socio-civic and religious groups, private corporations and individual donors. As a token of appreciation for Bro. Manuel's dedication to his mission, especially on his pioneering effort on the professionalization of the catechists, the legal corporation behind the Center was named after him and the center dedicated to his memory five years ago, on October 19, 1983.

When the De La Salle Brothers came in 1911 to start a school in the Philippines, they accepted students who belonged to the upper classes in order to offset the influence of the Protestant teachers and at the same time to train a corps of future leaders of the country. From this elite class were drawn student catechists and volunteer workers who served in the public schools of Metro Manila. Trough their apostolate, the student catechists extended the mission of the Brothers to the public schools. The scope of their catechetical work was expanded during the late 40's and 50's. In 1952, De La Salle College, Manila, sponsored twenty nine student catechists, twenty three from its high school and six from its college department, under the direction of Brother Manuel. By 1958, the number of student catechists swelled to about a hundred. Since the services of part-time student catechists did not ensure continuity of instruction, Bro. Manuel saw the necessity of recruiting a corp for a full-time teaching position. Thus, the idea of "a professional catechist" was born.

Today, after almost twenty-eight years of existence and continuous service, the Center has twenty-seven professional catechists who teach 31.000 students in twenty public elementary schools. These schools are under the jurisdiction of six parishes within the Metro Manila area.

The professional catechists of Bamcrefoundation.

Each professional catechist teaches a combined load of twenty to twenty-two hours per week, half hour per class from Monday to Thursday. Specially designed syllabi for the public elementary schools, formulated by the Director of the Center, together with experienced catechists, serve as teaching guides for the catechists. A catechist may teach in as many as three grade levels during the schoolyear, but a few handle six grade levels depending on the assignement. A catechist prepares a detailed lesson plan for the grade level she handles.

Friday is set aside as In-Service Day for the catechists. Everyone reports to the Center where the day is spent conducting different activities to supplement the spiritual and professional needs of the catechists. The day starts with a Bible Service to provide time for sharing of experiences and insights regarding the Word of God. The First Saturday of the month is Recollection Day for the catechists. Three Saturdays after the Recollection, pastoral activities are held in their respective parish assignments. Preparations for special liturgies for children on special occasions and supplementary lessons during the schoolyear are also done during the In-Service Day. Problems regarding school and parish activities, scheduling of Parents' Sessions and Church functions that may have something to do with religious instruction, are also threshed out during this day.

The number of catechists assigned in the six parishes is not equal, because there are parishes that can afford only a limited number of catechists while there are some that can afford a team of ten. There is a parish with only two catechists despite the big student population in the area. Within the year, activities are planned so that the catechists can help each other. During religious activities in a parish where there are two or five catechists assigned, others from the bigger groups are called in to help their colleagues. This cooperation provides the Center the spirit of unity in the accomplishment of the tasks and gives the catechists the chance to visit schools and parishes where others are assigned.

In the Philippines, with an 80% Catholic population, there has always been a considerable number of volunteers to work as catechists. Priests and nuns find it easy to recruit volunteers both from the schools and the community. However, most of these volunteers do not stay long because of the problem on how to perform effective catechetical work –a problem on methodology of teaching. Most of the volunteers find the job monotonous because all they ever do is tell biblical narratives; they have only a slight idea of how to use visual materials or are too bookish to be able to draw lessons from the experiences of the children. Some of them pack their lessons with unnecessary information rather than facilitate the children's activities and help these children discover meanings from their experiences. The professional catechists of the Center, some of them working for as long as 23 years, experience this problem, but are very eager to learn better methodologies of teaching and are always ready to experiment with newer and better ways. Religious congregations and organizations, from time to time, request the Center to conduct catechetical seminars and demonstration classes for their volunteer catechists. Other religious organizations, intending to professionalize their catechists, both regular and volunteer, also request the Center to conduct seminars on syllabus-making and lesson planning.

Many of the requests for lesson planning seminars come from far away places and it is more convenient to provide a team of about five members to go to the area rather than for the seminar-participant to travel to Manila. The team, including the group to be taught, live together during the workshop. This schoolyear alone (1986-1987), the Center is able to conduct eight demonstration classes and two week-long seminars on methodology and lesson planning. Demonstration sessions were conducted in the nearby towns and cities of Metro Manila. This usually lasted for one day. The first week-long seminar was conducted for a group under the Franciscan Fathers in Alegria, Northern Samar, 20 hours south of Manila by bus and ferry boat. A follow-up seminar is being planned for this Samar group since the Franciscans have sent in their request again for this summer. The second one was conducted on Mindoro Island, 12 hours southeast of Manila by bus and ferry boat. The Seminar was participated in by the Mangyans, a native tribe in the island occpying the highlands. The Mangyan Settlement is under the Divine Word Fathers.

The first catechetical exposition in the Philippines.

There has been a growin awareness of the value of the catechist in the propagation of the Christian faith. Last year, August 1986, the Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines honored the catechists by celebrating Catechetical Awareness Month. To heighten the effect of the celebration, the Archdiocese of Manila organized the first catechetical exposition. There were seven catechetical centers, including a number of prominent publishers of religious materials, that were invited to participate. The exposition was designed to pool together materials for religious instruction. BAMCREF presented its printed lesson plans and the activity books accompanying each plan.

Worthy of mention in the exposition is the presence of a large number of inspirational and reading materials, visual aids, religious textbooks and church paraphernalia. However, there was not a single book on how to conduct First Communion, Confirmation Activities for volunteer and professional catechists. In view of this, the Center is planning to write a guidebook on these. The experience and the knowledge of the actual condition of religious instruction in the country will be a big help for the Center.

During the 25th anniversary of the Center, Bro. Victor Franco, FSC, Provincial of the Brothers in the Philippines, wrote the catechists:

> "The parable of the mustard seed certainly finds its fulfillment in your history, for little did the late Bro. Manuel Castillo realize that in planting the seed of the Center 25 years ago, it would grow to the huge tree that it is today".

In fact, no other FSC affiliated apostolate "reaches so many with so few" and with additional improvements, BAMCREF has been reaching much more: A FULFILLMENT OF OUR FOUNDER'S VISION!

A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF THE AYAHUALULCO LASALLIAN COMMUNITY

Existence

Has been in existence since 1974. Is made up of Brothers and youth volunteers. The group lives, works and prays together among the local population on the slopes of the Pico de Orizaba volcano.

Reasons for being there.

The main reason is to make ourselves aware of the poverty and primitive living conditions of the peasant community. Our aim is to share their daily lives while trying to teach them to achieve freedom. This we hope to do by getting to know the conditions in which they live, by analysing them and, with the guidance of God's Word, making some specific decisions to help them to find dignity as human beings.

Main aim.

For the 13 years the team has worked here, the aim has always been to pick out from among the peasants, and to train, potential leaders capable of motivating and organising the others, and of getting them to undertake the task of improving their own conditions and those of the community.

Small group meetings.

We have used small group meetings as a means of making ourselves aware of the living conditions of the peasants, their basic needs and their ability to cope.

A gradual process.

Little by little, the main areas of concern became clear and leaders capable of organising their fellows have come forward.

Health.

Our main concern here is to make the peasants realise the importance of their health and life; the need of prophylactics and of going to the clinic in case of illness or accident; and the need to improve their food.

Production of goods.

The aim here is to improve, diversify and increase the production of foodstuffs so as to generate enough income to enable families to live with some sort of dignity. It is also to improve sowing techniques and the care of fruit trees; to encourage family vegetable plots, the planting of small areas of woodland; to increase the production of manufactured articles like wood carvings, simple dresses, bread, jam and so on.

Marketing.

Here the intention is to ensure a higher and fairer income. This is closely linked with the question of producing goods. It faces almost insurmountable problems because of the sharp practices of the middle-men, and the lack of funding for the producers and for the setting up an independent system of transport for the goods.

In addition to these very basic and urgent needs (life, health, food, a roof over one's head, basic clothing and footwear) there are also other areas of concern, like the following:

Education.

The aim here is to educate people sufficiently to enable them to know, to master and to transform the natural environment in which they live, so as to be free to take their position in society with a fair chance of being a success and not being doomed to failure because of their own ignorance or the exploitation of others. This implies also a process of education at a personal, family and society level within their peasant community without leading them to abandon their roots or their traditional values.

Most of our work and financial resources are concentrated at present in this area. We give our support to pre-schooling and primary education, and three years ago, we started secondary level agricultural courses by radio.

Society.

The aim here is to help the peasants to take their place in society and take part in its activities, while preserving what is valuable in their background and traditions. It is also to encourage them to work together and so enable them to get themselves organised and to improve their standard of life. The aim is also to teach them how to vote, how to demand their rights and how to fulfil their civic duties. In this way a just and democratic society will be built.

Religion.

What we are attempting here is to make it possible to live our daily lives "sub specie aeternitatis", as God's children; our daily life together filled with brotherly affection inspired by the words of Jesus; every moment of the day a celebration, an act of thanksgiving which culminate naturally at the eucharistic assembly. The peasants' lives, work, sufferings and joys will find in this way their inspiration in the Word of God and in its practice. It is with a view to this that we work closely with the diocesan and parish pastoral care organisers. The maturity of our peasants is quite remarkable, especially in our religious discussion and prayer groups.

Our contribution to the local people.

This has been very extensive and includes the following: roads, bridges, classrooms, help in the parish, roofing, a reception centre for Alchoholics Anonymous, buying land for future village developments, a clinic, a clothes shop, a vast amount of basic foodstuffs like milk and cheese, teaching materials, libraries, loans, etc. All this was made possible by gifts from friends and various organisations.

Numerous obstacles.

There are many things that make it difficult to turn these peasants into fully free human beings, as for example: chronic malnutrition since birth, lack of hygiene, promiscuity, abuse of alchohol, family feuds, individuals working alone, negligence in sending children to school, domineering role of the male in the family, the herd instinct in the face of communitiy or town problems, distrust among more politically aware groups, lack of funds when needed, impoverished economy, advertisement campaigns for worthless or superfluous goods that create needs that are false and are beyond the means of the peasants to satisfy, the beginning of family quarrels for religious reasons inspired by the preaching of fanatical Protestant sects, etc.

All this slows down our work and makes it more difficult, but we remain convinced that man's ability to surpass himself, the power of the Word of God and our own determination will one day bear abundant fruit.

What keeps us going.

What keeps us going is the never-ending cry for help from thousands of our fellow human beings who still live in abject poverty, who are oppressed and discriminated against by members of their own race and creed; it is the Word of God through which the Spirit challenges us, and which the Church and the Institute are now reading again in a new light; it is the hope to see once again one day our country and this American continent of ours living as God our Father would want us to, with brotherly love inspired by his Word, and with the same opportunities as everybody else in the world. This is a Utopian dream which will come true at the Second Coming of the Son of Man who will judge us according to what we have done and not done: "I was hungry and you gave me to eat... When...? Whatever you did to the least of my brethren, you did it to me..."

TEACHERS:

OVERCOMING A SENSE OF

IRRESPONSIBILITY FOR EACH OTHER

Cardinal Cushing liked to tell of his predecessor going out to a small parish near Boston during the depths of the depression and asking the local priest how it was going. The old priest replied, "Terrible, your Eminence, terrible, but thank God it's even worse with the Protestants" (1). Most people will probably agree that ecumenical thinking has put to rest such provincial attitudes in the half century since the statement was made. And maybe on the broad scale they would be correct.

But today do not our schools sometimes share in this attitude of irresponsibility for others schools? The principal, for example, who has made elaborate preparations for an impressive graduation ceremony, finds the ritual destroyed by bursts of firecrackers exploding just before the recessional. Someone immediately calls his/her attention to the graduation ceremony at a neighboring school where things were much worse. The intent is to brighten the day for the administrator. We might call this our "Chernobyl effect". If it is really bad someplace else then our "Three Mile Islands" do not appear so bad.

And how about the Catholic school and its perception of the public schools where the comparison puts public education in an unfavorable light. Really an attack on education anywhere has the force to lower the esteem for the profession of teacher everywhere. Catholic schools have their own reasons for existence and should not be defended at the expense of the public schools.

We need not, however, look to outside organizations to find a sense of irresponsibility for one another. This can happen in every school. Schools are loosely coupled organizations. Unlike some other professions such as the dentist who works so closely with the dental hygienist; the nurse anticipating the needs of the doctor during an operation; or a trapeze team who perform with practiced split-second timing; or even two adjacent workers on an assembly line, teachers do not usually need to work closely with one another.

The teaching profession, on the other hand, can produce insular thinking and independent work habits. Teachers can perform in their insolated classrooms, stake out their own turf as to space and equipment, and are generally left alone to direct their own programs. Many teachers claim, in fact, that they have not been visited by a school administrator or other teacher in years. These structures under which teachers work do not naturally lend themselves to sharing with one another in the support of each other's work. Sometimes the only way that one hears that a teacher is good or poor is through the student or parent grapevine. And, incidentally, this delivery system is also too often the only way that a particular teacher receives recognition for his/her accomplishments.

We need the challenge of "departmental crossfire" in our schools. Certainly the history teacher has something to say to the Religion teacher; the English teacher to the French teacher; the Religion teacher to the science teacher; and the music teacher to the math teacher, remembering that arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music were all linked together in the Renaissance interpretation of the liberal arts.

The lives of the students would be enriched if their art teacher visited their Religion class to speak of religion; if the physical education teacher spoke to the psychology class; if the health teacher spoke to other classes on the holistic approach to sound living. Teacher talking to teachers, teachers visiting other classes to challenge the students and to be challenged by the students, will make for an exciting school. The insights of all the faculty should be at the service of one another. The benefits that each teacher has received from his/her discipline can be shared and enjoyed by the entire school communitiy. Really, isn't this what a school is meant to be?

How can all of this be started in a school? The answer is that if everyone waits for the opening, it will never come. In this respect I am using the Talmudic story of Moses at the Red Sea. In the Talmud version when Moses struck the Red Sea with his staff nothing happened (unlike the Christian version). The Red Sea opened only when the first person plunged into the water (2). Some of us in each school must take the plunge, call the meeting, talk to others about all the possibilities, or just ask other teachers to exchange classes to get the program started.

Good schools cannot harbor irresponsibility for one another among faculty, staff, or students. The strong academic community needs the exposure of each person's skills, ideas, and enthusiasm. The school as a human organization hungers for such bonding, understanding, an appreciation of talent. The school as a Christian community is by definition a place of concern, recognition, and support.

One of the tasks of the Lasallian schools is to assess its school climate along the lines of this presentation. The result just might be a giant step in overcoming any sense of irresponsibility for each other that may at present exist in the school community.

THE TEACHER AS MINISTER OF GRACE

Not too long ago whenever we spoke of "vocation", we almost always had in mind the Priesthood or the religious life. Happily today we more and more realize that everyone has a vocation, a special, personal call from God to perform a life's work for God according to the talents with which God has endowed each individual person uniquely. The words of Yahweh to Jeremiah are applicable to each one of us.

"Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you, before you were born I dedicated you". (Jer. 1, 5).

Jeremiah balked at this call from God. You might be doing that also. Jeremiah said he couldn't speak for God and that he was too young. You may have other reasons that you think are more substantial. But the Lord says to you what he said to Jeremiah, Have no fear. I am with you".

So we, too, who choose to be teachers, Christian educators, motivated by the circumstances of life and by our understanding of our abilities or our interests, must be willing to respond to the knowledge God had of us before we were conceived in our mother's womb, the dedication he made of us before we were born: our vocation, the call God is giving us even now for this point in time at least, and possibly for the rest of our lives.

This is the basic reason why teachers are called ministers of grace, or perhaps more clearly, ministers of God Himself, the author of the gift of his grace.

St. De La Salle has several ways of expressing this in his writings. The quotation in our brochure is one: Let it be clear in all your relations with the children entrusted to your care that you look upon yourself as a minister of God (MTR.9,1).

In other places he writes that teachers are ministers of Jesus Christ, of the Church, and of the New Testament (MTR 9, 2, and 7, 3). He also speaks of teachers as "co-workers" with God, as ambassadors of Jesus Christ, God as it were appealing through the teacher, borrowing this imagery from St. Paul (I Cor. 9, 9, and II Cor 5, 20).

In a further reference to St. Paul's letter to the Corinthians, De La Salle reminds us that as teachers we hold a very special place in the hierarchy of vocations in the body of Christ, the Church. St. Paul ranks these gifts in order: first-apostles, second-prophets, third-teachers, then miracle workers, healers, assistants, administrators and those who speak in tongues (I Cor. 12, 28). If you are a hard-bitten teacher, it may not suprise you that you come before miracle workers, but it must be a gratifying surprise that you rank ahead of administrators.

Because teaching is a vocation from God, it is also a work of spiritual growth, or holiness, for the teachers themselves: they are fulfilling their own personal responsibility and their own destiny before God in devoting their talents to the well-being of the young people whom they serve. Everything they do for their students is part of their own religious experience, their relationship with God.

This understanding of the dignity of the teacher is a primary characteristic of the Lasallian school. It was something of a revolutionary development in the life of St. De La Salle. He himself wrote that when he first met the school teachers and began to help them, he considered them beneath the social status of his manservant, his valet. But when he eventually threw his lot in with them, became as poor as they were and was organizing them into the Institute of the Brothers, he wrote in his meditations for them that they were doing the same work as the Priests and Bishops of the Church. He did not hesitate to say that they were carrying on the same vocation from God as the apostles and Jesus Christ himself. Think of that: the teachers who take their vocation seriously are collaborating with God himself for the good of the students who are entrusted to their care. Such is the dignity of a teacher.

We might reflect, too, that in today's world it is well that God is collaborating in our work as teachers. Young people today seem at times to be desperately in need of the miraculous intervention of divine help to achieve maturity in the face of life's challenges. The widespread use of all kinds of drugs, the atmosphere of sexual promiscuity and violence, terrorism, war, the prevalence of a very low self-esteem masked by bravado or manifest in terrible depression, the incidence of suicide among high school students, these are all symptoms of a profound confusion among the young about the meaning and purpose of life itself.

If we want a background for these symptoms, think of the considerable publicity given to the corruption among personnel in government, business and industry (labor unions for example), the erosion of standards of morality that can be accepted by the majority of people, the breakdown of family life, the high incidence of single-parent households, and even the tensions existing within the Church herself. Is there any wonder that the young are cynical and disillusioned with adults, confused about the meaning of life and very hesitant to commit themselves, to have faith in anyone, including God?

The young are living at a time when public opinion, revealed in all sorts of media as well as national polls, is not in conformity with the Gospel, when if they want to remain faithful to Christ and his teachings, they are often all alone. They have to be very lucky in their adult friends and very courageous in their own character to let the world know that they believe in Christ and show it by their decisions and their actions.

If teachers are at the core of the Lasallian School, as the brochure says so well, it is primarily as models for the faith and the values that are based on the faith, the truths that make life really and lastingly meaningful and joyful. While the academic purposes of the classroom cannot be short-changed, perhaps it has become more clear than ever that the most important purpose of the teacher is the communication of the true meaning of life, of the existence of God who is creator and loving Father, of the fact of the Incarnation and mission of the Church, and of the bond of love that unites all of us as children of God and brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ in the global village.

Teachers are said to be at the core of the Lasallian school. Presumably this means that they are at the center of the action, or at the heart of the school. Let it be added then that the students are the core, the center of the action, the heart of the school. Let it be further added that in the Lasallian school, it is not the intellect of the student, but the heart of the student, that is the ultimate center of the teacher's attention. Again there is no intent to by-pass the intellectual purposes of the school, but only to insist that the final goal of the teacher is the whole being of the student, his total life.

This is why De La Salle says that the teacher must frequently pray for the gift of touching the hearts of the students, since this, he says, is the grace of state for the teacher (December 7, 2). In another passage he says that "To touch the hearts of your students and to inspire them with the Christian spirit is the greatest miracle you can perform and one which God expects of you" (June 29, 3).

How then do teachers develop and preserve the profound spirit of faith in their vocation from God and have the power to affect the lives of their students not only intellectually but more especially in a spiritual way? Two qualities seem to be indispensable for this:

The first quality a teacher needs is prayerfulness. Lasallian teachers are prayerful in their own lives, and they make prayer a part of the classroom experience of their students. As the brochure states it, "(De La Salle) encourages the teaching ministers to recognize God's continual presence and his guiding spririt both in themselves and in the hearts and minds of students".

A familiarity with Scriptures is indispensable for any Christian who desires to be prayerful. The Lasallian teacher tries to read and pray over some part of the Bible every day. One of the best guides in this is the daily liturgy of the Church, both in the Christian's Prayer and in the daily Mass. This doesn't mean that the teachers must go to Mass every day; it may even be more important to set aside some time at the beginning or end of each day to read over these passages of Scripture reflectively and to discover in them what God is saying in them about the experiences of their daily lives, especially as teachers. It is a time, too, to pray for their students, one by one, asking God to bless them and help them through their individual problems.

De La Salle made prayer a part of the classroom activity. There were short prayers said actually every half hour of the day as well as morning and evening prayers for the students at the beginning and end of the day. That whole program is probably not feasible today in any of our classes, but the Lasallian teacher does not need a Supreme Court decision to make some prayer part of the classroom procedure. There are ways of doing this, of course, that are counter-productive, but there are also several ways open to the creativity of the teacher that will encourage authentic prayer in the lives of the students.

To discover what may be appropriate for a particular school in this matter is one of the purposes of this Workshop.

A second quality of Lasallian teachers, without which the exalted quality of prayerfulness runs the risk of being ineffective, is kindness. The grace of God is his kindness to us, the favor of his love that he gives us. It is in this sense that teachers are ministers of grace: they mediate the love of God to their students by their kindness.

De La Salle has a very insightful and quite contemporary description of good disciple when he writes that teachers must combine two balancing characteristics: firmness and gentleness. Three pages of his Conduct of Schools give a full picture of this balance (McGraw Hill, pp. 162-165). But when he speaks about effective communication of values, and of the faith in particular, he is unequivocal in his insistence on the need for kindness. His actual word is "tenderness". It is an attitude and a concrete practice of love. He is quite the psychologist when he says that unless there is an affective bond between the students and the teacher, the students will not accept the values that the teacher exemplifies (Faster 2, 2). He says, to quote him exactly, "Often reflect that, if you fail (to win the hearts of your students by your gentle manners), then instead of leading them to God, you will drive them from him" (April, 21, 3).

His understanding of this basic truth in human relationship goes beyond the purely natural laws. He says that the work of God on the minds and hearts of students is conditioned by the relationship that the teacher forms with them. To quote him again, he says, "The greater tenderness you show to the children entrusted to your care, the more wonderful will be the effects of grace which God will effect in them" (June 11, 2). To paraphrase another passage in which the same transcendental thought is expressed, De La Salle says that when you have a true love for your students, the Spirit of God is operative in you creating that love and is able through your love to be creative in the students, enabling them to accept and to practice the good that you are teaching them (MTR, 2, 3).

This affective bond between the teacher and the student motivated by the sense of being a minister of God, has been historically the hallmark of the Lasallian school. It has proven itself especially in the concern for the less fortunate, the less gifted, the more unattractive of the students, those who are poor in any one of several ways. It is when the teachers have the ability to reach out and become truly helpful to these students that the Lasallian school can be recognized as authentic.

The Lasallian teachers take the time and the effort to know their students individually, and to treat them as unique individuals, relating to them beyond the exigencies of the subject matter and the strictly academic demands of knowledge, performance and examination results. They seek the full development of the students' personalities such as God has given them. They seek to touch the hearts, that is, the whole person of the students. This generally means that some time outside the classroom is given up by the teacher in order to meet the students at various informal occasions and to be available for personal conversation initiated by the student. While such relationships may be enjoyable to the teacher, it is not for such personal satisfaction that they are sought but primarily for the good of the students, especially those who are in need of the guidance and encouragement they do not receive from home. Many of them are desperately in need of and seeking such adult relationship, despite their adolescent drive for independence. Not all of this kind of educational work can or should be left to the guidance personnel, most of whom seem to spend most of their time with the students on strictly academic matters.

In summary and in conclusion, you as a Lasallian teacher are a minister of grace because God has chosen you mysteriously to be His personal representative to the students whom you teach. This is, indeed, a sacred trust as long as you choose to be a teacher. It means you have been appointed by God to communicate his truth and his love to your students. Both truth and love are indispensable to your role. Through a prayerful way of life, especially based on the reflective reading of Scriptures, you will deepen your faith in God and in the revelation of himself to you through Jesus Christ and the Church. What he wants you to teach your students will become so much a part of you that they will intuit it even before you tell them. Through prayer, too, you will enter into and share God's love for your students; you will receive the power of love to be patient, kind; you will never be rude, nor snobbish; you will not be prone to anger, nor to brood over injuries; you will be compassionate and generous (I Cor. 13). Because you have this love, your students will want to imitate you and God himself through his Holy Spirit will be working on their minds and hearts, giving them the power to live according to that truth and love that he has given you. Such is the dignity, the greatness of the Lasallian teacher. This is why the teacher is at the core of the Lasallian school.

THE MINISTRY

OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION (1)

When we think about the life of a Brother the word "ministry" often crops up. The word gives rise to at least two possible questions:
– What do we understand by ministry?
– What connection is there between the Ministry of Christian Education and the religious life of a Brother?

* * *

PART I: THE MINISTRY OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

ITS STRUCTURES

First of all, what is the relationship between:
* Magisterium and Ministerium?
* Service and Authority?

1. These two words, magisterium and ministerium, contain within themselves the complementary pair magis and minus. In the context of the words, they refer to more (magis) and to less (minus) important social positions. The actual relative importance depends, of course, on your point of view and on the socio-cultural context involved, and this implies a whole variety of consequences.
Whoever has responsibility for what is "magis" is the "magister". Whoever has responsibility for what is "minor" is the "minister". And each has need of the other.

2. The former is the one in charge. This position has always fallen logically to the person with experience, to the older person, to the priest. The latter is sacramentally consecrated as such.

3. The "minister" is the helper, in charge of running one part or other of everyday life within the framework of an overall plan. There is no sacrament to consecrate a person for this position.

4. There is a sort of theological logic about recognising the transcendental nature of the position of the magister because of the sacramental consecration. Another much more human sort of logic has to do with the specific nature of the relationship between the hierarchy and the others due to this sacramental consecration.

However, the notion of ministry does not originate in the sacramental nature of the Church, but in its nature as a society.

Ministry is something which is an integral part of the life of a group of Christians living together: it is what gives meaning to their relationships, and what transforms them.

1. Ministry is something that grows as a result of people living together. Of course, one of them, the minister, stands out from among the others, not that his "ministry" actually belongs to him: he has to consult the group, he works within a framework, he is responsible to an organisation... to a community. That is why we should avoid seeing in a minister someone set apart: he should always be seen in the context of a "ministerial" community.

2. Each member of a community has a contribution to make, specifically his own, to the building up of the ministry: the way he is, his quality of life. That is why apparently identical ministries may in fact be quite different: for example, being a catechist in a school, in a parish, in a base community cannot be equated: nor can the teaching of religion by a married layman with that of a religious. Human relationships are always altered by differences in individuals.

3. So we can see that, from a religious point of view, the quality of community life depends on the nature of human relationships with their challenges and mutual inspiration.

And so, for example, a Brother, cut off from his pupils, from his social milieu, from his Brothers, from his community house, from the past or recent history of his school... cannot as such be part of any ministry. On the other hand, when his faith leads a Brother to become conscious that he belongs to this or that group, to this set of relationships, to this community, he discovers in some mysterious way that he is capable of making a positive response to the needs of his fellow beings through Christian education. Awareness of the ministry and professional flair go together.

If people live together as a group it is for some purpose: without a common aim there can be no ministry.

1. Ministries are exercised within the framework of an overall plan. That is why the ultimate purpose of any concrete situation always comes from outside that situation.

The aim of the Church is first and foremost to make people aware that God is at their side and calls them to transcend this life. Its aim is also to make them make a personal commitment to answer that call. The aim of each and every ministry is, whatever the circumstances, identical.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS
Via Aurelia, 476 – 00165 ROMA, Italia

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

2. And so, even if in each different situation where ministries are exercised there has to be a specific immediate object in view (learning about one's faith, organising charitable activities, bearing witness to the silence of the contemplative life, celebrating the liturgy...), yet none of these specific aims is an end in itself. There is no concrete situation that can be the raison d'etre of a ministry, nor that can give it meaning. The justification for such a ministry, what gives it meaning, is the attitude of a person who feels himself called to be part of God's plan for the human race.

That is why the ultimate aim of every ministry is to bear witness to the Kingdom of God through the situations of everyday life.

3. In this sense, Catechesis has priority in the Ministry of Christian Education.

If we accept that the aim of a specific project dictates its content, then, what in the final analysis determines the nature of each ministry is the concrete way in which it chooses to be a means of mediation.

1. We use the word "mediation" because there are concrete situations in which God is alive. So in that sense, everything mediates. Each ministry must undertake to see in every concrete situation the Word of God.

In fact, ministers are a thousand different human faces if God. If we bear this in mind, it, and not current ecclesiastical administrative practice, will be the fundamental point of reference when dealing with the present subject. The theological quality of a ministry comes from faith in Jesus.

2. "Mediation", however, does not mean a half-way house or antechamber prior to entry to somewhere much more important. For example: Christian education does not exist for the sake of catechesis (even if quite a few Founders say it does): it is rather an initiation into the mystery of God who inspires what we know and how we live. "Mediation" means that if as a group we live as part of the social structure, we become identified with Jesus, we make him visible and we begin to share in a new form of life.

3. That is what we mean, in the Christian sense, by the "content" of each and every ministry. We are not talking here of new sorts of education, social work, cultural activities, medicine, methods of assimilation, political theories... but simply of living differently. The way we live becomes new through our faith and our hope.

That is why our life's journey is not directed towards the rites of worship and sacramental ritual, but towards the hereafter.

* * *

It only remains for us now to mention (although it has already been referred to) the final constituitive element of the context in which ministries are exercised: the Mission of the Church.

1. This is a logical consequence. The Church needs ministries, and so it creates them.

There is quite a lot that could be said about this.

2. When we speak of the "Church" we are not referring exclusively to its hierarchical structure. The Church we mean is the community of all the faithful, drawing its life from the Spirit, aware of certain needs and taking steps to fulfil them. That is why no ministry can be considered to be private property. Although most schemes originate in the personal initiative of an individual, experience tells us to base everything on God's plan: his living presence in a ministry always produces results we could only have dreamt about.

3. The hierarchical Church, the Magisterium, has the responsibility of recognising the gifts of individuals and channelling them into ministries. It does not mean, of course, that the Church owns them: it simply bears witness to the action of God. And so the Church's seal of approval (its "missio") is not the beginning of God's action in a given ministry; it is the recognition of its existence. That is why the "missio" of the Church, which is absolutely necessary and which confers the status of ministry, does not indicate what kind of work should be done; rather it is a call to a life of faith. As far as the work is concerned, those involved in the ministry sort things out among themselves. On the other hand, the assurance that God is present in the ministry comes from the seal of approval of the Magisterium and from being part of the universal Church.

So one could say that the constituitive elements of ministry, or the ministerial structure of education, can be said to be as follows:

1. A situation where people are working for the good of others.
2. These people live and work as a community.
3. They work so that God's Kingdom may be made manifest.
4. They are dedicated to being the visible presence of God (mediation) in real life situations.
5. Their work has the seal of approval: they have been sent (mission) by the Church.

THE MINISTRY

* * *

PART 2. THE MINISTRY OT THE BROTHER OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS AS RELIGIOUS EDUCATOR

Let us define the scope of the article by asking –and answering– a question:

* What connection is there between Baptism and the Religious Life?
* They are two complementary ways of answering the same Divine Call.

1. Every ministry owes its existence to the constantly renewed call of God to the Christian. The dialogue between his call and our fidelity constitutes the life of the ministry and is a visible witness to the Kingdom of God among men.

2. First of all we are consecrated by baptism. By means of this consecration, God chooses an individual who, from then onwards, can respond as a Christian and as a member of Christ's Church.

He calls upon him to bear witness before all men today that everything in this world is included in God's plan of Salvation: consequently, everything has meaning, everything that is human is his concern.

That is the first answer, and it forms the basis of every ministry, including that of education.

3. The call to the religious life constitutes a further step: it is God's constantly renewed call now inviting the individual to involve himself in a more specific task. He calls upon him to witness with his whole being to the Mystery which Jesus' contemporaries glimpsed in his Word and which they saw fully only at Easter.

And so, as a religious, the Brother takes on in the Church the ministry of being a witness by his whole life and as a member of a community, to the absolute transcendence of the Kingdom.

That is the second answer, and it forms the basis of a specific ministry, that of the religious educator.

* * *

In the light of what we have said about the theology of mediation, we realise that neither of the answers given is first or second.

1. The life of a Brother, consecrated as a religious in the Church, is seen in the context of a specific task and in a specific area of the life of the Church. The task is that of mediation. Without it there could be no ministry, for there would no longer be any content.

2. Through the intermediary of his Church, the Lord sends the Brother into the world of young people, in particular to that of the poor; to that section of mankind which is poor and immature.

The ministry of the Brother of the Christian Schools is specifically that of Christian education: the Lord and the Church ask him to go and help others to read, right at the very heart of the process of promoting human development, the visible presence of the One who transcends all things.

3. The Brother knows that as a result of his "second" call, everything about him in the eyes of others has the seal of the Mystery of the Cross and Resurrection: he is called upon to show that this world, while being the place where God's love is made manifest, is "no lasting city".

In this way, the Brother sees his ministry as a combination of service to his fellow men and witness to the Kingdom. His fellow men must see quite clearly and in concrete terms that, when the Brother deals with the sciences and the arts, he believes in this world here below as well as in something that transcends it.

* * *

The ministry of the Brother finds its authenticity in the life of St. John Baptist de La Salle as a member of the Church.

1. In the same way as the Founder gave the Brother a Rule of Life, and the Church approved it, so the Brother sees two elements in his ministry:

* there is the active side, since he is the brother of the poor, and since he lives with them and helps them to improve their lot through education;

* and there is the silent side that could even be called contemplative, which enables him to stand aside from everything and to forego living like other people.

2. These two elements combine to produce that mysterious feeling of peace that every educator who is a Brother feels. The human relationships involved in his work become a specific ministry from the moment that people around him see in him the unbelievable combination of creative flair, self-denial and a zest for life. That is the way a Brother works for his fellow men while at the same time being the visible presence of God.

3. By the very fact that he is "a minister of Jesus Christ", to use the words of the Founder, the Brother is finding, to his great surprise and joy, that at the present time, opportunities are becoming available for him to become a new kind of witness to the Kingdom for his fellow men.

For, as he goes about exercising his ministry, he discovers that there have come about in recent times some extraordinary cultural changes, all of which offer so many more and new opportunities to be the visible presence of God. However, he does not draw from this the conclusion that what he is doing now is dependent on what went on in the past. On the contrary, he finds that the fact of being a Witness to the Hereafter enables him in some mysterious way to recognise the signs of the times very clearly and to make the right response.

4. It is exactly this ability that the Church recognises when it makes it the specific aim of its Mission.

* * *

One could say, then, that the ministry of the Brother is built up of the following elements:

1. The call from God to be a Sign of the Hereafter.
2. Mediation through the educational service of the poor.
3. Creative flair and joy stemming from self-denial.
4. His connection with the role of St. John Baptist de La Salle in the life of the Church.

A SATURDAY MORNING AT "MIER Y PESADO" (MEXICO)

I. A Saturday Morning.

"Mier y Pesado" is a school in the picturesque, colonial style district of Coyoacan in Mexico City. It is one of the schools run by the Brothers and, as in most other schools in the world, school activities do not come to a halt once the school day is over: they simply broaden their scope and encompass the whole person.

There is no school on Saturday, and so that is the day when pupils from the infant, primary and secondary classes turn the sports fields into a hive of activity organised by their teachers or, in the case of the youngest children, by a group of enthusiastic parents. These same parents in addition to their marshalling duties also train teams, referee matches, mark out pitches and involve themselves in all varieties of sport like football, basketball, athletics... The atmosphere on these occasions is very lively.

For the school Saturday is also a "family day", when the educational community opens its doors wide to one and all and offers all kinds of courses and activities. Thanks to its staff (parents, teachers and former students), the educational community is able to run free courses for all who want, whether they are connected with the school or not.

If you strolled around the school you would come across a group of charming ladies in the main corridor, keeping fit with all the vigour and grace of aerobic exercices; elsewhere, other ladies are doing art appreciation. From somewhere you would be able to hear folk melodies being strummed on guitars; and out in the garden, in the shade of a tree a painting class would be under way. Further along you would find a first aid class going on for those who want to be able to help others in case of accident in the home or outside. And this would not be all: in other corners of the school could be found groups of studious looking people, worried by the present economic crisis, following courses in general administration, stenography, typing, electricity, weaving and macrame. What these good people learn at the Brothers' school helps them in many cases to increase their income as well as provide them with a pastime.

II. Lasallian Integration Courses.

Running side by side with all these other courses there is also a "community integration workshop" meant for the parents of pupils who have recently joined the infant school, and which consists of 10 talks on educational guidelines. From January to March there are organised also Lasallian Integration courses (cf. Lasalliana N. 12).

1. Origin and Aims.

The idea of running these Lasallian Integration courses first came up in the District of South Mexico after the 2nd National Lasallian Assembly held from August 3rd - 5th 1979. During the course of that year, a great many lay people spoke to the Brothers about their need for a solid grounding in the Christian Faith, and a wish to know more about the work of St. John Baptist de La Salle so as to be able to share more closely in the educational apostolate of the Brothers and to help to build up an educational community.

The first session began on November 17th 1979 in the Casa La Salle, a retreat house and house of formation (novitiate and scholasticate), and there took part young couples, Brothers, teachers and former students from a number of Brothers' schools.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

2. Organisation.

The course is run every school year in the various educational communities of Mexico. It is spread over 10 Saturdays, the official weekly day off. On each of these 10 days the session lasts 2 1/2 hours and consists of two talks. In all, then, there are 20 talks.

3. Those who run the course.

In general, those who give the talks are either Brothers or lay people who themselves have already followed such a course; or even other people who have some expertise in the topic being treated. As long as speakers follow the guidelines laid down by the Mexican Lasallian Federation, they can choose any method they like to deal with their topic.

4. For whom is the course intended?

It is meant for all those who share in the educational work of the Brothers: parents, teachers, former students and anyone else who feels he would like to be involved. For example, in the "Mier y Pesado" school, the course is really intended for parents of new pupils, but that is only one example. In practice, anyone can join in.

5. Results so far.

The most important result is that lay people have been able to share in the educational work of the Brothers, and that there has been formed an "educational community", an idea raised in the Rule produced by the last General Chapter which expressed so much interest in the Lasallian Family.

The courses which have been run at the "Mier y Pedado" school since 1980 are a good example of what such sharing can bring about.

Conclusion.

In a friendly, family-like atmosphere, fathers, mothers, children, former students and friends of the Brothers can benefit from the lead given by the Brothers working closely with their lay colleagues and inspired by the spirit of the Founder – a spirit of service, brotherly love and faith.

A LEBANESE LASALLIAN DESCRIBES A

YEAR LONG REFRESHER COURSE IN PARIS

After teaching the Arts and Religion for 12 years and spending a year as an inspector to enable Brother Lopez to go to CIL, I was offered a chance by Brother Bernard, the headmaster, to go for a refresher course in France. He told me, as did the Visitor, Brother Ildefonse Marie, that I "had to make the most of this year" to study to make myself a more efficient Lasallian teacher by following courses at the Institut Catholique, as well as by finding out what was currently being done in the Brothers' schools at Regional level in France.

I left for France at the end of August and was given a warm welcome at 78A rue de Sèvres in spite of the fact I had not been able to make prior arrangements owing to the situation back in my own country. The house does not normally cater for long-term stays and so my plan to stay for a whole year made it awkward for the Brother Director, in spite of his understanding nature. He had any number of similar requests from French Districts. However, a helping hand from Brother Patrice and the support of the Regional Co-ordinator overcame all problems, gave me a fixed address and enabled me to obtain a residency permit.

As the year went by I became more and more convinced of the advantages of staying at the Rue de Sèvres. It was not only the geographical advantages, like being near the Institut Catholique, the Sevres Centre, the Rue du Bac; but also and mainly the spiritual and Lasallian ones. The Office, Mass, the library and the archives, the family atmosphere at meal times, feastdays, birthdays, community meetings, the presence of Brothers like the Regional Co-ordinator, the Visitor, the Secretary for Education were so many complementary elements in a situation which was enriching and made for lasting friendships and a clearer vision. Another great advantage was the never ending series of Lasallian sessions, meetings and days which tended to take place there; and the constant coming and going of visiting Brothers not only from all over France, but from all over the world. Exchanging information and experiences with these Brothers was a real bonus, for it enabled me to discover what was going on in the Institute the world over. Meetings of the members of the La Salle Association or of the French Lasallian Federation were so many occasions to get to know people and to become involved in discussions and exchanges of information in the context of the close collaboration of Brothers and lay people in France.

AMONG THE BROTHERS IN FRANCE

As everywhere else in the western world, the lack of vocations and ageing are sad to see... But one can feel also that there is a renewal and the dawning of better tomorrows can be glimpsed. New vocations, although few in number, augur well for the quality of our future Brothers. The new spirit which can be felt in the Church in France makes for deeper commitments, offers greater challenges to the generosity of young people, makes it possible for them to live out their consecration in ways that are more efficient and better adapted to the needs of the times. These ways which are better adapted to the needs of the present day world are what the Founder envisaged when he saw that a school was the ideal place for evangelisation. There is a need everywhere for a re-foundation: it has to be lived before it can become institutionalised in texts.

In the schools which I visited (Charonne, Buzenval, Avignon, Auxerre, Romilly, Garges-les-Gonesse) and those whose Brothers or lay headmasters I met, the takeover or collaboration, as the case may be, is going very smoothly wherever the ground has been prepared. I was very edified by the religious conviction and commitment of the lay headmasters, and I learned a lot from them. Where there is still a community of Brothers, they and parents fight to save it. When the Brothers are no longer there, they try as Lasallian trustees to inspire an outlook on life and an approach to faith in the school. Thanks to these lay people (and to former students) most of the schools and property of the Institute have been saved or recovered. Thanks to their enthusiasm and persistence also, there has come about a demand for initiation into Lasallian spirituality; and even the Superiors admit that the collaboration of Brothers and lay people has led them to look for more permanent structures in Signum Fidei or some other framework which will be a living sign of the commitment of educators within the Institute. Everywhere research is going on, experiments are being planned or made in the whole area of Lasallian Trusteeship, reception, information, training and collaboration.

There is a prevalent feeling all round that what is happening is a process which complements and does not substitute: Brothers and lay people continue "together and by association" the work of St. John Baptist de La Salle, each respecting the other's ministry or vocation-charism. As in the case of the position of the lay people in the Church, this is not an interim or temporary solution. It is true that there are Brothers who do not believe that this is happening, and many despair that there will be anyone to take over from them. Others have taken on the role of "Institute gravediggers" by their intransigent negative attitude. It is quite true that the majority of teachers are not involved, but the Lasallian core group is slowly growing and spreading. What I admired most was the optimism and determination of the Superiors who believe in the future, are preparing for it with confidence and joy, and work with a view "to associate lay people with their educational mission... and to contribute to the promotion of the Christian laity, especially among educators".

DEVELOPING

THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL PROGRAM

Since the close of the Second Vatican Council, there has been a growing movement throughout the entire Church to recognize the vocation of all Christians by virtue of their baptism. This movement to call Christians to full participation in the life of the Church has become particulary important for the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. As lay religious devoted to the personal education of the young, the Brothers have relied upon a close association with their fellow lay teachers and staff members, alumni, parents of students, and other supporters of the Lasallian apostolates. Recently, the Brothers have been inspired by the increasing number of colleagues and associates in and outside of the school settings who have voiced their interest and even commitment to the ideals of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

Nowhere is the growing commitment to Lasallian ideals and association seen more clearly than in the schools and institutions founded by the Christian Brothers in the District of San Francisco.

In this article I would like to describe the specific efforts being made throughout the District of San Francisco to enhance Lasallian education in the schools through greater association and collaboration among the Brothers and their colleagues. The "Developing the Lasallian School Program", as this effort has been named recently, is directed by Brother Gary York, the Director of Education, and coordinated by Mr. Gery Short, a former teacher at St. Mary's College High School, Berkeley.

Three factors seem most influential for inspiring this movement toward greater collaboration:

a/ the sophistication of the lay faculties and staff members in terms of their identity as members in the Church, especially when complemented by theological education and other advanced degree programs;

b/ the exposure of the Brothers' colleagues to the Lasallian ideals as lived out and experienced in the schools and programs throughout the District;

c/ the openness of the Brothers, especially the district and school administrators, to encourage and promote the ownership of the Lasallian tradition with others outside of the Brothers' communities.

The highlights of the Developing the Lasallian School Program over the last three years can be divided into two areas: District Sponsored and School Sponsored Programs.

District Programs.

In 1985, this new effort began with a workshop for the Principals and the Directors, a panel discussion at the Brothers' Christmas Convocation, and a February workshop for representative Brothers and their colleagues from each of the District schools. The objective of each of these programs was to outline the needs of the District in order to determine the appropriate support and encouragement the District administration might offer the schools.

Some of the programs that have been developed thereafter have included the following:

1. District Orientation Program.
A set of readings, information sheets, and a slide show has been developed to introduce new school and District personnel to the Lasallian tradition and the contemporary spirit and organization of the Institute and the District;

2. Coordination of Lasallian Reading and Educational Materials.
This is a collection of articles, books, and transcribed presentations on various Lasallian themes appropriate for the continuing education of District personnel. Also on file are examples of retreats and inservice programs organized in schools throughout the District;

3. "Lasallian Vision Workshop".
This has become an annual weekend gathering at the Christian Brothers' Retreat House for 4-5 representatives from each school in the District to introduce and discuss Lasallian education;

4. "Buttimer Institute".
During the summer, 1987, the District and St. Mary's College hosted this three week regional education program on the life and spirituality of St. La Salle for Brothers and their colleagues from across the country;

5. Coordination and Distribution of Faculty and Student Prayer and Liturgy Resources.
Model prayer service and liturgy programs, suggested readings, prayers, music, etc. have been distributed to school representative to assist the communities and schools to celebrate special events and holy days throughout the school year.

6. Justice Education Resource Distribution.
To respond to the contemporary challenges facing Lasallian and Catholic education, an extensive justice education resource program has been put in place. This program includes an ongoing collection and packaging of tailored resources for the schools, the coordination of individual school efforts toward justice education, and the preparation of programs for faculty education.

The District efforts for the 1987-88 academic year include the expansion of each of these programs and efforts to acquaint members of the District to the special gifts and needs of Lasallian educators in other districts and regions of the world.

School programs.

The most encouraging aspects of the "Developing the Lasallian School Program" have been the achievements of individual schools throughout the District. Some of these achievements include:

1. Lasallian School Coordination and Leadership.
Several of the District schools have initiated a faculty committee, named a facilitator, or incorporated the "Lasallian School" program coordination into the responsibilities of the school administration. In most cases this leadership is reflected by a partnership of Brothers and colleagues;

2. Workshops, Retreats, and In-services.
During the 1986-1987 academic year, over 20 workshops or retreats for the faculty and staff were held in schools throughout the District. Topics ranged from general discussions of the characteristics of a Lasallian School to specific topics such as prayer, discipline, etc.;

3. Faculty Prayer and Liturgy Programs.
Over de last two years, at least six of the Brother's communities have initiated regular joint Brother-colleague prayer services.

4. New Faculty Orientation Programs.
Within several of the schools, a specific and expanding effort is being made to introduce new personnel to the life of St. La Salle and the Lasallian tradition.

5. Hiring and Interviewing New Personnel.
An ongoing file of procedures and models of integrating Catholic and Lasallian ideals into the hiring and the interviewing processes has been collected from various school administrators.

6. Faculty and Staff Socials and Community Activities.
Generally, there appears to be a growing recognition of the value of both formal and informal social activities among school personnel for enhancing the Lasallian spirit in the schools.

Future Direction.

The District Administration has given its full commitment to the spirit of this program. The General Chapter has endorsed such collaboration in the Institute's world-wide network of educational apostolates. The invitation is that we share a vision and form an association.

Perhaps the spirit of the future direction of this movement was best summarized by Brother Mark Murphy at the Lasallian Vision Workshop in February, 1987. Brother Mark concluded his address on his understanding of this association with the following remarks:

Let me conclude by making reference to Saint La Salle's attitude toward Providence. In one of his later writings, called the Memoir on the Beginning, he says, "Apparently then, it was for this reason that God, who directs all things with wisdom and gentleness, and who is not accustomed to force the wills of men, but who wanted to lead me to take complete direction of the schools, did this in a very imperceptible manner and over a period of time, so that one commitment led me into the next without my having foreseen this in the beginning". So also for us, both Brothers and colleagues, we may not know exactly what form our commitment will take. We may not know the final shape of the educational institutions, the administrative structures, the personal implications of such a commitment. We do think we know the kind of education we want to provide. We know the kind of educators it will take to provide such an education. And so my hope and prayer for all of us is that by our common commitment, and hence our "Lasallian association" –out of that relationship we will be supportive of one another in our practical pursuit of this Lasallian vision of education.

Mr. Gery Short.

CELEBRATING EASTER WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

The experience.

The experience I am going to describe could just as easily have been recounted by any number of Brothers who have taken part in or organised similar events. It is worth noting at this point that this is not something only the Brothers have organised: there are a great many people involved with youth work who celebrate Easter very fervently with their youngsters. Begun by the Salesians and the Marists, and inspired by Taizé, this way of celebrating Easter has acquired through a fair amount of experimentation characteristics which distinguish it from all other approaches. This is not to say that there were no difficulties, nor that it was not necessary to separate the grain from the chaff. We moved from the early mass celebrations of Easter which, at times, were more like big friendly youth jamborees than anything else, to celebrations where numbers were restricted to young people who belonged to groups or communities seeking to deepen their faith. Whereas formerly the celebration of Easter was an isolated event, now it has become an element in a process which lasts all the year long. The hierarchy too has begun to look more kindly on what we are doing in spite of earlier frowns at the sheer vitality and originality of our liturgies, and a fear that somehow this was all happening outside the Christian community as a whole. A fair number of things which are not quite right still remain, but all the same we feel we can describe in positive terms what we have achieved up till now.

Our Easter with joung people.

The Easter I am going to describe takes place in San Asensio (La Rioja), in my District of Bilbao. The fact that the District novitiate is here with all its facilities enables us to cope with quite large numbers of young people. As the District Retreat takes place at the same time, the place is almost empty apart from one or two to keep the place running, and so the young people feel they have the place to themselves and so are less inhibited. In fact without the availability of San Asensio and the willing cooperation of the Brothers there our task would be very more difficult.

At Easter 1987, there were 150 young people aged from 17 to 21. The organising team consisted of one priest, thirteen Brothers, a nun and a lay supervisor. The young people came from all our different schools in the District, and also a fair number had already left school but kept in touch through the groups or Christian communities to which they belonged. There are, of course, other places in the District where various groups come together to celebrate Easter, and these are mostly younger pupils. There are also parish-based celebrations which are not restricted exclusively to the pupils of the Brothers.

The preparation.

Easter needs preparation. Three months beforehand, the District Pastoral Team chooses a theme for Easter (the year we are talking about it was "The Celebration of Life"), and sends the various groups three catechetical work-schemes to help them prepare themselves. Two meetings are taken up with planning the daily timetables, sharing out the work of preparation and coping with practical problems etc. In both the preparations and in the actual celebration the young people have a major part to play with the help and guidance of the Brothers. Two days before Easter, five young people and two Brothers go to San Asensio to settle the final details.

The Easter celebration.

In 1987, things began on Maundy Thursday morning. The young people were met on arrival, made to feel welcome and shown to their dormitories or rooms. Everyone was given a name tag to wear, which by a clever combination of colours, letters and numbers, would later enable the organisers to form groups and get activities going. There followed the usual round of greetings, the meeting of old friends, the making of new ones. After the meal and a period of recreation, everyone settled down to small group meetings at which the first serious contacts were made and the mood was set for the following three days. There was a choir practice before the Supper of the Lord which lasted two peaceful hours and during which we felt really welcome there, just as we were, with our own lives, in the same way as the Disciples had been invited to the Paschal Meal, invited also to do as Jesus had done, to wash the feet of so many people around us who had need of it. And then, in the silence and peace of a beautiful night, we gathered together beneath the trees for our "prayer in the Garden". It was a time, in the company of Jesus, to make decisions, an invitation for each one of us to make choices about our own lives. After praying together, we broke up to pray either by ourselves or in small groups.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The following morning, our morning prayer drew us deep into the spirit of Good Friday. The re-enactment of Jesus' trial, the preparations for the Way of the Cross, a series of activities aimed at making each one of us think of death in our own lives, all this helped us to prepare for the celebration of the Death of the Lord with its climax, the adoration of the cross, which all took part in in an atmosphere of great peace and to the accompaniment of the hymn: "You will adore no one but Him". The night temperature was pleasant enough for us to be able to make the Stations of the Cross outside along the paths of the property. Each group took turns to carry the large cross, stopping at each station: the Lord walking to his death in the persons of these young people. When the Stations were over, those who wished were able to continue their prayers at the foot of the cross.

Saturday morning was divided into two parts. The first part was taken up with a group activity based on a "pack of cards", and the young people were asked to think about what were the things that kept their life going. In the second part, there was a penitential service. In the first part of this service there was an opportunity for the group to speak about the reasons each had for asking the Father's pardon; and then those who wished could go and speak to the priest individually. During the afternoon not a sound was heard anywhere: the group was invited to experience a few hours of the "desert experience"; to become recollected; to create an interior feeling of silence, ready to welcome the Great News later that evening. For those who found this too difficult, some rooms had been set aside where they could listen to suitable religious music, read, watch audiovisual programmes etc. Then, at night, there took place the most important celebration: "Jesus is risen!" To begin with, there was a proclamation similar to what we can find in our towns and villages, then the ceremony of the fire. After the procession and entry into the Church, the atmosphere remained recollected and the lights remained dimmed. Then there followed the readings retracing the story of Salvation, and at last came the joyful moment when the priest, having finished the Gospel, announced to us: "He is risen!" At that point the church was flooded with light, alleluias rang out in triumph, and from all corners of the church there floated up balloons of all colours, propelled in all directions by the hands of the youthful congregation. After the ceremony of the water and the renewal of the promises of baptism, the liturgy took on quite a different atmosphere. When we finally left the church it was already dawn and Easter Sunday morning, the bells of San Asensio rang out, and rockets streaked across the sky. Each one wished everyone else a happy Easter and celebrations went on till it was time to go. At six o'clock in the morning, coaches loaded up and everyone went home, enriched by this joyful religious experience.

Celebrating Easter in such an atmosphere is not the answer to everything and, if it is an isolated event, can smack of a pop festival; but for young people who week after week come together in their groups and Christian communities to deepen their faith it is an enriching experience and we can bear witness to that.

THE CENTRAL POSITION OF CHRISTMAS IN THE LIFE OF BROTHER SCUBILION

On December 25th 1819, at the age of 22, the young Jean Bernard Rousseau joined the Confraternity of the Sacred Heart of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the parish of Tharoiseau where he had been born.

On December 25th 1822, at the age of 25, Jean Bernard Rousseau joined the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

In the space of three years, Brother Scubilion, as he came to be known, chose the same date, December 25th, to make two major commitments which would influence the rest of his life.

Christmas 1819, when he joined the Confraternity of the Sacred Heart, he made the commitment at the age of 22 "to spend one hour from 5.0am to 6.0am every Holy Thursday in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament". He kept the paper on which he had written the promise till the day he died. Is this not a proof that he always remained faithful to his promise?

Christmas 1822, on receiving the habit and taking the name Brother Scubilion, he began his novitiate. He was in his 25th year. This was a serious commitment that had been thought out and it was for ever. This new robe and white rabato which he wore all his life, and the new name which he was given were so many external signs of his commitment.

We should not, of course, attach too much importance to the choice of Christmas in the cases we have mentioned. Christmas is an important feast, and that is a good enough reason for choosing it. With regard to Christmas 1822, there are certain things one can say. In the Brothers' Institute it has always been a tradition to hold these ceremonies on some significant feastday. Brother Andre Fermet in his book (p. 62) talks about how the Institute was at that time in the throes of reorganisation and that there were many Brothers receiving the habit. What is more, the novitiate which Jean Bernard joined on November 9th 1822 was under the patronage of the Infant Jesus. So it is not surprising that Christmas was chosen. Even if we should not attach too much importance to all this, it is nonetheless true that this coincidence in dates meant something to Jean Bernard. The commitment of Christmas 1822 seemed to be an extension of the Christmas 1819 commitment.

To gauge the importance of these events in the life of Brother Scubilion, it would be useful, on the one hand, to consider the meaning of Christmas; and on the other hand to read the meditation for Christmas Day written for the Brothers by their Founder, St. John Baptist de La Salle; a meditation which Jean Bernard heard for the first time at Christmas 1822, the day he received the habit and entered the novitiate.

Christmas is the coming of a Saviour, the Emmanuel, "God with us". It is the gift of the True Light, the gift of God to man. It is God being faithful to his Promise because "he wishes all men to be saved" (1 Tim. 2, 4). This young man, 25 years old, was so convinced of the truth of this that his commitment is his response. Love answers Love: "love in return for love" is an expression that is thought to have originated with him.

In his meditation, N° 86, for Christmas Day, the Founder stresses two points: poverty and humility. Here are three extracts. Let us not be put off by the style which dates from the 17th century: let us rather listen to the central message contained in these extracts.

"We are poor Brothers... Only the poor come to us, and they have nothing to offer but their hearts prepared to receive our instructions."

"Nothing so attracts souls to God as the poverty and humility of those who try to lead them to him".

"Rest assured that as long as you have a sincere love for poverty and for all that is humiliating, you will produce fruit in souls... that by your instructions you will touch the hearts of these poor boys..."

And so Brother Scubilion's prayer sprang naturally from the message of Christmas and the words of the Founder.

As he meditated on the poverty of the Child of Bethlehem he committed himself to the love of poverty and of the poor.

As he meditated on the humble submission of the Child of Bethlehem, he committed his whole life to the pursuit of God's will in his own life – "God's will be done".

As he meditated on the incarnate love of the Child of Bethlehem, he "opened his heart" and committed himself to "touching hearts".

God took possession of his life: As Chassagnon wrote (p. 207): "His sole concern, his passion was God".

And so during his life, Brother Scubilion:

* always sought to be with those who were most helpless, with the poorest (slave and free);
* was always concerned for those "who are far from salvation"; he would talk about "going to evangelise those good Malagasy people";
* he undertook his mission as a catechist with great zeal wherever he went, always trying to make sure everyone understood him;
* during the last stage of his life, he undertook to visit the sick and the dying;
* God's will ruled his life: "As God wants" he would say.

And when he came to the end of his earthly life it was by answering "Forever" to the Brothers' traditional invocation "Live Jesus in our hearts" that he went to the "God of his salvation", the same God he had committed his life to so generously at Christmas 1819 and 1822.

Perhaps for us too Christmas could be the centre of our lives?

THE INSTITUTE AND THE ORIGINS OF THE J.O.C. (YOUNG CHRISTIAN WORKERS) - (1)

I was led to write this article after reading the fascinating book by Pierre Pierrard on "The Church and the Workers in France" (1840-1940), and more especially, the long chapter on "militant anticlericalism" from 1891 to 1914. The author was able to give a very well documented account of the use of the press, almanacs and songs for propaganda purposes, forming public opinion among the masses all the more easily as it fitted in with a situation in which the sufferings and revolt of the poor found no answer in the Church. This Church, seemingly unaware of the growing movement among the working classes to stand up and be counted, was identified with the various forces that oppressed the workers. There occurred at the time, of course, a fortunate and major event, the publication on February 16th 1982 of the encyclical Rerum Novarum in which Pope Leo XIII spoke of the conditions of the workers. However, in France at least, this first solemn declaration on a social question was interpreted in a variety of ways, coloured for the most part by a complex political scene and the unwillingness of many Catholics to come to the rescue of the Republic.

Pierrard reacts to this rising tide of anticlericalism by highlighting examples of a positive response, however restricted, to the words of the Pope by a number of small groups like, for example, the Christian Democrats, Christian Workers Congresses, Social Secretariats, the A.C.J.F, the Sillon and so on. What they did was good and interesting, but it was more or less similar to the work the leaders of these groups were already doing to help the young in need. Even when there was founded the first "Christian Shop Assistants and Factory Workers Trades Union" also called the "Petits Carreaux", it is Brother Hieron of the Brothers of the Christian Schools who was considered to be its founder, because, in 1887, he grouped together 18 young employees from a variety of youth clubs in Paris where they were being given moral and material help as well as some vocational training.

However, with regard to all this, reality is much more complex and in particular shows that evangelisation is a very long process. The JOC has its roots firmly planted not only in the working class, but also in the spiritual ministry which the Church, whatever its human limitations, has never ceased exercising among the insignificant of this world. There is a sort of "pre-history" of the JOC which most people are ignorant of.

To get to know about it, you have to go back to the first half of the 19th century, a time when our country was in the throes of the industrial revolution.

At that time, many young people were sent up to Paris from predominantly Catholic areas of the country. These young people came from large peasant families who did not own enough land to provide work for their offspring. And so, they "went up" to Paris to work as servants, in workshops, as clerks (a type of work in limited demand), or doing anything at all, however menial. Used to a hard life, they worked hard, saved money, led a life of probity based on Gospel values. The women were good housewives, and when they married a young man who also had "come up" to Paris, they could be counted upon to look after the family income and see to their children's education.

Of course, once they had become town-dwellers properly so called, many abandoned the practice of their faith and let themselves be carried away on the tide of anticlericalism, endemic in working class districts. However, the kind of work they did was looked down upon by the industrial workers, and this helped ancestral traditions to survive. And so they willingly sent their children to Christian clubs so that they would be "protected" and brought up in the same way as they had been.

As early as 1843, at the request of Armand de Melun and Brother Philippe, Superior General of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, a youth "club" was set up at the St. Margaret primary school (11th arrondissement) run by the De La Salle Brothers. This "club" had as its aim to offer adolescents a chance to continue to benefit from the salutary influence of the school: the first "patronage" was born. Others were soon to follow, so much so that, by 1879 in the Paris area there were 23 clubs attached to Brothers' schools, catering for 3.500 adolescents and young people. When in May 1882 there took place at the Pensionnat de Passy a General Pastoral Assembly, it was to this large group of young people that Brother Exuperien, Assistant General, and as such in charge of Youth Clubs, referred when speaking to the chaplain of the Mother House, Fr. Chaumont: "There must be among those attending this assembly a great many who could be transformed into real apostles by some sort of training which is more intense than that of the clubs. We must discover who these young people are, form them into a group, train them and use them to improve our pastoral work".

There was a prophetic quality about these words: by the month of June of the same year, the support of a priest of known spiritual acumen combined with the energy of a dedicated Brother had brought together 21 young people specially chosen by the Brothers running the various clubs.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

From that time onwards right up to the 1920-1930 period, the movement was supported from two quarters: by the Brothers and by the diocesan authorities who appointed a priest from Paris as director. These young people who had been picked out, it is true, but who were over 20 years of age, were from the start the real founders of their group. It was one of them who suggested their patron saint should be Benedict Joseph Labre, the last Frenchman to be canonised and known as the "beggar saint". The most striking thing was that they accepted willingly the demanding spiritual dimension their mentors had wished on them: the practice of their faith enshrined in a rule of life, hardly distinguishable from that of religious life in its programme of spiritual exercises: daily prayer, frequent reception of the sacraments, recollection, retreats, spiritual direction... What is extraordinary is the acceptance of this spiritual dimension.

On October 8th 1882, the 21 members of the St. Labre group met together, prayed, had a meal and proceeded to examine the 16 resolutions which they then promised to keep faithfully. Subsequently they went to check in situ the various groups that had been formed locally in each of the local clubs –the first fruits. In 1888 the number of members had risen to 550; and by 1897 they numbered 900, of whom 400 had made their annual retreat at the Brothers' house at Athis Mons. The dynamism of this movement would bear fruit also on the social plane.

Its most well known achievement was the General Assembly which on September 13th 1887 set up the Christian Shop Assistants and Factory Workers Trades Union, continuing the work of the Employment Exchange Committee which with the active support of Brother Hieron had been functioning at 14 rue des Petits Carreaux since 1883. The minutes of the meeting entered into the register of the new organisation give the names of 17 of its young founders who were present, who all belonged to the Society of St. Labre and who would watch over its steady growth till 1919 which saw the birth of the CFTC (French Confederation of Christian Workers). Those were 30 years of hard struggle marked by the cold indifference of Workers' Organisations towards a trades union group including not only manual workers, and which dared advertise a religious affiliation. Its leaders, the Zirnhelds, the Desponts, the Viennets, the Teissiers to name just a few, continued all that time to draw their spiritual energy from the ideals that originally inspired them.

The dynamism of the St. Labre Association was felt also in other areas such as the "youth sections" of the St. Vincent de Paul Society (250 members and 29 teams in 1894), or the Support Groups of the clubs. By a process which bore witness to the depth of the spiritual foundations of the movement, there appeared a sign of astonishing vitality: this organisation to help young workers from families of modest means and with a minimal education to persevere in the faith, while developing in most of its members an apostolic outlook and the will to win back their brother workers to the faith, became also a rich source of "late" vocations, which was quite extraordinary for a time when becoming a priest meant studying the classics.

A typical example is Charles Fichaux who, for 34 years (1910-44), was the priest-in-charge, or rather the dynamic organiser of the whole St. Labre movement.

Charles Fichaux was born in 1869. His father was an agricultural worker from the rolling plains of the Soissons area who died in the 1870 War. His mother died when he was 7, and the nuns who ran the Hotel Dieu de St. Quentin accepted him into their orphanage. Here he found a new family, deep religious convictions and was given a solid primary education up to the age of 13. For the next 4 years, however, the young Charles was given no vocational training. In 1886, he "went up" to Paris and, thanks to the help of a friend, was given an unskilled job in a shop selling ties. He found lodgings near St. Pierre de Montmartre and joined the parish club. In 1887, he joined the St. Labre Association and became a very fervent member. He quickly came to the attention of Father Paguelle de Fontenay, who was in charge at the time and who noticed the depth of his religious convictions. However, it never occurred to this holy priest who was a close collaborator of Mgr. d'Hulst at the Institut Catholique, that this young uneducated man might have a vocation to the priesthood. It was while Charles was doing 8 months military service with the Light Infantry Batallion at St. Nicolas de Port that the question of the priesthood was broached to him by the chaplain, a question his innate modesty would have prevented him from considering.

In 1891, he joined the junior seminary of Notre Dame des Champs, and there he was, a young adult, 22 years old, alone in a class of third years. For 4 years he struggled with them to learn Latin, but he never mastered it properly. The following 4 years in the major seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris were no less demanding. However, the prayers and his studies made him ever more determined to answer God's call. On December 23rd 1899, at the age of 30, he was ordained and appointed chaplain at the Brothers' school of St. Nicolas d'Issy, a boarding school which catered for children from poor families and broken homes. It took him very little time to feel at home in a social setting that was very much his own. In the meantime, he continued to support now as a priest the Association in which he had grown up as a layman. In 1905, when religious Congregations were suppressed, many Brothers of the Christian Schools left and the St. Labre groups lost much of their dynamism. Prompted solely by his concern for the Association to which he owed so much, Father Fichaux volunteered his services to Mgr. Amette, the new Archbishop of Paris. And so, in 1908, while continuing to work at St. Nicolas, he was appointed second in command. In 1910, the diocesan authorities relieved him of all other work, to the delight of the young people who appreciated so much the apostolic zeal of this priest who had risen from their ranks.

In his letter of appointment, the Cardinal made a remark which was to prove prophetic: "I am giving you your Father Fichaux on condition you send me one day a hundred little Father Fichaux!" Their side of the bargain was easily kept as, 30 years later, in 1939, in spite of the cruel blood-letting of the War, 160 priests (of whom 3 became bishops) said they owed their vocation in one way or another to the work of fostering priestly vocations undertaken by the Director of the St. Labre Association.

The work of Father Fichaux led to two important developments which ilustrate how God makes his presence felt among underprivileged people in ways that humanly speaking are unexpected.

The first arose from the realisation that, during the holidays, many seminarists, most of them late vocations, could not go home. Father Fichaux turned a house over to them near Paris at Marnes la Coquette, and this enabled them to get to know each other, take their first steps together as ministers of the Church, adapt to a new set of cultural values and continue to benefit from the source of spiritual energy which set them on the road to the priesthood.

The other development was of a more social nature. In the period before and after the first World War, the suburbs of Paris had spilled over first into the area of the former city defences and then beyond. What used to be simply neighbouring villages were swamped by a series of jerry-built housing developments and soon became hastily thrown-together towns without any of the basic amenities. During the period 1920-30, Father Lhande described the saga of the pioneer priests sent out into the "bush" in such books as "Christ in the Suburbs" and "The Cross on the City Walls". The priests of the St. Labre Association, themselves drawn from poverty stricken districts, found it easy to identify with the people around them, convinced that these rejected people would welcome the Good News if only they saw it lived by people just like them.

It was against this background that the JOC was born. In 1926, a priest who had been ordained at the age of 34, and had been working in the Clichy parish in the west of Paris for only two years, heard about the work of a Belgian priest, a certain Father Cardjin. Georges Guerin was of true St. Labre stock. He was a member and on the council of the St. Ambrose branch of the Association; he trained as an apprentice and then worked as a metal assayer between the ages of 14 and 20; he was the union delegate of the CFTC; and he was close to the Sillon group. He served throughout the whole of the first World War, and was one of the stalwarts who kept the summer house for seminarists going. He was so impressed by what he had seen of the JOC in Belgium that he wasted no time in starting a small group consisting of 4 young workers. The movement was launched! He had suffered so much as a layman and as a young priest on seeing the increasing dechristianisation of young working class people that he could not bear to wait. Like Charles Fichaux, he was self-effacing and determined. He communicated the burning zeal he felt to priests who were his brothers by reason of the common path they had trodden to become priests, and who battled bravely in their clubs in Paris or in the suburbs. The resounding success of the JOC in the Paris area was due very much to these reasons; to the fact that here were priests who were convinced that these poor people could be evangelised, because they had been born among them and their lives as Christians and as priests had been deeply influenced by them. With the support of the diocesan pastoral commission run by Fathers Gerlier and Courbe, Georges Guerin was able to harness on a national level the cooperation of another St. Labre, Father Charles Bordet. And the rest is history...

The irony is that the succes of this development damaged the St. Labre Association quite severely: it was no longer the only spiritual driving force behind the mass trades union movement that the CFTC had become. What is more, the success of specialised movements was so extensive that they quite naturally began to absorb the apostolic zeal of many priests. It is perhaps worth noting at this point that during the events of 1936, Christians took their place in the thick of the workers' struggle, even if they had jobs, and non-Christian workers began to accept them as being totally committed to the common cause.

And so a new situation had been created... "Those who believe in God and those who do not, fight side by side for the same causes, for justice and human dignity, each inspired by his faith or his ideology; and in the process there grows mutual esteem and distinctions between motives become less clear. The impact of the Gospel through word and example will be powerful as never before among the working class".

The St. Labre Association would continue to survive, but only through the loyalty of its remaining members, married men now with families who, in 1982, would celebrate the centenary of the Association. The original dynamic inspiration, however, was to be found in the JOC movement.

A few words about this movement might be useful at this point. The early JOC members who had married and set up home did not want to lose their initial fervour for "bringing their brothers back to the faith". After 1935, they launched the Christian Workers League (LOC). At that time it consisted of a small group of very apostolically minded adults. Soon, following the collapse of France in 1940, they had the problems of the occupation to face: the predicament of wives whose husbands were prisoners; the difficulty of supplying food to the large cities... Being realists and close to the people living in their district, they formed associations with their neighbours, whether they were believers or not, in an attempt to find some answers. Soon they realised the name of their association was inappropriate since its members now consisted of anyone willing to help, whatever his religious beliefs. And so they named their group The Workers Family Movement (MPF), and by 1943, in the town of Clichy alone there were 2.000 families which has joined. The extraordinary mixture of people (their critics called them the MPF idiots) enabled Christians to show their fellow workers a solidarity of concern not seen before. In the same way, when the JOC had to face the needs of young people at the time of the Liberation, it created innumerable Workers Mutual Help Teams. These lasted for only a short time: with the return to France of people from forced labour camps, prisoners, deportees, many young people joined the surge to found families at long last. But what potential for adult Christian action! And what a difference those hard years in Germany had made: all the various pre-war labels and categories had disappeared, and now one bore witness to one's faith through the simple performance of everyday actions.

By 1946, the MPF was asking the Hierarchy not to be officially considered as a specifically Catholic action movement, even though it did provide small "Christian life groups" for its Christian members... It was not a very clear-cut situation, but it was resolved in 1950 with the foundation of the Catholic Workers Movement (ACO). The result of this new creation –the fruit of episcopal support and the determination of movement activists –was that the JOC, which continued to be a movement for fully committed young Christian workers, now had a very useful, similarly orientated adult partner. If one bears in mind the fact that about this time the Worker Priests came into existence, one is led to see in all these different happenings the dawning of the notion of the "People of God" which Vatican II in its "Lumen Gentium" constitution would proclaim as one of the best definitions of the Church of Jesus Christ. A truly Gospel paradox: it was among the working class, noted for its anticlericalism and so long undervalued or feared by the clergy, that the first attempts were made to bring about a situation in which the work of the baptised laity complemented that of the clergy –a true "mission" to spread the Good News.

The words of the First Epistle to the Corinthians (1, 26-29) come to mind: "Take yourselves for instance, brothers, at the time when you were called: how many of you were wise in the ordinary sense of the word, how many were influential people, or came from noble families? No, it was to shame the wise that God chose what was foolish by human reckoning, and to shame what is strong that he chose what is weak by human reckoning; those that the world considers common and contemptible are the ones that God has chosen... The human race has nothing to boast about to God."

We should note, however, that these things become clear only with time: when St. John Baptist de La Salle founded the Brothers of the Christian Schools, at the end of the 17th century, he could not foresee who would inherit his work. His Congregation, bruised like so many others by the anticlericalism of the beginning of the 20th century, planted a spiritual leaven among working class people which, in the name of the Gospel, was able to give rise to a host of young workers, despite their inherited class bitterness towards the clergy.

And so, from its very beginnings the JOC was rooted in the working class and the Christian fabric of our country, and drew its strength from both. It is the offspring of both the working class and the Church of Jesus Christ.

LASALLIAN STAMPS

Lasallian stamps are a subject interesting enough to have found its way a few years ago into the Institute Bulletin.

– The Tercentenary of the birth of the Founder saw the first issues of Lasallian stamps in France, Brazil and Panama. The year was 1951.

– Three years later, Monaco and Ecuador issued stamps. Monaco produced three stylised portraits of De La Salle on the theme of "educator of youth"; Ecuador commemorated the centenary of the birth of a notable fellow countryman, Brother Miguel.

– In 1958, Nicaragua celebrated the 50th anniversary of the arrival of the Brothers and issued a series of 15 denominations (surface and airmail). These stamps are the best Lasallian issues to date.

– In 1961, the Philippines showed their appreciation of the work of the Brothers by issuing a stamp to commemorate the 50th anniversary of La Salle College in Manilla.

– In 1962, Belgium commemorated the 50th anniversary of the death of Brother Alexis Marie, an eminent geographer.

– In 1966, Argentina joined the almost world-wide acclamation of these pioneers of lower class education by issuing a stamp to commemorate the 75th anniversary of De La Salle College in Buenos Aires.

– In 1978, Spain issued a stamp to commemorate the centenary of the arrival of the Brothers in Spain.

– Finally in 1986, Colombia issued a stamp to commemorate 100 years of work by the Brothers in that country.

To give readers a clearer picture of the stamps issued here are some details. For each stamp mentioned we will indicate its number in the Yvert & Tellier catalogue as a help to those who are particularly interested.

* As was proper, because De La Salle was born there, France was the first country to show its respect and admiration for one of its famous citizens, a pioneer of teacher training colleges, of schools to teach crafts and trades, and an innovator in many ways in the field of education. The stamp issued by the Post Office is maroon/lilac in colour, perforation 13, vertical, 2.5cms by 4cms, denomination 15 francs. The inscription at the base of the stamp reads: "1651 Jean-Baptiste de La Salle 1719". The portrait is a bust of the Saint without any indication that he is a saint. (Yvert & Tellier catalogue, N° 882). Artist: P. Gandon. In his native town of Rheims a special commemorative post mark was used showing Lejeune's statue with the inscription above: "28-29 avr. 1951", and around it: "Tricentenaire de St. J.-B. de La Salle, Reims".

* Brazil: A Lasallian stamp was issued in 1951, pale blue in colour, vertical, perforation 11 1/2, 3cms by 4 cms, denomination 60 centavos. The Saint is shown in an oval frame of laurel leaves teaching three children (based on Aureli's statue) with a surrounding inscription: "1651-1951, São João Batista de La Salle, Patroeiro Universal dos Professores". On top: "Brasil Correio". (Yvert & Tellier N° 494). On April 30th a special commemorative post mark was used which we will not describe, but which those interested can see in issue N° 127 of Institute Bulletin, 1951, page 200.

* Panama: No special stamp was issued on this occasion but there was used in 1951 a black surcharge: "Tercer Centenario del Natalicio de san Juan Bautista de La Salle 1651-1951" on two stamps in common use (2 and 5 centavos, horizontal, 2 1/2 cms by 4 cms). The first, red and black, shows the transport of sugar (Yvert & Tellier N° 281A). The second, light blue, shows Vasco Nuñez de Babca claiming the Pacific Ocean (Yvert & Tellier N° 281B). We point out in passing that surcharges on a stamp alter its value in philatelic terms.

* In 1954, the Principality of Monaco wished to honour the Brothers for their work in the two schools and one annex of this tiny nation. It issued three denominations, vertical, 3cms by 4cms (Yvert & Tellier N° 402, 403, 404). The first, 1 franc, purplish red, negative half length portrait of the Saint, below a Brother taking four children to school. The inscription below runs: "St. J.-B. de La Salle, Monaco" followed by the signature of the artist, J. E. Lorenzi. The second, 5 francs, black, shows a stylised version of the Falguiere statue in Rouen. The third, 15 francs, purplish blue, has the same design as the first.

* In the same year, Ecuador issued five Lasallian stamps 2.5cms by 3.5cms, perforation 11. It wished to honour in the person of Brother Miguel the educational work of the Institute in this Latin American country. The first, 70 centavos, horizontal, dark green, shows the school in Quito called "El Cebollar" where Brother Miguel taught. The second, 80 centavos, vertical, sepia, shows Brother Miguel teaching two children. The third, 80 centavos, vertical, greyish blue, carries the standard portrait of Brother Miguel. The fourth, 2.50 sucres, dark blue, vertical, shows the tomb of Brother Miguel. The fifth, 3 sucres, lilac, horizontal, shows the impressive monument erected in his own country in honour of this famous educator and writer. The monument is the work of Ciocchetti. (Yvert & Tellier N° 269 to 273). All the stamps were printed by Heraclio Fournier - Vitoria. It is worth mentioning also that Ecuador produced a very fine postcard bearing the portrait of Brother Miguel with the inscription below: "Lirio azuayo". Azuay is the name of the province where Cuenca is the capital: it was in Cuenca that Brother Miguel was born.

* In 1958, Nicaragua wished to mark the 50th anniversary of the arrival of the Brothers and issued a series of 15 denominations, surface and airmail. Eight different subjects appear on these brightly coloured stamps. These stamps measure 3 cms by 4 cms. Thirteen are vertical and two horizontal. (Yvert & Tellier: surface mail: N° 825 - 831; airmail: N° 387 - 394).

As it would take too long to describe all these stamps, we will simply list them in order of value: coat of arms, 5 centavos (surface) and 30 centavos (airmail); Pedagogical Institute of Managua, front view, 10 and 60 centavos; half length portrait of St. La Salle, 15 and 85 centavos; Brother Venero Carlos, 20 centavos and 90 centavos; Brother Antonio, 50 centavos and 1.50 cordobas; Brother Julio, 75 centavos and 1.25 cordobas; Brother Argeo, 1 and 1.75 cordobas; Brother Eugenio, 2 cordobas. This beautiful series was printed also by Heraclio Fournier - Vitoria.

* In 1961, the Philippines government wished to show its appreciation and gratitude for the work of the Brothers by issuing two stamps, one at 6 cents and the other at 10 cents, horizontal, polychrome and ochre, 2.5 cms by 4 cms. Both stamps show the front view of De La Salle College, Manilla, and bear the inscription: "Golden Jubilee 1911 - 1961" as well as the coat of arms of the Institute in a circle, with around it the words: "De La Salle College, Manilla". Perforation 11 1/2, (Yvert & Tellier N° 516 & 517).

* In its series "Famous Men", Belgium honoured an eminent geographer, Brother Alexis Marie Gochet, by issuing a stamp to mark the 50th anniversary of his death. The stamp is 2 francs, greyish blue, vertical, 3 cms by 4 cms, perforation 11 1/2, (Yvert & Tellier). On the same occasion the authorities organised an exhibition in the town where the Brother was born (Tamines, near Namur and on the River Sambre). The exhibition described and illustrated the scientific and pedagogical work of Brother Alexis who gave the teaching of geography a new lease of life in the second half of the 19th Century. The exhibition highlighted the issue of this stamp in honour of "one of the eminent men of your influential Congregation" by sending its respectful greetings to the Superior General.

* In 1966, Argentina joined in the jubilee celebration of the 75th anniversary of De La Salle College in Buenos Aires (1891-1966) by issuing a commemorative stamp. It is 10 pesos, burnt sienna, horizontal, 2.5 cms by 4 cms, perforation 13 1/2, lithographed in sheets of 100, an issue of 2 million stamps. The stamp shows the front of the building and, to one side, the picture of the Founder based on the Cesare Aureli statue in St. Peter's, Rome. The stamp was designed by Mrs Candida Gomez. (Yvert & Tellier N° 777). The stamps were issued on November 26th by decree N° 3498/66. The issue was the result of the work of Mr Angel Vago.

* In 1979, there was issued in Spain a stamp commemorating the centenary of the arrival of the Brothers (1878-1978). The vignette shows a picture of the Founder based on the so-called "rue de Sèvres" painting. It is multicoloured: maroon olive, lilac, red and blue; 5 pesetas, perforation 13 1/2. (Yvert & Tellier N° 2157).

* Finally in 1986, Colombia honoured St. La Salle by issuing a stamp to mark the centenary of the Brothers' arrival in the country. In reality, the District of Medellin was founded in 1890 but negotiations started in 1886, and in 1887 an agreement was signed between Mgr. Bernardo Herrera Restrepo and Brother Bernon Maria, Visitor of Ecuador and Chile and representing the Superior General, Brother Joseph.

This multicoloured stamp (airmail) shows a half length portrait of the Founder based on Gagliardi's painting, the latter having recently come back into favour. In the top left hand corner, the coat of arms of the Institute in black, and in the top right corner the three broken chevrons of the coat of arms of the Rheims De La Salle family. From the chevrons there radiate the three colours of the Colombian flag, yellow, blue and red; 25 pesos, perforation 12 1/4 by 12 1/4. Printed by Carvajal S.A.

INTRODUCTION

We have received many letters expressing satisfaction that LASALLIANA is once again back in print. This is hardly surprising when one realises just how many requests were sent to the General Council asking for it to resume publication.

– We should like to remind readers that each issue of Lasalliana consists of 20 articles in loose-leaf form. Articles are classified according to one or other of six headings, each heading identified by a capital letter:

O. General topics, miscellaneous subjects.
A. St. John Baptist de La Salle: life, writings, spirituality, teachings, etc.
B. The Institute: past and present.
C. Education.
D. The Institute working with lay people. The Lasallian Family.
E. Accounts of personal experiences, events, celebrations.
In case of need, new headings can be created.

– Numbering of articles.
The system of numbering articles offers various possibilities with regard to classification and retrieval. Up till now, articles were identified by two numbers and a letter, e.g: 14 - B - 74, where 14 stood for the number of the issue;
B indicated that the article came under the heading B, the Institute;
74 indicated that the article was the 74th published under the B heading.
It has been suggested that it would be a good idea to give each article a further number, indicating its place in the issue and providing a means of checking to see if there are any articles missing.
This explains why as from now we are going to insert a place-in-the-issue number immediately after the issue number. For example: 15 - 3 - A - 63 refers to issue 15, article 3, heading A, 63rd article under this heading.

– The Aims of LASALLIANA are to provide information on Lasallian topics and on our educational apostolate; to suggest areas for reflection and study; and to provide material for meetings, study groups, etc.
Its articles are intended for all the various members of the Lasallian Family. Some articles will, of course, be of more use to some groups than to others. We are convinced that each community, each school, each Lasallian group, etc. should have its disposal one or more copies of this publication.
There are still copies available of all but a few past issues.

– Recently there was published the Letter to the Lasallian Family, which the last General Chapter had requested from the Superior General and his Council.
Such an important document deserves a lot of attention. In the next issue (No. 16 which comes out in October 1989), there will be a number of articles dealing with this Letter.

THE HOLY FATHER'S ADDRESS

TO EDUCATORS AT TURIN

4 September 1988

1. ...I consider this a privileged meeting with you, dear educators employed in the work of the school. I consider it privileged because you are carrying out one of the most important and delicate tasks for the future of the Church and society. This meeting takes place during the celebrations of the first centenary of the death of Saint John Bosco, "father and teacher of the young", "the missionary to the young' (Message for the opening of the General Chapter, 10 January 1984)...

From a distance of one hundred years, the Church desires to express anew Don Bosco's witness and strengh of faith in its value for addressing the pressing and immediate service of education to overcome the tragedy of the split between the Gospel and culture (Evangelii Nuntiandi, 20).

2. I have come to be among you today to attest my impassioned partiality for the young, to reaffirm, as I had occassion to do before the members of UNESCO, that "the primary and essential task of culture in general, and also of all culture is education. Education consists in fact in enabling man to become more man, to 'be' more and not just to 'have' more and consequently, through everything he possesses to 'be' man more fully" (Speech to UNESCO, 2 June 1980, n. 11).

Yes, I am here to tell you to be ever more aware of the mission given to you by parents for the education of their children! They have placed their trust in you. Moreover, the Church sees you as her coworkers in the formation of young people and the construction of the dignity of the person.

It is up to you to offer young people the truth about loving a person and teach them to examine thoroughly the new knowledge. Few challenges are as stimulating as teaching, especially when it involves religious instruction classes, and few are as difficult in the prophetic wisdom and creativity required.

3. As educators you experience the ambiguities and grave conflicts which characterize society today. As I have already observed in the letter for the centenary, "the youth situation at the present day, a hundred years after the saint's death, has changed a great deal and presents a whole variety of different conditions and aspects, as is well known to educators and pastors" (Iuvenum Patris, 6).

The profound and numerous scientific and technological changes which continue to mark our epoch have shattered its stability, presenting us with many advantages and inconveniences. In the brief space of one generation, we have seen enormous changes in social values and economic conditions. The crisis which we face is the crisis of the person uprooted from his or her environment and relationships.

Even though "today groups of young people can be found all over the world who are genuinely sensitive to spiritual values, and who are desirous of help and support in the maturing of their personalities" (ibid, 6), they are still not strangers tc the ambiguities, the antinomies, and contradictions which manifest themselves, especially when the young find themselves immersed in, threatened by, and often crushed under an amorphous, one-dimensional, dehumanizing universe. This happens when Gospel values seem to be overcome at times by poverty of relationships at all levels, by the excess of contradictory information lacking a hierarchy of values, by the lack of meaning in life and anxiety for the uncertainties of the future, by the lack of ideals, by a certain attitude of "letting things go" which can lead to crime and harmful consumerism, corroding love and making life barren.

To this picture of things which heavily influences the young people, one must add the crisis of schools which often suffer from a lack of values to give the young, are unfruitful in generating wisdom and culture, and are faced with families in which love is sometimes suffocated.

This is a challenge which presents a pressing obligation to those who work in the field of education. As teachers and instructors you must seek to face up to these changes with creative intelligence since they constitute the daily situation of your professional service and the environment of your Christian witness.

4. Christ desires to be newly present to this contemporary world with all the explosive force of his mystery of love. He wishes to meet the people of today through teachers and models who are true educators, endowed with a strong preference for the young, drawn by Christ who possesses the truth about man and imbued with a great wisdom for humanizing all the new discoveries (cf. Familiaris Consortio, 8), and for restoring the harmony of the person.

Today the world has need, on the one hand, of teachers endowed with a strong conviction that can bring the human person back to his original position, and, on the other hand, of models, rich in inventiveness, to overcome the growing distance between human civilization and Christian faith, and to reestablish the alliance of science and wisdom (ibid., 8). It will be necessary at the same time to enrich knowledge, stimulate action of solidarity and revive the interior life.

It is necessary, therefore, to recover the consciousness of the primacy of truth and perennial values of the human person as such; to face up steadfastly to the challenge of offering an education which aims rather at the person in his or her dignitiy than at things, more at the search for wisdom than at material things.

It is necessary for the young people in your schools to learn to raise temselves up. How is it possible to safeguard their faculty of concentration and silent maturation of the faith when they are assailed by an ever more rapid movement of external stimuli? How does one enlighten their consciences? How does one teach them to dialogue with themselves; to think of their own dignity and that of others; to cultivate still the sense of wonder and reverence, the ultimate possibility that we have at our disposal to love profoundly, devotedly and with self-renunciation? Because of all this it is necessary to reaffirm with Don Bosco the conviction that in every young person there are reserves of good and interior qualities which, if opportunely stimulated, can give wisdom.

5. In the light of this, a fundamental aspect of your mission is to guide young people to Christ.

Christ is the constant reference point of Christian teachers. Only Jesus Christ is the adequate and ultimate answer to the supreme question about the meaning of life and history; but it is not enough to answer in words alone.

Your students must perceive from the witness of your lives that the person does not have meaning outside of Christ; that Christ is your supreme option and the nucleus of all your initiatives. Teaching does not simply mean imparting your knowledge, but revealing what you are, living by the inspiration of faith.

Giving yourselves to the young and starting with them means precisely becoming capable of understanding the condition of this section of society, taking into consideration their just viewpoint and expressing the tragedy that there is a culture and society which, rather than dedicating itself to accepting the young, concentrates on other marginal interests. Begin with the young; this is the field of your missionary work and your most precious cultural workshop. Be missionaries to the young! Go out to their very hearts! Enter into their spiritual intimacy! Find there the authentic foundation of a personality which feels forced to go beyond itself, from its own limits, from its own plans, to be open to the transcendental reality of a great destiny. Try to see the young with Christ's eyes. While aware of the deficiencies young people have, foster the conviction that the Gospel, if planted within the process of their human formation, can lead them to commit themselves generously in life.

To do this, give special place to the religious education class. Give it priority among your concerns. During that time the young should be in a position to find Christ and his Gospel, feeling the fascination of Christ's person.

6. Youth today are attracted by enticements which reach them from the world; yet they desire to find solid and lasting values which can give meaning and direction to their lives. The salvific message of the Gospel will have to tell them where to find this support and the right direction throughout the educational process. This mission is certainly demanding. It demands a twofold sense of responsibility from you: to direct the conscience and experience of the young towards the mystery of Christ, showing yourselves at the same time to be true sculptors of men and women endowed with a great sense of spirituality.

This ability to direct one's attention to Christ and this spiritual sense are the hidden incentive of all education and culture. It is in this way that teaching will be able, at the same time, to cultivate thought, enrich action, and promote the interior life.

7. Don Bosco was a holy educator who "proposed holiness as the practical objective of his pedagogy" (Iuvenum Patris, 5). "An interchange between 'education' and 'holiness' is indeed the characteristic aspect of his personality: he was a 'holy educator', he drew his inspiration from a 'holy model', Francis de Sales, he was the disciple of a 'holy spiritual teacher', Joseph Cafasso, and he was able to form from among his boys a 'holy pupil', Dominic Savio" (Id.,5).

What a great demand for an educator to be able to convince each of his disciples that he is called to holiness! Be concerned, therefore, to make the Gospel visible in your daily life. Only in that way can you have an evangelical influence on the students whom you teach.

Today it is necessary to repropose the great theme of holiness. Vatican II traces for us the specific objectives of a Christian education along these same lines. These objectives are a true challenge and clearly describe the delicate work of education: "Christian education... tends especially to make it such that the baptized, gradually initiated into knowledge of the mystery of salvation, always come to a greater awareness of the gift of faith they have received; that they learn to adore God the Father in spirit and truth (cf. Jn 4:23); and that they might thus reach the perfect man, the height of the fullness of Christ (cf. Eph 4:13), and might make their contribution towards the growth of the mystical body" (Gravissimum Educationis, 2).

I cannot but remember with deep gratitude all those educators, priests, religious or laypersons who, while confronting and overcoming difficult problems, are able to make their teaching penetrating and fruitful.

I thank such educators present here. Greeting them cordially, I wish to offer my encouragement in this initiative which aims at a renewed zeal.

The Church attributes fundamental importance to Catholic schools. Today there are no alternative forms which can effectively substitute for the quality of an education oriented towards the fullness of Christian life. Such a life should be offered by Catholic schools which give priority to translating their own specific goals into action; that is to say, to being a true cultural workshop which inspires people towards the Gospel for a Christian's journey in today's world.

In the face of an environment poor in relationships, the Catholic school transmits and strengthens a sense of community, of social concern, and of universal solidarity. Its finality, drawing continually from the sources of the mystery of Christ, is to prepare young people to see themselves as cooperators in human salvation, committing themselves concretely with an apostolic dynamism to the pressing needs, according to their own state in life.

Today more than ever, the renewed service of Catholic schools is to free young people from encroaching materialism and obsessive hedonism, to guide them with goodness and firmness towards the heights of complete truth and sacrificial love.

8. I appeal especially to parents also, the first educators and teachers of their own children.

Everyone should note what an importance "Mamma Margherita" had in the life of Saint John Bosco! Not only did she give the Oratory of Valdocco that characteristic "family spirit" which still exists today, but she was able to mould the heart of her little John into that goodness and tenderness which made him the friend and father of his poor boys.

The time of associations of Christian parents has come at last! They bring together in friendship families and educators, and help parents to understand better the present socio-cultural changes and to use the most appropriate methods of education.

Dear educators and parents: the Christian formation of the new generations is largely in your hands. Be aware of that! The Lord invites you to recognize the primary urgency of the education of the young.

May Mary Most Holy, your teacher and guide, assist you. May she enlighten you with her maternal intervention in transmitting the truth and in being teachers of goodness and of courageous witness for the faith. Furthemore, may the blessing accompany you which we, poor pastors of the Church, wish to offer you at the end of this meeting...

THE UNDERLYING CAUSES OF AN UNEXPECTED JOURNEY THROUGH LIFE

In a previous article of mine I promised that I would discuss the mystery of a vocation, which under the influence of Providence was constantly redirecting itself. I shall try to uncover the underlying causes which made these redirections possible and which resulted in a sense of wellbeing, peace, health and honour in a man who was already born to honour, peace and wellbeing.

What was John Baptist like as a child?

Let us first take a moment to consider with Blain the portrait he gives us of the child John Baptist. This child apparently used to leave family parties and read the lives of the saints. He was also apparently captivated by church ceremonies, and would recite the divine office with his grandfather.

Brother Leon Aroz in number 41 of the Cahiers Lasalliens writes a very fine passage about the childhood of John Baptist de la Salle, which we reproduce here, since it is still relevant:
"A child remains a child even if one day he will be a saint. His games, play-time, the development of his personality should not escape our attention. The family home was a gathering place for the well-to-do of Rheims. They had concerts there singing and dancing. Maria de la Salle, in her youth was appreciated as a musician and violinist, and earned much applause... Is it necessary to think, as his biographers would have us think, that John Baptist's sainthood was foreshadowed by his sad looks and introversion, whilst the rest of his family lived a life of ease, paying and receiving visits? John Baptist met all these visitors, spoke to them, perhaps a little shyly, but openly enough. He would listen to them, ask them things, and answer their questions frankly and freely. Since he was only a child, he was interested in anything going, and as he was an intelligent child, his answers contained unexpected insights.

A short outline of a vocation.

This child of more or less twelve years old suddenly said he wanted to be a priest. His father, Louis de la Salle, thought that there might be something of a castle in the air in this idea of his eldest son, however, God took first place in his household, so the family showed no objection. He felt somehow that the idea came from the Holy Spirit, and he simply answered "yes". He went ahead with that vocation with intelligence and persistence. As time went on he went to Paris, to the Sorbonne and Saint Sulpice, and the influence of these two establishments made of him a learned and holy priest.

So now he was a priest. His journey had reached the goal he had dreamed of. Everything seemed finalised. His family, the divine office, and study occupied him until Providence once more had plans for him, and these he would find out through his friendship with Roland, founder of an order of nuns to educate poor girls. Next Nyel appeared on the scene, and De la Salle helped him to start his first little school, simply to avoid disappointing his cousin Ms de Ruan. He helped in the rather hopeless task of running that first school and then two others. The teachers were not up to their job, and Nyel was too often elsewhere. De la Salle increased his visits to the schools to help them out. He bought a house right next to his own, so that the teachers could live together. He invited them to meals in his own house, so that they could discuss how the teaching was going, and finally, he decided to give them rooms in his own house, without feeling that he was committing himself to anything permanent. He just wanted to help; but gradually other outlines in this picture begin to appear.

He bought a very ordinary kind of house for these teachers and went to live there with them himself. There is another enlightening point to follow. He attemps to start to live the Christian life, a life committed to working with children, with them, and in 1681 they follow the whole of the Holy Week ceremonies together. It was then that he began to realise, much to his surprise, that Our Lord seemed to be calling him to take over these schools completely. Another series of events next occurred, including his resignation from the canonry in 1683 and the giving away of all his property in the famous famine of 1684. From that moment he became fully available.

The spiritual Journey of Saint John Baptist de La Salle.

I now want to concentrate on the spiritual aspect of John Baptist's journey, which he followed during the early years of the foundation of our congregation. I should like to summarize the four points which stand out in this connection.

1. Piety.

John Baptist's soul was completely dedicated to God. It was always so. When, as child, he went hand in hand with his grandfather to church, and spent hours at the ceremonies, it was not merely because he was good and wellbehaved. It was because something seemed to be working in his soul; God was gradually taking possession of that soul. It was not long, agree all his biographers, before he had made for himself a small cassock and cotta, because he did not want just to assist, he wanted to take part. As he got older, he would sit next to the big church window with his grandfather, and recite the office with all the seriousness of a litttle monk. His canonry filled a big need: a chance to praise God. He had no other thought than the praise of God, when, at the age of fifteen, he accepted that canonry. Normallly the idea of his becoming a priest would not have crossed the minds of his parents, for he was the eldest boy, and should have carried on the family name and traditions. Nevertheless, from childhood, he was being urged by God, and since in that household God counted for something, he was able to follow, without opposition that important vocation. Having become a seminarist, just at the decisive moment, he chose Saint Sulpice to complete his training. So he left his family, because he knew that the seminary of Saint Sulpice was a place for priests who wanted complete union with God and to base their vocation entirely on the call of the Spirit. John Baptist did not find himself out of place there, and soon mastered the "rules" of the spiritual life taught in that demanding seminary. He kept his eyes on a spiritual goal, and was a good example to everybody there, according to information that was still available in Saint Sulpice when he had to leave it on the death of his parents.
We know what happened from then on, but I would like to point out that Holy Scripture must have been read, reflected and meditated on and learnt by heart, for in his writings, and especially in his meditations, one constantly feels the force of the Word of God. So much so that in certain cases the

"points" of the meditations are simply logical groupings of Scripture texts. It is not surprising therefore that God became the centre of his life and God's glory and service should be his great wish. His mission as a founder demanded it, but God, Our Lord and Our Lady were nothing new to him: they were the objects of his deep spirituality and of his love, all enlightened by an unhesitating Faith, which is all the more surprising when one considers the deep divisions that existed in those days in the church in France. So God knew that He could count on that Friend of his and he did count on him, nor did His friend let him down.

2. Availability.

He was completely available. This was not because it came easily, nor because it seemed the usual thing. We have already seen that God's plans were very different from what he himself had envisaged. However, when God suggested something and when John Baptist had understood His message, then God could trust him. John Baptist would answer that gentle call, which became audible in a multitude of events seeming at first to have little to do with him. His vocation as priest was followed with tenacity, as we have seen, and this was unexpected and, humanly speaking, inadvisable, especially after the death of his parents, when he had to become the head of the family and its legal representative.

His friend Canon Roland was full of enthusiasm, and suggested that he could change his canonry for a poor parish. He agreed, but the plan, having survived a short time, was rejected by the Archbishop; nevertheless, it showed how available John was. Then came Nyel with his ideas inspired by God, yet leaving him with the question of how to look after his family and perform his duty as a priest. But the signs of God's will were gradually conquering him, and he was surrendering bit by bit to the movements of grace. Provided he knew that something was God's will, he would go to any lengths to achieve it. Such attitudes made him look a fool in the eyes of certain dignified members of the Cathedral hierarchy of Rheims. I think that this availability of John Baptist resulted from his constant concentration on God's presence, from his loyal and generous search for the Divine Will and from that great desire of his to follow, like those great men of the Bible, the orders of God. He learnt it through a careful study of Holy Scripture, just as those readings of his grandfather had taught him the enthusiasm and determination of the martyrs of Christ.

3. Radicalism.

His radicalism was well camouflaged behind the aristocratic exterior of this man of God. He did not look, or ever would, on God's will half-heartedly. If at times he hesitated, it was to make sure whether it was really God suggesting these ideas, but once he was sure, John Baptist would go as far as God wanted, without waiting, wondering or worrying. Would you like some examples? When his parents died, he was unsure what he should do next, so he went to his spiritual director Canon Roland, who assured him that God wanted him to be a priest. And so it came about, for two months later he became a subdeacon and he cast aside any doubt. When he realised that God wanted him to help the poor teachers, he did not hesitate either: he rented a house near his own for them; and when he thought that was not enough, he invited them to lodge in his own home, much to the disgust of family and neighbours alike. At a family gathering called to see what they should do with this madmen who was a disgrace to the whole clan, John Baptist sat there, with his arms folded and his eyes lowered, just listening in silence, like a rock in the middle of the ocean: that was how his first biographer, Bernard, describes the scene. When he felt that God was urging him to give up his canonry, which meant giving up his "social security", he never flinched, even after the refusal of the Archbishop, the contrary advice of the other canons, his family and public opinion. An even greater surprise was that he did not hand over the canonry to his brother, as everyone was advising him, including the Archbishop, but to a poor parish priest, who was well known for his holiness. There was agitation in the chapter, but the radically-minded John Baptist had made his decision.

And in God's good time John Baptist heard God saying to him: "The foxes have holes and the birds have their nests, but the Son of man has nowhere to lay his head". Then it was that he decided to give everything away, and the sign to do it came in the terrible famine of 1684. He in fact gave everything away, as though it were the normal thing to do; he made that extraordinary move as though it was just the logical consequence of following the Gospel. Then came a series of personal hand-overs, in which he surely showed himself a record-breaker. In the poor community of La Rue Neuve he was always the poorest of the lot. He slept in an attic which was not big enough to stand up in properly or lie full length. He ate what there was, and you know how they got that: a Brother would go out every morning with a sack on his back, through the streets of Rheims and later of Paris and collect the left-overs from well-supplied religious houses. The Brother would come back, with his sack more or less full, they would prepare it as best they could, then those heroes, my first Brothers, would dine.

4. Faithfulness.

This was the most remarkable characteristic of John Baptist. He was faithful to God and he was faithful to the children in whom he saw Our Lord. They were the ones who made him change direction, and for that John Baptist loved them for ever. "For ever" is a strong expression, but in his case it was well deserved. Forty years of hard work contrary to the habits of centuries, and contrary to the advice of men of his time, who in every respect were worth listening to. Listen to John Baptist's own words, as he explains what he had to put up with to two friends who visited him in Saint Yon, a few months before his death: "I have had to suffer constant opposition and even actual persecution from many people. Clergymen, from whom I could have expected support, let me down; my own sons in some instances rebelled against me. Those external crosses have been aggravated by interior ones which were even worse." Those words might sound rather pessimistic, but they end with a calm and serene statement, which shows how he recognised in all those sufferings the hand of God, in whom he had entire confidence: "If God had not supported with his own hand this 'edifice' for everyone to see, it would have been buried under its own ruins long ago."
This explains everything. In a letter to Brother Gabriel Drolin he writes: "Personally, I don't like going ahead of Providence, and in the Roman matter, I shall not go ahead either. I want Providence to decide things first, then I am very happy to follow." John Baptist saw the directions that God left on his route to show him the way, and this strengthened his Faith and at the same time explains his faithfulness. How can one refuse to follow, if it is God who leads and calls one? A final picture at the very moment of his death. When Brother Barthelemy, the Superior, asked him whether he had any final advice, John Baptist answered in a calm and peaceful voice, slowly to give himself the chance to weigh every word: "I adore completely the will of God towards me". Those were the triumphant words to end a life of fidelity. He believed in God, hoped in Him and loved Him "with all his heart, with his whole soul, with all his mind and all his strength"... always. Just as Christ did.

THE USE OF HYMNS

IN BROTHERS' SCHOOLS

It is a verifiable fact La Salle introduced the singing of hymns into his schools. Cahier Lasallien No. 22 (CL22) contains the hymns that were collected for this purpose and which were approved in 1703. However, on the basis of these facts some rather fanciful theories have been built which serieous research does not support. We thought it would be a good idea to straighten a few things out.

The use of hymns in connection with catechism.

To begin with, some information would be useful about when catechism was taught and how long the lessons lasted on various days. On ordinary school days, catechism was taught at the end of the day, at 4 o'clock, except during the winter period. In winter, it was moved forward by half an hour. During La Salle's lifetime, the "school winter period", if we can call it that, lasted from November 15th to January 15th. Then, about 1720, the Conduct extended this period by two weeks at either end. Lessons lasted half an hour.

Other days included half-day holidays when catechism was taught last thing in the morning and lasted half an hour.

When the whole of the following day was a holiday, catechism the day before lasted an hour, with the first half hour given over to the study of the "principal mysteries".

On Sundays and big feastdays, catechism lasted an hour and a half, the first half hour once again given over to the "principal mysteries".

When did hymn singing take place?

There is a special kind of hymn clearly indicated for the purpose "which must be sung before catechism on each weekday." There is is one per day except Sunday (in 1703). This gap was filled in the 1714 edition. Some readers, basing themselves on a somewhat hurried perusal of the text, have attributed certain characteristics to the whole body of hymns and which, in reality, applied only to the first six or seven.

The first occasion when hymns are to be sung is clearly indicated: it is "to ask for the guidance of the Holy Spirit"; and the first group of hymns is designed to serve this purpose.

The second occasion when a hymn is to be sung is not immediately after the catechism lesson, but after the evening prayer which follows the catechism lesson. This practice is already mentioned in the "Exercices of Piety" approved in 1697. It is included in the "Conduct of Schools" of 1706, and is still to be found in the 1720 edition. It is also to be found in the Rule of 1726 (Ch. 29, art. 26). According to the Conduct, this hymn can be considered as a recessional one. It is limited to about six verses. Moreover, in the printed text, the groups of six verses are usually separated by typographical embellishments.

These facts cannot justify a point of view which would consider these hymns as a sort of sung meditation, serving to outline the main theme of the catechism lesson which was to follow. To believe this to be the case would be to confuse our own personal practices with what actually used to happen in the days of St. La Salle.

Singing a hymn at the end, alter evening prayer, served to ensure that the pupils left the premises in an atmosphere of recollection, even a little relaxed, but also with some good thoughts like "what Cristians must believe in order to be saved", as the introduction to the second group of 30 hymns tells us.

Later, there was introduced the practice of singing the "hymn of the week" in full, just before the extended Sunday catechism lesson. This is mentioned in the 1760 edition. From the documents at present available we are unable to discover exactly when this practice was introduced, but it was after 1726. We should perhaps mention that the expression "hymn of the week" implies that there was not a different hymn each day, or that different groups of six verses were used, and this was enough to ensure variety.

What were De La Salle's motives?

De La Salle has not given any clear explanation of why he thinks hymns ought to be used. The 1706 edition of the Conduct has a chapter heading "Of Hymns", but that is all: there is no actual chapter. Elsewhere, one finds that the final hymn has been made part of the leaving school ritual.

De La Salle, however, is convinced that songs can be effective. He says in the "Rules of Politeness" (CL. 19, p. 150): "The words of a song have a much greater impact on the mind than words on their own." This is a recognition of the spellbinding effect of music. Why else would he have used it? It was also to follow a recommendation of St. Paul who, as the Founder points out, "tells us quite clearly on two different occasions in his Epistles that what Christians should sing are psalms, hymns and spiritual canticles." (Ibid. p. 150). Hymns, in their own way, enrich one's life as a Christian. For once, De La Salle refers to pleasure (very respectable pleasure, of course) as a motive for using hymn singing: "It should also be a source of great pleasure and enjoyment for Christians to bless and praise often the God of their hearts." (Ibid). This affective aspect is important for De La Salle: "Christians should sing (these hymns) from the bottom of their hearts and with affection, because they express praise for God." In the light of these words, it is hardly surprising to find De La Salle taking the trouble to collect here and there a certain number of hymns "for use in the Christian schools."

St. John Baptist de La Salle's choice of hymns

To speak simply of "St. John Baptist de La Salle's hymns" could lead to possible misunderstanding and give the impression that De La Salle composed these hymns himself. For example, to assert, as is done in issue 14 of Lasalliana, that "De La Salle spent much of his free time composing lyrics for songs which fitted in with what his teachers taught in their religion lesson during the course of the year" is to be excessively generous. The present state of research into these hymns does not in any way support such a confident assertion. We are still trying to discover the origin of the texts used by De La Salle.

Where do the texts used by De La Salle in school come from?

About 1986, I intensified my research into texts which could have been of interest to De La Salle when he was preparing his 1703 collection of hymns. At the same time, I tried to find the musical scores used in the singing of these hymns. My work continues in both these areas when time permits.

However, I have now reached a point in my research where I can say with certainty where 24 out of the 30 hymns of the first long series (CL. 22) come from: their origin is quite clear, and De La Salle certainly did not compose them. The oldest of these texts go back possibly as far back as 1669. Others date from 1681, 1671, 1696 and 1700.

One of the most interesting sources of these hymns is Abbe Simon Joseph PELLEGRIN. There is a somewhat hasty conclusion in the Cahier Lasallien No. 22 (p. IV, note 2) which says: "No text from the Cantiques Spirituels... by Abbe Pellegrin (Paris, Le Clerc, 1701) was included in the first (by date) of our two collections." If such a conclusion was reached it is obvious its author was unaware of the fact that in addition to Christmas carols and cantiques (hymns), Pellegrin published also in these same years some Chanson Spirituelles. In fact, De La Salle borrowed, and it was for his 1703 collection, hymn XXI, "Que de Trésors enrichissent mon âme" (What treasures enrich my soul) and XXIV, "Divin Agneau, qui sur l'autel..." (Divine Lamb, who on the altar...) These hymns were composed for the Jubilee France celebrated in 1701. The pupils in the Brothers' schools possibly sang these hymns even before they were included in De La Salle's collection approved in 1703. Two other hymns were also borrowed from Pellegrin. As far as the last group is concerned, thirteen out of the twenty-two hymns have been traced to their source. Consequently, we are in a position to say that a good forty of these texts were certainly not composed by De La Salle.

Was there an arrangement between Pellegrin and De La Salle?

Among the works of Pellegrin referred to by CL. 22 there is the following: Cantiques spirituels sur plusieurs points importants de la religion et de la morale chrétienne (Hymns based on various important points of religion and Christian morality) for use during catechism and in the Christian schools, set to the finest old and new melodies, by Abbe Pellegrin and other authors. New edition, revised and corrected, Paris, Le Clerc, 1721, in-12, 96 p. (AMG). As the last page of this book has been heavily trimmed, a certain amount of information is missing. As it happens, I have found this missing information, and have discovered two interesting formulas of approbation. One acknowledges receipt of 24 hymns in manuscript form from Pellegrin on "this 15th day of September, 1713." The other refers to L. Ellies du Pin, who has given his approval to "Hymns for the use of the Christian schools, this 5th day of January, 1703." The hymns referred to here are exactly those included in CL 22. This means that these approbations are very important. They destroy in one fell swoop the contention that the hymns in CL 18 belong to an edition which was published somewhere between 1720 and 1730, as the 1952 Institute Bulletin would have us believe. It is now beyond doubt that all the hymns included in CL 18 belong to a 1760 edition. Up till now, those editing these collections have spoken only in terms of the two outside dates of 1703 (1705) and 1760. In between, it occurred to no one that the 1721 edition was an intermediate stage between the 1703 and the 1760 one. And yet, to convince oneself of the truth of this, all one had to do was to check carefully the approbations I referred to above.

And so a first gap has been filled in the history of the editions of hymns for the use of the Christians schools.

Had I discovered a missing link?

This thought, lurking at the back of my head, became an exciting possibility when I was fortunate enough to discover a 1714 edition of "Cantiques spirituels... by Abbe Pellegrin and other authors." I rushed off to order a microfilm of the document so as to make a close study of it. It would be no exaggeration to say I had found a missing link. What I had discovered, in fact, was that the 1721 edition followed on directly from this 1714 edition, because Pellegrin referred to the approbation given him by Raguet on September 15th 1713. And in the 1714 edition, I found the complete text of this approbation which mentioned specifically which hymns, each clearly identified by a number, were approved.

Even more interesting than that was the reproduction of a "privilege" obtained by John Baptist de La Salle on December 19th 1711, which gave permission for the collection to be published. Pellegrin makes specific mention of this in his 1714 edition: "These newly approved hymns are published in virtue of a Privilege granted to Sieur de La Salle." Pellegrin is very fair: he gives the numbers of the hymns he has borrowed from De La Salle's edition. There are twenty-one of them.

So the question remains whether De La Salle and Pellegrin actually worked together and had some formal agreement. Further research is needed to discover the answer to this and to other questions. What we have established, however, is a linked series of editions: 1703 (1705), 1714, 1721 and 1760. We know who was responsible for them. But there are still other editions waiting to be discovered. These could throw real light on the significance of the collections of hymns for the use of the Christian schools, and on John Baptist de La Salle's real contribution to them.

DO YOU KNOW THE "CONDUCT OF SCHOOLS"?

I must admit that there is one book of the Founder's which I dearly treasure above all else and that is "La Conduite des Ecoles". In the following reflections I would very much like to be of some help to those who may read it, and by chance with their better wisdom and insight they may reveal the "vetera et nova" that lie jealously guarded, and for the most part, forgotten in these pages. In this introduction I simply want to dispel a misunderstanding.

Conduct of the Christian Schools – Guide to the Christian Schools.

It is almost certain that if you were to ask many Brothers: "Have you read the "Guide" of St. John Baptist De La Salle"? they would undoubtedly confidently reply: "Yes, years ago it was read and studied in community".

The error arises in confusing the tittle "Guide of the Christian Schools" edited in Paris in 1903, with that of the "Conduct of Christian Schools" whose first edition is dated Paris 1720. However, they are two completely different pedagogical works in spite of the fact that the writer of the foreword of the "Guide" states "We have adhered to the general framework of the traditional "Conduct", a statement that has led quite a few people astray. Without claiming that this is the last word on the subject I would like to pinpoint one or two differences.

Conduct of 1720	Guide of 1903
THE AUTHOR
La Salle together with a group of Brothers experienced in the teaching art. (Preface).	Anonymous; it lacks the richness of differing view-points which is normally associated with team work.
THE STRUCTURE
The flow of the river of everyday school life follows its course from the first page of the first chapter: "Entering and beginning School", to the last chapter of the first part: "On leaving the school premises and how the students should leave", i.e. putting theory into practice.	The structure is determined by logic and theory rather than by life itself; i.e. from the abstract to the practical: though they are connected, the one follows the other.
The three parts in which the "Conduct" is divided correspond to a pedagogy as it is related to experience, day by day, moment by moment.	The four parts of the "Guide" have a scientific and systematic style, typical of a Cartesian and normative treatise.

THE LANGUAGE

Concepts and ideas have to be "clothed" in words to enable the listener or reader to assimilate them. This "dress" in literary works is called a text, and in the "Conduct" and the "Guide" the language of the text is quite different. So disparate are they that it would be like comparing a shirt with a jacket although both are articles of clothing. Only a few pages of the "Guide" show some relationship with the "Conduct".

THE AIM

Where the two treatises are in accord is the essential meaning which they stress –it could not be otherwise. It is the human and Christian formation of the pupils, specifically in the Lasallian school. However, they both show evidence of the times in which they were written.

INNER VITALITY

As I have indicated earlier the "Conduct" is a document fashioned from the quarry of life by craftsmen at the "chalk-face". The composition of the "Conduct" came about after countless consultations between De La Salle and the oldest and most capable teachers among the Brothers of the Institute, and after several years of experience" (Preface). On the other hand the "Guide" could have been written –I don't say it was– by some professor of pedagogy. Let us compare by means of an example or two the quite distinct thrust shown in some of these pages.

Conduct in 1720	Guide in 1903
Teacher and pupil advance together from the first to the last page.	Teacher and pupil work separately for most of the time.
The pupil works with the teacher in the running of the class.	The predominant role of the teacher leaves very little opportunity for the pupil to work with him.
The pupil is an active agent in his own personal education and helps his companions in theirs.	This form of education in which teacher and pupil play their conventional roles weakens the education of the child.
Continuous assessment is basic to the personal progress of the pupil and so enables him to undertake self-evaluation.	It loses the advantages of "continuity" and gives rise to individual and group competitiveness.
The education (human, intellectual, psychological and moral) of the whole person is the object of the school.	Reduced in number, in comparison with the "Conduct" they are more practical and inpersonal.
The chapter on punishments – to quote one – contains a wealth of psychology and incentives of great value and profit to the pupils in showing them how to amend their ways.	More judgemental and less personal with regards to the one who corrects as to the one who receives the correction.
It is the school in action.	It's a preparation for the school to operate.
It is the very life-blood of genuine Lasallian pedagogy.	Ordinary pedagogical principles swamp, in part, the contagious, all-embracing vitality of the Lasallian pedagogy.

CONCLUSION

At no time have I attempted to claim that the "Conduct" is superior to the "Guide". Every society develops and writes its own pedagogy; not for nothing do two centuries pass by. My intention has been simply to motivate the reader so that he may personally verify that the "Conduct" in its quintessence is closer to today's pedagogy than the "Guide" of 1903; that the knowledge of the latter does not validate that of the former; and that whoever gives some thought to the "Conduct" will penetrate deeper into the rich personality of the Pedagogue from Rheims, and the worth of the creative team of Brothers with whom he worked in the composition of the treatise and on the subsequent revisions thereof.

A TOUR OF FRANCE – 154 DAYS ON HORSEBACK

WITH BROTHER BARTHELEMY

December 4th 1716 – May 7th 1717

At the end of 1716, St. La Salle sent Brother Barthelemy on a special tour of the communities of the Institute to prepare the Brothers for the General Assembly that was due to be held soon at St. Yon.

Brother Barthelemy did the whole journey –all 2240 kilometres of it– on horseback. In all, it took him 154 days, if we include the short time he spent in each community "visiting" the Brothers and taking a short rest. It was a real "Tour de France", but under what conditions! The "Petit Registre" kept in the Generalate, gives us a great many details: it is the first Institute census, in 1717.

Let us trace the journey undertaken by Brother Barthelemy and try to gauge his difficulties. The number of Brothers in each community is given in brackets.

THE BROTHERS

MARTYRED IN SPAIN

Around 1930, there began a very difficult period for the Church and Catholics in Spain. It was a time of great political, social and religious tension. At certain stages, legal measures enacted against the Church were particularly vicious. The outcome of all this was a civil war which lasted from 1936 to 1939. However, as early as 1934, a revolution broke out in the Asturias region of north Spain, and it quickly took the form of a violent persecution of priests, religious, militant Christians and the destruction of their property. It was during this period that the eight Brothers from Turon were martyred simply because they were religious. Once the civil war started, religious persecution became widespread and extremely violent. The thousands of people martyred – bishops, priests, men and women religious – included also 165 Brothers of the Christian Schools.

The first martyrs of this period have already been beatified, and so we hope the Causes of other groups will soon reach a successful conclusion. This is the case of our own Turon martyrs: the examination of their Cause, it appears, will be completed very soon.

And so we thought it would be interesting to reproduce here the Circular Letter the Superior General, Brother Junien Victor, wrote to the Institute at the time, as an introduction to the biographies of all these Brother martyrs.

Rome, March 15th 1940,
Feast of Our Lady of the Seven Sorrows.

Very Dear Brothers,

May the grace and the peace of Our Lord Jesus Christ be with you always!

We were filled with great sorrow when the forces of evil swept down on Catholic Spain in the summer of 1936. In the powerful words of the Sovereign Pontiff, Pius XI, these forces-"destroyed and ruines all that was most humanly human, and most divinely divine: people, sacred institutions and objects; holy lives dedicated to the service of others and entirely given over to prayer, study and charitable works. And the forces unleashed were so irrational, savage and cruel that one wonders how they could possibly exist". (Speech, September 14th 1936).

These terrible events caused us even more suffering because, ever since 1904, with the enactment of the Combe laws in France, Spain had become in some sort of way our adopted country, offering a fraternal welcome to our Brothers from the south of France. These events have been disastrous for our Institute: it has deeply suffered: many of our houses have been destroyed, our young Christians scattered, many of our Brothers massacred, a great many others imprisoned and destined to suffer atrociously, while others have been obliged to go into hiding, "with a price on their heads", as Pope Pius XI said, "sheltering in villages and towns, in people's homes and on wild mountain sides, like the first martyrs whom St. Paul admiringly described in the following proud and magnificent words: The world was not worthy of them".

The Pope had also this to say: "This was the apotheosis of Christian and priestly virtues, of heroism and true martyrdom in the sacred and glorious meaning of the word, martyrdom of innocent lives, of venerable old age and of budding youth".

More than 150 of our Brothers made this glorious sacrifice of their lives. Now that the storm has subsided and Spain, with the burden of its memories is working for a better future, we think it is time we published the official account of these glorious deaths. As is traditional, we will mention also the virtues these Brothers practised while they lived peacefully in our midst.

You have been waiting for these obituaries with some impatience. It has not been easy to gather all this material together, and it has entailed a fair amount of travelling. We offer it to you today, convinced you will read it with the respect we owe to the memory of these "witnesses of Christ". It is a tribute they have deserved by their heroic death. "In the eyes of the unwise, they did appear to die, their going looked liked a disaster, their leaving us, like annihilation... slight was their affliction, great will their blessing be. God has put them to the test and proved them worthy to be with him" (Wisdom, 3, 2-6).

They share now in the glory of the eternal Church, guardian of the promises of Jesus Christ. They have shown that "the torch of faith handed on by Dominic, Ignatius, Teresa, Isidore, Pascal and the whole hosts of Spanish saints has neither grown weaker nor has it been extinguished by the wind of the Abomination of Desolation in the Holy Place: on the contrary, it is burning even more brightly in the hearts of true Spaniards, yearning in their hearts, overburdened with sorrowful memories, for a rebirth and renewal of religious life which enables the Christian to triumph over misfortune and suffering". This is what His Holiness, Pope Pius XII said while he was still Cardinal Pacelli. (Address given in the presence of the Holy Father on September 14th, 1936).

They are also the glory of our Institute, ennobled by their blood. What a joyful welcome must Saint John Baptist de La Salle have given them in Heaven, he who had such great admiration for the holy martyrs, as we see in his Meditations. In them we see the real enthusiasm with which he describes for us St. Andrew's joy at seeing his cross ready for him. He goes into great detail as he describes the sufferings endured by St. Laurence, saying: "What can we say about such fortitude? Will such an example make us love suffering?"

Our dear respected confreres who shed their blood in witness of their faith certainly understood the Founder's words. How eloquent, therefore, is their death! What a crown to reward a life consecrated entirely to the service of our Lord and to souls redeemed by his blood!

These examples should urge us, Brothers, to serve God and devote ourselves to young people with greater fervour and generosity than ever before. "Not having the good fortune, nor the opportunity to suffer martyrdom for the faith, make yourselves martyrs for the love of God by practising mortification", says our holy Founder.

May we bear all these thoughts in mind as we read the account of the deaths of our glorious martyrs, and let us pray humbly and fervently for the grace of final perseverance!

With confidence that our prayers will be granted,

Your very humble and devoted servant,

Brother Junien Victor.

THE BROTHERS WHO WERE MARTYRED

IN TURON, SPAIN

on the 9th October 1934

* * *

On the 9th December, 1988 the Theological Commission studying the cause of these brothers unanimously approved their martyrdom. Although there are still some stages to be gone through before the process is concluded, this is a definite step in the direction of the beatification of these nine martyrs, (eight brothers and a Passionist priest). There follows a short summary of each of their lives.

Brother CIRILO BERTRAN
José Sanz Tejedor

He was born in Lerma, in the diocese and province of Burgos on the 20th March, 1888. He went to Bujedo in 1906 at the age of 18. He began his novitiate in Bujedo on the 4th March, 1907. He made his first religious vows on the 31st August, 1909 and his final vows on the 31st July, 1916. He taught in 13 different schools of the congregation and was director in five of them. He had been in Turón from 1933.

From his novitiate days his character was serious and reflective. He did not say much, was wise in the way he judged things and very affable in communicating with people. When he was a superior his wisdom and good judgment became apparent as well as his kindness in administration.

From material collected for his canonisation cause we can select the following from one witness: "He showed his love of God and of others by his zeal for souls. He prepared his lessons, especially his religious lessons with great care. With equal care he prepared the reflection that every brother has to give his students every morning". Some brothers who had lived with him had this to say, when they heard of his martyrdom: "We are not surprised; he was worthy of martyrdom and was made of the stuff of martyrs".

Brother MARCIANO JOSE
Filomeno López López

He was born on the 15th November, 1900 in El Pedregal, diocese of Sigüenza and Province of Guadalajara. He began his novitiate on the 20th September, 1916. He made his first vows on the 9th July, 1919 and his final profession on the 9th July, 1925. He was intelligent and could have taught, but when he was at Bujedo, he became deaf, so he had to take up manual work, and whilst doing that kind of work he showed a great affection for his vocation.

He had been in Turón six months when he died. One of the witnesses for his cause says: "He carried his cross with patience and love, and served his community, that is to say his congregation, with generosity".

Brother JULIAN ALFREDO
Vilfrido Fernández Zapico

He was born in Cifuentes de Rueda, province of León on the 24th December, 1902. Some people assure us that he was preparing himself to join the Capuchins, but had to give up the idea through ill health. He entered the novitiate of Bujedo on the 4th February, 1926. He made his first vows on the 15th August, 1927 and his final vows on the 17th August, 1932. From August 1929 until 1933 he was in the school of Caborana, very near Turón. He had been in the latter community only one year when he died. One witness says of him: "He always approached Our Lord when he had difficulties, and admitted that he always felt much better when he had talked with the prisoner of the tabernacle".

The following are some of his words: "Persecution has managed to unite me all the more with God through doing my duty, and has made this present world seem wretched, for there is only misery in it". "I am the Guardian Angel of my students and I must never lose sight of them". On more than one occasion he exclaimed: "If only I had the luck to become a martyr".

Brother VICTORINO PIO
Claudio Bernabé Cano

He was born in San Millán de Lara, in the province and diocese of Burgos on the 7th July, 1905. He went to Bujedo on the 26 August, 1919. He moved on to the novitiate on the 30th August, 1921, made his first vows on the 2nd February, 1922 and his final profession on 22nd August, 1930. He taught in Palencia from 1925 to 1934, except for a short time, when he was in La Santa Espina. He had been in Turón only 23 days when he died.

He was an excellent educator, a well organised and gifted teacher. His Brother Visitor testified for him as follows: "He loved his students very much, and had a remarkable enthusiasm for teaching."

He had a great devotion to Our Lady. He foresaw that the would die soon and told a friend of his so: a few weeks later in fact he died.

Brother BENJAMIN JULIAN
Vicente Alonso Andrés

He was born in Jaramillo de la Fuente in the province and diocese of Burgos on the 27th October, 1908. He went to Bujedo on the 1st September, 1920. On the 2nd February, 1924 he began his novitiate, making his first vows on 15th May, 1926 and final profession 30th August, 1933. That same year he was assigned to Turón, after teaching for five years in Santiago de Compostela.

He was a jovial and affectionate man. One of the witnesses said: "He was obedient, hard working and loved the Catholic church very much." Another witness: "He loved his vocation so much and was so joyful and happy in it, that he was ready to go wherever obedience sent him, as he used to say: "even to Peking if necessary". His father confessor has this to say: "I cherish the hope that one day I shall see him numbered among the martyrs, for he was killed for the Faith and for the teaching of Christ, which he, with apostolic fervour, passed on to his students. That is why God has rewarded him with the palm of martyrdom".

Brother AUGUSTO ANDRES
Román Martín Fernández

He was born in Santander on the 6th May, 1910. He was a student in the brothers' school, but in order to follow his vocation he had to convince his widowed mother, who did not like the idea. He became very ill, and the doctors gave up hope of saving his life. His fellow students made a novena to St Teresa of the Child Jesus, he got better and his mother offered no further opposition to his vocation.

He joined Bujedo on the 8th August, 1922, began his novitiate on the 3th February, 1926 and made his first vows on the 15th August, 1927. He was not old enough to make his final vows. He was assigned to Turón in September, 1933, after teaching for two years in the school at Valladolid and another two in Palencia. In spite of his youth, he was a masterly teacher. At his cause the following facts were testified about him: "He had to struggle to save his vocation against his mother's insistance that he should return home."

Brother BENITO DE JESUS
Héctor Valdivieso Sáez

He was born in Buenos Aires in Argentina on the 31st October, 1910 of Spanish parents. Having returned to Spain with his mother and brothers and sisters, he entered Bujedo, and stayed there two years. He then went to make his novitiate in Lembecq-lez-Hal, in Belgium on the 7th August, 1926. He took the religious habit on the 7th October, 1926 and made his vows on the 7th October, 1927. He did not reach the age to make final profession. Although he planned to go on the missions, he began his apostolate in Astorga, stayed there four years and then went to Turón in 1933.

Witnesses have said of him: "His enthusiasm for the Holy Eucharist and for the apostolate were remarkable". In a letter to his mother he said: "If the government expells us, I shall come to pass a few days with you, then I shall go to South America or France or anywhere else they send me. My main wish is to remain what I am, a Brother of the Christian Schools". To his father, who was in Mexico, he wrote: "Try to be brave under persecution, and if God gives you the grace of martyrdom, know that I, your son, will be envious of you."

Brother ANICETO ADOLFO
Manuel Seco Gutiérrez

He was born in Celada Marlantes in the province and diocese of Santander on the 1st October, 1912. He became a junior novice in Bujedo at the age of twelve. On the 6th September, 1926 he became a novice and made his first vows on the 2nd February, 1930. He had only two years of teaching, one in the school in Valladolid and the other in Turón. Two of his brothers also joined our congregation, and he wrote to them as follows: "Dear Brother, I am writing to you to say how anxious I am for your dedication to God to be complete and for always." "Dear Brother, Let us persevere in our vocation not half-heartedly, but like real soldiers of our General Jesus."

Two of his brothers testified as follows: "He performed his religious duties exactly". "His great interest was for his students, whom he wanted to make into angels".

Father INOCENCIO DE LA INMACULADA
Manuel Canoure Arnau

He was born in Santa Cecilia del Valle de Oro, Lugo. He entered the Passionist novitiate at Deusto on the 25th July, 1904. He made his first vows on the 27th July, 1905. He was ordained priest on the 20th September, 1913. He taught Philosophy and Theology in different places: Daimiel, Mondoñedo, Mieres. He performed his pastoral work in several parishes especially in Santander. From there he was transferred to Mieres one month before his death. He was in the school of the brothers in Turón when he was captured. He had gone there to hear the confessions of the students, and had remained to talk to them at Mass the following day.

Concerning him one of the witnesses said: "As a priest he was very active, very religious and completely dedicated to the apostolate".

"LET THE GREATER AMONG YOU BE AS THE YOUNGEST, THE LEADER AS THE ONE WHO SERVES" (Luke 22:26)

Rule, Article 61.
As a religious superior, the Brother Director is at the service of his Brothers to help them in their spiritual growth and in accomplishing their vocation as persons and as a community. He himself strives to live and help others live in the spirit of the Rule.

Rule, Article 62.
As the person principally responsible for the community and its unity, the Brother Director fullills his responsibilities with simplicity. He supports and stimulates the Brothers in their search for the common good. He listens to them but also keeps them informed. At the appropriate moment he intervenes to endorse decisions on which consensus seems to have been reached or to settle personally questions which cannot remain undecided.

I

"Authority is exercised with a sensitivity to persons and with respect for subsidiarity"
(Rule, Article 102)

The Lasallian community is basically a group of people in a dynamic relationship with Jesus Christ. The Brother Director's mission as a member of this group is to assist the community in making that dynamic relationship fruitful.

A relationship with the risen Lord is a call to continual conversion, continual growth. The Brother Director as the leader of a Lasallian community is one who has, himself, had the ongoing experience of conversion. He is one who has "fallen from his horse of security". It is from this experience that he ministers to his Brothers.

Much could be written about the role of the Brother Director. The following lines are intended to assist him realize his role as spiritual animator and guide to his Brothers as they meet Jesus in the events and people that constitute their everyday lives.

II

What is the Brother Director's role?

The role of the Brother Director is basically one of dialogue — a dialogue that is based upon a sensitive listening to and total acceptance of the other person, as a means towards encouraging the other person's growth. It is a dialogue carried out in openness to the Spirit and with the optic of the Gospel.

III

What does the role of the Brother Director involve?

The Brother Director is asked: to listen accurately to every other Brother, in such a way that he is able to discriminate between the feelings being expressed and the content of what is being said; to communicate back to the individual Brother or the community what is being said, separating the feelings from the content; to accept others as they are, without trying to see them as he thinks they ought to be; to challenge and confront when necessary; to assist in clarifying any lines of action or any decisions the individual or the community wishes to make.

Direction is a model for helping where both the Brother Director and the individual or community have a particular role to play. In order that his help be effective, the Brother Director will require certain skills. The effectiveness of these skills also depends upon the other person or the community playing a full, responsible part in the dialogue.

(1) The Brother Director must be fully present, not merely physically present. He must be psychologically attentive to the other. The other Brother is asked to be truly himself.

(2) The Brother Director responds to the other Brother's frame of reference. He seeks to understand that frame of reference, attempting an accurate empathy for what the other Brother is saying and experiencing. He tentatively expresses what seems to be implied by what the Brother is saying. He identifies themes, helping the other person to draw the logical conclusions from his statements or showing up the seeming contradictions in what is being said. He helps the other Brother to be specific in his communication. This quality of the Brother Director's response enables the other Brother to explore his own feelings and behaviors.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

(3) The Brother Director stimulates the other Brother to look at other possible frames of reference, to see a broader vision, and to see possible leads for future movement and growth. This may involve the Brother Director confronting and challenging the other Brother.

What should one confront? He should confront (a) discrepancies between what is being said and the reality as he is able to perceive it or as revealed, for example, in the person's body language; (b) distorsions, where the other person is only seeing one side of a position; (c) any "game", tricks or smoke-screens that he believes the other person is using and finally, (d) any attempts to evade the real issue.

What is more important, however, is how the Brother Director confronts: it must be done in a spirit of accurate empathic understanding, and always tentatively, since his judgment may not be accurate. It must be done with care for the other person as the motivation. The Brother Director would need to check his motivation as to why he is confronting. For whose good? And it should be done by working from the other person's strengths and not from his weakness.

(4) The Brother Director helps the other Brother or the group to come to a decision about necessary action. The other person is enabled to act upon his self-understanding, working out a plan based on the dialogue and discernment carried out with the Brother Director.

IV

"I'm not well prepared!"

(A Note to the Brother Director)

It may be that your feelings on reading this outline leave you uncomfortably aware of your lack of preparedness for your role as Director. If that is true, it is a very positive sign. It indicates the need we all have for continuing formation.

To answer this need for continuing formation, it might help to have occasional gatherings of the Brothers Director of your area or District. There you can share your concerns and the mutual expertise you have for your mission. You might also seek more specialized help through workshops or courses.

What is certain is that being a Brother Director is a mission that you will carry out more effectively as you feel the need to develop certain skills and employ them in the service of your Brothers.

PASTORAL ACTIVITIES

DURING FORMATION

The Scholasticate of South Mexico

"Formation should take into account the Brother's mission. The novices are progressively offered the opportunity to engage in apostolic work adapted to the capacities of each. These apostolic experiences are evaluated regularly with those who guide the novices in their vocation."

(Rule, Article 91 f).

What is laid down in Article 91 f of the Rule of the Novices applies likewise to the Scholastics. Their formation entails pastoral and apostolic activities which complement the religious and secular studies undertaken during this period of their initial formation.

These activities are a good sounding-board for each individual to find out how he will cope in the teaching profession and in the ministry of Christian education.

The contact thus provided with young people will put a balance in the life of the scholastic during these years of study. As the Rule states in Article 87 c: "These studies which aim to provide the competence necessary for religious education help the Brothers to have a better sense of their identity in relation to their vocation."

The details of these activities, as to the time spent and the organisation of these apostolic involvements, vary according to the Regions of the Institute. In the District of South Mexico the Novitiate and Scholasticate share the same house in a rather poor, very crowded suburb of Mexico City. There is unlimited scope there among the young and adults for boosting the morale, for training and for the work of evangelisation. It is an apostolate brimming over with opportunities to test the Lasallian fervour and zeal of the Scholastic Brothers. The short summary presented here will give some idea of the commitments proposed for 1987.

THE ROLF OF THE BROTHER

IN THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL

We sometimes speak of the United Nations presence in the Mid-East. We may also allude to the United States presence in Western Europa or even to a USSR presence in Cuba. When we converse in this manner we do not refer to a great number of people but rather to the reality that a certain presence is recognized. The presence is seen as exerting an influence in a specific area, it is looked upon as giving special service, and it is generally felt that this form of presence truly makes a difference.

When we review the Brothers' presence in educational service in the Chicago District, we find that this influence through presence has been quite powerful. Four schools –St. Patrick, De La Salle, St. Mel, St. Georges– which were staffed predominantely by Brothers until the late 1950's, firmly established the Brothers' reputation for quality education. It was during the '50's and early '60's that a veritable explosion in Christian Brother education took place as the Order accepted the challenge to start ten new schools, take over the direction of four more schools which were already in operation, one of which was a college. Fourteen schools in just ten years! In subsequent years the Brothers' manpower shortage required them to withdraw from eleven of their seventeen schools. Most of these eleven schools remain alive and well today.

In this scenario we see the Brothers presence felt by the impact of numbers in their early schools. We also see the Brothers' presence felt by the influence of a small group of Brother-educators, usually joining with a like group of Sisters, and surrounding themselves with a lay staff to establish new schools. And, yes, we even see the Brothers' "presence" felt in their absence today as many of the schools that the Brothers started remain viable institutions today. Many educational faith communities exist today because of the Brothers' direction of these schools in the early days of their development.

Since the Brothers published their Declaration in 1967, the emphasis has been to focus on methods of making the Brothers' presence felt amid their dwindling numbers, by their influence, by their service, and by truly making a difference in their schools. The Declaration urged the Brothers to re-evaluate their school commitments and to understand that their influence of the school than from the more from the quality and excellence of the school than from the number of schools which they conduct.

With the recent stress on the "Lasallian School", instead of on the "Brothers" school in the Chicago area, the question as to the role of the Brother in the schools is being asked by lay staff, by the Religious, and by the Brothers themselves. Some may feel that the downplaying of terms such as "Brothers School" and "Brothers Boys" may be the signal that the Brothers are planning a quiet exodus. But, in truth, the Brothers in the Chicago District still intend to keep their schools as their preferred educational work.

The Lasallian school is to be a place where the Brothers, Lay Faculty, Religious, and Priests are all completely involved with the whole school –with teaching, with catechesis, with apostolic and service organizations, with administration, and in extra-curricular activities. As Brother Peter Clifford, Provincial of the Long Island / New England District, wrote to his communities in June, 1986: "We are all aware that our colleagues, lay, religious, and priests, are more than replacements in our institutions for the Brothers, or unavoidable alternatives. They are men and women interested in our work and in our mission. We owe them the same attention and opportunities for growth in Lasallian thought and idealism as we owe ourselves. In addition, our mission becomes more important as it expands through teachers, volunteers, parents, and alumni groups, and other forms of the Lasallian Family".

The Brother who is the school administrator has the power to set in motion programs which will make the "Lasallian Characteristics" come alive. Faculty members need to be encouraged to hop on the academic escalator to become master teachers or department or committee chairpersons. Teachers might consider becoming exchange teachers in other Lasallian schools, or become consultants in their particular discipline for other area schools. Some may wish to enter intern programs for school administration. It will be the principal's vision as to what the Lasallian school might become that will determine just how vigorous this whole movement will be in each school.

The teaching Brother should be one of the school's visual aids in the art of teaching. The Brother should also be an energizer to the faculty. As the scope of the teacher's responsibility broadens to that of human service educators, teachers will at times be counselors, group leaders, designated thinkers, but always stimulators of the human potential in a variety of ways. The Brothers need to take the lead with their religious, academic, and social vision, and their strong commitment to education, to truly be the animating influence within the school and to the wider community.

The Brothers need to lead the faculty in discussing the great work that all of us are doing. Neil Postman reminds teachers of their importance: "The role of teachers, it seems, is to attempt to show youth that the young enter adulthood, not by TV information, but by having their questions answered. We now have a society of students who have answers to questions that they nevers asked. Unless students can lean on adults, especially teachers, they will not be hope-filled, courageous, or disciplined. The violence that is now revealed over television (their first curriculum) is seldom mediated by a mother's voice, is not modified to suit the child's age level, is not governed by any theory of child development. Teachers who are seen by their students as role models, listeners, value people, interpreters of society's mad violence and vulgarities, in addition to their competency in teaching, are needed today perhaps more than ever" (1). Brothers, we have our work cut out for us!

THE SCHOOL MUST BE WELL RUN

This is the advice —or rather instruction— that De La Salle gives from time to time in his letters. This has been the constant concern of Directors and headmasters over the past three hundred years.

"The school must be well run".

There's nothing more to say, really.

Is sounds right. It says exactly what it means. It states clearly the aim of the whole undertaking. Nothing too grand. Just right.

For John Baptist de La Salle this is not simply a pious wish, a "wouldn't it be nice if..." saying.

It is the result of planning, organisation and a lot of consultation.

What happened was that, in the course of frequent and regularly held meetings with Brothers who had the greatest experience of working in schools, De La Salle drew up a Conduct of the Christian schools. This laid down rules to help teachers cope in school; advised them on their general behaviour; and indicated how a Brothers' school should be run.

Over the course of some twenty years, they worked out a very clear and detailed text, based on the research of the time, but adjusted to the educational and religious aims of their schools.

This "Conduct of Crhistian Schools" is certainly the most detailed educational handbook that was available at the time when primary education and education of the common people began.

For many years it remained the reference text par excellence for schools in France.

* * *

One of the characteristics of this "charter" can be expressed as follows:

* Make the staff work together to fulfil the aims of the school, do their work well, and cooperate with the school authorities.

* Everyone should have their part to play in the running and success of the school.

1. First of all, the customers:

a) The PARENTS who want their child to join the school.

* The approach and teaching methods of the school are clearly explained to them, and they are told what makes this particular school different from other schools.
* They are asked to support the teachers' approach to teaching.
* The school aims at satisfying parents. "Parents should be happy with the school".
* Parents are called to the school whenever necessary.
* School and parents part company if teachers fail to a great extent to marry practice with theory.

b) The CHILDREN:

* They study at their own pace and change subjects once a month.
* They learn by listening and seeing, and from the example of the teacher who is first and foremost a "master of apprentices", in its broadest sense.
* They have various duties vis-a-vis:
  - the teacher: recitation, distribution, collection, supervision;
  - the other pupils: support, vigilance, visiting those absent;
  - visitors: welcome, politeness, good behaviour;
  - the classroom: cleanliness, sweeping, tidying up.

2. The teaching staff and

* the Brother headmaster who organises and supervises the secular and religious teaching of the school;
* the Brother Senior Teacher, who has a great deal of experience and who keeps an eye on the younger teachers; the canes are kept in his class;
* the two teaching Brothers, often very young, who complete their training by being thrown in at the deep end;
  - every evening they report on the day's successes and failures;
  - every evening they spend long hours studying and preparing their work;
  - they keep their notes (catalogues) up to date, noting their pupils' progress and character traits.
* The non-teaching Brother:
  - He looks after the material organisation of the house;
  - He is sufficiently trained to be able to take

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

over if a teacher is ill or absent.

* The Brother school inspector:
  – trains the other teachers;
  – is in charge of coordinating the checking, and the changing of "sections" and "orders" in a number of local schools.

From what has been said it is clear that the success of a school did not depend on one man's efforts at organisation, but rather on a combination of three groups working as one:

* parents, the customers, who were supportive and actively involved;
* pupils, willing to learn, taking active part in the process, having their say;
* teachers, working as one for the good of the school, and combining their efforts, their expertise and their research to ensure that the school fulfilled its three aims of teaching, educating and evangelizing.

* * *

The interaction of these groups should serve as a lesson for us today. The Conduct of the Christian Schools is one of the texts on which the Brothers' schools are founded: although influenced by practices current at the time, it demonstrates by means of practical application the principles which inspired the foundation of the schools.

A Brothers' school is composed of all those who are involved in it, by their active participation, their expertise, and by fulfilling a role suited to them.

Educational establishments have become enormous factories nowadays, extremely complex in their structure, serving a variety of purposes and clientele. They can constitute a very heavy burden; and one feels that the friendly family-business type of school administration that perhaps we knew is no longer sufficient and very likely to become impossible. We have to find other ways of going about things, while remaining faithful, nevertheless, to our traditions.

We are becoming more and more aware of the fact that the key factor in our organisations and in the success of our establishments is the human potential of all the people involved.

It is there that the imagination, the natural inclination, the will and creativity of the people involved –staff, pupils, parents– are brought into contact with new options.

However, nothing can even begin to happen unless the school organisers themselves set the whole process in motion by:

* distributing information,
* setting up channels of communication,
* calling upon people to try things out,
* giving concrete support to what is done,
* praising success, publicising it, giving clear signs of encouragement.

All this presumes that those in charge know what they want and are determined to achieve it, and that certain essential precautions with regard to approach are taken, so that raised hopes are not dashed yet once again.

One of the greatest enemies of this process of involving people with their potential gifts and expertise is sheer, unadulterated generosity. It has to be underpinned from the very start by:

– making people aware of what is expected of them, – training them
– giving them the means to do what is required,
– detailed planning.

I have the impression that those schools, whether Catholic or State, that have undertaken to do all this, are now forging ahead: they have chosen to aim for quality, quality that lies dormant in everyone, waiting only to be aroused by respect and trust.

"The School must be well run" means nowadays that:

1. All those who are part of it are partners.
2. Each one is responsible for the running of the school as a whole.
3. The expertise of each person has a part to play in the work of the school as a whole.

All this presumes also * on the part of those running the school: determination that is quantifiable;

* an atmosphere based on:
  – availability of information – communication, listening – training
  – willing cooperation.
* established procedures for:
  – defining areas of activity,
  – analysing them rationally,
  – taking into account possible changes,
  – making choices together according to qualifiable and/or quantifiable criteria, – keeping to a timetable with deadlines,
  – establishing a certain number of criteria for easy assessment.

These are the points which distinguish a school which has quality.

This quality is based on people, their commitment, their training, their trust in others.

It comes from taking the right means to achieve it, from establishing some rules to make the school run well.

It is quality based on the heart and mind.

It is another way of saying what our predecessors said:

"The School must be well run!"

WORKING TOGETHER LIKE BROTHERS IN OUR MISSIONARY TASK

Some reflections on the lay-teachers in our Lasallian establishments.

1. ..."And the first school masters discovered that they were like brothers."

Saint John Baptist de La Salle wrote the following words: "I had at first imagined that my interest in the schools and their teachers was simply as their adviser, and that my only commitment to them was to ensure their well-being and to see to it that they performed their work like Christians and educated persons." (1). However he soon realised that he was moving along a road with those teachers that would result in a religious congregation, whose members would called brothers. In fact they were to be called "Brothers of the Christian Schools", because they wanted to live together and be able to show to everyone that they were real brothers.

John Baptist discovered that in order to do God's work in schools, the teachers had to be holy men. They needed a firm sense of God, a well-founded spirit of Faith and an unflagging enthusiasm for their work: a determination never to give up. In other words John Baptist found out through his association with school-work, what task God wanted the teachers to undertake. That task, which in its turn required a serious preparation. Now in order to make sure that the schools would continue, together with their mission and ministry, he concluded that the teachers should live together and commit themselves to supporting one another in every sphere. Living together naturally led to the idea of brotherliness or fraternity, since they had the same work to do and needed to show perseverance in that God-given work. The next step in this reasoning was for John Baptist to be inspired with a real sense of fraternity, which, resulting from living together, meant living like brothers and in fact being real brothers. This was a genuinely providential journey which led him gradually to greater and greater involvement without his at first realising it. This was remarkable, because he later wrote: "If I had known earlier that the interest that I took through kindness in those teachers, would force me to live with them, I would have given up that interest". (2). However, inspired by Providence, he managed to make a true family out of those men; a family in which they not only made every effort to live like brothers, but were in fact brothers indeed. Thus work led to mission, mission to living like Christians. After that came living together, then the common task of ensuring the schools' continuation, fraternity, and finally the making of religious vows. Those were just some of the steps along which Providence guided John Baptist and his early teachers.

Blain tells us why he decided on the name "brother". The changes in their way of life led to the change in their name. The name "brother" was entirely fitting and was thus adopted; the name school-master was to be reserved for men who taught to earn a living. Blain continues: "If the name "schoolmaster" had been acceptable up to that time in a residence where togetherness and equality had not succeeded in uniting people unsure of their vocation, it was certainly unacceptable once they were united enough to form a single body. Therefore the name "brother" was entirely fitting, for that is what we call children of the same blood and the same father, and what kind people call those who have the same spirit and the same Father in Heaven. Thus the title "Brothers of the Christian and Gratuitous Schools" became the name of the sons of Mr. De La Salle. This is a very appropriate name, because it carries the very sense of the love which inspired the beginnings of their congregation and which should continue to be its life and soul. That love and charity should be present in all their discussions and be at the heart of all their plans. It is what must urge them to work and action, must surround all their activities, inspire all they say and do. The name "brother" shows them the worthiness of their profession, the excellence of their way of life and the dignity of their work. It reminds them that since they are true brothers, they should have a heartfelt but spiritual friendship with one another, and that, because they are like elder brothers of their students, they should give their lessons with love and an open heart." (3).

Hence according to the biographer of our Holy Founder, the first members of the institute really understood the meaning of "brother" and had a genuine sense of "brotherliness".

2. Lay-teachers share in the mission of the Institute.

Throughout its history and owing to a variety of circumstances, the Institute has had to ask the help of lay-teachers to accomplish its educational work.

It has happened that in certain places and at certain times this help has been looked on as a necessary evil, which time would remedy; the lay-teacher was something added from outside. This way of looking at the matter resulted from the period and circumstances in which those reflections were made.

Nevertheless these teachers were offering themselves and their work to the establishment in which they laboured and that establishment had a mission it could never abandon, namely to form Christians. It is an apostolic mission given by God and the church to the Institute and which the latter fulfils in every one of the its undertakings and by means of everyone of its members.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Therefore the lay-teacher who works in any of our establishments is a co-worker in that establishment and shares in the mission for which it was founded.

It is true that in order to share in a mission certain qualities are needed. For example one should know about the mission, feel in sympathy with it, become qualified for it and even be a convincing witness of it.

The mission of the Institute and of each one of our foundations is an apostolic one, which results from the Faith and apostolic commitment of the people who work in that mission.

It follows from this that the teachers who share in our work should also understand the meaning of that mission and their own vocation to share in it. But how will they find out these things if no one tells them?

Now our Founder worked with the first teachers in helping them to find out God's plan for them and for the Christian Schools. So in the same way the Institute should make efforts to help the lay co-workers to realise the apostolic meaning of the place where they work and whose very reason for existing is the apostolic mission of education.

This is the responsibility of the Institute and of every educational establishment. The lay-teacher might be very well qualified at a professional level to teach the subjects in which he is specialised. But as soon as he joins a community of apostles to undertake with them some of the teaching, those apostles should provide him with what the community stands for. He should in fact receive a spiritual and apostolic formation. In other words we have the duty to give to our lay-teachers that aspect of formation that they were not able to acquire before joining one of the De la Salle schools.

We might think that this is wishful thinking. We know that among our lay-teachers there are some who are not believers or who have lost the Faith; there are even some who have a different religion. How can we count those as co-workers in the mission of the Institute? That is the question, and nevertheless their association with us is a definite fact. Let us not forget that there is a parallel in the ministry of the church, for Baptism is considered valid even when administered by a non-believer. Without a doubt, a thought which is worth reflecting on.

One thing is certain: the lay-teacher in an educational institution which has a religious mission is not a mere instructor; he is called to be an apostle, and that call requires an answer of fidelity to God; in other words holiness.

Thus it is that lay-teachers in our Lasallian institutions are sharers in our mission, companions in our commitment and in our call to holiness via the ministry of teaching.

3. Is it possible that we ourselves will find a new meaning to brotherliness through our association with lay-teachers?

If these lay-teachers are called to the same mission and apostolate and have to achieve their goals whilst working with us, do they not share in our brotherliness? Do they not have a part in the very same brotherhood that was discovered by De La Salle and the first brothers?

When I read the documentation on our Lasallian family and on those who form it, and when I reflect on our lay-teachers, I often recall that passage in the Acts of the Apostles which tells of St Peter's vision when the Holy Spirit urged him to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles. (Acts 10, 7-16) "Do not call that impure which God has purified". From then on the Gentiles were called to the Kingdom without the slightest discrimination.

Surely those in our teaching establishments who have received God's call to an apostolic mission have to be looked on in the same light. Today the Institute is opening out to them and is telling them to share in the inheritance of De La Salle. Can they possibly be excluded from our brotherhood if the are included in our ministry and our mission?

If we give a clear answer to all those questions and if we decide really to consider as brothers and sisters those lay-teachers who work with us, we have already discovered a new role and depth to the term "brother", and perhaps too a new meaning for our Institute.

CHARACTERISTICS OF LASALLIAN SCHOOLS

— ASSOCIATION —

As we have worked with this document on the Lasallian vision, we have been struck by the quality of Association in our own educational becakgrounds. Somewhere in that diversity and variety of curriculum, and myriad of educators was a unified vision which made all difficulties and shortcomings insignificant beside the greater value of the individual's personal, spiritual, and professional development.

In his writings, La Salle refers to Union in a community as a precious gem. He states that if you wish your community to continue, you must cherish and preserve this virtue.

La Salle's point professes the essential meaning, purpose and strength of the Lasallian school.

Attainment of this union in community and its nourishment and preservation is critical to that which distinguishes and defines the successful and productive Catholic school.

In light of this, please consider the following scenarios, created to provide example, as to how they each fulfill, or fail to fulfill, the Lasallian ideal of Association in the school.

Consider a "basketball coach", in his mid-thirties. He spends long hours practicing whenever he can squeeze gym time from the flea markets and dances that invade the facility. Coaches, generally, are paid poorly. He is paid less than that. Yet he works, year after year, driving, chiding, teasing, scolding, and elevating his team in perfecting their play in the game of basketball. He absolutely knows the kids on his team. He knows how they are doing in the classroom, how they feel at home, and how they are with their friends. The school he coaches for would never want another coach.

What about the case of the "first year teacher" in his first classroom. A nun, with years of experience, takes him under her wing, advising, helping, comforting, and inspiring him in managing the classroom, and reaching his students.

A group of 'lay teachers" banded together as a Union challenge the religious administration on salary, benefits, work conditions. Both the administration and bargaining group begin all conversation with the word "Demands."

Consider an "English teacher" just completing her third year of teaching in a Lasallian School. She questions her next contract. The school makes a commitment to her in offering tenure. What kind of commitment has she made and is she going to make to the school?

"A Brother Principal" of some experience is given a new assignment. He arrives to find his administrative team a mix of religious and lay individuals of obvious professional competence. He is uneasy with the team and tends to become a narrow autocrat in his role.

Review for consideration a new teacher, with "outstanding academic training", who professes witness to Gospel values as evidenced by their work in the community, but who is also as yet uncertified. Both a department chairperson and academic principal encourage that teacher to pursue greater professional qualifications.

What about the "established master moderator" of an excellent program, who never yields to a possible greater good. "Oh, you need to take class pictures... take them during the Religion classes, they won't mind."

Consider situations like a "non-practicing catholic" teacher, with a heavy class load and coaching duties, who experiences a personal family crisis, the loss of a loved one. The staff in his Lasallian school rallies around him, covering his classes, his coaching duties, supporting him emotionally through his hardship.

And, finally, what about an extremely competent teacher who, in "subtle ways", sets himself apart from the presence of the spiritual dimension of the school. He regularly sees to handing out his mimeographed papers for class while a prayer to begin the day is being read over the public address system.

"Ministers of grace" —what an honor— what an ennobling of our vocation. St. John Baptiste de La Salle, the Patron of all Christian teachers, was a pioneer in recognizing the special dignity of the teacher.

This was very simple to St. La Salle —Ministers of Grace should "work in UNION, in a spirit of charity, tolerance, patience, humor and humility." With a shared acceptance of Gospel values, they should strive to relate as Jesus did with the Apostles —as the early Christians did in their experience of community.

Having Jesus' prayer at the Last Supper in mind, St. La Salle referred to unity as a "precious gem"! God knows how often we aspire to the ideal of union —and how often we fail! Consider St. La Salle's meditation for the 12th Sunday after Pentecost: "In fact, a community where charity and union are lacking, is a "species of hell". Here one complains, there another raises his voices against his brother on account of some grievance; a third is angry because someone has annoyed him; a fourth denounces his brother to his superior for what he has done to him. Nothing but complaints, murmuring and backbiting is to be heard, causing great trouble and disquietude. The only remedy to such disorders is union and charity."

It is consoling to realize that even the brothers in community with St. John experienced some of the same problems we face today.

In our secular society, charity and union, at times, seem remote and idealistic. We are influenced by the prophets of the ME-GENERATION, to get ahead at all costs. We find ourselves concentrating on the development of our own interests, in siolation, with little regard for unity, charity or the development of a WE-GENERATION.

The so-called "master moderator", immersed in his all important program, seeking his own aggrandizement, while oblivious to the work and needs of his colleagues – or to the goals of the school, does little to promote a spirit of union and charity.

"Lay negotiation teams make their demands as they pursue their interests using a completely secular process. Only conflict can ensue when such a team locks horns with an unyielding, unrealistic "board of control". How much better it would be if both sides strove to view the process as an "act of christian justice" –the TEAM realizing the financial constraints of the school and the BOARD being realistic and sensitive to the actual cost of living.

The ideal of Lasallian Association can be distorted by an "all-knowing, authoritarian Principal – oblivious to the expertise of his colleagues– doing things the way he's always done them in obstinate isolation. Such an administrator will have great difficulty adapting to a collegial style.

In our attempts to "rise from a species of hell" –to approach our Assiciation with charity, patience and tolerance, we have developed in-service programs in spirituality and retreats. We discuss the scriptures, pray together and celebrate liturgies. We support one another in times of crises –in much the same way depicted in the scenario of the man who lost a loved one, and at times of joy – professions, weddings, baptisms, etc. We have been quite successful in creating the caring environment which has become the trademark of any good Catholic school.

Most of us have been fortunate enough to have experienced the good nature of a veteran teacher –like the supportive NUN– who took the time to help a novice teacher adjust and develop professionally. I can remember the concern and kindness of Brother Henry Mischuk who took me under his wing and helped me survive my first year at CBA. People like these nourish and sustain us both professionally and spiritually.

However, Lasallian ASSOCIATION requires more!

The outward manifestations of our concern for one another must be motivated, not by the desire to ameliorate our position in the community, but by an interior heartfelt commitment to Gospel Values. It is possible to fake a commitment –to render lip service to the ideal– to be a modern pharisee.

Contrast the epitome of the Minister of Grace depicted as the "basketball coach" to that of the "secular professional". The Secular Professional who views his position only in terms of academic subject matter, good position, comfortable life style and job security does little to promote the Lasallian character of the school.

In his address to the Brothers at the General Chapter in Rome, last spring, Pope John Paul II, stated that: "The Christian Educational Plan must be carried out by everyone". And cautioned that: "It can so happen that administrators, with the respect and justice imposed upon them, are led to help such or such a teacher to voluntarily withdraw from a contract which he cannot integrally assume."

This approach should certainly influence our hiring practices. In fact, the article entitled, "Religion Teacher Hiring Interview" presented as a project at the St. Mary's Press Workshop in July/86 stresses the importance of selecting teachers who will be receptive to Lasallian Ideals. The well-qualified student depected poses the dilemma: Do we hire someone lacking a teacher's license who will be receptive to the school's philosophy or a credentialed individual like the "secular professional"?

The "English teacher granted tenure", having the school's affirmation, faces the future contemplating whether she can integrally assume the responsibilities imposed by working in a Lasallian school as a Minister of Grace.

We are Ministers of Grace in Association.

It is my hope that what we have shared here today in our discussions will be more than an intellectual exercise or a three-day holiday – that what we discuss today will motivate, animate a new spirit in our schools. This is just the first step – we have much to do!

In closing, may I suggest the following for your consideration. Fully realizing their idealistic nature:

1. That a person's ability to be receptive to Gospel values and the teachings of St. La Salle be a criteria in the selection o new teachers.
2. That Lasallian ideals be infused into the orientation of new faculty.
3. That faculty members be expected to participate in programs designed to explain the Lasallian character of the school.
4. That administrators be bold enough to realize the incapability of certain faculty members to fulfill a contract infused with Lasallian Value –and act accordingly.
5. That we investigate, possibly at the district level the development of a model for a collegial style of administration.
6. That the Brothers realize the growing need to be the animators of Lasallian spirituality, and:
7. That their lay colleagues, realizing their special status as Ministers of Grace assume a more active role in the propagation of the spirit of La Salle.

LET US REMEMBER:

"Union in a Community is truly a precious gem. When this is lost, all is lost. Hence, if you wish your Community to continue, preserve this virtue carefully!"

THE MISSIONS AND LASALLIAN VOLUNTARY SERVICE (1/2)

For some years now a number of young people have been wondering whether they could make a more worthwhile contribution to the missions than by just giving a donation. With a certain amount of reluctance and not a little fear, but at the same time showing great willingness, they offered their services to work for a period of time in one of the Lasallian missions. Since then five youths have committed themselves for three years and have gone to a Lasallian mission to assist in spreading God's word.

At the present time there are in the District of Bilbao several groups of Old Boys (some are university students, some already in employment) who meet every month to study the question of missionary vocation. Some of them are already fairly decided on the idea of offering their services for a period of several years as Lasallian Voluntary Workers, on a La Salle mission.

What is a Lasallian Voluntary Worker? What do we Brothers offer these young people? What criteria do we consider necessary? What demands are made of these young Old Boys in accepting this missionary work? What challenge does this desire of commitment, that these young people show, present to the Brothers?

IT IS NOT A QUESTION OF:

1. Escaping from problems.

To undertake missionary work in order to sidestep personal problems —whether consciously or unwittingly— is a mistake. Everybody at some time or another meets with family problems, upsets at work (stress, strikes etc.) and costly re-adjustments, in one way or another, to our modern way of living. To run away from, rather than face up to, these situations is to betray an attitude of mind completely inconsistent with the missionary vocation. The only consequence would be to carry the problem from one place to another. But even more, the trouble one is escaping from here only becomes more acute there, and the problem becomes even greater. To enjoy missionary work one has to have experienced the joy of having commited onself previously to other enterprises.

2. Searching for Adventure.

Often the missionary was associated with exotic countries, adventurous journeys, tribes whose customs were quite unknown in Europe... The missionary was looked upon as a research worker and mistaken for an explorer. But that all followed from the main task which was to evangelise. The missionary life isn't just another experience for idle, bored westerners; the missionary life is a commitment to spreading the Gospel.

3. Projecting a False Image.

In the interweaving skein of social relationships each individual presents himself in a certain light to others. Our manner of acting is noted in a certain way by all those around us; these concepts of ourselves create an image which is the presented to us. But this image of ourselves which others present us with does not always please us. It is then that we are tempted to build another image of ourselves, more attractive but false. As a result one embarks on ways of behaving which seemingly reflect attitudes of mind and feelings which really are foreign to us. Yes, the image has changed. But now it is wrong to assume that "actions are the expression of a way of being and of feeling".

Missionary life is an undertaking which starts from the premise of what one really is, and not from the image which one would like to portray.

4. Allowing oneself to be used by political and economical organisations.

The voluntary worker arriving in the Third World enters fully into an arena of powerful ideological and economic interests. Almost as a matter of course the countries of the Third World are sought-after prizes by the great powers who see in them the possibilities for the furtherance of their political views and as an untapped source of economical enterprise which makes the rich, richer, and the poor, poorer. Taken up, as the missionary is, by his preference for working with the poor, he runs the risk of being caught up in rivalry between the forces of the two ideologies. And all the good work for freedom and human advancement that might materialise as a result of this involvement, will be the fruit of a living faith at the service of the weakest.

IT IS A QUESTION OF.

Living out a Christian challenge.

A time comes when some young people, buoyed up by the demands of their own developing faith, offer themselves to be of service by way of some Christian venture. Just now there are in our La Salle centres a good group of youngsters who have undertaken a variety of things: some have become group leaders in work-camps during the summer, some are catechists who work with the Brothers in parish and college groups; others devote themselves to try and better the lot of tramps and down-and-outs in the towns; they try to lessen the friction between rival groups of gypsies living in town areas; some have finished their schooling in a La Salle school and have become teachers with the same Lasallian mentality in La Salle centres; some have even decided to become De La Salle Brothers; others have taken steps on the road to the seminary to become priests; and some of the girls have also decided to enter the religious life.

So then missionary life could be a worthy option to bear in mind by the young when considering the whole range of Christian good works. In fact the interest shown in this subject by many is quite surprising.

Following their training as teachers, doctors, engineers, mechanics, veterinary surgeons... and as a result of actively living out their faith, some of them could impart new life into the Church's missionary work.

THE MISSIONS AND LASALLIAN VOLUNTARY SERVICE (2/2)

BASIS FOR MISSIONARY WORK

1. Age: 21 and over.

2. Duration of service: 3 years or more.

3. Health:

The voluntary worker must have a thorough check-up by the doctor. The climatic and sanitary conditions, as well as the food in the Third World, are totally different from the ones we know here and not all volunteers can master them. A number of bites and stings and infections are inevitable. Therefore it is imperative to be familiar with all the possible antidotes to ward of illness and disease.

4. Maturity:

4.1. Personal:

"Life is like a small rice shoot; transported, it grows elsewhere."

It is extremely hard for the volunteer himself to judge what level of maturity he has reached. Those with whom he associates and who are with him all the time ought to be able to see and gauge his maturity, his tolerance, honesty, how he reacts to the group, his open-mindedness, his work threshold, how he fits into living with others, his desire to get on, how level-headed he is and how strong he is in the face of fatigue and failure.

4.2. The mind.

"If man's spirit dances badly
God silences the drum".

There are many unforeseen events in everyday life. Accustomed as we are to living in set social patterns we are psychologically tuned in to them. However, once there is a change of continent, social habits and relationships, frequently it occurs that some problems and traumas which have lain dormant in the subconscious come bobbing up to the surface. For this reason it is important that the volunteers, are not of a tense, nervous disposition but rather well balanced; that they have not suppressed their weaknesses but rather that they have come to terms with them. Everything that is tightly bottled-up like that, in the end will explode.

4.3. Spiritual.

"Love oneself like mouth and hand;
if the hand suffers, the mouth blows on it, and if the mouth aches it is the hand that cures it."

The secular missionary who wishes to form a part of a Lasallian mission project has as his starting point a Christian and religious experience which he has lived-out with a group of fellow workers and which has supported him from one enterprise to another. Therefore, it is not solely a question of participating in the development of projects and human growth in the sphere of profane studies. Missionary work is above all a work of evangelising carried out by the community. The volunteer renews this role which the Church has had as a cherished tradition from the very beginning.

4.4. The economics.

"God scares away the fly from the animal with no tail."

Very often our mental picture of economics is conditioned by the First World; that means we live in a world of "abundance and waste". It is true that there is the threat of unemployment but not even this problem has the slightest element of comparison with the economical situation in the Third World. For this reason missionary life depends on "economic maturity" capable of accepting the renunciation of safety and everyday commodities without losing the joy of living.

What security has one to give up? Among other things a comfortable home, a monthly salary, a well-stocked market capable of keeping the mission well-provided with all it needs for its work. A missionary community's economy is simply to provide the bare necessities of life. Funds to support the community normally come from donations and the salary that a particular missionary might receive; for example, a teacher registered with a school.

5. Professional.

"You don't make your bow during the battle".

It does not suffice to offer oneself as a volunteer "to supply what is lacking". Nor is "good will" enough to join in helping adults to read, for example. It is essential to know HOW to set about teaching those adults to read and write. Many of the branches of knowledge and the qualifications obtained here at home are not of any use over there. Very often ability to perform simple and elementary tasks are of the utmost importance, whilst specialist expertise can be of no value.

A multifarious, inter-disciplinary training is the best way to guarantee help to the Third World. This training given to the volunteer should be as full and all-embracing as possible covering more ground than technical or university specialisation.

5.2. Religious preparation.

"There are people like smouldering wood:
one has to throw them into the fire to set them alight."

A volunteer would be unable to blend-in with an enterprise like that of the Lasallian missionary life if his living faith was

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

puerile and feeble . It is important to possess a growing faith, a faith shared with others, one expressed in prayer: a faith that has led one earlier to embark on other ventures; a faith nourished by the sacraments, in junior Eastern celebrations; in reunions, in work-camps...; a faith, likewise, strengthened by Bible study and by the reading of books which strengthen the realisation of being Christian.

5. 3. Pastoral preparation.

"Make use of the right means to achieve the goal; a finger can't wash a face."

A possible professional contribution made in the fields of teaching, building, agriculture, medicine... is imperative: that's obvious. Nevertheless, all this is only a part of the work. The voluntary worker who assists on a Lasallian mission also takes an active part in pastoral care; the training of catechists, religious instruction for infants, juniors and adults, help in the liturgy etc. This, naturally, calls for previous training and experience. A good way to achieve this is by assisting the Brothers in their pastoral work in the colleges and parishes... and by taking part in the many day-courses, and longer ones, for the training of catechists; these are organised fairly frequently at different venues within a given District.

6. Contact with those who remain behind.

6.1. The Christian Community at Home.

"One arm can't encircle a baobab tree".

It often happens that many Christian endeavours come to light, and develop, among groups of friends, catechists and fellow students, who have evolved into Christian communities through the constant sharing of their faith together. A missionary enterprise can be another outlet for a group to adopt and help, through the services of one or several of its members.

The community decides:
- What undertakings it will accept.
- How they will be fulfilled.
- Who will accept the many responsibilities.

In such an undertaking there are two areas of responsibility: that of the missionary and that of those who remain behind. All has not been accomplished with the training, the departure and the journey to the mission. The volunteer is "the envoy", that is to say, he is the representative of the home community. This is, consequently, the beginning of an exchange: those who stay at home support the volunteer by their prayers, their letters, their financial help, their news, etc. He, in return, keeps them informed of his missionary work, its difficulties and successes. He informs them of the use that is made of contributions received and he tells them about the progress of his religious experience. In this way, the volunteer is far from being alone, but rather, he is a symbol of the presence and the life of a whole community who accepted the call from God.

6.2. The secular missionary and the Brothers.

"The intelligence of one single person is like a bag full of holes."

The volunteer takes part in a Lasallian mission because he has lived in a Lasallian environment where his vocation has developed. He is part of a team of Brothers and can count on the support of the Brothers of the District. The volunteer brings to the Lasallian mission his own personal ministry; a service complementary and distinct from that of the Lasallian religious.

The Brothers of the District, through the Secretariat of the Missions, accept all the responsibilities that go with all missionary works:

- training of candidates
- preparation for living in community with all that that entails: work, prayer, human relationships
- assessing the adequacy of the candidate for each of the missions
- the official backing of the missionaries
- constant support for the missionary communities.

7. Missionary attitudes

"Those who sail in the same canoe think alike."

EFFORT to integrate one's own cultural life and faith into the new social-cultural and religious milieu.

RESPECT towards the people and their surroundings: they have an identity and motive force all of their own.

TO AVOID the temptation to apply pressure to speed up projects, and to destroy thoughtful planning.

TO UNDERSTAND that evangelisation and improving the lot of mankind are the work of a team.

TO ACCEPT: that evangelisation and improving the lot of mankind are the work of a team.

TO ACCEPT the specific missionary enterprise undertaken by the envoy sent out to do the work.

INTEGRATION with a venture that is much greater than one's own work and set plans.

KEYNOTE ADDRESS OF SECRETARY

LOURDES R. QUISUMBING

at the Elevation of La Salle College, Bacolod to University Status and the Investiture of Brother Rolando R. Dizon, FSC as the First President of the University of St. La Salle, July 5, 1988

On July 5th 1988, La Salle College, Bacolod, in the Philippines was raised to the status of a University. Brother Rolando R. Dizon was invested as the first President of the University of St. La Salle. The keynote address was given by the Secretary of Education, Culture and Sports, Secretary Lourdes Quisumbing.

In the latter part of her speech, Secretary Lourdes Quisumbing showed her great admiration for and understanding of the lasallian educational tradition.

... In my short encounter with the Lasallian tradition, several impressions have embedded in my consciousness. I found out that Saint John Baptist de la Salle was the proclaimed patron saint of all teachers by our universal church. Being a teacher myself, it was easy for this fact to stay in my mind. We had our very own patron saint who will intercede for us teachers! However, as I began to study the life of this saint, I began to be struck by his life and work. First of all, I was struck that this French gentleman was able to overcome the strong group bias of his society towards the bourgeoisie and the nobility when he committed himself to work for the education of the children of the working class and the poor, and to live with the teachers which he considered, as he himself wrote, as having a lower status than his personal valet! Second, I was struck that he was able to decide to work as an elementary school teacher even after he received his doctorate in theology. Third I was struck that he was able to see that salvation for his students meant both teaching them skills so that they can find work and inculcating in them the life-giving truths and values of Jesus Christ. To him, there was no dichotomy!

Given this brief sketch of what little I know about him whom you have named your university after, what are its implications for your university especially as they pertain to the threefold agenda of our government? Firstly, to be true to his name, you will have to be a university that serves the working class and the poor of Negros by making the university accessible to them. You will have to fight and resist against the temptation to turn your institution into a university for the elite for the sake of academic excellence. The orientation to serve the working class and the poor does not mean that you will have to sacrifice academic excellence. The real challenge for you is to be a university that genuinely serves the working class and the poor without becoming a mediocre university. Medriocrity has no room in an authentic educational service of the poor. This is your particular contribution towards participatory democracy and social justice.

Secondly, Saint La Salle was concerned about the welfare of children. Any institution who bears his name can do no less. Your programs and your degrees, your researches and your projects should have a particular focus towards the well-being of the children of Negros. On this line, I would like to personally commend the work of your Social Research Center which has placed itself at the service of the government's efforts towards the social transformation of Negros, and the undergraduate and graduate programs in education even when it is certainly not profitable to do so! I hope that your university can become the center of a vibrant renaissance in social research and teacher education for the Visayas region. Such will be a significant contribution to the building of a just and humane society as envisioned by our Constitution.

Thirdly, Saint La Salle was concerned that the children be taught to lead good lives by instructing them with the life-giving truths and values of Jesus Christ and by giving them suitable education. In our modern parlance, we would say that he was very much concerned with values education. Today, our young people are being bombarded by values which present a distorted version of the good life. Your university must put all her resources to help counteract this cultural domination of the minds and hearts of our young people. We need your skills, your knowledge, your expertise to help fashion a new Filipino educational paradigm that can retrieve the wisdom of our national cultural heritage as well as to fashion a Christian education where the teachings of Jesus are embodied in the cultural tradition of our people. To do these, it is important for us to be functional in our own national language because language is the best tool we have to decode the insights hidden within our cultural heritage. Remember that Saint La Salle fought for the right to teach the children in their own native French when it was the accepted custom to use Latin as the medium of instruction.

Simply, I am asking you as your Secretary of Education to be faithful to your tradition, the tradition of Saint La Salle. Education after all, is simply the drawing out of insights necessary for the continuing growth of our community, both locally, nationally and globally. You have within your educational tradition rich insights which our people need.

Jaime Cardinal Sin, during his homily to the Brothers on the occasion of the diamond jubilee of their coming to the Philippines said: "If St. John Baptist de la Salle were alive today in the Philippines, would he not plunge straight into the fray to educate the poor in the life-giving truths and values of Christ? Can you, his sons, the inheritors of his indomitable spirit and vision fail to plunge into the fray in his footsteps? In the children of the slums, in the children of the sacadas, in the children roaming (our streets) and the impoverished countrysides, (St.) La Salle calls to you. Fail him not, fail yourselves not in this crucial hour, and our country shall owe you a debt of eternal gratitude". I, as your Secretary, can only echo his plea and add my voice to his!

SOME THOUGHTS AND SUGGESTIONS FROM A GROUP OF TEACHERS

We are a group of lay teachers from the "Istituto Arti & Mestieri" of Turin, a school which runs industrial technical courses, as well as courses at secondary level, up to the end of the 4th year.

We felt challenged by the Message of 41st General Chapter of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, and we would like to share with you briefly and somewhat spontaneously some-thoughts that came to mind as well as some suggestions.

SOME THOUGHTS

1. The serious way in which the Message speaks about a "Lasallian family" made a profound impression upon us and a welcome one: we understood it not as a metaphor, but as the description of a deeply human and Christian community which responded to the needs of a specific vocation which was to be found also beyond the confines of the Brothers' Institute.

2. The Message describes a Brothers' community not in hagiographical terms but realistically, and for many of us this was something new and moving.

This is how we saw the community of the Brothers of the Christian Schools:

A community which had solid foundations:

* in its fidelity to its Lasallian origins;
* in the effectiveness and capacity for work of the Brothers;
* in its rediscovery that a religious community is — a community which is loving and which prays;
— a community which is available (chastity);
— a community which is poor and for the poor;
* in its role as a non-priestly vocation which is present as a leaven and which gives service.

A community which does not hide its problems, but which seeks to:

* redefine its specific vocation in the present day world and Church;
* give greater importance to the vows in a world that does not understand them;
* make itself understandable to young people (lack of vocations).

An Italian community which seeks to:

* establish a position for itself in a country in which it is at risk because of financial difficulties and the power wielded by those who control finances.

* give a more evangelical response to those who thirst for values, truth, freedom and love, a thirst so prevalent in schools in Italy.

3. 1. We are very grateful to see that we lay teachers are no longer thought of simply as "lay stopgaps", or as "a work force you make use of when there aren't enough Brothers around". We understand that we are full members of the Lasallian Family, because of our vocation as teachers, Christians and fellow-workers in the Brothers' apostolate, with all the rights and duties that this vocation. By the fact that we are here and now doing the will of God, we are also "called" "here" and "now".

3.2. Consequently, we feel that it is urgent and crucial to take steps to:

A. Become aware of what a specifically Lasallian vocation implies at the present time;

B. Bring with us into the Lasallian Family values that are specifically ours:

— availability and personal friendship;
— professional competence;
— sensitivity to the sings of the times;
— enthusiasm and experience;
— witness (by words and actions) of our confi-

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

dence in the Lasallian vocation; – efforts to make this vocation understandable to young people ("fostering vocations").

3.3. We feel we have the "right" to involve the rest of the Lasallian Family (the Brothers' community in the first instance) in our "problems":

– the devaluation and disqualification of the person of the teacher in modern society, and the frustration that this brings;
– financial problems;
– loneliness and isolation in an ever increasingly soul-destroying society, and sometimes in a "bureaucratic" Church;
– poor professional career prospects within the Catholic education system;
– And so on...

SUGGESTIONS

The above thoughts have led us to make a few suggestions which are not intended to be original, but which can be seen as a sort of follow through on a community or institutional level of many things which are already being done on a personal level here and there.

Some of the following suggestions could be put into practice quite quickly; others are medium term projects; while others still are long term projects which would take much longer.

1. Above all, we lay teachers feel it is urgent for us to establish a closer spiritual contact with the community of the Brothers: we sometimes get the impression that the wealth of their Christian upbringing, religious wisdom and prayer is all locked away in a safe.

In practice, we look for:

– opportunities to meet them so as to be able to think and pray together at important times in the liturgical year;
– a chance, to the extent that this possible, to join in Brothers' community prayers;
– a chance to work out with them ways to offer help to pupils (also former students, parents, older pupils...);
– contact with Brothers in charge of fostering vocations;
– contact with teachers who used to work with the Brothers, but who now work in other schools, with a view to extending the influence of the spirit of St. La Salle.
– closer contact with other groups in the Lasallian Family (former students, Signum Fidei).

2. On a strictly professional level, we lay teachers feel a need for:

– meetings or courses on a regular basis to study Lasallian pedagogy in action.
– the possibility to update teaching and learning methods together with the Brothers, extending this possibility also to former colleagues.
– involvement in schemes Brothers have organised locally like extra tuition for pupils behind with their work, reception centres, etc.
– studying with the Brothers the needs arising from "new poverty" and finding truly Lasallian solutions.

3. With regard to decisions that need to be taken concerning the running of school, we feel it is important to study the question together (taking into account, of course, expertise and position in the school) in order to find solutions in the following areas:

– ordinary, everyday problems (allocating pupils to classes, choice of courses, timetabling, staff involvement, etc).
– the problem involved in establishing a small, stable group of lay teachers who, with the Brothers, can provide continuity for our teaching establishments.
– the problem of schools which are in danger of closing down or of losing their identity because of financial or staff difficulties, and thus depriving the "poor" of the "bread" they need.

There are other suggestions we could make, but we had better stop there: it is all very well to make suggestions, but to do something about them is not so easy.

What is important is to begin to work together, trusting Him who loved us first.

LASALLIAN FAMILY CONCEPT AND THE MALAYSIAN REALITY

Perhaps in a less formal institutionalised way, the Brothers in Malaysia have had different approaches to the development of the Lasallian Family. Almost every school director and Brothers' community have their own circles of friends, benefactors and co-workers. Through our formal contact with them there is imparted some degree of spirituality and educational philosophy.

Lay heads of Brothers' schools have, off and on, "get togethers" where sharing goes on regarding the specific identity and problems of our schools.

Then again in our schools with fairly active Catholic teachers there exists some coordination in the manner in which faith, values, and spirituality are imparted to our students.

OLD BOYS' ASSOCIATIONS

One feature of the Brothers' Schools which have had a long history has been the establishment of Old Boys' Associations. The more recently founded schools have also worked in the same direction. Their origin stems from the attachment of the former pupils to their Alma Mater and this attachment has its explanation in the tremendous loyalty and affection they had and retain for their former teachers who were Brothers. These Associations, by and large, are thus characterised by this deep attachment and a tremendous interest (and pride) in their former schools, their readiness to help out when called upon to do so. These Associations have always been autonomous and the Brothers do not exercise anything beyond a counselling role but their deference to the Brothers is unmistakable. Since most of the members are not Catholics, or even Christian, the religious dimension is not generally stressed but the moral influence of Christian formation and education is duly appreciated and most desired. These Old Boys' Associations (there are also lady members now by reason of the opening of pre-university classes to girls) are to be considered as genuine members of the Lasallian Family because of their close ties and their association with the support of the Brothers in their educational and social work.

PARENTS – TEACHERS ASSOCIATIONS (P.T.A./P.I.B.G.)

In general, the parents of our pupils have always been interested in the welfare of the Brothers' schools and they too have been of immense support in their expansion as well as in the general discipline of these establishments. Even before the establishment of formal PTA's by instruction from the Ministry of Education, groups of parents were to be found everywhere and, either individually or in groups, were able to render good services to the Brothers, even with regard to their communities' welfare. Parents who are also members of the Old Boys' Associations proved themselves particularly anxious to be close to the Brothers and helped to strengthen the ties between these Associations and the schools. With the setting up of the PTA for each school, there has been growing interest and support coming from a larger group of parents who now work more closely and with deeper attachment to the respective schools. This has strengthened PTA relations and, in practice, it is these Associations which are quick to detect what the schools need for improvement in facilities and the welfare of the pupils, especially the less advantaged.

Through these Associations, many more parents have come to know the schools better and to take genuine interest in them. Working with the Boards of Governors or Managers of each school, considerable progress has been achieved all-round. In general too, through meetings and discussions with the staff and, especially the Head Teachers, the parents have gradually come to a better understanding of what a Brothers' school is and what it is striving for. As such, the PTA's have greatly improved and cemented the good relations between the Brothers and their schools and the parents and made them true cooperators in the Lasallian enterprise. They constitute thus an important element in the greater Lasallian Family.

LIMITATIONS

However, is must also be noted that in Malaysia,. having a political set-up, increasingly manipulated by Islamic elements bordering on fundamentalist principles, within the last 5 - 10 years, there has been a concerted effort to minimise the Christian dimension of our Mission schools. This has been effectively done by the taking over control of students intake, staff transfers, curriculum determination, etc. As such, the number of Catholic students and teachers has been drastically reduced, forcing us to rethink our concept of the Lasallian Christian school. We have fewer lay Catholic teachers to draw from, in our attempt to establish the Lasallian Family.

Till now, many of our schools have been blessed with lay staff who despite being non-Catholic (most of them) are still sufficiently imbued with our Lasallian character. This has been due to a large extent to the fact that some of them were from our teacher-training college which has been closed since the early 70's. Besides this, there is the fact that in the "past", teachers tended to remain for many years in a particular school. So working alongside the Brothers, they inevitably absorbed the identity and traditions that the Brothers so well imparted.

However today, with the frequent transfer of teachers in and out of our schools by the Ministry of Education, longstanding teachers notwithstanding, we face the difficulty of having teachers who are imbued with or who understand our traditions. Teachers come and go before they even have time to

Via Aurelia, 476 – 00165 ROMA, Italia

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

develop any sense of loyalty or association with our Educational Mission.
What has become increasingly evident is also the posting of Muslim teachers into our schools. They, while being cooperative in some instances, may not appreciate fully the Christian dimension of our apostolic work. Many of our schools have more than half the staff Muslims and this phenomenon will continue to increase, as statistics over the last years show that all Teachers' Training Colleges in the country are practically Muslims in enrolment.

SOME BREAKTHROUGHS

Despite these limitations much effort has been given to deepen the commitment of teachers in our schools. At a more organised level, the "colloquium" (staff management programme) run by heads of Mission schools under the umbrella of the GACS (Guild of Assisted Catholic Schools) has conducted many programmes of staff development at our various Mission schools (girls and boys schools). The Brothers have featured most prominently in this movement, comprised of Religious and lay people. These programmes conducted for the staff of our Mission school provide opportunities for orientating our teachers into our own educational philosophy and emphasis. Much has been done, and to date, Staff Animation Teams are still in good demand.

However, the spectre of gloom looms ahead even for an organisation such as the GACS, since of late, there have been clear indications from the Ministry of Education to the effect of discouraging any educational endeavours initiated by groups other than those from the Ministry itself. This, coupled with the fact that many Mission schools are being heavily staffed and administered by Muslims, has somewhat begun to take the wind out of the "colloquium" sails. Nevertheless it will still struggle to carry on until such time when circumstances disallow its continuance.

With these factors in view, the prospects of the Lasallian Family as envisaged in some totally Catholic countries (Spain, the Philippines and the sort) seem less viable. We have neither the numbers of lay teachers to draw from, nor the"Catholic" atmosphere for them to function in. Leaving that aside, even the notion of the "Lasallian School with a Christian identity" is called in question, as Brothers are confronted by students, teachers, personnel and structures that are more than 90% non-Christian.

POSSIBLE INITIATIVES

Despite all this, the Concept of the Lasallian Family is not totally unfeasible. Perhaps workable at a smaller level, say 3-4 Catholic teachers from each school becoming an extended family to the Brothers community, attached to the school, where every now and then, they could be invited for a meal, prayer functions, faith sharing experience or other opportunities where interaction can take place and where we can impart our Lasallian charism to them. They may not even have to meet always at the Brothers' residences and may prefer to take turns at meeting at one another's houses for a simple meal and animated sharing as practised by ME, BEC, Charismatic groups, etc.

Another possible avenue to develop the Lasallian Family Concept is by tapping the rich source of Catholic teachers found in the parishes. These, more than often, are not from our Mission schools. In this vein there is a need to broaden our concept of the Lasallian Family to include the formation of Catholic teachers and others who will be willing to bring our Educational philosophy and emphasis to Government schools not run by Brothers. If organised efficiently, this move could prove a breakthrough for Christian educational influence into the National Education scene. Brothers could perhaps organise programmes at parish level or even set up appropriate structures for these teachers in order to share with them important aspects of education seen from the Lasallian and Christian perspectives.

Yet another initiave could be to develop closer links and communication with all those teachers who have been trained at our Teachers' Training College which has since been closed. They, above and beyond other Catholic teachers, would be most predisposed to continue carrying on and sharing in our Lasallian Mission.

The Lasallian Family Concept need not be limited to teachers only. At perhaps a different level the inclusion of parents, ex-pupils, male and female, Christian and non-Christian, benefactors and others interested in or who value Lasallian education and character training, human formation, would prove a rich and diversified contribution.

Finally, in a more specific manner, we could set before Catholic teachers, former pupils, parents and even benefactors, the ideal of the SIGNUM FIDEI whose more convinced and more enthusiastic members could publicly consecrate themselves to the Lasallian apostolate in a more specific and wholehearted manner. They could make a commitment to the pursuit of some Lasallian projects and to the expenditure of effort, sacrifices, even monetary help, etc., backed by a strong interior life of prayer, sharing and instruction in Lasallian love. They could form a sort of THIRD ORDER in the broader sense of the term become veritable SIGNUM FIDEI i.e. Signs/witnesses of the faith through Lasallian education.

Not many communities have exploited these possibilities to the full as yet. Perhaps the Sub-District Council could further discuss this matter and come forward with some concrete plan of action that will enable the various communities to explore and actively develop the notion of a Lasallian Family.

THE NEUCHATEL CATHOLIC INSTITUTE

A CENTURY OF TEACHING FOREIGN LANGUAGES (1/2)

1988 marked the 125th anniversary of the Brothers' arrival in Neuchatel. This was not the first Lasallian foundation in Switzerland, for that took place in 1750, only thirty years after the death of the Founder. In fact, apart from Rome, Switzerland is the first country the Institute spread to. What is more, the first biographer of John Baptist de La Salle was Brother Bernard, a native of Fribourg in Switzerland.

Many of the first Lasallian foundations in Switzerland encountered a great many difficulties and did not survive long. The primary school in Neuchatel, however, can take pride in having lasted longer. As far back as 1863, the local parish priest persuaded the Superior General, Brother Philippe, to send three Brothers to take charge of a run-down primary school, and the Institute is still running the school. To found a religious community in Neuchatel was not an easy thing to do in the middle of the 19th century, because the Canton authorities were not in favour of such a move in a town where there had been no Catholic presence from the time of the Reformation to the beginning of the 19th century.

The Opening of the Boarding School in 1893.

Thirty years after the arrival of the Brothers, a boarding school was opened next to the primary school. It was a modest start: in the first few years, numbers were low, and boarders were lodged in a local hotel provided for their use. This is how the boarding school which is the subject of this article started.

At first the school grew slowly and it was only after 1925 that it really expanded. The numbers of boarders reached their peak between 1950 and 1970, when they totalled almost 200. Such an increase in numbers made it necessary for some of the boarders to transfer to other premises in the Abbey of Fontaine Andre which the Brothers had bought in 1954.

For a variety of reasons, there are now only 90 boarders per year: numbers have been reduced because of the shortage of Brothers; dormitories have been transformed intorooms; and more space has been provided for the recreational needs and leisure activities of the youngsters we have to cater for these days.

Our Intake.

The educational system in Switzerland is in the hands of the various Canton Governments, and so it tends to vary accordingly. In general terms it can be said that compulsory education lasts 9 years (10 in some Cantons) and begins at the age of 6 or 7.

At the age of 15 or 16, pupils have to choose between continuing their secondary education in a Gymnase (Grammar School), or train as apprentices and learn a craft. The Law says no one below the age of 16 can become an apprentice. The immaturity of candidates and the shortage of places on apprentriceship courses, combine to extend this pre-apprenticeship period which then serves as a year during which decisions about future careers can be made.

There are three official languages in Switzerland, and in many crafts and professions a knowledge of French, German and Italian is desirable if not absolutely essential. It is, of course, a plus when promotion is sought. Because of this, boarding schools have been opened in various Cantons, in which boys and girls from Cantons where another language is spoken, come to learn an extra language and benefit from their contact with a different linguistic and cultural context, all of which will prove useful during their apprenticeship. All these boarding schools are private. Many of them are run by Sisters, Catholic lay people and the one in Neuchatel, by the Brothers. Some of these schools have foreign students also.

The Catholic Institute of Neuchatel, run by the Brothers in a French-speaking Canton, is almost a hundred years old. Every year it takes in 90 German-speaking boys for one academic year and helps them to improve their French.

A Few Words about these Students.

These boys are aged between 15 and 17. They are usually students with learning difficulties, and the reason they were not able to continue their secondary school studies in a Gymnase was either because they were slow learners, or had fallen behind in their studies, or simply because they had not worked hard enough.

For about 5% of them, this year at the Catholic Institute is only a postponement: at the end of it they will be able to take up their studies in a non-specialist Gymnase or in one offering commercial studies. Some go to a teacher training college to train as primary school teachers. Others go to special schools run by the Postal Service or the National Railways.

45% of the students leave the Institute for a period of apprenticeship run by firms and are able in this way to obtain qualifications.

40% leave and get a job, learning the skills they need in the course of their work. The kind of work they do is quite varied and includes engineering, electronics, electrical work, carpentry, catering, nursing and even agriculture.

Fortunately, up till now, all our students have been placed on leaving the Institute. This is largely due to the support and help of parents and of professional career advisers who are available to guide them in their choices.

On leaving the Institute, students, with very few exceptions, go back to their own Canton to do their apprenticeship with a firm and under the supervision of the manager. The manager follows their progress and pays them a small wage according to the work they do. Once or twice a week, these apprentices go back to school to learn the theoretical side of their craft. According to the craft, apprenticeship lasts between 2 and 4 years. At the end of this period, the employer is under no obligation to offer a job to the youngster, although this often does happen. The youngster, on the other hand, has to find himself a permanent job and do his military service, In Switzerland, military service consists of an initial period of 4 months, followed by periodical training sessions up till the age of 40, adding up to between 2 and 3 years of service in all.

Recruitment of Pupils.

The reader will have realised from what has been said that one of the special characteristics of our establishment is that its catchment area is not in any way local: our students come from the central area of German-speaking Switzerland.

And yet, up till now, we have had no trouble in filling all available places each year. We do not advertise at all: people hear about our boarding school by word of mouth. In fact what usually happens is that the number of applications exceeds the number of places available. And so each year there is a waiting list.

We are careful, however, not to be over optimistic, as the pupils now in their tenth year of compulsory education belong to an age group affected by a decrease in birth rate.

As years go past, we notice that a large proportion of our students are the sons of Old Boys of the Catholic Institute, or members of their family. Others have heard about the Institute from Old Boys living in their area. We insist, however, that students who come to us do so of their own free will and not because of parental pressure: as one can imagine, boarding school life does not appeal to many adolescents nowadays because of the restrictions that have to be imposed. The willingness of students to spend a year with us is a point we watch for in the preliminary interview we have with each of them before enrolment.

A Boarding School for the Study of French.

Another special characteristic of our Catholic Institute by comparison with most other Lasallian schools in the world, is that we keep our students for only 10 months: our school population changes completely each year. The reason for this is that the aim of the courses we offer is to improve knowledge of French. While this is the overriding objective of our teaching, it is not the only one.

For a fairly long time, we admitted students without insisting on an adequate knowledge of French; but eventually we realised that those whose standard was too low soon became discouraged and did not settle down during their year in the Institute. And so, recently we have introduced a test to assess knowledge of French, which the prospective student takes on enrolment.

We have also recently begun to run special courses for weaker students in an attempt to offer them teaching that is more adapted to their needs and level of intelligence.

The 90 students are divided up into 4 parallel groups or classes according to their competence in French. At the end of the school year, the top two classes sit an exam set by the Alliance francaise; while the other two groups sit one set by the Association of Swiss Private Schools, which is somewhat easier. Results in both exams are regularly very satisfying, students achieving a pass rate of between 80 and 90%. The diplomas they receive do not confer any legal or professional rights, but they do have quite a standing and help students quite often in their search for a career.

French, but also other Subjects.

Given the aims of the boarding school, the teaching of French dominates both the curriculum and the weekly timetable, taking up 17 40 minute periods per week. Other subjects are taught also, but in French, as part of the process of improving fluency. These include accounting, commercial arithmetic, typing, civics, Third World studies, training in the practical problems of everyday life and catechism.

In addition, students have to choose one or two optional subjects from among the following: English, Italian, algebra and geometry, music and information technology.

In all, students have at least 36 periods of class per week plus study in the evening. This is quite a heavy timetable, in particular for students who have learning difficulties, and some find it difficult to cope with.

To help students improve their command of French, it is suggested they use it even outside classtime. Formerly, pressure was put on students to do so by a system of punishments and rewards; but times have changed and it has become more and more difficult to insist on such things.

There are 5 Brothers and a number of lay people working in boarding school at present. Together they seek to improve methods used in teaching the various subjects as well as the organisation of time outside school hours.

THE NEUCHATEL CATHOLIC INSTITUTE

A CENTURY OF TEACHING FOREIGN LANGUAGES (2/2)

Outside Schools Hours

Another characteristic of the Institute is that all the students are boarders. They go home and visit their parents regularly every other weekend, of course, but that still leaves the rest of the time to be organised. This is something the Brothers are mostly responsible for, although lay people do take their turn at supervision during the day. Because of this, the Brothers have a lighter teaching load, and take over supervision in the evenings and at weekends when the boarders are there.

One of the Brothers' concerns is to ensure contact between the boarders and the French-speaking people of Neuchatel, a contact they would like to see improved by its frequency and quality. This is not easy to do even if, when the boarders are there on a Saturday evening, they can stay out in Neuchatel up to 10 o'clock at night. During the course of the year, we organise trips around the Canton and even outside it to introduce the students to French-speaking Switzerland.

There is provision in the timetable for external speakers to come and address the students on a variety of important topics. Such topics include the refugee problem, drugs, the Third World, prison, etc... We organise days also on which group distinctions are forgotten and students concentrate, through research and study, on a special theme like fashion, films, television, etc...

But the fact remains that evenings in the boarding school need organising, and that the 90 adolescents are used to having much more freedom of action at home. Coping with this situation demands a lot of imagination: activities have to be varied to maintain interest. There has to be supervision also, so that there is at least a minimum of order. And, of course, there are times when discipline has to be imposed.

All this is not always easy. It is mostly the Brothers who run the boarding department, and because they have to impose discipline, they are not particularly liked or accepted by some youngsters. There is nothing new in this, but it is still difficult to bear. We feel that most of these antipathetic feelings are not lasting, and will not colour the memory these students have of the boarding school once they leave. Our lay supervisors have their families to go to, and so cannot devote their evenings and weekends to working in the school. Their contract stipulates, however, that they take charge on two weekends per term when the boarders are in residence. Teachers supervise every other Saturday morning.

Secular Subjects but also Christian Education.

In spite of the problems we have mentioned above relating to running the boarding department, which spring from a permissive society and changes in youth culture, it has always been the ambition of the Brothers, and it still remains so, to give a human and Christian education to these young people, even if it is only for a short period of 10 months.

It is precisely this aspect of our educational work that was given prominence in the educational programme we recently revised with our whole staff. Our main aims which are stated in the introduction are as follows:

— to enable young people:
* not only to acquire a good grounding in academic subjects, and especially a good command of French;

— but also:
* to give meaning to their own lives
* to become men aware of their human and religious responsibilities * to develop a spirit of tolerance and justice.

To achieve these aims, the Institute seeks to create an educational framework which promotes:

* character training through the self-discipline demanded by studies, and by living with others and forming relations;
* teaching which is suited as far as possible to the needs of each one;
* a personal interest in the students, made possible by the close contact between them and adults, who try to show understanding, patience and tolerance, while still being able to be firm when the occasion demands.

Education which opens minds and hearts to the needs of others.

In addition to its normal educational work, the boarding school offers its pupils an opportunity to undertake various special activities aimed at increasing their awareness of important problems locally and further afield.

The aim of the course on the Third World which is part of the curriculum is to make students aware of current major problems. This is backed up by concrete actions on an ad hoc basis in support of various minor schemes. Over the last few years, help has been given in particular to India and Latin America.

At the same time, students are made aware of local problems by being involved in practical schemes offering help. Here are two examples:

The Christmas Campaign.

This campaign makes a very deep impression on most of the students and is something that is very practical. Its aim is to help poor families, especially those living in mountainous areas in the centre of the country. These families are pointed out to us by Social Security workers who are in contact with them. Our campaign is very generously supported by the former students of the Institute whom we ask to help us. Each pupil makes himself responsible for a mountain family. He begins by writing to them to obtain some firsthand information about their situation, about their needs, and especially the needs of the children. The main aim of the campaign is to provide clothes, toys and Christmas presents for the children. Once this first contact has been established with a family, the pupil sets about raising the money necessary to buy whatever is needed by his adopted family. It is at this point that the generosity of Old Boys becomes evident, and the usual school fund-raising activities prove useful. When sufficient money has been raised, goods are bought from shops in Neuchatel, are made up into parcels, and sent off by the pupils with a greetings card. The parcels are large, weghing 15 kilograms on an average. Last year, 116 families were helped, which is commendable seeing there are only 90 pupils in the boarding school.

Holidays for mothers.

In mountain areas, the mothers of peasant families can only rarely go on holiday because they do not have enough money. In 1987, thanks to money raised, in particular by the Old Boys, who really are generous, our boarding school was able to send off 37 mothers for a free holiday in the Swiss Tyrol.

Other things have been done at one time or another, mostly less expensive, but which have made a impression on the pupils. There have been, for example, contacts, visits and sports fixtures with the local prison; and similar contacts with adolescents between the ages of 16 and 20 in a youth remand centre; and so on...

Christian education.

Most of our pupils come from Catholic families, but there are a few Protestants among them. In addition to the weekly religion lessons which are part of the curriculum, the Catholic Institute organises also the following:

* Each class goes on an annual retreat with its classmaster. The retreat usually takes the form of a camp-cum-retreat, somewhere away from the Institute premises.

* Occasionally there are days of recollection held in the peace and calm of the Abbey of Fontaine Andre, the other Brothers' community in Neuchatel.

* There is a voluntary prayer session once a week. It is held on Thursday evening in the boarding school chapel, and is organised by a Brother from the primary school. The youngsters are interested by the different ways of praying suggested by the Brother: they are encouraged to write down their prayers and their thoughts, and these are subsequently published with their agreement. Attendance is completely voluntary, and numbers vary from week to week.

Old Boys.

One has to remember that our pupils stay with us only 10 months and that, after that, they go back to their own Canton. There is very little contact between successive groups, and so there is little chance of building up a common stock of memories or a group spirit. Each year is different. The situation does not lend itself to the setting up of an Old Boys' Association, and so officially none exists. But, in various towns, groups of Old Boys have got together and meet regularly.

There are various signs, however, that show that numerous Old Boys seem to remember their days in the boarding school with some affection. For example:

– They show great generosity in providing funds to help our Christmas Campaign and other activities.
– We receive a great deal of correspondence from them.
– About 200 of them come every year to call on the Brothers and have a friendly chat.
– Last year more than 150 accepted our invitation to come and take part in the traditional three-day Wine Harvest Festival in Neuchatel.

All this leads us to think that the work we do here and relationships we build up are not merely superficial.

Conclusion.

The pupils that come to the boarding school are usually from the families of middle class shopkeepers and quite well off.

They are not poor economically speaking: their poverty is rather educational, intellectual and sometimes affective.
While helping them educationally – and our results show a certain amount of success – we try to make them sensitive to the poverty of others, and teach them to to show solidarity with them, by offering practical help. This we try to do by the various activities we have mentioned.

We try to ensure our intake covers as broad a social spectrum as possible, and so we keep our boarding fees as reasonable as we can. This was relatively easy when we had a lot of Brothers who did practically all the teaching and ran the boarding school. These fees nowadays have to take into account the salaries of lay teachers and supervisors, otherwise it would be impossible to stay within the budget. It should be noted that the Government of the Canton of Neuchatel gives no financial assistance to a private boarding school like ours. In spite of these difficulties, our fees are among the lowest in this type of establishment. This is our way of contributing to the education of the poor.

October 1st 1989

INTRODUCTION

This issue of LASALLIANA is the third of the three planned for this year, and marks the end of our first year of resumed publication.

As we announced in issue Nº 15, this issue is devoted in a large measure to the «Letter to the Lasallian Family» published by Brother Superior and his Council a few months ago. It is an important document, and we feel that the articles included in this issue will be useful as a basis for studying, understanding and assimilating it.

With this in view, we are publishing seven articles grouped under four main headings, and have included at the end of each a series of questions aimed at stimulating a study of this Letter, either in community or study groups, or with other members of the Lasallian Family.

The seven articles were written by Brother Hernando Sebá López in his role as Secretary of the Lasallian Family in the Education Mission Secretariat which has now been functioning for a year.

Among the topics treated in this issue, we should like to draw your attention to those to do with Blessed Brother Scubilion: the Pope's homily at the beatification Mass; the French Prime Minister's speech, which refers to the Institute several times; and the miracle which was used for the cause.

In view of the impending canonisation of Blessed Brother Mutien Marie, we have included a description of the miracle and extracts from official documents relating to the examination of his cause.

* * *

We should like to remind readers that these articles are intended to be study documents and are meant to spread knowledge of things Lasallian among Brothers as well as lay teachers, ancillary staff, parents of pupils, pupils and others connected with the Lasallian Family. It would be useful if enough copies were made available for each of these groups to be able to benefit by them.

Likewise, all who wish to contribute to our publication, and who wish to share their thoughts and preoccupations about Lasallian matters, will find a welcome in our pages.

To help you find your way around these collections of articles, we should like to remind you once again about our numbering system:

- The first number, 16, is that of the issue.
- The second number, between 1 and 20, is the number of the article in the issue.
- In third position there is a letter which indicates the subject or theme:
  - O. General topics, varia.
  - A. St. John Baptist de La Salle, life, writings, spirituality, doctrine.
  - B The Brothers' Institute, history, present time.
  - C. Educational matters.
  - D. Collaboration between the Institute and lay people, Lasallian Family.
  - E. Personal experiences, various events, celebrations, etc.
- The final number indicates the number of articles already published on a particular topic.

SAINT TERESA AND THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

It is more than likely that when most of us read the "Story of a Soul", we felt a little thrill on seeing the name of Brother Simeon figure in it, a name referred to with affectionate gratitude by St. Teresa of the Child Jesus.

The Saint knew the Brothers of the Christian Schools in Lisieux: she would meet them in the streets, and her father would speak about them at the "Buissonnets"; and so she is part of the history of their religious family. Teresa had promised to spend her time in heaven doing good upon earth; she could hardly forget a spiritual friendship God's Providence brought about with Brother Simeon of the Lisieux community.

A meeting.

If we mention here Teresa's journey to Rome in November 1887, and her brave appeal to Leo XIII to let her join the Carmelites at the age of 15, it is because we think it is likely that the Saint met Brother Simeon in connection with this question.

In her autobiography, Teresa writes: "My father went to visit the venerable old Brother Simeon, and there he met Father Reverony. He gently rebuked the priest for not helping me in my difficult task, and then went to tell Brother Simeon all about it. The kind old man listened with interest and even took notes, and then said with emotion "You don't see things like that in Italy".

One may well imagine that this providential meeting with Brother Simeon changed the attitude of the intransigeant Vicar General. It is what Teresa herself thought: "I think that this meeting made a very great impression on Father Reverony: he was forever afterwards telling me how convinced he was I had a vocation".

While this meeting was taking place, Teresa was on a trip to Naples. When Celine was asked in 1946 to describe what happened, she said that she remembered going with her father and Teresa to the school, but the Director was not there. On August 31st 1890, he wrote to her, saying: "I have very happy memories of you and your father". It is not too far-fetched to suppose that, at least on one occasion, he saw the two sisters who under such circumstances were inseparable.

A friend and confidant.

Even if a meeting in the parlour never took place, it is certain that these two exceptional persons had a close relationship: Saint Teresa meant a great deal to Brother Simeon; and from this time onwards, he was the friend and confidant of the Saint, her sisters and of the Carmelite convent of Lisieux. His strong attachment to them was shown by his constant sollicitude for their needs. Writing to Celine on March 5th 1897, he says: "If you need anything, don't hesitate to ask me. I am here to serve you and your superior".

As for Teresa, she has respect, affection and confidence in this religious. She writes in her autobiography: "A few hours before my profession, through the kindness of good Brother Simeon, the papal blessing arrived. This precious blessing certainly helped me to survive the most violent storm I have ever experienced in my life". Unfortunately, the holy Carmelite's letter asking for the blessing has been lost. With a touch of humour, Teresa wrote to Pauline: "I think I ought to thank «holy old man Simeon», and tell him I received his letter. What do you think?"

Just like Teresa in 1890, Celine too asked Brother Simeon to obtain for her a papal blessing on the occasion of her profession on February 24th 1896. And later, she wrote to him again to ask him to do the same for Sister Stanislas who was celebrating her Golden Jubilee on February 8th 1897: "Rest assured that your little Carmelite convent in Lisieux has a special place in its heart for you... we will always remember good Brother Simeon, our father's friend; and both of us, my sister Teresa of the Child Jesus and myself, are very proud to know you... We are both trying to become saints and want to go to heaven soon. She is on her way there. She is an angel. Her life is consumed by love. I enclose a short piece of verse written by her". It is her favourite piece and her best: «Living by Love».

Brother Simeon answered on January 25th 1897: "I have just re-read your sister's lovely poem. It is a sublime song that is worthy of the great St. Teresa herself. All the Brothers here wish to read it and make copies... Our Holy Father Leo XIII is in good health: his secretary, a very good friend of mine, thinks the poem is very good... Tell your holy sister that I am praying she will recover her health". He was able to obtain the blessing. The Prioress, Mother Mary Gonzaga, wrote to him "joining her two little angels in expressing her most respectful gratitude". Later both Teresa and Celine wrote. Celine described the celebrations in minute detail as one would to a very close friend, ending with: "it was a perfect day, and without doubt the best present of all was that of our dear, venerable Brother Simeon".

Brother Martino, the headmaster of St. Joseph's College in Rome, has been good enough to send us a photocopy of a letter which the Saint had enclosed with that of her sister. We reproduce here the complete text which Brother Martino's predecessor had the foresight to keep:

Carmelite Convent, Lisieux
January 27th 1897

Dear Headmaster,

I am happy to join my sister Genevieve in thanking you for the very valuable service you rendered our Carmelite convent.
Not knowing any other way to show you my gratitude, I kneel at the feet of our Blessed Lord, and through my poor prayers wish to show you how much your kindeness to us has touched me...

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

My joy, however, is tinged with sadness, for I have heard your health has been weakened: I beg Jesus with all my heart to spare your life which has been so precious to the Church, for as long as possible.

I know that our Divine Master must be eager to give you your crown in heaven, but I hope he will leave you a little longer in exile, to continue working for his glory, as you have done all your life, so that the immense store of merits you have amassed may make up for those souls that come to God with empty hands.

I dare to hope, dear Brother, to be one of those fortunate souls that will share in your merits, as I do not think my life in this world will be very long... When I come face to face with my Beloved Spouse, I will have only my good intentions to offer him; but if you reach our Heavenly Country before me, I hope you will come to meet me and offer on my behalf the merits won by your devoted life. As you can see, your little Carmelites can never write to you without begging for some favour and taking advantage of your generosity!!!

Dear Headmaster, you are so powerful on our behalf in this life; you have obtained for us the blessing of our Holy Father Leo XIII so many times already, that I can't help thinking that the Good Lord will give you great power over his heart in heaven. I beg you not to forget me in his presence if you have the happiness of seeing him before me. The only thing I beg you to ask for my soul is the grace to love Jesus and to make him loved as much as it is possible.

If Our Lord comes for me first, I promise to pray for your intentions and for all the people who are dear to you. I am not waiting till I get to heaven, of course, before I begin praying for you: I am happy to do so now and so prove my deep gratitude to you.

I shall always be happy, dear Headmaster, to be your grateful little Carmelite in the Sacred Heart of Jesus,

Sister Teresa of the Child Jesus and the Holy Family, Carmelite Celine's name in religion was Sister Genevieve. Our reproduction of this letter is faithful to the original in its punctuation: the underlined words are the Saint's emphasis in the original.

The limited scope offered by an article forces us to be too brief. We cannot quote in full all the letters we have in our possession which were exchanged between Celine and Brother Simeon who, with her closest family, was the first to become aware of this person whom the whole world would soon acclaim as "the greatest saint of modern times". On July 7th 1897, Celine wrote to ask him to obtain a papal blessing and an indulgence "in articulo mortis" for Teresa: "Our dear little Sister Teresa of the Child Jesus is dying... she is slipping away quietly. Her illness is love. She is not dying of anything but love just as she wished so much".

And so a Brother of the Christian Schools was one of the first to share the intimate feelings and thoughts which revealed the secret of the outstanding holiness of one who would be the inspiration of a unique spiritual movement in the Church. And this Brother realised the importance of this message. He says so in his reply on July 12th: "The sad news you sent in your letter about the sad situation of your admirable sister is a source of both sorrow and consolation. To die of love for Jesus who died for love of us, what is there more sublime, more heroic and more worthy of our longings!" In spite of a few difficulties, he obtained what she had asked for: "I asked for the papal blessing and the "in articulo mortis" indulgence for your sister. The Holy Father has agreed to everything". Finally, a letter dated October 10th 1897 informs him of Teresa's departure for heaven.

A heritage.

On September 30th 1898, the autobiography of Sister Teresa of the Child Jesus was published, 2.000 copies in all. In the Carmelite convent they were worried. Would they sell even 100? Celine wrote to Brother Simeon immediately and sent him three copies. In her letter dated October 4th which was included in the parcel, she suggests timidly: "Of course, I don't think the Holy Father will read this book, but couldn't one offer him a copy for his blessing?" She thinks that his "special friend" might possibly be able to arrange it.

Brother Simeon read the book he had been given and "thought it would do a lot of good" and "all the other Brothers were eager to read it". He sent the second copy to the Pope's private secretary, asking him, as Celine had asked, for "his impressions of the book in writing". On November 6th a letter arrived at the Carmelite convent from the Brother Director: "The third copy I am returning to you has been blessed by the Holy Father".

The Brothers are still working in Lisieux, and are bound by deep bonds of friendship with the Carmelites: the gentle saint has continued to help them as her father had before her, and she extends her kindness to all the Brothers.

A spiritual relationship.

Is the relationship, then, between St. Teresa and our Institute one that is based on chance meetings and on her heavenly protection? Can one not speak of a true spiritual relationship which goes beyond the confines of time and space?

Many Lasallians have been inspired by her ideal which has led them to the only true greatness, that of evangelical insignificance, taught by both saints. Can one not say that it is on this level that the close ties that bind us are most obvious?

Saint Benildus surely followed "the way of the Little Flower" without knowing it by that name and unaware of its lyrical dimension. He surely illustrated the value of even the smallest gesture made through love.

Brother Gabriel Emonnet.

The author of this article has written a book which was very highly praised by a variety of reviews. It was written with the Brothers especially in mind, and what makes it original is a comparative study –to first to date– between the spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle and that of St. Teresa of Lisieux. THE PROCESS OF JUSTIFICATION IN THE SPIRITUALITY OF SAINT JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

Introduction.

The purpose of this article is to examine the way in which the process of justification is presented in the spirituality of Saint John Baptist de La Salle. To help me in this I shall use as my basic texts the Meditations and the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer composed by the Saint.

Although he was a Doctor of Theology, De La Salle has not left us any systematic treatise on theology. Upon examination, however, his writings are full of teachings about the spiritual life. At first sight, this would seem to pose problems for this present study, but in fact it is a positive factor. While De La Salle did not construct a theory, he was able, and very successfully too, to present in a systematic form the way in which he lived his faith. Before putting down anything in writing, he lived this life of profound faith with his teachers. It was only subsequently that he wrote about it in detail in his Meditations and Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer.

When one analyses St. La Salle's faith journey, it becomes obvious that it was marked by a profound conversion experience. He discerned the call of God in "poor and abandoned children". He was willing to put himself into the hands of Providence so that God's will should be accomplished in him. Finally, he allowed himself to be led by the grace of God in most unexpected directions.

It never occurred to him that, because of his chance meeting with Nyel, God would lead him so far. All he did was to take one step at a time towards the apostolate God was going to entrust to him. In order to be faithful to this call and to better understand the call of God in the person of the poor, he had to give up his comfortable lifestyle. It is in the successive stages of De La Salle's radical conversion to the poor that one perceives his process of justification: he became aware of his sinful condition so that God would justify him. And so, justified by the grace of Christ, he allowed himself to be guided by the Holy Spirit so as to fulfil his mission through the educational service of the poor.

Following the example of their Founder, the Brothers also are called to acknowledge their sinful condition, so that justified by the grace of Christ, they can be efficient instruments of the grace of God in the exercice of their ministry.

* * *

We shall see now how the six stages of the Pauline process of justification are presented in the spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

1. Our sinful condition.

The first stage in the process of justification is the acknowledgement of our sinful condition. Our own sins are the result of original sin. De La Salle points out that a Brother should acknowledge his sinful condition before God, because this sinful condition is an offence against the Creator. He suggests Brothers should acknowledge their condition in the following terms:

"Oh my God, I acknowledge that I have greatly offended you, and I am constantly conscious of my sins, because it is against you that I have sinned, and I have done so in your presence. I was even conceived in sin." (Expl. p. 50).

For De La Salle, it is absolutely essential for a Brother to acknowledge his sinful condition, because this is the basic condition for God's grace to appear in his life. But according to De La Salle, it is not enough simply for the Brother to be aware: he must make his pupils aware too. What is more, De La Salle points out clearly the dangers that the spirit of the world represents for one who wishes to respond freely to the grace of God. That is why part of the mission of the Brother is to keep pupils away from sin:

"This is why God has provided children with teachers... to guide children... through all the dangers they meet in the world... This is the main concern you must have for the children entrusted to you. It is the main reason why God has entrusted you with so holy a ministry..." (Med. Time of Retreat No. 5, 3).

Since a Brother must be a model for his pupils, he is under the obligation, in the first place, of acknowledging his sinful condition, and then secondly, as he exercises his ministry, of helping his pupils to become aware of their sinful condition.

2. We are made free by the grace of Christ.

In his meditation for Good Friday, De La Salle writes that the death of the Son of God is the consequence of the sins and the evil which reigns in the world. However, the love of God freely given makes us free through the intermediary of his own Son. And so it is important for the Brother to express himself in the following terms during mental prayer:

"I earnestly beseech Our Lord Jesus Christ to show his goodness to me by applying to me the merits he had the mercy to acquire for me by his Passion and death, which of themselves are very efficacious and all-powerful; so that completely covered by them, sin is no longer apparent in me, and in this way I may be more pleasing to you and better disposed to receive your grace and enlightenment in mental prayer." (Expl. Method. p. 54).

We are made free by the grace of God in Jesus Christ who has redeemed us by his death and resurrection. In the face of this great sign of love, a Brother must:

"render Jesus love for love in acknowledgement of so great a gift". (Med. 26, 3).

The first step in the plan of salvation is always God's:

"It was necessary that God himself through Jesus Christ Our Lord should show us the road we were to follow, and inspire us with the desire of walking in the footsteps of his Son." (Med. 3, 3).

That is why the Brother is merely "a voice" of God (Med. 3, 1) as he fulfils his mission. He is simply a voice, receiving from God the grace to exercise his ministry.

The fact that the first step is God's alone is shown clearly in the very vocation of the Brother. It is a call freely made by God to give a Christian education to children and young people:

"Thank God that he has had the goodness to call upon you to obtain such great benefits for children." (Med. Time of Retreat, 2, 1).

3. Made free by the grace of God, we are transformed into the sons of God.

When St. La Salle speaks of mysteries in the second part of the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer, he makes an explicit reference to the Incarnation of Jesus Christ. In the Incarnation he sees the mercy of God who gave his own Son for the redemption of mankind. By this merciful act of God in the person of his Son and through the intermediary of the Holy Spirit, we receive the grace to be transformed into the sons of God.

"Oh God, Eternal Word, I believe with all my heart that you became the Son of Man in order to win for me the grace to become the son of God your Father." (Expl. p. 64).

By the very fact we have become sons of God, our lives must be guided by the Spirit of God. We must look at things not in the way the world looks at them, but with the eyes of faith, since God's grace lives in us. We are the temples of the Holy Spirit. That is why he says: "You must live and act only according to the Spirit and by the light of faith". (Med. 43, 2).

4. Made free by the grace of Christ, we are now animated by the Spirit.

Since we have been made free by the grace of God, we are now animated, renewed, led and strengthened by the Holy Spirit. Our life is no longer guided by the criteria of the world, but according to the Spirit of Jesus, because we have been justified by the grace of Christ. As St. La Salle says:

"The first effect that the Holy Spirit produces in a soul that has the happiness of receiving him is to make it see things in quite a different light from that in which those who live according to the spirit of the world view things." (Med. 44, 1).

A radical change takes place because of the presence of the Holy Spirit in us. The way of looking at things changes completely. One no longer looks at things according to the spirit of the world, but according to the spirit of God. Animated and guided by the Spirit, the Brother looks at everything with the eyes of faith. He lives according to the spirit of faith. And when St. La Salle speaks of living according to the spirit of faith, he means that the life of a Brother must be animated, guided and renewed by the Holy Spirit. In fact when St. La Salle speaks of the Spirit of Faith, he speaks of the Holy Spirit. (M. Sauvage & M. Campos: "Announcing the Gospel to the Poor").

5. The process of justification is accomplished by means of the Church.

This mediation occurs through preaching and baptism, among other means. According to St. Paul, "Faith comes from what is preached, and what is preached comes from the word of Christ." (Rom. 10, 17).

St. La Salle says: "It was the spread of God's glory by the preaching of the Gospel that made up all the consolation of this great apostle (Paul), and this must be yours as well, to make God and his Son Jesus Christ known to the flock confided to you." (Med. Time of Retreat, 15, 2).

As a follower of Christ, the Brother shares in this mission of the Church. By baptism, he is likewise called to be a herald of Jesus Christ. He fulfils this mission especially when he teaches the message of the Gospel to the pupils confided to his care by God.

In addition to preaching, the Church fulfils its mission of evangelisation by means of baptism. Through baptism we die to the world of sin and we rise to new life in Christ. For St. La Salle, the Brother has a duty to communicate to his pupils the basic truths of the faith, since, like him, "by baptism, (they) are consecrated to the Most Blessed Trinity". (Med. 46, 3). As someone who is baptised, the Brother has a duty to announce Jesus Christ, since his pupils too have received the grace of baptism.

In his meditation, De La Salle stresses the Church's role of mediation. The Brother as a baptised person shares in this work. When he shares in this mission he must remain united with the Church. This union will be shown by obedience to the Pope and the Magisterium of the Church. His inssistence on this is understandable in the light of the danger offered by Jansenism, so rife at the time. De La Salle was invited at various times to join the Jansenists. Had he done so he would have received considerable financial aid for his undertaking. He rejected these invitations, however, preferring to trust in Divine Providence rather than in money.

6. Animated by the Holy Spirit, we become capable of doing good.

The good that we do does not come from our efforts nor from our abilities: it comes from God's grace. We are transformed by the Holy Spirit. That is why when a Brother prays he can ask him:

"Come Holy Spirit, take possession of my heart. Animate all my actions so much that it can be said that it is you who are acting and not I; and that I have no life, no movement no action unless it comes from you." (Expl. p. 18).

The Brother becomes capable of doing good works because he has been renewed and justified by grace.

Grace is always a gift and a duty. On receiving this grace, a Brother must "look upon everything with the eyes of faith, do everything in the sight of God, and attribute all to God". In order to do this:

"You must act through grace and show that you are moved by the impulse of the Spirit of God." (Med. 45, 3).

Through the movement of the Holy Spirit, the Brother must seek only God's glory in the accomplishment of his mission. Seeking the glory of God implies also the renunciation of self. By this renunciation, the Brother can complete in his own body what is missing in the sufferings of Christ. For St. La Salle, the true disciple of Jesus Christ is he who shares in the sufferings of the Son of God:

"Like him (St. Ignatius of Antioch) you must bear in mind that you will be a true disciple of Jesus Christ only when you love him, and when you love suffering for his sake." (Med. 102, 3).

Conclusion.

In the spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle, it is possible to identify the process of justification described by St. Paul. De La Salle, a Doctor of Theology, had a thorough knowledge of the teachings of St. Paul. In addition to knowing them, he admired them also. There are innumerable references to St. Paul in the Meditations and the Explanation of the Method of Mental Prayer. By this means, St. La Salle endeavours to help his Brothers to become aware of their sinful state, so that, conscious of it, they can be more attentive to the grace of God, a grace which renews them, justifies them and brings them out of their sinful state to a new life in Christ. Once made free by the grace of Christ, Brothers can live according to the spirit of faith, and not according to the desires of the flesh. And so the Brother must not "look upon anything but in view of God and must attribute all to God".

Through the action of God's grace, the Brother as a person leaves his sinful condition to become "a minister of Jesus Christ" (Med. Time of Retreat, 3, 11). As a minister of Christ, he must seek only the glory of God in his mission of educational service of the poor.

BROTHER SCUBILION WAS ABLE TO SEE GOD IN EVERY PERSON

1. «You are the salt of the earth! You are the light of the world» (Mt 5: 13, 14).

In the Gospel of Saint Matthew, these surprising words are addressed to the hearers of the Sermon on the Mount, that is, to all those who have heard the message of the Beatitudes, the law of the Kingdom of God.

It is therefore to the crowd of the poor, the afflicted, those who hunger for justice, the insulted, the calumniated, the persecuted that Jesus comes to say: "You are the salt of the earth! You are the light of the world».

Such is, in fact, the ideal which Jesus proposes to his disciples and the call that he makes to the People of God as a whole. Such is the vocation of the Church. Such also are the demands of the Gospel for the members of this Church.

Should this be for us a source of self-satisfaction? No, it is the truth when we think of what we are: «See what love the Father has given us, that we should be called children of God; and so we are» (1 Jn 3:1). And Saint Peter affirms: «But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people, that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light» (1 Pt 2:9). The great Pope Saint Leo challenged the faithful in this way on the night of Christmas: «Recognize your dignity, O Christian».

«You are the salt of the earth...» What does this mean? Salt gives flavour to food and preserves it. Salt is precious. When Jesus declares: «You are the salt of the earth: if salt has lost its taste, how shall its saltness be restored?», he means: what you have received makes you precious for the world; nothing can replace what you bring. It is up to you to be the ones here on earth to prevent life from losing its savour.

Brothers and sisters of Réunion, you who give flavour to the world by your faith, I greet you warmly, and express my joy in being with you to honour your first Blessed, Brother Scubilion.

I greet Monsignor Gilbert Aubry, your Bishop, and I offer him my cordial wishes on this anniversary of his episcopal ordination.

I also greet His Eminence, Cardinal Albert Decourtray, President of the Conference of Bishops of France, and His Eminence Cardinal Jean Margéot, President of the Episcopal Conference of the Indian Ocean, as well as my brother bishops.

I address my cordial greetings to the priests and the men and women religious. In particular, I greet Brother John Johnston, Superior General of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, together with the members of the Institute present here; I share their joy and I join with them in their thanksgiving on this day when the great family of Saint Jean-Baptiste De La Salle is again being honoured.

To the civil authorities who have come to this liturgical celebration. I offer my respectful greetings, and I thank them for their presence.

And, once again, greetings to you, dear brothers and sister of Réunion!

2. Today, when the Bishop of Rome comes to see you, I would like, before everything else, to give thanks to the Lord with you for the gift of faith granted to this country. With a free heart you have adhered to the Good News which was offered you. Evangelization has already produced numerous fruits here, and Brother Scubilion is a remarkable witness of the movement towards holiness inaugurated on this island by the first missionaries.

3. It is necessary that each one make the faith received from his ancestors grow within him, by voluntarily rooting it in a parish, in a community, in a neighbourhood team, in a reflection team, in a movement. First of all, the Christian faith must permeate this basic community which is the family. Dear brothers and sisters, may the family be the first sphere of your commitment as baptized, in the firm conviction of the unique and irreplaceable value of the family cell for the development of society and of the Church. Take part in ecclesial activities wherever you are, and consider the deepening of your Christian formation as a priority to which you must dedicate some time. Finally, without limiting your involvement in services which are ecclesial in the strict sense, bring your qualified contribution to the building of a society that is ever more respectful of human dignity, by not being afraid to say «no» to the slavery of material things which could entice you. Be among the authentic elements of civic and moral progress for this island which is yours.

Without imposing your faith, out of respect for others, live «the Christian difference» and let the Catholic imprint appear not only in individual behaviour, but also in the quality of community and collective life: in the family, in business,, in leisure, in politics. There is a manner of being and acting which must influence the structures of society. Do not take refuge in a false humility which would consist in keeping silent about the content of the faith or causing the public expression of it to disappear. Live in conformity with Christian demands, and you will become witnesses of love. With all the others, search for the ways of a human development for everyone, so that the dignity of each person may be recognized.

4. Brother Scubilion bore witness to this care for the dignity of the human person during his years of missionary life. He was born at the end of the 18th century, in metropolitan France, in the present Diocese of Sens-Auxerre which desired to send a delegation here. After entering religious life in the Brothers of the Christian Schools, he offered himself willingly for the apostolate in distant lands, in his desire for a more complete gift of himself. In 1853 he arrived in Réunion and served here until his death.

The love of God and the love of neighbour were inseparable in him. In the eyes of everyone, he shone with a power of love that revealed the God of Love. He was light, as Christ wished it: «You are the light of the world». He allowed himself to be enlightened by Jesus Christ and he enlightened others in the light of Jesus Christ by this example and in particular, by his catechesis among the slaves.

As a good educator, Brother Scubilion loved to catechize. Enthusiastically, he made up delightful catechism lessons. His love for young people and his joviality urged him to take his pupils of Sainte-Marie to explore the Heights of the Ravine-des-Chèvres or the caves of the Trois-Trous; he even attempted to scale Charpentier's Peak with them. These excursions were also pilgrimages: they visited the Church of the Rivière-des-Pluies or Notre Dame de Bel-Air or Notre Dame de Bon-Secours. In the light of the world, Brother helped people to discover the light of the soul, the light of Christ.

5. Brother Scubilion understood and lived the love of neighbour in its evangelical dimension. He knew how to see God's image and likeness in every person. He loved in the way God loved. Following the example of Saint Jean-Baptiste De La Salle, Founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, he showed great tenderness towards those who were entrusted to him. He helped them to have confidence, to forgive one another, to give meaning to their life, to walk in hope; he distinguished himself in the service of the sick, showing great compassion to his brothers and sisters in distress. He practised the charity of which the Apostle Paul made himself the wonderful herald in his Letter to the Corinthians to which we have listened together: «Love is patient and kind; love is not jealous or boastful; it is not arrogant or rude. Love does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice at wrong, but rejoices in the right. Love bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things» (1 Cor 13:4-7).

6. The greatest commandment of the Law is to love God with all one's heart and one's neighbour as oneself. Christ made this law of love his personal commandment. It is the newness of the Gospel, which fulfils and completes the former Law: «Think not that I have come to abolish the Law and the prophets, but to fulfil them» (Mt 5:17). And Jesus continues, praising in advance all educators of the type of Brother Scubilion: «Whoever then relaxes one of the least of these commandments and teaches men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven. But he who does them and teaches them shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven» (Mt 5:19).

7. Dear brothers and sisters, the beatification of Brother Scubilion is like a founding event in the history of your diocesan Church. It emphasises at the same time that this part of the world, this region of the Indian Ocean, your island, has a vocation to raise up examples of holiness for the whole Church. Father Laval in Mauritius, Victoria in Madagascar, and Brother Scubilion in Réunion join hands together to bring your peoples into the community of the children of God; as other great figures of your country also do: Father Monet, «apostle of the Blacks», Father Lavasseur, companion of Libermann, Aimée Pignolet of Fresne, foundress of the Daughters of Mary. You already have a spiritual patrimony which it is important not only to keep but to know well in order to live it and in order that apostles with hearts on fire will always rise up. Accept your history and play a major role in it. While living the Gospel as these great servants of God have done, bring your own culture more and more to life. You will want to be more human in the measure of the love of Jesus Christ for the men and women of Réunion.

8. On your island, you enjoy relative abundance. However, consumerism can turn people away from the true evangelical way of human success. Among you, as in the home country, there are without doubt lifestyles to be changed so as to know the happiness of simple people and preserve the quality of human relations. Moreover, together with many other countries, you are unfortunately experiencing unemployment and you will have to try to reduce it. In the same way that you were able to take up your life again after the hard trial of the cyclone Firinga (28-29 January 1989), I desire that your fraternal solidarity will reach all those who are without work and suggest to you the necessary local initiatives so that all may share in a worthy, responsible development.

9. As for you, dear young people who are listening to me, I know how sensitive you are to success of life in peace. Your heart knows no boundaries and you desire to love. You wish to give yourselves entirely in order to love and be loved. You are right, for without love life does not attain its goal. However, be careful of caricatures of love! Saint Paul has given us today distinctive signs of true love; build your life on this type of love. Let Jesus Christ lead you by the hand. He will not let you go, for he wishes to go with you to the very limit of love. Search for your vocation: to Christian marriage, religious or priestly vocation. Learn to respect yourselves, to sustain one another in order to build a world in which you will bring about the triumph of the values of the praise of God and the service of people, values of tenderness and sharing, of justice and peace, of solidarity and responsibility. Do not be afraid of sacrifices in order to improve yourselves from day to day and make your talents fruitful. The way of perfection, the way of effort, is also the way of joy. Good luck for today and for tomorrow! The Church and the world count on you: become the champions of your future in solidarity.

10. Jesus says to all of you who are here, to you who are listening to me on the radio and television: «You are the light of the world».

Let me say to you in Creole: «Do not remain in the darkness; come to the light. Leave aside what is not good and go straight forward with a good conscience. The sun rises and then it sets: the moon rises and then it sets; but you are the light which is not extinguished».

With your Bishop and all your pastors, continue to build your Church and develop your country, striving to drive off the slaveries which dehumanize existence.

According to the example of Brother Scubilion, learn to become saints. Like him, build your lives on the mystery of the cross, on the lifegiving power of the Eucharist, on devotion to Mary, Queen of the Apostles.

May this very loving Mother protect you and lead you in peace towards her Son Jesus!

To him be honour and glory forever and ever!

(L'Osservatore Romano, May 29th 1989).

SPEECH MADE BY MICHEL ROCARD, THE FRENCH PRIME MINISTER, in the presence of the Holy Father, on May 1st 1989, on his arrival on the Island of Reunion.

Holy Father,

This is the second time in less than a year that I have been called upon in virtue of my position as Head of Government to welcome and greet You Holiness on the territory of the French Republic. For me this is a source of heartfelt joy, as I see this as a sign of the interest and friendship you have for our country. I am pleased also to greet His Eminence Cardinal Casaroli, the Secretary of State, who is with you, and to thank His Eminence Cardinal Decourtray, President of the Bishops' Conference of France, and the Papal Nuncio to France, Monsignor Antonetti, for having made the long journey to meet you here and to accompany you on this apostolic visit.

I am pleased to greet you, Holy Father, in this part of France in the Indian Ocean, the Island of Reunion, whose very name suggests harmony and peace. You will find that the population here is young, enterprising, varied, tolerant, and for most part Catholic.

The visit of Your Holiness to beatify one of the evangelisers of this island, Father Scubilion Rousseau, cannot fail to receive a warm welcome here, accompanied by the fervour and devotion you have already noticed since your arrival at the airport.

Quite apart from any reasons of protocol, the French Government was anxious to be associated with your act of recognition of this son of Burgundy who for 35 years worked for the good and the emancipation of Reunion, and through him, of the Brothers of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

Our country is proud to have given to the world in the XVII century a great benefactor to humanity in the person of John Baptist de La Salle. If he was one of the great educationalists of modern times, because he reformed teaching methodology and replaced individual by group teaching, his great achievement was that he understood the importance of educating the children of the working classes. He involved himself personality in this and in 1682 founded the Brothers of the Christian Schools for this purpose also.

It is thanks to him and to them that the work of combating illiteracy began in pre-1789 France. His approach and his humanitarian concern opened the way for compulsory, free primary education, which successive French governments would subsequently proclaim (for the first time in 1793), and which Jules Ferry would finally introduce in 1881, upholding, as you are well aware, the principle of the freedom to teach, and the non-denominational character of State education.

The Brothers of St. John Baptist de La Salle did not restrict their love of the poor to mainland France. In the space of a short time they had spread throughout the world, and now there are more than 10.000 of them in 80 countries. It is as a part of this missionary work that we find the warm personality of Father Scubilion Rousseau.

This son of France, born, Holy Father, close to the famous historical and spiritual centre of Vezelay, added a new dimension to the wok of the Brothers on this Island of Reunion. As I mentioned earlier on, Brother Scuibilion Rousseau came to the Island in 1833: at the time it was still called Bourbon and was governed as a colony. His role in its history was to be of crucial importance and would break new ground.

In fact, what he wanted to do was to gather on the same school benches in the primary school all children, irrespective of the colour of their skins, or whether they were the children of free people or slaves. This was not done without much opposition. By persevering, however, in his determination to achieve this, and by basing his teaching on the values of the Gospel that set people free, he prepared the slaves for freedom which the Second Empire granted them in 1848, thanks to the efforts of Victor Schoelcher.

The most recent biographer of Brother Scubilion in a book with a preface by Monsignor Gilbert Aubry has pointed out, and I quote: "a surprising and staggering area of common agreement between the atheist mystic, Victor Schoelcher, and the holy Brother Scubilion". The autor goes on to say: "These were two lives devoted to the same cause, completely free of self-interest, and in my view, each one complementing the other in its concern for freedom, on a moral and spiritual plane as well as on that of political freedom. One obtained from the newly proclaimed Republic a decree abolishing slavery, and a declaration in the constitution that slavery could no longer exist in any territory held by France. The other, here, prepared the slaves to take up their responsibilities as free men and citizens, helping them to live through the initial excitement of a new situation as responsible adults". He contributed in this way to the present day situation, which rejects all discrimination between the citizens of this Department, whatever their origins. Victor Schoelcher has his place in our national Pantheon, a fitting tribute to the high regard in which he was held by all. Brother Scubilion lies here on this Island of Reunion to which he devoted his life and where he is held in veneration by everyone. Tomorrow, Holy Father, you will consecrate him as one of the Blessed to be an example for the Catholic faithful throughout the world. This cannot but be a source of rejoicing for France.

In my own name, in the name of the President of the Republic and in that of the French Government, in the name of all the men and women present here, in the name of the people of Reunion, I wish you, a very happy stay on this splendid corner of France in the Indian Ocean, the Island of Reunion.

THE MIRACLE ATTRIBUTED TO BROTHER SCUBILION APPROVED FOR HIS BEATIFICATION

Instantaneous and complete cure of Marie Therese Hoareau of a «serious infection of the wall of the abdomen following a hysterectomy operation due to fibrosis of the uterus, with a clinical gangrenous development, complicated by evisceration, heavy haemorrhaging and hipovelemic shock».

* * *

Marie Therese Losandiere was born on the Island of Reunion on June 10th 1928. She married Claude Hoareau and had seven children. Her medical records show no history of hereditary disease, if one discounts the premature deaths of some brothers and sisters at an early age. Her parents died at an advanced age (her mother was 87 and her father 98).

In 1965, Madame Hoareau had a gynaecological operation, and the operation wound healed perfectly. In 1967, she went for another operation for a slipped disk in her lower back. She was badly overweight and suffered a little from blood pressure: she had been suffering recently from various ailments: loss of appetite, constipation, pains in her right iliac fossa, metrorrhagia and leucorrhoea.

When she went for an X-ray and a gynaecological check-up, it was discovered she had an enormous uterine fibroma which had to be operated upon. She went into hospital on October 20th 1975 at the Clinique de la Pointe, and was operated upon by the chief surgeon, Marc Zourgane. A complete hysterectomy posed no problems and the post-operative stage was normal.

However, on the sixth day. October 26th, her temperature rose to 40° as a result of infection which grew worse in the days that followed. Doctor Zourgane discovered the cause to be gangrene. He began treating it with sulphamides, antibiotics and cortisone. He operated on her again to drain and clean the infected area. In spite of all this and blood transfusions, her condition did not improve.

On the contrary, on November 1st, at one o'clock in the afternoon, there was a heavy external haemorrhage, followed by a massive cardio-vascular collapse, which destroyed any hopes of recovery. Doctor Zourgane informed her husband. Transfused blood was ejected through the tubes serving to drain off purulent discharges from the abdominal cavity.

* * *

Another patient in the clinic, a certain Madame M. J. Buichard, seeing the terrible state of Madame Hoareau, went up to her on October 30th and suggested she invoke the help of the Servant of God, Brother Scubilion, and she left her a holy picture of him with a relic.

It was on the evening of November 1st, when the state of the patient was beyond hope of recovery, that her husband who was beside her, took the picture of Brother Scubilion into his hands and filled with confidence asked him to cure his wife.

After a short while, an obvious and spectacular change took place in the patient and her condition improved. After two or three hours, her condition had returned to normal and the danger of death had disappeared.

The doctors could not believe what they saw. They decided to keep Madame Hoareau in hospital for examination for a month, and on December 2nd 1975, they allowed her to go home completely recovered. As far as the doctors are concerned, what happened on November 1st could not be explained and still cannot be in the light of our present knowledge of science.

This miracle was approved on June 1st 1987 and was used for the beatification of Brother Scubilion.

MIRACLE ATTRIBUTED TO BLESSED BROTHER MUTIEN MARIE APPROVED FOR HIS CANONISATION

This miracle which was accepted by the Church for the canonisation of Blessed Brother Mutien Marie took place on February 22nd 1977 in Malonne, Belgium. The person cured was Brother Madir.

Brother Madir, whose secular name was Franz Verstraelen, was born in 1900. As early as 1929, he had a cholecystitis which had been treated by cholecystectomy. In 1930, he had to go back to hospital for a local operation for costal osteitis, the result of a previous operation.

However, the first symptoms of the illness which was cured miraculously go back to 1969, when he suffered a fracture of his spine which was thought to be simply lumbago. Subsequently, X-rays at the time showed that the second lumbar vertebra was also affected.

His pathological state grew worse. X-rays taken on December 21st 1970 showed fractures also in the 12th dorsal vertebra and the 3rd lumbar vertebra. The condition grew worse and Brother Madir had such pain in his back that he had to be put into plaster and lie still.

On January 4th 1971, a fracture was discovered in the 9th dorsal vertebra, and on June 1st of the same year, on the 10th and 11th dorsal vertebrae. Neither medicines nor physiotheraphy proved to be of any help.

When he was in Anvers in 1976, he suffered another fracture, this time in the neck of the right femur.

A medical examination on January 13th 1977 confirmed the existence of extensive and generalised senile dorso-lumbar osteoporosis. The patient was in great pain and could walk only with the help of two sticks or crutches.

On November 13th 1976, the decree was published approving the miracle of Brother Mutien Marie for his beatification. The next step was to officially identify his remains, and this ceremony was due to take place on February 22nd 1977.

Brother Madir, who had been infirmarian at Malonne, asked to be allowed to help with the ceremony. Both the doctors and the superiors agreed to his request, knowing full well that he could not give much help with the ceremony, since if he let go of his stick he would fall down. Brother Madir, however, was confident that Brother Mutien could cure him.

At one point during the process of identification of the remains of the Servant of God, Brother Madir began to help the doctors and the other people present. To do this he needed to use both hands and so had to let go of the stick he needed to support himself. By the end of the ceremony he no longer needed either sticks or crutches. And this continued to be the case as long as he lived. He died on May 7th 1986 of a pulmonary oedema.

There still exist numerous photos of the ceremony. In the first few one can see Brother Madir leaning on his stick as usual and forced to do so by his illness. In the others he can be seen without any support at all.

* * *

Henri Podor, one of those present at the ceremony, gives the following testimony: «... on February 22nd 1977, as the one in charge of the staff at the Institute, I was called to take part in the opening of the grave and coffin, having first sworn an oath in the presence of a number of dignitaries. Just then, Brother Madir comes into the parlour, leaning as usual on his crutch. We open the coffin: at that point the doctors come forward, as does Brother Madir who puts the crutch aside in order to help. When all was finished you can imagine my surprise on seeing Brother Madir walking now without any support. He said to me: "I think Brother Mutien Marie has granted me a great favour"».

Numerous other persons who were present at the ceremony or who had lived with the Brother before and after the cure gave similar testimonies.

In the official process of the Cause, the miracle is described as follows: «Instantaneous and complete clinical cure, with the disappearance of painful symptoms and the recovery of the ability to walk normal for his age, from a serious form of senile osteoporosis, accompanied by multiple and repeated fractures, a serious pain syndrome and serious functional locomotor disability.»

THE «CATHOLICITY» OF THE SCHOOL

Educators, I feel, often make professions of faith to themselves. They develop a belief that there is a certain way to do things in order to bring about the best results. It is a conscience of craft which tells the teacher when he/she is doing mediocre work and when he/she is nearing perfection.

I am now ready to proclaim another profession of faith and this one concerns the nature of a Catholic school. I am speaking of the «Catholicity» of the school and not the more generic characteristics such as «religious» school, «Christian» school, or «nonpublic» school.

The Catholicity of a school must be rooted in three specific areas of school life this profession of faith tells me. (A) The Religion teachers and their influence on the school. (B) The Faculty and part that each one plays as a Catholic role model. (C) The School Environment, including school culture, activities, rituals, and facilities.

* * *

(A) RELIGION TEACHERS. «THE MISSIONARIES TO A TEENAGE CULTURE»

The religion teacher is the key, the vital component, if the educational goals of the schools are to be achieved. But the effectiviness of religious instruction is closely tied to the personal witness given by the teacher. This witness brings content to the lessons of life.

Students need to recognize authentic, human qualities in their teachers. They are teachers of the faith; however, like Christ, they must also be teachers of what it means to be human. This includes culture, but it also includes such things as affection, judgment, patience in listening to others, prudence in response, and finally availability for personal meetings and conversations with students. (1)

ACTION PLAN FOR RELIGION TEACHERS

(1) Meet as a department to discuss, but only after each has read, «The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School.» This paper, released for publication in June, 1988, was written by the Vatican Congregation for Catholic Education. This is a basic document for teachers of Religion. (See endnote #1).

(2) Build up a department resource center – tapes, books, current readings. I suggest that each teacher have a personal copy of : Missionaries To A Teenage Culture, and Teaching Religion in Catholic Schools, Theory and Practice, both by Marisa Crawford and Grahm Rossiter. St. Mary's Press Publications.

* * *

(B) THE FACULTY – «THE CREATORS OF SPIRITUAL ENERGY»

It was a Hindu leader, Mahatma Gandhi, who believed that teachers educate themselves not to be separate from their students but to become one with them. He realized that the students' best textbook is the life of the teacher and that the student will never learn to seek harmony, appreciate beauty, and desire spiritual energy unless he/she sees these exemplified in the lives of his/her teachers. (2)

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

ACTION PLAN FOR ALL TEACHERS

(1) Study the enclosed Opinionnaire and give it your best effort. These data will be helpful in planning the forms of support that may be needed by our faculties. We often speak of our teachers' responsibilities – now we are asking how the school may be of help to teachers to carry out these responsibilities.

(2) Review your own subject content. In checking to see if your lessons are really part of Gospel territory, note if you have an interdisciplinary dimension to your work, if multicultural concerns are addressed and if global issues are discussed, and if the students become familiar with Catholic social justice teachings.

* * *

(C) SCHOOL ENVIRONMENT – FACILITIES, RITUALS, ACTIVITIES

Airports have chapels. The US Congress begins its sessions with a prayer. Public schools have service clubs. Companies treat clientele cordially. All of these are nonsectarian in approach. Yet, sometimes it is heard that prayer, service, respect, and a place to worship help to make our schools «Catholic.»

ACTION PLAN FOR ADMINISTRATORS AND CAMPUS MINISTER

(1) Students are evaluated daily. Teachers are evaluated regularly. Curriculum is evaluated periodically. When was the last time that the «periphery» was evaluated? Each school should review its activities, its school symbols, and the values that it celebrates to see if these fit into the Catholic environment. This could be interesting work, even if the only immediate outcome was that the words of the «Old Testament School Fight Song» are tempered. Maybe even the school's Yearbook will become a more authentic diary of life in a Catholic school!

A NEW SCHOOL YEAR

An article in the Education Section of the Sunday, June 12, 1988 Providence Journal excited my imagination. The article is by Edward B. Fiske of the New York Times. With today's attention to and scrutiny of teachers and schools I am sensitive to both criticism as well as assistance.

I wrote this essay after reading the article, then I let it sit in my desk since late June. After the retreat this past summer on our new Rule and after many experiences with study, teachers and students, I have taken it out, made some adjustments and now present it for your thoughts and stimulation.

The article details the research going on into successful methods used by teachers and the different learning capabilities of students. The teacher who does not stick adamantly to the same method – if it is not working – is praised. Of course we are dealing with the challenge of the classroom, the challenge from the student, the challenge of the day-to-day "business" of teaching. This "business" forces us, not only in the classroom, but wherever and whenever we attempt to put our vocation, our apostolate into effect, to adapt our methodology and message.

Fiske opens his article by stating that most teachers have only «one arrow in their quiver.» If the arrow doesn't «stick» in certain students then those students are blamed for the failure of the school. Possibly, Fiske says, the «teacher was not teaching the best way for that child.» The teacher should have shot a second arrow, or discarded the quiver altogether and used some other arsenal.

John Dewey, says Fiske, was of the first to recognize that students learn in different ways. Research is progressing on ways of learning:

To activate our usage of various devices, to encourage us to go to our bags of tricks, to force us to look for various schemes and methods we also yield to the students' responses to them through our knowledge of them. John Dewey may have been a proponent of different learning capabilities, but I can't help thinking of the Founder's very penetrating passage in his meditation for «Good Shepherd Sunday,» the former Second Sunday of Easter:

«Jesus compares those who have the care of souls to a good shepherd who is careful of his sheep. One of the qualities which Our Lord says distinguishes him is that he knows them all individually. This is also one of the essential qualities of those who instruct others, for they must get to know their pupils, and discern the manner in which to act towards them. Some require great mildness, while others need to be directed with firmness. Some require much patience; others need to be goaded on. It is necessary to punish and reprehend some, in order to correct their defects, whereas others need to be continually watched lest they should wander and perish. This varied conduct must depend upon knowledge and discernment of character, and this grace you must beg of God most earnestly as being one of the most essential for you in the direction of those over whom you have charge.» (Pg. 115, De La Salle Meditations, Longmans, 1953).

In his comment upon this meditation, Battersby gives this wise comment:

«...It is clear that although he (De La Salle) adopted the simultaneous method... he nevertheless realized full well the drawbacks inherent in it, namely, that the individual may be obliterated in the mass, and he recognized that the only true education is individual. Thus this Meditation... is a remarkable effort to attenuate the evils of the class system of teaching by inducing the teacher to give as much individual attention to his pupils as is possible.» (pp. 116-117).

Reading over these passages again, and reflecting upon the Management of Schools I find it hard not to feel "Our Founder said it all," or that "We (Brothers) knew that all the time." I continue that by asking myself how I put these ideas into my own dealings with students – if indeed I do accept them! Obviously the Founder is speaking from a spiritual point of view, but aren't the problems of education ultimately of the spirit and spiritual?

Whether or not the Founder "had it all," he was on to something.

Look at the organization of the schools according to the Management and the concern for many and various methods and procedures in the classroom. In the furor today over the graduation of students who are poor readers yet are routinely promoted because they should "stay with their class," or simply that the system cannot do anything for them, I recall one of my early impressions from the history of our Institute, namely that a student would not be promoted until he had mastered the material for that level or was otherwise ready. Of course monitors assisted in dealing with individuals. We still use them but call them tutors today.

Getting back to somewhat of the Founder's implications, I think that other than the methods we actually use at whatever level or in whatever arena of education we are engaged, we all make it a point to get to know our students. In that actual process we all have a variety of approaches depending upon our students' response to us from day to day. More informally we try to talk to our students whenever or wherever we see them, call them by name, show interest in and support of their talents, their activities, their pursuits, other likes and dislikes. Nowadays, particularly, we try to know their home and family situation which has such a bearing upon their performance and well-being.

Summarizing this is a passage from General Introduction to the Management, a St. Mary's College Press publication of 1965. From Chapter IV on "Motivation" on pages 25-26 we read:

«The teacher, if he is to be successful in motivating his students to fruitful activity, must be vividly aware of the needs and desires of human beings in general. But more specifically, he must have a definite appreciation of the attitudes existing in the group before him. For this purpose, he has to be well aware of the type of home from which these students come, the social strata in which they live, the type of environment which conditions their thinking and acting. We should, likewise, know as much as possible about the individual students, their temperaments, mental and physical characteristics, problems, interests and aspirations. Such knowledge is essential to any realistic effort to lead students to higher levels of motivation.»

This is a great task for an educator, but history, research and our own experience tell us that this must be part of our very being. Whether or not we use all the devices put at our disposal critics countered that the system discourages us. A researcher, William Rioux, quoted by Fiske in his article, observes:

«Students have to be batch processed. If you are alone in a classroom with 30 kids, how do you figure at five different experiences for every lesson? Teachers have to cover a certain amount of material. So you can't pause to help students who aren't keeping up.»

A school or classroom with a diversity of learning styles going on would be a busy place, seemingly disoriented, and noisy. Peoples' image of what a school should be would be shattered. People don't like their images being shattered.

Possibly the subjects in which a student is proficient are those not always offered or highlighted in some of our schools, for example the Fine and Performing Arts. Often a student can express himself/herself non-verbally, by manipulation of color, of movement, of sound, or of some material. The eyes, the voice, the hands, the ears, the limbs are important in the complete person. All learning may not be book learning, nor is all learning done by the head.

Not only may some teachers fail using less effective or only one or two methods, but our systems may be less effective by our having only one or two views of what education is. In today's world of patent success, of heady achievement, of preconceived notions of "the man or woman of the 21st Century" we may be forgetting the total human organism which is composed of limbs that move, voices that sing, eyes that see, hands that mold, and hearts and feelings which operate without words or calculations.

It is frustrating to realize "I don't have it made" regarding teaching. On the other hand, it is exciting to look for ways and means in the midst of students and the events of each day.

PRAYERS

OF A CHRISTIAN TEACHER

THE CHRISTIAN TEACHER

Being a Christian teacher does not consist so much in winning over the complete trust of the pupils as in making them discover ways of being themselves.

Being a Christian teacher means leading a pupil to know himself and discover his role in society and in the Church.

Being a Christian teacher is a gift from God, a marvellous choice on the part of the Father; but it also means searching and striving: it is a dialogue; it is an undertaking which is forever new and forever old.

Being a Christian teacher is to make God the prime mover in a life which is prepared to make a new start: each person receives a unique plan as a free gift. A teacher accompanies a person on his journey without taking his place nor substituting himself for him.

John Baptist de La Salle experienced what it means to be a teacher and a teacher of Christian teachers. The process was a slow and painful one: it brought him into opposition with his family, society, various members of the clergy, and it ended on his own Golgotha.

Towards the end of his life, he gathered all his theological and pastoral teaching intended for Christian teachers in a work called "meditations for the time of retreat".

The present article attempts to present the same teaching but in the form of prayers.

The Christian teacher who bases his life on God will find light and guidance here for his work.

TEACHERS, WITNESSES, MESSENGERS...

Lord our God,
You created man
And you wish us all to know the Truth,
The Truth that is you,
Revealed by Jesus, announced by the Apostles, and proclamed by the Church.

Lord, you wish
All human minds
To be enlightened by the light of faith.
How can they believe
If they have never heard anyone speak of You?
How can they hear about You
If there is no one to speak of You?
Send preachers and teachers to announce your Word.

Lord,
You spread your goodness
Through the ministry of men;
You have made the light shine
In the midst of darkness;
You enlighten the hearts
Of those you choose to be teachers of children,
So that they can share your glory with them.

Lord,
You who entrusted to us
The ministry of Christian education,
Enlighten us so that we announce your Word
And not our own;
So that we make known your Truth
And not out own,
For we are your ministers
And the dispensers of your mysteries.

You are a marvellous Father
And you wish children and young people
To come to know and live their faith in Jesus;
When parents, through ignorance,
Through business worries,
Neglect their work as educators...
You send Christian teachers
To share your Truth.

Enlighten us, Lord,
So that guided by the example of Jesus,
We may lay the firm foundations
Of faith and piety
In the hearts of children.

You have chosen us, Lord,
To instruct, to teach, to exhort,
And to touch the hearts and wills of pupils
So that they follow Jesus.
Help us to complement,

As brothers and friends,
The educational work of parents.

Lord, you wish all men
To know the Truth
And to be saved.
To bring this about, You continue
To send Christian teachers
To accomplish this mission among children.

You, Lord, are the ploughman
Working in the field.
You, Lord, are the architect
Building the house.
We are your gardeners and your masons
Whenever we proclaim your Gospel,
Whenever we share your Truth.

Thank you, Lord,
For calling us to announce
The Gospel message that never grows old
To young children,
And so helping them to find salvation.
With simple words,
We wish to teach them about the crucified Jesus,
The source of salvation.

We, Lord, only sow,
But You, Lord,
Make the seed sprout,
And make the plant grow
And bear fruit.
Our mission,
Is to teach with simple words.
That is why, Lord, we beg you
To teach us to be good teachers
And to help us to be your witnesses.

FATHER, BROTHER, FRIEND

The mission of the Christian teacher
Is to work with parents
To educate their children:
Some parents want to help but cannot:
Others could but don't want to:
They are too lazy, not interested,
Selfish, don't see why...

Lord,
We wish to be the parents of those who have none,
The elder brothers and sisters of those Who are alone,
The true friends of those who
Have no one to guide them,
And teachers for all.

Lord,
Bad habits acquired
In childhood and youth
Are difficult to correct.

And You, Lord?
You inspired and urged John Baptist de La Salle
To found the Christian Schools;
We, Christian teachers,
Wish to continue teaching knowledge and religion.

Thank you, Lord,
For wanting to continue your work of salvation
Through our work in schools;
To teach selflessly is a path to salvation.
On completing our mission,
We say: "Thank you, Lord".
To be a Christian teacher,
Is to educate the whole person;
It is to teach in the spirit of Christianity;
It is to strengthen the will to do good.

Lord,
We wish to consecrate our whole life
To the education of children and young people;
We wish to inspire piety
By example and by word.
For all the times we have failed,
For all the times selfishness overcame us,
For all the times we were impatient,
Forgive us, Lord.

Not to make a distinction
Between work in school and saving our souls,
Is to be a good professional teacher
And a living witness to Jesus of Nazareth.
To integrate faith with culture,
And faith with life, is to be a Christian teacher.
"Faith without works is dead".
"All knowledge, all faith, are nothing without charity".

Lord,
Give us the strength to teach the truths of the Gospel.
Help us to be other Christs,
For children and young people
Need teachers who are also witnesses.

Lord,
Enlighten the minds of children and young people;
Move their will
So that they discover you
And respond to you with generosity.

Lord,
We offer you our words,
We offer you our life,
Do your work through us, Lord.

A RELIGIOUS AND A EDUCATOR: TO LEAD THE YOUNG INTO A WARMER AND A GENTLER WORLD

On my desk is a quotation that goes like this: «If you really asked me why I do what I do, the answer I would give is that I do what I do for God. But sometimes, God has a kid's face» (Rev. Bruce Ritter, OFM). If I may, I would like to share a few of those faces with you as a way of explaining what it means for me to be a De La Salle Christian Brother.

*

The first of thse faces is Donna's. She was sixteen when I taught her English. She was intelligent and attractive, and she was dating a thirty-five year old divorcee. I was anxious and afraid that I would fail to get through to her, and I still recall how overwhelmingly relieved and grateful she was to be helped out of the destructive web in which she was entangled. Some three hundred years ago, Saint John Baptist de La Salle wrote of pa-rents (especially working class and poor parents) who were caught up in the religious confusion of their Age and were so preoccupied with «the constant concern of earning the necessities of life» that they were in need of assistance (MTR 1.2); and he wrote of children too frequently left on their own and so being formed primarily through «the bad example of companions they meet while wandering the streets» (MTR 2.1). Divorce and the disintegration of authority, conflict and dissent within our Church, nuclear proliferation and substance abuse, and a reckless acquisition of possessions, pursuit of pleasure, and preoccupation with the self mark our present Age. In these troubled times of ours, it has been my experience that many parents (some of them single parents like Donna's mother) still continue to seek the assistance of religious Brothers in the education and the formation of their children. Because they care, they entrust their children to us in the hope that we can help them in the awesome responsibility which is theirs as parents.

*

It was on a college retreat that I met Ron. He was nineteen. Like so many of the fine young people today, he is an «impossible dreamer.» A peace activist, a soup kitchen volunteer, a simple man of obvious goodness... Over the years in which I have known him, we have worked together; and we have recreated together. After he became a Brother five years ago, we lived together in Community. Of the things that I have been able to help him with, I am most proud of having helped teach him how to pray. For me, that is at the heart of what it means to be a Brother. Saint John Baptist de La Salle urged our first Brothers to really commit themselves to meriting the esteem and the care of the young people with whom they worked. And once they care for you, he wrote, use the love that they have for you to lead them to God (MSF 115.3). Remember..., he wrote, you are God's ambassadors... God's ministers... (MTR 3.2). It seems to me that this is a vocation not so different from that of parents. We use love that they have for us to bring them to God.

Now I know that the word miracle conjures up, for many of us, images of walking on water and multiplying bread. But, I ask you, is it any less of a miracle to help youg people know that they are both loved by God AND good? Is it any less of a miracle to help a young person grow in self-knowledge, self-discipline, and self-worth?

The final face I would like to share with you is that of Adam, a former student, who wrote me recently of realizing that while in school he «was untouchable and rather comfortable with that. I was smart, and I was a track star, and I was wild: but I wasn't deep at all. I was well-liked by others, but I couldn't like myself.» He wrote to thank me for not giving up on him. He said: «And then you entered my life and convinced me that I was good. At first, I thought that if I didn't respond to you you'd leave me alone. But you didn't give up on me... You... led me into a warmer and gentler world. I say this from my heart... Whenever someone tells me how good I am, I thank you.» And I suggest to you that this is the miracle that we Brothers hope to help perform in the lives of young people. We hope to be able to assist the Bishops of our Church and parents of children lead the young people of our society into a warmer and a gentler world. We remain committed to this work in the schools because it is our experience that the need for this ministry in the Church continues to be very great.

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (1)

1 - KEY CONCEPTS TO BEAR IN MIND WHEN READING THE LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (1)

1. THE NOVELTY OF THE LETTER

> «We are aware that we are participating in a new historical fact in the Institute and which is going to identify us as "the Body of the Society", as "the Lasallian Family".» (Circular 422, p. 19)

We should stress first of all the fact that this is the first time an important document drawn up by the superiors in Rome is addressed at the same time to the Brothers and to the lay people who, throughout the world, work in Brothers' schools or are in contact with them.

The Letter is addressed to the Brothers as the "principal heirs of Lasallian spirituality" since the Brothers are "the mainstay of the Lasallian experience." (Circular 422, p. 13)

There are consequently important conclusions to be drawn from this:
- There is a challenge to be true sons of St. La Salle: after all, "noblesse oblige!"
- There is a moral obligation to offer guidance to Lasallian movements and associations.

The Letter is addressed to lay people, whether associated or not, who, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of St. La Salle, pursue their commitment to the Lasallian educational apostolate and contribute to its vitality.

Secondly, the Letter was written at the formal request of the 41st General Chapter of 1986. This request is contained in Proposition 6:

«That Brother Superior General and his Council address our lay teachers and the Lasallian Family by means of a Declaration or Circular Letter, expressing all that they envision for the present and future of our Educational Ministry.» (Circular 422, p. 14)

> «The Brothers as members of the Church live in this world and are necessarily sensitive to the problems which arise in each successive period of human history. They experience the same desires and anxieties as the rest of men. It is important for them to recognise that the signs of the times stress the urgency of their mission in the world today, the necessity to renew their religious life, their apostolic ministry, their presence among men.» (Declaration 8, 1)

2. KEY CONCEPTS TO BEAR IN MIND ON READING THE LETTER

> «The Lasallian Family... is a new phenomenon that over these past decades has been developing in the Institute with ever increasing strength and creativity.» (Message of the 41st General Chapter to the members of the Lasallian Family)

1st CONCEPT: HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

First of all, the Letter to the Lasallian Family must be read in its historical context.

Just like the Church, the Institute also has become more and more aware over the past few years of the crucial role of lay people in the life and apostolic mission of Lasallian establishments.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

We have moved on from a situation in which "we considered ourselves as the proprietors of our work and mission" (Circular 422, p. 13) to one in which a great many lay people share our educational apostolate and make a considerable contribution towards the vitality of our work in the Church. «There has, therefore, been a considerable evolution from the not too distant past when we had to employ lay people because of the difficulties of the times and considered them simply as auxiliaries.» (Circular 415, p. 24)

As far back as 1975, Brother Charles Henry had already spoken about the Lasallian Family, in the prophetic way that characterised some of his utterances, and in the same terms as we use nowadays: «We are becoming more and more aware of the importance and necessity of joining forces –Brothers, former students, parents and young people– and forming a Lasallian family. This family group which is very close to our heart springs from something that is equally close – the Christian school which has such great potential and is so rich in possibilities.» (Speech to the Italian Lasallian Congress, Bolsena, September 15th 1975).

Brother Pablo Basterrechea, when he was Vicar General, spoke in the same vein and went into greater detail about the Lasallian Family: he considered the various groups of Lasallian lay people «as being very closely associated with the Institute of the Brothers, sharing the same apostolate and the same love, and inspired by the same hero. This close association does not blur the distinction between different charisms and vocations; but it integrates these dynamic elements in a single apostolate, which is perceived and pursued in common.» (Speech to Spanish Lasallians, Valencia, December 8th 1975)

The 40th General Chapter had the following to say in its Proposition 6 on the Mission of the Institute: «The Brothers will share their Lasallian spirituality and the leadership of their works with all the members of the educational community. They will be concerned with the continuing formation of those persons and will make them aware of the different degrees of belonging to what is called the Lasallian family.» (Circular 403, p. 76)

In 1981, the Visitors who were taking part in the intercapitular meeting examined the question of "openness to lay people". At the outset they stated that «the increasing number of lay people working with us in schools is a sign of the times which the Brothers must be able to interpret.» (Circular 415, p. 23) (Our italics)

They were careful to point out also that «the very nature of our work makes us one of the groups in the Church which has most to do with laymen and that in anything but a superficial way, since we have to form an educational community and even, given the right conditions, a faith community... We are called upon to fulfil a new role, that of sharing our spirituality with lay people whom we look on as our equals.» (Circular 415, p. 24)

Finally, between December 28th and 30th 1985, there met in Rome the Combined Institute and Lasallian Family Commission. The commission included 6 Brothers and 6 laymen, and Brother Patrice Marey, General Councillor, was chairman. They drew up a report for the 41st General Chapter. The document had the following to say about the importance of the lay movement in the Church of today: «This movement should not be thought of as a threat or as competition with regard to the work of the Brothers. It should rather be looked upon as a grace from God, whose historical importance and significance we have to learn to understand: it is for us a sign of the times.» (Document, p. 9)

2nd CONCEPT: THE CALL TO CONVERSION

The Letter must be read also in the same spirit as that which characterised the 41st General Chapter of the Institute, a spirit that can be summarised in two words: conversion and renewal.

The Chapter called upon the Brothers, in terms I would call moving, to become converted, that is to say, to undergo a profound and serious spiritual transformation, a radical change of heart and to breathe new life into our apostolate.

That is why when we read, study or meditate on the Letter, we should constantly bear in mind the Pastoral Letter of Brother John Johnston, Superior General, written on January 1st 1987, and especially pages 11 to 32.

Let us quote for the moment just the following paragraphs which offer a good summary of the wishes of the General Chapter:

> «Now is the time, we believe, to state loudly and clearly, that the Lord calls us, as Brothers of the Christian Schools, to live a life in the Spirit which is genuine, profound and focussed on our mission. That call is addressed to every single one of us.» (Message of the Chapter to the Brothers, p. 21)
>
> «The Message calls us to BE Brothers of the Christian Schools in and in relation to this world. It calls us to let go of whatever is holding us back and to follow Christ without reserve and without looking back.» (Pastoral Letter 1987, p. 15)

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (2)

1 - KEY CONCEPTS TO BEAR IN MIND WHEN READING THE LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (2)

3rd CONCEPT: ECCLESIAL COMMUNION

We have to read the Letter also from the point of view of a renewed Church as revealed to us by Vatican II. It is not an ecclesiology based on authority or hierarchical power, that is, on the superiority of certain members of the Church vis-a-vis others. On the contrary, it is an ecclesial communion, based on the service and participation of all the members of the People of God. (Cf. Lumen Gentium, Chapter 2 especially, and Christifideles Laici, No. 18-22)

The following words of John Paul II explain clearly what is meant:

> «Ecclesial communion is more precisely likened to an "organic" communion, analogous to that of a living and functioning body. In fact, at one and the same time it is characterised by a diversity and a complementarity of vocations and states in life, of ministries, of charisms and responsibilities.» (Christifideles Laici,. No. 20, p. 51)

And so, the Lasallian Familly is characterised by communion and sharing. In it there come together in the charity of Christ and by virtue of the charism of the Founder «all the inspiration in the educational approach and spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle.» (Letter, p. 6)

And so, «Our common source of inspiration and strength is felt ever more clearly and strongly to be St. John Baptist de La Salle. As Lasallians we are his disciples. As his disciples we form one educational and spiritual family.» (Letter, p. 6)

4th CONCEPT: THE DECISIVE ROLE OF THE LAITY IN THE CHURCH

For some years now, the Church's thinking about the decisive role of the laity in the life and mission of the Church has been fortunately gradually evolving. There exist some excellent theological works from both before and after the Council, as well as documents prepared by the Magisterium of the Church, reports on the Congress on the apostolate of the laity at a variety of levels, and so on. The document, however, which completes this process of evolution is the post-synodal Apostolic Exhortation Christifideles Laici by Pope John Paul II.

I think it is absolutely necessary to understand this long document if one wants to really benefit from reading our Letter. Moreover, not to understand this present trend in the Church is to deprive the Letter to the Lasallian Family of its value as a call to action. The Pope's Exhortation quotes a speech by Pius XII which sees into the future and which we should bear in mind:

> «The faithful, more precisely the lay faithful, find themselves on the front lines of the Church's life; for them the Church is the animating principle for human society. Therefore, they in particular, ought to have an ever-clearer consciousness not only of belonging to the Church, but of being the Church, that is to say, the community of the faithful on earth under the leadership of the Pope, the head of all, and of the bishops in communion with him. These are the Church.» (Christifideles Laici, No. 9, p. 23)

The members of the 1986 Chapter were obviously thinking along the same lines when they wrote: «We are not indifferent to those many men and women who, in one way or another, claim a share in the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle, and who wish to be more intimately involved in our ministry and heritage... We want to work together with them so that, through our works, there may be a greater participation of the laity in the mission of the Church.» (Message of the 41st General Chapter to all the Brothers of the Institute, p. 27)

This "insistent call" made by the members of the Chapter is enshrined in our Rule (article 17) which reads as follows: «Ever since the time of their foundation, the Brothers have contributed to the promotion of the Christian laity, especially among those educators who want their professional work to be a form of Gospel ministry. The Brothers gladly associate lay persons with them in their educational mission. They provide for those who so desire, the means to learn about the Founder and to live according to his spirit.»

And so the Letter to the Lasallian Family presents a great challenge to the Brothers: they are called to share their Lasallian identity with others so as to bring about a marvellous expansion of their educational ministry.

5th CONCEPT: THE CALL FOR A NEW EVANGELISATION

It seems we are faced with a new kind of world, for which there are no precedents. But who could have failed to be impressed by the constant and insistent calls of John Paul II in all his speeches and interviews for a new evangelisation in the Church?

We include, from among many others, two examples of such calls:

> «Yes, there faces us now the gigantic task of evangelising the modern world, a world with a new set of definitions. The world has moved into an era of tremendous upheavals, due to the mind-shattering inventiveness of modern man. Unless he manages to integrate what he has created into an ethical and spiritual framework, what he has produced will destroy him. We have moved into a new phase of human culture which offers Christians a tremendous challenge.» (Speech to the Pontifical Council for Culture, January 13th 1986)
> In many places in our modern world, the biggest problem is not that of preaching the Gospel to those who have never heard it, as the Apostles had to. Nowadays it is the problem of preaching it to those who have heard it already, but who no longer respond to it.» (Homily at a Mass in Sydney, Australia, November 26th 1986)

The Letter to the Lasallian Family invites us (and points out practical ways of doing so) to direct our efforts towards a new evangelisation of young people and adults, and gives us as a target date the beginning of the third Christian millenium. The members of the 1986 Chapter were very conscious of the enormous challange that faced the Institute and said: «At times we have the feeling that all must being again, so numerous and pressing and new are the needs of our world and our Churches.» (Message to the Lasallian Family, p. 33)

The only way in which we will be able to respond to the Pope's call for a new evangelisation will be by an intelligent and fresh approach in cooperation with all the lay people who work with us. This is how John Paul II ends Christifideles Laici:

> «A great venture, both challenging and wonderful, is entrusted to the Church – that of re-evangelisation, which is so much needed by the present world. The lay faithful ought to regard themselves as an active and responsible part of this venture, called as they are to proclaim and to live the Gospel in service to the person and to society while respecting the totality of the values and needs of both.» (No. 64, p. 192)

QUESTIONNAIRE FOR STUDY GROUPS

Our intention in this first article (two sections) was to introduce some key concepts to help in the reading of the Letter to the Lasallian Family. Bearing these concepts in mind helps to understand the message of the Letter. The message is spread over quite a long text: our study scheme is intended to help the reader to grasp the message more easily.

1. Have you found anything new in the Letter which strikes you with regard to your identity as a Brother and about your community. If so, what questions has it raised?
2. When you think about the school where you work, what specific things or situations could justify your calling it a place where there is communion and sharing? What could be done to move in that direction.
3. What difficulties have you encountered as a result of the call to conversion made by the 41st General Chapter? What could you do on a personal, community or group level to promote its implementation?
4. Does the Letter suggest to you the need to make certain changes in your relations with others in your school or in your group?

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (3)

2 - AT THIS PARTICULAR MOMENT IN HISTORY

1. THE END OF THE 20th CENTURY

> «St. John Baptist de La Salle and his first disciples were acutely aware of the social problems of their times. Struck by the educational needs of the society around them, their response was to found schools» (Letter, p. 8).

In many parts of the world today, one gets the impression that one world is coming to an end and another is being born. That is why our is an age that is full of great contradictions and of changes in social structures with all the confusion and ambiguity that this implies. It is an age that has its share of discouragement and pessimism.

Each period of history has offered its own challenge to the People of God, and the last few years of the second millenium are no exception.

In his recent speeches, John Paul II has called upon us to take a serious look at the situation of present day society. If we glance through his numerous declarations we will find the following statements which paint a somewhat grim picture of the world in which we live:

> «We are faced with:
> – growing secularisation which seeks to exclude God and religious truths from human affairs;
> – threatening relativism which undermines the absolute truth of Christ and the truths of faith, with the result that believers are tempted to think the latter are merely a collection of beliefs and choices among many others;
> – the materialistic mentality of consumerism which makes superficial promises that are attractive but hollow, and provides material well-being while creating an interior void;
> – seductive hedonism which offers a whole panoply of pleasures none of which can ever satisfy the human heart.»
> (Speech to the representatives of the Catholic Laity of the United Satates, San Francisco, September 18th 1987)

> «The influence of secularisation resulting from well-being and religious indifference is on the increase also among you, in the life of individuals, in family life and especially in public life. Faith has lost its power in the concrete circunstances of everyday life.» (Allocution to the Austrian Bishops, June 24th 1988).

> «In your region, as in other places, the faith of many Christians has reached crisis point; and many have ended up by adapting their ways to lifestyles that have little to do with the Gospel. An awareness of this should not lead, however, to surrender to discouragement or pessimism. It should rather encourge Church organisations to bestir themselves to take all legitimate means and generously renew their commitment to a new evangelisation.» (To the faithful of Bovino, Italy, May 25th 1987)

2. THE OTHER SIDE OF THE MEDAL

> «It is noticeable that many teachers these days share the spiritual ideals, aims and educational approach of De La Salle». (Letter, p. 8)

By contrast with the picture we have just painted, which to some may have seemed rather gloomy, we have found in all parts of the world a resurgence of genuine spiritual life, both among groups of religious and lay people. One could even say that there was a noticeable spiritual hunger among certain groups of lay people, as if they sought that "supplement d'ame", as one philosopher called it. It is an intense search for God which in various prayer groups takes the form of increased reading of the Word of God, commitment to missionary work, concern for the outcasts of society, etc.

Our own Lasallian world has been affected by this movement which comes from the laity. Each day, increasing numbers of teachers, parents, young people and former students challenge us and seek spiritual guidance from us Brothers. They ask us to delve into our Lasallian "spiritual wealth" and give them the support they need in order to make a clear-sighted and creative response, as men and women of faith, to the pressing challenges of present day society, challenges which take on such complex forms in the various areas of family, social, political, economic and religious life, etc.

And at the same time this is a challenge for the Brothers too, as they see opening up before them this "new road". Brother Superior summarised this challenge as follow:

«In the years to come, we shall have to continue deepening our charism and developing our spirituality. Thus we shall be disposed to accompany, sustain, and educate numerous groups of Christians –above all, Christian educators– who wish to derive their inspiration from De La Salle to grow as men and women of faith, at the service of the local Church, and as people particularly committed to the field of education». (Circ. 422, p. 13)

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

There are, therefore, quite clearly two things we must do:
— DEEPEN our charism
— DEVELOP our spirituality
In order to be able to SUSTAIN and EDUCATE groups of Christians.

In this way, the person of St. John Baptist de La Salle will become increasingly that of a spiritual father for a great number of Christians who seek nourishment in his teachings so as to live –like him and in union with the Brothers– their baptismal commitment to the full, accepting Jesus Christ unconditionally in the service of those who are furthest from salvation.

3. REDISCOVERING THE FOUNDER TOGETHER

«The Holy Spirit gave Founders the ability to create a body of teaching which could be adapted to any age. This is true also of John Baptist de La Salle; and in his spirituality we can find an appropriate and imaginative response to the educational and moral problems of our day». (Letter, p. 11)

For more than 30 years now, the life and work of the Holy Founder has been studied systematically and scientifically by the Institute. As a result, there are now in existence 50 "Cahiers Lasalliens", a "Lasallian Vocabulary" in 6 massive volumes, as well as a host of excellent works produced by the Brothers in a variety of languages. All this work and its fine results bear witness to the wealth of our Lasallian spiritual heritage.

The result of all these efforts? A Founder who is better known, more admired and more loved. A Founder who is seen to be very human, in touch with the reality of his times, who is enterprising, daring, imaginative, innovative, a spiritual Father.

A Founder who is not only the pride of the Brothers, the "principal heirs", but who also fills lay people with enthusiasm and inspires their commitment when they receive the grace to draw near to the fountain-head of his life and teachings.

A Founder is revealed who has much to say to present day teachers, a Founder who invented an approach to education whose main characteristics are of great relevance at the present time. His educational charism is able to furnish answers to a great many young people who seek to work among the poor and to promote justice.

A Founder is revealed who, «by his words and actions, pioneered the concept of the Christian teacher, perceived as the "minister of God", the "ambassador of Christ", the "builder of the Church", fully involved in the educational apostolate of the school pursued in faith and with the support of a community». (Letter, p. 10)

But there still remains some way to go. Brothers and Lasallian lay people have now reached a new stage. We can, perhaps, summarise it as follows:

1. Brothers, we must learn to accept the lay people who work with us as equals who have deliberately chosen to commit themselves to education, and not simply as paid employees who are better than nothing.

2. Brothers, we must feel the urge to involve ourselves fully in working with adults –teachers, parents, former pupils and others– who come to us daily, asking for guidance in their search for God, for support and encouragement in their life of faith and Christian commitment.

3. Brothers, as part of a process of continuing formation, we must find the right formula and the best means to share more and more our understanding and deep convictions concerning Lasallian spirituality and pedagogy with groups of lay people. This is new territory for many of us, but crucial as the springboard for a surge of apostolic energy, and for breathing new life into vocation prospects for the Institute.

4. Lasallian lay people, for their part, must feel the urge to ask the Brothers and their communities for the witness and spiritual guidance they need in order to be able to deepen and increase their knowledge and practical application of the teachings of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

5. Lay people must make an effort and re-read, this time from a lay person's point of view, the life and works of the Founder, or other areas of his teachings which Brothers up till now have not developed very much.

6. Lay people must play a much more important part in the renewal of the Lasallian school, so as to be truly light, salt and leaven by the irreplaceable contribution of their knowledge of the world, and of family and civic life.

QUESTIONNAIRE TO HELP STUDY GROUPS

This second article (3rd section) aims at making us even more aware of the "signs of the times", of the light and darkness of the social milieu where we work, and which affects equally both young and old. It aims also to make us react and become more committed.

1. Which are the areas of darkness which exist in the place where we live and which weigh down or hinder most our work as teachers? Which areas paralyse the spiritual and moral growth of the young people?
2. In our own setting –that of a religious community or an educational community– what signs or indications are there that there is interest in the deepening of faith in the light of our baptismal commitment, or a wish to learn about the Founder or to know him better?
3. In which one or ones of the 6 points of the new stage mentioned at the end of the article, have we made most progress in our own area? In which one or ones do we need to make more effort, and what practical means would help us to make progress?

3 - JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE: A RESPONSE (1)

1. DE LA SALLE: TEACHER, FATHER, SOURCE OF INSPIRATION

> «De La Salle's thinking has lost none of its astonishing relevance: its influence extends beyond the Brothers' communities; it reaches out to all who wish to work, guided by his inspiration". (Letter, p. 14)

St. John Baptist de La Salle is very well known the whole world over because of his educational work and his innovations in the teaching of the common people. However, there is one aspect of this genius which was somewhat neglected initially, and which is becoming more and more evident and signifiacant as time goes on, and that is that of St. John Baptist de La Salle as a Master of the Spiritual life.

This has become increasingly recongnised in the last 20 or 30 years not only within the Institute, but also in other religious and ecclesiastical circles, and more recently among lay people in contact with the Brothers.

But if we speak about St. La Salle as a master of the spiritual life, we must speak also of Lasallian spirituality and by logical progression of the spiritual life. These terms are used fairly loosely, and it would perhaps help to define them a little.

We use fairly commonly such expressions as cultivating spiritual life, not neglecting spiritual life, deepening spiritual life. We speak even about revitalising it. Obviously this spiritual life we are talking about is Christian and it can be so only to the degree to which we realize therein a life of personal relationship with God, this already implies that our spiritual life must be constructed on the basis of the Word of God and of faith: the Word by which God calls man to Himself the faith by which man recognizes, accepts this call» (1).

This leads us quite naturally to speak of the existence of Christian spirituality. «No Christian spirituality worthy of the name can exist where the conviction has been weakened that God, in Christ, has made Himself known to us by His own words, this own acts, as Some One. The whole spiritual life of Christians is aroused and formed by the fact that, as they believe, God has spoken to us and that his living Word has been made flesh amongst us. In other words, in Christianity the spiritual life does not start from a certain conception of God, not even from the idea that He is a personal God, but from faith, the faith which is proper to Christianity: that is, the assent we give to the Word of God, to the Word which is made known to us, which is given to us in Christ Jesus.» (2)

> «Spiritual, in the Christian vocabulary means "what has to do with the HolySpirit", "what is inspired by the Holy Spirit", "what the Holy Spirit transforms within". Spirituality is, therefore, the religious, or divine or Christian or spiritual dimension of the moral sphere. In biblical terms it is expressed as Covenant or Kingdom; in theological (or catechetical) terms as grace. Whatever words are used, it is a plane of divinisation». (The Spirituality of Lay People and of Religious Life by P. Varillon, SJ, p. 6)

2. LASALLIAN SPIRITUALITY

> «For all those that lay claim to his name, Brothers and lay people alike, John Baptist de La Salle is now, even more than in the past, a teacher and a source of inspiration». (Letter, p. 20)

First of all, let us ask ourselves if we can really speak of a Lasallian spirituality. Yes, without the shadow of a doubt we can. There are, of course, some writers who are somewhat loath to speak about specific spiritualities, especially those which originate in religious congregations or other religious movements. They prefer to insist on one single Christian spirituality, followed by all Christians without distinction, whatever the period of history or culture. The unwillingness to recognise diverse spiritualities in the Church stems from the fear sometimes that they will become esoteric systems, leading possibly to absurd competition or senseless rivalry, and forgetting one essential thing: all spirituality is firmly rooted in the Gospel.

The history of Christianity shows us quite clearly how the Gospel of Jesus has been lived and applied to everyday life by Christians, in a variety of ways, with a variety of stresses according to historical periods and different social and cultural settings. This has given rise to different "spiritualities", and consequently, to different "schools of spirituality". It is like a bunch of flowers from the same garden,. There are many different ways of arranging flowers to produce a harmonious and attractive general effect. In the same way, in the Church, all the various "spiritualities" taken together reveal the immense wealth of the single Gospel message of Jesus.

On the other hand, it is sufficient simply to listen to the Magisterium of the Church when it speaks to religious and other groups of committed Christians to realise how much its pastors and especially the Pope encourage them to live fully and with complete fidelity according to the spiritual teachings left by Founders to their sons and disciples.

One question arises quite naturally as a result of what we have just said: What is the reason or what are the reasons for this diversity of spiritualities? We must begin by saying that it is God who chooses men and women in the Church and at different times in human history, and especially at certain critical moments, to face up to and meet the specific needs of the Perople of God. Normally, most of them have a very strong and distinctive personality and the gift of being able to create a following. They are quite clearly persons who have been conditioned or influenced by the milieu in which they have lived, by the education they have received, and by other factors of an historical or cultural nature.

There are two main factors which, combined, bring about the birth and consolidation of a spirituality in the Church: in the first place, there must have been at one point or another a unique experience of God, coloured more or less by the particular psychological make-up of the Founder; and secondly, stemming from the above, his first disciples must have undergone a process of profound spiritual training.

The experiences of the Founder and his first disciples which lie at the root of this birth and consolidation took place in a specific spiritual climate and in the context of specific spiritual needs at a particular historical period. The fruitfulness of a spirituality depends on the fidelity and inventiveness of its disciples in the course of time. By fidelity we do not mean the mechanical and slavish reproduction of the initial formula, but a fresh response, inspired and nourished by the intentions and attitudes of the Founder and his first disciples, in other words, "fidelity to his spirit and specific intentions".

The case of De La Salle is typical: the reason why our Founder has been given the title of Master of the Spiritual Life is because of the influence of his life as "a man of God", both on his disciples as well as on his contemporaries.

His spiritual teaching, based on his own experience, was certainly first and foremost directed towards the training of his followers, the first Brothers. However, it was not long before others came to him –priests, religious, lay people, even heretics and public sinners– to benefit from his spiritual wealth, his guidance and the sanctity of his life. We can see in this, as it were, a foreshadowing of what is happening now, 300 years later, in the Lasallian Family.

We should not forget that he composed the "Meditations for the Time of Retreat" «for the use of everyone involved in the education of young people, and in particular for the retreat made by the Brothers of the Christian Schools during the holidays».

> «The Brothers are convinced that in the life, work and writings of St. John Baptist de La Salle, the Holy Spirit is revealed in a privileged manner, and that they will find there even today a living principle for their guidance» (Decl. 5, 1)
>
> «Fidelity to the present moment of history and fidelity to the Founder, far from opposing or excluding each other, are closely related, provided that we do not expect St. John Baptist de La Salle to have known in advance all our problems and the answers to all our questions». (Decl. 6, 1)

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (5)

3 - JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE:

A RESPONSE (2)

3. ALL HEIRS OF THE SAME FATHER

> «We are the heirs to a rich spiritual patrimony left to us by St. John Baptist de La Salle which we must preserve and cause to grow each new day» (Message of the 41st General Chapter to the Lasallian Family, p. 34)

This article does not aim to set out the main outlines of Lasallian spirituality: the Letter has already done this in summary form. What is important, however, is to point out how the knowledge and especially the practical application of this spirituality which inspires Lasallians in "their mission manner of acting" has a bearing on the future vitality of the Institute.

In spite of the interest shown by Brothers, especially since 1966, in the teachings of the Founder, we are still a long way from the real renewal one would expect from a direct contact with his spiritual teaching. That is why, following the 41st General Chapter, the Institute is once again trying to promote renewal:

1. It calls for the conversion of the Brothers in two areas: conversion to God and conversion with regard to people; and it sets before us the challenge of the apostolic ministry of the Brother today: the renewal of the school, and a determined openness to lay people.

2. It appeals also to all Lasallian lay people, whether assocciated or not, to join forces with the Brothers, to strengthen the commitment of their faith, and to be prepared to meet the demands of society and of the Church.

All this must take place through direct contact with the source: the Founder. The Rule expresses this idea very clearly: «As they (the Brothers) contemplate the history of salvation unfolding in their own lives, they find in the Gospel journey of the Founder a call to conversion, constancy in adversity, and the strength to begin anew.» (Rule, 144) What is written here can serve equally as a source of inspiration for lay people.

And so what is called for is an increasingly thorough knowledge of our Founder, of his life, his writings, his teaching. We recommend you read and study the book entitled "Announcing the Gospel to the Poor" by Brothers Michel Sauvage and Miguel Campos. This work has the double advantage of offering a wide panorama of the whole of Lasallian spirituality, while keeping us in close contact with the Founder's own writings to which they constantly refer.

According to these authors the spirituality of the Founder has an existential character and a dynamic unity, two qualities which make the spiritual message of De La Salle very relevant. In addition, «De La Salle does not offer us an abstract and deductive spirituality. His starting point is the life of his disciples: the circunstances of their daily life, their everyday worries, the lack-lustre duties of their profession, their limitations and their weaknesses. His teachings take form through his dialogue with them, as his writings show by the frequent use of the second person». (Ibid. p. 11)

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

It has been said that De La Salle owes much of his spiritual teaching to the French school of spirituality of the XVIIth century, or more especially to Berulle, as others say. He was subject also to other influences those of St. Ignatius, St. Francis de Sales, the Carmelites and others, because De La Salle was someone who borrowed whatever he found useful. This characteristic of De La Salle led G. Rigault to write: «Nowhere does De La Salle seek to be completely original. Where he happens to be so, it is the result of an extraordinary ability to make syntheses and an ever watchful capacity for assimilation; it is because he is eminently practical and able to adapt. All this he raises to the heights of asceticism and mysticism. At these heights he becomes one of the masters. He is no longer the pupil of any one of them. He creates for the use of a new religious family, very much different from those that came before, a spirituality which has a particular slant, and forms and formulas that make it distinctive». (History of the Institute, Vol. I, p. 466)

It is in this "particular slant" that we are invited to share, to understand more deeply, experience more intensely, in a word, to live.

«What makes us one is that we are sons of the same father: John Baptist de La Salle. We are Brothers because we have his life, his spirit flowing through our bloodstreams» (Closing Address 41st Gen. Chap., p. 36)

«Brothers, so much has been said already about this essential theme the last few days, that I need do little more than declare my firm belief that the invitation to share our Lasallian heritage is a call from the Spirit in our day. This call requires us to rethink not only the role of those who collaborate with us, but our own role as well». (Closing Address 41st Gen. Chap., p. 42)

QUESTIONNAIRE TO HELP STUDY GROUPS

The intention of this third article (4th and 5th sections) is to centre attention on the Founder as a Father and Master of the spiritual life, whose sons, as Lasallians, we all are in the measure in which we follow his footsteps with fidelity and creativity.

1. What importance does the Word of God have in our "spiritual life"? Do we read it assiduously and meditate on it every day?

2. What do we know about the life of St. John Baptist de La Salle? Which aspects or moments in his life touch us most and have had most influence on our spiritual journey?

3. Which writings of the Founder are we most familiar with? Which of them have we read most or consulted? What scheme as an individual or as a member of a group could we draw up for personal development with a view to coming closer to De La Salle?

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (6)

4 - ON BEING A LASALLIAN NOWADAYS: A FEW PRACTICAL GUIDELINES (1)

In chapter 4, the Letter turns to practical considerations and describes six measures that can be taken. It is not an exhaustive list, but nevertheless, it lists some priorities for the Institute today. These are not set down by order of importance. They complement each other, they represent the demanding array of Lasallian commitments for this fascinating period of history in which we live –the final years of the 20th century and the beginning of the third Christian millenium.

As a means to understand these measures more fully, we have collected together a selection of extracts which we hope will help us in our thinking and will serve as a basis for action.

1. SHOW CONCERN FOR THE YOUNG

The young: these are the future hope of the Church and the reason why the Institute exists. Numerically, this is the largest group in the Lasallian Family. On their education depends the future of mankind:

«What awaits young people nowadays is something new, full of unforeseeable opportunities, for good as well as for evil. The Church of today cannot fail to realise that it is called upon to be the mother of a generation whose fate it is to face up to and win the challenge posed by civilisation: one of the most daunting trials of human history. The education of young people nowadays is very demanding. They live in an age of computers, satellites, highly sophisticated technology, very complex economic and social structures and shocking contrasts between ideals and permissiveness, and between boundless wealth and abject misery. Faced with this situation, the educational mission of the Catholic community takes on an urgency as never before, so much so, in fact, that it is absolutely essential that the community's best resources –spiritual, pedagogical and economic– should be made available to it.» (Pope John Paul II, Speech to Italian pilgrims from Romagna, Oct. 11th 1986)

«Brothers, we are called to be experts on youth. We have to know how to respond to them in their search for meaning. We must be able to stand with them as loving Brothers as they wrestle with doubt, fear and frustration. We must know how to help them to find structures that will enable them to pursue their ideals and channel their energies. (Brother John Johnston, Closing Address, 41st General Chapter, Circular 422, p. 41)

«The educational policies of Lasallian institutions are centred on the young, adapted to the times in which they live, and designed to prepare them to take their place in society. These institutions are characterised by the determination to make the means of salvation available to young people through a quality education and by an explicit proclamation of Jesus Christ.» (Rule 13)

2. DRAW UP A LASALLIAN EDUCATIONAL PLAN

During the course of the General Chapters held in 1966/67, 1976 and 1986, the Institute reaffirmed in explicit terms the validity of the Catholic school. One has only to read the Declaration and the Rules of 1976 and 1986 to see how true this is. At a time when the validity of Catholic schools is being questioned, the Institute has not wavered in its conviction that the Catholic school "has a full part to play in the salvific mission of the Church, and especially in the area of teaching the faith."

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

«For more than a year now, and in a great many places, you have been celebrating this jubilee, meditating all the while on fidelity to the charism of the Founder. This charism, it hardly needs saying, consists of seeing the school, available to all and especially the poor, as an educational community, inspired by Christian values, that is, based on love, able to educate the hearts and minds of children and adolescents, thanks to well-trained and competent teachers who are consecrated to God, prayerful and living together as brothers at the feet of their only Master, Jesus Christ. It is here that the Catholic school finds its inspiration and model.»

(Pope John Paul II, Speech in the Chapter Hall, Rome, Nov. 21st 1981)

«In order that the notion of the Catholic school should not be relegated to the land of dreams, we are asked to ensure the following:
– that the educational plan that defines its identity is actually acted upon and find its inspiration in the Gospel;
– that all those that are involved in it –teachers, parents, pupils and ancillary staff– form a true Christian community.
– that this community should proclaim its evangelical authenticity by its openness to the world in which it lives, by its promotion of awareness of those who are less privileged and by its concern for them.
– that in this way its whole life and organisation constitutes "complete and constant catechesis", which is not confined to religion lessons, but extends to and is an integral part of the whole life and all the activities of the school, in an atmosphere of "solidarity, like-mindedness and service", shot through with the spirit and teachings of Christ."» (Brother José Pablo Basterrechea, Address to the 7th National Study Week for religious, Madrid, Easter 1978).

3. EXERCICE A SOCIAL CONSCIENCE

De La Salle's Gospel journey was a steady and determined process of drawing close to the poor, the "living images of Jesus Christ". At the same time, there took place the equally steady process of discovering the plan God was asking him to implement: the training of teachers and the foundation of the Christian Schools to "counter such a great evil".

«Never cease to make known the social doctrine of the Church in all its fullness, so that it can be of help when problems have to be examined according to genuine Christian criteria. The Church relies on its heritage of faith and life with more than enough light and strength to bring about this transformation of all things in Jesus Christ. All recourse to ideological systems not bassed on the Gospel, or to those which are materialistic, either in the way in which they view the world or put forward schemes for social action, is fundamentally closed to Christian truth: it is inadequate, as its vision is limited by the boundaries of this world. It is diametrically opposed to the mystery of unity in Christ. A Christian cannot accept planned class struggle as the dialectical solution of conflicts. Neither can he confuse the noble struggle for justice, which is the expression of respect and love for man, with a plan "which sees in the class struggle the only way of eliminating class injustice in society, as well as the classes themselves." (Laborem Excercens, p. 11)» (Pope John Paul II, Allocution to the Episcopal Conference of Chile, April 2nd 1987)

«The Brothers are entrusted with their mission by the Institute, a mission especially to the poor. As a community they become increasingly conscious of the reasons for the poverty that surrounds them and so become earnestly involved in the promotion of justice and human dignity through the educational service they provide.

This concern of the Brothers for the poor serves also to motivate their activities when they deal with people in a more favourable social environment, urging these to become more sensitive to unjust situations of which the poor are so often the victims.» (Rule 14)

«The service of the poor requires that a Brother use the oppotunities of his apostolate to oppose all forms of poverty of frustration, to maintain a special concern for the full human development of those who suffer poverty, which they live. Sensitivity to the needs of individual persons and a preference for an apostolate to serve the poor can never dispense with efforts to establish a more equitable social order which is aimed at the elimination of poverty.» (Declaration, 30, 3)

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (7)

4 - ON BEING A LASALLIAN NOWADAYS: A FEW PRACTICAL GUIDELINES (2)

4. EVANGELISE CULTURE

The question of the inculturation of the faith is becoming more and more important in the Christian world, and the Magisterium of the Church has began to lay stress on it, especially since Vatican II (cf. Gaudium et Spes, 53-62). Our own Institute, which has spread to all corners of the globe to proclaim the Gospel to the poor through education, now spearheads the Church's response to the challenge posed by the evangelisation of cultures.

«The recent synod of bishops devoted to the vocation and mission of lay people in the Church and the world, twenty years after the Vatican II Council, stressed the importance of training lay people to make the Gospel come more alive in the living fabric of culture, in social circles which will influence thinking and behaviour, in the family, work, school, university, social communications.

...In order that the Gospel can inspire the various ever-changing cultures of this world, there has to be a new powerful effort from each element of the Church, as well as from the various organisations of the Holy See, Bishops' Conferences, international Catholic organisations, religious communities, secular institutes, lay people committed to one or other of the many apostolic movements, and from civic bodies. (Pope John Paul II, Speech to the Plenary Assembly of the Pontifical Council for Culture, Jan. 15th 1988)

«Every culture needs to be evangelised. The Brothers make every effort to get to know, to respect and to assimilate the positive values of the cultural heritage of the people where they are located and whom they are called to serve. With joy and hope the Brothers discover there the signs of the presence of the Spirit. They ensure that the ferment of the Gospel renews and enriches this cultural heritage.

This effort at inculturation is equally necessary and applies as well to youth culture as to the rapidly evolving culture of contemporary society.» (Rule 18)

«Every Lasallian foundation is embodied, together with the local Church, in the culture, the language and the life-style of the place where it is located. Such embodiment ought to be accomplished in keeping with the charism proper to the Institute.» (Rule 18a)

5. CATECHISE AND ENGAGE IN PASTORAL WORK

According to the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle, Christian education is an essential part of the educational ministry of the Brothers. That is why «The Brothers make known the divine mysteries by exercising the ministry of the Word of God. The Brothers are catechists by vocation; this is their "principal function." (Declaration, 38, 1)

Catechesis, as a process which must first and foremost make possible a life-giving encounter with the person of Christ through faith, involves in a special way the teaching of the doctrine of Christ, so as to initiate its listeners –children, young people and adults– into the life of a Christian, and to its riches. If it is true that to be a Christian means saying "yes" to Jesus Christ, we must point out that this "yes" has two levels: it consists in abandoning oneself to the Word of God by basing oneself on it. But it also means, in addition, trying to fathom more deeply the profound meaning of this Word. Catechesis is necessary, as much for the growth of faith among Christians as for their witness to it in the world.» (Pope John Paul II, Letter to the faithful in Hungary, April 6th 1980)

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

«From the beginning, the Institute recognised the central place that catechesis has in the apostolate of the Brother. However, this never led the Institute either to dissociate the teaching of religion from the rest of education, or to devote itself to catechesis alone. Almost by instinct, the living tradition of the Institute has integrated faith in Jesus Christ into the daily lives of the students. There has always been this concern to tie together the work of evangelisation with growth in education and culture.» (Declaration 40, 2)

«By its organisational structure and the climate that it engenders, the Christian school makes catechesis possible. This catechesis should be lively, centred on the person of the student, in touch with life as it is, based on Scripture and the liturgy, attentive to the teaching of the Church, and concerned with an integral presentation of the Christian message.» (Rule 15 a)

6. FORM COMMUNITIES OF FAITH

All Lasallian groups should aim to form communities of faith – communities where one's experience of God is shared, where there grows brotherhood "through the joyful gift of oneself to others", and where one's apostolic commitment to the Church is rekindled.

«The educational community must aim at becoming a Christian community within the Catholic school, that is to say, a real community of faith. This cannot happen, and cannot even begin to happen, if Christian commitment is not shared by at least some of the main sections, that is, parents, teachers and pupils, of the educational community. It is most desirable that Catholic lay people, and especially teachers, should be prepared to make this commitment, by taking part in pastoral care groups or others capable of promoting Gospel values.» (The Catholic Lay Person, Witness to the Faith in School, 41)

The Brothers' community makes known to the rest of the educational community the essential elements of the Lasallian tradition. The Brothers offer to those who desire it, a more intensified sharing of Lasallian spirituality, encouraging such persons to make a more specific apostolic commitment. The Brothers join in the formation of faith communities which are witnessing to the truth of what the Brothers profess.» (Rule 17 c)

THE METHOD TO FOLLOW FOR GROUP WORK

This 4th article (sections 6 and 7) is meant to help you think about the 6 measures mentioned in the Letter, either by yourself or as part of a group. It attempts to do this by providing you with some extracts from texts found in papal pronouncements or Institute documents.

You can, for example:

1. Choose a text and read it by yourself or with the group.

2. Have a discussion about what you have read, saying:
   - what struck you most forcibly
   - what you think is most important
   - what is most relevant to local problems

3. To end with, suggest something specific as a way or doing something practical about what you have discussed.

THE LASALLIAN TRAINING OF THE LAY TEACHER

I. Three facts.

1. The Institute has made a very clear choice: to make lay teachers working in Lasallian schools an integral part of its apostolic mission.

Article 17 of the Rule states: «The Brothers gladly associate lay persons with them in their educational mission. They provide for those who so desire, the means to learn about the Founder and to live according to his spirit».

In his Letter on the Destiny of the Institute, the Superior General, Brother John Johnston, speaks of a "shared mission" and says the following: «They take their place as "full partners" – and we Brothers gladly associate them with us in our mission. We accept that from now on our schools will not be "Brothers' schools", animated by the Brothers' community with secondary collaboration of lay teachers, parents, students. They will be instead "Lasallian schools", schools animated by Lasallian educative communities of faith "within which the apostolic activity of the Brothers takes place» (page 32).

The Institute and each individual Brother is beginning to realise something that lay teachers have hardly been aware of up to now: that they are associated with the Institute, not only as teachers, but also as "apostles" in the mission of the school in the Church.

2. In order to understand this new way of thinking, each Brother has to undergo a sort of "conversion" which involves his:

— welcoming the co-worker and his collaboration;
— enabling him to share in the wealth of Lasallian pedagogical teachings and spirituality;
— making him share Lasallian life;
— sharing work and responsibility with him.

3. Normally, when a lay teacher joins the staff of a Lasallian school, he knows nothing or very little of its approach to education.

It is quite likely that he is very competent to teach the subjects he has specialised in and to work in a school, at least at a basic level. During his studies, he acquired knowledge and teaching skills. But he had no training which took into account working as a teacher in a Lasallian school.

When a young Brother is sent to teach in a school, he comes equipped with the appropriate qualifications and training as a teacher... but also and especially, with a spiritual and apostolic background which he has gradually built up in the course of his years in formation. A lay teacher too comes trained in the first two areas, but not in the third.

* * *

II. Two Consequences.

1. The teacher needs spiritual and apostolic training.

He needs it just like a Brother. The latter gets it during his novitiate and scholasticate. It is only after that that he is entrusted with an apostolic ministry in teaching.

Apart from a few exceptions, a lay teacher takes up his work as a teacher without the spiritual and apostolic training received by a young Brother. And yet he needs it just as much as the young Brother to do his work in the educational stting of a Lasallian school.

The Lasallian school is committed to give a Christian education: it will achieve its aim if the teachers are involved in this aspect of the apostolate. The school is "less Christian" to the extent that a section of the staff does not take an active part in this apostolate.

The lay teacher who works in a Christian school is called just as much as the teaching religious to be a means of evangelisation for his pupils.

A Christian school that loses sight of this fact, and which takes lay teachers onto its staff solely on the grounds of their professional competence, runs the grave risk of destroying the very reason for its existence.

This spiritual and apostolic training must take into account the vocation proper to a lay person, and consequently must be adapted with this in view. Their spirituality will not be that of a consecrated religious, but it will be nonetheless evangelical.

2. The Institute must offer its lay teachers an opportunity for spiritual and apostolic training.

The Institute takes great pains to trains its members, the Brothers, and makes sure it sets aside several years for this purpose. Should it not take responsibility also for the training of its lay teachers in areas in which they have never been able to obtain training?

A Brother is trained so that he can then undertake a ministry entrusted to him in line with the aims of the Institute. Is this not the same ministry that will be entrusted to a lay teacher? In a Christian school it would be a great pity to think of him simply as a communicator of knowledge, a teacher of secular subjects, and not take into account the aim of providing integrated education.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS
Via Aurelia, 476 – 00165 ROMA, Italia

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

And so, if the lay teacher is to play his part in fulfilling the mission of the Institute, is it not reasonable to expect the Institute also to take in hand his spiritual and apostolic training?

There is no doubt this implies changes in structures and systems which have been traditional up till now. A great deal of effort will be needed, but then, are we really serious or not about shouldering this responsibility?

It is clear that much has been done in the Institute with regard to offering this training. It is equally clear, however, that this has to become more widespread and intensive. There must come a time when this will be no longer a free service offered by the Institute, or an offer accepted for the best of intentions by the teacher, but a specific stage undergone by all those who wish to belong to an educational community which has very clearly set up and adopted an educational approach which it offers as a model to society.

* * *

III. In Practice.

— What spiritual and apostolic training are we going to offer the Lasallian lay teacher?

1. Above all, it must be a spirituality and a call to the apostolate which takes into account his lay character. It must be distinct from those aspects of spirituality which are specific to the Brothers, who are religious.

2. It has to be a spirituality which is in line with "the spirit of the Institute", with what inspires each Brother and enables him to fulfil his vocation and ministry, and without which "they (the Brothers) should be looked upon as dead members, and they should look upon themselves as such".

The spirituality of a lay teacher must be substantially identical with that of the Brothers, that is, must be one of faith and zeal.

Faith will make him judge everything according to criteria based on the Gospel, that is, on the teachings of Christ. In order to assimilate these criteria and learn to put them into practice, he will have to read and meditate often on the Word of God contained in the Holy Scriptures.

Zeal will be the outward sign of his lively faith, a zeal that will lead him, through Christian education, to evangelise others, especially children and those young people for whose education he is responsible.

3. Faith and zeal will make him feel part of an educational community in which a commitment has been made to run "together and by association" a Christian school which offers human and Christian education to children and young people.

* * *

— What form will the Lasallian training of lay teachers take?

1. Above all, it cannot and should not be like a coat of varnish or a veneer applied to his personality. Time is needed for this spirituality to be assimilated intellectually and to be put into practice spiritually.
— A series of weekend courses can be useful; and so can longer periods of time, organised in such a way as to create an atmosphere sufficiently quiet to be conducive to this assimilation.
— Why not consider organising something much longer, lasting several months even, completely devoted to this spiritual and pedagogical training?
— All this calls for persevering effort, that is, not simply a few days here or there, but constant effort to live what has been understood and assimilated. What are needed also are times for assessment and recourse to spiritual reserves.
— It calls also for follow-up and support, that is, someone to direct things: someone to help you discern whether your life matches up to your commitment.

2. It must include certain topics for study and reflections, so that these can be known and assimilated, and can enable one to fulfil one's vocation more fully as a Lasallian teacher:
— Getting to know the Founder, St. John Baptist de La Salle: his life, his virtues, his charism, his teachings, his achievements... and how they should be interpreted nowadays.
— Getting to know the Lasallian Institute: its mission, its commitment, its aims, how it functions, its organisation.
— Getting to know the pedagogical and educational traditions of Lasallian schools, and how they adapt to the situations and needs of the modern world.
— Getting to know (in order to be able to practise them) the characteristics of a good Lasallian teacher interpreted in the light of modern day conditions.
— Getting to know and studying thoroughly the meaning of a vocation to be a Christian teacher, a mission entrusted to him in the Church.
— And especially, getting to know the faith and living by it, since he must educate his pupils according to it.

Such a task is so delicate and complex that in many cases it is the District or Region that will have to assume responsibility for it.

THE DE LA SALLE SISTERS OF GUADALUPE

310 years later.

— March 1679: John Baptist de La Salle met Adrien Nyel in front of the house of the Sisters of the Divine Child on rue Barbatre. This marked the beginning of a long journey which was to lead to the foundation of the Christian Schools.

— March 3rd 1989: The Holy See approved the new constitutions of the La Salle Sisters of Guadalupe, which had been recast in the spirit of Vatican II and brought into line with the new Code of Canon Law. This was a new strong and flourishing offshoot of a tree planted by De La Salle 300 years previously.

Who are the La Salle Sisters of Guadalupe?

It is a religious institute of pontifical right, founded in Mexico 45 years ago, and is a form of consercated life for women, inspired by the Lasallian charism.

Origins and Aims.

«The Institute of the La Salle Sisters of Guadalupe owes its origin to the inspiration and apostolic zeal of Brother Juan Fromental Cayroche, of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. About the year 1944, after some twenty years of dedicated apostolate in the Archidiocese of Mexico, Brother Juan realised the need to found an institute for women which would be able to work in conjunction with the Brothers in their educational mission with young people. This Institute would be placed under the protection of Our Lady of Guadalupe and would take St. John Baptist de La Salle as its source of inspiration and guidance, and St. Joseph as its special patron.» (Rule, 1989, art. 1)

«Seeing in these circumstances a providential sign, the Sisters consecrate themselves to God in order to devote themselves to the apostolic ministry, according to the charism of Saint John Baptist de La Salle.» (Rule, 1989, art. 2)

«The purpose of this Institute is to ensure the human and Christian education of children and young people, especially of the poor. This is done either in establishments directed by the Institute itself, or in institutions where they can offer their services with the same purposes in mind, or in apostolic work in parishes and, if circumstances so require, by giving domestic help in the houses of religious or priests.» (Rule, 1989, art. 3)

Brother "Juanito".

This is how the Sisters call their Founder. Brother Jean Fromental Cayroche was born in Servieres (Lozere, France) on June 27th 1895. When he was 13 he went to the Brothers' Juniorate at Vals, which was not far from the village where he was born, and he stayed there a few months. Because of the Combes Laws which were voted in at the beginning of the century, Juanito's Lasallian formation had to take place outside his own country. He went successively to Premia de Mar (Spain) where he got to know St. (Brother) Miguel and took the habit, then to Lembecq lez Hal (Belgium) where he made his scholasticate. When he was 18, he left for Cuba, arriving there in January 1913. In 1921, he made his perpetual profession. In 1925, he arrived in Mexico.

Brother Juanito arrived in the country at a difficult time. The country was governed by Plutarco Elias Calles who, between 1926 and 1929, unleashed a vicious persecution of the Church. It was not till 1940, with the arrival of General Avila Camacho, that Lasallian schools were able to emerge from a situation closely resembling that of life in the catacombs, and which had been their lot for 20 years.

Brother Juanito's zeal, which even during the clandestine years had never wavered, was now able to be given free rein. While continuing his work as a catechist, teacher and bursar, he gave new impetus to the federation of former students which he himself had founded, and he brought out a magazine called "Indivisa Manent" which served to popularise cultural and religious matters.

It was in the midst of all these activities, based on the Simon Bolivar College, that the idea was born of founding a Lasallian form of consecrated life for women, who would devote themselves to backing up the work of the Brothers. Brother John made the idea reality.

The various stages of the process of foundation.

After obtaining permission from his Superiors, given on the condition he would not be the superior of the future community, Brother John set to work.

The Sisters welcome their Founder back with great jubilation, and he continues to live his edifying life in their midst till his death in 1978. In 1971 also, the Sisters set up a house in Colombia.

— 1986-1988: 5th General Chapter, in two stages, during which there takes place a revision of the Constitutions prior to their submission to the Holy See for approval.
— March 3rd 1989: definitive approval by the Holy See of the revised Constitutions.

Future Prospects.

As a consequence of the introduction of mixed education into Brothers' schools, there has arisen over the past few years in a variety of places, a wish on the part of girls to consecrate their lives to the apostolate of education within the framework of a form of consecrated life for women, inspired by the Lasallian charism. This is a challenge for the Brothers as well for the Sisters:

— The Sisters have to come to terms with their Institute becoming international, as well as with greater direct involvement with the apostolate of education;

— The Brothers, for their part, will have to learn how to direct and encourage vocations that come to light among the girls they teach; and how to help the Sisters in their efforts to intensify the Lasallian and professional training of their members.

At present, there are about 160 Sisters and 22 communities. These latter are to be found in Mexico (13), United States (5), Colombia (2), Italy (1) and Philippines (1).

THE PASTORAL CENTRE

at the Abbey of Fontaine Andre, Neuchatel, Switzerland

Almost 1.000 years of history

The Abbey of Fontaine Andre stands in the north-eastern part of Neuchatel, half-way up the southern slopes of the Chaumont Massif and owes its name to a spring which is still in existence.

The Abbey was founded in 1143 by the Premonstratensians. It has had an interesting history; it was burnt down to the ground in 1375, reoccupied by the monks and then abandoned again after the Reformation. Finally it became the private residence of the Prince of Neuchatel, having gradually lost its religious character. Over the course of the last three centuries, the buildings have undergone considerable alterations.

An annexe of the Brothers' Neuchatel Catholic Institute

The Fontaine Andre property was bought by the Swiss Brothers' Association in 1954. This purchase was considered necessary because of the big increase in the number of Catholic Institute pupils in the 1948-50 period. One result was the need for extra teaching space and, especially, provision of recreational and sports facilities. What was needed was somewhere that was quiet, spacious and restful, both for pupils and for Brothers.

In 1951 and in 1953, bids were made for properties but they were unsuccessful. Finally, the Brothers succeeded in buying the property and buildings known as the Abbey of Fontaine Andre. The property, part of which consists of meadows, is completely surrounded by forest, and has one of the best views in the area. The property covers an area of about 50 acres and contains some woodland and arable land: as such, therefore, it can serve both as a farm and a place for people to come and stay. The buildings are sufficiently spacious, modern and comfortable to accommodate 40 or 50 persons.

From 1955 to 1965, it was used mainly to lodge 50 or so boarders annually. Maintenance work and improvements done mostly by the Brothers themselves made the premises even more attractive.

In the period around 1966-67, following the 39th General Chapter, Brothers branched out into a variety of apostolates and there were noticeably fewer available for work in the Neuchatel boarding school. This and other reasons stemming from a change in the mentality and needs of young boarders, and the desire to improve their facilities, led the Brothers to cut down the number of boarders. Numbers were reduced from 180 to the present figure of 90, and this makes it possible for all the boarders to have accommodation in the Catholic Institute in the city centre.

And so the Fontaine Andre premises became available for other uses.

What should Fontaine Andre be used for?

From 1973 to 1983, Fontaine Andre, with its peace and seclusion, served as a rehabilitation centre for young drug abusers. These were lodged in the Abbey, and were offered guidance and help by Brothers who had chosen this kind of work as their apostolate.

In 1983, the Association of Swiss Brothers closed the operation down: after examining all the pros and cons, they decided it was no longer possible to provide sufficient numbers of qualified personnel to ensure its success.

And so, some other use for the property had to be found. It was then that it was decided, with the agreement of the Visitor of Besancon to whose District Swiss communities belong, to turn the Abbey into a pastoral centre.

Such a decision entailed the appointment of a director and a community. It took two years in all to train a Director, form a community, and make all the necessary alterations. While this was going on, the house was used as a half-way house for released prisoners, and for other groups on a one-off basis.

July 1985: the Pastoral Centre begins its work in earnest.

Finally, in summer 1985, after two years of transition, Fontaine Andre was ready to offer its facilities to groups on a regular basis. People had known about the Abbey for a long time, so there was no need to advertise, and bookings came in gradually.

From the very start there has been a policy to put no restrictions on the types of groups or activities the Centre would cater for, provided their intention was serious.

And so all kinds of groups come to use the Centre – a state of affairs approved by the three General Councillors who came to visit us at the end of 1985.

The Centre is used by a great variety of groups

In the beginning, it was mostly Youth Movement groups that came, looking for somewhere quiet to meet and have retreats and days of recollection. Very soon, groups started coming from outside the Canton of Neuchatel. In fact, we never know where the next group will be coming from nor what it will be. Among the groups we have catered for there are the following:

– A group of cancer patients, some of them recuperating, accompanied by a lady organiser. During their meetings, patients were invited to speak freely to one another of the problems caused by their illness, how they felt about it, what their fears were, how they manage to cope and what the problable outcome will be. It was all very moving. At the end everyone agreed the meetings had been very thought-provoking, and said that the prayerfulness, simplicity and thoughtfulness of the hospitality offered them by the Brothers' community had impressed them greatly.

– Several groups of school-leavers have come on retreat with their teachers and chaplains.

– Parents have come with their children to spend time relaxing, praying and taking part in religious celebrations. Occasions such as this offer the opportunity also of simply talking together, something that day to day family life, working hours and certain jobs make sometimes almost impossible.

– On several occasions Protestant persons have come with their Parish Council for a day's recollection. On other occasions, Catholic parish priests have brought their Council along.

– On one occasion a group of housewives came, wishing to spend some time reflecting on their lives and the work they did. They were glad too not to have to do their daily round of cooking and washing-up just for a change. And for once they were the ones waited on at table... by the Brothers.

– We played host to a group of State primary school teachers from the Canton of Berne, who came to follow a series of adult education courses.

– There was also a training programme which lasted 400 hours in all, spread over 10 months, and which dealt with sexuality. It was aimed at preparing experts in this field who would subsequently work with children in schools, and possibly also with parents.

– We have had Christian Charismatic groups.

– Various healing communities or groups have stayed with us.

– And, of course, we have to mention the Brothers teaching in Zurich, or here in Neuchatel, in the primary and boarding schools. These come to use our facilities at Fontaine Andre on a regular basis for celebrations or for more specifically religious reasons, like preparatory courses for first communion or confirmation, and for days of recollection.

These are just a few examples to illustrate the wide range of groups that we cater for. It can be seen that not all groups come for a religious purpose; but we are often told that everyone who comes is struck by the atmosphere of prayer and recollection which is the hallmark of Fontaine Andre and contributes greatly to its influence.

A successful undertaking

When we first started, Brothers told us we could consider ourselves successful if we were booked up for 40% of the time. In fact, in 1986, we passed the 60% mark, which represents more than 2.000 persons staying with us in the course of 12 months. Short term forecasts are encouraging: we are booked solid for the next few months and especially the summer period.

Groups staying at the Centre can have either full board and lodging, or be self-catering, using the facilities available. This latter option is often preferred by youth groups because it is cheaper.

Prices at the Centre vary according to the income of applicants. The price for one day's full board and lodging can be anything between 50 and 30 Swiss francs, depending on whether the person is an apprentice, a student or a wage-earning adult. The question of payment and prices is discussed with group organisers, and people are openly asked to show solidarity with this approach. Up till now, we have been able to stay within our budget while operating this variable price system.

The role of the Brothers at the Centre

There are three Brothers at present working full-time at the Centre, and two others who have other jobs are members of the community. Up till now, the three Brothers have been able to run the Centre between them without any outside help. They are responsible for the general administration of the Centre, preparing accommodation for groups, running the finances, catering, cooking and maintenance.

The only influence they exert on groups is that of their devotedness, their warm hospitality, their willingness to be of service and their prayerfulness. And they do exert an influence, there is no doubt about that, and many people are impressed, judging by what people say and write to us on numerous occasions.

What, then, is the way forward? At present, we seem to have three choices:

– Stay as we are, and count on exerting an influence through the witness of devoted service, fraternal love and prayer.
– Hand over the running of the material side of the Centre to lay people who would be paid a wage, leaving the Brothers free to involve themselves directly in working with groups. This option is very attractive, but entails financial risks for the Centre, and would inevitably lead to an increase in prices of board and lodging.
– Combine both activities, some Brothers running the material, others the spiritual side of the Centre. This depends somewhat, of course, on the qualifications of Brothers, but is something worth going into. It could happen only if the community increased in size.

INTRODUCTION

ANOTHER YEAR FOR LASALLIANA

LASALLIANA begins another year, the seventh of its existence, during which issues No. 17, 18 and 19 will appear. We thank our many readers for telling us how much they appreciate our publication and for their encouragement. We hope that LASALLIANA will remain faithful to its aims and provide the various sections of the Lasallian Family with information concerning everything that has to do with our Founder, the Institute, our vocation and apostolate, and our work.

LASALLIAN LAY PEOPLE WISH TO HAVE ACCESS TO THESE ARTICLES

We must insist on this: LASALLIANA is intended for the Lasallian Family. Some Districts realise this and distribute copies of each issue not only to Brothers' communities, but also to schools and to those in charge of various Lasallian movements –to teachers, parents, young people, as well as to other persons more closely linked to the world of St. La Salle.

It very satisfying to meet a lay teacher who says to you: "Do you know? I read an article the other day which said that I was an apostle too in school. And he quoted excerpts from St John Baptist de La Salle. It was a real discovery for me". Or then there is the university student who says: "In my last school, I came across a collection of articles, including one which spoke about ‹Lasallian Volunteers›. I found it interesting and it made me think. I didn't know the Brothers organised things like that..."

In fact, the articles we include in LASALLIANA are meant to arouse interest, and this interest will be satisfied if lay teachers have a copy in their staffroom, parents in their meeting rooms, pupils in their library... and if there are copies wherever they are likely to be read.

This explains probably why quite often we are contacted by lay teachers, parents on management committees and former students, who wish to take out a personal subscription to LASALLIANA. It's a good sign.

A NEW SECTION. CORRESPONDENCE

Included in the voluminous correspondence received by LASALLIANA, there have been suggestions from four different quarters –France, Spain, Mexico and Italy– that we should start a correspondence section. This section would enable readers to discover the reactions of other readers to articles published, suggest new ideas, complete information, ask for explanations, and so on. We welcome this suggestion and can make a start straightaway. Readers who wish to contribute to this section may do so, but we make a plea for brevity so that we can satisfy all our customers.

HOW ARTICLES ARE CLASSIFIED

Each article is identified by 4 numbers/letters. E. g.: 16 - 14 – D -34.

- the first number indicates the number of the issue.
- the second, the number of the article in the table of contents.
- the letter indicates the nature of the subject matter.
- the last number indicates how many articles exist already on subjects of a similar nature.

The example given above indicates that the article in question appears in issue No. 16; that it is No. 14 in the table of contents of that issue; that the subject matter relates to lay people and the Lasallian Family; and that 34 articles already exist on related topics.

Subject matter is indicated by letters as follows:

O. General subjects, miscellaneous.
A. St. John Baptist de La Salle. Facts, writings, spirituality, teachings, etc.
B. The FSC Institute: history and present day.
C. Thoughts on education.

LIVE JESUS IN OUR HEARTS!

FOREVER!

I should like to say a few things about these 6 words we use so often. My point of view will be both historical and practical. This article does not seek to be an exhaustive treatment, but simply to examine this invocation against the background of Lasallian spirituality.

1. This short invocation is one of the Lasallian devotions.

Starting with the Trinity (formula of vows) and going on to Mary (Liesse...), St. Joseph (1719 Mass...), the Guardian Angels (Med. 172, 197, 198...), St. Cassian (at the Grande Maison), we see that De La Salle has a special devotion to Providence (God who leads...), the Holy Spirit (By the movement of the Spirit), and especially to Jesus Christ.

John Baptist de La Salle encouraged his Brothers to meditate on the principal mysteries of the life of Christ, on the Eucharist, the Passion, and the Child Jesus. (Cahier Lasallien 8, p. 484).

2. Where did De La Salle find his inspiration for it?

According to Blain (C.L. 8, p. 493): «It was partly to imitate this great saint (St. Ignatius, martyr) that he established in his Institute this pious custom of saying "Live Jesus in our hearts – Forever!" at the end of all community activities. It is like a password for the Brothers».

We find a parallel in Abbe Condren's prayer: «Come, Lord Jesus, and live in your servant...»; as well as in that of Jacques Olier: «Oh Jesus, living in Mary, come and live in your servants». Olier also heads a letter to Mme. Rousseau with the words: "Live Jesus in our hearts". Other letters of his begin with: "God be blessed, forever".

Grignon de Montfort's motto during his missions was: "Long live Jesus, long live his Cross" (R. Laurentin, "Dieu seul est ma tendresse", p. 83).

It can really be said that we inherited it partly from St. Sulpice and the French school of spirituality. Rigault says (Vol. I, p. 466): «At no point did De La Salle seek to be entirely original: he synthesised, assimilated, adapted... created formulas specifically for the use of a new religious family, and whatever its origin, the invocation was adopted by the Brothers as their watchword or password..»

The Abbe Deville sees this invocation for the use of the Brothers as yet another example of the mystical Christocentric character of the spirituality of Berulle.

3. Its use in the early days of the Institute.

In the Practice of the Daily Timetable (C.L. 25, p. 95, 96, 101, 102), it says that «when it is time to get up in the morning, a Brother says "Live Jesus in our hearts" and the Brothers in the dormitory reply, "Forever". It is the community signal». The Director uses the same invocation to tell the Brothers in the Common-room to stop reading the Imitation and go to the oratory. In the evening also, the Director uses it to start spiritual reading, and to indicate it is time to go bed.

The copy of the above publication which we have is dated 1713. We know, however, that it was composed before 1705, a time when the so-called Avignon Rule already existed in manuscript form. De La Salle had already written Regulations of a simpler kind at Vaugirard and Rue Neuve, and the invocation could very well have been in use even then.

It would be useful perhaps also to mention that, in a manuscript dated 1738 and found in Chartres in 1905, it can be seen that Brothers use this invocation to start mental prayer and after the O Domina Mea and the Angelus which follow it.

4. The continuation of its use in the history of the Congregation up the present time.

During the Generalate of Brother Agathon, for the first time an indulgence was attached to a prayer expressly for the use of the Brothers. There was an annual plenary indulgence to be gained, and 40 days each time the Brothers used it on meeting one another. (Collection of Bulls, p. 48; Pius VI in 1786).

To maintain uniformity in the various communities, Brother Anaclet decided that all recreations should begin and end with the invocation.

As De La Salle's cause progressed to Venerable, Blessed and Saint, he was invoked as such, but the final invocation was always the "Live Jesus in our hearts – Forever".

In the 1946 Rule, at the time of Brother Athanase Emile, the use of the invocation remains more or less what it was in the Practice and the Rules that followed. There are three references to it in the Rule: (ch. 29, art. 1, 3, 5).

Under Brother Nicet Joseph, a Latin version was tried out: "Jesus in cordibus nostris vivat! – Semper!" but it never caught on.

In the Rules "ad experimentum" produced by the Chapter which elected Brother Charles Henry, there is one mention only of the invocation, and it is added that it is the community signal (ch. 10, art. 13). Under Brother Pablo, the same text reappears.

Under Brother John Johnston, the new Rule was approved by the Church. In article 68a, the use of the invocation is linked to a way of thinking dear to the Founder: "Live Jesus in our hearts" Forever! is the usual invocation in the community; the Brothers see in it a reminder of the presence of the Lord who lives in their midst."

5. It is still in the chapter on prayer.

This is so because, although very short and succinct, it is still a prayer. As Deville says in his "Ecole Française de Spiritualité, p. 133, this invocation is "a cry of love and desire", "a living summary of a whole range of teachings on mental prayer which the Founder left his Brothers."

Insistence on the presence of God takes a concrete form in the presence of Jesus in the midst of his Brothers, «like the sun... so that all their actions should be directed towards him as their centre, and draw all their strength from him as the branches of a vine draw it from the stock» (C. L. 14, p. 10).

6. It is considered to be the invocation of the Lasallian community.

De La Salle wanted all the Brothers to have the same spirit. This spirit is the spirit and life of Christ in the heart of each Brother. It is a part of community relationships and of apostolic undertakings.

If for the followers of St. Francis a way of expressing the fact they belong to the Friars Minor is the use of the motto "Pax et Bonum", so for the Brothers, their invocation has a similar role.

To the Brothers who have been formed by mental prayer on the maxims, virtues and sentiments of Jesus Christ, De La Salle says the following: «Ask therefore the Lord of all hearts to make yours one with those of your Brothers, in that of Jesus.» (Med. 39, 3).

7. In his life, De La Salle shone with Jesus living in his heart.

He was image of Jesus Christ (C.L. 7, p. 113). His heart was modelled on that of Jesus Christ (C.L., 8, p. 373). He summoned his remaining strength on his death-bed to answer "Forever!" to the invocation.

The fire which Jesus Christ kindled in his heart was apparent to all (C.L. 8, p. 485). He begs Jesus Christ to answer in his place when someone comes to him for advice (C.L. 8, p. 318).

8. One can say the same of his disciples.

The Brothers are called children engendered in Jesus Christ (C.L. 8, p. 358). The Spirit of Jesus Christ reigns in the community (C.L. 7, p. 434). Jesus Christ seems to be in the midst of the Brothers during recreation (C.L. 8, p. 138).

The Institute spreads everywhere the good odour of Jesus Christ (C.L. 7, p. 357). Young teachers are... the good odour of Jesus Christ (C.L. 7, p. 279).

9. In conclusion, by way of suggestion...

a/ Every time we use this invocation in community, we should make it a real prayer.

b/ Those who are more in tune with the Russian Pilgrim method will find in our invocation the finest prayer of the heart a Brother could want.

c/ In the Office Book, the expression "your name" returns frequently. It is true it refers to the name of God, Yahweh, but this name "in our midst" is also that of Jesus (Ieshoua). And outside the psalms, there are various passages where the actual name Jesus figures (Phil. 2, 9-10; Apoc. 15, 4). We all know the power of a name in Jewish thinking: to say his name is to make him present, make him come alive, not separately, but in us, on our lips, in our lives, "in our hearts".

d/ According to M. Olier, who indirectly was De La Salle's teacher, "the Brothers should learn to look at Jesus, unite themselves with Jesus, act as Jesus". This means that, when we are with our pupils, this invocation will help us "to have Jesus in our eyes, in our heart and in our hands" (Olier, Introduction à la vie et aux vertus chrétiennes, p. 24). In this way we will be able to instil the love of Jesus in the hearts of children so "that they think often of Jesus... speak frequently of Jesus, aspire only after Jesus, and live for him alone" (Med. 102, 2).

CHALLENGES FACING THE BROTHERS' COMMUNITY: END AND SPIRIT OF THE INSTITUTE – MISSION

These few thoughts on the challenges facing the Brothers' community which are contained in the Rule were put together by the Colegio del Carmen community in Caxias do Sul in Brazil. Through lack of space, we have omitted the introduction and the conclusion of their contribution. References to the Rule are limited to chapters 1 and 2. (Extract from issue No. 100 of Comunicação, pp. 12-18, September 1988).

Foundation

Three sources are sufficient to throw light on the "challenge" facing Brothers within the school in which they work and in which they are called upon to be "witnesses": St. Paul's first Letter to the Corinthians, chapter 12, the Letter of our Superior General, Brother John Johnston, and the talks he gave us during his visit to our Dictrict. In those talks he explained and reaffirmed in ringing tones what he had written in his Pastoral Letter, "The Destiny of the Institute: our responsibility".

In the light of the authoritative teaching of St. Paul on the mystical body, we can see clearly the role of the Brothers' community within the educational community of the school, and this latter's role in the universal Church, the mystical body of Christ in all its fullness. At this stage, one is looking beyond the individual, a primary cell in the Church, and beyond the family, the domestic Church.

A religious community also is a "small Church" which is a part of that slightly larger Church, the educational community of the school.

The Apostle Paul teaches that there is a diversity of spiritual gifts, ministries and works, but it is God who works through all of these. To each one the Spirit is given in some particular way. He speaks of preaching with wisdom, preaching instruction, the gift of miracles, prophecy, the discernment of spirits, the gift of tongues, and the gift of interpreting tongues. All these gifts the Spirit distributes as he chooses. And then he takes the body with all its different parts as an analogy. Each part has to remain as it is and not want to be some other part. Nor should it feel less important by being what it is. He concludes by saying that what is essential is charity, and he develops this idea in later chapters.

In his Pastoral Letter, Brother Superior John Johnston promises a circular letter for the end of 1988 intended for lay teachers and members of the Lasallian Family with a view to explaining clearly the intentions of the Institute with regard to the "present and future of our educational ministry" (p. 30).

The Rule, for its part, states: "The Brothers gladly associate lay persons with them in their educational mission" (17); and "The Brothers' community is ever mindful that its apostolic activity takes place within an educational community in which all the functions, including positions of responsibility, are shared" (17a); and "the Brothers foster a spirit of collaboration and mutual enrichment among all the members of the educational community" (17b); and "The Brothers' community makes known to the rest of the educational community the essential elements of the Lasallian tradition" (17c).

Brother Superior also points out that the Rule lays great stress on the links between the Brothers and the lay people that are associated with them. He refers to the extraordinary changes that are going on in the Institute in the context of the evolution of the role of the laity in the Church. The Institute has accepted that from now onwards our schools should no longer be "Brothers' schools", run by Brothers' communities helped by lay teachers, parents and pupils. Instead, these schools will be "Lasallian schools", run by Lasallian educational faith communities, within which the Brothers' community exercises its apostolic activity. He says also: "What these radical changes mean is that Brothers now have a different role, and those who work with them also have a different role. I am really heartened by the rapid and even enthusiastic evolution, which can be seen taking place in many parts of the Institute, in the way in which the idea of a "shared mission" is being implemented".

In his talk to the Brother Directors and lay heads of schools, Brother Superior spoke also of the following changes in models: "From the triangular or pyramidal model, with the Brothers at the apex, we have moved on to a circular model, in which the Brothers are one of the elements in the circle. This implies a change in the roles of Brothers and lay people".

And so, the challenge for the Brothers' community, which is a part of the educational community, is to be true witnesses to the presence of God, to the possibility of creating true brotherhood between people and nations, to their consecration to God, and to their commitment to the apostolic ministry of evangelisation through education.

This is what the community sought to state more specifically by identifying the challenges contained in the Rule. It was a long process, and yet our list of quotations is not an exhaustive one. There are many others in the Rule which are also challenging. It was gratifying for us to discover the extent to which there was agreement between our Rule on the one hand, and Church documents and those of the Bishops Conference of Brazil, including recent ones, on the other. Here, then, are the challenges contained in those articles of the Rule we examined:

Art. 1 & 11. The challenge of continuing to make a practical response to human and spiritual neglect, and to the needs of especially poor pupils. As the number of Brothers diminishes, there appears the new challange of becoming associated with lay people who need to be trained so as to be able to commit themselves fully to Christian instruction and education.

Art. 2. The challenge of fidelity to the call of the Holy Spirit and to the charism of the Founder, by living one's consecration to God in such a way as to pursue one's apostolic ministry of Christian education and evangelisation in association with others.

Art. 3 & 11. The challenge of remaining exclusively lay religious and as such fulfilling a ministry entrusted by the Church. As consecrated religious, accepting the challenge to ensure the constant renewal of the school, considered to be a privileged instrument, making it accessible to the poor, and proclaiming it to all who come as a sign of the Kingdom, of God and a means of salvation.

In these modern times with their various "cultures", the challenge of opening the school to other forms of teaching and education adapted to the needs of the time and place; of creating, renewing, diversifying types of work according to the present spirit and to the most urgent needs.

Art. 4. The challenge of Lasallian identity and fidelity to the original inspiration (to be found in the Founder and the history of the Institute). Once known and assimilated, these two elements should lead to conversion and to the sharing of their riches with the educational community.

Art. 5, 6, 7, 8, 12. The challenge of acquiring and living according to the spirit of faith and of zeal, this Institute spirit without which we would be dead members or not true members. The spirit which is characteristic of the Brothers' community must be acquired, nourished, studied, meditated about and shared. Daily prayer which is implied in all this should transform one's life.

Art. 9 & 10. The challenge of brotherhood which goes beyond being simply called "Brother", but which must be translated into perceptible feelings, specific attitudes, concrete proofs... of Christian brotherhood.

Art. 12. The challenge of uniting one's efforts with those of others to promote cultural progress and to proclaim the Word of God, and to provide within the educational community an education which respects the individual, makes possible an openness to grace, and predisposes him to accept the gift of faith.

Art. 13. The challenge to found schools and to take part in the running of educational communities inspired by De La Salle, and of establishments for young people, adapted to the times in which they live, trying to prepare them to take their place in society, and combining an excellent human education with the explicit proclamation of Jesus Christ.

Where necessary, also providing adult education.

The challenge of considering one's profession as a ministry, offering brotherly guidance to enable others to discover, appreciate and assimilate human and Gospel values.

Art. 13a. The challenge of respecting conscience and integrating culture and faith.

Art. 13b. The challenge of making pupils and auxiliary staff undertake their own education by taking an active part in the educational community.

Art. 13 & 13d. The challenge of promoting a critical attitude vis-a-vis contemporary society with its mass media and technological resources. This implies giving teachers a chance to follow courses.

Art. 14. The challenge of promoting Justice and human dignity, especially in the more developed and well-off sections of society.

Art. 15. The challenge for the Brothers' community to let itself be evangelised by those whom it serves, considering the work of evangelisation and catechesis as its principal work.

Art. 15a. The challenge of promoting an organisational framework and general atmosphere that is favourable to integral catechesis which consists in encouraging a frequent turning to God, finding time to pray, and bearing visible witness to a faith community made up of convinced Christians whose hearts are filled with the Spirit who teaches all truth.

Art. 15b. The challenge of sharing in the pastoral work of the local Church, either personally or through the intermediary of catechists and lay volunteers.

Art. 16. The challenge of an apostolate pursued "together and by association" by members who are approved, sent and supported by a community with which they must remain closely associated.

Art. 16a. The challenge of maintaining apostolic works which are in accordance with the aims of the Institute, and of submitting them to the discernment of the community in union with the Superiors and the District.

Art. 16b. The challenge of making oneself known as a Brother, especially if one is working outside the community.

Art. 17, 17a, 17b, 17c, 17d. The challenge of promoting the development of Christian lay people associated with the educational community, and of collaborating in the training of Christian teachers, so that they may become more and more competent, and commit themselves more to the Church and education.

Pastoral work takes place nowadays within the educational community and tasks and responsibilities are shared. It is important therefore to encourage the cooperation and self-improvement of the members of the educational community – the young people, parents, priests, former pupils, friends... One needs therefore to pass on the Lasallian message and to offer the possibility of sharing its spirituality by helping to set up faith communities.

The challenge of collaborating with organisations with similar aims.

Art. 18. The challenge of making the effort to know, respect and assimilate the positive values of the culture and tradition of the place in which the Brothers are working.

Art. 18a. The challenge of becoming part of the local Church, of adopting the language and lifestyle of the area in which the Brothers work.

Art. 19. The challenge of sharing in the missionary work of the Church. This is the only way in which the school will achieve maturity in the Church. This supposes even the availability to accept missionary work "ad gentes".

Art. 19a. The challenge of volunteering to be sent to areas of chronic need, in response to the missionary call of the Church.

Art. 19b. The challenge of being concerned about fostering vocations.

Art. 20. The challenge of living one's life of faith as a gift to the ministry of Christian education.

Art. 21. The challenge of putting one's time, gifts and energy generously at the disposal of those whom the Lord entrusts to the Brothers, who are spurred on by the zeal and attitude of Christ the Servant. This challenge involves an effort to improve constantly one's competence, the quality of one's relationships, the witness of one's life and the vigour of one's faith.

**

In a word, the Brothers' community will bear witness within the educational community that it is one of its true members when the entire life of each of the Brothers is transfigured by the presence of the Lord who called them and continues to call them, who consecrates them, sends them and saves them.

FROM GRAND BIGARD AND BOKRIYC (BELGIUM) TO THE REGIONAL NOVITIATE OF KINSHASA. THE LASALLIAN VOCATION IN AFRICA

While a number of Districts in Europe and North America are alarmed, and with good reason, at seeing their houses of formation emptying and closing down, in Africa and Latin America, it is quite the opposite which is a potential source of worry: the number of candidates for religious life and the priesthood is very impressive.

Likewise, according to the most reliable forecasts, in two generations at the most, the African Churches will have the greatest number of faithful in the world after Latin America. It can be thought, then, that the future of the Catholic Church no longer depends on the west.

From now onwards, how could it be possible not to take these facts into account and to see the resulting changes?

As for us, involved as we are in this phenomenon in the Church, we wish to make our contribution by reflecting a little on the position of the Lasallian vocation in Africa. Such reflection must include an analysis of the determining factors, conditions and requirements of initial formation.

To begin with, we should perhaps recall the main stages of the Brothers' settlement in Africa, and in particular, in Zaire, "the most vigorous Christian community in Africa" (MISSI, February 1989).

* * *

1. Beginnings.

On October 7th 1909, five Belgian Brothers of the Christian Schools arrived in Boma (Zaire), coming from Belgium at the express wish of King Leopold II.

That year marked the beginning of the missionary activities of the Brothers in Zaire. The Brothers settled in and gradually spread their apostolic activities to Boma (1909), Kinshasa (1910), Tumba (1921), Bamanya (1929), Mbandaka (1930), Kangu (1930), Gombe Matadi (1936), Matadi (1938). This expansion ended with the outbreak of the Second World War.

As soon as the war ended in 1945, the District received reinforcements: 14 Brothers arrived from Belgium, and new houses were opened in Itipo (1949), Bikoro (1953), Konzo (1953), Kilwa (1956), Lubumbashi (1964), Gbadolite (1969) and Mbanza Ngungu (1972).

In 1953, the Brothers went to Rwanda, opening houses in Byumba (1953), Nyuondo (1955), Ruhengeri (1957), Shungungu (1963) and Butare (1968).

This long chronological list of school foundations gives no idea of the efforts involved. To do this one would have to describe how these establishments grew and flourished. Wherever the Brothers settled, they set up schools which provided education at a variety of levels from primary to university.

At secondary school level in particular, the Brothers prepared students for a career in administration, crafts, teaching, professions, commerce and other specialised areas.

It is worth pointing out also that in Boma the Brothers were for a time involved in paramilitary training; and in Kinshasa, they were instrumental in setting up a school of river navigation.

This apostolic expansion came to an end in 1974, when the State nationalised the schools, and the number of Brothers was cut down, with 24 Belgian missionary Brothers returning to Belgium for good.

As the result of an educational agreement signed by the State of Zaire and the Churches on February 26th 1977, the Brothers agreed to take over the administration of some of their former schools in Kinshasa (7 schools), Matadi (2), Tumba (3) and Mbandaka (3).

2. Recruitment and formation of Zairean candidates.

a/ From 1920 to 1972.

In 1920, the De La Salle Brothers were the first religious in Zaire to be able to integrate completely indigenous vocations in their congregation.

This generous and far-sighted step was very daring, when one recalls the socio-political situation of the time.

In that year, two young Congolese were sent to Belgium to make their novitiate at Grand Bigard. A third one followed later and made his novitiate in 1928 at Bokriyck.

As for Zaire, Brother Veron Ignace, the Visitor and a Belgian, opened the first house of formation in the educational establishment in Boma. There followed the opening in Tumba of a juniorate (1928), novitiate (1929) and a scholasticate (1930).

In 1932, the novitiate was transferred to Bamanya (Equatorial Region) and stayed there till 1954. After that it moved to Gombe Matadi (Lower Zaire Region), where it stayed till 1966.

The novitiate remained closed for two years (1967/68) and then re-opened in October 1969, still at Gombe Matadi. It closed again in 1972 and remained so till 1977. From that year onwards, the work of recruitment has continued uninterrupted.

From 1930 onwards, the Brothers had no difficulty in attracting indigenous vocations, but the peak was reached in 1958/59.

There were at that time 60 black Brothers in community and 30 novices in formation.

b/ The increase in the number of vocations in the last ten years.

On September 1st 1977, 8 youngsters who wanted to become Brothers joined the Brother Veron Ignace Postulancy in Kinshasa. On september 16th 1978, 4 young Zaireans (out the 8) took the habit of the Brothers at a prayerful eucharistic celebration.

This was a memorable and blessed day after so many years, and in many it reawakened hope for the future.

In 1978, in a third move, the novitiate came to Kinshasa. At the same time, the juniorate and the scholasticate were transferred there also. They are now called the "Brother Veron Ignace Postulancy" and the "Mary Immaculate Scholasticate".

In 1983, there were some internal changes in the novitiate: it became pan-African first, and then was extended from one to two years.

For this canonical year, 1988/89, our numbers in the novitiate are as follows: from Cameroun (1), Ivory Coast (1), Equatorial Guinea (1), Nigeria (3), Rwanda (5), Togo (3), Zaire (10).

c/ Changes in numbers of novices since 1920.

Year	Number of novices
1920-1929	9
1930-1939	27
1940-1949	43
1950-1959	72
1960-1969	27
1970-1979	12
1980-1989	38
Total	228

As the figures show, numbers rose steadily from the beginning of recruitement and reached a peak in 1959.

The ten years from 1960 to 1970 were disastrous: 60 Brothers left during this period at a rate of 6 per year.

From 1970 to 1979, 12 joined but 22 left. The upward trend begun in 1980 gives us all hope, but Brothers continue to leave and slow down the upward trend.

It cannot be said too often: statistics are dangerous. The most critical say they are dangerously misleading, especially since we are dealing with an area which depends first and foremost on the free gift of God's love and not on human calculation.

All the same, these figures are enlightening and can (and ought to) make us think.

This is all the more true when one realises that the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is one of the few international congregations whose apostolic experience now exceeds 300 years, 80 of which in Zaire.

That is why we think that the time has come for a common effort to improve, with God's help, our system of formation.

And so it is a source of great joy to see the administrative centre of the Institute and the various sectors in Africa giving priority to the fostering of vocations. The effort made in this area over the past 10 or so years, both financially as well as with regard to personnel, is quite considerable. It is already noticeably bearing fruit, although in some sectors results have not yet come up to expectations.

THE MARTYRDOM OF THE BROTHERS OF TURON

Article 15-7–B-76 gave the biographical details of the 8 Brothers and the Passionist priest martyred in Turon. In view of their approaching beatification, we should like to devote this article to giving some details of their martyrdom.

* * *

The political and social situation in Spain in 1934.

1934 was an eventful year in Spanish political life. For many groups that were anxious to seize power, the Russian Revolution provided a model. Socialism and communism were spreading rapidly, and meetings and publications openly incited the masses to revolt and wreak their vengeance on all their oppressors. Hatred and the spirit of revolt were stirred up by many politicians and the leaders of leftist movements. Their utterances were generally characterised by attacks on religion and religious symbols.

The atmosphere was such that it was obvious that, sooner or later, revolution would break out and an attempt would be made to seize power. It was felt also that included in this there would be a fierce attack on Catholics and especially on priests and religious. The leaders of this revolution decided they would have a trial run in Catalonia and Asturias: if this proved successful, the revolution would be extended to the whole of Spain. Asturias, in the north of Spain, was a mainly mining area with a large population of immigrant workers who had been uprooted from their native provinces. In such a setting leftist groups were solidly organised.

The revolutionary trial run

The beginning of the Asturias Revolution was planned for the month of October, and would start with the proclamation of a general strike. Plans that had been prepared at a national level by the groups and movements concerned had been implemented: revolutionary committees had been set up in each locality, and weapons had been secretly distributed to their members.

On October 5th, a national general strike was launched and with it, in Catalonia and Asturias, the revolution. It was hoped their example would be swiftly followed by other regions.

In Catalonia, however, the attempt at revolution lasted only a few hours. In Asturias, on the other hand, it went on for a fortnight. Its beginning was timed for midnight and it would be announced by a certain number of dynamite explosions in various places. Such explosions would not arouse suspicions as dynamite was regularly used by miners.

The Asturias Revolution

When the signal was given, each committee put into operation what had been planned: they took over the barracks of the forces of law and order, confiscated weapons, occupied the principal buildings, took charge of the population, assumed responsibility for food supplies, and imprisoned all the dangerous people which included priests, religious and leading Catholics.

Although in general the revolutionary leaders tried to control the situation, things got out of hand and many crimes and excesses were committed. They probably had not intended to go so far as to put consecrated people to death, but local groups in many cases took things into their own hands.

The fact remains that, in the course of the 15 days that the revolution lasted, 33 priests and religious were executed in Asturias. Of these, 10 were secular priests, 6 seminarists, 8 Brothers of the Christian Schools, 3 Passionists, 3 Paulists, 2 Jesuits and 1 a Carmelite. The oldest was 71 and the youngest, a seminarist, only 16. Most of these murders were premeditated, and in certain cases, were carried out in an incredibly cruel way. Numerous priests and religious, including Brothers from other communities in Asturias, were able to escape and take refuge with friendly families or flee to the mountains. In addition to this, 17 churches were destroyed, 7 of these at Oviedo, the regional capital, and 10 in various other places.

The Brothers of Turon

Turon is a small mining town near the valley of the Aller, some 20 kilometres from Oviedo, and 6 kilometres from Mieres, another mining town, but much larger. For some time, the Brothers had been running 12 free schools in the area. Of these, some –those at Mieres, Ujo and Bustiello– were very near Turon. Most of their pupils were the children of miners. At Turon, there were 8 Brothers, one of whom worked in the kitchen. Four of them were under 26 years old. The Director, who was the oldest, was 46. Six of them had been at Turon for a year, one 6 months, and another only 20 days.

The local socialists, communists and Freemasons had already attacked the school on several occasions because of the apostolic work and the Christian training that the Brothers were giving to the children and young people, not only during class but also after. It was their greatest ambition to destroy this good work.

Imprisonment of the Brothers

The Turon revolutionary committee began its work at midnight, October 4th. By 5 o'clock next morning, the manager and the management personnel of the Turon coal mine were all in detention. At 6 o'clock, the three local priests were arrested, and shortly afterwards a number of persons whose Catholic convictions were well known.

The Brothers had got up and were getting ready to start their community prayers. With them there was Fr. Inocencio, a Passionist from Mieres, who had come the day before to hear the pupils' confessions and to prepare them for the first Friday of the month. The sister-in-law of one of the arrested priests ran over to the Brothers immediately to warn them that the revolution had started and that they had imprisoned the priests. Her advice to the Brothers was to leave as soon as possible, as they would be coming for them also. That is what she said to the Brother who was preparing the altar in chapel for Mass. He went up immediately to warn the other Brothers. Somewhat scared, they decided to have Fr. Inocencio say Mass immediately, and to do whatever was necessary afterwards.

They had reached the offertory when they heard shouting at the school entrance. A group of revolutionaries, armed with rifles, were banging on the door, demanding to be let in. Seeing what was happening, the priest suggested they consume the sacred species in the tabernacle so as to avoid any profanation, and this they did. Meanwhile, the shouting and the banging was still going on. One of the Brothers went to open the door, and the leader of the group said they wanted to search the house for weapons. The Brother replied that he would go and speak to the Director, but the whole group pushed its way in and began searching all the classrooms. Then they went upstairs to where the Brothers were already in their rooms. They made them come out and searched everything thoroughly. They did not find any of things they were looking for, but only the list of members belonging to the Catholic Youth group which met at the school. This did not prevent them from doing a fair amount of damage during the course of their search. When they had finished, they told the Brothers they were under arrest, and without allowing them to take anything with them, led them off to what was called "The People's House" where they met other people who had been arrested earlier.

Their imprisonment lasted four days. The first day, they were left alone in a room and were given nothing to eat. The following day, food was brought to them: it had been prepared outside at the expense of the Director of the "Hulleras" factory. The three priests joined them in their room. From the very outset, the Brothers had realised they were going to be killed. There were moments, however, when they still hoped they would be set free.

They spent their time in prayer, either together or by themselves. On the third day, convinced they were going to die, they made their confession to the priests. In the meantime, close by, the revolutionary committee made the decision to kill them. One of the leaders, who got on well with the parish priest, objected to killing the local priests. The sentence was to have been carried out the following day, but various revolutionary activities prevented this, and they had to wait an extra day. That evening, two revolutionary leaders came to "see how the prisoners were getting on". Among other things, they wanted to know if the Brothers' cook was also a religious or only an employee.

October 8th came to an end and they lay down to sleep on the ground as they had done the previous nights. The Brothers had kept their serenity much to the astonishment of their guards. At one o'clock in the morning, two leaders came into the room and ordered them out so they could be taken to the front. However, they made them leave all their things behind. They took them out into the street, and they found themselves facing a group of revolutionaries with their rifles trained on them. They were joined by two other prisoners, policemen from Oviedo. The leader of the revolutionaries, Silverio Castañon, asked them if they knew where they were going. One of the Brothers answered: "Wherever you like. We're ready for anything." "Well, you're going to die", the leader replied. He ordered them to start moving, and they made their way to the cemetery. The two policemen went first, then the Brothers followed by Fr. Inocencio. The execution squad followed behind.

The evening before, a trench had been dug in the cemetery. It was nine metres long and quite deep. There had been rain on the preceding days. That night it was quite cold. On their way there they did not talk: they prepared themselves for the sacrifice. It took them ten minutes to reach the gates of the cemetery. They were locked. The leader sent someone from the village to go and find the gravedigger who arrived a few minutes later with the key.

The squad leader told the Brothers to line up in front of the trench. Facing them stood the squad of armed men with their weapons aimed at them. The order to fire was given. There were two volleys, and then the leader and his second-in-command went around finishing them off with their pistols. Someone finished the Director off with a sledge-hammer and his head was separated from the body. The corpses were thrown into the trench and the gravedigger was forced to fill it in with earth. Then the group of revolutionaries returned to the village.

The other prisonner heard the volleys and realised the sacrifice had been offered. It was the morning of October 9th 1934.

Witnesses to Christ

From the very beginning, everyone considered the Brothers and Fr. Inocencio to be true martyrs. The only reason why they were murdered was because they were religious. Everyone was quite clear about this, including their murderers.

The evidence gathered for the beatification cause is incontrovertible. The revolutionary leader who was arrested after these events said, when he was in prison, that, when they were being taken to the cemetery, "they walked with much recollection and prayed to prepare themselves for their sacrifice", and that "they showed much determination and courage". An eye-witness of the execution and a fellow prisoner made a written statement, saying: "he did not hear them complain at any time or say anything, both on the way from the People's House to the cemetery as well as during their execution by firing squad or while waiting for the coup de grace". He added that "their death was the work of a number of villains, because the local people would never have allowed their children's teacher to be murdered, and that is why they did it at night, forcing those who had to execute them".

Here are the names of the martyrs: Brother Cirilo Beltran (46), Marciano Jose (33), Julian Alfredo (31), Victorino Pio (29), Benjamin Julian (25), Augusto Andres (24), Benito de Jesus (23), Aniceto Adolfo (22) and Fr. Inocencio de la Inmaculada (47). The remains of the Brothers were transferred to Bujedo on February 26th 1935.

The District of Valladolid has recently published a detailed account of these events as well as a biography of these martyrs in a very well documented book entitled "Testigos de la Escuela cristiana - Mártires de la revolución de Asturias". It contains 487 pages of text and illustrations and is the work of Brother Pedro Chico González. Copies of the book can be obtained from the Valladolid District Secretary, Arcas Reales s/n, 47008 Valladolid. Spain.

OUR WORK OF FOSTERING VOCATIONS

As the one responsible for fostering vocations in the District of Quebec, I should like to tell you what the vocations situation is like here, describing some of the difficulties we experience, and the efforts we make, with faith and hope, in spite of the lack of candidates.

Fostering vocations in a difficult situation.

Because of our social and religious situation we feel a certain unease when it comes to recruiting vocations. Families in Quebec, ever fewer in number, are being destroyed as they struggle with separation and divorce. The fall in birth-rate is becoming more and more noticeable. Religious practice has its ups and downs, in spite of the praiseworthy efforts of charismatic groups and others, and spiritual renewal centres. Our young people are the victims of our society and live in a difficult situation dominated by unemployment, suicide, and selfishness. As for us Brothers, our average age is high, and fewer and fewer of us work in schools. And so the age gap between us and students grows steadily wider, and the reality is that it is becoming increasingly difficult to establish contact. Perhaps we no longer dare to offer them a challenge. At times we feel incapable of speaking about ourselves, of suggesting to others the ideal which has inspired our own lives for so long. In short, we are asking ourselves questions about our visibility, our witness and our presence among young people. The least one can say is that fostering vocations is for us a very complex business, difficult to come to grips with and assess in our Quebec context.

Are we then in a hopeless situation?

In the depths of our heart we all ask the same questions: Lord, what do you want me to do? We know that prayer is a priority, and we are making a great effort in this area. At the level of our local communities, we notice that the novena for vocations from the 16th to the 25th has returned. Several Brothers say the rosary privately for the intention of good vocations. In our own community of St. Joseph's, sick and retired Brothers join together in their prayers and sufferings for this same intention. During the course of the year many Masses are said.

We have to remember that the Lord's call comes by way of intermediaries, through us. Our apostolic work, in all its diversity, produces no vocations: inter-District secondary schools, remedial work centres for truants, pastoral centres which work with thousands of youngsters each year seeking to strengthen their faith, halfway houses for young people and families in trouble, etc. What is there still missing in what we do? We must find a solution. Yes, but what solution? Should we consolidate or try out something new? These questions are a constant part of our lives. And we cannot ignore the call to conversion made by our Superior General (January 1987).

The contribution made by our District.

The contribution made by our District in the area of fostering vocations is quite remarkable:

last July, a two day special Chapter was held, devoted to the fostering of vocations in our District, and to which outside speakers came to share their experience and suggestions. Of the 30 or so who took part, a good dozen were prepared to express their views in a short talk lasting between 5 and 10 minutes. Workshop sessions enabled all to say what they thought and to speak of their involvement. Of the decisions reached, the following are worth noting:

«That the inter-District school of Mont Benilde be a special place where young people have suggested to them the idea of following a vocation, especially the vocation of a Brother of the Christian Schools».

«That a team of Brothers, based on the community of Villa des Jeunes (a pastoral centre), be entrusted with the task of running youth groups with a view to forming a group of young people committed to a deeper spiritual involvement».

«That all Brothers, associating themselves with the efforts being made to find vocations for the District, show their solidarity by prayer, by the proclamation of the Word, and by the personal witness of a successful life».

A vocations committee, made up of 8 Brothers, with the Vocations Director as chairman, holds regular meetings for the purpose of thinking about the needs of young people, about how to make contact with them, about how to make Brothers more aware of their mission and make them concerned about vocations. The committee also seeks to make concrete proposals. The main concern of the committee is on the witness level: young people need guides and witnesses; they need someone to introduce them to a Jesus who is close and personal. Our communities must open their doors to these youngsters and welcome them, because it is by showing them the way that we will find ours.

I should like to mention also the contribution made by the Vicar General, Brother Genaro, and General Councillor Brother Martin Corral, at a meeting with the members of the District vocations team. After a general survey of our vocations situation, our own study of it and our commitment, our distinguished visitor said they were edified by the serious efforts made in our District, taking into account the social and religious situation in Quebec. «The wealth and easy-going ways of Quebec society do not encourage your young people to make personal, Christian or vocational commitments», they said. In conclusion, they invited us to challenge the Brothers, to make them more aware of the mission of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, to make specific appeals to young people, and to continue to pray, because it is all God's work.

One final word.

«We are therefore convinced that, if you are full of zeal to work with these young people, if you are available to help them organise themselves, then God will have some really astonishing results in store for you». (Br. Superior General, Reunion, April 1987).

May Blessed Brother Scubilion obtain labourers for the harvest!

PERSPECTIVE OF A RELIGIOUS EDUCATOR IN A SCIENCE CLASSROOM

The perspective that I'm going to take on this topic is a Lasallian perspective. What would it have meant to the Founder to be a religious educator? First, he had a very strong belief that God was at the center of who he was and what he did. As evidence of this, he wrote:

«The spirit of the Institute is first a spirit of faith which should induce those who compose it not to look upon anything but with the eyes of faith, not to do anything but in view of God and to attribute all to God.»

This is a fundamental thing that comes to us from the Founder, that all depends on Divine Providence. It's all God's plan. He writes:

«God is so good that he not only brings us into existence by His act of creation, but also desires that all of us come to the knowledge of truth.»

If God is at the center of my life, then all of my activity should be an opportunity for knowing Him better. It should be contemplative. This is one of the things that the Founder saw about the school which we sometimes tend to forget, that a school can be a place where contemplation is possible.

As evidence of this, we see that the Founder insisted that meditation was essential to the Brother's life. Also, the Founder had classes stopped every half hour so that students could remember that they were in God's presence by one student announcing. «Live Jesus in our hearts, forever.» This half-hour reminder stressed the concept that God is the center of all things.

From the Management of Christian Schools we read:

«It is the duty of a good master to inspire his pupils with a relish for and a habit of prayer and to induce them to form the custom of having recourse to God in the different circumstances of life and above all, in their personal trials and family afflictions. Every half hour a pupil should say aloud, "Let us remember that we are in the holy presence of God." The exercises will be immediately suspended and the pupils and masters should recollect themselves for the space of an "Ave Maria". These prayers are useful to the master by helping him to renew to attention both towards himself and to the presence of God. They are useful to the pupils by habituating them to think of God from time to time during the day.»

The next thing that was a fundamental belief was that in promoting the dignity of persons and the pursuit of truth, the Christian School can be a place where God is experienced. Where human persons are the center, where truth is the center, God is experienced. There is no separation or division there. The Declaration states:

«The day-to-day human experiences and the discovery of the secrets of the universe are presented there with their own inherent values. This, in turn, gives rise to question about the ultimate meaning of things that are charged with hidden and unnoticed potential. In their educational activity, the Brothers seek to integrate the effort for human development with the announcement of God's word. They are convinced that any education that respects the human person is a way to open people to God's grace and so dispose them to accept the faith.» So there is that connection between the human and the divine and where human persons are respected, there God can be found.

It is important to realize that the founder did have a kind of conversion experience that led him to the schools and it may be very different from our reasons to come to the schools. Because you decided you wanted to be a science teacher you looked for a school that would hire you and now you are at this place to talk about what that school is about and what it is like. However, the Founder set up a whole life-view which had to do with the fact that God was the center of it. From there, he took the natural step to found the schools. Although we come to the school for different reasons, once we are here some important things can happen if we reflect on some of the truths and traditions that precede us.

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

These truths and traditions are what distinguish a Lasallian school. For an educator, at least for the religious educator teaching in a Lasallian school, it is important to realize what it is that is different about our schools.

The Founder talked from the very beginning about the fact our schools were conducted together and by association. This is an important value. The Brothers were to work together and assist each other. The schools were even built in such a way that the Brothers could look down at any time and see the other Brothers teaching. The highlight of my teaching, over the years, has been the times when I have worked with other people for the students. However, often our schools are divided into all sorts of ways that isolate teachers.

* *

Another characteristic was the special attention given to the poor. The Founder writes:

«You know that your duty requires you to instruct the poor. Endeavor to imitate this same kindness towards them and strive to overcome the promptings of nature when they suggest that you should more consideration for the rich than for the poor.»

Many times, it is the rich student, the one who has a little more intelligence, the one who looks better or is more talented, to which we gravitate. But it is the poor student that we need to give the special attention since this is a characteristic of our schools.

* *

A third characteristic was that the schools were gratuitous. The reason for this comes from the Founder's understanding of the gospel. When the students came to him they were all to be equal. There was to be no preference for anybody who had more money.

Obviously we cannot run free schools today. But we must not look like we are favoring the rich because they can pay tuition. We cannot have activities in the school that cater only to the rich. The Founder's way of dealing with this problem was to take money from anyone except those he was teaching.

* *

Another characteristic of the early schools was that the Founder perfected the simultaneous method of teaching. But there was an emphasis on the individual. The Founder emphasized having knowledge about the individual and developed a system whereby detailed files were kept on each student. From the very beginning, there was to be an emphasis on the individual's needs, his special ways of learning.

Also, the school was to be a formative place. It was not just a place to teach reading, writing, or religion, but it was where the whole student was formed.

The school was to be counter-cultural in the sense that it was based on the gospel. Then, as today, the school was to stand for real values and not values simply gleaned from elsewhere.

* *

Finally the school was characterized by a spirit of faith and zeal. The Declaration states:

«The Brother is totally immersed in the life of the students. He shares their interests, their worries, their hopes. He is not so much a school-master instilling a set of teachings as he is an older brother or sister who helps them to be aware of what the spirit is speaking within themselves, what their own abilities are, and little by little, how they may discover their true place in the world.»

In the Lasallian school the teacher is a sister, a brother, to her/his students and that is the kind of thing that characterizes her/his relationship with them.

As science teachers it is important that you know your subject matter very well and that you know the Church's stand on issues such as biogenetics, etc. You also have to be able to tell students when you have a problem with an issue; when you, yourself, have not completely resolved or sorted through an issue. I think it is legitimate to tell students that, «This is not something I have the answers to yet either». Since you are leading students to make informed decisions based on their consciences, you have to make available to them appropriate information, such as the Church's teachings.

One of the mistakes that young people make is that they want easy answers to everything. I don't think that is possible, especially in the world of science. But, you have to be able to tell them clearly what the Catholic Church teaches.

LASALLIAN PEDAGOGY,

A LIBERATING PEDAGOGY (1/2)

Introduction.

As a point of information before starting to examine this subject: while one can consider pedagogy on three levels –as an art, as a science and as a philosophy– it is only as a philosophy that it will concern us in this article.

What we wish to do, then, is to consider its aims in all their principal forms.

It is obvious that every philosophy owes much to its historical context. It is consequently hardly surprising to find that the writings of De La Salle in themselves do not provide answers for all the questions which arise at the end of the 20th century.

Our task, therefore, confronted by a constantly changing world, will be to examine closely the spirit and intentions of De La Salle so as to be able to determine what Lasallian pedagogy should be at the present time.

We might perhaps summarise it by the three letters of the alphabet by which we are known in the Church: F.S.C.: Faith, Service, Communion.

We see a connection between "Service" and "Purpose", between "Communion" and "Means"; and finally we see "Faith" as leading to "Witness" and an "Ecclesial Dimension", and being connected with "Basic Foundation".

I. PURPOSE:
Service, Mission of the Lasallian school.

"The purpose of this Institute..." (Rule 1, 3) is the Lasallian way of expressing the basic message of the Gospel: "Proclaim Jesus Christ".

On analysis, this purpose has four main characteristics: human education, Christian education, for young people especially the poor, as a part of the Church.

A. Human education.

This can be viewed from various angles. Eighteen years of my life spent among impoverished immigrants from North Africa and Turkey have made me aware of its "liberating" aspect.

Without going any more deeply into the "why", let us limit ourselves to some brief comments which answer the question "how" and which pinpoint some of the characteristics of a Lasallian school.

1. A Lasallian school should be characterised by the fact that it makes its students actively responsible for their own development. They have to learn how to be involved in their own education and develop social responsibility. To achieve this, they should be given an active role to play in class. (cf. Rule 13 b)

The pupil is not an object which receives, which is someone's idea, which is ignorant of everything. He is rather the one who thinks, who searches, discovers, creates, plays an active part in his own development. (cf. Paolo Freire)

All this necessarily implies a certain teacher-taught relationship: it is not one between someone who knows everything and badly misunderstands the idea of authority, and another person who knows nothing: it is a relationship of communion and brotherhood. (cf. below)

2. With regard to what is taught, a Lasallian school takes care to prepare its students to take their place in present-day society and in that of the future. (cf. Decl. 45)

This implies constant adaptation to society as it evolves but without losing a critical spirit.

Moreover, we should remember that what is taught is not simply a body of knowledge, but also and perhaps principally, values that are the foundation of the education of the whole person.

3. A third aspect of this human education, which is more rarely stressed, is that a Lasallian school is where pupils are taught to be active agents not only in their own education, but also in "social transformation".

School has a political role to play in the sense of "acting on society". As Maurice Bellet wrote: "Educating people is what, in the final analysis, changes the course of things most profoundly".

This reflects the nature of the Lasallian school. There are numerous passages in Chapter documents which support this same idea. (Cf. Decl. p. 48, 3; 45...).

De La Salle himself challenged the society of his day by actions which appeared revolutionary at the time.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The school will contribute to the transformation of society by promoting and defending certain values, even if they go against those of contemporary society.

We can give a few examples of this: respect for the poor; solidarity rather than competitiveness and rivalry; team-spirit rather than individualism: promoting the good of the group rather than that of the individual, for this latter course closes a pupil in on himself and prevents him from being open to others, by encouraging his greed for goods and power (cf. Michel Sauvage, p. 354); a critical spirit. (cf. Rule, 13 c)

This last value deserves special mention. We must realise that, unless we are careful, the school becomes part of society: it begins to reflect it and its current models of behaviour.

These latter, however, are not always compatible with Gospel values, which are the only valid criteria for a Christian and, therefore, a Lasallian school.

Another value that needs to be promoted is justice. While the 1966 Chapter stated that being faithful to the specific intentions of the Founder clearly meant adopting a preferential option for the poor, the 1976 Chapter spoke of "fighting for justice", and the 1986 Chapter, in article 14 of the Rule, says that Brothers should "become increasingly conscious of the reasons for the poverty that surrounds them and so become earnestly involved in the promotion of justice and human dignity through the educational service they provide."

B. Christian education.

We are dealing here with something that is absolutely fundamental to our mission.

"Christian education" immediately makes one think of prayer and religion lessons, and this is as it should be.

The Christian school is a school where Christian doctrine is taught, where people pray or, rather, are taught to pray, that is, to live intimately with a person, that of Jesus Christ.

The Christian school and, therefore, the Lasallian school is a school whose whole life, at every moment of the day, should consist in living out the teachings of the Good News in the presence of Jesus. And this Good News is that we are all certainly saved and risen with Him, and that its key-word is love.

If we do not love others, all our prayers and eucharistic celebrations are nothing more than lies.

– A school is not Christian if it shunts to the back of the class the child that hasn't the first clue about anything, or one who is a thundering nuisance and who gets on our nerves.

– A school is not Christian if people are prepared to live in a state of conflict: pupils with pupils, pupils with teachers, teachers with teachers, teachers with the headmaster, etc.

– A school is not Christian if it automatically expels a pupil for some infringement of school regularions, without trying to discover the reason for it, and without caring about what will happen to that pupil.

– A school is not Christian if it does not respect the personal dignity of others.

C. Especially of the poor (cf. Med. 80, 3; Announcing the Gospel to the Poor, p. 44-45).

If the Founder was adamant about making his schools free, and so changing the schools of his day, it was to ensure they would be accessible to all children, not only to children of well-off families, but to the "children of the artisans and the poor".

The question as to who are the poor today is answered in Circular 412.

There are perhaps two categories of underprivileged persons we should look at more closely.

There are those we dismissively call "dunces": a teacher who really loved them would find means to help them to make the most of what abilities they had.

And then there are in industrialised countries the social misfits, among whom we must include the children of the most recent immigrants, the refugees. This area deserves some serious study but is beyond the scope of this article.

We can conclude by making the following observation: a lot is said about the "democratisation of teaching", but to talk is not enough: we must act. Solutions do exist but they are not always made use of.

LASALLIAN PEDAGOGY, A LIBERATING PEDAGOGY (2/2)

II. MEANS: Communion, Association, Brotherhood.

Another aspect of the Lasallian school is that of communion, which implies association and brotherhood.

A. Association.

The Lasallian educational programme is implemented "together and by association" by Brothers and lay people, who are aware of the historical inspirational qualities of the legacy of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

From the very first years of working with his teachers, De La Salle realised that, to meet the needs of poor children efficiently, there had to be total commitment on the part of the teachers, and all had to work together, thus ensuring continuity of schooling.

For Lasallian teachers, working together and by association means not only following the same educational programme, but considering themselves partners in its implementation, responsible for its success and personally committed to its fulfilment.

This willingness to be associated is translated into concrete terms by a common acceptance of human and evangelical values, a desire to live according to them, and to encourage others to do so also.

It is shown by behaviour and attitudes in everyday life. Conflicts can arise. This is human and fortunate, because it is a sign of life. Conflict is enriching as long as it is faced up to and resolved.

B. Brotherhood.

The second aspect of communion is the atmosphere of friendliness or brotherhood to be found in a Lasallian school.

Whereas in French schools, before the 18th century, personal relations were strongly influenced by authority, discipline and recourse to punishment, in his schools, De La Salle seems to have tried to change this situation by reconciling the need for order, so that work can be done, with respect, amiability and friendliness in relations.

The Meditations often speak of "touching the hearts of pupils", and of "loving them tenderly".

The Lasallian school, faithful to its origins, tries to create and promote an atmosphere of friendly relations among all the members of the educational community.

Is it not this atmosphere that makes people return again and again to Lasallians schools?

III. BASIC FOUNDATION: Faith.

How can we live according to our faith as Christian teachers?

If founders of orders based their spirituality on some specific virtue, for De La Salle this virtue was the Spirit of Faith.

Based on the Spirit of Faith and the Spirit of Jesus Christ, Lasallian spirituality is christocentric.

We have now moved into the area of Christology. This can perhaps be seen from different points of view depending on geographical location, historical period and sociological context. Most recent writing on the subject tales into account a whole range of complementary factors which enable us to gain some idea of what Jesus did.

This brings us to the idea of a "liberating" Jesus:

«Too often we would look for a comforting tranquilliser in a personal image of Christ. This enables us to put to one side questions affecting common humanity, while all the while surrounded by a sea of misery and massive unemployment, and to find a sense of security in our religious practices». (Tissa Balasuriya, "Jesus-Christ et la libération humaine")

No one can deny that Christ opted for personal freedom.

In a Roman society that was sick, full of inequality and exploitation, he preached personal human dignity. There are innumerable situations in the Gospel where there was a clash of values, and where he chose those that promoted the dignity and freedom of the individual.

But if Jesus came to promote personal freedom by freeing people from all their interior blockages and their source, personal sin; he showed by his actions that he was likewise opposed to another type, namely, collective sin.

In a society in which social conformism was the rule, he had the courage to question values that held sway and which crushed poor and unimportant people.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Jesus called upon people to make a clear choice of God and justice rather than money and greed. (cf. Lk. 16).

Henceforward, witnessing to the Gospel is not possible without at the same time undertaking to remove the obstacles to the values preached by Christ. This brings us back to the Rule, article 14.

IV. WITNESS.

If our communities are communities of faith, they will quite naturally bear witness to this.

If the sociological context of past centuries explains why evangelisation came to be thought of as active transmission of propaganda, even as external pressure, the pluralist world in which we live must make us revise totally our ways of thinking in this matter.

While we do not have to create separate religious groups for their own sake, we do have to remain within the human community, within a specific Christian community.

The question is to know how to live within it, not separately but likewise not swallowed up by it.

We do not have to be a Church of silence, forgetful of Jesus Christ. On the contrary, we must bear witness to an explicit faith in Jesus Christ.

One of the fundamental questions, and one that can sometimes cause anguish, is how to suggest to others to seek Jesus Christ who is our life, while respecting fully their liberty, and in a way that enables them to make a free choice.

V. THE ECCLESIAL DIMENSION.

How should our educational communities be the Church, build the Church?

It has been rightly said of the Founder that he had a "prophetic vision" of a renewed Church.

The first Brothers were led to be constantly aware of the importance of their work in the Church.

«Consider that you are working in your ministry for the building of the Church through your teaching of the children whom God has entrusted to your care.» (MTR, 8.1)

But if De La Salle presents the Church as being at the same time mystical, christological and spiritual (cf. Sauvage and Campos), he shows it also at the same time to be part of human reality and therefore sinful.

In Meditation 205, he urges the Brothers to make it holy and to "purify" it with the word of life.

De La Salle knows that for it to become credible it must divest itself of its privileges, honours, possessions, culture, in a word, of all that prevents it from being the spouse of the One who was despised and poor, and whose only concern was for the Kingdom of his Father.

Our love for the Church must go so far as to make us dare to denounce by silent or even vocal opposition certain unjust situations, structures and methods that it supports even if it is only by its silence.

Let us not end, however, on a rather negative note: rather let us rejoice at all the things that makes her a spouse worthy of the Master.

Let us remember the true witnesses to the Gospel, Proagno, Romero, and all those thousands of priests, men and women religious and lay people who have been imprisoned and tortured because they had taken up the defence of the unimportant people who are crushed by regimes who betray the name of Christian.

CONCLUSION.

A commited community, one that has a critical spirit, a community of faith, bearing witness to the faith, an ecclesial community, will find its fulfilment in the liberating sacrament, par excellence, the Eucharist; the sacrament which authenticates a coming together for a great cause, that of the liberation of the world.

«Jesus Christ unites himself to you in holy communion in order to transform you into himself, so that you thus form but one heart and soul with him, and his interior disposition become your own». (Med. 54. 3)

THE APOSTOLIC ROLE OF THE LAY TEACHER IN THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL

In establishments run by religious, the lay teacher is not simply a helper. He is above all a Christian who has a vocation to be a teacher: he offers his services to his pupils to help them become men and, because they are believers, to give them a more complete education.

WHAT THE PRESENT-DAY CHURCH CALLS FOR

1. The Church has now left behind that period of history in which the religious school was considered to be a substitute: it no longer sees it as being competitive either. What the Church calls for at the present time is a presence in education which is a witness to its message of salvation, and which serves the spiritual needs of people.

The lay teacher must be aware of his role as a believer who gives pupils that come to him a human and Christian education.

To the extent that his faith is vigorous and well-founded, he will feel it his duty to use it in the service of the believers he is educating.

2. As a baptised person and a believer, the lay teacher is in a position which is not radically different from that of other teachers who have consecrated themselves to the service of the Church and the Gospel by their religious profession.

His basic apostolate is to give what he has: culture, service, help and faith also.

3. The Church, as a community established by Christ, and we do not mean only its Magisterium and hierarchy, calls upon its members with insistence to acquit themselves of their duty to proclaim salvation to all men.

Aware of his baptismal character, the lay teacher is convinced that he is a herald announcing the message of salvation in the school in which he works. He announces this message by the sincerity of his speech, the witness of his life, and by collaborating with other Christians in the school, whose work is inspired by the same ideal.

4. He is sensitive to the spiritual needs of the Christians around him who are receiving a human and spiritual education. It is among them that he becomes fully aware of his baptismal and evangelical duty as a responsible Christian and, above all, as an influential teacher.

5. At no point, consequently, does he feel that he is simply a helper of more commited Christians, like the religious he works with. He is, like them, responsible for the evangelical and spiritual training of his pupils.

If he teaches religion, he is faithful to the message he carries. If he does not, he realises all the same that his work as a teacher of other subjects must be inspired by Christ's message of salvation. He looks upon science, history, literature, art and crafts with the eyes of a believer. He is not content simply not to take a rationalist, pragmatic or naturalist point of view: he offers his pupils teaching that takes into account the existence of Providence and the spiritual world.

THE DEMANDS OF THE LASALLIAN CHARISM

If the lay teacher, working in an establishment inspired by the spirituality and educational approach of St. John Baptist de La Salle, has an open and understanding attitude, he will be encouraged by this very fact to become more aware of certain values that are a part of the Lasallian charism:

* a special awareness of his poorest pupils (the clumsy, lonely, problematic, hurt, ungifted and underprivileged);

* closer personal and affectionate relationships with each of his pupils;

* justice and fairness in assessment of work, as well as of behaviour and reaction;

* a practical and open approach to discussion about teaching methodology and content of courses;

* unshakeable fidelity to the spiritual and educational directives laid down by the hierarchy of the Church;

* willingness to work as part of a community, and an ability to share problems, efforts and work;

* a sense of responsibility with regard to tasks entrusted to him, and a sense of subsidiarity and collaboration.

The lay teacher working in a Lasallian school must attach much importance to doctrinal orthodoxy, openness towards the Church, sacramental life, devotion to Our Lady, fidelity to the spirit of Christianity, and the practice of the social virtues.

The Lasallian charism calls upon him to have the threefold spirit which the Founder of the Christian Schools and Heavenly Patron of all teachers wanted for his schools:

– a deep spirit of faith which sees God in the everyday events of life and history;

– a burning zeal for the salvation of pupils, helping them to turn their minds and hearts to God by the Christian training he gives them;

– a great awareness of the Christian community, which makes disinterested collaboration possible when giving this training.

The lay teacher at a Lasallian school is always prepared to learn more, to improve himself on a personal and professional level. He realises, in fact, the great responsibility given him, and he knows that he will not be able to do justice to it if he takes refuge in laziness, routine, and the expedient way-out.

This concern for continuing his training encourages him to work hard in the field of religious studies and teaching methodology, and to acquire the ability which is essential for relating to pupils. This demands much effort from him and sometimes involves sacrifices, but one element of the charism of John Baptist de La Salle is a strong and constant desire for improvement, and a willingness to be generous with one's time, ideas and signs of solidarity.

THE PERSON OF SAINT JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

He is not the exclusive heritage of a religious institution or a religious congregation.

The lay teacher in a school inspired by Saint John Baptist de La Salle should be aware of his providential value, and should share in an up-to-date and creative implementation of an ecclesial charism which goes far beyond a simple, passing devotion.

He must do all he can to get know this Church figure, his educational insights and especially his apostolic and catechetical inspiration which set a new trend in Christian education.

Sharing in this ecclesial wealth will give him a clearer idea of his own identity, while at the same time ensuring that his work as a teacher procures for him the happiness of fulfilling a noble mission. What is even more important is the fact of providing his pupils with an education marked by a true evangelical spirit and one that is full of spiritual meaning.

A PROFESSIONAL PSYCHOLOGICAL PROFILE OF A LASALLIAN LAY TEACHER

HIS WORK AS A TEACHER

1. He does all he can to be competent as a cultured person and as a teacher. He studies.

2. He is sensitive where justice is concerned with regard to both pupils and his colleagues in school. He goes so far as to claim for them what is best not only from an economic point of view, but also and especially from one that is moral, cultural and even spiritual.

3. He shows solidarity, willingness to work with others, responsibility and commitment (in acts rather than in words).

4. He tries to have relationships in school that are characterised by closeness, a family spirit, elegance and cordiality.

5. His approach to his profession is enthusiastic and joyful. He makes his vocation bear fruit through his efforts and conscientious attitude.

7. He shows concern for his own self-improvement, seeing in it the means of ensuring that his teaching is more professional and up to standard.

8. He is wary of theories and utopias, especially where fundamentals are concerned, because he is convinced that it is important for a teacher to be practical and concrete.

9. He is always spontaneous and bright, doing all he can to win his pupils' confidence, and ensuring his influence over them rather by his love of teaching than by exorbitant demands.

10. He is always studying. He is prepared to learn by experience all he needs to know in order to do his job properly as a teacher.

HIS SPIRITUAL LIFE

1. He tries to increase his faith as a Christian by his own continuing formation and by putting into practice evangelical and Church criteria.

2. As a believer, he reads the Word of God frequently, seeking nourishment for his soul, avoiding all subjectivism, and following the guidelines of the Church found in the pronouncements of the Magisterium.

3. He shows great respect for the conscience of others, while developing his own.

4. He prays often and pursues his favourite devotions. Above all he develops his baptismal life by means of the sacraments.

5. Among all his other various and worthwhile devotions, he finds his greatest pleasure in his devotion to the Mother of God, the teacher of her Son.

6. In all the events of his life, he sees the hand of God who is always close to man.

7. He values professional virtues, especially charity, justice, patience, strength, joy, etc.

8. He always has a positive attitude towards life, towards events and people, even when he has to confront them.

9. In his own life he sets a high value on sincerity so that his personal witness may have a very strong impact on his pupils.

10. He often meditates in his heart on the person of Christ: he should become his principal source of inspiration, since he is the model of all teachers who have a heart. As a teacher full of faith he imitates Christ.

HIS APOSTOLIC ZEAL

1. He is aware of his responsibilities as a teacher, and considers his work as an evangelical service that he must offer with enthusiasm.

2. He gives disinterested help to the most needy, and sound advice to the lonely, the afraid, those with no will power, and the friendless.

3. He is always attentive to the spiritual needs of others, and he provides them with enough light and strength to overcome the temptations, dangers and obstacles that surround them.

4. He always manages to find the best ways of doing good: he gives advice and encouragement; he leads

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

people to forgive and understand; he offers criteria inspired by the Gospel.

5. By the witness of his life he demonstrates in what direction good lies: he teaches how to pray; he encourages the frequentation of the sacraments; he points out criteria for just behaviour; he offers solutions to problems; he is constantly pointing the way to the Gospels.

6. He gives of himself unstintingly, even at great personal cost, when someone near him, whoever he may be, needs his help.

7. He always gives freely what he has received freely, for he realises that God's gifts are free.

8. He does not become discouraged at apparent failure, for he understands that, in the eyes of God, there are no failures when what is done is done in his name.

9. He is always prepared to face new situations, without being over attached to persons, places or resources.

10. He thanks God often for having chosen him for the important work of Christian education. He sees his profession as a sublime gift which marks him as someone specially chosen by God.

HIS ATTACHMENT TO THE CHURCH

1. He realises and feels that he belongs to the Church, and he follows faithfully the directives that come to him with the authority of the Magisterium.

2. He studies with great interest the documents and instructions of the Church, so that they become for him the norms for his conduct and, especially, a source of inspiration.

3. He takes pains to ensure his pupils feel what it means to belong to the Church, and he tries to make them go beyond the stage of seeing it only in sociological terms.

4. He defends the Church of Jesus with objectivity and sincerity, without glossing over, however, the mistakes that individuals or institutions may have committed.

5. By all the means at his disposal, he seeks to deepen his knowledge and love of the Church. He tries likewise to make his pupils share his own convictions and feelings.

HIS LASALLIAN SPIRIT

1. He considers himself fortunate to have been chosen to work in a profession inspired by the charism of John Baptist de La Salle.

2. He tries to increase his knowledge of the spirituality and pedagogical approach of the Founder of the Christian Schools. He acts on the basis of what is to be found there.

3. He feels he is a partner in the work he does and not simply a salaried teacher with no interest in these principles.

4. He works with others as a teacher at a local level, and feels proud at being part of a movement which is truly ecclesial and international.

5. He supports all the undertakings and initiatives that help to spread the work of the Christian Schools, including the fostering of vocations of various sorts to undertake this work.

THE LASALLIAN TEACHER CONSIDERS HIMSELF TO BE A PARTNER IN A CHURCH UNDERTAKING

This Church undertaking transcends time and space.

It transcends time because it is a response to a charism which has inspired an undertaking for 300 years, and which consequently has been approved by the Church for the same length of time.

It transcends the narrow limits of where we live, because it is spread over 5 continents and is to be found in almost all the countries where the Church has taken root. Its international character ensures its catholicity, oecumenism, and its work of evangelisation.

Far from shutting itself up in an impoverishing cliquish mentality, it sees in these two areas of transcendnece a reason to feel even more deeply that it belongs to the Church of Jesus, and to realise that it is committed to work in a specific area, it is true, but with a vocation also to be universal.

SHAME AND EVANGELIZATION

At first, the title of this article may seem stange. Nevertheless, when examined, there appears to be a close but harmful relationship between the two as actually practiced. I would like to explore both of these areas and give focus to them in such a way that it will be helpful to deans of discipline, to religion teachers, to the adolescent retreat and encounter facilitator, and in a general way to adults dealing with adolescents. One of the things that has always bothered me in my years of teaching and giving youth retreats and encounters was the resistance by young people to things religious. And yet, when one gets beyond the facade into the person, the hunger for God and the deep spirituality that one finds in young people is awe-inspiring. In spite of this yearning for spirituality, and in many cases a genuine advance and growth in the spiritual life, there still remains a spectrum from hostility to deep suspicion of things religious. I believe that a clue to understanding this phenomenon is the role that shame has played in institutions of evangelization and education as well as the methodology and techniques that are commonly used. As I talk about shame, I would like to put some parameters on the words as I use them.

SHAME is the pain of feeling exposed to oneself or to others as defective, deficient, and flawed; it is the rupture of the self with the self; and it is excruciatingly painful because the self is exposed to the self as failure. This inner torment leads to deep spiritual malaise, which combines a feeling of being basically alone with the sense of absence and emptiness. John Bradshaw calls this toxic shame which he distinguishes from healthy shame. Healthy shame puts one in touch with one's self, the limitations one has a creature, the need for others, the need for relationship, the need for help. It lets us know that we are not God. Erikson points out the role of shame in the second stage of development. It is healthy when the primary caretaker –in Erikson's framework, the parents– has established trust the child can begin to set his/her own boundaries, learning to hold on and to let go, at different levels of being.

GUILT. Guilt and shame are often confused. Guilt, in a healthy sense, would be the psycho-emotional pain one feels in violating a norm or value that is part of one's moral values system. It can be relieved without any effect on the goodness or the badness of the person. Toxic shame in the same situation would respond by saying, "I have done something bad, therefore I am bad."

By the time one deals with school age children or adolescents the healthy based identity elements or the shame-based elements are already in place. What is done in the class can re-enforce the shame-based identity elements or diminish them. The very nature of shame is to keep itself hidden from the self of the shame-based person. The pain is excruciating, as children and adolescents who habitually cry themselves to sleep can testify. There are many shame-inducing procedures and situations within our educational and religious system. Some are blatantly so, others more subtly so. The common shame-inducing forms include: comparison with other children or with brothers, sisters or parents who have been educated previously by the same teacher or in the same institution; inattention or lack of response to the child; ridicule and pointing out defects publicly; abuse –physical, verbal, emotional or sexual; establishing gradations secretly or non-verbally on intelligence, race, economics, or social standing; not answering questions honestly; demanding instant perfection and maturity –either verbally or non-verbally. Less blatant forms are ensconced in "conventional wisdom" and are perhaps most shame-inducing. I would like to mention some very specific ones that are found in the home, the school, the catechism classes, and in unconscious attitudes expressed in conversation, be it in the home or in neighborhood or social gatherings.

1. Insufficient sharing of the adult's experience of God with the result that everything about God has been converted into doctrine and morals. The adult's experience of God is seldom shared and is usually substituted for doctrines which are the concrete expressions of past believers' search for God and the significance of Jesus. This verbal relic becomes distasteful for the child because the child lacks the needed sense of history. People's search for understanding of God from past centuries has become the "content of religious teaching" both formal and informal. The vocabulary of the past becomes meaningless (transsubstantiation, hypostatic union) or the present meanings of the vocabulary distort the meaning of the past (person, Father) in such a way as to render the evangelization as totally divorced from reality. The expectation of both adult and institution is that these words be learned rather than their meaning becoming grounded in the experience of the child and the child's nascent experience of God, it causes the child to think that he or she is deficient because these doctrines and moral principles are not understood nor do they relate to the experience of life. As a result, the affective experience of God and religion becomes bound in shame and distaste. I taught religion in a small town in Colombia some years ago. I would present some material in class and the students invariably would be bored, resistant, and even hostile. Later we would go out for a coke with a few students, or have a conversation in the plaza and I would say the same things that I said in class the day before, and lively interesting discussions would ensue. I came to see that the shame-bound structures that are associated with religion are to a great number of people very painful and therefore resisted, but life-filled sharing of God and the experience of God holds people's attention.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center

2. The sacrament of reconciliation perceived as shameful and invasive. "Conventional wisdom" would say that the boy or girl who did not go to confession during a retreat or who never went to communion at masses was "hardened". No matter how much teachers, priests, and religious insisted otherwise, at the feeling-conduct level this was the perceived attitude (there were and there still are many places that publicly communicate that this is the case). The "collective experience" of confession has always been bi-polar. One pole would be a certain feeling of relief for having dealt with the guilt, and the other would be the experience of fear and shame in the confessing. Enough people have had negative experiences of confession and are talking about them that on a popular level the use of confession as a means of experiencing reconciliation with God is declining at an astounding rate. Materialism, hedonism, and hardness of heart are the common explanations given for this decline. Yet studies and research indicate that the search for spirituality and for God is stronger than ever at all levels of society. If one uses the formation of 12 Step groups as an index –one that demands "a searching and fearless moral inventory", an "admission of our exact nature of our wrongs to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs"– many of the people who participate in these experiences have found them liberating. Many such participants of these groups are or have been Catholics and have found their life experience of confession shaming by contrast. It would be helpful to us as religious educators to look at what we are doing through the filter of shame in order to see if and how we are distorting the good news of the Gospel, and as a result, leaving people with an experience totally opposite of what we intend in our evangelizing efforts. The Good News of Jesus was indeed very simple and continues as our prime task. It seems that much shame-inducing baggage has been hung on the Gospel completely distorting it and making it a source of pain instead of a source of freedom.

3. The fusion of Human Sexuality and Morality. The whole area of human sexuality is indeed surrounded and permeated with toxic shame for the majority of human beings, whether its expression be by excess or by defect. Secrecy and a conspiracy of silence rooted in shame surround most children's and adolescents' introduction into this important dimension of human life. The church historically, has evolved into the protector of sexual moral rectitude. As a result, in the popular mind to be religious is to be against sex and sexual expression –and attitude which is not without historical justification, all the protests to the contrary. In many countries morality has come to be coterminous with sexual morality. This fusion of the gospel with moral rectitude and has been disastrous for the Gospel and for healthy sexuality rooted in love and an expression thereof. The heart of the Good News is God's unconditional love for us and the freedom that results from this reconciliation (II Cor. 5:14-6:2). The use of shame to control and deal with sexuality is theme for another essay.

It would be helpful then for us to discover how shame has permeated our evangelization efforts and do what is necessary to reduce the shame within the cultural context of each ethnic group. Evangelization, rightly done, gives people the experience of Jesus' words, "I have come that you may have life – abundant life." (Jn. 10:10)

CATECHESIS AND JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE'S SCHOOLS

«De La Salle wanted schools that were well-run... He wanted teachers that were skilled in imparting secular and religious knowledge, and able to educate hearts and minds.

His writings:

- The Conduct of Schools,
- The Duties of a Christian to God,
- The Rules of Christian Politeness and Civility,
- Instructions and Prayers reflect this concern for pastoral care and education.

The Founder was able to see an area of neglect, with all its ramifications –and there lies his genius– and to offer an efficient remedy.

What the Founder of the Brothers wants to raise up are true Christians, true disciples of Jesus Christ. This goes much further than teaching the catechism. It affects a person's whole life».

(Jean Baptiste de La Salle: Le Message de son catéchisme, p. 18, Brother Jean Pungier).

I should like to show in this article how the present-day approach to catechesis in France reflects closely that of John Baptist de La Salle.

1. A CATECHESIS FOR THE PRESENT DAY

Its aims were redefined by the French Bishops' Assembly in Lourdes in October 1979.

This assembly stated its views and laid down guidelines regarding the mission, spirit and requirements of present-day catechesis in an official Reference Handbook.

It lays stress on the following points:

– the Christian message and the way it is expresed in the teachings of the Church;

– the cultural and pedagogical situation in which Christian initiation takes place in present-day France.

The catechesis of children is seen as part of their initiation into the Church, and as such it is a particularly heavy responsibility in present circumstances.

Article 31 of the Reference Handbook makes the following statement:

«Teaching catechism implies that there is somewhere where the child can experience the life of the Church.

Teaching catechism gives access to the "documents of the faith" by means of which a man can become part of the Covenant between God and his people.

Teaching catechism has a sacramental structure. Sacraments reveal and are the active gift of God who frees man and makes him share his life.

Teaching catechism leads to conversion and to a way of life that is transformed by faith.

Finally, teaching catechism leads to the celebration of the Christian mystery and to feasts of the faith.»

John Baptist de La Salle's aim was to "form Christians", who would be "truly" so, "living by the very spirit of Jesus Christ in all things." This is not a small undertaking...

I think this is also our task nowadays. It is not simply a question of imparting knowledge, but of leading children and young people to make a profession of faith as members of a community of faith.

This can be accomplished only if we adapt our teaching methods. We cannot simply use one method or other.

John Baptist de La Salle was well aware of this. That is why he insists on actual Christian experience. He wants to meet "the crying needs of the craftmen and the poor..." He is constantly searching for teaching methods that are perfectly adapted to the Christian message.

And this is exactly what the 1979 Reference Handbook asks of us in article No. 32:

"A religious language that is adapted to our times. An approach which is part of a catechesis that is integrated into the life of the child..."

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center

2. CATECHESIS - SCHOOL - PARISH

The catechetical renewal in France has helped us to rediscover what makes up a Christian community, that is, the place where catechesis takes place, and where the child can discover the real image of the Church.

School or parish? Catechesis? School as part of the Church's pastoral set-up? It is not simply a question of organisation. It rather depends on the existence, dynamism and acceptance by a community of believers.

Our Catholic schools will be credible only if we form real communities of believers. That is, if they are places where young people and adults are recognised and respected as they search for God...

It is important that there should be close cooperation between schools and parishes, in general pastoral terms, and especially as far as as the choice of catechetical texts is concerned, and regarding the training of catechists.

It is not a question of trying to impose uniformity or finding one solution for all problems. I think that schools and parishes should seek a basic consensus together with regard to diocesan pastoral policy and regarding the great differences between various situations.

Let us go further: the responsibility of the school and teachers does not end with catechesis.

What is important, as John Baptist de La Salle points out, is that "the school be well run".

As Christian teachers, we have to question ourselves as a matter of urgency about the way we teach. Does it prepare the way for proclaiming the Gospel? Does it lead our pupils to lead an interior life?

Our schools will be truly Christian if the secular side of our teaching prepares the ground for the acceptance of the Lord and his Word.

We have to make our schools willing to take part in the pastoral work of the local Church.

Let us end by quoting the words of John Baptist de La Salle in his 15th Meditation for the Time of Retreat (3):

«You can expect yet another reward which God will give you in advance in this life if you devote yourselves generously to your duty and, if through zeal and the grace of your state, you know how to strengthen your disciples in the Christian spirit. This is the very special satisfaction you will experience when they grow up and you see them living honourably and reverently, far from any unjust association, and performing good deeds. For the teaching you gave them is not a mere matter of words, but accompanied by a great abundance of grace for those who respond well, which will maintain them in the practice of good. Their perseverance in the faith will be a great cause of joy for you when you call to mind the way they show their faith and the results of the lessons you gave them, realising that this makes them dear to God and places them in the number he has chosen.

What a joy it will be to see that they have received the word of God in your religion lessons not as the word of men but as the word of God powerfully at work within them, which will be apparent in the honourable lives they continue to live.»

OF A CHRISTIAN TEACHER (2)

[(1): Cfr. 16-9–C-63]

MINISTER, AMBASSADOR, CO-WORKER...

Lord, our God,
You have reconciled us through Jesus Christ.
His passion and death
Earned salvation for all men.
You invite us to apply to ourselves
The riches of his saving grace.
It is by doing your will that we complete
The work of our salvation.

Jesus, you want us to play our part:
Your plan of salvation becomes complete
When we add our sufferings
To the torment of your cross:
"I make up in my body
What is missing in the passion of Christ".

I offer you my services.
I pray to you for my pupils
So that they do what is good
And unite their actions to yours,
Lord Jesus.

I am happy with the mission you have entrusted to me.
I wish to be your ambassador and your minister.
I offer you my hands, my words...
So that you can act through them.
Your Spirit is at work in me
Enlightening the hearts
Of children and young people.

It is not easy, Lord, to bear your message,
But I trust in your help to overcome difficulties,
For I do not seek my own glory,
Only to do your will:
You have the words of eternal life.

Lord, the branch bears fruit
If it is attached to the vine.
We educate
If we are united to you.
For it is you, Lord,
Who give strength and life
To all our efforts.
We ask you to enlighten our lives.
We ask you to make fruitful
The work that we do
In the hearts of children and young people
So that they too may bear fruit
By their love, their service and the good they do.

CO-WORKERS, SHEPHERDS, TEACHERS...

Lord,
You call upon us to plant and to water:
But you make growth possible.

Lord, you are the Good Shepherd,
Who cares for all the sheep,
Especially for those that are weak or go astray.
Teach me to love all the pupils,
Especially those who find it difficult to learn,
Those who misbehave,
Those who have problems at home...
It is you Lord who touch hearts.

Jesus, you prayed to your Father:
When you performed miracles,
At the close of each day's work,
When undertaking any important task in your life.
Teach us to pray, to trust in God, our Father.
Teach us to love children and young people:
You are the Good Master.

Lord,
Now, just as you did 2.000 years ago,
You choose us to be your co-workers.
You send us out as your ambassadors.
You want us to be your witnesses.
You call upon us to live like you.
We want to proclaim your beatitudes:
"to be poor in spirit", "to be gentle",
"to be compassionate", "to be merciful".

You give us the example.
You invite us to love others,
You invite us to pray without ceasing,
You invite us to forgive,
You invite us to do your Father's will.

Lord Jesus, ideal Master,
Teach us to be good Brothers and good teachers.
Show us how to teach
With tenderness and responsibility.

It is not easy
To be your minister and your ambassador.
It takes effort, idealism and determination.
We are here, Lord,
To proclaim your message and your Kingdom.
We are here, Lord,
To live according to your spirit
With children and young people,
We are here, Lord,
To love them all with optimism.
We are here, Lord,
So that you may act with us and through us.

You, Lord,
You give us life.
You make it possible for us to be Brothers, teachers.
You give us everything.
That is why we praise you and give you thanks.

We pray to you:
For the children and young people in our classes,
For their parents and the members of their family,
For the lay teachers who work at the school,
For ourselves, the De La Salle Brothers,
So that we may live like Jesus,
Be joyful and optimistic,
Make the world around us better,
Remain brave at difficult times,
Be your co-workers
For the salvation of the world.

GUARDIAN ANGELS...

Lord,
You show special love to children.
"Let the little children come to me!"
You call upon us now
To be close to them,
To be their visible angels.
How good you are, Lord!
You send masters and teachers
To enlighten the minds of children
And to touch their hearts.
Count on us
To show them the right way
And explain the message of the Gospel to them!

Lord, thank you for the gift of faith.
Teach us to bear witness by our own example,
Since a Christian life shows itself by good works.
Children received faith at their baptism,
At home it continued to grow,
And in school they complete their learning:
– they are taught the maxims of the Gospel,
– they are put on the right road.
Help us to be good guardian angels
By our teaching and good example.
Children need teachers,
But we are above all witnesses to the Gospel:
We teach more by what we are
Than by what we say.

Lord,
life is hard and difficult,
There are many obstacles on the way.
We need your help and your support.
Children are weak in mind and body.
We want, Lord,
To lead them by the hand
Towards you. We are their guardian angels.
You remind us of your final message:
"Go out into the whole world
And proclaim the Gospel!"
The children are waiting for us.

Lord, give us the grace
To watch over the children you have entrusted to us.
Give us the strength to do your will.
We pray to you, Lord,
That children and young people
May grow to know you, Lord,
And love you with all their heart.
Preserve them, Lord, from evil and from sin,
And lead them along the road to salvation.

RHEIMS '89

OPENING ADDRESS

July, 3rd 1989

From July 2nd to July 5th, there was a Lasallian Family gathering in Rheims, organised by France Region, in which more than a thousand people took part. The gathering was opened and brought to a close by an address given by Brother Superior General. In this article and in the one that follows (17-15–D-41) we publish both speeches.

A couple of years ago I heard several young Brothers from Asia speak with great affection of one of their former teachers, a missionary Brother who had made a great effort to master the local language. "He spoke to us at considerable length and with great enthusiasm in our own language," said one of the young Brothers. "We were grateful. We appreciated immensely his love and respect for us and for our culture, but –unfortunately– we never understood one word of what he said!"

I hope that your experience today with my French will not be the same!

CELEBRATING OUR UNITY

When I first learned that the Region of France was planning this assembly, I was delighted and –even before receiving an official invitation to participate– recorded the dates on my calendar. I was pleased because I am convinced that such assemblies and congresses have great value in fostering our unity as brothers and sisters in the Lasallian Family. Assemblies such as this cannot, it is true, substitute for other kinds of programs – such as those of your outstanding Center of Lasallian Formation. But they serve an other purpose. They give us the opportunity to celebrate, that is to say, –to praise God and to thank him for the great grace of being called to live our baptismal consecration as followers of St. John Baptist de La Salle. Such assemblies provide us the opportunity to share our experiences; to reflect on ways of living our Christian and Lasallian commitment more wholeheartedly and efficaciously; and to enjoy together our union as brothers and sisters.

What a blessing it is to be able to celebrate this assembly in Rheims, where it all began. Rheims: birthplace of John Baptist de La Salle; site of the Mother House of the Sisters of the Holy Child Jesus, where Adrian Nyel asked Canon De La Salle for the help that changed his life and shaped the lives of thousands of young people throughout the last three hundred and ten years and indeed, in various ways, of all of us. Here in Rheims we can go as pilgrims to the numerous other sites which recall moments of great historical importance for the Lasallian Family: the College des Bons Enfants, the Cathedral, the Church of Saint Maurice, the Basilica of Saint Remi, the Church of Saint Jacques, the School of Rue de Contrai, the Sacred Heart Boarding School, the former Boarding School of the Brothers (now the Jesuit College), the tomb of Blessed Brother Arnould and, not too far away, the sanctuary of Our Lady of Liesse.

A WORLDWIDE MISSION

The presence of the Superior General of the Institute at this assembly is a reminder that the mission which began so modestly here in Rheims three hundred and ten years ago is today lived in more than half the countries with membership in the United Nations. Yes, the mission of the disciples of St. John Baptist de La Salle has become a worldwide mission. For this reason I am grateful for the invitation to share these days with you and am particularly appreciative of the orientations which Brother Jean-Marie Thouard and Preparatory Commission gave me for this address: a message on the international Institute, on the international Lasallian movement: its ramifications, its basic perspectives, its hopes."

"The international Institute"... "international movement." Our mission is to contribute to the building of the Kingdom of God. Our mission is to "make a difference" in this world: to make a difference through our efforts to procure the human and Christian education of youth throughout the world, particularly poor youth. Our Institute is today an international institute thanks to the Brothers of France who made it possible for the charism of De La Salle to animate Brothers and collaborators the world over in touching the lives and hearts of youth.

The Lasallian mission is lived by some 8.500 Brothers and a multitude of collaborators –it is almost impossible to estimate the number– all participating in varying degrees in the spirituality and educational tradition of John Baptist de La Salle. Among these collaborators in some eighty countries of the world are lay directors, administrators, and teachers, such as many of you; a certain number of priests and men and students; members of associations and boards of direction; members of staff and employees; former students; benefactors; friends; and, of course, those for whom our mission exists, the young people God confides to our care.

"TOGETHER AND BY ASSOCIATION"

As members of the Lasallian Family, the Brothers and their collaborators are striving to work "together and by association" for the human and Christian education of youth, especially poor youth, in schools of all kinds and at all levels: pre-school, elementary, middle, secondary, teacher-training, professional, technical, agricultural, university.

Anyone who reflects on the mission of the Lasallian Family throughout the world cannot help but be impressed by the complexity and diversity which influences profoundly the particular shape of the Institute of John Baptist de La Salle in each country. Your Lasallian brothers and sisters and the youth they serve are people of a variety of races, colors, cultures, languages, and religions. The manner in which they live the Lasallian mission is profoundly influenced by the political and economic realities of each country.

DIFFICULT POLITICAL SITUATIONS

In a number of these countries, the Lasallian Family finds itself in difficult circumstances, circumstances that call for extraordinary faith and courage.

There are Brothers in certain countries of Eastern Europe where the Institute was suppressed more than thirty-five years ago and the Brothers strictly forbidden to live together. Despite their inability to exercise a normal apostolate, they have remained as faithful as they are able to the demands of their religious consecration. In Poland, however, the Institute exists and is blessed with vocations –but because Catholic schools were suppressed many years ago, the Brothers devote themselves full-time to catechetical apostolates and to service of the handicapped.

In Vietnam our seventy-five Brothers are allowed to live together but have no normal apostolate. Twenty-three Brothers in politically tense Burma try to serve youth in non-school apostolates, since Catholic schools are forbidden.

A year never passes without some area of the Institute being touched by serious political violence or even war. You have followed throughout the past fifteen years the tragic events of Lebanon. During the last two years, many of you, as well as your pupils, have contributed financially to help our forty-five Brothers maintain the seven schools they conduct for the service of the youth of that ravaged country. Our Brothers in Israel and the occupied Territories continue to do all they can for their Palestinian youth, even when the schools are closed. Time does not permit me to speak at length of our Brothers and collaborators in Sri Lanka, in Northern Ireland, in Ethiopia, in South Africa, in Nicaragua, in Haiti, in Colombia, in Peru.

DIFFERENT RELIGIOUS TRADITIONS

This very partial list of countries served by your brothers and sisters of the Lasallian Family is a sufficient reminder that our mission today is to youth not only of different races, cultures, languages, but also of religions. Many of our young people –and, course, a number of our teachers, parents, and former students– are Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus, Confucianists, Shintoists, Animists... Vatican II insists that it is the mission of the Church to make Christ's loving and saving presence a vivid and effective reality among all peoples. It is our grace and privilege to play an important part in this great mission of the Church.

I frequently suggest that we read newspapers and watch television news with the eyes and ears of Lasallians. As we follow political and social developments in particular countries we should call to mind our fellow Lasallians and pray for them, as well as for all those confided to their care.

A SHARED MISSION

Yes, the mission which began at the service of the youth of this city, then spread throughout France, is today at the service of youth in some eighty countries. Lasallian educators are striving to assist young people to develop their God-given potential as human persons and at the same time are challenging them to commit themselves to building a better world, a world where all can live in dignity and with respect, where all can live as sons and daughters of God, a world where all can live, therefore, as brothers and sisters.

That was our mission yesterday and that IS our mission today. But the way in which that mission is lived has changed dramatically in recent years. For most of our history, we Brothers of the Christian Schools ourselves received, lived, and passed on the Lasallian ideal. While we might have had help from a limited number of lay colleagues, it was clear that the schools were Brothers' schools and that it was the Brothers who ran them. As I mentioned at Buzenval last year, I began teaching in a college of three hundred fifty boys with ten other Brothers and one lay teacher. That school was a Brothers' school, a school animated by the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

LASALLIAN SCHOOLS

That traditional model no longer exists. For a variety of reasons, it has yielded to a new model. We have moved from a model of "Brothers' Schools" to a model of "Lasallian Schools". This change of language is not trivial. The difference the new language conveys is significant. The "Brothers' School" was a school animated by Brothers, with lay collaborators in a very secondary role. The "Lasallian School" is a school animated by the Lasallian educational community, a community of Brothers, lay teachers, priests, members of other religious institutes, parents, members of the various associations, staff and employees, former students, friends and benefactors, the young people themselves...

Our Rule is clear and emphatic: "The Brothers' community is ever mindful that its apostolic activity takes place within an educational community in which all the functions, including positions of responsibility, are shared" (art. 17a); furthermore, "The Brothers' community makes known to the rest of the educational community the essential elements of the Lasallian tradition" (art. 17c).

NEW ROLES

What this change means is that both the Brothers and their lay collaborators have new roles to exercice. To say, however, that the Brothers have a new role does not imply a loss of faith in the vocation of the Brothers. On the contrary. Our conviction is that "the young, the poor, the world and the church still need the ministry of the Brothers" (art. 141). But the unique contribution is not to be found in any specific service. It is to be found rather in their manner of living and in the message communicated and questions raised by that manner of living: "As religious vowed to the ministry of Christian education, the first apostolate of the Brothers consists in the witness of their consecrated life" (art. 24).

The mission of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is today a SHARED MISSION. You and I are blessed by God in being called to exercice this mission. Let us during this assembly praise and thank God for all the good that has been done and is being done today through the Lasallian Family. Let us ask God earnestly to make his Spirit come alive in us in order that we might make the loving and saving presence of his Son a vivid and effective reality among the youth He confides to us.

RHEIMS '89

CONCLUDING REMARKS

Brother John Johnston, FSC
Superior General

Rheims'89 days of celebration – days of study and reflection – days of sharing experiences as Lasallians – days of evaluation – days of renewed commitment.

We bring RHEIMS'89 to an official close in this magnificent basilica of St. Remi, a place, as we all know, of great importance and significance in the life of John Baptist de La Salle.

The Preparatory Commission has invited me to give the conclusions and the parting word. I am not sure that it is really appropriate for me to give the conclusions. I think that you and you alone can formulate the conclusions, that is to say, capture succinctly what these days have meant to you and what difference these days are going to make in your life in the days ahead.

What I can do, however, is offer you some concluding thoughts and leave with you what I hope will be an appropriate parting word. Almost immediately after I began to reflect upon the content of my remarks, I decided to take as my point of departure the meditation which De La Salle wrote for the feast of St. Remi.

In that meditation our Founder says that we Brothers –and, I would say, all Lasallians today– must search for and desire "the plenitude of God's Spirit in order to live" up to our vocation.

Search for and desire the plenitude of God's Spirit in order to live. Our first impulse might be to dismiss this remark as pious exaggeration, the kind of comment one expects from a saint! But to take lightly this remark would be to reveal an inadequate grasp of De La Salle's understanding of the vocation of the Christian teacher.

The founder's starting point was always youth, especially poor and neglected youth. God loves young people, he would say, and wants them to know truth and be saved. But for this purpose, human ministers are needed. Therefore God kindles a light in the hearts of certain people, calling them to be his ministers. De La Salle would say to his first disciples, "Brothers, you are such people. God has chosen you. He has kindled a light in your hearts, calling you to be his ministers, his ambassadors, his co-workers. The founder goes so far as to tell the Brothers that they are to represent Jesus Christ, to RE-present him, to make his loving and saving presence a vivid and effective reality among young people.

De La Salle wasn't satisfied that the Brother be a capable teacher. He wanted him to be so united to Christ that he could serve as his co-worker, as his presence. Although De La Salle prepared these particular thoughts primarily for the use of the Brothers during their annual retreat, the title page indicates clearly that the meditations were intended also for "the use of all persons involved in the education of youth".

These reflections seem, perhaps, to be "too much" –too idealistic– well beyond the realm of probability if not possibility. If that indeed is your reaction, I don't think that De La Salle would have been surprised. He knew that the Christian teachers he was addressing were normal human persons, but he wanted to propose to them an ideal towards which they should strive. The ideal he proposes is indeed high: it is nothing less than TO BE CHRIST FOR OTHERS. For those who wish to make progress towards this ideal, the founder has practical advice: if you wish to be the persons that God wants you to be, give yourself totally to the Lord, beseeching him to fill you with the plenitude of his Spirit. He knew well that to be ministers, ambassadors, co-workers –to be the presence of Jesus Christ– the Christian teacher needs the plenitude of the Holy Spirit.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

In the light of these thoughts, we can interpret that fundamental idea expressed in the meditation for the feast of St. Remi: to live our vocation well, we need the plenitude of God's Spirit. For this purpose, the founder continues, you should apply yourself very fervently to mental prayer.

The fruit of prayer, according to St. De La Salle, is the Holy Spirit. And, he adds, one of the fruits of the Holy Spirit is zeal. After reflecting on the extraordinary zeal of St. Remi, De La Salle says, "You exercise an employment which requires great zeal... When a man who is called to an apostolic mission first fills himself with God and His Holy Spirit, he can accomplish anything."

De La Salle concludes his meditation insisting that the vocation of the Christian teacher is to help young people live according to the Christian spirit. But, he says, that we may impart the spirit of Christianity to others, we must possess it ourselves.

I make these thoughts of John Baptist de La Salle my own. I present them to you as the concluding thoughts of RHEIMS'89. All of us in this basilica –Brothers, lay teachers, priests and sisters, parents, staff members, board members, friends, benefactors, and young people– all of us are, in one way or in another, disciples of De La Salle. Our call as Lasallians is to make Christ's loving presence a reality for others, especially for the poor. Our mission is to give ourselves with zeal and enthusiasm to the service of others. To be faithful to our call, we need the power of the Spirit of God. To receive that Spirit we must turn to the Lord in earnest prayer.

Here in this magnificent basilica, where our Father and Founder spent so many hours, even entire nights, praying fervently for the Spirit of the Lord, let us resolve to be men and women of prayer. And, aware of the Lord's presence among us in this sacred house of prayer, let us ask him for the grace we need to be faithful to that commitment.

Finally, Brothers, ladies, gentlemen, young people, let me leave with you a parting word. The expression I have chosen is not original. It is the invocation which has long been the signal of our community, the signal that reminds us that to BE true Lasallians, we must be so united to Christ that we are able to say that he lives in our hearts. For this reason, as we go forth from this assembly, let us proclaim with faith, hope, and love, that beautiful invocation: "Live Jesus in our hearts! For ever!"

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (8)

5. DIFFERENT BUT ASSOCIATED

«Faced with the urgent needs of his day, Saint John Baptiste de La Salle began by gathering around him a group of men with whom he shared the process of building up a community and of mutual education». (Letter, p. 31)

1. COMMUNION AND PARTICIPATION

The Lasallian Family is more or less worldwide, and so it is hardly astonishing to discover that its members speak a multiplicity of languages, belong to a variety of countries and cultures, and come from vastly differing socio-political, economic and educational backgrounds. And so, as a consequence, the variety of Lasallian groups is both very wide and rich.

In Chapter 5, the Letter tries to divide up the present-day members of this large Lasallian Family according to 8 different groups or categories. Here are the categories:

1. The Brothers of the Christian Schools.
2. Teachers, catechists, in general, anyone who works in a Lasallian school.
3. Women religious who live their consecrated life according to the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle.
4. Men and women who wish to define their attachment to the Founder by a more special commitment. For the moment, those included in this category are:
   - The Union of Catechists of Jesus Crucified and Mary Inmmaculate;
   - Signum Fidei (cf. articles 05-D-07 and 05-D-08);
   - The Lasallian Third Order.
5. Young Lasallians.
6. Parents of pupils.
7. Former pupils.
8. Benefactors and Affiliated members of the Institute, parents of Brothers, friends of our schools and sympathisers.

All these groups have one essential mission:

- TO GROW as members of their group.
- TO DRAW CLOSER to other groups.

The Letter reminds the Brothers, however, that since they are the "principal heirs", they must "by vocation, choice and consecration" play an important role in the consolidation of the Lasallian Family.

The challenges they are called upon to meet could be stated as follows:

1. To deepen understanding of the Lasallian message, adapt it to the present day, and spread it abroad.
2. To encourage the vigorous growth of the Lasallian family and its sense of unity;
3. To make their communities places open to lay people, welcoming, prayerful and apostolically minded.
4. To contribute their availability to the schools they teach in, and to suggest ways of ensuring a human, professional or Lasallian education. (cf. Letter, p. 26)

Whatever the Brothers or Lasallian groups do, all must be done within a context of seeing that each group has its own identity, and its members have opted for different states of life, professions and fields in which to exercise an apostolate. This internal pluralism is a source of enrichment, but it remains nonetheless clear there is an urgent need to work towards the achievement of a common purpose. In fact:

COMMUNION and PARTICIPATION

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

«each component of the Lasallian Family has its own specific characteristics and must function in virtue of them. This is essential if everyone involved is to feel comfortable in what he is doing and if his work is to be effective. At the same time, we feel, however, that in all this rich diversity, there must be a greater capacity and willingness to work together with others." (Letter, p. 31)

2. TOGETHER AND BY ASSOCIATION

On June 6th 1694, the Founder and twelve Brothers pronounced the first perpetual vows of obedience, stability, and association in the Society of the Christian Schools. In this way, in the presence of God and their Brothers, they expressed their commitment to achieve their aims and to undertake certain obligations. Together and with no turning back, they wanted to launch an apostolic, religious and educational undertaking. In this way, the Founder made the spirit of association a fundamental characteristic of his work.

Our own formula of vows expresses this same desire for association. In this connection, it seems useful to remind ourselves of the following:

> «1. The importance of the desire to live in association as the basis and dynamic force of our community life. We are not employees hired to carry out a certain activity, but rather we are persons who voluntarily associate themselves within a consecrated state in order to seek and determine together and by association the best means of being ministers of God among youth.
>
> 2. The need of a specific programme that will provide meaning and substance to this association. The first Brothers were energised by the desire to develop successfully a type of school that would serve the poor. Their plan for such expressed itself graphically as well in their "state" as in their "work".
> 3. Within this dynamic programme structure obedience takes a positive significance: it is the basis of the solidarity promised by each member to "the body of the society".» (Circ. 410, pp. 51-52)

At the present time, the various groups belonging to the Lasallian Family wish to show their DESIRE FOR ASSOCIATION both within their own group and with other groups, so as to be able to undertake the EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMME so admirably and clearly described in the 1987 Rule.

«We believe that the life of the Lasallian Family can be and should be characterised by this spirit of association, even though the forms this takes may differ. Ways to achieve this must be found for each of the groups we have spoken about, care being taken, however, to respect their specific characteristics and the kinds of links that bind their members together.» (Letter, p. 31)

However, in order that this association does not remain in the realm of pious wishes and good intentions, five conditions mentioned in the Letter have to be taken into account if action is to be effective:

1. Active involvement in Lasallian educational schemes or evangelisation;
2. A dovetailing of the efforts of individuals and groups;
3. Coordination in planning so as to be able to draw up common schemes and define practical measures that can be taken;
4. Common agreement, if only in general terms, about what they understand to be the position of man, the world, the Church, the essential values to promote, in God's overall plan;
5. The common pursuit of the task of exploring the works of John Baptist de La Salle, of translating his thinking and expressing it in modern language. (cf. Letter, pp. 32-33)

It is certainly not easy to put into practice in any significant way this "together and by association", which is a concrete way of living according to the ideal of Lasallian brotherhood, and which is an essential element of the spiritual message of Saint John Baptist de La Salle. The challenge that it offers deserves our response and the dedication to it of all our spiritual energies.

3. QUESTIONNAIRE TO HELP STUDY GROUPS

1. What action should be planned so that the group I belong to can grow to its full potential?
2. What action should be undertaken so as to bring all the local Lasallian groups closer together?
3. What are the obstacles that I encounter, either in my group or in the area in which I work, when real team-work is needed for getting something done?
4. What precise instances could I use to show my group that, among the people I work with, there is a desire to work "together and by association"?

LETTER TO THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (9)

6. LET US BUILD OUR FUTURE TOGETHER

«As we go forward, we count on as many as possible of you to come with us. We count especially on the help of the Holy Spirit: we are sure he will not fail us if we listen to his voice, follow his inspiration and read the signs he sends us». (Letter, p. 41)

1. THE WAY FORWARD IN THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE

In its seventh and final chapter, the Letter to the Lasallian Family offers some practical suggestions for "ensuring greater internal unity and vitality". Aware of "the urgency, the scope and importance of this task", the central administration of the Institute once again calls upon Brothers and lay people to involve themselves in the growth and organisation of the Lasallian Family. This is a task that demands the "pursuit of excellence."

Here, then are the suggestions for the next few years:

1. Study and reflect deeply on our common Lasallian and spiritual heritage.

This reflection is vitally important. Unless this point is taken seriously, it will be impossible to implement the other suggestions.

2. Express the results of this research in clear and understandable lenguage.

It is important to be able to formulate what we believe in and what it is that can make us devote so much energy to it, in language that is simple, suited to the task in hand and culturally appropriate. Such a statement will be of great help in implementing the next suggestion.

3. Set up a process of discernment in each movement or association.

The effects of reflection are twofold: on the one hand, it makes it possible to define the identity of each group and to judge its greater or lesser conformity to the Lasallian ideal; and on the other, it leads to a better understanding of the apostolic commitment of each group and to a more effective implementation of it.

4. Organise more courses and set up more centres and commissions for Lasallian training.

This is something that is both necessary and urgent. We need Lasallians who are enthusiastic and generous – that goes without saying; but these latter must also be well-trained and up-to-date, so that they can be creative and have a transforming effect in a society that is becoming more and more complex.

5. Increase the number of meetings between the various branches of the Lasallian Family.

Relationships lead to mutual discovery; dialogue, to mutual acceptance; frequentation, to mutual love. Lasallian groups have still a long way to go before they can draw close to one another, get to know one another and work happily together.

2. ACTION AT INSTITUTE CENTRAL ADMINISTRATION LEVEL

As a result of decisions made at the 41st General Chapter and by Brother Superior and his Council, five important measures have already been taken in order to promote greater understanding and more effective consolidation of the Lasallian Family throughout the Institute.

1. Lasallian Education Mission Secretariat

This has been completely overhauled and organised to be of service to Institute Districts. It has two sections:
a/ Education and Pastoral care in Schools section to provide help for Lasallian schools;
b/ Associations and Movements section to deal with Lasallian association groups.

2. International Lasallian Studies Sessions (SIEL)

Two were planned, and the first one was a great success with 41 Brothers taking part. The second one is due to take place from October 1990 to May 1991.

3. Lasallian Studies Department

Following the death of the much missed Brother Maurice Auguste, Brother Michel Sauvage, with his widely acknowledged expertise, was appointed head of Lasallian Studies. With his team of experts he has drawn up an ambitious work programme in this important area of Lasallian research.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

4. International Publications

"Lasalliana" has resumed publication and offers new material useful for formation. La Salle Intercom is in the process of renewing itself and extending its range of information.

5. Visits to Districts

Brother Superior and his Council take advantage of visits to Districts to meet various Lasallian groups and convey their message to them.

3. ACTION ON DISTRICT LEVEL

Our Rule tells us that a District is not only an administrative structure but that it expresses "the ordinary communion existing among its communities and Brothers" (R. 124). The Letter sees the District level as being ideal for concerted action by Lasallian groups. This is because:

1. At this level, it is easy to bring together all the various groups of the Lasallian Family.
2. It is possible for groups to get to know one another.
3. It is possible for individuals to make personal contacts that last.
4. Plans can be made and a sense of mission experienced. (cf. Letter, p. 32)

From all this it is easy to see that contact between the various Lasallian groups and Brother Visitor and his Council is not only necessary, but is the source and guarantee of fidelity to the spirit of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

It is in the sector of the Church constituted by the District that "formation, Lasallian research and the sharing of experience schemes" must be drawn up and followed through. In order that groups may benefit from guidance and support, two measures are a priority:

1. THE TRAINING OF ASSESSORS
2. THE CREATION OF SPECIAL COMMISSIONS

In the light of this, an appeal is made:

1. To Regional Coordinators and Visitors and to their Councils to use the best means available to ensure training, follow-up, and growth for these groups.

In this connection it is important to point out that it is the Institute which "evaluates the authenticity of (the) Lasallian character" of various movements and associations (Rule, 146). On a District level, this duty is the responsibility of the Brother Visitor and his Council.

2. To headmasters or governing bodies of Lasallian schools to ensure that the instructions and guidelines laid down by the District are carried out faithfully.
3. To Brothers' communities to play a leading role in this new stage in the life of the Institute.
4. To Lasallian groups themselves to define clearly their aims and draw up plans for training and future action.

The Letter concludes by choosing the 42nd General Chapter of 1993 as a target to aim for forthe implementation of all the suggested measures. The assessment that will take place then will serve as the springboard for action in years to come.

QUESTIONNAIRE TO HELP STUDY GROUPS

1. Which Lasallian groups in your District are the most energetic? How did they develop? What has brought about this vitality?
2. What efforts should one make, or what measures should one take in order to set up a training course for Brother assessors for Lasallian movements?
3. What possibility is there in your District of creating a commission (of Brothers and lay persons) or a secretariat to deal with everything relating to the Lasallian Family? What alternative solution can you suggest?
4. Do the educational communities of the District have a Lasallian training programme worked out to meet the various categories present in them? How is this programme implemented? How is it assessed?

ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE AND THE CENTENARY OF THE INSTITUTE IN COLOMBIA

A bishop's appeal.

The Brothers arrived in Colombia in 1890. The country was going through a difficult time. One civil war had followed another ever since independence. The consequences of this state of violence and instability were poverty, ignorance and illiteracy.

Both the government and the Church were looking for some solution to remedy these evils. They thought that providing education for the people was an ideal means to overcome social calamities and to set the nation on the path to prosperity.

But where would the teachers come from to accomplish this noble task? The young nations of Latin America have always looked upon Europe as a source of cultural influence; and it was from Europe that the teachers of our nation would come. There were already several religious teaching congregations established in our country.

Around the year 1890, the diocese of Medellin was under the jurisdiction of Mgr. Bernardo Herrera Restrepo. He had got to know the Brothers of the Christian Schools when, as a young seminarist, he had gone to study theology at the seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris. The discipline and the good behaviour or the Brothers' pupils had impressed him greatly, and he wanted to see them established in Colombia. This is indeed what happened when he returned to his country and became bishop of Medellin, his native town. At this time, Brother Joseph was Superior General of the Institute.

With the support of the civil authorities and especially of Doctor Joaquin Velez, plenipotentiary representative of Colombia in Paris, he asked the Superior General to send at least six Brothers to Colombia. The time was right, as there were still plenty of vocations, and Brothers's schools were in a period of great expansion everywhere, especially in Europe, Asia and America. The fact that the laws of the French Government obliged religious to do their military service had done nothing to stem the numerical growth of the Institute.

On completion of all necessary negotiations, a contract was signed between the Institute and the diocese of Medellin, and the Superior General gave permission for the departure of the six Brothers that had been asked for.

The first steps.

The community went to Ecuador first. There they learnt Spanish before moving on to their final destination in 1890. Brother Bernon Marie, Visitor of the District of Ecuador, accompanied them.

The group included four French Brothers, a Colombian and an Ecuadorian. When they arrived in Medellin on March 19th, they were greeted with much respect and esteem by the civic and religious authorities as well as by the population which had been waiting impatiently for the Brothers to come and open a school.

And so Colombia became the second country in South America to receive the sons of St. John Baptist de La Salle. The first country had been Ecuador where the Brothers arrived in 1863.

In April 1890, the Brothers opened the San Jose school in an old building which had housed an orphanage up till then, and which now the bishop handed over to them.

Expansion.

The community was soon reinforced by the arrival of other French Brothers, this time from the Districts of Rheims and Clermont. These were young religious who preferred to leave their own country in order to keep their vocation which was threatened by the anti-religious laws which forbade them to run schools in their native country. These providential reinforcements made it possible to open other schools in places such as Barranquilla and Bogota, capital of the Republic. They had been invited to the capital soon after their arrival in Medellin by Mgr. Bernardo Herrera Restrepo who had, in the meanwhile, become Archbishop Primate of Colombia.

Besides being professionally competent, the Brothers who founded the District were apostles and true missionaries. They had a great ability to adapt to circumstances and to get on with people, while at the same time respecting the cultural traditions of the country. All these qualities and an almost perfect mastery of the language ensured them a great influence. Their extraordinary capacity for work and their sacrifices explain the prosperity that the Institute enjoyed in Colombia.

These French Brothers owed the sanctity of their lives in a good measure to those who formed them, Brothers Exuperien and Blessed Brother Arnould. Their spiritual vitality crowned their work in Colombia: vocations were numerous and the first Colombian Brothers followed closely in the footsteps of their founders, assimilating their religious virtues, their love of work, their religious observance, self-sacrifice, piety and zeal for the apostolate. This spiritual heritage ensured the continuation of their religious influence up to the 1960's. And then that extraordinary 1966 Chapter renewed religious life in line with the edicts of Vatican II.

Abundant fruit.

Thirty-eight years after the arrival of the Brothers in Colombia, their schools were spread all over the country and this made possible the setting up of another District in 1928. From then on, the District of Medellin would include the western part of the country, while that of Bogota the eastern part. In 1960, there were 600 Brothers in Colombia, most of them natives of the country.

At that time, they ran about 50 establishments and taught some 30.000 pupils. There was talk even of founding a third District in the north of the country, but these plans came to nothing with the onset of the religious crisis following Vatican II.

As the centenary celebration come closer, San Jose school is no longer the small establishment it was in 1890: it has become a very large and attractive centre of education. Its original 173 pupils now number 3.600 and represent all social classes, without distinction of social rank, economic circumstances or religious beliefs. The San Jose complex offers education which goes from nursery classes to university level.

In their first hundred years, the Brothers have left their mark on Colombia: the Lasallian approach to education and the religious, professional and pedagogical influence of the Brothers have enabled them to play a most important part in education at a national level.

The Brothers have contributed to the formation of a society which lives according to civic and religious values. Colombians have had to cope with many problems, but the education that the Church has provided by means of its religious has enabled the country to face successfully major socio-economic and religious crises.

Difficult times.

The post-conciliar crisis that affected all levels of the Church took a heavy toll of the Brothers also. Numerous religious returned to secular life; numbers went down by 50%; houses of formation remained empty; there were no vocations for 10 years; and the religious who had stayed grew older without hope of being replaced.

In spite of everything, the work has survived. Roots deeply imbedded in the rock of the regularity and sanctity of the founding Brothers have made possible the inspiration of new life into the century-old trunk of the Congregation, and new growths are vigorous and auger well for the future. The words of Brother Charles Henry, Superior General of happy memory, "renewal or death", have been taken to heart by the Brothers: we are resolved to survive. Our houses of formation rejoice once again at the presence of young people wishing to follow in the footsteps of St. La Salle.

Future prospects.

At the present time, our establishments include free schools, country schools, youth centres, centres in poor districts of towns and two universities: the La Salle university in Bogota and the Lasallian University Corporation in Medellin. Working closely with us are 2.000 lay teachers.

The lack of Brothers –they number 250 at present– has been compensated for in our schools by the presence of lay teachers. There is a certain amount of truth in the assertion that our schools have become teacher training colleges in which Brothers make known the principles of Lasallian pedagogy to a considerable number of lay people. The dream of the Founder, who on several occasions tried to set up training colleges for lay people, has become a reality in each one of our establishments: we have undertaken the responsibility of making known to our lay co-workers the spirituality and pedagogy of St. John Baptist de La Salle. With a view to achieving our objective, we organise study days, retreats, inter-District meetings, etc.

A short while ago, we started up an "Education Society" at university level which offers courses on the life and work of St. John Baptist de La Salle. What we are aiming at is to obtain from the Government recognition of these studies as a course in the Faculty of Educational Sciences.

Looking upon things as St. La Salle would want us to, namely, "with the eyes of faith", we have hopes for a bright and promising future.

DE LA SALLE PROFESSIONAL TRAINING CENTRE DALOA

Daloa is a large town in the west central part of the Ivory Coast, in the forest region. It is caught up in a process of expansion. Immigrants from everywhere, especially from Burkina Faso and Mali, live in very poor, crowded and rudimentary conditions.

The population of Daloa is thought to be 175.000 inhabitants. The Moslems are slightly in the majority and are more vociferous. Catholics make up less than 2.5% of the population of the diocese.

Some 15.000 students follow secondary school courses in three State schools, four private schools, two "general education schools" (CEG), and a State professional school.

Many of these pupils had problems at primary school level: they began too late, they received no support from their family, or they were simply not terribly interested, which is understandable if we remember that this is a forest region where the crushing climate tends to favour a certain "dolce farniente".

The Brothers of the Christian Schools were invited to Daloa by Mgr. Pierre Marie Coty. On the occasion of his consecration as bishop, he had stayed at our Generalate in Rome. It was then that he strongly urged Brother Superior to send Brothers to take over the running of the Lycee II. Before being the Lycee II, it had been the Sacred Heart Catholic College. It was founded and built by the Canadian Brothers of the Sacred Heart, who had been obliged as a result of a series of tragic circumstances to let go of the school.

Three Brothers, then, arrived in Daloa in September 1978. For eight years they worked simply as teachers in this school, but the idea of taking over the running of the school posed insurmountable problems to do with the number of students (some 2.000) and the spirit of the school.

During those eight years a great deal of thinking went on and the result was the creation of a Professional Training Centre for the outcasts of society: boys and girls, between the ages of 15 and 20 who were too old to begin general secondary education courses, or who had reached the limits of their ability in the first years of their secondary schooling.

These young people who came from both the town and country districts were frustrated in their hopes, did not know where to turn, and had no training for life or for a job.

The La Salle Professional Training Centre wishes, at least in some measure, to help such youngsters. It aims to gives these young people who are failures some basic technical intruction which will give them hope and some dignity. For this reason, this Centre stresses the practical side of teaching in particular. It aims to train student apprentices so that they can earn an honest living as more or less expert workers in electrical equipment or as repairers of radios and television sets.

The Centre aims also to makes its students responsible and honest citizens in their work and all areas of their lives. This is the special aim of the ethics class, but the whole dynamic ethos of the Centre is directed towards training the personality of the future worker in all its aspects. Teachers and monitors are aware of these aims.

There was no other similar establishment in the Ivory Coast. This means that we had to be pioneers. Not bound by any particular curriculum, not tyrannised by the prospect of State examinations, we can devise our own courses which are adapted to the needs of our special clientele and are accessible to it. We are in a position to choose our methods and approach. We can give our students whatever information or techniques we feel will be of most use to them in the short or long term.

Out teaching tends to be practical. Apart from a few French, maths and electricity lessons, adapted as far as possible to their ability and work-patterns, our apprentices spend most of their time in the workshops, where they work on repairing radios and television sets, practising setting up circuits in houses that are being built or renovated in town. This work is always supervised and checked by teachers and monitors from the Centre.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

The Centre opened in 1986 with 21 students. In 1987, they numbered 53, in October 1988 there were 80 of them. We hope to pass the hundred mark when school starts again in October 1989.

The buildings we use were built by the Brothers of the Christian Schools. The land which covers an area of 9 hectares was provided by the town authorities of Daloa. The German Charity organisation MISEREOR has supported the Centre during the first three years of its existence, and we have reason to hope it will continue to do so for another three years. We have already submitted our request.

Is not all this something of a dream? Is not our work here something of a Utopia, something that cannot be achieved?

Our pupils come from country and forest regions. They are lacking in a sense of thinking about the future, about making savings or investing. The idea of keeping a promise is foreign to them, as is love of work and of work well done. They have no team spirit or professional conscience. All these are values that need to be taught and promoted among our students.

And so, our Centre is open to young people whose academic record is somewhat poor. It represents, therefore, a life-belt, a last resort. This is social work in the true meaning of the word. This is why MISEREOR has adopted us, as have other organisations who have come to our support.

From the very first day the Centre opened its doors, it was made clear to parents and students that it did not offer studies leading to a diploma. However, students who did not manage to get a diploma in their general education studies hope to be able to do so by coming to us. It takes all our patience and skills as teachers to wean them away from the glittering prize of THE DIPLOMA, and a great deal of courage and perseverance to teach them the value of work, and to make them want to have the joy of working for the development of their country, and to take part in the struggle against under-development.

We have taken steps to obtain basic toolkits to give to students when they finish at the Centre, so that they can start a job without too many problems.

The idea of starting up a cooperative is in everybody's mind. We encourage our students when they finish their training to pool their efforts, their work and their skills, so that when they start work it will be with a lot of backing. A cooperative would put at their disposal a sufficiently well equipped workshop where they could work and do some repairs. It would also provide an administrative office, some books, value tables, catalogues, etc. Teachers from the Centre would be able to advise them and, from time to time, could organise refresher and retraining courses for them.

However, we see that there are inherent dangers in such an arrangement. Would our former students see the cooperative as a place of refuge? They have always dreamed of becoming officials. The idea is inbred in them, and it is very difficult to succeed in making producers out of them when their ambition has always been to be consumers.

* * *

And so, the challenge facing us is to transform these young men, who have been disappointed in their ambition of finding a comfortable and secure job as a petty official into free men, determined to become the co-workers of God the Creator through their work for a better world, ready to pool their efforts, so as to play a greater part in the salvation of the world; and as children of God following in the footsteps of Christ, helping those in need and those who are oppressed.

Are we, really, the ones who are dreaming?

ST. GABRIEL'S HALL AUDUBON
PHILADELPHIA - U.S.A.

St. Gabriel's Hall is a private Residential Rehabilitative Institution conducted by the Brothers of the Christian Schools giving continuous service to wayward youths and orphans for over 91 years. The Founder of the Institution was Archbishop Patrick John Ryan, Archbishop of Philadelphia, who selected the Brothers to conduct the facility on behalf of the diocese. The Institution was officially opened in 1898 as the Philadelphia Catholic Protectory for Boys, a homeless institution.

In 1899 the Protectory received a charter from the City of Philadelphia which increased it as a court adjudicated facility. In 1962 its name was changed to St. Gabriel's Hall reflecting a growing sensitivity in rehabilitative work. Appropriately St. Gabriel is the patron of difficult boys.

St. Gabriel's Hall is a non-profit, year round, Private Residential Rehabilitative Institution for over 200 court appointed boys between 12 and 18 years of age. The average time spent in residence is between 9 and 12 months. The mission of Sr. Gabriel's Hall is to provide stability, therapy, counseling and education to prepare residents for a successful return to home and community with self-respect, discipline and an understanding of the circumstances which brought them to us for help. The principal aim is to care for the individual in the belief that early intervention can restore a purposeful relationship between self and society.

St. Gabriel's Hall is not restricted to any religion or group. All interests are served with emphasis upon individual values fostered by a dedicated order of Brothers, certified teachers and a highly qualified experienced staff. Every boy assigned to the facility is given a comprehensive psychological, educational and medical work-up upon admission. A program is then devised to best benefit the individual. Case progress is reviewed regularly, both inhouse and by the committing authority.

The Social Services Department is committed to serving the needs of the young men in its care through an on-going interdisciplinary approach. The effectiveness of the program stems from the cooperative effort of a high skilled staff working as a team, bringing together treatment coordinators, child care workers, teachers, psychologists, psychiatrists, school counselors, mental health workers and social workers. A wide range of services is provided including individual, group and family therapy, outpatient clinic, partial hospitalization services, drug and alcohol counseling, full medical and dental care, psychological and psychiatric evaluations and therapeutic activity groups. Since 1984, St. Gabriel's Hall has been licensed by the Office of Mental Health and Department of Public Welfare to operate a Mental Health Clinic and Partial Hospitalization Program.

The Group Living Department is an integral part of our residential in-care program. It is based upon a few well-founded principles, the most fundamental of which is the assertion that all young people committed to the program are essentially socially and community oriented. The basic unit of Group Living is the "fraternity", a self-contained group of approximately 20 boys under the close supervision of youth care professionals. Each fraternity is provided its own living, sleeping and dining areas, in addition to indoor and outdoor recreation facilities. Students are assigned to fraternities according to age, emotional maturity and physical size. Fraternity living enables the professional staff to establish mature, trusting relationships with the residents, foster cooperation among peers and develop positive adult role models.

St. Gabriel's Hall provides comprehensive educational opportunities to the young men committed to our care. The school provides advanced academic, academic remedial and special education programs. The ultimate objective of the school program is to provide a student with the necessary skills for his transition to other programs in other schools. St. Gabriel's Hall School is recognized by the Pennsylvania Department of Education and is accredited by the Commission on Secondary Schools of the Middle States Association.

Graduation is a very significant event in the lives of our boys. It is held twice yearly in conjunction with the St. Gabriel System and is the culmination of a truly heroic effort on the part of many boys to overcome multiple difficulties and accomplish what they would have considered impossible a year earlier. Graduation is a formal ceremony in a distinguished setting, with friends and family in attendance. There is always a keynote speaker, academic awards, a class valedictorian, and a range of diploma and certificates presented by the respective programs.

St. Gabriel's Hall provides a wide range of recreational activities for the residents. We have a large gymnasium with two indoor baskestball courts and a modern weight lifting center, outdoor swimming pool, basketball, volleyball, baseball, soccer and football fields and extensive grounds for all manner of leisure pursuits. The school participates in the Archdiocese Catholic Youth Organization in track, the Philadelphia League in basketball as well as intra-mural sports in basketball, flag football, soccer, softball and volleyball.

Special assemblies, talks and presentations are scheduled throughout the year to augment in-house programs. Visiting professionals work with the boys throughout the year as volunteers. St. Gabriel's Hall participates in career exploration and has an Explorer Scout Troop.

N° 18
May 1st 1990

INTRODUCTION

● Issue N° 18 of LASALLIANA is the second of the three planned for 1990. In this issue we have concentrated especially on subjects related to our mission as educators and to the Lasallian Family. In doing so our aim was to offer topics that were thought-provoking and provided material for discussion, in the hope that they would encourage Brothers, communities and teaching establishments to think seriously about them, and lead them to follow the guidelines laid down in the Letter to the Lasallian Family.

● Once again, we should like to stress that these articles are meant to provide information and be used as discussion documents not only by the Brothers, but also by communities as a whole and by lay teachers who wish to reflect more deeply on their vocation as Christian educators.

For this reason it is desirable that there should be enough copies of our publication in all our Lasallian establishments so that they can be used unhurriedly and when the need arises. Quite often, when we have occasion to speak about our mission as educators, we search around for suitable material to use. The aim of this Institute publication is to meet this need by making high-quality articles available on this subject as well as on numerous other Lasallian topics.

● Subscriptions to Lasalliana are dealt with at a District level. The Brother Visitor tells us how many copies he wants and he distributes them on arrival. A certain number of establishments in several countries have told us that they would like more copies. Our answer is that they should take the matter up with their Visitor. This goes also for lay teachers, affiliated members of the Institute and other colleagues who wish to receive copies.

● We mentioned in Issue N° 17 that we were going to start up a correspondence section which would provide an opportunity for readers to ask questions, offer explanations or furnish additional information relating to topics treated in articles. We have already received a number of letters but unfortunately not soon enough to be included in this issue. We hope therefore to launch this new section in our next issue, N° 19, which will include both the letters we have already received and any others that arrive in the meantime.

HOW ARTICLES ARE CLASSIFIED

Each article is identified by 4 numbers/letters. E. g.: 16 - 14 – D -34.
- the first number indicates the number of the issue.
- the second, the number of the article in the table of contents.
- the letter indicates the nature of the subject matter.
- the last number indicates how many articles exist already on subjects of a similar nature.

The example given above indicates that the article in question appears in issue No. 16; that it is No. 14 in the table of contents of that issue; that the subject matter relates to lay people and the Lasallian Family; and that 34 articles already exist on related topics.

Subject matter is indicated by letters as follows:

O. General subjects, miscellaneous.
A. St. John Baptist de La Salle. Facts, writings, spirituality, teachings, etc.
B. The FSC Institute: history and present day.
C. Thoughts on education.
D. Collaboration between the Brothers' Institute and lay people. The Lasallian Family.
E. Personal witness, experiences, events, celebrations.

LASALLIAN POSTAGE STAMPS

Stamp collecting is one of the many pleasurable hobbies or leisure time activities of our retired Brothers.

Collecting stamps on the basis of themes is the area which seems to generate the most interest while also furnishing a lot of information. Collections of stamps on De La Salle have not been too popular, more because few collectors know about them rather than because of a lack of interest. Certainly their circulation is very limited and therefore they are not readily available everywhere.

In LASALLIANA 14–0–26, some information on Lasallian philatelic Publications was made available internationally. Admittedly it was not exhaustive, but it does indicate that there is interest in this area among the Brothers, students and alumni. The present material is designed to add a little more to what has already been published, and is subject to further revision and completion.

- For the tricentenary of the foundation of the Institute, new issues were published in 1980 and 1981 in Bolivia, Sri Lanka and Venezuela.

- Also in 1981, Panama came out with a stamp which commemorates the 75th year since the arrival of the Brothers in that country. Actually, it should have appeared in 1979 because the Brothers came to Panama in 1904.

- In 1980, Ireland issued an excellent stamp of the Founder to commemorate the arrival of the Brothers in that country.

- The picture of Brother Miguel Febres Cordero appeared on a stamp issued in Ecuador on October 30, 1977.

- Subsequently, Ecuador honored one of its illustrious sons on October 21, 1984 on the occasion of the beatification of Brother Miguel of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. That was the third stamp dedicated to him. The first was printed in 1954 to commemorate his birthdate.

- In 1961, the Philippines honored the work of the Christian Brothers on the occasion of its Golden Anniversary and in 1986 there were three issues to commemorate the Diamond Anniversary of La Salle University of Manila. They represent the Founder and other canonized Christian Brothers.

- Just as in 1962 Belgium honored Brother Alexis Marie, so likewise in 1981 Canada presented a stamp to honor the eminent botanist Brother Marie Victorin.

- The Democratic Republic of Madagascar, in 1981, brought out a stamp to honor Brother Raphael Louis Rafiringa who, during the early years of the ministry of the Christian Brothers in that land, became a man very much revered for his holiness.

* * *

In this part of our presentation we will furnish more information on the stamps mentioned above. Unlike LASALLIANA 14–0–26, we cannot provide the Ivert cataloging for the simple reason that we do not have it at hand. We will use the Scott cataloging for those who are interested. We will follow a chronological order for the stamp issues, as far as possible, when the date is available.

- On August 15, 1964, Nicaragua, which has issued "the most beautiful group of Lasallian stamps", put into circulation an Air Mail stamp C 410-A80 which presents the most commonly used Lasallian heraldic emblem. It appeared previously on July 13, 1958 but this time it is identified as Cs 0.20. Scott has it cataloged as N° C539A-A81.

- The country with the second largest number of Lasallian stamps is the republic of Ecuador. For the beatification of Brother Miguel by Pope Paul VI it published a stamp on October 30, 1977.

It is allegorical and mesures 12 x 12 1/2, cataloged as N° C608-AP153, worth $2.60.

The previous issues of 1954 showed the sites and monuments which commemorate Brother Miguel. The stamp alluded to above, in allegorical style, shows the Piazza of Saint Peter in the Vatican over a background map of Latin America which highlights Ecuador and above these is the image of Brother Miguel. The general idea is to emphasize his importance in the Lasallian contribution to education on this continent. The inscription below reads: "An Academician on our Altars - Blessed Brother Miguel, 1854-1910". It was printed in the Instituto Geográfico Militar de Quito.

- On the feast of St. Joseph in 1980, Ireland issued a beautiful stamp of the Holy Founder on the occasion of the centenary of the arrival of the Brothers on that island.

Technically, it consists of a lithograph in several colors measuring 14 x 15. It is nicely done and bears the catalog number 477-A156. Oddly enough it is listed in the catalog as "Order of Salesians" (founded by St. John Baptist). The only printing on the stamp reads" "Ord De La Salle in Eirin – 1880-1980". It is printed by "Irish Security Stamp P. L."

- Bolivia, to the best of our knowledge, on May 15th, issued the first stamp commemorating the Tricentenary of the foundation of the Institute. It is an allegorical drawing by A. Bel in several colors which represents the Founder with a map of the world to his right and the following words in the upper portion: "Worldwide Tricentenary of De La Salle 1680-1980". It was printed by La Papelera, S. A. and cataloged by Scott as N° 653-A234 with 13 1/2 x 14 perforations and valued at 9 bolivianos.

On May 15, 1981, three others Lasallian stamps appeared in as many countries.

- One of these comes from Venezuela by way of Ipostel which issued a vertical stamp excellently printed in silverish tones with the signature of the Founder in red and a black inscription reading "Lasallian Tricentenary 1680-1980" in the upper part.

There is also a special, original and we believe unique postmark for first day circulation from Colegio La Salle-La Colina bearing the signature of the founder which is very similar to that on the stamp itself.

Printed by "Casa da Moeda do Brazil", it appears in Scott as N° 1244-A285, lithographed, with perforations of 11 1/2 x 11 with a value of 1.25 bolivianos.

• Another stamp issued on the same date comes from Sri Lanka and is worth 2.00 rupies. Horizontally oblong, with perforations of 12 1/2 x 12, predominantly blue in color and lithographed, it was printed in the Soviet Union and represents the Founder on the left, while on the right we find the star heraldic shield of the Institute with its garlands and motto: "Indivisa Manent". Beneath this is a scroll with "Lasallian Tercentenary 1680-1980". Catalog N° 603-A223.

• On that same 15th of May, 1981, Panama put on first-day sale a stamp which actually celebrates 75 years of Lasallian education in this small Republic. The real date for commemoration was 1979, but for various reasons, the issue appeared only in 1981. The art work is that of Alberto Conte, an alumnus and shows the Founder blessing the map of Panama. The nine stars represent each of the places in which the Brothers exercised their apostolate in the course of 75 years.

It is the second philatelic issue made in Panama on the Lasallian theme. The first appeared on September 24, 1951 and included two stamps which celebrated the Tricentenary of the birth of St. John-Baptist de La Salle.

It was printed in Colombia with a run of half a million stamps. The value of each was 17 C. Catalog N° 608-A195 with perforations of 12 x 12.

• Among the series on important national figures of Canada we find a stamp dedicated to Brother Marie Victorin (Conrado Kirouac) which was issued on July 22, 1981. He was born in Quebec in 1885 and died in an automobile accident on June 24, 1944. He is considered among the greatest botanists of Canada along with John Macoun to whom a stamp was also dedicated on the same day.

Almost square, lithographed in several colors with a value of 17 c it represents Brother Marie Victorin surrounded by flowers and his name appears at the bottom.

Perforations are 12 1/2 and the stamp bears catalog N° 894-A430 of Scott.

• Madagascar, where the Brothers have labored since 1866 issued a stamp on August 10, 1981 which was dedicated to Brother Raphael Louis Rafiringa. He was born in Tananarive on May 1, 1854 and died with a reputation for sanctity on May 19, 1919. It is a rather large stamp 5 x 3.5 with perforations of 12. The value is 30 Fr of this Democratic Republic. It is catalog N° 622-A195 and represents the traditional image of Brother Raphael against a red backgroud.

• For the trird time in the history of Lasallian Philately Ecuador steps forth on October 21, 1984. This time it presents an issue commemorating the canonization of Brother Miguel, henceforth known as Brother Miguel Febres Cordero. Strangely enough, the stamp says "sanctification".

There are two stamps: one of 24 and another of 9 sucres, printed at the Instituto Geográfico Militar, one vertically oblong and the other horizontally oblong. The 9 sucres stamp shows a photograph of the Academia Ecuatoriana de la Lengua de 1892 against a silver background. Brother Miguel was a professor there. A much better image is found on the 14 sucres stamp in which, against an aerial view of the Vatican and the Piazza of St. Peter as a background, we see superimposed on the right upper corner the picture of Pope John Paul II and on the left lower corner, the photo of St. Brother Miguel.

A very limited edition which is also a collectible appeared as a Philatelic Sticker measuring 9 x 11 cm with a value of S/28. It has the family house of the Febres Cordero in the city of Cuenca in the bust of the father of Brother Miguel, while his mother appears at the lower right.

• In 1961 the Philippines issued two stamps to celebrate the Golden Anniversary of the arrival of the Brothers on the islands. Then on July 16, 1986, on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee of this same historic event, the government of the Philippines issued three stamps each showing one of three Lasallian saints against a background of the Brothers' schools of Nozedale and of Taft Avenue.

The first, against a red background, shows the sculptured group of the Founder and pupils in front of La Salle–Paco and La Salle–Taft. Its value is 60 s.

The second, against a yellow background, presents the image of St. Brother Benilde over the building of La Salle University. Value, 3 p.

The third, against a blue background, has the image of St. Brother Miguel Febres Cordero against the original school of Paco where the Brothers first began teaching on the islands. Value: 2.40 p.

All of these stamps are horizontally oblong, 3 x 4 cm and below have the inscription "De La Salle University. 1911 - Diamond Jubilee - 1986".

Besides these stamps, there was also published a triptych entitled: "Commemorative Stamps of the Diamond Jubilee" with the above-mentioned stamps in the center, flanked by a Philatelic Sticker to the right and left, together with a short explanation of the stamps and the Lasallian communities. The Philatelic Sticker is green and white (the colors of the University) and presents the nine founding Brothers of the Lasallian schools in the Philippines.

Also issued was a night view of the front of the University. This Philatelic Sheet is square, 7 1/2 x 7 1/2 at 7.20 p.

In 1988 (Ivert 1510) the Philippines reissued the same stamp of Saint Brother Miguel which appeared July 16, 1986 only this time the value changed from 2.40 to 1.90 p.

DE LA SALLE AND TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR TEACHERS (1/2)

A CHERISHED DREAM OF THE FOUNDER

In the studies which have been made on De La Salle and his work, there is one project which has suffered from benign neglect, perhaps because it did not achieve its intended result, perhaps because the attempts ceased before his death, but it is difficult to believe that he ever completely gave up on the idea. I am referring to the steps De La Salle took to firmly establish a teacher training program for rural teachers.

Much has been written about his establishment of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools as it is officially known, and more popularly "Christian Brothers" or "Lasallian Brothers". It was due to the chance encounter of two men, Nyel and De La Salle, in the reception room of the convent of the Sisters of the Child Jesus on March 9, 1679 that in the designs of God was born a Society which was to become the Community of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

However, if we read his biographers carefully, it becomes evident that from the outset De La Salle entertained the idea of training teachers for rural schools. When Blain speaks about the foundation made by De La Salle in the Parish of Saint Hypolite of Paris, he tells us: "No other institution fascinated him more. His plan included the Institute of the Brothers for the cities as well as the formation of school teachers for the rural areas". (1) Elsewhere he continues: "He was convinced that there would always be something missing in his Institute or that it could not render the Church those services it deserved as long as rural areas were not provided with the same kind of teachers available to the cities; i. e., devout teachers who were well prepared to educate and instruct youth in all that is necessary for salvation". (2) Both of these quotations confirm the statement of Brother Maximin when, speaking about the "Normal Schools of St. John Baptist de la Salle", he says that after his Religious Congregation, there was nothing that occupied his thoughts and zeal more than truly efficient Normal Schools (in the pedagogical terminology of the day) for the training of lay teachers for rural areas". (3)

A PROJECT SPECIAL TO THIS INSTITUTE

From his very first years of working toward the organization of schools, we can see him taking steps, setting the stage, so that while children in the cities were being provided with teachers dedicated to their salvation by means of schools, the rural children would not be deprived of equal opportunities.

In his "Memorial on the Habit", a very important document which he composed around Christmas time of 1689 in Paris defending his position relative to the Habit of the Brothers against M. Baudrand the parish priest of Saint Sulpice who intended to change it, he clearly states: "In this community (its members) operate gratuitous schools only in cities, in which they teach Religion every day including Sundays and feasts.

They also devote themselves to the training of teachers for rural schools in a house other than that of the Community, which we refer to as "a seminary". Those in training remain only a few years until they are well prepared both in piety as well as in what concerns their work as teachers." (4)

The reasons for this separation during formation and later in place of ministry we already mentioned when we discussed how De La Salle differed from his predecessors. Reviewing them quickly, we could say that they were basically due to the strong spirit of community which he wanted for the Brothers. He was faced with the resounding success of the Christian Schools due to the new teachers he was training. However, in the same rural villages there were not enough children to occupy the time of two or three Brothers and this was the number required to form a community. On the other hand, the number of students was sufficient to occupy a lay teacher who could live in the village, and since he received the same kind of training and formation as a Brother, he could achieve the same results with the village children. Besides, lay teachers could also help in the parishes with the liturgical service, an area in which the Brothers did not wish to become involved because they wanted it perfectly clear that the Brothers were not clerics.

THE ORIGINAL INTENT

During the entire life of De La Salle as the founder of schools, the concept, the project and the realization of training schools for lay teachers was always on his mind. It was an enterprise from which not even the most serious difficulties, not even the betrayal of those he trusted could dissuade him.

The first information we have goes back to 1683. Brother Dante found it among notes of Maille and Capillon, notaries of Rheims, as quoted by Lucard; and Brother Maximin discovered a document of Remi Favart, Doctor of Theology and Canon of Notre Dame of Rheims, dated April 2, 1683. Both quotations refer to the same thing and transcribe a content which is identical. "The house contracted to him for the sum of two thousand five hundred and fifty (livres) which is located on Grand Street of Rethel is the same sum as that said given him by someone who wishes to remain anonymous, on the condition that said house be used by the discreet and worthy person of M. Jean-Baptiste de La Salle, Doctor in Theology and Canon of the Cathedral of Rheims for the purpose of a gratuitous school for children which is being opened in said place of Rethel, and to house the teachers who operate it; likewise, if it be possible, there will be established a seminary for rural teachers for the diocese of Rheims. The above has been stipulated and accepted by M. De La Salle, present". (5)

Everything seems to indicate that this original plan was not realized for reasons which are quite evident. Primarily, he did not as yet have the personnel sufficiently prepared to undertake such an ambitious enterprise. Nevertheless it does tell us that from the very beginning of his work as a Founder (only 4 years after his meeting with Nyel) he has in mind to provide rural teachers indipendently of his work with the Brothers.

ANOTHER ATTEMPT

In that same year of 1683, De La Salle rented two houses next to the house on Rue Neuve where the Institute was officially born in 1682. One of them would be the home of the first Normal School on record in the history of education.

Zeal for the glory of God is creative and with parish priests begging for Brothers to teach in their parishes, De La Salle found himself with too few Brothers. In places where there were too few students to warrant the investment of a whole community, he suggested that these pastors send him devout and intelligent young men so that he could train them as teachers. The proposal was enthusiastically received and the first Normal School began, as close as we can ascertain, around Christmas time of 1685 with three candidates. S. Gallego states that this "is the humble beginning of the training school for teachers". (6)

Concerning this Normal School, Blain says that at one time there were up to thirty students and De La Salle saw that these student teachers could take the place of Brothers in small towns. (7) He was personally interested in them, although he appointed a competent Brother to direct them according to his programs and counsel.

We know from early biographers the kind of schedule and activities which were in place in this first training center. The students were taught reading, writing and plain chant as well as the skills necessary for the profession of an educator. Also indicated were the times for prayer, meditation, spiritual reading and other duties of Christian living. De La Salle describes it all in his already quoted "Memorial on the Habit": "They are in a house separated from the Community which we refer to as «a seminary». Those in training remain only a few years until they are well prepared both in piety as well as in what concerns their work as teachers.

They wear the clothing of ordinary laymen, preferably black or some other dark color, and they are distinguishable from other lay people only by their white collar (rabat) and their shorter haircut.

They are taught singing (Gregorian), reading and writing to perfection. Their food, lodging and laundry are furnished free of charge. Afterwards, a position is found for them in a town or village where they are to fulfill the office of teacher-cleric. Once they have been so placed, they have no further ties to the Community except those flowing from courtesy. However, they are welcomed any time they come to make a retreat." (8)

Occasionally, impressed by the atmosphere of recollection and devotedness of the house, some asked to join the community of the Brothers and they were welcomed. This, however, was actually the first school designed specifically to train teachers and "only teachers" as S. Gallego insists; that is, lay teachers in the strict historical sense of the term with no overtones of novitiate or seminary.

This first Normal School, opened toward the end of 1685, continued to flourish while De La Salle remained in Rheims. After he left for Paris in 1688, under the direction of Brother Henry L'Heureux and Brother Jean Henri according to Brothers Dante and Maximin, it began to dwindle and it finally disappeared in 1690. All told, we can see that it enjoyed three years of successful operation of the five years of its existence.

THE PROJECT OF MAZARIN

Before the Normal School in Rheims began, De La Salle was the lessee of a house which had not yet been used for its original purpose according to the contract drawn up by Favart and the wishes of Charles-Armand de la Porte, Duke of Mazarin. De La Salle began negotiations with him to open his "seminary" in order to produce a sufficient number of lay teachers to disseminate correct doctrine and Christian morality as well as solid citizenship throughout the lands of his duchy, as we read in the contract of the foundation dated August 20, 1685. The duke will pay for 17 people, their lodging and formation and De La Salle commits himself to furnish two Brothers who will be in charge of organizing the program. Besides, according to the contract, there is provision for the continuation of the work even should the community of Brothers dissolve. 3.000 (livres) spread out over the year will be provided.

Everything had been arranged, but, as Brother Maximin says, "unfortunately John Baptist de la Salle was too far ahead of his times". (9) The project was not accepted by those whose influence was brought to bear on the Archbishop and when De La Salle and the Duke of Mazarin went to him to seek approbation they were answered with a caustic: "You are both crazy". In all humility, De La Salle replied: "Forgive me, Your Grace, there is only one," referring to himself as the author of the proposal. (10)

Consequently, the contract was nullified. However, on the same day, September 22, 1685, they signed a similar agreement to make the establishment in La Fere in the diocese of Laon. This contract is less generous in the matter of personnel (3) and finances (600 livres) and stipulated that locating a house and opening the program must take place by October 1, 1686, at which time the funds would be made available. We cannot be certain that this school actually opened, but Rigault is of the opinion that an ephemeral and undocumented foundation did exist in La Fere.

Perhaps it was for this reason that, convinced as he was of the need for these "seminaries", that he opened the one in Rheims at his own expense and under his own responsibility because it began with three candidates for teacher training from the duchy and for the duchy, according to S. Gallego.

DE LA SALLE AND TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR TEACHERS (2/2)

THE PARIS PROJECT

De La Salle moved to Paris in 1688. Ten years later, in what was called Grandmaison, it seems that among other programs existing in this house, there was also a kind of "seminary" for rural reachers (1) under the direction of Brother Nicholas Vuyart. It could be that it functioned in conjunction with the novices (pretty broadminded for those times!), but it does not seem to be concerned only with novices, according to Guibert.

It is in the parish of Saint Hypolite in Paris where the teacher training program for rural teachers reappears. This was in 1699. Encouraged by the enthusiasm of the parish priest who had requested Brothers for his school, and financed by the contributions of various benefactors, De La Salle re-opened the "seminary" on Rue de l'Ourcine. The two Brothers of the school also assumed the operation of the "seminary". The director was Brother Nicholas Vuyart "whom De La Salle considered as one of his best men (2) and who, it seems, had already prepared a couple of young men then teaching in Rethel (1683-1685) according to the wishes of the Duke of Mazarin. This was to be the first Normal School with supervised student practice, because one of the two classes it scheduled was to be taught by student teachers under the supervision of a master teacher.

Regulations for the student teachers were similar to those of the Brothers: "Rising at four-thirty, and retiring at nine. Prayer, spiritual reading, examination of conscience were part of the routine, along with instruction and activities proper to their profession... Silence and recollection were common practice along with all that went into the ordinary day of the Brothers, (3) The program of studies was similar to that of Rheims, with additions and modifications. Included were catechism, reading, grammar, spelling, arithmetic, the system of weights and measures, and Gregorian chant which would be useful in their function of assistants to the parish priests of rural areas. It was, for a century and a half before, what it would continue to be afterward; that is, a formal obligation for parishes to organize elementary schools, and teachers had to be trained.

We have no way of determining the number of student teachers who were certified in this program, but we can give here a typical testimonial concerning the effectiveness of this "seminary". A priests wrote this in 1719: "My country and I owe an eternal debt of gratitude to De La Salle. It was his kindness which furnished me four young men to teach in the neighborhood of Saint Marcial. They were well prepared and very zealous. One became a priest". (4)

Unfortunately, Bro. Nicholas Vuyart lost his head over the money to which the parish priest of Saint Hypolite made him a legal heir. He abandoned De La Salle and once he had broken off his commitment, the seminary began to decline in 1704. Perhaps the whole affair began because of the strategy adopted to save the "seminary" which was prospering, at the time of the Court case of Chatelet on the 29th of August. De La Salle would not allow the proposed dissimulation and insisted on the principle of "together and by association". However certain Brothers implemented their plan to pretend not to belong to the Institute in order to save the school and the "seminary". Eventually both disappeared. It seems that later on Vuyart requested his re-admission and De La Salle, who never harbored rancor toward anyone, was disposed to receive him with fatherly forgiveness. However, according to his custom, he consulted with the Brothers before taking a decision and after hearing their objections he decided against the re-instatement.

NEW EXPECTATIONS WITH ABBÉ CLÉMENT

Another attempt would be made in Paris itself. De La Salle was convinced of the need for these training schools and whatever had to be done to get them going would be done. During the spring of 1708 the Brothers had come to Saint-Denis, a small town to the north of the capital. While negotiations were still in progress, a young man by the name of Abbé Clément, son of the King's surgeon and aspirant to the rich monastery revenues of St. Calais comes into the scene. Impulsive and eager to achieve something significant in the field of education, he contacts De La Salle. The founder senses that something is not right. They meet off and on during the course of the year and then, because of the recommendation and strong approbation of Cardinal de Noailles, the interest of Madame de Maintenon and even of Louis XIV, the "seminary" is opened at Easter of 1709. Three Brothers take charge of it, one of whom teaches Gregorian chant. They used the same format previously employed with the same happy results. Except for a temporary closure during the famine, everything seemed to indicate that the cherished dream of De La Salle was finally to be realized, and that his tenacity was to be rewarded.

However, once more money and social status caused the failure of the training school for rural teachers and this time it involved disgrace and humiliations for John Baptist de La Salle.

Toward the end of 1709, Abbé Clément received his coveted prize of the Abbey of St. Calais as well as a position as Canon of the Cathedral of Le Mans. Dominated by vanity and ambition, he began to lose interest in the humble work of the "seminary" for rural teachers which he formerly considered a worthy project for both his youthful dreams and his money. In 1711, his father received the title of nobility from the King, and from then on his aversion turned into disdain. He not only ignored his former friends but also became ashamed of the projects to which he had commited himself, refusing to repay the loan which De La Salle had made to him and insisting that he had been forced to support the foundation of the "seminary".

A court case ensued. De La Salle was charged with taking advantage of a minor. At first he decided to defend himself by presenting his evidence in the case –13 letters written by Clément to De La Salle– over the course of the entire planning stage. He left this documentation in the hands of "trusted people in authority" (5). Unfortunately, few there are who cannot be suborned with money. These trusted friends turned against him and the whole Parisian atmosphere became hostile to him. After doing all he could possibly do, to no avail, flight (6) remained his only alternative; so on February 18, 1712 he went South whence he had come scarcely 5 months previously.

On June 15th, a second judgment of the Court adjudicated the house of Saint Denis to Rogiers, one of the "trusted people in authority", and ordered the Brothers and De La Salle to vacate the premises. Thus the training school for rural teachers perished for the third time. After all the work he had invested in his dream which, after the Congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, was dearest to his heart, he had just suffered another severe set-back. He felt both discouraged and very tired. It was the moment of his dark night of the soul which would be dispelled by the peace and tranquility of Parménie. De La Salle would die without the consolation of seeing a single teacher training center in operation, but his sons, faithful to the vision of their Founder, have succesfully established teacher training centers or Normal Schools on every continent throughout the 300 years of Lasallian history.

IN THE HANDS OF PROVIDENCE

From all this, it is clearly evident that, for De La Salle, it was of vital importance to give teachers a proper formation if education was to enjoy continuity and effectiveness. With this conviction, he founded a Congregation of men consecrated to God by vocation to exercise the ministry of Christian education. They were to remain lay Religious, not clergy, so that nothing, not even the attractions of the priesthood, would distract them from their primary mission. They would live in community so that "together and by association" they could better do the work which God has entrusted to their care. And yet, almost as if there were something more the Institute had to do, from the very beginning he envisioned the formation of lay teachers as collaborators in the Lasallian project, to go where the Brothers could not go – to the small towns and villages.

Given the above, no one can say that this idea of De La Salle concerning the training schools for rural teachers was only sporadic or incidental. We have witnessed him constantly striving to begin again whenever circumstances, which were always external to himself and to his work, brought his efforts to naught. Just consider the 29 years (1683-1712) during which De La Salle tried to establish various "seminaries". Sixteen years went into projects, transactions and more or less stable establishments. And 13 of these years saw the full implementation of these incipient Normal Schools. These 13 years are more than the few days or the few months which we commonly ascribe to their functioning.

If De La Salle proposed to himself the re-formation of the popular school of the Seventeenth Century, he very intelligently undertook the re-formation of the principal factor in the system of education: the teacher. This has to be fundamental in any attempt to improve the school. Any other attempt at reform, be it through creative concepts or through administrative shake-ups is doomed to ultimate failure. Thus it is that the greatest Lasallian contribution has been a focus on the teacher as the means and the condition of the true reform. During his whole life, we see him dedicated to improving his teachers, be they Brothers or not, by way of written pedagogical works, catechisms and spiritual writings. If we find him teaching classes in Dijon or Grenoble it is only due to special circumstances on which he substitutes for a Brother who for some reason cannot meet his classes.

The excellent results of his method of teacher training were immediately recognized and praised. We know of the letter sent to Brother Bartholomew, the first successor to De La Salle in the government of the Congregation, by one of the priests of the parish of Saint Nicholas du Chardonnet to which we have already referred. Blain himself says: "He saw his work and his concern rewarded as he contemplated the blessings God had bestowed upon these young teachers in the schools of the villages to which they had returned. They would bear much fruit and would be the "good odor of Jesus Christ" by their example, their piety and zeal, and by their dedication to the duties of their profession" (7). And this must be the true purpose of Lasallian teacher training, not only to impart excellent professional skills, but above all, to enkindle that religious zeal which is indispensible for the complete fulfillment of so exalted a mission. This is what really makes a true Christian teacher.

No wonder that Pope Pius XII, on May 15, 1950 proclaimed St. John Baptist de La Salle "Patron before God of all teachers".

CHAPTER 5 OF THE CONDUCT OF SCHOOLS: A DRAMATIC DIALOGUE

In Chapter 5 of the Conduct of Schools De La Salle is at grips with the major pedagogical problem of the 17th century: teacher cruelty. Canon Blain tells us in the Life of John Baptist De La Salle that De La Salle's ambitious intention was to eliminate all forms of corporal punishment from the schools, a formidable task, I might add, at a time when the paternal swat was considered the beginning of pedagogy.

Blain also tells us that De La Salle during his lifetime was not successful in eliminating corporal punishment from the schools because the teachers were not ready to do so. They were so threatened by the possibility of losing their authority in the classroom, that they could not relinquish the security of the ferule. Regarding the elimination of corporal punishment in the classroom, De La Salle had to engage in a patient, political, lifelong program of persuasion with his teachers. Like a good administrator, he accepted the teachers where they were, and he worked patiently to wean them away from their reliance upon corporal punishment. De La Salle understood the teachers' insecurity and resistance, and he accepted whatever changes of moderation and limitation that were possible. It took until 1860, 141 years after the death of De La Salle, before the Brothers finally eliminated all mention of corporal punishment from the Conduct of Schools.

It is an historical tragedy stemming from a superficial reading by historians of education of Chapter 5, the longest chapter in the Conduct of Schools, that De La Salle's approach to the elimination of corporal punishment has been misunderstood. The length of Chapter 5 has been mistakenly interpreted by some historians as a confirmation that De La Salle as well as his teachers were obsessed with corporal punishment. It is my belief that such a misreading has been due to the failure to recognize the chapter's dialogical structure and the concomitant failure to identify what is said by De La Salle and what is said by the teachers.

Ironically, De La Salle's approach to the elimination of corporal punishment as expressed in Chapter 5 is probably the most realistic and humane presentation on correction written by a practising primary school educator in 17th-century France. Chapter 5 is a pedagogical treasure, a gem in the history of discipline in education. In Chapter 5 De La Salle's pedagogical genius is at its best, and what he has to say about classroom correction and "kids at risk" has value for teachers today.

Without being theatrical Chapter 5 is a subtly staged dialogue in which the moderating views of De La Salle alternate with and respond to the needs and demands of the teachers to hang on to the traditional means of correction. Based upon the text of De La Fontainerie's English translation of the Conduct of Schools (McGraw-Hill, 1935) a counting of the positions identified as taken by the teachers totals approximately ten pages; a counting of the responses identified as De La Salle's totals approximately 22 pages. Chapter 5 of the Conduct of Schools is the best example in all the writings of De La Salle illustrating the painful reality of his role as collaborator in the pedagogical formation of the teachers. The objective of this article is to outline the script of the painful dialogue between De La Salle and the teachers in Chapter 5.

Script of the Dialogue between De La Salle and the Teachers

De La Salle: (Introduction, four pages) The principal cause of student misbehavior: the teacher

The Introduction to Chapter 5 is not in the 1706 manuscript of the Conduct of Schools. De La Salle added this long introduction prior to the 1720 printed edition in order to strengthen and focus his position regarding corporal punishment vis-a-vis the teachers. De La salle sets the stage by posing a dilemma in terms that are meaningful and challenging to the teachers: How can a teacher obtain classroom order and discipline without alienating the students? Then De La Salle, front and center, presents the model teacher as one who combines firmness with gentleness and follows with the lengthy claim that the cause of student misbehavior is the unbearable and weak teacher. Typical lines:

"... first the necessity of joining gentleness to firmness in the guidance of children must be explained."

"What must be done in order that firmness may not degenerate into harshness, and gentleness into weakness?"

(Summary) The unbearable teacher is rigorous and lacks discretion; domineering and impatient; demanding and nagging; unreasonable and unwilling to listen; unfair; insensitive.

(Summary) The weak teacher is neglectful; lax on regulations; familiar; frivolous. He fails to follow through; shows favoritism; lacks conviction or feeling.

Teachers: (Article 1, four pages) The traditional kinds of correction

The defensive demands of the teachers dominate this response. The teachers insist upon a description of the kinds of correction they have traditionally relied upon: reprimand, strap, rod, expulsion, and penance. The 1706 manuscript of Conduct of Schools had included the whip, but by the time of the 1720 edition De La Salle had succeeded in getting the teachers to drop it. De La Salle makes three interventions in the teachers' presentation: he makes the startling recommendation that reprimands not be used; he gets the teachers to agree to a limited and minimal number of blows; and he puts off talking about penance, which "has special utility," until the end of Chapter 5. Typical lines:

"When a teacher has threatened the pupils with something, and one of them commits the fault on account of which they have been threatened, he must be punished."

"The ferule may be used on several occasions: 1. For not following the lesson or for fooling around. 2. For coming late to school. 3. For not obeying at the first sign; and for several other similar faults."

According to our custom, the rod may be used: 1. For not being willing to obey. 2. For habitually not following the lesson or not studying. 3. For scribbling instead of writing. 4. For fighting in school or on the streets. 5. For not praying in church. 6. For not behaving at Mass or during catechism. 7. For missing Mass or catechism on Sunday."

De La Salle: (Articles 2, 3, 4. seven pages) The moderation and restriction of correction

De La Salle goes into a lengthy monologue regarding the moderation, limitation and eventual elimination of corporal punishment. The monologue is broken up into three "scenes." In the first "scene" De La Salle counsels the teachers to avoid corporal punishment by critiquing the source of the disorder; by creating non-punitive means of keeping order; by consulting beforehand with the school principal.

In the second "scene" De La Salle describes the "ideal" punishment which fulfills ten "ideal" conditions: seven of which apply to the teacher; two apply to the student; one applies to both. De La Salle probably had his tongue in cheek during this "scene," knowing that the ten "ideal" conditions in reality eliminate corporal punishment.

In the third "scene" De La Salle describes the ten worst faults commited in administering corporal punishment. Again, and the implication is clear, if the faults are avoided, corporal punishment becomes practically non-existent.

In the monologue De La Salle uses his strongest language in Chapter 5 against corporal punishment, and he makes very specific limitations and restrictions against its usage. De La Salle comes through as an administrator who is in touch with his teachers and on top of the problem. Typical lines:

"... in a good school punishments must be rare..."

"To avoid punishments which are a source of great disorder in a school, it is necessary to note well that it is silence, self-control, and vigilance on the part of the teacher that establish and maintain good order in a class, and not harshness and blows."

(Summary) The ten conditions are: on the part of teacher: charitable, just, proportioned to the fault, moderate, calm, prudent, and not administered for offenses taken personally; on part of the student: accepted and respectful; on the part of both: silent.

(Summary): The ten worst faults are: harmful, useless, impulsive, disturbing to the class, antagonizing other students, using disrespectful words, brought on by displeasure with the student or his parents, done in an indecorous manner, not approved by school policy, and not approved for the particular teacher.

Teachers: (Article 5, two pages) The serious offenses deserving punishment

The teachers respond by listing the five most serious offenses which they righteously demand deserve corporal punishment and which they defensively maintain can only be controlled by corporal punishment. It must have been very difficult for De La Salle to compromise and to let the teachers have their say in this matter. Typical lines:

"There are five vices which must not ordinarily be pardoned: lying, fighting, theft, impurity and indecorum in church."

De La Salle: (Sections 1, 2, 3, 4. six pages) Understanding problem children

De La Salle immediately steps forward as a "psychologist" and in the same article delivers, in pre-scientific terms of course, a touching treatise on the types and treatment of "children at risk." He analyzes the etiology of the plight of poor children; he explains how parental neglect, deprived family conditions and social background account for student misbehavior. He recommends appropriate ways of dealing with various types of problem children. At this point in the exchange regarding the etiology of student misbehavior, De La Salle, the teacher of teachers, is at his peak.

School psychologists and counselors today would undoubtedly applaud De La Salle's delivery as a precursor to their undertaking. The reader with further interest in this matter should refer to Brother Othmar Wurth's in-depth study of De La Salle's analysis of troubled children in John Baptist De La Salle and Special Education, (Saint Mary's Press, 1988).

In a short peroration (Section 4) De La Salle warns the teachers against the dangers of accusations made against students, and he prescribes ways of dealing with the accusations fairly and justly. Typical lines:

"There are some children to whose conduct their parents pay very little attention – sometimes none at all."

"These faults do not come from an evil disposition of heart or mind, but from their having been left to themselves."

"... it would ordinarily be more to the purpose not to correct him, but to pretend not to notice it when he does not study or fails to do his duty."

"If they have a haughty spirit, give them some charge in the school... If they are thoughtless, show them affection... and place then between two students of sedate disposition."

"Do not require of them what is beyond their capacity... and be satisfied with the little progress that they make."

Teachers: (Articles 6 and 7. four pages) The administration of punishment

One would expect by this time that the teachers would have been won over by De La Salle to less violent means of correction. Quite the contrary! At this juncture the teachers wanted their "right" to the use of corporal punishment spelled out in detail as to when, where and how it should be administered. One might also justifiably expect by this time that De La Salle would have lost patience with the teachers. But he had not. De La Salle sympathized with their deep insecurities, and he understood how hard it is for the teachers to risk giving up "their hold over the class." So De La Salle goes along with the description of the administration of corporal punishment in school, patiently tempering and restricting the unpleasant details. Typical lines:

"When the teacher wishes to give the ferule to a pupil... he will indicate with the point of the signal the rule which the pupil has violated... The pupil will go to the teacher, make the Sign of the Cross and hold out his hand... If when the teaher wishes to make the pupil hold out his hand, he meets with resistance, he will make a sign to the pupil to go to the place where punishment (with the rod) is administered... there he will prepare himself in such a manner that he may not appear indecently."

De La Salle: (Article 8, five pages) Penance and De La Salle's recommendation

Tired but not discouraged in his efforts to "convert" his teachers from corporal punishment, De La Salle comes back to his recommended method of correction: namely, penance and its explanation which he had postponed earlier. In this last effort in Chapter 5 to get rid of corporal punishment from the schools, De La Salle attemps to convince the teachers of the preventive, corrective and exemplary advantages of using a variety of forms of penances as effective alternatives to corporal punishment. De La Salle's final recommendation to his teachers in this dramatic dialogue is the closing line:

"The most appropriate penance and the one that is of the greatest utility is to give the pupils something to learn by heart."

EDITIONS OF THE «DEVOIRS I» BY YEARS AND CITIES

Introduction

● This is not the first time that LASALLIANA dedicates one of its issues to "Duties of a Christian I" which, according to some opinions, is among the best works of St. Jonh Baptist de La Salle. (Cf. LASALLIANA: 03-A-16; 03-A-17 04-A-23; 04-A-24; 06-A-34).

● We present here all the editions which have been personally verified by the author in the following sources: the National Library of Paris, the Archives of Motherhouse of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, the Municipal Library of Avignon, the Library of the Jesuits of Chantilly, the Municipal Library of Madrid, the National Library of Brussels, the Departamental Archives of Pibrac, the Library of Lyon, Hotel de la Cloche, the Library of the Gregoriana University of Rome...

● We have also received many written communications from libraries of the Christian Brothers, and public, diocesan and seminary libraries of France which have been added to the list of editions of "Duties of a Christian I".

● I am convinced that subsequent investigations will refine some of this data and that other editions will be discovered in the future. The historian, G. Rigault considers this work of De La Salle as "the most important contribution of all Lasallian literature, a masterpiece of its kind and one of the most outstanding books of recent centuries". (G. Rigault, Histoire de l'Institut des Frères des Écoles Chrétiennes, Vol. I, p. 556).

NOTE: Recently, I consulted lists of the editions of the "Duties of a Christian I" in the Archives of the Motherhouse of the Christian Brothers and found some which are not included here because, for the time being, they need to be confirmed.

Conclusions

1. How many copies of editions and further printings of the "duties of a Christian I" would there have been?

- It is not easy to venture even a close approximation of this number. The number of copies of editions and re-printings varies in each case: the edition of 1799 (Rheims) had 12.000 copies; that of 1811 (Rouen) had 2.000; and that of 1812 (Laon) had 6.000...

- Estimating an average of 4.000 or 5.000 copies per edition-reprinting, this would amount to over a million copies which for those times is quite considerable.

2. The "Duties of a Christian I" held an important place in the Christianization of the primary schools of France. According to the former Superior General Nicet Joseph, his mother used this book as a reader while teaching school in his home village.

3. If the cities in which editions-reprintings of this book are pegged on a map of France, some interesting facts come to light.

4. Has the "Duties of a Christian I" received the consideration it should have within the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools for its content as a theological synthesis of the Founder; or from the point of view of its diffusion among the families of our students and in our classrooms; or because of its possibilities for the christianization of generations of students?

SAINT MUTIEN -MARIE (1841 - 1917) POSSESSES ALL THE GREATNESS OF THE HUMBLE

Homily for the canonization.

John Paul II

December 10th, 1989

1. "Repent, because the Kingdom of heaven is at hand!" (Mt 3:2).

During this season of Advent the Church addresses to us once again John the Baptist's invitation. She addresses it to each one of us! John, the Precursor, was alone in the desert, in austerity. He had no other task than to prepare the way of the Lord. His voice was heard, and the crowds arrived. At John's invitation they submitted to baptism, acknowledging their sins. Their path was one of conversion.

With John, this crowd is preparing the way of the Lord. In fact, the Kingdom of heaven is now at hand! John announces that "he who is to come after me is mightier than I" (cf. Mt 3:11). The last and greatest of the prophets announces the Messiah, the shoot that has blossomed from the stump of Jesse, the one whom the prophet Isaiah awaited.

2. When we listen to the prophets today, when we listen to John Baptist who leads us on the way of the Messiah, we are not only hearing the echo of an ancient message. It is the Church of Christ which in every generation, in this generation at the end of the second millennium, returns to say that the Kingdom of heaven is at hand in the Messiah foretold by the prophets.

He is coming into our midst, upon whom rested "the Spirit of the Lord, a spirit of wisdom and of understanding, a spirit of counsel and of strength, a spirit of knowledge and of fear of the Lord..." (Is 11:2).

If conversion is asked of us, it is in order to welcome him who is coming, to receive the gifts of justice and peace, to become peacemakers because, as the prophet Isaiah says, "he shall judge the poor with justice, and decide aright for the land's afflicted" (Is 11:4). To prepare for his coming, to become his disciples, it is necessary to let ourselves be transformed by his justice and guided by his wisdom. We understand that through "the spirit of wisdom and of understanding" (Is 11:2) the Messiah discovers our sin and invites us to be conformed to the law of love and truth of his Kingdom.

3. The prophet says again of the Messiah that "justice shall be the band around his waist" (Is 11:5). He will inaugurate a kingdom of peace: "Then the wolf shall be a guest of the lamb, ...the calf and the young lion shall browse together, with a little child to guide them... There shall be no harm or ruin on all my holy mountain" (Is 11:6, 9).

Is this an illusory message, since the endless conflicts in so many parts of the world seem to render it vain? It would be so if this message did not come from God, if it were not addressed to consciences, if it were not of itself a source of justice, justice according to God, God's justice! Isaiah's message, then the ardent appeal of the Precursor, and finally the coming of Jesus himself bring the fruits of peace to the hearts and actions of those who allow themselves to be converted.

John the Baptist proclaims the urgency of conversion: "Even now the axe lies at the root of the trees" (Mt 3:10). Let us heed this warning well: each person is called to produce the good fruits of justice and peace: each moment, each act, has its importance in the function of the Kingdom which is coming and whose spirit we must not contradict. Every person, no matter how modest he or she may be, is irreplaceable in the human family; the humblest act inspired by love gives glory to God.

4. Today the Church exalts a very simple religious. Throughout his life he fulfilled the Lord's will without delay. Faithful to the demands and the renunciations of his rule, St Mutien-Marie has all the greatness of the humble.

Throughout sixty years of religious life lived in obscurity, he practised the observances of the Brothers of the Christian Schools with a total generosity. For him, nothing was more important than obedience, nothing more joyous than poverty, nothing more urgent than the obligations of the common life, the acceptance of his students or whoever came to him. Faithful to the little tasks which were entrusted to him, day by day Brother Mutien gave his life to the Lord, in a self-renunciation that became natural to him. For this reason he is already an exemplary figure; he achieved holiness in routine things, in following docilely the way of the sons of St John Baptist de La Salle.

A simple teacher of music and drawing, or busy with the many services needed in a large educational institution, Brother Mutien lived constantly illumined by

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

God's presence. His sense of prayer impressed his confreres and students, to the point that they called him "the Brother who prayed always".

He is an admirable model of the "life of prayer". He spent as much time as he could in adoration and meditation before the Blessed Sacrament; he radiated with joy each day in communicating in the Body of Christ; he never began a task without invoking the Lord and venerating the Cross. At every moment, his rosary in hand, he invoked the Blessed Virgin with a total devotion as these words show us: "To arrive at an intimate union with our Lord, take the way of Mary where there is no task or shadow which could stop your progress towards Jesus" (Letter of 3 Jan. 1914).

By the intensity of his spiritual life, St Mutien-Marie "prepared the way of the Lord, making straight his path" (cf. Mt 3:3). Those who saw him at prayer were struck at finding in him "nothing but simple sincerity". In the man of God there is something like a transparence which disposes him to give authentic witness to the Lord present in him. The Word of God dwelled in him, the spirituel writers nourished him; from them he drew a wisdom which he naturally communicated. We think of the words of Isaiah which we have heard this day: "The earth shall be filled with knowledge of the Lord as water covers the sea" (Is 11:9).

5. At Malonne Saint Mutien-Marie had a hidden influence which owed everything to the living source of his piety, his prayer. The children in the catechism classes, the students who endlessly gathered around him, understood that the strengh of this man came from his intimacy with God and that his unfailing charity was more valuable than any other talent.

His message is not expressed in terms of this world's wisdom. Rather, he shows his Brothers, teachers, and students the true fruitfulness of a life that is humbly offered. He could say, like the Psalm in today's liturgy, that it is God "who shall have pity for the lowly and the poor; the lives of the poor he shall save" (Ps 71 [72]:13).

He considered himself weak and poor, and that enabled him to help whoever confided their troubles to him. After his death they spontaneously recognized him as the intercessor whom the Church now honours, a friend of God who remains a brother to men.

With the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, with his compatriots from Belgium, we are awestruck by the influence of this humble religious. Today we give thanks for the holiness of Brother Mutien-Marie. We ask him to inspire today's teachers that they will know how to accompany young people on the path of faith, to open them to the beauty of the Gospel message, to invite them to renew ceaselessly the conversion which Christ the Saviour asks for, to take an active part in the Church's life.

6. The long path of holiness which Brother Mutien travelled seems to be a faithful response to the words of St Paul which the Church has us listen to on this second Sunday of Advent: the holy books are written "for our instruction, that by endurance and by the encouragement of the scriptures we might have hope" (Rom 15-4). The holy Brother gave proof of endurance and encouragement. May he help us along this path to take our support from the power of the Word of God to face the challenges in the lives of each one of us, the challenges of each of our families or communities.

St Paul added, "May the God of endurance and encouragement grant you to think in harmony with one another, in keeping with Christ Jesus" (Rom 15:5). After the example of the holy Brother of Malonne who was entirely imbued with the spirit of Christ, we will welcome better the Saviour who is coming among us if, in unity, we receive the Word and act in communion with the same Spirit and share the same gifts. "Welcome one another, then, as Christ welcomed you, for the glory of God" (Rom 15:7). To live the season of Advent is to prepare the days when "justice will flower", the days when we shall know "profound peace" (cf. Ps 71 [72]:7), the days when "all the tribes of the earth (shall) be blessed" (ibid., 17).

7. Brothers and Sisters, the example of a saint who lived close to us can strengthen in us the courage of hope. Brother Mutien-Marie goes before us on the path of fidelity to God's invitation and of tireless service of our brothers and sisters. We ask his intercession, that we may be given in our day to make straight the way of the Lord and of man, which is the path of the Church. We invoke his intercession that we may be given the ability to produce fruits which express true conversion, to proclaim ceaselessly the Kingdom of heaven which is now at hand in him who baptizes in the Holy Spirit (cf. Mt 3:2-11).

And thus we can "with one voice glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (cf. Rom 15:6).

«THE LASALLIAN TRADITION»

Report on a symposium

In October, 1987, a symposium on "The Lasallian Tradition" was organized as part of the series of events held to honor the 125th anniversary of the founding of Saint Mary's College. Several participants requested that a follow-up symposium be organized, and it was –on Saturday, November 12, 1988. I acted as moderator for the occasion and took some notes with a view to presenting here a summary report. In this account I attempt to group together topics which were scattered throughout a discussion that lasted more than two hours among the sixty faculty, administration and staff members present.

BACKGROUND TOPICS MENTIONED

More than one speaker pointed out the need for historical background about St. John Baptist de La Salle and for some appropriate documentation for study purposes. La Salle's "Meditations" were mentioned as an example. A definition of the term, "Lasallian Tradition," was asked for, and a tentative one was forthcoming: "a set of developing educational beliefs, attitudes, and policies handed down through generations of Brothers and lay teachers from St. John Baptist de La Salle –a heritage that has always emphasized working in schools primarily for the poor, schools as communities engaged in Christian religious instruction and in the human development of students through quality education, and schools characterized by a brotherly concern for persons, for institutional stability and good order, of a non-clerical, non-elitist, and non-Jansenist kind."

In order to make this tradition the possession of all the members of the College community, readings and seminars should be organized.

On the other hand, it was asked, is not this tradition the sole proprietorship of the Brothers? Perhaps the rest of the College community can participate only in the "spirit" of La Salle, while the Brothers alone own the tradition. This distinction occasioned several comments: some speakers saying that all people of good will at the College are sharers and shapers of the tradition, that we all have access to it, that there never has been discrimination, that in Lasallian matters there should be "a level playing field" for everyone. At any rate, none of us should be ignorant of it; and maybe some lay teachers, especially those with no family obligations, can actually be devoted to it as much as the Brothers. Is it correct to say that the future of the College depends on the prime possessors of the Tradition, the Brothers, who must present the rest of us with plans?

Moreover, beyond individual commitment to the tradition, there is an institutional or corporate commitment to which we can all contribute in varying degrees. It was claimed that by a kind of osmosis we can all (students included) absorb the spirit of the institution and acquire its focus. There is no secret fraternity in this matter. In fact, it may be that we all participate to the extent that we are dedicated to the goals of the College, exhibit human decency, do our work professionally, etc. –since La Salle's life was spent in training just such teachers. We become thereby "Lasallian family members," i.e., more than "employees" of the College.

KEY TERMS DISCUSSED

One of the key words in the tradition is that of "brother." We should all be brotherly in our approach to each other and to the students. To be brothers and sisters means that coercion and competition are inappropriate at the College, and that consultations are appropriate. A family spirit was shown by the motto on La Salle's coat of arms, Indivisa Manent, keep undivided.

But, it was warned, we must beware giving to the Lasallian Tradition dimensions that are only humanistic.

Another key word is much more troublesome: "poor". Do we want an extrinsic, sociological definition of "poor," or, in some way, a more intrinsic one? From the very beginning of the "Christian Schools," their success has attracted a well-to-do clientele. The early Brothers' schools were victims of that success. But in La Salle's lifetime even the rich were not charged for classroom instruction– all the schools were maintained by outside financial support (by parishes, municipalities, patrons, etc.). Does this tradition actually go all the way back to Socrates who also refused to charge for instruction? His concern for truth, and only truth, required him not to muddy the waters of education with student fees. Or does the tradition of gratuitous instruction stem from the counter-Reformation in which the Church was anxious to save the poor as well as the rich from Protestant doctrine? If so, there is now a crisis: not only is there today no longer a counter-Reform spirit, there seems to be no desire to pursue truth in the Socratic sense. In particular, one speaker inquired, do we not today shift our instructional aims away from truth for its own sake to training-for-doing? Isn't vocational preparation the preoccupation of most colleges' curricula? Have we not lost the concern for truth (which was the claim of the catechisms which were at the heart of La Salle's schools)? If so, we may react pessimistically, or we may react by seeing in the situation a real opportunity for evangelization. It is true that La Salle had a reputation for including a lot of practical, vocational material in his schools, but for him this was a lure to bring children to the truths of the catechism. At the same time, of course, he insisted on quality training (e.g., in mastery of vernacular French) with a view to assuring a secure living for the students in society. A student participant suggested: by teaching college students to think, we may show our concern for truth itself. Such an effort may be called "pre-evangelization;" at least, that is the attitude of Brothers in missionary schools where the student population is often largely non-Christian.

VOCATION NEEDED

There was considerable discussion about terms like "vocation," "career," and "job". Vocation is etymologically a "call" and came to mean a call from God; but that language has been replaced by expressions such as "sense of identity" –meaning that God calls us to be our true selves. And, unfortunately, modern work places do not often provide careers where our true selves can be realized. Hence careers and jobs must be distinguished, regrettably, from vocations. For both lay teachers and religious teachers the notion of vocation can be a unifying idea. And in both cases, it can be subsumed under the idea of "Providence." Each of us as a unique person is a mystery; our providential vocation is a means to energize each of us but also to give us a ministry to carry our vision to the institution. "Abandonment to divine providence" was one of La Salle's teachings (characteristic of the spirituality of his day), but one which is difficult to translate into terms acceptable to modern sensibility. Perhaps we could speak of a force moving us to integrity. There remains, however, the fact that we do not live up to our ideals; reality intrudes. The resulting tension should be creative.

I KNEW

BROTHER JAIME HILARIO

I lived with him and had the privilege of seing him each day and to come to appreciate him. Therefore, I can today bear witness which may contribute both to the joy of seeing him beatified and to the simple and heroic life of virtue which he led. May he come to my assistance.

His childhood

Manuel Barbal Cosán was born in Enviny, in the region of Pallars Sobirá (Lérida) in the diocese of La Seu de Urgel on January 2, 1898. His family was profoundly rooted in the Christian tradition: grace before meals, the angelus, and rosary in the family life, helping the poor and keeping Sunday as the Lord's day.

"My father is a good Christian with a gift for going out to people and he has a lot of common sense. He is an optimist with a wonderfully positive outlook filled with hope." "My mother is a saint. She belives that love must be everywhere. There are some people whom God places as trailmarkers to show us the way to heaven. She was one of these." Manuel passed his childhood amidst the hardships and joys of a mountain village. Work in the fields, the grand scenery of the Pyrenees and the rugged mountains, all became a part of his hard-working, serious, sincere and poetic personality.

Desire for the priesthood

In January of 1908, he went to the boarding school of the Vincentian Fathers in Rialb. He made his First Holy Communion in May of 1909. Soon he felt the stirrings of God's call to the consecrated life, initially to the priesthood. The family was overjoyed. A religious vocation is a blessing from God.

October, 1910 saw Manuel in the seminary of La Seu where he received excellent commendations. However, a progressive deafness became an obstacle to an ecclesiastical vocation. He went back home but the hidden stirrings of God's call did not diminish. He met a Brother of the Christian Schools who spoke to him about his institute. "I like that" he exclaimed. From that moment he sought for a way to follow a Lasallian vocation.

The novitiate in Irun

Before entering the novitiate where only French was spoken, he went to Mollerusa for three months to begin to learn that language. "The Brothers have a gift for KINDNESS", he wrote. The Director of Novices in Irun was Brother Junien Victor, the future Superior General and an eminent formator. A month after his arrival he received the holy habit and with it the name Brother Jaime Hilario.

A thumbnail sketch of this novice would say: young, tall, rather thin, brownish hair; quiet of maner, bright, courteous, simple and direct, unassuming, very tenacious both in work and study and always in good humor. He was uncommonly mature for his 19 years. He lets us into his interior life by writing: "Little by little God is becoming everything for me: father, guide, support, light, strength and joy". Socially, his zeal become very concrete: "The greatest work of mercy in a community is to encourage, create enthusiasm and to spread joy".

Successive assignments

Between 1918 and 1926 he served in several places. First, there were five years in Mollerusa. At the end of his first year, both Brothers and students agreed that: "Brother Jaime is a great teacher and a holy man". Quite a compliment for a beginner. In 1923 we find him teaching latin in Manresa..., unfortunately, his hearing deteriorated drastically and he had to give up the classroom for the garden and the orchard. The following year he returned to Mollerusa. Oliana became his new community the nest year, following which he went to the boarding school of Ste. Germaine de Pibrac, Haute Garonne, France. He remained here for quite some time.

Final vows: August of 1927

Among his personal notes, we find this statement which we think is very significant: "If God had revealed to me the difficulties I would have to face as a Brother, I would have been afraid and I would never have entered... But now I would not give up the robe for all the gold in the world, nor my way of life for all the land in Enviny". Even the Founder at the end of his life said something similar. Pibrac would be his home for 8 years, on the "staff of the Novitiate". He was well prepared culturally and spiritually and with his firm convictions and determination, he was a role-model and an encouragement to the young men in formation. In 1932, it was suggested that he try his hand as a recruiter in vocational work. He started by sending pamphlets and other information on the religious life to the neighboring towns with fair results... However, his deafness became more pronounced until finally he had to return to work in the garden as he had done as a boy in the fields of Enviny... In the silence of his labors be found the opportunity to speak with God and to accept the action of Grace which was steadily preparing him for his ultimate testimony.

I knew brother Jaime Hilario when I was an aspirant in Cambrils (Tarragona) in 1934.

At about this time, both the Spanish Brothers and the schools which belonged to the French Districts of Beziers and Toulouse had in Catalonia were transferred to the District of Barcelona. The aspirants from Pibrac came to join us. One day Brother Jaime Hilario came to visit his former students... This gave me my first flash of insight.

I was on my way out to mid-morning recreation when I noticed this little group from Pibrac surrounding a Brother. They were tightly pressed around him and hanging from his every word. Brother was listening them with total concentration (only later did find out he was almost deaf) to their questions and comments. His answere were accompanied with a smile. As a detached observer, I found this charming. Meanwhile, Brother Leoncio, another man of great faith and subsequently a martyr also, came into the courtyard and when he realized who was the center of interest of the small group, threw up his hands (I can still see him) as he passed by and exclaimed: "Dominus (sic) non sum dignus". I was impressed.

Another incident. When I was already a novice in San José of Cambrils, I found Brother Jaime Hilario working in the orchard. As usual, the novices were rapt in observing and cataloging. We all admired his recollection and sense of the presence of God as he expertly went about his work... We also saw him alone before the Blessed Sacrament, deep in adoration... We likewise knew that he was contributing to the publications of the diocese of La Seu... We never spoke to him (in those days we were not supposed to communicate even between communities existing within the same house) but we novices had decided that "he is a saint".

The revolution of 1936 took Brother Jaime Hilario by surprise in Mollerusa while he was on the way to Enviny.

He was detained and placed under house arrest with a family of friends (the Badia family) who tell of the way they were edified by his total abandonment to the will of God, his intense prayers, his charism as a catechist for the children of the house. Transported to the prison at Lérida, he was placed in cell 31. Since he was a native of Cambrils, he was taken to the Commissariate of Tarragona and interned in the prison-ship "Mahón". This was in December of 1936. His trial was fixed for January, 1937. A friendly lawyer, Mr. Montañés suggested: "Just declare that you work in the gardens of the community... that you are not a Religious... and you will be free to go. Later, Brother Jaime said to Brother Eusebio: "We are not going to get along with this lawyer... I cannot pretend that I am not a Religious..." This amounted to signing his own sentence. That much was very clear.

The trial in Tarragona before the people's court

To help Brother Jaime, Brother Sorribas sat next to him so that he could repeat the questions of the Court for him. The opening statement of the defense attorney was a classic in logic and profundity: "This monk has studied latin (sic) and poisoned the minds of children. If we do not kill him, he will kill all of us..." Then he tried to present him as a poor man, a stranger to politics, a laborer in the monastery. He then asked Brother Jaime to corroborate his statements. "No," said Brother Jaime, "I am a religious, a Brother of the Christian Schools". The presiding officer interposed: "Let the accused explain the difference between a gardener and a monk." "No, there is no contradiction. My deafness prevents me from being an educator". That was all. After a semblance of discussion, the Judge condemned him to death. Once they were alone, Brother Jaime asked what was decided. Brother Sorribas rubbed the back of his neck and asked, "When?" He had not been told. Bro. Jaime asked for paper and wrote in pencil to his sister and his nephews: "I have just been condemned to death by the Tribunal. Do not be ashamed of me and do not weep for me. I have done nothing wrong. Pray for me as I do for you. Good-bye until we meet in heaven..." Perfect spelling, no sign of nervousness.

The martyrdom of Brother Jaime Hilario

Two days later (it was decided to act quickly to prevent a possible indult of pardon, which in fact arrived on January 18th, effective immediately) at three-thirty in the afternoon, Brother Jaime was taken into the woods on a small hill "la Oliva" near the cemetery. While they were waiting for the arrival of the official, some members of the platoon asked him: "Don't you realize we are going to kill you?" The reaction was typical of the testimony of every martyr in this situation: "To die for Christ is to reign!" They placed him near a dry waterfall and the platoon took its place about 10 feet away. Brother Jaime, facing the soldiers had his arms folded and his pale face raised toward heaven... "Fire!" Brother Jaime remained standing. Not one bullet had hit him. Furious, the captain repeated the order: "Fire!" Brother is still standing. Frightened, the platoon dropped its guns and fled while the cursing captain fired his pistol into the temple of the victim who thus entered the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus.

"I would not give up my Brother's garb for all the gold in the world!" This is not just melodramatic literature. He confessed Christ when his life was at stake; but "he who loses his life for My sake, keeps it unto everlasting life". Brother Jaime Hilario was already there... Together with his Brothers of Turon who, like him, had given their youthful lives for the same crime of "having poisoned the minds of youth".

"We follow the footsteps of saints" and "uncommon holiness" are Lasallian principles. May they also be ours.

THE BROTHERS AND NATURAL SCIENCES IN QUEBEC

For a long time now, the Institute has had in its ranks Brothers who have specialised in natural sciences. Some of them even have become famous like Brother Sennen in Spain, Heribaud Joseph in France, Leon in Cuba and Marie Victorin in Canada, to mention but a few. In general, the Brothers's first concern was their work in school. In France they published a whole series of textbooks on zoology, botany and minerology, especially at the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th. The influence of the French Brothers who arrived in Canada from 1904 onwards, and who were often highly competent in zoology, doubtlessly contributed to the expansion of this subject which took place at that time in Canada. In Quebec, interest in natural sciences was due initially to the boost given it by Brother Marie Victorin (1917), and to the expansion of a movement promoting science among young people. Nowadays, ecology has become a topical subject. There are only a few Brothers working in this area.

1. The predominant influence of Brother Marie Victorin (1885-1944).

In Quebec, Brother Marie Victorin was without fear of contradiction the outstanding figure in the field of natural sciences. What made him famous in particular was his "La Flore laurentienne" published in 1935, and the creation of the Montreal botanical garden. For several years now, a very highly coveted scientific prize has been named after him, and is presented every year by the Quebec government.

But Marie Victorin was more than a famous scientist or an efficient administrator. His genius was to have been able to gather around himself others who would spread and continue his work. Brother Rolland Germain (French by birth, 1881-1972) was a very close collaborator, and Brother Alexandre Blouin (1892-1987) illustrated his books. Numerous other scientist were influenced by his example and pursued their work in a variety of areas of natural sciences: the exploration of the Great North, ethno-botany, producing popular scientific material for newspapers and radio, phytogeography, ecology, algology, teaching science to very young children, etc. Marie Victorin exerted his influence on adults by his university teaching, his writings and his personal contacts.

His influence extended also to thousands of young people through Young Naturalist Clubs (CJN) which came into existence in the 1930's. A number of Brothers have been involved in the running of these clubs in schools, juniorates and scholasticates. The Clubs were run according to well-defined lines and were affiliated to the Canadian Natural History Society. In the daily newspaper "Le Devoir de Montreal" there appeared a weekly article; regular leaflets on botany, zoology and minerology were distributed to members; exhibitions were organised to encourage competition between different Clubs. The Natural Sciences Exhibition held in Mont Saint Louis (Montreal) in 1933 was spectacular: in the space of two weeks it was visited by 100,000 people. In addition to the activities of these Clubs, there was also in the 1940's a series of broadcasts on Radio Canada intended as an introduction to botany (1941-1946). To stimulate the interest of listeners, competitions were organised for different age-groups, and free educational pamphlets were distributed to those who were interested.

This powerful movement which sought to popularise science and which was characteristic of Quebec at that time (1930-1950) was a stimulating influence on many Brothers. Several formed collections of various sorts, set up biology laboratories, gave or followed courses in natural history, explored remote regions and in particular, the Mingan Archipelago (Gulf of St. Lawrence), prepared teaching materials like illustrated manuals to help with identification of plants, etc. Museums and herbariums still have precious specimens valuable for research purposes.

2. Exceptional contribution of Brother Firmin Laliberte (1905-1988) to entomology.

The work of the agronomist, Brother Firmin Laliberte is in the same tradition as that of Brother Marie Victorin. Recently, Brother Firmin bequeathed, with the permission of the Quebec District Council, his collection of 100,000 insects to the new insectarium of Montreal. It will be located in the Montreal Botanical Garden, founded by Brother Marie Victorin. The collection will be exhibited in a hall which will carry the name of Brother Firmin Laliberte.

All the while he was involved in farming in our agricultural establishments, Brother Firmin became increasingly interested in the world of insects. Under the influence of Jean Henri Fabre, a French entomologist (1823-1915) whose works he had read several times, he built up his impressive collection over a period of 60 years, devoting most of his free time to this fascinating work.

Many young scientists kept in contact with Brother Firmin, seeking the master's valuable advice. He developped their curiosity and the ability to observe closely. He spent his summers in holiday camps, running entomology classes, either at the Le Saisonnier de Lac Beauport camp, near Quebec, or especially at the Rolland Germain camp in Frelighsburg (Quebec) near the frontier with the USA.

Brother Firmin took an active part in the foundation of the Association of Amateur Entomologists of Quebec in 1973, and he was its president for the first five years. He contributed learned articles to the review "Fabreries" which he ran from 1975 to 1984. In 1982 he published his "Glossaire entomologique".

Almost to the end of his life, Brother Firmin was a powerful figure in the world of science teaching to young people, and in learned societies. From many of them he received marks of esteem and awards, in particular from the following: the Societe linneenne of Quebec, the Canadian Entomological Society, the Quebec Entomological Society, and the Association of Amateur Entomologists of Quebec.

3. Adaptation by the Brothers to the needs of today.

Following the example of Brother Firmin Laliberte, many Brothers have had to adapt their working methods to fit in with the evolution that has taken place in Quebec society in the last few years. The setting-up of the Marie Victorin Centre is the result of this process of adaptation. The Centre has been set-up in the basement of one of our communities in the suburbs of Quebec. It was organised by a number of Brothers for the use of young scientists. In this centre there have been brought together specialised works (books, magazines) scientific instruments, collections of all kinds: birds, insects, plants, shells, etc. The Centre is near a school which runs courses in natural science technology, and students following these courses are able to complete their scientific training at the Centre. Other study groups have been set up to satisfy the needs and interests of outings and visits to ecological centres open to the public. Visits to centres such as this inspired Brothers to find a new way to stimulate scientific interest.

Brother Claude Cote who had created a botanical Garden and a mini-zoo in the scholasticate in 1956, already had a great deal of experience in teaching science to young Brothers. He took his inspiration from the new technology in use in State education (centre for interpretation of nature), and set up an ecological centre at the La Saisonnier de Lac Beauport holiday camp. He prepared rooms for visiting groups and laid out an ecological path in the neighbouring forest. During the summer, young people attending the camp followed courses in science. During the rest of the year, the centre served as a place where courses in ecology where given to various groups. Visitors found displays on various subjects very interesting: subjects included astronomy, mycology, ornithology, minerology, zoology, entomology, botany, etc. There was also an aviary with live birds in it for visitors to see. Little by little, people have been made more aware of the quality of life in the environment, and of the need to protect our ecological heritage by means of collective action. The first stage in this process is to make people aware of their responsibility as individuals.

This short article cannot hope to describe everything that the Brothers of Quebec have done in the field of natural sciences. Many have put in a lot of time in open air centres, and some still do. Certain things have been done which are not strictly speaking part of the Brothers' work: Brother Benoit Laganiere, a biologist, takes groups round the Quebec Aquarium; Brother Marcel Blondeau has been spending summer for the last few years in the Quebec Great North collecting plants for Laval University. He has written already several short studies of the flora of the Quebec Eskimo villages.

DISCIPLESHIP
A CALL TO FOLLOW CHRIST THROUGH IDENTIFICATION WITH THE POOR (1/2)

Introduction

The scope of this short essay is to look into some forgotten aspects of discipleship, to read through St. John Baptist de La Salle (hereafter DLS)'s writings and experience in order to see how these aspects intersect with them. We have selected four which have a real interest for us: 1– discipleship as a personal encounter after a call; 2– discipleship for the sake of the Cross; 3– discipleship as victory over fears, and 4– discipleship as sharing the mysteries of Christ.

These four aspects turn around the axis of the service to the poor because 1– our call to discipleship is a call to encounter them and to love them; 2– we follow Christ for the sake of his Cross which shares and redeems the cross of the poor; 3– through true discipleship we learn to overcome our fears and give them hope, and 4– through discipleship we share with them the mysteries of Christ, in a continuous and joyful identification with them.

Needless to say that it is all implied in the Lasallian spiritual writings where DLS moves freely from the Brothers' experience to his grasp of ecclesiology. It is through his writings and experience that we will try to see these four aspects of discipleship.

1. DISCIPLESHIP. CALL AND ENCOUNTER WITH GOD FOR AN IRREVOCABLE CONVERSION TO THE POOR

It was only after many years that DLS discovered what type of call he was following. "If I had even thought that the care, motivated by pure charity, which I gave to the schoolteachers would ever impose on me the duty of residing with them, I would have stopped it. For, since quite naturally I consider lower than my valet the men I was obliged to employ in the schools, especially at the beginning, the very thought of having to live with them would have been intolerable to me. And as a matter of fact I felt great distress in the early period when I had them come and live in my house, a period that lasted two years." (1)

God's action in DLS' life is summarized in the unobtrusive call of God and his gradual conversion to the poor "God guides everything wisely and gently and does not usually do violence to the inclinations of men. Therefore, when he determined to urge me into devoting myself completely into the care of the schools, He did so in a manner that escaped my knowledge over a long period of time, with the result that one commitment led to another that I had not forseen at the beginning". (2)

After nights of prayer and a continuous presence to God DLS was able to discover –almost in a slow conscious way– Christ in the person of the dispossessed children of Rheims. DLS saw a kind of "natural" identification between these poor children and Jesus Christ and does not hesitate to ask the Brothers: "Do you honor Jesus Christ in their person"? (M 133, 3) (3)

The holy founder calls the Brothers to look upon these children with real "tenderness" – "For these children, he says, are often like orphans... as far as the salvation of their souls is concerned. It is for this reason that God has appointed you their guardian" (M 37, 3).

In his deliberate choice for the poor, in becoming man, God chose poverty. Through his "kenosis" or voluntary self-denial of his divinity, he lived as a poor man from cradle to the cross proclaiming the beatitude of poverty. DLS passes from the gravity of this mystery to a personal application: "Our Lord was born poor and loved the poor: he was glad to be with them and even said that the poor are blessed because the Kingdom of God belonged to them" MTR (10th or 202, 2). "The poorer we are the more fully we shall possess the spirit of Jesus Christ who glorified in living a life of poverty" M 179, 1.

The spirit of Jesus in us means discipleship open to the poor. "Look upon them as the image of Jesus Christ, and as the best way to be disposed to receive his spirit abundantly. In this way the more you cherish them, the more you will be united to Jesus Christ." M 173.1.

In this Meditation for the feast of St. Francis of Assisi we see in a few lines how the classical call to encounter God through discipleship ends up with the encounter with the poor. In a shorter way DLS says: "When we have voluntarily embraced poverty to imitate Jesus Christ, we love as he did those whom God has allowed to be poor." M 166.2. For the Brother, the poor may be considered as "sacraments" of God. Obviously, to say that the poor are "sacraments" or "sacramentals" of God does not mean that there is an ontological identification between them and Jesus but, they are so close to him that we cannot miss them when we follow him. "You should recognize Jesus beneath the rags of the poor children whom you have to teach. Adore him in their person." M 96.3.

The personal call to discipleship is thus far from being a call to a bi-lateral dialogue with God. There is a kind of trinitarian movement which true discipleship creates intensely between the Brother, Jesus and the poor children. "The love of the Brother for his pupils is for them sacrament of God's love. But it is also a sacrament for the Brother himself. His educational relationship to his pupils educates him to love God more fully... They evangelize him." (4)

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

In such movement DLS invites the Brother to become more transparent: "Jesus Christ wants that your pupils consider you as they would consider Him and receive your instructions as if it were from Him... Your pupils are the letter which he has dictated to you and which you are writing daily in their hearts." MTR (3rd or 195.2).

This is the first aspect that we wanted emphasize: discipleship starts with a call to meet God but it materializes by preferring, honoring and loving the poor because they are the image of Jesus Christ. It is only thus that we succeed in making them into disciples too, able to meet God.

2. DISCIPLESHIP: FOR THE CROSS OF JESUS FOR THE CROSS OF THE POOR

Ernest Best brings out the idea that "there are three commands in discipleship: come, deny, take up, followed by a present continuous mode "follow me". The call is not one to accept a certain system of teaching, live by it, continue faithfully to interpret it and pass it on –which was in essence the call of a rabbi to his disciples; nor is it a call to accept a philosophical position which will express itself in a certain type of behavior– as in Stoicism; nor is it a call to pass through certain rites –as in the Mysteries, so as to become an initiated of God, his companion. The carrying of the cross is no rite! It is a call to fall in behind Jesus and go with him." (5)

There is an upheaval in Jesus relationship to the notion of "family" in Matthew 10.36. In these texts the family relationship represents for the disciple a real cross, difficult to bear till Jesus becomes the real family to him. The choice is between the disciple's vision of the family and Jesus' radical new stance: Jesus is the family in which he wants his disciple to include all the poor of the earth.

To stand by the poor as Jesus stood by them till the cross is to share their plight and suffering. After Jesus, all the oppressed of the earth are invited to project one day their own frustration and helplessness on his cross. While matching their cross to his they are also called to see in it not a minus sign "–" but a positive sign "+" of resurrection. Through living discipleship the Brother tries to replace the cross of the poor by that of Jesus Christ with all its power of redemption.

This is the second aspect that we wanted to emphasize. Discipleship is not a private affair between the faithful and God, far from it. It is sharing the cross with Christ and the poor. The faith in his resurrection encourages the Brother to carry on without tiredness and fear.

DISCIPLESHIP: A CALL TO FOLLOW CHRIST THROUGH IDENTIFICATION WITH THE POOR (2/2)

3. DISCIPLESHIP: A VICTORY OVER ALL FEARS

It is interesting to note the context surrounding the fears of the first disciples in the gospel. If we take the context of the storm in Mt. 8.23 and following verses we see that they are afraid of 1 – the mission, (as in Mt 10.26 and Lk 12.4); 2 – they are afraid of the appearance in the lake (as in Mt 14.26 and Mk 6.50); 3 – they are afraid of the ascent to Jerusalem (as in Mk 9.32 and Lk 9.45) and 4 – they are afraid of Jesus during the appearances after the resurrection (as in Lk 24.37 and Jn 20.19). (6)

Fear of the mission:
DLS knew quite well that to become a Brother of the Christian Schools was not an easy commissioning. In his beautiful meditation for the feast of the Nativity he stresses the idea that this vocation gives no room for misunderstanding or wrong interpretations. He knew quite well that a wrong appraisal of a chosen state of life makes it unbearable. In other words, once we know our real commissioning there is nothing to fear.

"In choosing our present state we should have prepared ourselves for abasement, like the Son of God when he became man, for lowliness is the characteristic of our profession and our employment. We are poor Brothers, forgotten by the world and esteemed of no consequence. Only the poor come to us, and they have nothing to offer but their hearts prepared to receive our instructions." M 86.2.

On the other hand, how can we be afraid of our mission when it is characterized with glamorous titles by the holy founder all drawn from the Pauline vision of discipleship. "Ministers of God," "ministers of Jesus Christ", "ambassadors of Jesus Christ", we have nothing to fear because "the strength of Jesus Christ helps you to overcome all the obstacles opposed to the salvation of the children." MTR (3rd or 195.2).

Fear of the appearance in the lake:
When Jesus walked on the water the disciples mistook him for a phantom. "It is a ghost, they said, and in their fear they began to cry out." Mt 14.26. To walk on the water is an attribute reserved to God in the Bible (c.f. Job 9.8). Nevertheless, the apostles failed to recognize him.

Fear to go up to Jerusalem:
On his way to Jerusalem with his disciples Jesus sets out to announce his Passion. At least three times in Mark's gospel. There was an atmosphere of fear among them: "Though they failed to understand his words, they were afraid to question him." (Mk 9.31) and "at these words they were overwhelmed with grief." Mt. 18.23.

Fear of the appearances after the resurrection:
First of all there is a fear to get out and proclaim the resurrection. The doors were tightly closed because they were afraid of the authorities. Here they are "clandestine disciples" like Joseph of Arimathea... As in the appearance on the lake they fail to recognize Jesus the Resurrected (c.f. Lk. 24.37).

The real fear the disciples should have is the fear of being tempted by false messianic power (cf. Jn. 6.14) and the eagerness to take the first places above all (cf. Mk. 9.33).

In this context we hear from Jesus: "Where is your courage, how little faith you have" Mt 8.26 and "Do not be afraid." The key teaching about the storm is that those who have embarked themselves on the journey to discipleship have no right whatsoever to be afraid, in spite of the irrationality of the surrounding events. What is at stake is the unconditional fidelity of God. As well as discipleship is the unconditional commitment of the disciple so is the commitment of Jesus towards the believer.

Fear is incompatible with discipleship because it is a lack of faith. We will never attempt our "exodus" or our "ascent" to Jerusalem if we doubt of the recognition of his resurrection. Any fear would jeopardize these elements altogether.

Nevertheless, the Brother cannot conceive discipleship without hardships which threaten his faith in his mission. DLS tries in several meditations to convince him to be like "the grain of wheat which dies and produces much fruit" Jn 12.24. "Do not be surprised, he says, if you meet with trials and opposition in the exercice of your ministry. The more you suffer the more resolute you should be to acquit yourself conscientiously of your work. Rest assured that God will then shower his blessings upon you in abundance." M 136.3.

Through his meditations on the apostles and evangelists DLS follows the same pattern: he explains to the Brothers what is persecution for the sake of the Kingdom and how to overcome its fears. "Have you as much love of suffering as St. Andrew had for the cross on which he died? Do trials, afflictions and persecutions which you have to sustain in the exercise of your ministry augment your zeal and, far from discouraging you, lead you to endeavour even more ardently to make Jesus Christ known and loved? M 78.3.

The third aspect that we wanted to emphasize was true discipleship as a victory over all the disguises of fear. Fear to react against the status quo which crushes the poor daily, fear to be tagged as reactionary, communist or marginalized religious, fear of leaving Jesus the Messiah for false prophets and philosophies of redemption of the poor... No wonder if discipleship requires thus a patient and constanty discernment.

4. DISCIPLESHIP: SHARING THE MYSTERIES OF CHRIST WITH THE POOR AND IDENTIFYING WITH THEM

The first fact that seems clear to DLS when he speaks to the Brothers is that these men are gathered around him for a specific service. He recalls to them how the gracious gift which is transforming their lives is not for themselves. "Beseech this Divine Spirit to make known to you the gifts with which God has favoured you, so that you can communicate them" M 189.1.

It is thus clear that discernment is not enough. Interiorisation of the mysteries of Jesus is the first step before sharing them with others: "Let it be clear to you that in order to be filled with God as much as your state requires it from you, you are obliged to speak very often with God." M 80.2. It is only after such a deep and faithful dialogue that the Brother will grasp his call to discipleship as a call "to engender children in Christ and also to make Jesus live anew in their hearts." M 157.1.

It is interesting to note with Bro. Miguel Campos, that "the Meditations for the Time of Retreat start with the recall of the creative action of God and end up with the Heavenly Jerusalem. The Brother's daily work takes thus its full dynamic and historical meaning within the plan of salvation and the sharing of the mysteries of Christ. (7)

The plan of salvation and the sharing of his mysteries take place in the Church which is built by the Brothers' discipleship. The Brothers do the utmost to sanctify it, to purify it with the word of life, so that she may appear before him full of glory without stain or wrinkle. They make present the mystery of Christ in its growing in the Church, through the instruction of the children. (cf. MTR 9th or 201.2). For DLS there is a clear and simple convergence between his spirituality and his ecclesiology: it is true discipleship which daily builds the Church in the Brothers' hearts and in the hearts of the poor entrusted to them.

"You are laying the foundations of the building of the Church when you teach the children the mystery of the Holy Trinity and the mysteries of Christ on earth... Happy are you to be honoured by the Church which singles you out for such a holy and high task." MTR (7th or 199.1).

For the Brother-disciple there is no sharing without identification. Through hours of loving contemplation he realizes that his call is not to live for the poor, nor to live with the poor but to live like a poor person with the poor for the sake of the Kingdom he is suppose to build.

Building the Kingdom the Brother renews and synthetizes the relationship of sonship between God and the people, the relationship of brotherhood between people and people and the relationship between people, nature and history. This building gives the Brother a wider sense to his discipleship. It is not just social work for the benefit of a neighborhood. There is a redeptive-cosmic dimension to discipleship when it comes to share all the mysteries of Christ with the poor.

To make this sharing successful it needs a complete identification with the poor which goes beyond the consecration and exclusive attachment to God. God does not need human beings for himself. That would be a pagan conception of consecration; he needs, in fact, instruments to make the promises of the Kingdom visible among human beings. Hence "consecration" means basically "mission". As religious we are "reserved" for the poor, consecrated to them and identified with them through Jesus. (8)

Who are these poor we are identified with? The "Declaration of the Brother in the World today" has an enlightening position which avoids two extremes. First, the rigid interpretation of a poverty based solely on pure economic grounds and, second, a loose interpretation which defines the poor so broadly that we are encouraged to do nothing except to maintain the status quo with an easy conscience.

There is a poverty of frustration, product of injustices, physical and social handicaps, personal insufficiencies or failures. "The Brother is also called to wage war against the poverty of frustration." (9)

DLS charism and concern for the poor are not different from the concern of the Church expressed at Medellin and Puebla. Obviously, the situations encountered by DLS are not those of Latin America but the patterns taken by poverty are almost the same regardless of time and political regimes. It is only the formulation of the problem and the wording of its theological appraisal that have changed. Some refuse to call it "theology" and prefer instead the term "politics".

DLS did not enter in such niceties. He lived the concerns of the Church through persecutions and abuses. His identification with the under-dogs of his time disturbed l'ordre etabli. It was "politics" too when his religious enterprise chalanged the official schoolmasters and the archbishops.

Acting as DLS the Brother will be able to bring in the Kingdom, to live the eschatological dimension of his vocation and, for those confided to him, he will be the simplest and the best "exegesis" of God's word.

The gospel completely oriented to the poor starting from the Beatitudes and ending with the last judgement lesson in Matthew 25, the charism of the founder living with the Brothers for the last three hundred years and the signs of the time, all these three elements advocated that we speak today about discipleship as "option for the poor".

The word "option" has a very interesting military connotation. Its meaning in this context points out to a high degree of urgency, calculated strategy and forcible results... The crucial impact of the "option" for the poor on the future of the Church highlighting this urgency is the basis of this essay. It calls the Brother to true discipleship oriented to the poor because, paradoxically enough, the option for the poor is not optional. It does not depend on personal inclination, good will, a personal charism or socially concerned people only... (10)

The reality of Christ, the Poor person par excellence, is unique and means an essential element of our faith. It is in his solidarity for the poor that we realize our encounter with him. (11) It is through his solidarity that our discipleship overcomes all fears and is able to share his Cross and his mysteries with them.

PERSPECTIVE OF A RELIGIOUS EDUCATOR IN A SCIENCE CLASSROOM

As Christians we are committed to living and spreading the Good News. This is possible in all areas of academic study and very much so in the area of science. Teaching in a Lasallian school enables us to carry out our mission of teaching science and teaching Jesus.

The science curriculum does not cover religion content as such, but as we give students the content of science we must, at the same time, work to instill in them Christian principles and values. We must be committed to the spreading of Jesus' Gospel message of love, peace, justice, and forgiveness.

It is from our personal relationship with Jesus that our own value system develops. What and who we are as people is what and who we are as educators. If we are committed to the Jesus message what the students will see in each of us is the reflection of Jesus.

As religious educator we must pass on a value system, a science content, as well as teaching them how to learn. Our value system is derived from the Good News, but our technological information must be up-to-date so that we can help students of science and techonolgy to interpret the Good News.

In order to pass on a Christ-centered value system, we must be motivated by a spirit of Faith, and therefore, the Lasallian educator is necessarily a religious person. It is absolutely essential that we stay in touch with God, that we pray and meditate.

As members of a Lasallian community/school, we are called to be ministers of Jesus Christ and of the Church. Since Vatican II there have been many changes in the Church. One reason for the changes is telecommunication, science, and modern techonolgy. However, the Church changes slowly, especially in response to scientific advances. It is difficult but necessary for us to be understanding and patient with the Church. This does not mean that our knowledge and understanding of the latest advances in science should stay behind. We have a responsibility to the students and to the Church to move ahead.

The manner in which we present scientific issues and the same time the Church's present position on issues is what is important. In fact, the manner in which we teach any subject area is the first evidence to our students of what our value system is – how we treat each individual with respect and dignity; being prepared; being just in disciplinary matters and in grading; establishing an environment where students can learn, where they can have respect for themselves because someone believes in them, where they can respect others and not fall to peer pressure, where each can develop habits of study and do honest work, where they can grow spiritually, emotionally, as well as academically. These are values that they will carry with them for life.

The issues where religious and moral values must be taught in conjunction with content seem to fall into three categories: those that deal with the individual, those more social/global in nature, and those that relate only to the sciences – the interdisciplinary areas that must be of concern to science teachers.

The real issue in the first category is teaching a respect for life, for the importance of the individual. In life science and in other science courses, the topics that may come up are: abortion, birth control, artificial insemination, invitro fertilization, AIDS, euthanasia, biogenetics.

It is clear what our position should be if we are in tune with the Church's teaching about abortion. And in this case, the Church is absolutely right. There is no logical reason to present an opposing view. Abortion is wrong – it is taking a life. The latest case of the comatose pregnant mother that was in an accident that has been in the news lately, does not make it easy for us. However, it is important to be straight forward with the students and that is why our value system must be founded on the teachings of Jesus.

There is great difficulty regarding the issue of birth control. The Church says that rhythm is the only acceptable form of birth control. As science teachers, it is necessary to inform the students of all types of birth control even though we are on touchy ground here. They must make their own decision as to which method they will use. We must rely on the religion curriculum and the religion teachers to give the students the process of making moral and ethical decisions. There is need for communication among religion and science teachers so that the religion teachers know when such topics will be covered.

This brings us to artificial insemination and invitro fertilization. The Church is opposed to test tube babies as she considers this not normal. As in the issue of birth control, students must be aware of advances being made in this area and then must make their own decisions.

We must teach students to have compassion for those who have contracted AIDS, but must do so in a manner that does not promote overt sex acts or drug usage. It is essential that every school develop and implement an AIDS curriculum. Knowing the scientific facts will help us directly and in our caring for others. It will also help our students to deal with AIDS.

Euthanasia is often a topic of discussion. A person may not be killed but one does have the right to die with dignity and this must be the message we impart to students.

As for biogenetics and all scientific research, it is essential that we are first knowledgeable ourselves and present, according to the level and the course that we are teaching, the advances that are being made, the research that is being done, and the importance of these studies. The use of animals in research is often questioned. Undue torture of animals should never take place. Christian ethics in research must be encouraged.

As a religious educator, we must teach a sense of responsibility to pass on to the next generation the planet earth better than it is at the moment. Science topics that naturally fall into this category are nuclear power, nuclear armament, nuclear energy, nuclear medicine, nuclear waste, other toxic waste, pesticides, acid rain, and air pollution.

The topic of nuclear power provides opportunities to discuss student fears of nuclear bombs and nuclear armament. It seems to me that when teaching about the structure of the atom and nuclear energy our social responsibility for a better world must be established. We must include, and not leave to chance, Jesus' message of peace and love. The students must be made aware of the negative effects of nuclear war. There are positive contributions of nuclear power and these, too, should be explored with the students. Yet the question of nuclear waste and what to do with it is a problem.

The whole area of toxic waste, pesticides, acid rain, air pollution, and the diminishing ozone layer are critical concerns of the science educator, especially the Lasallian educator. We must instill in the students a drive to help solve these problems. For example, in the small area of aluminum cans and newspapers – are we teaching the right value system when they see us throw the can away or never mention it in a class setting? Isn't recycling a practical lesson to teach students so that we might preserve the beauty of Mother Earth?

There are opportunities to teach ethics in medicine when we deal with nuclear medicine. Although this advance in science has resulted in the enhancement of life, a major drawback is the disposal of nuclear waste. In fact, disposal of many things connected with a hospital or with medical care needs a lot of updating.

All of our students must be taught that each has a responsibility to mankind with regard to science and/or science information. Lawyers, politicians, those in communication, business people all need to be aware of their responsibility to the next generation in passing on the planet earth. Everyone must respect life. Everyone has the power to preserve, practise, and help others to live in a peaceful and safe environment.

Why are pesticides being used so extensively? What about the food that is covered with pesticides or the ground water into which the pesticides are seeping? The sewage systems of our cities and towns do not take care of the human pollution and waste and hence our rivers, lakes, and oceans are really a mess. We are religious educators when we communicate to the students our/their responsibility to respect all life and to help provide a world environment that will serve each to reach his/her full potential – his/her oneness with his/her fellow human beings – his/her oneness with God.

I would like to end my perspective by addressing an area that falls into both respect for life and for passing on a better planet earth. It is the lab environment in which we teach. In the 30 years that I have been teaching science I have not been in even one properly ventilated lab until this year. It was not until I developed severe toxic poisoning did I realize the full danger in which I have been working. With the toxic waste sweep made throughout Southern California, especially in the Los Angeles area, I became very much aware of the vast problem in our labs. We owe it to ourselves, our families and the students we teach to make sure that all labs are properly ventilated – up to good health/safety standards – and that the toxic waste dump sites in our areas are properly used and/or cleaned up.

I realize there are many other areas of science that we teach that lend themselves to religious input – lasers, communication satellites, Star Wars, etc. It is important to reiterate that being a religious educator demands that we pass on the message of Jesus in a manner that exemplifies Jesus, giving the students all the knowledge which they need to make Christian moral and ethical decisions about their lives, their future and the future of Mother Earth.

«HIGHER EXPECTATIONS» IN THE CATHOLIC INNER CITY HIGH SCHOOL

Christian hope – shaped by teachers, school climate and curriculum design– thwarts the realities of early death and poverty.

Antoine's mother thanked the young men and women who had organized everything, who had spoken, who had led the prayers. She repeated what she had said a year before, that Antoine was a good boy. He was not an angel; but he was a good, respectful boy. Every morning he prayed a psalm with his mother before leaving the house, as he did a year ago when he left for school but did not return.

The students who shared their reflections at the memorial service voiced a wide range of feelings: anger, frustration, fear, hope and love. No one expressed surprise.

On his way home from school, near the East New York housing projects in which he lived, a group of older teenagers had without cause beaten Antoine so badly that he died a few days later. Death is always shocking, especially when the victim is young. But murder is so frequently the cause of death for young blacks that it is not a surprise. Most of Antoine's friends knew of other youngsters who had been murdered in their neighborhoods. When you are young and black and male,, murder may be the final fact of life.

Homicide is the leading cause of death for black males between the ages of 15 and 44, and for black females between the ages of 15 and 24. During his lifetime, a black male has one in 21 chance of becoming a homicide victim; he is six times more likely to be murdered than is a white male. When a murder victim is a 16-year-old student in your own school, there is new import to these and like statistics:

- In 1976, when many of today's eighth-graders were born, more than half of all black children and 45% of all Hispanic children born in New York City were born to single mothers.
- In 1985, one out of every two black children under the age of 6 lived below the poverty line; for Hispanic children, the figure was two out of live children.
- In 1985, median income for white families was $29,152; for black families it was $16,786; and for Hispanic families it was $19,027, with poverty rates growing faster for the Hispanic population. (1)

What are the implications of these statistics for the Catholic high school with a large minority population? When students, by virtue alone of being Hispanic or black, are more likely to be murdered than are white students, death is not far from student consciousness. In fact, when ninth-graders in our school are asked at the start of a class retreat to name what they most fear, 30% to 50% name "death." When 11th or 12th- graders sign up for electives, sections fill up most quickly in the course Death and Dying. The Catholic high school offers something that public schools cannot easily allow: open discussion of life and death, of death and dying, with a difficult but clear position grounded in faith. Central in such discussion is the reality of hope: not as a palliative, but as a leavening agent.

A second implication of statistics about death and poverty in minority communities is that "higher expectations" in a Catholic high school must be rooted in the death and resurrection of Jesus. It is important to assert this clearly because when the phrase "higher expectations" is used in educational writing, it is often unwittingly rooted in an assembly line view of school popularized earlier this century by the Efficiency Movement. (2) If education means simply choosing the best "raw material" and producing a well-educated "final-product," Catholic schools would have only to assure some final Catholic coating. Students in such schools might implicity learn that success is a matter of performance and production, reward and consumption –hardly Christian values.

Instead, a Catholic high school community can call all of its members to respond to the challenge of prophets of every age: to see visions and to dream dreams. For a black or Hispanic youngster it may be especially important to have a dream. It is not utopian thinking that a school must sanction, but firm hope and Christian expectation grounded in the death and resurrection of Jesus. The clearest statement of Christian expectation is the Nicene Creed: exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum et vitam venturi saeculi –I expect, I am fully confident about, I have as my living hope the resurrection of the dead and life in an age soon to be.

* * *

These are the "higher expectations" fundamental to the Christian community and central to a Catholic inner city high school.

Hope is at the heart of such a Catholic high school, and hope can take shape in the lives of students through the teachers, the school climate and the careful design of curriculum.

Where many young people face unrelentingly harsh realities in life, the teacher is a sacramental sign of gentleness and acceptance. Where many young people find few adults concerned enough to guide and correct them, the teacher is a sure and firm guide. Three hunded years ago, the church's patron saint of teachers, John Baptist de La Salle, defined the role of the Christian teacher.

"You who are teachers have the responsibility to use every possible means to bring those under your guidance into that liberty of the children of God which Jesus Christ obtained by dying for us. You must do this by possessing two qualities in your relationship with them. The first is your gentleness and patience. The second is prudence in your reproofs and correction. (3)

The teacher, as sacramental sign, reveals some of life's unsuspected dimensions. A teacher helps a student to believe in him/herself. In inviting a student to believe in the power of life over death, in the possibility of shaping a world in the image of the Lord and the beatitudes, the teacher is a sign of hope.

Not only the teacher but the total school community is to be a sign of hope, somehow reflecting the Mystical Body of Christ. It is a tribute to the honesty of Catholic high school administrators that, in the NCEA's survey of Catholic high schools, two areas of school life given some of the lowest evaluations were: a/ responding to the special needs of minority students (rated fair or poor by 28%) and b/ recruiting and retaining low-income students (rated fair or poor by 40%). (4) Perhaps the lead question on climate questionnaires distributed to black students in Catholic high schools should be: "Does this school receive you as you think Jesus Christ would receive you?" The total school community teaches the basic lessons: This school cares about you, believes in you, supports you. This school challenges you to reshape yourself and society in the image of the risen Lord.

Excellence in course design and curriculum planning is another practical way that a Catholic school builds hope. Courses must challenge students to think clearly, to work hard, to be creative. Courses must offer students a realistic opportunity to succeed. Good curriculum design calls forth from students new belief in themselves, new trust in their ability to learn.

Minority students are often low income students with predictably lower scores on standardized tests than higher income students. Such test scores can debilitate adolescents and cause them to lose hope. In such circumstances, thoughtful curriculum planning and competent, caring teachers are especially important.

Thirty years ago, philosopher Etienne Gilson reminded teachers of the limitations and the importance of their work. Gilson wrote:

"We should not imagine that school children know nothing more than what they are taught in schools. In fact, what we teach them is but an infinitesimal part of their knowledge, but it is made up of what, without us, they would never learn. "(5)

What most minority youngster learn about the Catholic faith and Catholic attitudes toward minorities will be learned not only from teachers in Catholic schools, but from Catholics in the local community. Minority youth will surely learn whether Catholic high schools reach out enthusiastically to them or reach out only to those among them with special academic or athletic promise. This said, Gilson's words can encourage and challenge teachers of minority youngsters in Catholic high schools. Without such teachers, students might not learn the "higher expectations" open to them through the power of the resurrection, and their responsibility, as children of God, to cooperate with the Holy Spirit in reshaping the world in the spirit of the beatitudes.

PEOPLE–DRIVEN SCHOOLS

"Schools should become age-integrated – with senior citizens invited to take courses with our High School students."

The foundation of the Catholic school system is its "social capital". This social capital is the people who share our school values and the people who agree on basic religious and educational concerns. Dr. James Coleman, in his research at the University of Chicago, refers to these sustaining groups as the "functioning and supporting communities" of the Catholics schools. These are the people who are responsible for our birth, growth, and our sustenance.

Like our financial capital, our people-support is a treasure which we dare not lose. However, as we move the zoom lens close to delineate the linkages of this network, we will find that our social capital is gradually eroding. Much of this valued asset is disintegrating right in front of our eyes.

Many of our nearby manicured residences no longer have kids in them. In fact, only 23% of all households in the United States have children of school age in them! Furthermore, the loosening of family structures limits the possibility of other parents, who have school-age children, being directly involved in the life of the school.

Too, as more Catholic parents adopt a cafeteria_-style approach in their selection of Church offerings, we may find that Catholic education is not one of the more popular choices. Some parents who are getting caught up in the trappings of society, or who cannot pay for a home and a Catholic education, or who wish to save money for a college education for their children, are trading off a Catholic-school education for some other preferred commodity. These realities, all taken together, are more than just an erosion. Their consequences send tremors into the school bedrock!

Today's communication from the school to the home must be more than a paper trail. We need to have a feeling for what is going on in these homes and we must do this with a sense of mission, and not just as another job. This must become our main interest.

Our schools need also to become age-integrated. Senior citizens should be invited to take courses with our high school students where space permits, and at no charge. Parents may also wish to sample some attractive courses in our curriculum. All of this will bring an exciting challenge to our faculties and at the same time forge a new bond between the school and the community it serves.

Volunteers also need to be included in our new social capital. Many people are waiting in the wings for an invitation to be part of our school life and to invest in what they perceive to be an exciting adventure. In this age of volunteering, our Lasallian Association must open wide its gates to accept these generous people.

Our alumni are also part of this social capital. In La Salle's view these organizations were to be established in every school so that former students would persevere in the spirit of the school. He advocated retreats and days of recollection for them. He gave them something of substance. Our alumni should be included in our educational process and not just be looked upon as a reservoir to be tapped when the school needs financial help.

And how about the other 77% – those who, as statistics indicate, are not connected with high schools anywhere? What a terrific market for us! Three-fourths of the nation is there for us to spread our message. Friends, neighbors, alumni, alumni parents, grandparents, businesses, and all those others, who until now have never heard of us, are all part of this untouched market.

Our schools need to be articulate communicators to the general public. Our daily work in school, with each educator in a separate classroom or office, identifies us as working in a loosely coupled organization. For the most part we work alone and do not have to deal often with adults, even with fellow teachers in close association, unless we choose to do so. This has left an insular mark on the teaching profession. And it is one that we must remove quickly before our elusive social capital goes bye-bye.

We do not need believers. We need disciples. The difference is that disciples invest themselves in the activity. In times past our outreach was limited to parents and alumni, and they are the reason why we are alive today. Now, however, we must add "new" social capital in addition to our parents and alumni. We discovered years ago that "new" financial capital was needed and we pursued this insight with great success.

It would be a terrible irony if we did not have the disciples within our schools who feel that adult activities – volunteers, adult education, business linkages, to name a few – are important enough for faculty involvement. If this is the case, we may be going the way of the railroads. Passenger trains served a real need, but yet private passenger carriers went out of business. Apparently the managers and workers were just looking down the same old tracks each day and they did not observe the changing landscape. And, believe me, our educational landscape is changing!

Lord,
in the same way as the angels went up and down Jacob's ladder, our apostolate as teachers is to go up to you by prayer to get to know you better, and then to go down to the children and young people with your message, your Word.
Our challenge, Lord, is to learn Christian truths and maxims, and to adapt them to the life children and young people lead.

Jesus, be our Master.
Like you, we too consecrate our lives to the marvellous work of showing the way to the Kingdom of God.

Our apostolate is not restricted to enlightening and enriching the minds of the pupils.
We have to obtain for them the means to do good according to the will of God.

Lord, Father of all light and all gifts, we ask you for the strength and light to guide the lives of children and young people according to the Gospel message and to offer our support in doing good.

It is not easy, Lord, to encourage those who are not brave, to support the weak to be patient with everyone; and yet, following the example of Jesus and the Apostles, we dedicate ourselves to our work as ministers.

To be a teacher and a guardian angel means:
encouraging others to do good,
teaching them to pray,
encouraging them to frequent the sacraments, leading them away from sin and helping them to look for the Kingdom of God.

Your Apostle Paul shows us the way to build up the body of Jesus Christ in the hearts of children and young people:
– By reminding them that they are the temples of the Holy Spirit by virtue of their baptism and confirmation.
– By encouraging them to be honest with God and their neighbour.
– By encouraging them to gentle and kind, forgiving one another
by loving one another, following Jesus' exemple.

We want to remain vigilant as we work as ministers teaching our pupils and giving them good example.

MISSIONARY, CATECHIST...

Lord, You chose Paul and destined him to spread the Gospel.
He went down the highways and byways announcing the Kingdom always building the Church on the foundation of faith in Christ.
Now, You confide to us that same mission.
We beseech You to grant us a profound knowledge of Jesus and a generous committment, Paul's style.

We are honored to be educators for teaching is the basic call of the Church.
We collaborate with parents and pastors in the mission of helping Christ grow in the minds of children and youth.

Ours is the mandate to build the foundations of the Faith – to teach the truths and maxims of the Gospel – to instruct in the mysteries and love of God
– to encourage acceptance of the will of God.

The Church honors us as it entrusts to us the work of educating to the Faith and chooses us to pass on to children a knowledge of Religion and the spirit of Christianity.
Lord, make us Your humble apostles.

You sent the Apostles to teach Your word.
The early Fathers of the Church understood the importance of being catechists:
St. Cyril, St. Augustine, St. Ambrose... all taught catechism.
St. Jerome even wrote:

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

"A more beautiful thing it is to catechize children than to tutor an emperor".

The mission You gave to Your Apostles has not passed away.
You told them to teach the Kingdom of God:
"Go, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit".
Peter and Paul were model catechists and educators.
Even You, Lord, spent more time as MASTER than PRIEST.
Three years of your public life went into announcing the Good News about God.

Thank You, Lord,
for choosing us for so great a mission.
We ask You to help us that we may complete it with dignity and love, like the Apostles and Saints.

Lord, Your Apostle Paul gloried that he was sent to preach the Gospel.
He taught the message of the Cross of Christ folly for the Gentiles, scandal for the Jews, but Divine Wisdom
for those who believe the Gospel of Christ.

Lord, it was You who filled his mind and heart with such a zeal for Your glory that he became the Apostle of the Gentiles.
Thank you, Paul!
Many who were strangers to God's Covenant became sons of God and temples of the Holy Spirit through faith in Jesus Christ.

Lord, like your Apostles and Saints we value the mission of the Christian education of children and youth.
Because of it they will become sons of God and by it will persevere in their Faith.

Thank You, Lord, for choosing us to be MINISTERS OF YOUR GOSPEL.

* * *

WITNESSES

Lord, to instruct children and youth in the faith is to establish the foundations of the Church.
To us You have confided the work of building that foundation.

Day by day the Apostles spread the Good News and the number of believers grew and grew.
When the number of the faithful was overwhelming, they chose seven deacons to manage ordinary affairs while they devoted themselves to the one important thing, the teaching of the Divine word.

Jesus, Master, You taught daily.
We pray that you increase our diligence in Your service.

We are successors of the Apostles in the great enterprise of catechizing and instructing the poor in the truths of Faith.

We know that without You we can do nothing.
So we pray to You,
asking for necessary graces to exercise our ministry worthily.

Prayer and study,
the two pillars of Christian ministry.

Our labor as apostles does not end with teaching the Truth.
It is complete only when it produces Christian living.

The Apostles encouraged early Christian communities to live in the communion of the breaking of the Bread, and to pray daily in the Temple and especially to live in union with each other.

We want to be Your apostles, we are prepared to contribute to the extension of Your Kingdom by educating in schools
by pastoral efforts outside the school.
The pastoral and catechetical work of the Apostles was based on instruction about Christ, it was complemented by the administration of the Sacraments, and it grew through prayer and committment.

Lord, give us the strength and the dream of donating our time and our efforts to forming our young into real Christians:
instructing, forming, organizing,
with COMMITTMENT.

Lord, we hope that our children will not simply believe;
we ask that You stir up in their hearts
a truly Christian life.
We want to go beyond reaching we want to be witnesses to You, witnesses who will inspire youth to join in Christian community.

Show us the way to prayerfulness, simplicity, and committment so that we may follow You and have the joy of seeing our children with us on the road to salvation.

LASALLIAN ASSOCIATION

(1/2)

This article and the following one are part of a talk given by the author, Francis P. Coughlin, an ex-Brother. He is at present the Educational Coordinator for the St. Gabriels' Hall in Audubon. The various headings are ours.

Introduction

I need to begin, although is not a good way to do so, by stating two qualifiers and one apology.

My first qualifier is that my remarks are addressed almost exclusively to the lay people present. I hope the Brothers and others will not be offended. There is much to say on the topic and I have limited time and have to develop a focus for myself. My remarks do have implications for the Brothers, but I think they would best be stated by others.

My second qualifier is: I am not a theologian, nor am I an expert in Lasallian matters. I do have long familiarity and great love and respect for things Lasallian, but even all of these things together do not make me an expert. I am, therefore, open to and would welcome corrections in either my facts or my interpretations.

My apology is that I am going to speak from a prepared text. I am a lecturer and rarely speak in this way, and I think I may be a little uncomfortable doing so. I am doing so in order to cover my material in the time allotted.I consider myself first and foremost a teacher, and prefer speaking from notes and would much prefer the give and take of the classroom setting. I ask that you be patient with this approach.

The lay state

Let's start by putting a couple of things in context and perspective.

The first context and perspective we must establish is one which concerns us, the laity. Up to Vatican II and to a large extent since Vatican II and to a large extent since Vatican II, and in opposition to Vatican II, there was a theology of laity which emphasized our instrumental value to the hierarchy of the Church. Such a theology stresses our role as helpers to the hierarchy, to the clergy, even to the Brothers in accomplishing their mission, the Church's mission to the world.

Since Vatican II there have been a number of other theologies of the laity put forth, all of which are only more or less satisfactory, because, I think, they continue to be theologies of laity and not theologies for laity. The real need is for a new integrated theology of Church. You and I, however, cannot do much about that.

Both the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church and the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity in the documents of Vatican II make it clear: We (lay people) do not belong to the Church, nor do we have a role in the Church. Through baptism we are the Church. Through baptism and confirmation we are called and gifted. Through baptism and confirmation, in union with Jesus Christ, our mission is the mission of the Church itself. The dignity of who and what we are, the dignity of what we do is rooted in and rises out of our baptism and confirmation. We are an ecclesial people and we are sacrament to the world. The awareness of that reality must be for us an ever growing awareness. I make a strong point of this fact now because it must be a basic assumption in our discussion and understanding of the idea of association. If the conccept of association is translated into actual practice in our schools, it will be of the utmost, even critical, importance that we be aware of the reality of who and what we are.

Association

The second context and perspective we must establish is that of association itself. For us the term association does not have very strong denotations, nor very inspiring connotations. It is a rather weak neutral word. We will, hopefully, in the coming years change that. It will come to have a weight, a significance, an import similar to that which it has always had for the Brothers. You may be aware that Association is one of the vows each Brother professes and renews throughout his life. This vow ol Association the Brothers profess traces its origin back to the very foundations of their Institute. In 1694, John Baptist de La Salle with twelve laymen (the first Brothers) pronounced three vows: Obedience, Association and Stability. I have prepared a copy of that vow formula in English for you to examine. You will note there are no vows of poverty or chastity. They came later. The first three vows were practical and highly functional in their purpose. These twelve men were laymen. De La Salle alone was a priest, the only priest-brother in the 300 year history of the Brothers. The three vows had as their very practical purpose the provision of manpower for the maintenance of free schools. These men were associated together to keep free schools for the poor.

Men who were not Brothers i. e., not bound by the vows of obedience, association and stability, have always, from the very beginning, been associated with the Brothers in their work. We know this from De La Salle himself in the Memoir on the Habit written in 1690. But, it is evident that the association was limited, and, it seems, somewhat distant.

The term association for the purposes of maintaining schools, has for the most part over the past three hundred years been applied specifically and exclusively to the Brothers. Association truly has been and is a characteristic of the Lasallian School, but until now it has not technically applied to us, except in a general vague way. I believe that we and the Brothers are at a turning point in our and their understanding and implementation of association.

Let's define association. It is a bonding together for the common purpose of conducting Christian Schools. I think we can all more or less identify with that. We are doing that. Now this bonding together, this association allows for a great many degrees, a large spectrum. At one end we have the Brothers who are associated by vow. At the other end we have people who work in the same building and are relating to the same students, and that's about it. That is an extreme, but possible and real. Between these two extremes there is room for a great many degrees of association. My point is not to try to identify where we are on this spectrum. That is not yet possible. My point is to suggest that we are being called to move on the spectrum to greater association for the common purpose.

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

Association for Lasallian Schools

We are being called to greater association in a Lasallian School. What is a Lasallian School? Or what makes a school Lasallian? From the very beginning, right to the present time a Lasallian School was recognized as different. What made it different was the presence of the Brothers. The terms Lasallian and Brothers were interchangeable. We spoke ordinarily of a Brothers' school. Graduates identified themselves as Brothers' boys, and now we can speak of Brothers' girls. These schools had profound influence on their students, and on other staff members. Whether there were many Brothers or only a few, the school was distinctive. What made these men Lasallian? It is very important for us to be clear on this, if we are ourselves to be identified as Lasallian by associating ourselves with the Brothers. It will be a superficial, unconscious association at best if we become Lasallian by some process of osmosis, or if we are Lasallian because we fall within the aura of the Brothers.

The Brothers and spirituality

The Brothers themselves are not Lasallian simply by virtue of membership in the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. Being Lasallian, it seems to me, is both a personal and communal enterprise, and it is available to us through the Brothers. De La Salle is their founder and father. They are his sons and heirs. De la Salle's legacy is primarily theirs, and can be ours through association and by their willingness to share it with us. De La Salle's legacy is essentially a spiritual one. It is discovered in his own life story, in his writings, in the 300 year old story of his Institute and in the lives of his Brothers present with us today.

It is the spirituality of De La Salle which makes the Brothers Lasallian, and their schools Lasallian, and it will only be by sharing that spirituality with us that the Brothers can hope to make us Lasallian. It will only be by their sharing that spirituality with us that we can hope to become Lasallian.

Please be aware that these are my views. I try to indicate that by repeatedly saying "it seems to me" or "I think". For some, and even for some Brothers, my emphasis on buying into the spirituality as a requirement for being Lasallian, may be a bit strong. I should make it very clear that I am not talking about, I don't think it is intended, nor do I think it is desirable that we all become "mini-brothers", or that we create a third order. I am talking about buying into a spirituality which is particularly suited to us as educators, and it is only available to us through the Brothers. With those cautions, let me proceed.

De La Salle, like all of us, did not sit down and write his life story or the life story of the Brothers, and then set about living it. His story, like ours, is written in the living of it. The story unfolds as we go along, not always as we or he would have it. It is important for us to know his story and how he got into the work of the Christian Schools, but I cannot trace that here. He did in fact get into the work of establishing the Christian Schools. He quickly realized that they could not be maintained, could not prosper, unless they were staffed by trained and dedicated men who would give their entire lives to the schools. He also quickly realized that he himself had to train these men and that their dedication could not be sustained unless it were provided with interior and exterior supports and that the dedication must be based upon religious principles. He eventually, very gradually, painstakingly, brilliantly developed a spirituality for laymen who were exclusively, specifically committed to the ministry of education.

The spirituality of the educator

This is the great good news for us, you and me, lay people committed to education: the spirituality we need to sustain us in our ministry already exists. It is a living,, vibrant spirituality which has evolved from de La Salle's original teaching through 300 years of history. It is this spirituality, I think, which makes the Brothers unique. You and I, and the Brothers' students would, in general, be at a loss for words to explain why it is we are drawn to and devoted to the Brothers as we are.. It is this spirituality of De La Salle, I think, which they are trained to early in their lives and which they live out daily that draws us. It is this spirituality which, when all the external and superficial distinctions are removed that makes them Lasallian. It is not so esoteric, so otherworldly as to be beyond our reach. This spirituality is, as La Salle intended it, very practical, very functional, suited primarily to the Brothers, but able to be adopted and adapted by us. The sticking point is that we need to be educated and trained in this spirituality, and only the Brothers can do it. It is my own conviction that it is this spirituality which is the most characteristic element of anything Lasallian –whether it be Brothers, schools, students, teachers, people.

I know things are not this simple, and I know I am not sufficiently learned in these matters, and I have not done the research necessary to validate this statement, but, if I were to identify the linchpin which holds de La Salle's spirituality together, it would be what I consider his most brilliant insight, fully realized only late in his life, namely, that the Institute, the Christian Schools, were of divine origin. They were not the work of De La Salle, nor of the Brothers, nor of the Church, nor of us. They are God's work. And his work like his will will be done, regardless.

We are but his ministers, the administrators of his mercies. This rather awesome insight holds the spirituality together and informs each of the elements.

(2/2)

This article and the preceding one are part of a talk given by the author, Francis P. Coughlin, an ex-Brother. He is at present the Educational Coordinator for the St. Gabriels' Hall in Audubon. The various headings are ours.

The elements of Lasallian spirituality

I can only list and briefly comment on what I consider the salient elements of Lasallian spirituality. Hopefully, they could form future agenda for us.

The first element is a Spirit of Faith. We are not talking about faith whereby we believe in God or the dogmas of the Church. Having the Spirit of Faith is having a way of seeing the world. It is a world view, a way of looking at ourselves and others, especially our schools and our students. It is a way of knowing that the world has meaning, that appearances both conceal and reveal the realities behind them. If we see and comprehend the world, ourselves and our work in a Spirit of Faith, we will go beyond seeing and comprehending and we will begin responding in a Spirit of Faith.

The next four pieces flow from the Spirit of Faith, but they are also the means by which we acquire it.

First – a profound respect and reverence for Holy Scripture, especially the New Testament. Without it there is no Christian spirituality of any kind. We must read and assimilate it not just as human beings and Christians, but as teachers. If read in this way it has new meanings for us.

Second – a great trust in the providence of God. This is related to the unifying element of Lasallian spirituality. What we do, our work is God's work. He will provide for it. We trust that our best efforts will advance the work, and our worst failures cannot destroy it. If he should decide the work is finished, it's over, regardless of what we do. If it is to continue, it will continue, regardless. It is a wonderfully freeing sentiment. We do as much as we can as well as we can, and then it's on him.

Third – a great attentivesness to the presence of God. The practice of the presence of God is as old as Judaism and perhaps as old as man. Much has been written on it over thousands of years. Again, as with all the things we are speaking about, De La Salle took this age old practice and fitted it to the teacher and the classroom, and so made it distinctively Lasallian.

Fouth – a devotion to prayer, especially to meditation, or as the Brothers have traditionally called it, Mental prayer. Again this is nothing new in the Christian or any other tradition of spirituality, but De La Salle again brings it into focus on the teacher.

Zeal

The next element is a Spirit of Zeal. Zeal may be an old fashioned word, and perhaps an old fashioned virtue. A good synonym may be love. Interestingly, I think, (again, I have not done my research) the word rarely occurs in De La Salle without the adjective ardent. A burning, vigorous, strenuous, (passionate?) zeal or love is what is called for. As the Spirit of Faith is a way of seeing, the Spirit of zeal is a way of doing. Can you imagine grading your papers, preparing your lessons, attending faculty meetings with a passionate love? That's what is called for. Remember that De La Salle was not just a theoretician, he was a practitioner in the classroom. He never asked his Bothers to do what he was not willing to do himself. He knew he was asking his Brothers to devote their whole lives to the schools. He realized they could not perform their work unless they saw it in the light of faith and did it with passionate love, nor can we. Much of what we all do is routine, rote, attention to details, bookkeeping. It could and does easily become drudgery, and we can and do easily become drudges. Over the long haul we can become bored and, worse still, boring. De La Salle's solution: passionate love. At other times and other places it would be called elan, panache. The renaissance man was characterized by sprezzatura, an apparent effortless grace. De La Salle would not have found those words appropriate in his context. They would not have carried for De La Salle the weighty significance he wished to convey. And yet, they are words which very much characterize him and his way of getting things done.

The Spirit of Zeal is that element which infuses the spirit of joy into that we are about. It saves us from the gloomy religiosity which characterizes drudges and bores. It is a simple, clearheaded devotion to duty, it always takes us that extra mile, it gets the job done neatly, efficiently, completely. It is a characteristic of the Lasallian school.

The poor

The next element is a predilection, a preference, for the poor. It was for the children of the poor and the working classes that De La Salle established the Christian Schools. It is a characteristic of the Lasallian school to show that preference for the poor. It is easy to enter into a lengthy and heated discussion of "who are the poor?" I would urge all of you to avoid that discussion. For our purposes it is useless. Place yourself squarely in your school or your classroom. Then ask yourself, "who is poor"? If they are all poor, ask yourself who is the poorest? You do not need an advanced degree in anything to answer the question. It is probably the ugliest, dumbest kid. Maybe the quietest or noisiest, maybe the biggest thug. Probably the most disadvantaged emotionally, socially, educationally. The preference for these kids is based not on feeling sorry or wanting to help. It is based on a spirituality which calls on us to see beyond the appearance and minister to the reality. Identify your own poor kids, zero in on them and then give them the most and best you have to give. That always has been and is the Lasallian way, pure and simple. The spirituality consists is being tuned and disposed to doing that.

Openness to the signs of the times

The next element is not clearly stated anywhere by De La Salle, but it emerges from his own life story and the 300 year old life story of the Brothers. It is an openness to the signs of the times. It is a disposition of attentiveness and watchfulness to what is being asked of us. It is a disposition of attentiveness

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

and watchfulness to what is being asked of us. It is an abiding recognition and acceptance that all things change and that there is a season for the change. It is sensitivity to the fact that we change. It is acknowledgment that a 12 year old is different from a 17 year old, that each child is different from every other child, that we ourselves are different at different times and in different ways. It is insight into the distinction between the letter and the spirit of the law, but also the insight that because we are frail humans the letter is the embodiment of the spirit and safeguards it. The spirit must be supreme always, but if the letter must be put aside it is done carefully, not through faddishness, but through discernment. It is the patience to accept that the mythologies we live by today must give way. It is the wisdom to create new mythologies to live by tomorrow.

This is a difficult element of Lasallian spirituality to articulate. Openness is a pretty neutral word, but the implications are by no means neutral. The implications of openness are clearly related to the unknown and to vulnerability. Not an easy element to embrace, but nonetheless very Lasallian.

We are what we do

The last element I wish to list is again one which is not clearly stated anywhere by De La Salle, but it clearly emerges from his life story and his writings and the history of the Brothers. For lack of a better term it has to do with the practice of a holistic view of all we are and do. It is the development of an integrating force within ourselves. It has to do with all the other elements I have spoken of. You may have noted that they are all related. One flows from the other, informs the other, complements the other, then turns back and defines the others. They are distinct for the purspose of conceptualizing, analyzing and articulating, but individually they make little sense. It is only when integrated and embodied as a whole in a human being do they become Lasallian. This element was underscored by De La Salle when he insisted that a Brother was not a teacher when he was in school and a religious when he was in the community house. He insisted that a Brother was not a religious who happened to be a teacher. His Brothers were teaching religious and religious teachers. They did not live their lives in community and earn their living in school. For him and for the Brothers the two were distinguishable, but inseparable. The same is true for us. We are not Christian for an hour on Sundays, teachers from 8 to 4 on weekdays, and husbands, wives, parents, or whatever for the rest of the time. These distinguishable parts of ourselves are to be inseparable. Each must flow from, inform and define the others. By insisting that his Brothers' holiness, wholeness, perfection and even salvation depended on how well they performed their duties in school, as well as on how well they prayed, De La Salle made this integrating force a key element in his spirituality. Dichotomizing diminished the significance of both life and work. Integrating enhanced the significance of both. He addressed directly the schizophrenia to which we are all drawn as well as the false dualism which divides and destroys all of us.

The research has yet to be done, but I am sure it will prove that De La Salle's spirituality is a whole, a structured coherent teaching. It's effectiveness and vitality have been proven over 300 years in the history of the Brothers. I am certain it is applicable to us. Large parts of it can be adopted wholesale, other parts will require adaptation.

I really wish I could expand on all of these elements, which to me are of the utmost importance. I am sure, however, that there are people much better qualified to do it. These things should be part of a future agenda. Unless we are educated and trained in these things, our association with the Brothers will be of a very superficial nature. The extent to which we accept and practice Lasallian spirituality will determine the degree of our association.

The genius of De La Salle

Lasallian spirituality is what makes De La Salle an educational genius. His genius has relatively little to do with the fact he introduced the simultaneous method or the use of the vernacular for instruction. His genius lay in his transformation of the entire concept of the education of the masses by laymen. We are no longer misfits good for nothing else but to teach filthy street urchins and other people's brats. We are God's ministers, administrators of his mercies. We have been entrusted with the sublime task of caring for and saving our students, who are sacred immortal souls. De La Salle elevated us and our profession to extraordinary, sublime heights. De La Salle made teaching the finest of the useful arts. Teaching is a manifestation and exercise of divine goodness. De La Salle had a great deal to do with making it so.

There was a little disgression on De La Salle. It will be hard for us to be Lasallian without developing an appreciation for him. He is not easy to get to know, but worth it. Initially, he will strike you as austere, even severe. Be patient and get beyond the appearances. We would have reason enough to love him, if only for his Brothers, but, I think, if we learn his ways and practice his teaching we can love him for himself. He is our patron.

TOGETHER AND BY ASSOCIATION

"John Baptist de La Salle was led to found a community of men who, enlightened by God and sharing in his plan of salvation, joined together with a view to meeting the needs of young people who were poor and far from salvation. At the present time also, every Brothers' community finds its basic motivation in this event" (Rule, 47).

The expression "together and by association", rarely used up to the present time, is now more frequently so in the wider context of Lasallian lay people. Lay people, however, vary in their usage of this expression. Many repeat simply what they have heard the Brothers say but are unaware of the origin or richness of this Lasallian expression. What follows is an attempt to explain the meaning of this expression and so contribute to a better understanding of it, and perhaps lead to a more correct use of it.

1. THE SOCIETY OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

Thanks to Blain, we probably know when this idea was born. The occasion was the "heroic" vow made by De La Salle, Nicolas Vuyart and Gabriel Drolin on November 21st 1691 (cf. Blain I, p. 313, C. L. 7). We know from the Founder's own words how he was led by God "from one commitment to another", in an "imperceptible" way. On this occasion, then, he understood that God wanted him to take a further step and commit himself more fully. He invited the two young Brothers, on whom his future hopes rested, to join him in an act of total and radical gift of their lives and energy so as to ensure the success of what they saw as "the work of God". It was a private vow which was meant to set the seal on a commitment which would consolidate the newly-born community. The text of the vow is as follows:

"Most Holy Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, prostrate with profound respect before thine infinite and adorable majesty, we consecrate ourselves entirely to thee to procure with all our ability and dedication the establishment of the Society of the Christian Schools, in the way in which it seems most pleasing to you, and in which it is of the greatest benefit to the society. And for this purpose, I, John Baptist de La Salle, Priest, I, Nicolas Vuyart, I, Gabriel Drolin, make a vow of association and union, now and for always, till such time as there is only one survivor or till the complete destruction of this society, to procure and maintain this establishment, without our being able to depart from it, even if there remain only the three of us in the society, and we are obliged to beg and live on bread only.

In view of which, we promise to do, unanimously and with common consent, all that we consider in our conscience and without any human consideration, to be for the greater good of the society.

Done this 21st of November, day of the Presentation of the Most Blessed Virgin, 1691. In proof of which we have signed".

The text speaks for itself and reveals the generosity and spiritual quality of these three men who were prepared to stake everything on the free schools.

And now we come to the year 1694. This year reflects in a certain sense an increase in maturity in the work understaken by De La Salle. It can be said that his community "was growing from within", in spite of difficulties like the famine of 1693-94 and its great consequences. The Founder thought it was time to call an assembly of the Brothers. In the Institute, we consider this to have been the first General Chapter. He summoned 12 Brothers out of the 30 that probably existed at the time according to calculations. He discussed with them, and assessed the situation of the community. They were faced with an important task: that of approving by community consensus the regulations according to which they had lived and which they had observed. They wanted also to commit themselves more fully to God and to one another so as to be better able to answer God's call to them. And so they decided to make perpetuel vows of association, stability and obedience. On June 6th, Trinity Sunday, in the course of a simple ceremony, they pronounced each in turn the formula of perpetual profession. The formula written and signed by the Founder is kept as a precious relic in the Archives of the Generalate. Its text runs as follows:

«Most Holy Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, protrate with the most profound respect before your infinite and adorable majesty, I consecrate myself entirely to thee to procure thy glory as far as I am able and thou wilt require of me.

And for this purpose, I, John Baptist de La Salle, Priest, promise and vow to unite myself and live in community with Brothers Nicolas Vuyart, Gabriel Drolin, Jean Partois, Gabriel Charles Rasigade, Jean Henry, Jacques Compain, Jean Jacquot, Jean Louis de Marcheville, Michel Barthelemy Jacquinot, Edmo Leguillon, Gilles Pierre and Claude Roussel, to keep together and by association free schools, wherever this should be, even if I am obliged in order to do so to beg for alms and live on bread only, or to do in this society whatever is entrusted to me, whether by the body of this society or by its superiors.

For this purpose, I promise and vow obedience equally to the body of this society and to its superiors. These vows as well as those of association and stability in the society and obedience I promise to keep inviolably all my life time.

In proof of which I have signed. Done at Vaugirard, 6th of June, Feast of the Holy Trinity, 1694. (Signed)

De La Salle».

The 12 other formulas are identical, apart from the substitution of the name of the Brother making vows by that of the Founder. Brothers who made perpetual vows after this memorable occasion did so with equal determination and in the same spirit. A register is kept in the archives of the Generalate containing the 1694 formula of vows of the Founder and of the 12 Brothers, and those of 23 other Brothers up to 1705.

2. FIRST CONSEQUENCES OF ASSOCIATION

On that same day, there took place another event which I think is worth mentioning and which reinforced, one could almost say welded together, the association they had professed: the Founder suggested the Brothers elect a superior who was a Brother. His intention was to ensure that the newly-founded society should henceforward be in the hands of its members. It was a wise suggestion which the Brothers did not accept at the time, preferring to be governed by De La Salle and to benefit from his wise guidance and counsels for as long as possible. This was made clear by their unanimous vote that he should continue as superior. They decided, however, that on the death of De La Salle, they would accept as superior no one else except a Brother who was associated with them, and who had made the same vows and commitments as they. The following day, June 7th, they recorded their decision in the following terms:

«We the undersigned, Brother Nicolas Vuyart (there follow 7 names), having become associated by the vows we pronounced yesterday with Mr. John Baptist de La Salle, priest, to conduct together and by association gratuitous schools, recognise that, as a result of our vows and of the association to which they have bound us, we have chosen Mr. John Baptist de La Salle as our supeior, and we promise to obey him with complete submission by virtue of our vow, as well as those he will give us as superiors. We declare also that we do not intend that the election we have held to make Mr. De La Salle our superior should set a precedent for the future. We intend that after him, in the future and forever afterwards, no priest will be accepted among us, no priest or anyone who has received holy orders will be chosen as superior, and that we will not have nor accept any superior who is not associated with us, and who has not made vows like us, and like all the others who will be associated with us in the future.

Done at Vaugirard, June 7th 1694».

Apart from being very clear, this document shows the determination of the members of the society to be a completely lay community, a fact that reflects the extent to which they were aware of their identity. The document is also a vigorous defence of their autonomy with regard to making decisions and their internal government. Their election of their superior is a consequence of the vows they have made and the association they have bound themselves to. These two positive statements have been a permanent feature of the Brothers' Institute ever since.

3. WHAT ASSOCIATION MEANT IN THE INSTITUTE

From the various facts we have mentioned and the documents which support them, we can deduce what part association played in the lives of the Brothers, how it was an integral part of their lives, and how it became one of the key elements of Lasallian spirituality and its charism. The following points illustrate this:

1. The Founder and the 12 Brothers understood clearly the real nature of what constituted at that time the Soociety of the Christian Schools.

2. They formed an organised body. They had committed themselves by a vow to God, for the rest of their lives, together and by association, to a specific educational apostolate – that of gratuitous schools.

3. They based this educational apostolate on their total and radical availability.

4. They understood clearly that authority was exercised by the superior, but also by the Body of the Society. In everyone's mind, the Society was a solid reality. This would be subsequently proved by the famous letter that the Body of the Society sent the Founder in 1714.

5. The opening words and the content of the formula of vows emphasise the religious character of this offering to God: the consecration is addressed to the Most Holy Trinity, and it is in order to procure its glory that the three vows are pronounced.

6. The apostolic aim of this consecration and of association are unequivocal: the Brothers commit themselves to work for the glory of God by conducting together gratuitous schools.

7. They determine to remain faithful to their commitments even if they encounter opposition and difficulties, and they are reduced to such a state that they have to beg for alms and live solely on bread in order to pursue their apostolate.

Association is the result of a group decision which expresses the brotherhood or unity that must exist among the members of the community in a social form, gives it a juridical basis, and makes it visible.

This brotherhood acquires its profound meaning from the relationship between Christ and the Holy Spirit, on which it is based. It is sufficient to recall the Gospel metaphor of the vine (John 15, 1-8), or St. Paul's reference to the body (I Cor. 6, 12-20). Association must be anointed with the oil of fraternal union which "enables all, communities and Brothers alike, to assist each other in sharing their common responsibility for their life and their apostolic work" (Rule, 124).

The Founder and the first Brothers were convinced that God had chosen them and called them so that, closely united and of one mind, they could be "ministers of God and dispensers of his mysteries" among poor children and those furthest from salvation. They see their work in a Church context, and consider it as "one of the most important and necessary functions in the Church".

Three hundred years later, our 1987 Rule "faithful to the specific intentions" of the Founder keeps the original spirit and fervour alive and active. It summarises this marvellously when it declares: "The Brothers, in fidelity to the Spirit and the charism of their Founder, consecrate themselves to God in order to exercise, by association, their apostolic ministry of education" (Rule 2).

The Brothers consecrate all their energies to the ministry of Christian education: "Together and by association, they labour to accomplish God's saving work in a profession where the poor have the Gospel preached to them and where young people grow as human persons and children of God" (Rule 20).

4. A MISSION SHARED WITH LAY PEOPLE

Since Vatican II, the acceptance of lay people by the Institute has been clear and explicit. As early as 1967, in the "Declaration on the Brother of the Christian Schools in the World Today", there is talk of "friendly collaboration between Brothers and lay people", a point which is taken up by the 1967 and 1977 Rules (cf. Chap. 9, 7).

In May 1981, all the Visitors of the Institute gathered in Rome and studied the whole question thoroughly. They recognised that "with all the facilities offered by the large number of laymen working with us, the meeting esteems it an urgent duty to get them to share in this mission and this spirituality. An urgent duty because it is a debt the Church owes the layman" (Cir. 415, p. 25 Oct. 1981).

But it was at the 1986 Chapter that a definitive change took place. There was now talk of a mission shared with lay people. "Thanks to this integration of Brothers and lay people working together in a common ministry, our schools will be better and we will be able to offer a service of greater quality to the Church" (Cir. 422, p. 13 July 1986). Although the Brothers remain the "mainstay", the "heart" and the "faithful memory" of the Lasallian spirit, there is a steadily increasing number of Lasallians who seriously wish to live according to the Lasallian charism, and to express their commitment to Christ through the spirituality left us by the Founder.

The men and women find support for their wishes in article 17 of the Brothers' Rule which says: "Ever since the time of their foundation, the Brothers have contributed to the promotion of the Christian laity, especially among those educators who want their professional work to be a form of Gospel ministry.

The Brothers gladly associate lay persons with them in their educational mission. They provide for those who so desire, the means to learn about the Founder and to live according to his spirit".

Scanned at the Lasallian Resource Center
De La Salle Institute – Napa, CA – USA

This then is special invitation that the Institute makes to Lasallian lay people: to share in the apostolate and live with the Brothers, inspired by the spirit of association of Lasallian tradition.

But that is not all. The Rule reveals yet another dimension of this Lasallian spirit of association, when it says: "The Institute sees the existence of the various Lasallian movements as a grace from God renewing its own vitality. The Institute can associate with itself lay people who want to lead the life of perfection that the Gospel demands, by living according to the spirit of the Institute and by participating in its mission.

The Institute helps them achieve their proper autonomy. At the same time it creates appropriate ties with them and evaluates the authenticity of their Lasallian character" (Rule 146).

This article refers to groups of lay people who form themselves into associations inspired by De La Salle. This idea of forming associations is nothing new in the Church. One can say that it is as old as the Church itself, but in our days, it has acquired new strength. It is what Pope John Paul II says in "Christifideles Laici": "In these last few years, the special characteristics of the phenomenon of lay association have been variety and vitality. It is possible for us to speak of a new era of association among the lay faithful" (N° 29).

The two texts quoted above reveal to us the various ways Lasallian lay people can live according to a Lasallian form of association, that is to say, according to the Founder's form as illustrated by him and the first Brothers, and still valid for us to a great extent.

Among many others, I should like to pick out the following forms of association:

– Lay people who wish to make "together and by association" a part of their lives, together with Brothers and within a Lasallian educational community, or in the context of some other activity at a District level.

– Lay people by themselves (because there are no Brothers) who wish to practise "together and by association" in a Lasallian educational community. (In certain countries, there are already many Lasallian schools run by lay people only).

– Lay people who feel they are specially called by God to make a more explicit commitment by undertaking specific obligations. This is the case at present of Signum Fidei members and those of the Lasallian Third Order.

– The Union of Catechists of Jesus Crucified and Mary Immaculate is a special case, because it is a secular institute and so enjoys an autonomy proper to these institutes. It takes its inspiration, however, from Lasallian spirituality and in this sense it has a spiritual link with the Institute of the Brothers. In practice, this link takes the form of a Brother Assessor, appointed by Brother Superior, who has an advisory role.

Under normal circumstances, a Lasallian association should function within a District or Regional framework. At this level, there exist District or Regional plans which coordinate all the energies of Brothers and the various Lasallian groups with a view to achieving a single aim. In the light of this, a District or Regional plan cannot be drawn up by Brothers only. The various Lasallian groups must each make their specific contribution to it, otherwise the Lasallian contribution to the Church will be incomplete. Seen in this light, the District Plan becomes the District Lasallian Family Plan.

However this is done, one must never lose sight of the fact that work "together and by association" in Lasallian thinking has nothing to do with the friendship that can exist among a group of friends or even an efficient team of workers. The Lasallian must aim higher and, with the eyes of faith, feel he is personally called by God, so that with others, likewise called by God, he can commit himself totally to the ministry of Christian education, especially to that of poor children and of all those far from salvation. The commitment by association of lay people will doubtlessly be different from that of the Brothers, but it will have to have the same evangelical basis and be sufficiently visible to be a genuine proclamation of the message of Jesus Christ.

At present, hoping that groups of Lasallian lay people will think about this subject and study it, I feel the need to point out that there are certain requirements that are absolutely essential if we are going to speak about Lasallian-style association:

– The awareness among those who are associated of God's personal call to each one to undertake a Christian educational apostolate. This presumes looking at things with the eyes of faith.

– A clear idea and basic consensus with regard to the common aim which is to be pursued. This follows from an acceptance and implementation of a common educational plan.

– The promotion of a spirit of service and availability, and a commitment to gratuity.

– The growth of fraternal relationships so that each person is valued at his true worth as an individual. This produces a tight-knit community.

– Personal and community experience of Christian values stemming from constant attention to the Word of God and the celebration of Mass.

– Awareness that one belongs to the Church. Not shutting onself off from others, but showing a need for what other groups or communities have to offer.

And now it is up to committed Lasallian lay people to speak. What is needed now is to look for concrete ways of putting into practice this "together and by association" so that it can act as leaven in everyday life.

This is what Pope John Paul II said when he declared that: "the faithful who join associations or movements through the inspiration of the Spirit seek to put the Word of God into practice in real situations, bringing the life of the Gospel to everyday life and human values, and enriching the Church with an infinite and inexhaustible fund of charitable and holy undertakings" (March 2nd 1987).

I firmly believe that those groups of lay people who want to live according to the spirit and charism of St. John Baptist de La Salle by association are called upon to play an important role in the renewal of the Church and present-day society.

CALVERT HALL COLLEGE

(BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, U.S.A.)

TWO EDUCATION PROGRAMS

* * *

THE XAVIER PROGRAM

The Xavier Program at Calvert Hall College, Baltimore, Maryland, serves a unique group of students with identified language learning difficulties. The goal of the Xavier Program named for long time faculty member Brother Xavier Langan, FSC, is to provide remediation for continued development of skills in language areas and support for completing coursework simultaneously. The students served in this Program may encounter problems in reading, writing, spelling, and math skills due to conditions often referred to as dyslexia or specific language disability. While some students in the Xavier Program may have relatively mild differences, their learning problems are significant in that they result in performance below that expected from students with high potential.

Characteristic of students with specific language difficulty is an uneven profile of performance. Each individual presents a unique profile of strengths and weaknesses in academic areas. In order to address the unique learning characteristics of these students their academic programs are tailored to meet their individual needs. Though they are fully integrated into the academic environment at Calvert Hall, students in the Xavier Program receive additional instruction from a Language Specialist on an individual or small group basis for one period each day. During this time, they receive remediation and direct instruction in language skills affecting reading, writing, and math, as well as assistance and support for coursework assignements. This may well involve work on skills such as organization, monitoring and proofreading, and test taking techniques.

Students in the Xavier Program at Calvert Hall profit from smaller class sizes and flexible scheduling. The average class size is twenty students and classes can be arranged to help students meet graduation requirements and acquire electives of particular interest. In their regular clases, these students receive consideration through appropriate modification in instructional techniques and testing procedures. Specifically, they may take untimed tests where the need arises, may receive help with note taking, and may request differential grading of written assignements (content vs. mechanics).

An educational plan will be developed for each student which outlines his program and specifies objectives to be addressed in the language remediation sessions. To facilitate implementation of their programs, there is ongoing communication between the language specialist and classroom teachers. Progress towards the stated goals is reviewed with the parents at regular intervals.

The Xavier Program affords its students a strong academic program in a resourceful setting that acknowledges their strengths, and encourages their contribution to the school community. Calvert Hall believes that the student in the Xavier Program benefits from the challenging, yet supportive, academic environment at Calvert Hall. The students will also profit from the art, music, and sports activities which round out their academic programs and contribute to their personal development, to the mutal benefit of both students and the school.

Calvert Hall College has an enrollement of 1060 young men between the ages of 14 to 18. Approximately 40 of the students are enrolled in the Xavier Program. The Xavier Program is staffed by a full time Director and four full time staff members. Calvert Hall's overall faculty of 80 members includes 20 Christian Brothers.

THE McMULLIN SCHOLARS PROGRAM

THE PROGRAM

The McMullin Scholars Program is a comprehensive, four-year academic program consisting of honors and Advanced Placement courses from the English, Social Studies, Religion, Foreign Language, Mathematics, and Science departments.

Courses are designed to meet the special needs of the intellectually gifted student. Accelerated content, in-depth study, small group discussions, interdisciplinary approaches, and experiential learning opportunities are an integral part of the Scholars Program.

Recognizing that many of our students will one day assume high-level, responsible position in society, the development of leadership skills and social responsibility are central components of the program.

General requirements for students in the Program include:

- Honors Latin
- Honors Religions
- Humanities Seminars
- Summer course in Communication, Research and Study Skills
- Proficiency in a modern foreign language
- Advanced study in at least two disciplines.

THE STUDENTS

McMullin Scholars are a small, select group of students who are committed to the pursuit of truth and knowledge. As a part of a community that includes other scholars (both students and teachers), Scholars are expected to be active learners who take responsibility for their education. In return for making an academic commitment, Scholars are entitled to certain opportunities and benefits that are not available to the general student body.

BENEFITS AND HONORS

- A variety of cultural, educational, and travel opportunities, designed to promote fellow-ship among participants, are available to Scholars.

- Each student in the Program is assigned a faculty member who serves as a mentor and academic advisor for four years.

- Upperclass students have an opportunity to work on real problems and engage in independent research projects with mentors in the academic, business, professional and political community.

- A student who fulfills all requirements of the program will be honored at graduation as a McMullin Scholar.

- An explanation of the Scholars Program accompanies a student's transcript when he applies to colleges and universities.

PROGRAM PURPOSE AND GOALS

The purpose of the Scholars Program is to promote academic excellence. Program goals are:

- To ensure that each student has an opportunity to develop his intellectual gifts to the fullest.

- To enhance further the opportunities for fellowship and leadership in a Christian community.

- To graduate students with a liberal education so that they will be life-long learners who are: proficient in a foreign language; well-grounded in the humanities, sciences, and mathematics; able to communicate successfully both orally and through the written word.

HISTORY

The development of the McMullin Scholars Program at Calvert Hall College began in the Spring, 1985 with the first class of Scholars beginning in September, 1986. Although Calvert Hall had an outstanding Honors and Advanced Placement Program for many years, the Administration felt a signifiant need to move beyond a traditional program into a more inclusive and coordinated effort involving academic and leadership development. While academic knowledge is the key to scholarship, responsible use of that knowledge should be at the heart of any true Scholar Program.

STUDENT SELECTION

Students are selected for the program on the basis of overall intellectual ability, as well as specific high-level ability in the mathematics, verbal, scientific, or foreign language areas. The selection committee and program director will consider IQ test scores, standardized ability and achievement test scores, grade point average, and teacher or counselor recommendation and faculty interview.

BROTHER FRANCIS McMULLIN, FSC

The McMullin Scholars Program is named to honor the memory of Brother Francis McMullin, FSC, the founder of Calvert Hall College, and the first American Christian Brother. In 1843, at age of 16, John McMullin responded to the invitation of Archbishop Samuel Eccleston to go to Montreal for training as a Christian Brother. In 1845 he returned to Baltimore as Brother Francis and on September 15, 1845, began Calvert Hall at Saratoga and Sharp Streets. He continued his work at Calvert Hall for the next year and a half, until poor health forced him to move to a warmer climate. On March 7, 1847, in St. Augustine, Florida, Brother Francis died, but his work lived on reflecting that same spirit of service, generosity, and dedication he brought to its beginnings... and all this between the ages of sixteen and twenty!

Nº 19
October 1st 1990

FROM THE EDITOR

This is the last issue of LASALLIANA for the year 1990. Our editorial year has dealt with many themes which we believe to be of common interest to our many readers both in deepening our knowledge and reflection on Lasallian matters and in providing material to those who are active in sharing with others our spirituality and our mission.

We have been notified by many communities that they are not receiving LASALLIANA but that they have seen it in other centers. We regret that this Institute publication is not available in all communities. Ordinarily our mailings go through the Provincial office. The ideal would be to send each District enough copies for every community or center, as well as to provide for distribution to our immediate collaborators.

In previous issues we promised to begin a LETTERS TO THE EDITOR section. Since two letters for this purpose have been received, we publish them below.

Brother Jose Maria Valladolid

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

«In Nº 17 you began a section for LETTERS TO THE EDITOR. I am taking advantage of this opportunity to offer a correction to the article of Brother Hernan Pulgarin R. on "St. John Baptist de La Salle and the centenary of the Brothers in Colombia" (Lasalliana 17-18-E-45).

The fact is that there were two Colombian Brothers: Brother Filemon (Juan Isidoro Sanchez), from Pasto and Brother Alonso (Manuel Valencia) from Ipiales. Both cities are in the Department of Nariño which borders Ecuador and to which country these two Brothers went for their formation. (Cf. Rigault, Histoire Generale, p. 319 and Archives of the Motherhouse)».

Brother Bernardo Montes Urrea, Dist. of Bogota, residing in Rome.

«From its first edition, I have been an avid reader of the LASALLIANA for which I have the greatest admiration. However, I would like to call your attention to the variations in the spelling of the name of the Founder within each issue, and sometimes within the same article.

This is the case in the excellent contribution of our former confrere M. Francis Coughlin (18-16-D-44) in which he speaks of the spirituality of De La Salle and later on he refers to the originality of the teaching of de La Salle. It might possibly be a question of two different articles translated into English or simply a matter of pecularities of language. While in the United States, I had the pleasure of visiting La Salle College, and for many years I taught in a certain La Salle School. In Colombia I saw a Colegio De La Salle and here in Cameroun I was a professor in Collège de La Salle.

Personally, I prefer the spelling De La Salle which we sometimes see as the authentic (?) signature of the Founder. Thus we have: spirituality of De La Salle (as above) as well as Brothers of De La Salle. Brothers of de La Salle or Brothers La Salle to my Dutch ear sounds somewhat odd. Of course, the adjective "Lasallian" is perfect!»

Brother Laurent Vester, Bertoua, Cameroun. District of Douala.

LIVE JESUS IN OUR HEARTS... FOREVER!

– We say the name of JESUS as the Risen Christ.

– We earnestly wish him to stay in our hearts FOREVER.

1

For centuries now,
«LIVE JESUS IN OUR HEARTS»
has been the invocation with which we,
Brothers of the Christian Schools, have begun our prayers every morning.

As the sun rises, we address our praise and desires to CHRIST, the first-born of creation.

Greetings of peace,
like those of Jesus to his disciples;
like those of Paul at the beginning of his epistles to Christians; like those of the priest
at the beginning of Mass:
«The peace and grace of God our Father and of Our Lord Jesus Christ be with you!»

2

is the fraternal expression of a deep desire.
It's as if we were saying:

– If every day, as soon as you rise,
you feel that Jesus is living in you, you possess already within yourself
the source of life and the fount of enthusiasm;

– If you place JESUS
in the boat of your heart,
what passion-filled storm,
however violent it may be, can make it sink?

From the depths of your being you will hear the Founder say to you:
«Beseech this Divine Saviour to be ever in your soul tou pray therein and to lead yo to God»
(Med. 62, 3)

3

When we are part of a closely-knit community, the LIVE JESUS rings in our ears with harmonious sounds of joy and happiness.

Is it not a source of great happiness to be assured that JESUS presides over our group...
«Where two or three...»

His presence is comparable to that of the sun in nature:

– It is as the source of life;
– It communicates to plants
the power to produce;
– It gives fruit their taste and full ripeness.

It is enough for us expose ourselves to the influence of his beneficial rays

– for his spirit to enter into us;
– for our hearts to draw closer to one another;
– for the Gospel to become our rule of life.

The FOREVER cried in answer by all will be

- like a cry of praise to JESUS CHRIST;
- like the signature at the end of a letter which endorses what has been written;
- like the «We want you to rule over us» said to David by the children of Israel;
- like the centurion's profession of faith:
  «Truly, JESUS, yo are the Son of God».

Your name, Jesus, is above all other names.
Before yoy all knees vow, above in heaven and here on earth.

Come, Spirit of Jesus, take possession of my heart and give life to all my actions, so that I can say:
«IT IS NO LONGER I WHO LIVE,
BUT IT IS CHRIST WHO LIVES IN ME».

PRAYER OF THE TEACHER BEFORE SCHOOL

O my God, you are strength in my weakness,
The bright light in moments of uncertainty and worry,
A friend's advice when most needed.

It is you who entrusted me with my ministry,
You who have made me the shepherd of the little flock at school.

Never abandon me to myself for one moment,
Lest pride overwhelm me,
And I consider «your work»
As being totally mine;
Lest the children listen only to my voice'
And forget to listen to yours.

Give me and my pupils
the spirit of discernment in our lives

- So that I can make the child
  And his preparation for life,
  And not reputation, the main of the school;
- So that I derive consolation
  Not only from efficient work,
  But from announcing the Gospel;
- So that I am in my class as one who serves
  And not as one who calls upon others
  To serve him.

I unite my work
With that of Jesus Christ, my Master,
So that it may draw
Its strength and efficiency from him.

I pray to the most Holy Virgin,
Queen of the Apostles,
And Mother of the Christian Schools,
And to St. John Baptist de La Salle,
My Father and Founder,
And ask them to deign to protect me in the exercise of my ministry. AMEN.

S. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

AND OPENNESS TO THE WORLD (1/2)

Pope Paul VI, speaking to the members of the 3rd World Congress on the Apostolate of the Laity, had the following to say:

«The world is your field of action. You are immersed in it by your vocation» (15/10/67).

Nearly three centuries earlier, St. John Baptist de La Salle addressed these words to religious educators:

«Your profession requires you to mix every day with the world, where your every step is watched. It behoves you, therefore, to be a model of every virtue for the seculars among whom you live» (Med. 69, 3).

And nowadays we can read in the new Rule of our Institute:

«The Brothers live out their consecration in a community of the Church. Such a community affirme the duty and the possibility of renewing the world in the spirit of the Gospel» (R. 23). Elsewhere the Rule tells us that this community is committed to the educational apostolate; that it is characterised by great openness to others; that it is integrated into a wider pastoral care programme; and that it is interested in cultural groups and other aspects of social work.

Priests, religious and lay people are sent out into the world as the seed of life to transform it by the action of the Holy Spirit.

WHO IS THE WORLD?

We should perhaps first of all define the meaning of this word by looking in the dictionary.

– In current usage it means the planet we live on.

– When Jesus said that «God so loved the world that he gave his Son», it is clear that "world" meant all people. It is a world, fallen because of its sin, a world that the Redeemer came to save, «For God sent his Son into the world not to condemn the world, but so that through him the world might be saved» (John 3, 16-17).

– So what is this world that Jesus curses and condemns, the world for which «he does not pray»? It is the world of which he said: «it (the world) does hate me, because I give evidence that its ways are evil» (John 7, 7); it is the world described by St. John: «the world has to offer the sensual body, the lustful eye, pride in possessions» (I John 2, 16); it is all the people whose "prince" is Satan (cf. John 14, 30 & 16, 11); it is all those whose perverse or misguided beliefs that are contrary to the maxims of the Gospel; it is those who do not belong to the Kingdom of God.

Whether hidden or overt, the influence of the world is felt everywhere.

Pope Paul VI, speaking to the members of this same Congress on the Apostolate of the Laity, has this to say:

«Under the influence of a thousand and more factors, the world is naturally moving towards a state which has been described by certain contemporary thinkers –to the joy of some and the chagrin of others– by such terms as secular, laicised, desacralized. We note with much sadness that there are Catholic writers who, in opposition to the 2.000 year old tradition of the Church, look forward to the gradual reduction, even the eventual disappearance, of the sacred character of places, times and persons».

The Sovereing Pontiff then added: «Your apostolate, dear Sons and dear Daughters, is to oppose this trend».

– This word is used in yet another way which can cause confusion: the world, as opposed to the monastery, is the mass of people who live their Christian lives in a way that is very praiseworthy and blessed by the sacrament of marriage, but which is different from that of Christians who consecrate themselves to God in the priesthood or by celibacy by the vows of religion and the practice of the evangelical counsels, and in conformity with a Rule approved by the Church.

That world is neither wicked nor cursed: God has willed it and sanctity flourishes in it, but it is distinct from the world of consecrated people. To return to it after having renounced it can be an act of infidelity. St. Paul, abandoned by one of his "faithful helpers" writes sadly about him: «Demas has left me through love of the world».

AVOIDANCE OR PRESENCE?

The real Lasallian paradox consists in shunning the world in order to be closer to it.

It is important to grasp the exact meaning of the teachings of St. John Baptist de La Salle. He is not unaware of the need that teachers have to have social contacts.

«Your duties oblige you to have occasional relations with the world» (Med. 127, 2).

He advises, then, much less a physical separation which, however, he still insists on as far as possible, than a kind of effective but prudent presence, following the recommendation of St. Paul who says we should give up all our "worldly ambitions" and «be self-restrained and live good and religious lives here in this present world» (Titus 2, 12). And so in his Meditations he says the following:

«St. Leo forbade religious to meddle with secular matters» (114). «Hold in horror all frequentation of it (the world) and have no communication with those who are in it except in so far as it is necessary» (Med. 182, 1). «Beware lest you imbibe its spirit» (Med. 127, 2).

He ask us to behave in it as religious:

«Learn from this Saint to live and move in the world without participating in its corruption, its views or its maxims» (Med. 174, 3).

And the desire to renounce the world:

«Have you so completely rid yourself of it as to never think of it? Are you quite free of every attachment?» (Med. 144, 1)

According to him, to be in the world is like being for a short time in a place of work:

«You will not cause your name to be noised abroad, but you will be in the world merely as passers-by, occupied solely in the work of God, causing Jesus to live in the hearts of those he has given you to instruct» (Med. 6, 2)

The Founder's greatest wish is that the presence of the Brother in the world should bear witness to love for Christ and the neighbour; and that this presence be a burning light constantly fed but never dimmed by it.

«Your faith should be... a beacon for those whom you instruct» (Med. 178, 1)

And from St. Paul he borrows the following idea which is dear to him: «We are Christ's incense to God for those who are being saved and for those who are not» (2 Cor. 2, 15).

«Your employment requires that you should have some communication with outsiders. Be on your guard to be ever a subject of edification... So act that your exterior appearance, all your words and actions may breathe virtue. It is only for this reason that God wishes you to go out. Prepare yourself in your retreat to comply with his intentions» (Med. 98, 2).

Finally, the Saint wishes this presence in the world to be a real and effective apostolate, in accordance with Jesus' instructions to his apostles: «and I commissioned you to go out and to bear fruit» (John 15, 16). The Founder too sends his Brothers out into the world and tells them that the best way to make their apostolate effective is to stay away from the world (cf. Med. 146, 143).

He returns often to the same ideas, and like a blacksmith hammering on his anvil, he forges solid convictions. And so a religious lives in the world like a soldier well-armed for the battle ahead, or like a workman fully equipped for his work.

S. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE

AND OPENNESS TO THE WORLD (2/2)

PRESENCE IN THE WORLD AND INTIMACY WITH GOD

Lasallian spirituality is constantly concerned with two things: to avoid everything in the world which is an obstacle to a life of union with God; and to attain intimacy with God so as to be more effective in one's apostolate.

However, if the Founder fears over-familiarity with the world to this extent, it is not because he questions the goodwill of the Brothers, but rather because he wishes to protect them from a very real danger. He wants also to ensure that they have the necesary peace and quiet for union with God.

«The less you converse with men, the more will God communicate himself to you» (Med. 111, 1)

He sees this peace as being necessary for interior life:
«In the restfulness of solitude, forgotten by the world and occupied only with the thought of our sins and of the way to live holily, we find God and can seek to please him» (Med. 174, 2).

Union with God is essential if our apostolate is to be effective in the world: a lamp that has gone out gives no light:
«As you stand in need of both these things (the Spirit of God and zeal) you should seek retirement from the world where neither can be found. As Our Lord has said: "For the truth-giving Spirit the world can find no room, because it cannot see him, cannot recognise him". This is because the maxims and practices which the Spirit of God inspires are clean contrary to those of the world» (Med. 189, 2).

And he continues elsewhere:
«It is frequent intercourse with the world which usually destroys religious, because such associations withdraw them from the communications they should hold with God. There can be no alliance between the Spirit of God and that of the world. Hence, we no sooner become impregnated with the spirit of the one than we lose the other» (Med. 174, 3).

The Saint returns constantly to the cause and effect relationship between union with God and effective presence in the world. They are like the weft and warp of the tapestry of our religious life:

«Since you have left the world in order to lead a life above the merely natural life and human inclinations, so that you can labour for the salvation of your neighbour, your whole study should be to seek God alone. You should apply yourself to the ministry to which he has called you, and devote yourself entirely to spiritual things» (Med. 58, 3).

Like a weaver's shuttle, we dart from one to the other:
«You should love retirement which enables you to work efficaciously at your own perfection, but you should leave it when God requires you to labour for the salvation of the souls he has entrusted to your care. But, after the example of St. Anthony, you should return at once to your solitude when your task has been accomplished» (Med. 97, 3).

PRESENCE OR SEPARATION?

A religious is a consecrated person, separated by his state from Christians living in the world, but living among them as leaven in dough.

In our own days, the Conciliar Decree "Perfectae Caritatis" has clearly defined the meaning of the religious state, the consecration of its members, and their separation from the world, whatever the nature of their apostolate:
«The members of each community should recall above everything else that by their profession of the evangelical counsels they have given answer to a divine call to live for God alone... (and they) should combine contemplation with apostolic love. By the former they adhere to God in mind and heart; by the latter they strive to associate themselves with the work of redemption and to spread the kingdom of God» (Chap. 5).

It follows that one cannot say that religious and lay Christians in the world are identical, although the latter also are bound by their baptismal vows to bear witness in the world.

This separation which characterises religious was stressed by Pope Paul VI when he spoke to the members of the General Chapter on June 7th 1966:
«You are religious, consecrated, and men of the Church».

The Founder's thinking on this point is inspired by the words of Jesus to his Apostles: «My choice withdrew you from the world» (john 15, 19), and can be summarised as follows: the religious educator has to live in the midst of the world, without belonging to the world, without adopting its way of thinking:
«Have no communication with it (the world)... Do not suffer that it should have any access to you, lest by dealing with it you contract its spirit» (Med. 41, 2).

LOVE OR INTIMACY?

It is true that one cannot achieve anything without love, but it is important to avoid ambivalence. It is not the world that one hates, but what is evil in it; and the world itself, only in so far as it identifies itself with the evil that is in it. St. John is very clear about this: «You must not love this passing world or anything that is in the world. The love of the Father cannot be in any man who loves the world» (1 John, 2, 15). St. James says something similar: «Making the world your friend is making God your enemy» (James, 4, 4).

St. John Baptist de La Salle cannot be accused of exaggeration when he says:

«Are you completely disgusted with the world?» (Med. 174, 2)

«Do you hold in disgust all that constitutes the pleasure of worldlings?» (Med. 144, 1).

He quotes St. Paul to show the incompatibility between love for the world and love for Christ: «If I still wanted that (man's approval), I should not be what I am – a servant of Christ» (Med. 182, 1)

In fact, did not our Divine Master say: «If the world hates you, remember that it hated me before you» (John 15, 18)? The Founder bases himself often on this text to encourage his followers to bear patiently the difficulties the world puts in their way.

PRESENCE OR ASSIMILATION?

Presence in the world must not mean fusion, identification or assimilation. We must keep our religious, consecrated and separated character as described by the Council. This is exactly what St. John Baptist de La Salle thought:

«You ought, as St. Paul says, "to be clothed in the new self, which is created in God's image, justified and sanctified through the truth"» (Med. 60, 2).

«Have you given up your worldly ways? Your manner of life, no less than your habit, should be entirely different from that of worldlings» (Med. 60, 1).

In our own days (1968), the Vicar of Christ has much the same thing to say, as we can see from the audience he held on December 11th 1968:

«We deplore the attitude of certain priests who, in order to come closer to the world, believe that by changing the way they dress and by living in the world like lay people, they can come closer to the world. Such a form of identification gives the immediate impression of making contact. Let us be careful, however, that this contact does not make the priest lose his efficaciousness and his specific role, this role which distinguishes him, which places him in the midst of people to whom he is called to preach the message and with whom he must not become assimilated socially and materially».

And St. John Baptist de La Salle had this to say:

«People ought to be able to distinguish a person who is consecrated to God from an ordinary secular by his appearance and by the way in which he behaves, for he owes edification not only to the wise but to all, as St. Paul says» (Med. 92, 2).

There is also in this context, the famous allocution of Pope Paul VI, given on November 16th 1966, to the members of the General Congregation of the Jesuits:

«Some were under the illusion that, in order to spread the Gospel, it was necessary to adopt the ways of the world, its ways of thinking and acting, and its profane character. By doing so they forgot that, if a herald of Christ has the apostolic duty to come close to the people to whom he has to deliver the message of Christ, he cannot become identified with them in such a way that the salt loses its taste, and the apostle his specific strenght».

CONCLUSION

St. John Baptist de La Salle considered well-judged contact with the world to be so important, that he included it in his final recommendation on his death bed. The last will and testament of a Founder is as precious for his followers as that of a father for his sons:

«If you wish to preserve and die in your vocation, have nothing to do with people of the world; because, little by little, you will start to appreciate the way they act, and you will become so involved in their conversations that, through tact, you will not be able to avoid showing agrement with what they say however harmful it may be. This will lead you to be unfaithful, and once you no longer observe your Rules, you will lose interest in your vocation and eventually abandon it» (Blain).

The Saint's 40 years spent in founding the Institute, and the experience of religious throughout history, show that flirting with the world is to play with fire.

This teaching is demanding and austere. It is the teaching of the Gospel: it is the narrow and rough road which leads to God and true happiness here below. There is no suffering to compare with that of a divided heart that gives itself at the same time to the world and to God; or an overburdened heart where God and the world are in competition. St. John Baptist de La Salle joins St. Augustine in saying:

«Mere trifles hold me back and prevent me from belonging wholly to God» (Med. 173, 2).

On the other hand, how great is the joy of a heart free from all attachments to the world and its demands!

Jesus said to his Apostles: «Be brave: I have conquered the world» (John 16, 33). His victory ensures our own, and the Holy Spirit assures us of this: «Anyone who has been begotten by God has already overcome the world; this is the victory over the world – our faith» (1 John, 5, 4). Inspired by these words, the Founder advises his followers:

«Faith should lead you to despise what the world esteems» (Med. 96, 2).

His final words are to them:

«How happy are you to share the same lot as these Apostles, and the advantage of having left the world» (Med. 182, 1).

THE PARISH SCHOOL (1654)

AND THE CONDUCT OF SCHOOLS (1720):

A STUDY IN CONTRASTS

The "official" manual for primary schoolteacher education in France during the second half of the 17th century was the Parish School by Jacques De Betancourt, a priest at the parish of St. Nicolas du Chardonnais in Paris, who wrote the book after 18 years' experience teaching in the parish schools. Lasallian researchers tell us that the Parish School was a "source" book for John Baptist De La Salle when he wrote the Conduct of Schools.

It is true that there is very little in the Conduct of Schools which was not previously contained in the Parish School. Both books treat identical topics such as: qualities of teachers, admission policy and practice, school building and furnishings, student "offices," rewards and punishments, teaching prayers, catechism and the 3R's. Nevertheless, two major differences have historically contrasted the two works: charging fees from students who could afford them and teaching Latin syntax and grammar, neither of which were part of the program in the Conduct of Schools.

However, both the topical similarities and the financial and curricular differences are deceptive in the sense that they tend to distract us from other important but less obvious differences between these two pedagogical works. As a matter of fact, when De La Salle wrote the Conduct of Schools, he radically departed from the approach of his "source" book, the Parish School. The objective of this article is to outline eleven contrasts between the Parish School and the Conduct of Schools and thereby, hopefully, to present a complete picture of De La Salle's transformation of the established text in teacher education.

(1) The Parish School is based upon the long but limited experience of one teacher. The Conduct of Schools is the product of the shared classroon experiences of a teaching "faculty" acting in a process of correction and updating. It is very likely that De La Salle wrote the Conduct of Schools from notes taken at the "many conferences held with his teachers."

(2) The Parish School is a single publication, whereas the Conduct of Schools is one work in a pedagogical system which includes, among other works, the Meditations for the Time of Retreat and the Common Rules. These works complement the Conduct of Schools and provide it with a new "pedagogical spirit" without which the Conduct of Schools would otherwise remain just a training manual, as is the Parish School.

(3) The Parish School is structured into three parts from "the top down." Part One begins with administrative concerns: qualities to look for in hiring a teacher, building maintenance and furnishing, and teacher assistance needed to maintain large enrollments (80-100). Part Two deals with piety: teaching catechism and prayers. Not until Part Three does the Parish School consider the essentials of teaching: learning methods, the daily schedule, and points of order and discipline. The Conduct of Schools is also structured into three parts but "from the ground up." Part One deals with the daily tasks required of the teacher in order to help the teacher make it through the day. Part One explains the daily schedule and provides a chapter containing directions on classroom management and teaching method for each successive activity and subject to be taught. Part Two deals with ways and means of obtaining order and discipline without alienating the students in order to help the teacher make it through the year. Part Two is really a treatise on building the sense of community in students with the result that they will want to come to school. Part Three organizes school administration as a teacher-support system in order to help the teacher make it through a career of teaching. Part Three describes the duties of the formateur in an initial teacher-formation program designed to help the beginning teacher "to get rid of bad habits and to acquire good habits necessary for effective teaching." Part Three also describes the duties of the Inspector of Schools in an in-service development program designed to help the teacher in the classroom on a day-to-day basis to master matters of judgment in teaching and management.

(4) The Parish School is modeled after a seminary manual which logically deduces the qualities needed in a teacher according to the theological and moral virtues. De Betancourt fit his teaching experiences into these predetermined categories; whereas De La Salle inductively discovers the qualities of the effective teacher by allowing the successful classroom experiences to provide the categories which characterize effective teaching. Part Three of the Conduct of Schools describes the undesirable qualities to be eliminated by a beginning teacher: talkativeness, fickleness, fidgetiness, giddiness, indifference, familiarity, harshness, spitefulness, particlity, negligence, faintheartedness; and it describes the desirable qualities to be acquired by a beginning teacher: vigor, firmness, reserve, vigilance, self-control, skill in teaching, prudence, friendliness, zeal, ability to communicate. Clearly these qualities describe the good or bad affects of a teacher in the classroom. They are not deduced from a seminary manual. This conclusion also applies to the traditional list of the 12 qualities of the good teacher.

(5) The Parish School presents an ambiguous view of the primary teacher when De Betancourt concludes that "humility puts the seal on the virtues of the teacher." Apparently in the last analysis De Betancourt identifies the lowly position of primary teaching with the lowly image of the primary teacher. De La Salle, on the other hand, does not cease to speak in the Meditations for the Time of Retreat of the primary teacher in lofty terms as a minister of grace sharing in a sacerdotal ministry which the Apostles reserved for themselves.

(6) The Parish School employs the traditional approach to teaching. The students recite in rotation, "two by two", before the teacher. The curriculum gives priority to Latin over French, and the teacher gives preference to the Latin students who occupy the first place in the classroom. Unfortunately, slower students and those who study to read only French seem to be treated as "second-class" students and dealt with less patiently than their brighter counterparts. The Conduct of Schools, on the other hand, presents an innovative program which not only excludes the study of Latin grammar from the curriculum but also begins teaching reading in French without prior knowledge of Latin pronunciation. The Conduct of Schools also organizes student recitations into a "simultaneous method" wherein the correction of one become the correction of all. Lastly, the Conduct of Schools gives preference to the poor and solwer students who are to receive more attention and care from the teacher.

(7) The author of the Parish School has a "theological" view of schooling. Such a view is made clear in the description of the teacher according to the theological and moral virtues, and in the lengthy description given to the various catechisms in the curriculum of piety. In the Conduct of Schools De La Salle, on the contrary, demonstrates that he has a "psychological" view of the teacher and the student. His use of "psychology" is most apparent first in his analysis of the causes for student difficulty in learning, misbehavior and absenteeism, and secondly in his description and recommended treatment of the various types of problem children.

(8) The Parish School offers a "preparatoy" program of studies which prepares students to go on to "the next level of schooling." Surprisingly De Betancourt encourages the teacher to seek out financial aid for the economically poor but bright students who could not afford to go on. The Conduct of Schools offers a "terminal" program which prepares poor students for work and for life. When parents request from De La Salle more schooling for their child, further studies will be in vocational or general studies, not in preparatory studies for higher education.

(9) The Parish School gives an ecclesiastical and doctrinal flavor to the curriculum of piety. Frequently students are excused from class to act as servers for the parish masses. Detailed description are given of the several catechisms used in the preparation and reception of the sacraments, and detailed practices are held for the processions held on feast days. In the Conduct of Schools the section on teaching catechism emphasizes the art of questioning for understanding and the practices of virtuous living in daily life. De La Salle puts more emphasis on living in religion than on doctrine. One could say, in contrast to the Parish School, that the Conduct of Schools puts a layman's emphasis on religious study and practice. It is not without significance along these lines that De La Salle did not allow the Brothers to teach catechism in the church building.

(10) The Parish School presents a fragmented curriculum which is divided into a curriculum of piety and a curriculum of knowledge which, in turn, is subdivided into a study of Latin and a study of French. The students also are separated from each other on the basis of curriculum and finance: those who study Latin from those who read only in French; those who pay fees from those can not afford them. Whereas in the Conduct of Schools the curriculum unfolds as an integral part of the daily schedule. Prayer and catechism are distinct but not separated from the three R's. No distinctions are made in the placement of students, economically poor or well-off. All students read French, and students are dealt with on their own merits. Two characteristics of De La Salle's school were an integrated curriculum and student body.

(11) The Parish School employes a teacher assistance program that delegates the teaching authority of the classroom teacher. The assistant teacher, hired for a class enrolled with 80 to 100 students, is responsible for teaching deignated subjects to certain students, and student officers also are allowed to be involved directly in teaching and correcting other students. De La Salle, on the other hand, is very strict about keeping the authority in the classroom focused in the teacher. He keeps the class enrollment small (50-60 students!) with one teacher. Only on a temporary basis might begining teachers attend the class to "learn this new method of teaching". Student officers were never directly involved in teaching as such or in the correction of other students: they were employed only to hear practice recitations and to be models for the slower students; they were employed only to hear practice recitations and to be models for the slower students; they were assigned only to watch over the students and to report to the teacher, never to intervene with the misbehaving student.

In review we list the contrasts between the Parish School and the Conduct of Schools as the following: a single publication vs. one of a system; isolated individual experience vs. shared group experiences; logical vs. experiential development; ambiguous vs. lofty view of teaching; deductive vs. inductive thinking; traditional vs. innovative methodology; theological vs. psychological understanding; college preparatoy vs. terminal programming; doctrinal vs. living religion; ecclesiastical vs. lay concerns; fragmented vs. integrated curriculum and student body; divided vs. reserved authority.

This article has been offered as another example of how De La Salle who was at grips with the primary teacher education program of his time inaugurated a new approach in contrast to the Parish School in order to achieve the true and the beautiful and the good in primary education.

THE BEATIFICATION OF THE MARTYR BROTHERS OF TURON AND THE BROTHER JAIME HILARIO

Pope John Paul II's address at the audience for pilgrims

(Monday April 30, 1990)

1. The solemn beatification of eleven Servants of God, martyred for Christ, and sons of Spain's noble land, gives me an opportunity to hold this most welcome meeting with you who have come to Rome to honour the new Beati and take part in this great demonstration of faith and Church fellowship.

On this happy occasion I wish to greet especially the Brothers of the Christian Schools and their many students and former students here presents, as well as the members of the Passionist congregation. Let us all honour together the eight Brothers and Father Inocencio de la Inmaculada, martyred in Turon, Asturias, and Brother Jaime Hilario who shed his blood in Tarragona.

2. These eleven martyrs, apart from sharing a rich spiritual personality, forged by fidelity and dedication to their vocation, have in common also the fact they were all teachers and educators of young people. School gave them the opportunity to stay close to children and young people, to listen to them, to love them, to accompany and help them in their growth as human beings and Christians. This is what these Brothers and Sister Maria Mercedes did, because they believed in the great value of their educational and religious mission in the service of children and young people. They wished to be faithful to the noble cause of the Catholic school, the distinctive purpose of which is, as the Vatican II Council says, «to create for the school community an atmosphere enlivened by the Gospel spirit of freedom and charity... so that the light of faith will illumine the knowledge which students gradually gain of the world, of life and of mankind» (Gravissimum Educationis, 8). And so they did not hesitate to shed their blood and thus bear witness to their faith in an exceptional way.

These martyrs should provide an incentive for all Christian teachers and especially for religious to dedicate themselves totally to an apostolate which is so worthwhile and necessary in our days. St. John Baptist de La Salle had this in mind when he said to the Brothers of his Institute: «You must not doubt that it is a great gift of God, this grace he has given you to be entrusted with the instruction of children, to announce the Gospel to them and to bring them up in the spirit of religion» (Med. 201).

3. These words tell us that the Catholic school is a privileged place in which children and young people discover God in their lives and are trained to be true Christians, witnesses to their faith and followers of Christ. But this training and evangelisation can be brought about only by men and women of faith, who through their religious consecration share their experience of God with young people and who are prepared also to give their lives for him and for them, as the new Beati did.

Heroic actions are not improvised. They are the result of a whole life of renunciation and abnegation. This is the kind of witness that we find in particular in Blessed Maria Mercedes Prat, who is remembered as beign a humble and pleasant religious, always ready to be of service to others.

Similarly striking is Brother Jaime Hilario's dedication to God, borne out by the following words he wrote: «The day you give yourself totally to God, you will enter a whole new world, as has happened to me. You will enjoy a kind of peace and tranquility you have never experienced before, even on the happiest days of your life«.

4. Before ending, I should like to say a few words to you, teachers, parents, and students of the Brothers of the Christian Schools or of the Company of St. Teresa of Jesus. As Christians and members of Spanish society, you should be aware that institutes involved in social work, which the Church itself or other institutions support, are not restricted to a purely religious or ethical plane, but offer society valuable service, stimulating cultural, civic and religious life, constantly aware of the needs of contemporary progress.

This same second Vatican Council, recognising that parents are those who are primarily and principally responsible for the education of their children, defends their right to total freedom in the choice of schools. In this way it is possible to opose the temptation to impose an educational system which would deny the inalienable right of parents in the name of healthy pluralism, and which «would militate against the native rights of the human person, the development and spread of culture itself, the peaceful association of citizens, and the pluralism which exists today in very many societies» (Gravissimum Educationis, 6).

«For this reason the Church gives high praise to those civil authorities and civil societies that show regard for the pluralistic character of modern society, and take into account the right of religious liberty, by helping families in such a way that in all schools the education of their children can be carried out according to the moral and religious convictions of each family» (Ibid. 7). In this way, civic legislation will be enriched by important spiritual and ethical values.

In the fervent hope that the beloved Sapanish people, ever faithful to their Christian roots, will continue at the present time also to promote culture and peaceful coexistence, with affection I impart the Apostolic Blessing to you all, to your families and to the educational communities of your Institutes.

EXTRACT FROM THE POPE'S HOMILY AT THE BEATIFICATION MASS

St. Peter's words in the second reading remind us that «the blood of Christ, the spotless lamb» (1 Pt. 1:19) was the price paid for our redemption and salvation. Thus it is consoling to state that in Church history there have been very many Christian men and women who have imitated Jesus Christ in the supreme act of shedding their blood, and at the same time were his witnesses in difficult situations of persecution. In this solemn Eucharist, then, the Church puts forward some of these Christian for veneration and reflection by all.

First among them we remember the community of eight Brothers of the Christian Schools of Turon (Asturias, Spain) who in 1934, together with the Passionist religious Father Inocencio de la Inmaculada, were led to death without giving any resistance. In the eyes of their persecutors, they were guilty of having dedicated their lives to the human and Christian education of youth in the Catholic school of Our Lady of Covadonga in that mining town.

The Passionist priest met occasionally with the De La Salle Brothers. In that way, God in his inscrutable providence wished to unite in martydom members of two congregations who workerd in solidarity for the Church's one mission. This fact which might seem circumstantial, is truly significant, since it makes clear to us the unity, interdependence and collaboration which must wxist between religious congregations in the church, especially in our time, in order to face up to the challenge of the new evangelisation.

BEATIFICATION OF THE MARTYRS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS 1934 - 1937

The martyrs who were beatified yesterday by His Holiness, John-Paul II, are a source of joy for the Catholic Chruch. They are heroic witnesses to the Christian faith. They witnessed to their faith in and their love for Jesus Christ with their own lives. It is the Holy Spirit who awakened in them faith, hope and love, and it is the same Spirit who sustained them in fidelity and perseverance to the very last moment of their painful passion. Because of this they have become for us an honour, and for the Church an outstanding example. They are now, for us all, powerful intercessors in heaven where they enjoy the reward of their dedication to the cause of the Gospel.

We thank God today for this new gift which He has given to his Church by the glorification of nine martyrs. We share in the joy of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, of the Passionist Fathers and of the Sisters of the Society of Saint Teresa who see their martyrologies enriched by these new martyrs. We, bishops and priests who are concelebrating, together with all of you who are participating in this Eucharist, are happy to represent the various dioceses and regions where the newly beatified were born and where they died: Barcelona, Buenos Aires (Argentina), Burgos, Cantabria, Guadalajara, Lugo (Mondoñedo), Seo de Urgell (Lérida), Tarragona, and the Asturias. To me, as archbishop of Oviedo belongs the honour of presiding at this celebration and of represennting the Asturian diocese where the martyrs of Turon shed their blood for Christ.

Brothers Cirilo-Beltran (Burgos, 46 years(, Marciano-Jose (Guadalajara, 324 years), Victorian-Pio (Burgos, 29 years), Julian-Alfredo (Leon, 31 years), Benjamin-Julian (Burgos, 26 years), Augusto-Andres (Santander, 24 years), Benito de Jesus (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 24 years), Aniceto-Adolfo (Santader, 22 years) formed the Community of the Brothers of the Christian Schools in the mining valley of Turon near Mieres. Arrested with them was Fr. Inocencio de la Inmaculada (Lugo, 47 years), a Passionist priest who was about to celebrate Mass in the college when the Brothers were arrested on the orders of the revolutionary Committee. Led to the House of the People, they were all condemned to death because they were religious and executed near the wall of the cemetery on 9th October 1934.

At the beatification of this group of witnesses the Pope added the name of another member of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, Brother Jaime-Hilario (Seo de Urgell, 39 years) who was martyred at Tarragona and that of the Teresian Sister Mercedes Prat (Barcelona, 56 years) who were martyred at Tarragona and Barcelona respectively during the Spanish civil war (1936 - 1939).

On the occasion of the beatification of the martyrs it is inevitable that I should refer to the circumstances of their death, to the historic context in which their martyrdom took place. If it is properly understood, the glorification of the martyrs invites us to overlook the causes of the injustice which led to the deaths of innocent people. It is a cause for reflection for the society which endured the sectarian intolerance of political groups which went so far as to ruin the peace of society and to destroy harmony among the peoples.

The hatred of religion shown by the extremist leaders of the revolution of 1934 and of the civil war of 1936 - 39 in Sapin is an undeniable fact of history. In those circumstances the fact of belonging to a religious order, of being a priest or simply a fervent practising Catholic, could, at the height of anti-religious fury, lead to death.

How was it possible to reach such a point of confrontation among a people so deeply religious as the people of Spain? That is an important question which must find a calm, objective answer as more light is thrown on the revolutionary processes of those years and as the historic facts are studied with calm objectivity.

I have not intention of dwelling of these considerations which, on this joyful occasion, are of secondary importance. The motive which compels the Church to act in the cause of the martyrs is not one of political or social revendication. It is entirely "religious". The Church wishes to highlight the example of heroic death for the faith because such a death is "precious in the sight of the Lord" and is a divine gift which should stimulate us believers to live in a manner consistent with our beliefs and with the first commandment of the Law of God; «Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and above all things».

I invite you to look on the death of the martyrs with the eyes of faith, as a fact whose realization was part of God's plan, according to the prophetic vision unveiled for us by Christ: «You are not of this world. The world will hate you as it has hated me» (John 15: 18-21). That divine vision, according to faith and divine Providence is the back-drop to the death of the witness of Christ. Has Our Lord not warned us that we would be persecuted and that our persecutors would event think that they were serving the cause of justice?

The hatred breathed out in Spain at that time against the Church and religion was presented as the defence of a just cause. At the instigation of demagogic and sectarian leaders, the Church was often accused of being the cause of all the ills that afflicted Spanish society where the vast majority of people found themselves in misery and in a situation of high unemployment.

The glory of our martyrs does not consist in the fact that they were wrongly accused of complicity in political or social activities. Their glory arises from the fact that the real cause, their being religious or well-known representatives of the Church of Christ, came out clearly and decisively in the summary trial which led to their condamnation and execution. The Church exalts the martyrs, not because they were innocent victims, but because they were faithful witnesses of Christ. That is why she calls them martyrs, that is, witnesses to the risen Lord – witnesses par excellence.

In the death of a martyr shine forth the purity and strength of faith in Christ and the superabondance of Christian love which leads him to declare himself a disciple of Christ, help him to accept death with serenity, sustain him at the supreme moment and enable him to praise God and to die while pardoning his enemies.

The death of a martyr is like the death of Christ on the cross. It is in the peace of his death that the truth of his cause is revealed. «Truly this man was the son of God». The impression created by the death of the martyrs beatified yesterday, is engraved on the hearts of those who murdered them or who were present at their death. The martyrs of Turon prayed for and forgave their executioners. The tranquility of Brother Jaime-Hilario impressed those who fired on him twice without hitting him. Even the bullets respected him according to his biographer. Mother Mercedes Prat recited the Our Father and murmured "Jesus, Mary, Joseph". The attitude of peace and calm with which they died, their rosary beads in their hands and forgiving their executioners while praising God, expressed clearly the purity of their dedication to the cause of Christ and of the Church.

Let us thank God for the gift of these martyrs. They will be the seed from which will come new religious men and women, new priests and new committed Christians.

* * *

In the death of the newly beatified there are values which we should accept with devotion as drops of the blood they shed and as relics which will be the seed of a new life for the whole Church.

They are witnesses of the faith at a time when there is a pressing need to rediscover the necessity of risking our comfort and of confessing our faith even at the cost of our temporal interests.

They are witnesses of the value of the Christian school at a time when so many Christians neglect their duty to provide their children with an integrated education in harmony with their religious beliefs.

They are witnesses of love for the poor by giving their lives for the education of the children of the working classes. I can personally bear witness to the love that the people of the mining valleys of the Asturias have for the Brothers of the Christian Schools. The workers of the Asturias who have attended their schools will never forget the sacrifices and generosity of their educators.

They are witnesses of love of their enemies. The temptation to resist force with force is always there. Nevertheless, «He who uses the sword will persih by the sword». Christ asked us to forgive always, even our enemies, and that our revenge be sincere love for those who persecute and claumniate us. In the last analysis, judgement of persons belong to God and we are asked not to judge our brothers but to give our life for them after the example of Christ. «Father, forgive them for they know not what they do».

Some will say that we are too fearful; others that we are under an illusion or that we are too trusting. As for us, we want to remain faithful to the words of the Master who calls us to be witnesses in his way: «Love one another as I have loved you».

let us imitate the martyrs. Let us be witnesses of the faith and of the love of God in the community of the Church and the world will believe in the Lord.

I READ THE RULE

AND BEGIN TO DREAM...

As I read the Rule, I seem to discover a new message in the text which affects me deeply.

As I read the Rule, I feel new power bursting from this simple, warm, direct, spiritual and fraternal text.

As I read the Rule, I think of all the things going on in the Institute which reflect the wisdom and realism of the Chapter members of 1986 –things that are so varied, so open in character, and things that remain to be completed.

As I read the Rule, I begin to dream how different our lives would be if we fully accepted this inspiring text and lived it naturally, simply, with affection and courage, with creativity and daring.

I feel that there is more inspiration in the text of the Rule than in all the things we do or will do. The reason for this is that the Rule is based on truths that inspire our work and, in a special way, our conversion and interior freedom.

These truths come from the Spirit, for the Rule as well as the whole Institute are the work of the Spirit. «The spirit of the Lord, indeed, fills the whole world, and that which holds all things together knows every word that is said» (Wis.1:7).

As I read the Rule, I see the importance of living as one: unity in diversity. For, although the Rule was written by the Brothers and for the Brothers, it is already a source of inspiration for so-called "Lasallian groups" and for the "Lasallian Family" which include in their number both lay people and Brothers.

As I read the Rule, I feel that the Institute, that is, we the Brothers, must come to accept this new situation. In order to do this, we must become aware of and accept at this particular moment in history a certain number of significant things that are taking place in our midst and all around us.

What, then, in real terms, is the message contained in an article of the Rule such as the following?

«The spiritual gifts which the Church has received in St. John Baptist de La Salle go far beyond the confines of the Institute which he founded.
The Institute sees the existence of the various Lasallian movements as a grace from God renewing its own vitality. The Institute can associate with itself those lay people who want to lead the life of perfection that the Gospel demands, by living according to the spirit of the Institute and by participating in its mission.
The Institute helps them achieve their proper autonomy. At the same time it creates appropriate ties with them and evaluates the authenticity of their Lasallian character« (Rule 146).

The kind of life the Institute led for the first 300 years of its life, and which it considered to be its private and exclusive property, now has to be shared with others if its vitality is to be renewed. The Institute is the work of God, as St. La Salle used to say, and as the Rule says again in our days (articles 141, 143, 66, 15c, and 21). The God of the Covenant, who is able to make all things new (Apoc 21:5) and «because the time has come» (Mk 1:5; cf. Gal 4:4), has chosen to act in a new way and to make his message known beyond the vicissitudes of our history and human fragility on both a personal and community level (cf. Rule 144).

THE GIFT OF GOD

As I read article 146 of the Rule, I stop with a sense of satisfaction at some paragraphs:

- «St. John Baptist is a gift of God. God has acted through him and has revealed himself in him, in his life's journey, and in his work as Founder. And thus the Rule states with joy and hope that St. John Baptist de La Salle goes far beyond the confines of the Institute which he founded».

- In the same way, the Institute he founded is a gift from God and that is why there is a very great need of it for a great many people who see it as a hopeful means for salvation. That is why the Rule urges us to SHARE ITS MISSION (Nº 17a, 132c, 146) and its SPIRITUALITY (Nº 17c).

- Finally, Lasallian movements which have appeared and established themselves among us are also "gifts of God". We might even say that these are in a manner of speaking a "renovative gift within the Institute because they contribute to the feeling that through them the Institute is renewing its own vitality. The RULE is even tentatively beginning to refer to "THE LASALLIAN FAMILY" (Nº 64).

The RULE speaks of "Lasallian movements" as though the charism of St. John Baptist de La Salle is now reaching out beyond the Institute proper and creating many other groups and communities which have and live with a sense of "belonging", a "belonging" not so much to the Institute as to the "Lasallian heritage" which has been preserved and developed within the Institute.

Since it is an "inheritance" which maintains its richness and which grows in the mesure in which it is shared, the Institute invites those who wish "to strive for evangelical perfection according to the spirit proper to the Institute and in accord with its mission to ASSOCIATE themselves with it, be they men or women, Religious or lay.

And so, in all that concerns this ASSOCIATION which is somewhat unique to the Institute of the Christian Brothers in that it involves a committment by VOW to «ASSOCIATION for the service of the poor», we must delve into it more deeply and live it in conjunction with the various LASALLIAN GROUPS which have come into being. Here we are launching into uncharted waters, far beyond the traditional understandings we have had.

I CONTINUE TO READ...

I read the Rule and dream of the progressive extension of such statements as: «the spirit of God has given the Church in the person of St. John Baptist de La Salle a charim which still animates the Brothers and many other teachers» (Nº 20).

Because the LASALLIAN CHARISM is confided to the Brothers and resides in their hearts and in those of many other educators, I dream of how the following texts may read:

«This Institute... creates, renews and diversifies its works according to the needs of the kingdom of God.» (Nº 11)

«In spite of difficulties, by Faith, the Brothers realize that God does not abandon "His work" but rather "He takes pleasure in making it more fruitful day by day"» (Nº 141).

«From the very beginnings of the Institute the Brothers fulfilled their mission "together and by association", exercising their apostolate as members of a community in which they are accepted, supported and affirmed.
... By the fulfillment of their mission, whatever it may be, they contribute to the realization as a community of the unique and ecclesial mission of the Institute» (Nº 16).

All of these statements of the Rule, naturally, are FROM the Brothers and destined FOR them, because they have originated from their manner of life as Christian Brothers and from the charism of their Founder. However, from the moment we personally and institutionally accept that our holy Founder does not belong to us exclusively, then we must also accept that he is free to continue to be the GIFT OF GOD, the evangelical Way for many within and beyond the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, within and beyond all Lasallian groups. And we must always recognize that he has this freedom!

AND I CONTINUE TO DREAM...

As I read the above quoted articles of the Rule, then, I am envisioning a CONVERSION of attitudes and structures: a conversion which frees hearts from fear and self-doubt. This must be a conversion which opens our Communities of Brothers to initiate relationships with Christian teachers and which makes our "together and by association" a reality in the here and now among the diverse elements and levels of the Lasallian Educational Community. It must be "together and by association" that we develop our educational system in study sessions, evaluations, relaxation, prayer and in the celebration of our common Faith. "Together and by association" because we share the same Spirituality and Mission, we drink at the same Lasallian fountain, we are drawn by the same social and ecclesial needs and challenges in the areas of education and evangelization. Above all, we are "together and by association" in the SPIRIT. The Lasallian experience was born as an experience of the SPIRIT and we must not allow it to become primarily an experience of workers and of Labor Unions. The necessary steps must be taken so that, in accord with the educational systems of particular places, both Brothers and Lay collaborators may develop complete understanding, openness, creativity, mutual collaboration and enthusiastic confidence.

I dream of Brothers and Communities in which there is no diffidence toward lay teachers because of an awareness of the richness of our Baptismal committment and the efforts being made to "make their work a truly evangelical ministry" (Nº 17).

I dream of Brothers and Communities which generously open the rich treasures of Lasallian tradition to all those teachers, young people and families who wish to enhance their Christian way of life by means of the teaching of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

I am dreaming of Lasallian Teachers who are serene, open and dedicated to the most needy students, who are able to rise above the tensions of Unions and salary conflicts... who seek only to be real teachers dedicated to the wholesome development of their students, who dedicate themselves totally to teamwork within the Lasallian educational and pastoral system.

I am dreaming of a better definition and description of the NEW place and the NEW role of the Brothers in Lasallian Educational Centers.

I am dreaming of a betterdistribution of responsabilities in Lasallian Schools consistent with the educational outcomes envisioned and with a recognition of the quality of the commitment invested, together with a reasonable amount of scholarship grants for the needy. Because it is an "experience of the Spirit" the Lasallian experience must always rely on a certain quota of gratuity on the part of both the Brothers and the Laity, always taking into consideration their means, times and places.

I am dreaming of the growth of the SENSE OF FAMILY among all Lasallians whose common Father and Founder is St. John Baptist de La Salle. There are myriads of experiences of "together and by association", thanks to the many efforts being made to assure that LASALLIAN INSTITUTIONS be identified by their will to put all the means of salvation within the reach of youth so that they may achieve a high degree of excellent formation as persons while publicly acclaiming Jesus Christ (Nº 13).

I dream while I read, share and meditate on the RULE... and this fills my heart with hope and patience!

THE «AUTORS»

OF THE ORIGINAL RULE

To ask ourselves who the authors were of our original Rule is not simply an academic question. It is a crucial one, because the true understanding of our identity and mission dependes on it.

I. DE LA SALLE IN ASSOCIATION WITH HIS BROTHERS

1. Biographers make two statements with regard to the authorship of the Rule:

a/ It was De La Salle who wrote the Rule. The biographers see three dates as being important before 1726, the year when the Rule was first printed:

- 1682: Practice of the Daily Regulation (community exercices).
- 1694: Collection of Rules (the copy we have is dated 1705).
- 1718: Chapters on modesdy and regularity are added.

In this edition, De La Salle was inspired by the Spirit according to Blain, who writes: «And if this is so... we should not think he was only half inspired. All must follow him to the letter, without exception, without modification.» This is moreover the spirit of the preface of the 1726 Rule. It is probable that Blain wrote it, but his style has improved. It is noticeable that its contents differ from what the Founder profoundly believed. Let us take only two facts: there is no mention of young people, and community is defined in terms of three vows and not consecration. De La Salle wanted men who were totally consecrated to God, living in community, with a view to pursuing their apostolate. This preface was omitted in 1901.

2. Many authors.

It is clear there were several authors, but not in the sense that different persons wrote different parts: techniques used for the Gospel cannot be applied to work out if De La Salle wrote this or that. The whole text was written by De La Salle and by all the Brothers. De La Salle obviously had a leading role in forming a community out of a group of individual and free persons for the salvation of young people. The Rule brought them together and gave them unity.

II. AUTHORS WHO LIVED IN A CHURCH IN THE MIDST OF THE WORLD.

1. A Church in the world.

a/ This was a Church that was weighed down by rigid structures, political and religious conflicts (eg. Fenelon and Bossuet, jansenism and quietism, etc.).

De La Salle did not change the Church, but he wanted a Church that would set out on its way, reach out to the world, to the poor. When he was a Canon he went against social convention and associated with men inferior to his footman, as Blain says (Vol. I, p. 169).

De La Salle wanted people to be prepared to move from a clerical Church into a Church that was the People of God. This dynamic thinking regarding the Church can be seen in the Rule (cf. insistence on the lay nature, brotherhood, community spirit...)

b/ It was a Church that was carried along on a wave of spiritual enthusiasm. There were spiritual, pastoral and missionary renewal movements. From the point of religion, the 17th century has been called the «grand siecle» of the soul (Daniel Rops).

– It was a century when the Bible came to the fore, and changes in attitude to communion occurred regarding frequency of reception, for example.

– The was a renewal in parish life

– Liturgical prayer was restored

– Men and women came together for prayer and to deepen their spiritual life, as well as for the purpose of organising the renewal of the Church.

In a word, there was much spiritual searching going on. (Moliere would have something to say about religious hypocrites in his Tartuffe). There was also a desire for prayer. «Methods of mental prayer were all the rage» wrote H. Brenond.

As far as the Brothers were concerned, De La Salle gave priority to mental prayer, the spirit of faith, the presence of God, and interior recollection as an interior support of the Institute. All these enabled the Brothers to live with throes of a mass mystical movement.

c/ It was a Church in the midst of the world tortured by the cries of young people deprived of education and of the Gospel. Article 1 of the Rule speaks of this:

«As he became aware, by God's grace, of the human and spiritual distress of "the children of the artisans and the poor", John Baptist de La Salle devoted himself to forming schoolmasters totally dedicated to teaching and to Christian education.»

The basis and justification of our identity and mission are to be found in these cries of distress from society. And so, consecration, Christian education especially through the school, free education, special concern for poor children, faith and zeal manifested in a lay community are the basic values on which the Lasallian community is founded. The Founder wanted schools «to be well run» and the Good News to be preached to the poor.

d/ It was a Church in the midst of the world marked by the foundation of traditional and new types of communities. By way of illustration, there were among others:

– The Salon of Mme Acarie (Barbe Aurilot, cousin of Berulle) in Paris. Its members discussed the reform of the monasteries and the foundation of new congregations.

– The Tuesday Conferences. This was a gatherin of ecclesiastics which took place every Tuesday at St. Lazare and was led by St. Vincent de Paul. Its purpose was «to speak about virtue and the duties of state». Or their number, about 20 became bishops, including Godeau, Pavillon and J. B. Bossuet.

– The Company of the Blessed Sacrament. It was founded in Paris in 1627 by the duc de Ventadour. Its membership was mainly lay, but included priests also like Olier, Vincent de Paul and later, Bossuet. The Company did charitable work (hospitals, prisons, ill and afflicted people); worked for the protection of Christian morals; strove to awaken the consciences of those in power (clergy, magistrates, the Court), and to offer support to organisations not belonging to it. Gaston de Renty (1611-1649), a married person with a family, was the leading light in the Company for many years.

III. AUTHORS... INSPIRED AND SUPPORTED BY THREE INSEPARABLE FACTORS.

At this point, we should say that, basically, what is essential is not to know who wrote the Rule, for it is something the whole community contributed to. What is important is to realise that:

1/ De La Salle and Brothers did no form an association in order to write a Rule. The Rule was not the point of departure. That was God. God who had seen the human and spiritual distress of poor children.

2/ The text produced by the community was meant to help the community life of ots members who had accepted to bear witness «together and by association». By association, because all:

a. had allowed God into their lives. It was their call to help one another to search for God.

b. had been moved by the distress of children to help them to have life, and have it more abundantly. They were associated by and in a God of love for the sake of an apostolate.

c. had accepted to belong to the one and same fraternity.

3/ It is in the name of this fraternity that the community gradually set up structures (schools, communities with rules, assemblies, vows) for the Christian education of poor children.

These factors are central to the observance of the Rule. Brothers who became holy did so not by the literal observance of the Rule, but because they understood these factors enshrined by the Rule and bassed their lives on them. In this sense, the Rule is spiritual. The spiritual dimension includes life in its entirety and consists in fidelity to the Spirit. It is not like an extra floor you add to life. These factors (God, the needs of children and fraternity) are inseparable.

IV. WHAT DOES ALL THIS IMPLY FOR US TODAY?

1. The 1987 General Chapter and Rule were of historic importance for the Institute. They call upon us to look into the future, if only just a little. As Gaston Berger said, we Brothers should not «crawl backwards into the future», with our eyes steadily fixed on the past. In his January 1988 Letter, Brother Superior calls upon us to «let go of whatever is holding us back and move off in the direction indicated to us by our new Rule» (p. 38). This is not meant to be a Lasallian version of a general clear-out; but past models that paralyse, that inhibit or prevent the growth of the Institute must be abandoned.

2. We have to admit this is a demanding task. Our Rule is demanding.

Less prescriptive and normative, the Rule appeals more to the creativity of Brothers. It is a Rule that inspires, that is spiritual and creative. To abandon accepted models and to strike out in a new direction is never easy. For most of us, change is difficult; for some, extremely dificult.

3. It has to be said finally that we need God's grace and mutual support. Faithful to Jesus Christ, to his Gospel and to his Spirit (Rule 142); convinced that God does not abandon his work but is pleased to make it bring forth more fruit each day, (Rule 141); we must have faith in the future because we know in whom we have placed our trust. Let us always work «together and by association» for the vitality of the Lasallian Institute, convinced as was our Founder that «there is a great need for our Institute».

VOCATION CRISIS:

A COMMUNITY'S

SELF-FULFILLING PROPHECY (1/2)

Since the mid-sixties there has been a steady decline in the number of women and men who are choosing the religious style of living. The average age of community members continues to rise. Retirement houses are bursting at the seams while novitiates stand idle and empty or have been converted for other uses. Religious communities have been forced to examine personnel commitments which the group has made, to redefine the kind of presence which they will have in institutions, to withdraw from certain ministries and to consolidate others.

There are some analysts, sociologists and other experts, who paint a grim picture of the future for religious communities. From the perspective of those historians who have put this phenomenon in the context of the total history of religious life we see that there have been other times when a «vocation crisis» has led to renewal and revitalization. Along with these historians there are visionaries who describe the future of religious life and outline its possibilities.

Simultaneous with the described «vocation crisis», religious communities are experiencing radical changes. There are changes in self-understanding, styles of prayer, community, theology of vows, manner of dress, etc. There are new forms of ministry which do not necessitate a group commitment. In short, the uniformity which at one time characterized the religious life style has changed to plurality and diversity of life styles. The basic structure remains: some form of community, prayer, ministry, vowed life and celibacy.

All of the above is important to the continuing dialogue and subsequent plans of action for communities as they prepare for the future. There is, though, at least one more perspective on the «vocation crisis» which is as significant and calls for the same consideration.

IS THERE A DEATH WISH?

For many religious communities, the past twenty year experience has been exciting, new, meaningful and hope-filled while at the same time tumultuous, confusing, perplexing and uncertain. The community's pastoral ministry of vocations today evokes confusion and uncertainty about its present identity and its future. Because religious communities are unclear about their corporate image, they are uncertain about what to present to potential members and those who influence their choices. A religious community needs to address this confusion and uncertainty before vocation ministry within the community can be effective.

The experiences of the diminishment, aging, consolidation and radical change in life style are impacting on the group's view of the future. It is essential for the religious community to assess its present attitude about the future. It is especially important for the community to assess the impact that declining numbers has had on the group's attitude toward and belief in a future FOR THEMSELVES. The group's perspective is one of the most important factors in shaping the process of revitalization and renewal.

Some religious communities believe that the «vocation crisis» cannot be addressed. They hold that there are too many sociological and cultural factors which are determining the group's future. They believe that there are many things which militate against a person chosing to be a member of their group. These factors seem to be beyond their control. They feel that they are powerless victims and refuse any responsibility for what is happening. They will not acknowledge that they are potential agents for change. Theses communities will not believe that they can influence the course which the future will take. The «vocation crisis» is happening to them. More accurately, they are allowing the experience of diminishment to have more power than it should. If the group has this pervasive attitude, the «vocation crisis» will become a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Societal and cultural influences do have a powerful impact on the vocation picture in the Church. These influences, though, are given more power than they deserve and can paralyze a group. More importantly, they can shape the groups's view of the future by robbing a religious community of its own power to effect change.

If a religious community believes that they are powerless to affect what, at best, is an uncertain future, then this will be automatically conveyed to others. Those to whom they minister will sense their fear and anxiety. Those who might consider membership would be shunned by this unspoken and subtle death wish. No person would choose to work for a corporation who believed it would be bankrupt in a matter of time. No person would board a ship which was to be ser adrift to be tossed about by the elements. Nor would any person take a membeship in a health club where all the members allow their physical condition to deteriorate because they have no desire to improve.

MOTIVATION FOR VOCATION MINISTRY

A related attitude among some religious which also shuns potential members is the yearning for the time in their history before the «vocation crisis» and the changes in religious life. Large numbers entering the novitiate gave veteran members a sign that their chioice was still credible. These large numbers of new members enabled them to expand and make even more institutional commitments. There is a desire to again be a part of a great influential network of institutions, and to enjoy the impact and power which came with that responsibility. There is a desire for the status which came with being a religious who contributed to this network. There is a nostalgia which, by its very nature, does not allow religious to let go of the past. Some community members will perpetuate the «vocation crisis» precisely because their grief over the loss of what was only serves to point to stagnation and death.

Consequently, for some, the desire for new membership stems primarily from these yearnings. Hidden in these yearnings is a denial of death which keeps some from seeing the possibilities for new life. The subconscious desire to appease their grief becomes the motivation for vocation ministry. For these, many new members would be sign of regained status, power and prestige. This increase is seen as a source of self-esteem and pride. This motivation for seeking new membership keeps religious communities from addressing the hard questions of renewal and revitalization. Vocation ministry for these religious communities becomes recruitment. The ultimate goal of recruitment is to serve the community and not the individual who is discerning a vocation. Needless to say, a potential member will be hard pressed to consider joining a group with these sentiments.

Discussion of vocations and the «vocation crisis» in these settings are invariably filled with frustration and lead to feelings to helplessnes, inadequacy, doubt and further anxiety. Still, the concerns of vocation ministry and its relationship to renewal must continually be brought to the consciousness of the group. It is always difficult to look at the past and be reminded of the pain which was associated with making renewal possible. To remember the ambiguity, the indecision and the confusion seems only to reopen wounds which one wants so much to remain healed even if only superficially. Questions about the group's commitment to the future remain unasked. I believe the vocation ministers of the religios community are among those who are charged with the challenge of raising these questions and concerns.

There is another motivation for the desire to have new members. It stems from the yearning for life, for what could be, for possibilities, for urgent needs to be met and for dynamic growth. It is the motivation of religious women and men who have the experience of being called to religious life by God. When this call is heard continually throughout life it becomes a powerful source which promotes self-confidence and hope for the future. The vocation is continually chosen as a response to a God who wants the individual to be happy. The religious person hears this invitation in the everyday events of life: through people who are entrusted to their care. The trusting response to the Caller is made again and again throughout their life.

These religious women and men are in touch with an evolving dream for themselves, their community and the world. They have found a community within which their dream comes alive. They have discovered a Church wherein many communities have joined to announce the Reign of God. They look for others who will share this dream and help make it a reality. A religious person with these felt convictions, dreams and hopes, sees her/himself as a positive addition, a significant part, a unique person in the Church. They know that their community continues to be an instrument of God's love in the world. They sense that they and their community are needed today and have a role in the future. They are convinced that they are a gift for others. Their life has meaning and significance because they are, along with other members of the Church, called to make the dream of the Reign of God a reality. Having contact with such religious is an empowering experience for potential members because it is inviting and attractive.

This view of the self, the community and the Church becomes the underlying motivation for wanting new membership. Religious want to share this experience with others. They feel the life style is important for this world and there is a significant place for it. This person radiates her/his convictions and is attractive because of his/her stance toward life. An invitation extended to another to consider this life style is powerful because it is an invitation to be part of a life-giving, vibrant and vital group.

These are two extremes. Hopefully, as religious communities move toward the fullness of renewal, they will also move toward a more positive and healthy view of themselves. Consequently, their life style will become a more attractive option for those who have yet to make a life style choice.

VOCATION CRISIS:

A COMMUNITY'S

SELF-FULFILLING PROPHECY (2/2)

Moving Toward Revitalization, Renewal and New Membership

The renewal of communities and individuals happens when community members involve themselves directly in vocation ministry. There is a significant relationship between vocation ministry and the ongoing renewal of the group. It is a cyclic relationship in which life generates life. The crux of the relationship between renewal and vocation ministry is in the commitment a community makes to allow others to see it as it is today, in its humanness and as it struggles to live up to its professed ideals.

This is difficult for religious communities because religious women and men are hesitant to involve themselves in vocation ministry. There are a number of elements in the renewal process. I will highlight only a few of them by describing a religious community which is overcoming its hesitancy and is moving toward the fullness of renewal by involving themselves in vocation ministry. This religious community is described as an ideal. In reality communities are still moving toward this goal. By contrast, I also describe some of the dynamics which seem to keep communities from moving forward the fulleness of renewal.

A religious community that understands and sees clearly its purpose, role and unique charism will stand as a credible and valuable contributor in the Church. This religious community sees its ministry as significant because its members are responding to today's real and pressing needs. This community welcomes new members. These new members will undoubtedly give shape to future commitments. Potentially, they may even involve the community in new ministries. Together, new and old members will determine what the real and pressing needs are today. Individuals are commissioned in the name of the group for their specific ministry. There is never an individual commitment, but one which has the support of the whole body. This community recognizes the importance of being professional. They balance professionalism with a ministerial perspective which gives them a different motivation from others in their respective professions.

A religious community who has a strong awareness of their giftedness for the Church today also recognizes the possibilities for continuing to offer these gifts. They appreciate their history and acknowledge that the future may involve changes. They welcome those changes which are discerned as elements of renewal and revitalization. This community knows that they are presently trying to bring about renewal. They invite new members EVEN WHILE struggling to renew. They expect that the new members will contribute to the renewal.

This religious community extends hospitality at every opportunity and invites non-community members to share in their prayer, socials and meals. They encourage others to express their curiosity and welcome question about their values, goals, lifestyle and ministry. The community members pray regularly in thanksgiving for their vocation and also the vocations of others. They understand their vocation as one among many others in the Church. It is not better or holier in the eyes of God but unique and different. This community personally extends invitations to individuals to consider membership in their group. They extend this invitation because they see themselves a instruments of God's call to others. They invite others because they experience their own vocation as a gift and want others to share in their joy. The community's vocation ministry is seen as part of the ministry of the entire Christian community and, as such, is carried out in the spirit of concern for the individual, the Church and the community simultaneously.

Contrasting this ideal is a description of religious communities who are having difficulty moving toward genuine renewal. For these groups there seems to be a built-in resistance to any suggestion that more openness and hospitality might be good. Often, these communities will avoid any activities which might make non-community members aware that perfect renewal has not yet taken place. Community open houses or allowing visitors in the actual living spaces (eg. dining and living rooms) are not acceptable by one or several community members. Visitors in these instances are ushered into a parlor with the instructions that they should "wait here". Sometimes a few members or even one can keep the whole community from welcoming people into their home. The unspoken fear is simply that others will see who they are and how they live. They might ask too many questions, speak too many observations or scrutinize too carefully that with which they themselves are not yet comfortable. Another fear which is important to name is the fear that individuals have that they might have to get involved. Involvement in vocation ministry automatically will mean making a personal investment. There is a real hesitation for an individual in this community to get involved in vocation ministry. They know that they will experience inconvenience. They are not willing to allow their routine and comfortable lifestyle to be disrupted.

Members of these same communities will not exted personal invitations to consider their life style. Invitating others will automatically open the religious woman or man to questions about their life style and how it is experienced. The potential member will express concerns, observations and judgments which will call for a response from the religious. They are not comfortable sharing their own reflections on the struggle to live a religious life. These community members are often unaware of the sequence of the initial formation program and are embarrassed to any that they do not know what the potential new member could do next with her/his interest.

Lastly, it is rare that this community brings to their common prayer the names of those people who might have an interest in their community. Instead, there are pleas for an increase in vocations with the hope that the Lord will deposit many interested "prospects" on the doorstep of the vocation office. Also, rarely heard are prayers of thanks for their own vocation or vocalized petitions for an undestanding of where they might be called today by God.

Vocation Ministry As A Source of Renewal

It has been my experience that individual community members and whole communities who involve themselves in vocation ministry are renewed and find energy in this activity. The actual involvement in vocation ministry, specifically in offering hospitality, extending personal invitations and praying, is a source of renewed hope in the future. One example which I would like to cite involves my own brothers.

Last summer our summer volunteer program situated itself in one of our existing communities. It was a program which invited young men to experience our ministry and our community life. The volunteers helped out in a remedial reading and math program for youngsters in a poor innercity shool. They lived as members of a local community. The experience of ministry to the poor was very significant as was their experience of our community life.

There was some initial hesitation on the part of my brothers about welcoming these young men into theirhouse. They expressed their concerns about having these "outsiders" as a part of the community. (Who could tell what they might do?) Still, fears and ansieties notwithstanding, they opened their doors and hearts to the fifteen volunteers. The five week program proved to be a tremendous blessing for everyone involved. It is especially good to hear my brothers who hosted the summer volunteer program speak enthusiastically about the experience of having the young men in their community. Meal times came alive with conversation about the excitement of the day's ministry and activities. Prayer and liturgy echoed with earnest pleas for assistance in discernment, petitions for those entrusted to their care and utterances of thankfulness for life and all it holds. The brothers could talk again about their accomplishments, experiences and hopes for the future. There were new ears which listened attentively respecting their wisdom, and young inquisitive minds which questioned with a genuine desire to understand. There ewere shared dialogues on life's familiar questions and concerns flavored now with the young's perspective. The brothers have expressed gratitude for,this experience. This kind of interaction with young people is lifegiving and energizing.

Another example of vocation ministry as a source of renewal comes from a religious sister who recently expressed to me her excitement for the ministry. She is a history teacher in a co-educational high school. Two years ago she began to serve as the local vocation coordinator for her community at that high school. Initially, she was reluctant to get involved. Gradually, the usual fears and anxieties gave way to more and more involvement. She talks freely of the experience she is having working directly with young people. She sees herself as one who is walking with them, as they discern God's call to them. She found that some of these young people are considering religious life as an option.

This sister is choosing to be present to young people in out-of-class discovery experiences like retreats, prayer groups and discussions. These experiences are especially geared toward helping them develop their skills for discernment. She is now an active participant in the programs of discovery which her community's vocation office sponsors. She enthusiastically invites the young people entrusted to her care to accompany her on these experiences. Her local community is becoming a place of more hospitality where the young people feel comfortable because they are welcomed sincerely. She speaks about the experience of renewal, about a new perspective on the future, about hope and about feelings of revitalization. Her attitude is infectious and is involving other colleagues, both lay and religious, women and men, in vocation ministry for the sake of the young people in their school. I believe that this is what the process of renewal could look like. I'm sure that many similar examples of vocation ministry as a source of renewal could be related. We would do well to share these with our community members and each other.

Conclusion

First, religious communities cannot look for new membership to define who they are for Church today. They must have a clear purpose and identity which give meaning to their presence today in the Church. Second, they cannot afford to wait for signs of new membership to give them hope for a future. It must be found in the experienced call from God to be instruments of grace and peace for those entrusted to their care. Third, it is clear to me that religious communities cannot wait for the fullness of renewal before they begin to invest in vocation ministry. Struggles for renewal and vocation ministry must be simultaneous precisely because there is a cyclic relationship between them.

We are called as vocation ministers to point out this cyclic relationship. We are called to suggest that involvement in vocation ministry is one avenue for the difficult journey through renewal and revitalization. Our invitations to individual community members will serve as a beginning and make it possible for entire communities to participate in vocation ministry. The first step, and probably the most difficult, is for the group to assess its present attitude about the impact which the last twenty years is having on its self-image and view of the future. Next, it is important to evaluate how these perspectives affect the group's willingness to participate in the pastoral ministry of vocations. This seems to be a frustrating part of the slow and gradual movement toward the fullness of renewal through vocation ministry. This effort on the part of vocation ministers will help other community members to discover that which empowers them for ministry today and will also serve as the basis of hope for the future.

THE CONDUCT OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS A TECHNICAL-PROFESSIONAL TRAINING MANUAL FOR TEACHERS

• Origen of the "Conduct"

From his first contact in 1679 with Nyel's teachers, De La Salle noticed they had two dangerous shortcomings. There was above all an excessive freedom of movement which caused all kinds of disorders in the new society. These disorders were bound to have a negative effect on both the organisation and the running of schools. This first shortcoming could be relatively easily remedied by bringing the teachers together under one roof so as to make their supervision less difficult and to get them used to a more regular and well-ordered lifestyle (1). But there was also another shortcoming which was even more serious as far as work in school was concerned. Since Nyel's teachers had no training, each taught as best as he could with whatever talents he had and as he was inspired. This lack of uniformity of approach in these newly-established schools prevented them from achieving the results that might have been expected.. Having become aware of these deficiencies, De La Salle was eager to remedy them without delay. As he attempted to suppress disorder in school caused by a lack of uniformity of approach, De La Salle conceived the first idea which would lead to the writing of the Conduct. He tells us himself that it became necessary to write it so as to be able to ensure a uniformity of approach in all the schools and in all places where there were Brothers of the Institute (2).

• Its influence on teaching

The advantages that De La Salle foresees will be gained from a faithful observance of the practices contained in the book are clearly stated: order in school, well-ordered and uniform behaviour on the part of the teachers, and great benefits for the children. One might be tempted to consider the presumption of the author of the Conduct as somewhat simplistic and over-ambitious when he expects such results simply from the implementation of the collection of rules contained in the work. Such a statement, however, is neither gratuitous nor utopian. In fact, the preface of the book tells us that it was not written as a book of rules, but as a result of a great number of discussions between the longest serving and most capable Brothers, and after many years of practical experience. It says also that nothing was included in it that had not been agreed upon and tested; that all the advantages and disadvantages had been considered; and as far as possible, all the good and bad consequences had been foreseen (3).

Supported by this long experience which guarantees and justifies each and every practice contained in the Conduct, De La Salle exhorts the teachers to make sure they put them into practice. He tells the superiors of the Institute and school inspectors to take the trouble to learn and assimilate perfectly whatever is contained in it. He tells these latter also to make sure that teachers observe exactly all the practices prescribed, even the smallest ones, and do not infinge any. De La Salle concludes by stressing the importance of the document, and urging the Brothers who are already teaching in schools to read and reread often what is relevant to them in the Conduct, so that there is nothing in it they are ignorant of, and so as to put everything faithfully into practice (4).

• Textbook for teacher training

But, if the Conduct was the vade mecum of the practising Lasallian teacher, it had already served as a textbook on the theory and practice of pedagogy in the seminary where students spent many hours studying it. There they learnt not only the subjects they would later teach in school, but they were taught also the pedagogical methods and procedures they ought to use in order to exercise their ministry among children better (5). These methods and procedures could not be other than those recommended in the Conduct. Manuscript 43 tells us in fact that training teachers means giving them, to the greatest extent possible, the spirit of the Conduct; explaining how to put the methods contained in it into practice, and how to make the methods efficacious (6). Manuscript 43, just like the preface of the 1706 "Method", proclaims its full confidence in the efficacy of the practices recommended in it, considering them "as an infallible means of diminishing greatly the problems experienced in the course of teaching (7).

The educational instructor must show prudence, however, in the way he explains and demonstrates the importance of the Conduct to his student teachers. He must not present it to them as law: the very word would make them think it was unpleasant and difficult. He must show skill in convincing them that it is absolutely essential if uniformity of teaching approach is to be ensured throughout the Institute; for the members of the same organisation must not proceed differently in one place from those in another. There are, moreover, more important reasons for having uniformity in methods and procedures, and the instructor must bring them to the attention of his student teachers. The fact is that, since teachers are not likely to spend their whole life in the same class in the same town, they would have to cope with indescribable difficulties on moving elsewhere if the class they took over had been taught by a teacher whose methods were diametrically opposed to those in force in the Institute. In such a situation it would take months to get the class used to the methods of the new teacher (8). The basic aim of the Conduct, therefore, is as follows: to introduce uniformity of methods and procedures into all Lasallian schools, so that the running and organisation of these schools is not left to the whims and fancies of teachers, and so that their work is made easier wherever they may be or whatever class they teach.

- Adaptability to pedagogical progress

And so one might be justified in thinking that Lasallian pedagogy had ended up in a cul-de-sac; that, in a sense, it had become fossilised by depriving the teacher, stuck in the rigid and inflexible straightjacket of the Conduct, of any possibility of showing personal initiative. That is a pessimistic view which seems to be approved almost in the uncompromising text that follows –a text that confirms in legal terms the approach we have been describing: the Brothers "will teach all their pupils according to the methods prescribed for them and which are universally used in the Institute. They will change nothing in them and will not introduce anything new into them" (9).

And yet, all things considered, the intention was not to fix, once and for all, laws that were immutable: it was rather to consolidate a position that had been won, and to render impossible any backtracking or return to an approach that the genius of De La Salle had made obsolete. There were still some who might miss or even advocate such an obsolete approach because, while it was less efficient, it was easier and more convenient in that it encouraged routine (10).

De La Salle does not claim in the Conduct to have discovered a universal panacea, nor does he try to stifle the personal initiative of the teacher. He leaves the door open to all future progress in methodology. What he insists on is that, whatever changes are proposed in the practices recommended in the Conduct, they must first be thoroughly tested over a long period (11). Consequently, what seem at first sight to be harsh laws are in fact efficient means of ensuring pedagogical progress. In fact, since any new ideas a teacher may have to be submitted to other experienced teachers for checking and approval in the light of school practice, totally impractical and farfetched ideas are rejected and only what is positively useful and an improvement on what already exists is accepted. What is more, the general spread of new ideas, once accepted after a critical appraisal by other teachers, ensures that the efforts of individuals do not remain isolated and ineffective, but rather contribute to the general good of the organisation.

- Universal Lasallian diffusion

There is one aspect of the methodology which the Lasallian approach to education offers teachers in the Conduct which deserves a special mention, and that is its universality. It is intended –at least, this is what it says– to be understood by the average teacher. Unlike some very well known modern teaching methods which are understood and practised more o less only by their creators or at the most by a restricted circle of their followers, the Conduct is intended for all teachers, and not only for those who have a special aptitude for teaching. It is this aspect in particular which made the Conduct so valuable and popular during the last quarter of the 17th century and throughout the 18th up to the time of the French Revolution. It is what even now, three hundred years later, makes it still valuable in certain ways. It cannot be, nor should it be, discarded as something old with a glorious past and put on display in a museum to be admired by visitors.

Manuscript 44 cannot speak too highly of the excellence of the Conduct when it turns to consider its aims: the organisation of large classes, some of which could number as many as 100 children, and sometimes more. In such circumstances, there was a need for a specific approach to make it possible to instruct and educate children properly in large numbers (12).

The advantage of the methods and procedures recommended in the Conduct lies basically in the fact that they made it possible to cope properly with large classes. This possibility offered undeniable advantages, if not from a strictly pedagogical point of view, at least from a social one. At a time when schools for the children of working people and the poor were so rare, no teacher, struggling to better the lot of the lower classes, could afford to hesitate for reasons which were strictly pedagogical: his slogan had to be: «As much basic instruction and education possible for the greatest number». The Lasallian approach to education understood this from the very beginning.

PRAYER OF A CHRISTIAN EDUCATOR (4)

(1: 16-9-C-63; 2: 17-13-C-73; 3: 18-15-C-79)

* * *

MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL

Lord,
You gave your Church apostles, prophets and Doctors; and you have chosen us to be ministers of the Gospel.

Holy Spirit,
enlighten each of us that we may be worthy instruments of your grace.

You entrust to us, Lord,
the teaching of your Gospel to children;
give us also the generosity and eagerness to dedicate ourselves to their salvation.

We are your ministers when we work with charity and enthusiasm at the task of instruction and education.

Thank You, Lord,
for entrusting children and youth to our care;
and give us the courage to face, for Your sake,
all the difficulties which may arise..

You, Lord,
send us to work in Your vineyard,
we are here with willing hearts.

We are Ambassadors of Christ and His Church, in His name we bear Good News.
You, Lord,
through Your Holy Spirit dictate the words we write in the hearts of children and youth.

Jesus, as you were dying on the cross for us all,
so that we might live in You,
You willed that we be Your ambassadors, teaching what it means to love God and to seek only His glory.

Lord, Jesus,
You are the cornerstone on which Your Church is built.
We are that Church whose mission is to sanctify itself and we humbly ask for an ardent zeal for Your glory, that so it may be.

Thank You, Lord,
for this gift of ministry through education;
help us to love children and youth, and to bring them the grace to follow You.

Lord,
You so loved the world that You sent Your Son to save us.
That same mission is the one you give to us:
to walk with our students on the Way to You.
Fill us with love and generosity, Lord,
as we go along together.

Jesus, Good Shepherd, always careful of those who are Yours,
we, too, are pastors of your children and youth:
help us enjoy the good pastures of Your Gospel.

May we spend our lives bringing the life of God to our students.
We want only to educate in Christ,
so that the life of Christ may radiate in children and youth.

MESSENGER OF THE COVENANT

Lord, You sent us Your Son to redeem us from sin that we might live the life of grace.

Catholic schools and we Catholic teachers try to guide and encourage our students to do good and avoid evil.
«Zeal for your glory, Lord, consumes me because the sons of Israel have broken their Covenant with You».

We seek, Lord,
only the best for children and youth:
that their baptismal Covenant with you be not violated
by lying, stealing, impurity, hate, disobedience...
We want them to embrace willingly their dignity of sons of God by charity, prayer, joy...

Your Gospel, Lord, identifies the path along which we must lead our students:
- To love God above all.
- To love our neighbor as ourselves.
- To do good, even to our enemies.
- To live in sincerity and truth.
- To strive for the values of the Kingdom.
- To pray always, with piety and faith.
- To love God more than the riches of this world.

.....

Teach us, Lord,
to live according to Your word to pass on Your maxims and purpose of life with enthusiasm and consistency to children and youth.
because You, Lord, alone move hearts enlightened by truth.

We wish to follow your example, because we know that witnesses are more convincing than teachers.
The ideal is to be both witness and teacher:
make us like unto Yourself!

Young people identify with and imitate their educators, their teachers.
Lord, make us into good Christian teachers, witnesses to the God You are before the students we teach,
so that they may come to know You
and love You,
Our Lord and our God.

TO GUIDE AND ENCOURAGE

Lord Jesus,
zeal for the glory of the Father made you cast from the Temple
the merchants and money changers;
Teach us to correct our students with firmness and love
when they stray.

Hypocrisy and pride in the Pharisees brought You to confront them personally and publicly so that they might be converted.

Lord,
children are weak
and inclined to act without thinking.
Inspire us with the right approach to help them think and consider the consequences of when to act and how to act.
We need love when we encourage them and more love when we correct them.

Our inclination is to give in to our passions and this is more true of youth.
We must support them
by word and example
by motivating and correcting.
Good and bad habits acquired during these years can best be changed during these years;
in adults they become habits.

We want to be Christian teachers;
we want to teach in Catholic schools;
we want students to have the freedom of the sons of God which You won for them
Lord Jesus, by Your death.
You have chosen us for this apostolate,
a ministry of education.
Grant us the gentleness, patience and prudence we will need when we must reprimand or punish.

We hold the place of parents as we teach and educate for their souls.
Lord, we commit ourselves to show them the right path and to bring them back should they stray.

You have made us, Lord,
the guides and keepers of children.
We offer our lives in the ministry of education.
Confirm, O Lord, the work of Your hands.

«THE SCHOOL IS DOING WELL...»

The Founder uses this expression only in his correspondence. Other variations include:

1. «...In Avignon. The schools there are doing well.» (L. 16,3 p. 68. Letter to Brother Gabriel Drolin, Feb. 11, 1705).

2. «I am pleased that your school is doing well...» (L. 44.20. Letter to Brother Robert, April 26. 1709).

3. «Nothing should be left undone to ensure that the schools do well, especially your own.» (L. 8.18. Letter to Brother Hubert. June 1, 1706).

4. Take care that the classes run well.» (L. 52.8. Letter to Brother Joseph, Dec. 1706).

These words suggest to us what must have been a continual concern of St. John Baptist de La Salle. However, of themselves they still leave us in the dark because of the lack of any context which might throw light on what standards he had in mind when he used them. It helps little to know that the Founder wants the schools to "do well" if we do not understand exactly what he means by this formula. Our natural inclination would be to interpret it in the light of what we mean by it today in our own circumstances.

We do have some passages which are more explicit.

5. «Take care that your school runs well and that your community is faithful to the Rule». (L. 42.12. p. 144. Letter to Brother Robert, Feb. 26, 1709).

6. «You must carry out not only your class duties, but also the other exercises, for classwork without the spiritual exercises will not do.» (L. 62.6, p. 177. Letter to Brother Mathias, April 13, 1708).

The first of the above quotations (5) might leave us with the impression that there is only a coincidental relationship between a school which is going well and fidelity to the exercises among the Brothers. Yet, that harmony accords perfectly with the ideal defined in the Rule.

The second (6) leaves no doubt about the interpretation. The words used are categorical. They establish between the two terms employed a strict relationship of causality: the school doing well depends upon the proper performance of the spiritual exercises. Certainly these are not the only factors (it would be an exaggeration to pretend that they are). However, they are a decisive element, a condition sine qua non.

There are other passages which support this assertion. Even though they do not use the words we are investigating, they express the idea perfectly.

7. «Since you ask it, I will see that you have plenty of students. Be keen on carrying out your school duties, but please be as keen about your spiritual exercises as you are about class.» (L. 64.4, p. 179. Letter to Brother Mathias, May 16, 1708).

8. «Your spiritual exercises and your school require all your care. If you involve yourself in anything else, you are acting in opposition to the designs of God.» (L. 12.5, p. 44. Letter to Brother Hubert, Oct. 2, 1710).

* * *

At this point we must recall a key phrase of the MEMOIRE SUR L'HABIT: «The exercises of the community and work in the schools require a well integrated man.» (1) This document, written between 1689 and 1691, is definitely anterior to the letters which we quoted above. Brother Miguel Campos, in his "Itineraire évangélique de St Jean-Baptiste de La Salle" (Rome, 1974) makes the following commentary on this passage:

«...community requires a totally committed man –totality both in his life and in his work as a member of the community, in view of its mission. It would be well to note here that the expressions "exercises of community" and "work" are already used by De La Salle and that they are not understood as two parallel realities. Community is the word which unifies the unique way of life of the Brother – doing the will of God. The exercises of the community are designed to emphasize the evangelical dimension of the work of the community; i.e., the work of the community empowers this evangelical life within the redemptive mission of the Son of Man» (CL 45, p. 194).

We must not lose sight of the fact that the main purpose of St. John Baptist de La Salle (in both senses of the word as given by Littré: goal and its logic) is apostolic rather than pedagogical. If the Founder has restructured schools, it was not that they "do well", but according to the Rule in Art. 3: «to make them available to the poor as signs of the Kingdom and a means of salvation». This is best expressed by Brother Michel Sauvage in "Annoncer l'Évangile aux pauvres" (Paris, 1977) in a section which he, himself, entitles "that the schools do well...":

«In De La Salle, evangelical inspiration moves his practical efforts to adapt the school to its concrte, earthly conditions. In an effort to make the means of sdalvation available to poor children on their level, he does not hesitate to question traditional pedagogical procedures when he finds them inadequate. He is concerned about the effectiveness of teaching even with regard to the minutest details. Today, these seem to be very nit-picking, but we can understand their existence against the broader pricture of the lack of preparation of teachers during that period. The history of education recognizes that because of De La Salle and his Institute significant progress has been made in institutional learning. By seeking the Kingdom of God those who worked under evangelical inspiration also contributed to the advancement of the human education of poor children within their earthly condition... In other words, spiritual motivation stimulated educational creativity. The attitudes which the Founder inculcated in his disciples with regard to an evangelical love for children and their real participation in the "work of God" are actually the basis for an effective transformation of our human condition... The Meditations of the Founder remind us that professional competence also results from the intensity of the spiritual life of the Brother.» (pp. 271c, 272a, 274a, 280a).

* * *

I have limited myself to these two passages because they bring us to the point we want to make. They help us to see that we lose the meaning intended by De La Salle when we limit it to a strictly pedagogical sense, even when it seems to be within a purely pedagogical context. I have previously discussed this matter in Lasalliana 15-11-C-58.

While recognizing the pedagogical competence of the author, I must confess that I do not recognize the thought of the Founder in the interpretation as it is presented. In effect, it is saying:

«The school is doing well". This means right now.
- That the users are partners.
- That each is responsible for the whole.
- That the ability of each is necessary for the common work.»

This constitutes a real shift in the meaning. The author, (even if what he says is perfectly acceptable) actually substitutes his own ideas for those of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

By his own words, which may sound like a slogan, the Founder expresses the same fundamental requirement for his school; i.e., that teachers, be they Brothers or lay people, must be penetrated with a Christian spirit, consider themselves as "ministers of God and dispensers of His mysteries" (1 Cor 4:1 quoted in MTR 1, 1), thus "cooperate with Him and enter into His plan to bring about the salvation of children" (M. 56, 1 in CL 12, p. 157).

However, the word "salvation", which is found in the Conduct of Schools (Cf. CL 24, pages 151 & 186), is not found in the article quoted above. When it is read and re-read, one is struck by its secular tone. It is not enough to insert the word Christian from time to time at the end of a sentence in order to transform a pedagogical text into a pastoral presentation.

We find here the phenomenon of the secularization of the writings of the Founder as has been pointed out by Brother Jean Pungier in "Jean-Baptiste de la Salle, le Message de son Catéchisme" (Rome, 1984): «...What these texts contain that is universal in time and space have become a mere laicized commentary. Since the 18th century we see in the Schools of the Brother... a pedagogical instrument... become so modern that in a certain sense it has lost its religious purpose... and often, in the eyes of the bourgeoisie of the Enlightenment, it has become the model for training in the skills.» (p. 32-33).

If Lasallian schools ought to be "excellent schools" aimed at "succes", it must not be for excellence in itself nor in success for itself. These two qualities are part of a project for the total liberation of the human being as a necessary condition for attaining Salvation.

The school of St. John Baptist de La Salle strives "to bear fruit" in both meanings of the expression – personal sanctification (of the teacher) and evangelization (of the student). «I have chosen you that you should go and bear fruit and that your fruit should remain» (John 15:16).

To profane a word of St. John Baptist de La Salle is, in fact to desacralize it.

Brother Jacques Goussin

(1) I have often found this expression abbreviated into: «The school needs an integral man». This vitiates the thought of the Founder and almost always eliminates its religious and communitarian content.

STATUS OF A NON-GOVERNMENT SCHOOL IN JAPAN (1/2)

In order to understand the present situation of a La Salle school in today's Japan it behoves to say first a few words about the education system.

1. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF JAPANESE EDUCATION

The first Imperial Edict dated in 701 A.D. can be considered the start of the real system of formal education. That Edict provided for an organization of lay schools modeled on those of China for the training of civil officials. A parallel educational ladder for the education of priests in Buddhist temples and monasteries was also envisaged. Outside of those government and clerical schools during the eight hand the ninth centuries, private schools were established in Kyoto for the education of the court families.

During the long feudal period formal education came to play a very minor role. Educational institutions virtually disappeared. As in Europe of the Middle Ages, scholarship was kept alive in temples and monasteries.

Under the Tokugawa regime, (Shogun) formal education prospered once again. The feudal lords (daimyo) were encouraged to set up schools in their own fiefs. They were for persons of rank. Some private schools were also set up to educate children of lower status. Temple schools for both boys and girls were encouraged, and by the close of the Tokugawa period, 15.862 of these institutions were reported in operation. Intercourse with Europeans gave the Japanese a knowledge of Western culture. The Jesuits established seminarios and collegios in various parts of Japan to facilitate the propagation of Christian teachings.

The change from the Shogun to the Imperial rule –commonly referred to as the Meiji Restoration– took place in 1867. The aim of the new leaders of Japan was to make Japan a strong state, unified internally and opposed to the rising power of the West. They looked upon education as a powerful means to achieve their Restoration and National Unification program. They lost no time and in January, 1871, the Ministry of Education was organized and vested with authority over all educational and cultural matters. In August 1872, the system began operation. Though there were many changes in the details of the organization, it remained the basic pattern for Japanese education. The purpose of this new system of education seems to have been to train a people that would be both technically competent in the skills necessary to operate a modern state, and indoctrinated with the principles upon which the unity of that state rested. Education from 1872 to 1945 was essentially an instrument for the control of the people by the state. The Imperial Rescript remained the accepted statement of the principles underlying the educational system from which much of the militaristic and ultranationalistic emphasis in education was later developed. By means of education, militaristic leaders fostered a "national spirit" to make the new generation fanatical about the "Mission of Japan." Service to the Emperor and the State was made the principle of life. This ideology was mirrored especially in courses in history, geography and morals.

During the pontificate of Leo XIII, the Brothers were asked to go to Japan but it was not until 1932 that it could be materialized with the arrival of four Canadian Brothers. In September 1930 Brother Ephrem had been sent by Brother Assistant Mandellus to make a kind of survey. In his report we read: The Japanese Government having rather strict educational requisites the establishment of the Institute in Japan will be an expensive adventure. Besides, the apostolic results will take many years to be noticeable. During the few weeks he had spent in the Far East he had forseen what was needed except one important detail: The Brothers sent to Japan would have to be fully qualified with University degrees to get permission from the National Board of Education to teach even in elementary schools. The international armed conflict being near, the Brothers were advised to wait before building any school.

After 1945.

The surrender of the Japanese military government in August 1945 brought the Imperial Rescript to a sudden end and the Occupation authorities attempted a reformation of Japanese education. Their ultimate goal was the establishment of a system of education based on the principle: pursuit of truth and recognition of the dignity and worth of individual. The Japanese government was then strongly directed to eliminate all militaristic and ultranationalistic features in the new educational system and to construct a sound democratic pattern of education. Following the promulgation of the new Constitution on November 6, 1946, the fundamental Law of Education and the School Education Law were enacted in March 1947. The new school system provided free and compulsory education for children of elementary and middle school age, and introduced coeducation. Two notable features of the postwar system were removal of restrictions upon private schools and the freedom granted to these schools to teach religion. Unfortunately, some of the unpleasant features of the old regime remain: namely the utilitarian view of education simply as a means to get ahead in life, the college entrance examinations, the textbook control by the Department of Education, etc.

Situation of Private Schools in the Past and at Present.

The feeling of the Meiji statemen was that private education, which advocated academic freedom, was an impediment to the aim of the restoration and tended to perpetuate feudalistic tendencies. For this reason there was discrimination against private schools throught the whole period from 1872 to 1945. In November, 1945, the Chief of the Bureau of School Education, in a directive to the Prefectural Governors, acknowledged the fact that private schools had "suffered too much interference and excessive oppression in the past" and instructed them to "pay attention to schools of this kind treating them justly and helping them to develop their special character."

It explains in a certain way, why the Governor of Kagoshima Prefecture did not hesitate to affix his seal of approval when in 1949 we asked permission to open a La Salle School in his Prefecture. He even sent his own son to our school and more than once he accepted to give a talk to our students. It must be pointed out that this long period of oppression has produced in the country a rather unfavorable attitude towards education where religion was taught.

We thus had to prove that religion was not an obstacle to education through the accademic results of our Catholic schools. Of course this attitude is fading away but it took many years to be acknowledged but it has not yet completely disappeared. In the minds of some people, even to this day, public education is regarded as the superior form of education. This should be understood by anyone who seeks to know the actual position of Catholic schools in Japan. These schools are operating under a handicap which only a high reputation, based upon academic superiority and excellent moral training, will enable them to overcome. In other words, Catholic schools in Japan must be outstanding schools if they wish to succeed.

Fortunately our La Salle Institutions rank among the best even academically above most of the public schools in Japan. «The influence of the Church in the field of education is shown in a special manner by the Catholic schools. No less than other schools does the Catholic school pursue the goal of human formation of youth.« (Gravissimum educationis, 8)

STATUS OF A NON-GOVERNMENT SCHOOL IN JAPAN (2/2)

2. APOSTOLIC INFLUENCE OF CATHOLIC SCHOOLS

A. Great Influence of Schools in General.

Catholic schools in this country can exert a great influence upon youth, because of the favored position of schools in Japanese society. Education in Japan is exceedingly schools-centered. The greatest part of the child's education is entrusted to and expected of the school. School education is often more valued, and may exert a more lasting influence than education in the family. For most Japanese children, school becomes the center of their lives. Sports, recreation, interest in cultural activities and the like are centered in and around the schools. Such activities contribute to the great influence of the schools. This academic influence upon its students will be all the greater as the school is considered a "good" school –this is, a school which succeeds in placing a high percentage of its graduates in good universities. If a Catholic school, besides being a "good" school in this sense, also gives a sound character formation, it will exert an even greater influence than other schools, public or private.

• The Ground-breaking Apostolic Influence of Catholic Schools.

To understand and evaluate the nature of the apostolic mission of Catholic schools, the methods, limits and results, one has to take into consideration four elements: a) the present situation, b) the apostolate of the Church in Japan, c) the educational situation and d) the psychology of the Japanese people.

The educational situation at present, with large numbers of students flocking to Catholic schools, surely opens up vast possibilities, but at the same time the psychology of the Japanese people sets limitation to the kind of apostolic work which can be achieved in Catholic schools. It would therefore be a great mistake to evaluate the apostolic influence of a Catholic school in Japan merely by the number of students baptized.

All agree that Japan is a very difficult mission. Actually the progress of Christianity is slow; the Japanese are in no particular hurry to be baptized. The propagation of the faith is still in the ground breaking stage. And however important it may be to promote the direct apostolate, it may be equally if not more important to disseminate Christian ideas throughout the country sound ideas about man, the family, society, etc., which are "praeambula fidei." This is where our Lasallian schools are able to fulfill a most important mission, «since, therefore, the Catholic school can be of such aid to the fulfillment of the mission of the people of God and to the fostering of the dialogue between the Church and mankind to the benefit of both, it retains even in our present circumstances the utmost importance.» (Gravissimum educationis, 8)

It is an established fact that through the work of the Catholic schools, knowledge of Christianity, and Catholic influence has been carried far and wide into families and influential circles to which perhaps the Church would otherwise not have had access. To mention but one aspect, more than one thousand and two hundred graduates from our school in Kagoshima are now medical doctors, not to mention the University professors, lawyers etc. The Bishps of Japan have often publicly recognized this far-reaching apostolic influence of the Catholic schools, saying that missionary work in such an education-minded country as Japan would be impossible without good Catholic schools.

• Propagation of the Faith in Schools

The propagation of the faith among non-Catholic students should not be narrowly interpreted as meaning direct proselytizing. «A La Salle Brother is a Catechist by profession so catechism should be thaught to all students.« It must be realized that hardly any of the children entering Catholic schools are sent there by their parents to become Christians. The parents, Catholic or not, are interested in the academic and "moral training" given by the Catholic schools, not ordinarily in religious instruction as such. Apostolic "pressure" results in an antipathy and an impeding of the apostolic influence of the school. Naturally, all the Brothers wish to increase the number of Catholics in their schools. But at present the indirect apostolate seems to be the more important, and care must always be taken not to obstruct this apostolate by too direct or indiscreet methods. The work being done at present will bear fruit in the second or the third generation. When His time will come.

B. Apostolic Influence on Various Groups

1. Upon the students

Apostolic influence is exerted upon the students through: The ethic course. This course given in Catholic schools aims at instilling in young minds sound moral principles and at developing the power of moral judgment. It produces in many students the desire to study religion more profoundly, and thus prepares the way to baptism.

Practical training in every life. Talks are given regularly on practical matters by the Principal, teachers, invited speakers. Thus the students over a number of years develop sound moral habits and attitudes.

The religion course. This course is on a voluntary basis. By experience it seems to indicate that freedom in this matter will produce better results in the long run.

Religious activities. Optional attendance at Holy Mass, religion-inspired activities such as charity drives, Christmas Baskets etc., may help to drive home the idea of Christianity. Here again the reputation of the school will add to the Christian spirit.

2. Upon the family.

Schools can exert a very great influence upon the parents of the students. If a school has again a good reputation, the parents will follow almost blindly any directive given by the school. Talks given to the parents by the school authorities or outside speakers, are well attended and usually produce great effect. Some parents who marvel at the remarkable improvement in their children's behavior may want to know the spirit and the religious basis of such character-training.

Conferences on educational subjects often develop into courses on religion and lead some parents to baptism. Since Catholic schools enroll many students from the better families, professional men, such as doctors, lawyers, professors, etc. who might not get acquainted with Catholicism otherwise can get such information through the school. These men in turn through their contacts often communicate their information to others, and thus knowledge of Christianity is spread.

3. Upon other educators

Principals and teachers of other public and private schools often visit Catholic schools and consult the teachers on educational matters. They might be interested in the method used to train character, often ask about the religious basis upon which this program is built. Frequently they return determined to apply some of the Catholic principles in their own schools. Public school teachers and teachers of other private schools often send their own children to our schools.

4. Upon society at large

Catholic schools often get attention in the press. Various ceremonies the cultural and athlectic activities especially Universities entrance results appear in prints and published all over the country.

Our schools being known as La Salle and Catholic the attention is then focused on the Catholic Church.

3. ADMISSION OF CATHOLIC STUDENTS INTO CATHOLIC SCHOOLS

Article 798 of Canon Law states the obligation of Catholic parents to send their children to Catholic schools. The Catholic schools themselves have therefore a correlative obligation to accept Catholic children. However, as with any obligation stemming from positive legislation, practical circumstances may render the fulfillment of this obligation difficult or almost impossible. At present, because of the educational situation in Japan, it is simply impossible to give every Catholic child an opportunity to receive education in a Catholic school.

Limits are set by the number of students that can be accepted and by the academic standard which Catholic schools must maintain in order to recruit good students and continue to exert their missionary influence. If a school, for example, were to accept every Catholic irrespective of his scholastic ability, it would lose its reputation for being just and objective. This being known, the Catholic parents would send their children to public schools instead.

We try to give every possible consideration to Catholic applicants having the greatest welfare of the Church at heart. If we were to accept all Catholic students without passing the entrance examinations, the school authorities as well as those Catholic students would be despised by non-Catholic teachers and students. The school would lose its prestige and there would be a decrease in the enrollment. Financially speaking it would become quite a burden not receiving any help from the diocese and being a private school very little from the Japanese Government.

4. LASALLIANS FACING REALITIES IN JAPAN

Frustration. A Lasallian engaging in education in Japan may experience a deep frustration upon realizing that although his Congregation has established and is administering the school, he may not in many cases be so free in this administration as in his home country. This because he has to reckon with the limits set by law, by local custom, the composition of the lay staff (most of them non-Catholic) in the school etc. One must realize on what legal basis private schools are granted approval to operate in Japan. They are granted their charter on the basis of an act of endowment, called in Japanese "kifukoi". Through the "kifukoi" the property of the newly established Catholic school is legally separated from the ownership of the founding religious corporation and is administered by a new school juridical person. The school can thus be considered as a part of the educational setup of the country. Religious teachers should be careful in thinking or speaking too much in terms of "our" school. They should rather consider themselves as Japanese educators working in the educational framework of this country. As for local customs, regulations, teachers' opinions, etc. any attempt to disregard these and operate the school alone or on the pattern of their home countries would be fatal.

Non-Catholic teachers and students do not immediately perceive the greatness of the religious as such. They often evaluate a Brother only as a person and as a teacher.

The Brothers have been asked by the Lord to work in a milieu where human relations in the beginning at least, may not be very rewarding. Students and parents do however appreciate the devotion of religious teachers and on occasion express their wholehearted gratitude. That came into focus last year when one of the Brothers was awarded the Order of the Rising Sun, Rosette Golden Rays by the Japanese Government with the Imperial Seal.

Expert teaching. If a Brother is an expert in his field he will be duly appreciated by the staff and the students, and it will greatly increase his influence.

Availability. A Brother should always be available for consultation, student guidance or teachers' conferences, and make every effort to attend all school activities.

Teaching of religion. The long school hours (six days a week) and the many extracurricular activities present a difficult problem. Religion courses have to be wedged into a tight schedule. Time can be found, however, if one is willing to adapt himself to conditions.

Evenness of temper. East is East and West is West. No doubt many things will annoy a Brother when he comes to Japan. As elsewhere a man who gets angry is the loser.

Unity among the Brothers. It is essential to preserve unity among the Brothers living in community and in a school. The least sign of disunity among them will be noticed by the staff and students to the great detriment of the apostolic aims of the school.

Conclusion.

In Japan the educator's motto should be to work quietly day after day, in great humility and patience, with great charity and kindness for all. Results, sometimes very rewarding, will appear in God's appointed time. «In order to respond to this divine plan and also to situations of distress similar to those that the Founder knew, the Institute desires to be present to the world today as part of the Church's work in spreading the Gospel.» (R. 11)

REFLECTION

after the Gospel

at the Closing Liturgy of the Fourth Session of the Buttimer Institute of Lasallian Studies

(St. Mary's College, Moraga, California) July 14, 1989

«And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee, and a report concerning him went out through all the surrounding country. And he taught in their synagogues, being glorified by all.

And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up; and he went to the synagogue, as his custom was, on the sabbath day. And he stood up to read; and there was given to him the book of the prophet Isaiah. He opened the book and found the place where it is written,

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor.

He has sent me to proclaim release to captives and recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty those who are oppressed, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord."

And he closed the book, and gave it back to the attendant, and sat down; and the eyes of all in the synagogue were fixed upon him. And he began to say to them: "Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing"» (Luke 4:14-21).

This particular segment of the gospel of Luke is situated immediately following the baptism of Jesus in the river Jordan (Luke 3:21-22) and the great temptations of Jesus in the wilderness (Luke 4:1-13). It is in the wake of these great experiences of affirmation, of self-clarification, and of empowerment that Jesus goes home... that Jesus goes home to Nazareth, the town "where he had been brought up."

For many of us here at the Buttimer Institute, these past three weeks together have been an extraordinary experience. For many of us, these three weeks have been a powerful experience of re-foundation... of increased self-understanding... of re-dedication to God's holy work. And so it is today, with Jesus, that we pack our bags, ship our packages, say our good-byes, and prepare to go home.

There is another way, however, to look at this issue of "going home." For some of us, hasn't the whole of these three weeks, or perhaps even for others the whole of these past three summers here at the Buttimer Institute, been a kind of going home? Hasn't this experience been a kind of going home to the real John Baptist de La Salle... a more human, a more accessible, a more inspiring and loving father... a going home to the foundational vision, the gospel call, the initial dream... home to that time when God's most Holy Spirit raised up our new family in the Church in order to bring the Good News to youth who found themselves cut-off and without access to the promises of the Covenant... a going home to the deepest and best in ourselves... a being re-called, re-claimed, and re-challenged by that same God, who De La Salle assures us, is so good that he always takes the necessary means to make himself known (MTR 1)?

In the wake of this Buttimer Institute experience, we leave here with a clearer sense of having been chosen once again... sent once again... empowered once again. We return home more aware that "the Spirit of the Lord God is truly upon us"... sending us to challenge the darkness of ignorance... sending us to set free those imprisoned by self-doubt... sending us to be the compassionate presence of God leading back those who are alienated and spiritually abandoned... those cut-off from the Truth in a society where, more and more, the teaching of religion is like the teaching of a second language.

How fitting it is then as we prepare to go home... how appropriate it is that we gather here at the table of the Eucharist as we prepare to leave... that we pause and remember as we gather around this table of the Lord's Supper that we do not go home alone. The Father so loved the world that he sent his only Son to bring us home (John 3:16)! The Father so loves the poor... the abandoned... those without access to the promises of salvation that he sends us to bring them home!

The great apostle Paul says that it is not I who pray... it is not we who pray... it is the Spirit of Jesus praying in us (Romans 8:15-16). It is the Spirit of Jesus in the depths of our hearts crying out, "Father, bring me home! Father, help me bring them home!" I believe that this is the scriptural foundation of what John Baptist de La Salle meant whent he told us to get in touch, in the first place, with that interior movement in the depth of our hearts... to get in touch with that inner stirring of God's Holy Spirit murmuring, "Father, bring me home" (MSF 62 & CL 15, p. 103). I believe that this is also why he told us to be equally attentive to that same Holy Spirit murmuring in the hearts of those most abandoned and spiritually cut-off... in the hearts of the young people with whom we work... and through whom that very same holy Spirit cries out in prayer to us, "bring me home" (MTR 37).

And so tonight as we prepare to leave... as we celebrate this new begining..., I urge you to keep in mind these words of our beloved Founder and to pray for the grace to be faithful on your journey. De La Salle writes: "Entreat then this God of hearts to keep your heart and the hearts of your brothers and sisters one in the heart of Jesus" (MSF 39).

The Buttimer Institute was founded in 1986 as a study project of the United States-Toronto Region. Conducted at St. Mary's College, Moraga, California, groups of 30 to 40 Lasallians educators come together for 3 consecutive summers to examine the foundations, pedagogy, catechetics, and spirituality of John Baptist de La Salle and the Christian Schools founded by De La Salle's Brothers.

NEW LIFE FOR THE LASALLIAN FAMILY IN QUEBEC

The breath of new life given to the Lasallian Family by the last General Chapter is reflected in the greater cohesion among different former students associations, in closer relations between Brothers and former students, in a growing need among our members to deepen their grasp of Lasallian spirituality, and in work more in line with the spirit of our Holy Founder.

A common programme for Lasallian groups

In the past, each of our schools had a former students' association. In the last 25 years, changes in schools have led to fortunate amalgamations, and so now, all the former students of the city of Quebec belong to the same Lasallian organisation.

The result of so many people coming together gives much more strength to the various apostolic activities we engage in in the region. This increase in numbers encourages new ventures, and provides dynamism, efficiency and support for important schemes.

Another advantage of having one group has to do with the need of some standardisation in the training of members. Since we are asked to be more and more knowledgeable about the teachings and life of St. John Baptist de La Salle, there is a need to draw up some worthwhile programme. We are asked to organise day-long refresher courses, provide topics for study, directions, literature, all of which presupposes some forward planning.

The Lasallian Federation of Canada also makes it more easy to arrive at standardisation in the work of the assessors in the four Canadian Districts. At the three annual meetings, the exchange of information about local activities provides an incentive for all the groups.

As far as those who do not belong to the Federation are concerned, assessors are still trying to devise a common training programme. They have a scheme for next autumn.

It is clear that the publication of the Letter to the Lasallian Family offers us a good opportunity to reflect on our apostolate, and on the qualities that are needed of a group wishes to join this new movement. Such reflection will enable everyone who is already involved to become reacquainted with the whole of the spirituality of St. John Baptist de La Salle.

Creation of new links between Brothers and lay people

Usually it was the Director who looked after the former students' association: the other Brothers did not feel particularly involved. Apart from special anniversaries, there were very few contacts with former students.

With the closure of our schools and their regionalisation, many associations found it difficult to survive, and others folded up. This situation enabled us to form the Quebec Lasallian Association. In the absence of specific premises, meetings began to be held in Brothers' communities. This was the first step in the establishment of closer relations between Brothers and lay people. Nowdays it would not occur to anyone to hold monthly meetings anywhere but at the Brothers' house.

These links between the two groups lead to greater mutual understanding and awareness of one another's problems. People living in the world help us at times to get our feet back on the ground, and this enables us to work better with ordinary people or the underprivileged. On our side, our Gospel values influence those that come into contact with us.

Let us give you an example of what we mean. Three times a year, Lasallian men and women come to visit our retired Brothers. Their comments include the following: these Brothers give us a lesson in serenity, and faith in God. They continue to be Christian teachers even in old age. We like visiting them because they give us more than we give them.

Deepening of Lasallian Spirituality

We have always had members who were very active in local good works. But, in the last few years, especially since the Congress in Mexico, they have been trying more and more to bring the Gospel dimension into their work for charity.

The truth of this is borne out by the increasing demands they are making for means to study the life of our Holy Founder. They want to delve more and more deeply into his spirit. As a result their life as Christians becomes renewed. An example of this, some asked for a day of recollection in preparation for Lent.

Every time we speak of St. John Baptist de La Salle, they listen with great attention. What attracts them most is his interest in the Scriptures, his faith and trust in God, his work to give human and spiritual help to young people, and his gift of being able to bring people together for his schools.

The stress on Christian education

When it comes to choosing activities, they always insist on allocating time for the pastoral care of either young people or adults. In this way, members follow our Holy Founder's approach who always stressed the education of the individual as a whole.

As we take part in their assemblies, we feel that they are inspired and guided by Lasallian spirituality. For them, concern for the young, the poor, and ordinary families is a priority.

The publication of the Letter to the Lasallian Family comes at a good time. All will be able to find in it new reasons to stimulate their apostolic work. The feeling of belonging to a group that includes so many people inspired by the same spirit will give renewed stimulus to each one's spiritual life. The heritage of our Father, shared with them, will produce in the Church a much needed and hoped for renewal.

«SHARED MISSION»

HOW SHALL IT BE ACHIEVED?

One of the most burning questions of our present Rule concerns the fact that at present the Institute and the Brothers share their apostolic mission with lay colleagues who share the work of our Brothers' schools.

Proof of this lies in the numerous articles and conferences produced by the Institute on this theme. They are becoming so common that little by little the topic is evolving platitudes uttered almost unconsciously.

1. Mission of the Institute and the Brother

Mission:

We realize that to fulfill a mission in the Church it is not enough just to work long and hard. Such work becomes "ministry" when it is seen as a sharing in the "mission" of the Church.

The Brothers are fulfilling the "mission" which the Church entrusted to them when the Institute was officially recognized and approved. It is the mission to provide a Christian education for children and youth and this is identical with the finality of this Institute as formulated in the Rule.

Consecration and the spirit of the Institute:

In accepting that mission, whoever wants to be a Brother leaves the ordinary life of the world, accepts to live in poverty, chastity and obedience for the love of Christ and unites himself to other Brothers in order to run schools "together and by association". «The Brothers participate in the Church's mission by consecrating their lives to God in order to bring the Gospel to the educational world» (Rule 12).

These are the commitments which change a man into a Brother. Living out this reality requires one essential factor: a soul, a spirit, which in this case is the spirit of faith and zeal. The Brother acquires and deepens it during a period of intense formation in the spiritual life.

Acquiring and maintaining this spirit is so essential that he who does not have it, or has lost it, even though he lives in community and calls himself a Brother «ought to be considered, and consider himself as a dead member». It is the adquisition of this spirit of the Institute which changes a person into a bona fide member of that society. Of course, it is self-evident that the possession of this spirit cannot be measured statistically nor can anyone infallibly know who has it and who does not.

Mission and spiritual life

De La Salle frequently correlates the spiritual life of the Brother and the success of his apostolate: i.e., his mission. «Secular affairs are a great source of distraction and they would render you incapable of applying your mind to those exercises which demand that our thoughts should be filled with God's holy spirit« (M. 114, §3). «Rest assured that you will do good in the Church only in so far as you are filled with faith and conduct yourself by the Spirit of Faith, which is the spirit of your Institute with which you should be animated» (M. 139, §2).

Ministry

As he goes about his work of teaching, a Brother is fulfilling his mission and accomplishing his "ministry" of education within the Church. «Teach them the rules of a Christian life and the means by which they may secure their eternal salvation. It is for this end that God has called you to your present vocation» (M. 87 §2). The Rule says: «The Brothers consider their professional work as a ministry» (R. 13).

Because he is entrusted with a ministry within the Church the Brother shares all the characteristics proper to "one who is sent", one who has been given a "mission" or in other words an apostle. That is why De La Salle uses terms of high esteem for the dignity of the Brother (and the teacher) such as the following: Minister of God (M 3, 2; 51, 1), collaborator with God (M. 205, 1); dispensor of the ministries of God (M. 166, 3), minister of the Spirit of God (M. 189, 1), co-worker with Jesus Christ (M. 195, 196...), ambassador, minister and vicar of Jesus Christ (M. 78, 2; 93, 3; 99, 2), guardian angel (M. 197), voice of God (M. 3; 168, 2), spiritual father (M. 110, 1; 157, 1), good shepherd (M. 33; 196), minister of the Church (M. 199, 2; 201, 2), helpers of the parish priest (M. 61, 3...), etc., etc.

* * *

Therefore the mission of the Brother has a certain hierarchical order: First, the Church recognizes that the Institute has a mission which is a part of its own mission – spreading the Gospel and working at the salvation of all mankind. Secondly, the Brother consecrates himself entirely to God as a member of the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools and acquires its spirit. Thirdly, as a living member of that Society he becomes part of its mission and commits himself to its realization by being an educator. Fourthly, all his work is done as a "ministry" within the Church. Fifthly, as he fulfills his mission by means of his ministry, he takes on the dignity of an apostle, a minister of God, an ambassador or Jesus Christ, etc.

2. The laity associated in the mission

In synthesis, this is the basis on which the mission of the Institute and the Brother rests. Then, when we speak of the "shared mission" of lay collaborators, we are actually saying that they share in this total concepts. They share; that is, they have a role in it. But they are a part in the sense that they are a sector of people who fulfill an educational role within the schools.

The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools confide to the lay teachers of their schools the responsibility which it has contracted with the Church, which involves fulfilling its mission of educating by exercising its "ministry" of education.

With ideal logic, that would mean that these lay persons would also "be formed" as the Brothers are, for the fulfillment of their ministry. This would involve a preparation consisting the adquisition of the spirit which "animates" their life and mission as teacher.

In other words, if the Institute invites lay teachers to exercise its apostolic mission, it must also make it possible to acquire the spirit of the Institute by which it fulfills its mission.

The Rule (N° 17) tells us that «The Brothers gladly associate lay persons with them in their educational mission.» Then in N° 146 it repeats that «The Institute can associate with itself lay people who want to lead the life of perfection that the Gospel demands, by living according to the spirit of the Institute and by participating in its mission».

It is evident that the Rule does not make a distinction with regard to lay people as our collaborators between the mission and the spirituality of the Institute. Rather, it presupposes them. Further, it could be said that there are two pre-conditions for a lay person to be associated with our mission:

a) A desire to strive for evangelical perfection, (it being understood within the lay or secular state).
b) Acquisition of the spirit proper to the Institute.

Naturally, the first condition can be met by any Christian. However, for the second, some means must be provided: some way to become acquainted with that spirit, in what it consists, the way in which it can be acquired, etc.

3. The responsibility of the Institute and of each Brother

The lay teachers who work in the Brothers' schools have little knowledge of the spirit of the Institute and they are not going to acquire it by osmosis. In this regard, the Rule is very clear: the Institute and the Brothers «are to provide for those who so desire, the means to learn about the Founder and to live according to his spirit» (R. 17).

This article of the Rule is not simply an advisory. It does not say "they may offer", "it is proper to offer"... It says specifically: "they provide". And this is directly in reference to "association with our mission".

Therefore, although "shared mission" is an appealing expression, it cannot remain just a bit of currently popular terminology. While all the Brothers and even the entire Institute become aware of this reality as though it were a new discovery made in this third centennary of our existence as an Institute, we must accept that our lay collaborators have a right to whatever may be necessary for them to fulfill the mission which we confide to them.

It would be easy to yield quietly to the temptation of saying that this should be handled by Superiors, the Region or perhaps each District. We could be satisfied to hear that "a center of formation for lay teachers is being organized", or that certain Brothers "are arranging for it". This might put us as ease, but it is not enough.

If the Institute wishes to be faithful to its mission in the Church and if that mission is fulfilled in large part by lay teachers, then it becomes necessary that we give them all the best possible means to make their work pleasant and effective. It is always possible that some of our collaborators would want no part of it. Others might be satisfied to do their teaching or professional work with no reference to Gospel values... This is sad, but it is not a valid reason for the Brothers and the Institute to neglect «offering them the means of knowing the Founder and of living according to his spirit».

* * *

In view of all that has been said, it might be in order at this point to answer a few pertinent questions:

– What does the statement "The Institute willingly associates lay people into its mission" mean to me?

– Is my community happy to associate lay people into its work?

– What is my attitude with regard to the lay people who work with me in my school?

– Do these lay people know the Founder and the spirit of the Institute?

– What has the community done to provide the means thereto?

– What have I personally done to help lay teachers become aware of the spirit of the Institute?

– What difficulties or obstacles have arisen to prevent it?

– What is the District doing about it? Is this enough?

– What is being done by the Region? Is this enough?

– Are the Brothers in general sufficiently concerned about providing lay teachers with the means to "share" our mission?

– What are the goals of the Community? the District? the Region? the Institute?

– What are my personal goals?

VILLA LA SALLE

Retirement Living Complex

Southport. Queensland, Australia

In keeping with our Districts throughout the world, the District of Australia has been taking steps to provide for the ageing Brothers. Our Oldest Brother, Br. Anselm Hallam, will celebrate his 90th birthday next year.

Up untill a few years ago, the elderly Brothers, when they could no longer teach or perform some helpful task in the school, have always preferred to remain within an active community. This has been Br. Anselm's choice and he is a member of the Revesby community.

In the past, when the time came for more adequate care than could be given in community, the Brothers were willing to transfer to a Nursing Home staffed by Religious Sisters. This has always been a successful move for them, and they rapidly adjusted to their changed circumstances.

Over the last decade and more, those Brothers who are no longer teaching or in school related endeavours, but are still able to look after themselves and even engage in other apostolates, have had special arrangements made for them to live in a retirement community. Some 12 years ago, a house for retired Brothers was built on our "Oakhill" property at Castle Hill. This has accommodation for 15 Brothers. At the present time, additions are being completed to provide Nursing Home facilities for those who need 24-hour care and supervision.

Other accommodation for elderly but active Brothers was provided in one of three houses on a site at Southport, Queensland, belonging to our Boys Town operation at Beaudesert. Southport is on the coast, Beaudesert is some 70 km inland. This property was the original Cable Station (the "All Red" route from England, through Canada, to Fanning Island in the Pacific Ocean, on to Norfolk Island, and finally Southport.) which operated from 1901 to 1962.

The Trustees of the De La Salle Brothers acquired its 1.2 hectares in 1964 (on which the three above-mentioned houses stood). The central house had been the receiving and transmitting office and equipment; another house was the Manager's residence; and the third one was for the telegraphic staff's residential quarters (there was a staff of 22).

The property had been acquired as an annexe to Boys Town. This was a successful experiment for giving a week's experience of a new and exciting environment for each of the seven Boys Town Cottages (House Parents and twelve boys). Youth Groups from Brisbane and other towns often sought the use of "Camp La Salle" (as it was called) for special live-in session. During the long vacations experienced Brothers, assisted by Brothers Scholastics, volunteered to take children from the State schools for Religious Education and holidays.

During the early Eighties, the Brothers gave considerable thought to the Camp La Salle site. The wear and tear of some twenty years of use necessitated considerable work if the "Camp" was to continue. Many similar youth camps were now available and Brothers were in short supply. The Brother Visitor and Council came to the decision, in 1981, to continue to use one of the houses for the elderly Brothers –the winters were very mild and the climate eminently stuitable for retirement living–. The entire property was not needed for this special purpose, and so it was a question of selling part of it, or using it for some other purpose. It was decided to develop the remainder of the site for Retirement Living units for people who would appreciate the type of advantages which could be offered –a Chapel, Daily Mass, resident Chaplain, Anointing of the Sick and Elderly each month, Reconciliation twice weelky, a community of Retired Brothers, and all the amenities of gracious, secure and peaceful living.

Br. Peter McIntosh was entrusted with the initiation and development of the scheme –which saw the removal of the three buildings and the construction of an entirely new complex of sixty-one self-contained units and fifty-one studio apartments, landsacaping, administrative and recreation areas, and many associated facilities. The staged development was completed over five years, residents moving in as soon as each stage was ready.

The Bothers' Residence, Chapel, and hostel dining room and kitchen, were the last stage to be occupied in late 1986 and a community of Brothers was established. This became four in 1988 and six in 1989. Two more Brothers will join the community in 1990, one in charge of Nursing Care and other for Pastoral duties. Meanwhile, elderly Brothers from southern colder States come to the Villa for part of the winter months.

At the time of writing, each of the Brothers is able to make a contribution to the life of the Villa –sacristan, Art tuition, Brothers' dining room care, Distrtict publications, bursar, bookkeeping. Five are over 70, and one is in his middle sisties.

The Brothers take their meals in the hostel residents' dining room on weekdays, taking their places as assigned by the kitchen staff. Their presence is very much appreciated by the residents.

In holiday periods, Brothers from other distant communities make use of the accommodation for rest and recreation after their apostolic work in the schools or elsewhere. It is an eminently suitable place for Brothers whose health, physical or mental, requires a period of quiet and rest before resuming their apostolic work.

Villa La Salle has a full-time Manageress and Assistant. Theirs is the responsibility for the day-today management of the entire complex –financial, kitchen and dining room, gardens, maintenance, etc.

Mass is offered each day by the resident Chaplain at 9.00 a.m. with an average congregation of twenty-five residents. The sacraments are available as outlined earlier.

An additional 45 self-contained units are being constructed at the present time and are scheduled for completion in December.

The Feasts of St. De La Salle and our Lasallian Saints and blesseds are celebrated as they occur through the year, so that the Residents become more aware of the Lasallian spirit and endeavours. As the complex develops the Brothers' contribution to the life and welfare of this project can be better assessed.

SANGRE DE CRISTO CENTER

Santa Fe, New Mexico, U.S.A.

Nature and Purpose

Sangre de Cristo Center near Santa Fe, New Mexico, is a continuing formation program for men and women religious and priests in their middle years. The Center was founded in 1962 by the De La Salle Christian Brothers. Over the twenty years of the Center's operation, about one thousand persons have taken advantage of the Sangre program to help them understand themselves as humans, as Christians, and as religious ministers in a society and a church undergroing profound cultural change.

The term "refoundation" is used to describe the work of the Center because the program does two things: a) it invites each member to a thorough examination of the fundamental understandings, motives and movements of a lifetime of ministry, and b) it encourages the development of those modes of being and doing which will bring each member's basic faith and central values effectively into his or her future ministry. The program of the Center, therefore, provides opportunities for personal interiorization through religious experience, through theological insight, and through the experience of some degree of psychological integrity.

These three dimensions of the program focus upon and facilitate the development of what is essential to an understanding and compassionate involvement in the society and church of our times.

- A permeating faith in the God who calls, who grants us personal salvation in Jesus Christ, who communicates his Spirit to us, and to whom we respond in a life of daily personal prayer.
- An adult comprehension of contemporary theological, sociological and psychological insights into God, humanity, culture, church, scripture, social needs, morality, and so on.
- A strong sense of personal identity, including the facing and acceptance of personal strengths and limitations, personal successes and failures, along with a reasonable facility in communicating both ideas and feelings.

The Sangre program calls for personal involvement in the theoretical roots of Christianity through reading, discussion, participation in formal presentations and workshops, as well as through the experience of personal solitude and prayer and the dynamics of group interchange.

Persons Whom Sangre Can Help:

The program and style of life at Sangre is designed for a religiuos or priest of middle years (from 38 through about 58 years of age) who is in good health, is adjusted psychologically, who is desirous of some updating in various areas through reading, listening and discussion, and who is willing to contribute generously to interrelating with others in this group experience.

Persons Whom Sangre Cannot Help:

As part of our continual growth toward Christian maturity, each of us must deal with repeated experience of weakness and failure. There are, however, some difficulties which require the assistance of a skilled professional. Sangre cannot be helpful, for example, in the remediation of alcoholism or such psychological issues as dissociation, withdrawal, or severe levels of discontent, authority hostility, depression, etc. Such a person is, in fact, in need of professional psychological or psychiatric assistance.

Location

Sangre de Cristo Center is about twelve miles northwest of the City of Santa Fe, New Mexico, in the foothills of the Sangre de Cristo Mountains adjacent to the Santa Fe National Forest. The extensive property in a private valley contains the buildings of the Center, an assortment of mesas and arroyos, two smal spring-fed ponds and two minor waterfalls on a small stream. The site was chosen primarily because of its wild natural beauty, its bracing climate at an elevation of 7,100 feet, and its almost constant sunshine and clear air. For someone not yet familiar with the rugged beauty of the Southwestern United States, the contrast with other greener parts of the world will be startling at first.

In order to take advantage of the distinctive culture of the Santa Fe area, as well as for personal convenience, trips to the city are usually scheduled twice weekly. Optional participation in some of the cultural events of the area is possible at times.

The Program

Presentations/Discussions: One important aspect of the program is the balanced series of presentation in theology, psychology, spirituality, religious life, various ministries, social awareness, intelligence, overall comprehension of the movement of culture, and their ability to comunicate. Presentations are generally given in both a morning interval of two hours and an evening interval of an hour and a half, although not all program segments have both morning and evening presentations. There is a short break midway through each presentation, and discussion is encouraged throughout. Since Sangre presenters are resident at the Center during the time of their presentations, personal consultation and informal interchange is readily available.

Reading: In order to gain the most from the presentation of the visitng staff, as well as to benefit generally from the Sangre experience, a collateral reading program is strongly recommended for each participant. During the orientation period a recommended reading list is distributed and explained; in addition, visiting presenters also suggest particular works relevant to their coverage. A few special mornings are set aside (with no formal presentations) during which some of this reading may be done, but these will never suffice unless some of the other open times in the program are used for the reading. As in all of the program, some specific objectives and a personal plan are part to the overall initiative and self-discipline that make Sangre work.

Prayer and Liturgy: One feature common to all Sangre participants is the desire for a deepening of their regular personal prayer life. Whether this desire results from a sense of enrichment and wanting more, from a sense of dissatisfaction and wanting better, from a response to the word of Jesus in the gospel, from some particular awareness of giftedness or need, from the search for ultimate meaning in life –or from whatever source, the desire is there. To confirm in the participants the conviction of the indispensability of a life of prayer and to help them enrich their personal experience of such a life, several presenters treat of the nature and practice of prayer. Although no set time is scheduled for personal prayer, the large amount of open time throughout the program allows for individual differences, vocation, and response to the grace of Christ. Two special measures do, however, facilitate development in this regard:

- Quiet time of about forty-five minutes is ordinarily provided each morning, during which all other activities come to a halt.
- An eight-day directed retreat, somewhere near the midpoint of the program, deals specifically with one's personal prayer life and opens up an opportunity for growth and enrichment.

The Eucharistic Liturgy is celebrated at least six days each week at Sangre. The creativity of all of the participants in arranging readings, hymns, symbols and action gives to this celebration a special quality and also helps to affirm its unique place in the life of a Christian.

Community praise is generally offered each morning. Participants share the responsibility for planning and leading the community prayer. The creativity of all is called into play in the generation and combination of ritual, symbols and word that will give public expression to the presence and action of the Risen Christ in the hearts of all. Finally, about once every two weeks, an opportunity is provided for an hour of shared prayer for those who wish.

Community Life: Community is an analogous term. The word may be used to describe family, school, civic and religious groups, even the "one world" of humankind, yet in each case it connotes different though similar meanings. The Sangre community, both by reason of its relatively short duration and because of its intensive and compressed dynamics within a modified educational structure for the achievement of specific program goals, differs significantly from what is ordinarily meant by the term religious community. The ordinary community norms do not apply, for the most part, especially in the establishment of structures.

On the other hand, the freedom of time and the close association in a common task not only allow but actively encourage the participants to develop a degree of intimacy and sharing at a level of understanding beyond the usual experience of community living. This intimacy and sharing, along with the excellent theoretical and practical assistance of various staff members, fosters a general harmonious relationship among both participants and staff. Some even find the circumstances conducive to the development of a few warm personal friendships that may continue over many years.

There are certain important facets of Sangre life which contribute to this bonding relationship but which are not treated under other headings. Of particular importance among these:

– Social gathering from time to time celebrating the event of Christian brotherhood and sisterhood.
– Regular personal interviews with one of the program directors, both as scheduled and at the initiative of the participant.
– The unique experience of togetherness-in-solitude during the many times when one receives from or gives to others that blend of companionate presence and respect for privacy which supports the solitude sometimes needed to work through issues of personal integration.

Recreation: The opportunity for outdoor activities is a significant part of Sangre life. The area around Sangre and the climate are excellent for hiking, walking and moderate mountain climbing. Sangre also has facilities and equipment for tennis and volleyball.

Five special days are set aside for full-day community outings to some scenic spots of historical/cultural and geographic interest within moderate distance. For those interested, shorter outings to other areas of considerable scenic beauty are also offered on some Sunday afternoons; additional similar activities depend upon the initiative of individuals and the group. The daily schedule, of course, usually includes some open time for physical recreating as well.

Recreation of a more cultural nature is available during the afternoon visits to Santa Fe and its environs, through the house collections of musical and literacy works, through radio and television, through occasional special events at nearby Indian Pueblos, and through attendance at some of the cultural events sponsored by local civic and educational organizations. One free weekend is scheduled for those who wish to travel beyond the immediate area.

Work: The only paid employees at Sangre are an outstanding experienced cook and some part-time help. Each morning there is a short housework period, and dishes are done after meals. Approximately every two weeks, there is a scheduled work period of about three hours during which necessary maintenance, cleaning and some clerical work is done. The work pattern is rooted in necessity and communal responsibility in general, but it also provides a healthy variation from activities that might otherwise deal only with academic and reflective pursuits. Of course, the intrinsic human and Christian value of work itself is something to which we all witness, not just at Sangre but in the labor of our everyday lives.

Length of the Program: One hundred days is an arbitrary span of time. The experience of some twenty years of the Sangre program indicates, however, that these one hundred days seriously undertaken are sufficient for considerable progress in the following areas:

– growth in personal prayer life and the setting of some guidelines for future responsiveness to this continual call of the Spirit;
– digesting much of the rich content of the program, while determining ways to continue this lifelong learning process;
– developing and beginning work on a reading program which is capable of enriching and instructing for a lifetime;
– experiencing the dynamics of human interrelating on an intimate level, then choosing some means of bringing this same style of relating to future dealings with one's self and others;
– accepting and understanding one's need, dependence and vulnerability, while at the same time strengthening the awareness of one's giftedness and empowerment, so as to encourage overall a faith-filled approach to life which is both realistic and hopeful.

The very pace of the Sangre program is itself important to the experience. Open times (for example: Sundays, most afternoons, and some evenings) are as useful and necessary to personal growth during the program as are the formal input sessions. Here, as in all of life, each participant has to find ways of balancing initiative and involvement with discipline and restraint.

INTRODUCTION

LASALLIANA BEGINS A NEW YEAR.

LASALLIANA begins a third year in the second period of its existence.

In the first period, 13 issues were published, at the rate of 3 per year, and these were obtained by individual subscriptions.

Publication ceased on account of certain difficulties that had arisen. The General Council, however, received many letters from all over the Institute deploring its disappearance. Those who made use of Lasalliana knew how useful it was.

The General Council saw from the letters it had received how much the publication was missed and requested publication to be resumed. And so it was that issue N°. 14 appeared in January 1989 as an Institute publication. Since then two years have come and gone and the third is beginning.

LASALLIAN IS MEANT FOR:

- Brothers and Brothers' communities
- Staff of Lasallian schools
- Lay staff who work with us in our educational apostolate
- Members of the Lasallian Family.

WHAT IS THE AIM OF LASALLIANA?

- To provide information and thought-provoking material about
  - The Holy Founder: his life, work and spirituality
  - The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools
  - The vocation and consecrated life of the Brother
  - The educational apostolate, the shared apostolate, the educational service of the poor, the Lasallian Family.
  - Pedagogical topics (education, methodology) with special reference to our own schools.
- To describe things that have been done:
  - Of a religious, educational, pastoral nature, etc., in the Lasallian world.
  - In the way of missionary activity, Lasallian Voluntary Service, schemes to improve living conditions and to promote religion, etc.

WHO CONTRIBUTES TO LASALLIANA?

- LASALLIANA accepts contributions from all sections of the Lasallian world: Brothers, communities, lay teachers, friends, etc. Anyone who wants to can write in and his contribution will be welcome.
- LASALLIANA also asks certain specific people to write articles for it.

HOW IS LASALLIANA DISTRIBUTED?

- Formerly, LASALLIANA was obtained by individual or community subscriptions. THIS IS NO LONGER THE CASE.
- At present, it is the District that sends in the subscription. That is to say, the Visitor informs the Generalate (the Secretary General) how many copies the District requires.

The District distributes copies to communities, schools and to those persons for whom the publication would be useful. Sometimes there is a case for sending copies to people outside the Lasallian Family who are not aware of the publication's existence and therefore cannot ask for it.

Districts are asked to stimulate the demand for this Institute publication which has been thought out and prepared for the purpose of sharing thought-provoking material, knowledge, and information about happenings in the Lasallian world. It is up to the Brothers, communities, Lasallian schools, etc. No one should be left out. We have a very good tool at our disposal and we should use it. Thank you to those who make our work easier.

THE TERCENTENARY OF THE HEROIC VOW OF 21 NOVEMBER, 1691 (1/2)

A man in a state of «great perplexity»

During the summer of 1691, Blain tells us (1), Monsieur de La Salle found himself in a state of "great perplexity". On the one hand, he had every reason to be proud of the work that had been accomplished in twelve years –ten Christian and free schools under the direction of his Brothers; on the other hand, he saw that, for some time now, difficulties and obstacles of all kinds were piling up.

When, in February 1688, he had come to Paris with two Brothers in response to the request of M. de La Barmondière, parish priest of Saint Sulpice, to take up residence there in the Rue Princesse and assume responsibility for the parish school, he had left behind in Reims a flourishing community, a postulancy and a training college for masters from rural districts. But in the absence of the Founder the situation had deteriorated at Reims: the community had lost half of its members (8 Brothers out of 16), the college had to close and the postulancy was almost empty (the Founder had transferred this to Paris, but to no avail –the last young subjects had left and had not been replaced).

In the capital itself the situation was far from reassuring. True, the success of the Rue Princesse school had led the new parish priest of Saint-Sulpice (M. Baudrand) to entrust a second school to the Brothers, this one in the Rue du Bac. But this had provoked the wrath of the writing masters who took M. de La Salle to court, and even though they lost their case, they did not lay down their arms: further attacks were only too clearly to be expected from them. The parish priest himself had wanted to modify the habit worn by the Brothers, a presumption on his part that threatened the interior liberty of the community. The Superior had replied with his "Memoire on the Habit" which was, more than anything else, a defence of the specific nature and autonomy of the Institute.

Added to these worries from outside, the Founder had serious reason to be concerned about his health. A first sign of this occurred in December 1690 on the occasion of a journey to Reims. A relapse followed in 1691, and this time his life was endangered; it needed the energetic and painful intervention of Dr. Helvetius to fend off the threat. Meanwhile another terrible trial had befallen him: Brother Henri L'Heureux, whom he had brought to Paris to prepare him to take over as Superior, had died after only a short illness. Several other Brothers had also fallen ill, while two of the four members of the Paris community quit in a fit of discouragement.

In a word, the "perplexity" spoken of by Blain well expressed a personal crisis for La Salle, a crisis of doubt and disarray: «after so many sacrifices, so much labour and trouble, after so many crosses and persecutions, he was back where he had been ten years earlier, with only a handful of Brothers. His undertaking had not made much progress and he had reason to fear that it would eventually die out.» (2)

Growth from within.

If John Baptist de La Salle did experience discouragement, it was of short duration. He recovered his confidence in prayer and reflection and decided to bolster his Institute from within. There could be no move forward as yet, no new foundations, for there was need to strengthen wills, and strengthen bodies too, and so lay firm foundations for the future. This would be done in four stages:
– a new house would be rented, outside of Paris;
– all the Brothers would be given the opportunity to make a spiritual retreat;
– two of the Brothers would be bound to himself in a special and permanent form of association – "the heroic vow";
– a novitiate would be opened to guarantee the future of the work.

Vaugirard

It was in August 1691 that La Salle found the new residence he was looking for; he rented a house at Vaugirard, a property with spacious garden. At that time Vaugirard was only a simple a village situated on the route to Issy, south-west of Paris and about 2 km. from the gates of the capital. The village was a quiet, wooded spot, a pleasant meeting-place for the people of Paris who gathered there in the numerous inns. Today Vaugirard has become part of the capital itself and forms part of the 15th arrondissement.

The property rented by the Founder was at the entrance to the village, coming from Paris. It was about 3 km. from the Rue Princesse and 1 from the parish church, Saint Lambert's. (The present St. Lambert's is a more recent foundation and is a little nearer to the property concerned which, incidentally no longer exists, although historians have situated it in the rectangle formed by the Rues Blumet, Copreau and Vaugirard.

The house stood alone and was in poor condition, but the air was good. Blain describes it in terms of its most wretched aspects and allowance must perhaps be made for exaggeration on his part: broken windows, shutters coming apart, windows letting in rain and snow, furniture almost non-existent, absence of any heating...

At the beginning there was no chapel and for Mass, the Brothers and novices went to a private chapel nearby. In 1697, when this chapel was closed by order of the Archbishop (who was against the current tendency of private chapels to proliferate) the prelate granted the Founder authorisation to have one in the Brothers' residence.

Before coming to the subject of the "heroic vow" it may be of interest to note that, fifty years previously, in December 1641, three disciples of Père Condren, namely Jean-Jacques Olier, François de Caulet and Jean du Ferrier, had likewise betaken themselves to Vaugirard to pray and meditate there before laying the foundations of the future Society of Saint Sulpice. Was La Salle thinking about this episode when he chose Vaugirard; or was he simply influenced by the solitude and salubrity of the place, as well as its proximity to Paris, not to mention the moderate figure requested for the rent?

The vow of 21st November 1691

Blain is the only one of the first biographers of the Founder to speak about the vow of 21st November 1691. The probable explanation for this is that only the three persons involved were aware of what happened and it was one of them, Gabriel Drolin no doubt, who gave the information to Blain (3)

In his account the biographer places the heroic vow prior to the acquisition of the Vaugirard house, but in so doing he is in contradiction to other facts related by him. Thus, he provides a detailed account of the first retreat of the Brothers at Vaugirard, held in September 1691 (the period of the school vacation). Then he speaks of the "novitiate" (it was a prolonged retreat) as having begun on 8th October of the same year –a session attended by a certain number of Brothers whose places were presumably taken in the schools by teachers trained in the establishment at Reims. All of which shows very well that the house had been rented well before 21st November 1691, the date at which Blain places the "heroic vow". It seems logical therefore to situate the vow at Vaugirard, as all subsequent biographers have done.

Why 21st November?

The Presentation of the Blessed Virgin in the Temple is celebrated on 21st November and this was the date chosen for the renewal of vows by the Sulpicians, the Sisters of Father Barré, the Brothers of the Christian Union, the Congregation of Saint Louis, the French Carmelites and others. It is known also that this feast was celebrated with solemnity in the Sulpician seminaries and this had left a deep impression on the mind of John Baptist de La Salle when he was a seminarian there. No doubt these reasons had something to do with the choice of the day for the major engagement we are speaking about. Perhaps also there were particular circumstances that favoured this date. Thus, the 21st November fell on a Wednesday in 1691, and according to the 1705 text of the Rule, which was probably already in use, when this occurred, holiday was given on the Wednesday instead of the normal Thursday. We know also that on the previous day, the 20th, La Salle had made a visit to the notaries in Paris concerning the bequest of his grandmother, Perrette Lespagnol, recently deceased (4). This would have provided an opportunity for him to confer with the two Brothers concerned, whom ovbiously he would have previously contacted about the matter. Their visit to Vaugirard would pass unnoticed since all the Paris Brothers used to go there on free days. No doubt the ceremony took place in the chapel neighbouring the Brothers' house and so the latter, apart, of course, from the two concerned, knew nothing of it.

The two disciples concerned

The Founder, then, chose two disciples to undertake this commitment with him: Brother Nicholas Vuyart and Brother Gabriel Drolin.

The place and date of Nicolas Vuyart's (or Wiart's) birth are not known, but he must have entered the Institute at Reims in 1681 since we find him in charge of the school at Rethel from 1682. Some biographers think that he was principal of the teacher-training establishment at Reims in 1688, when the Founder left for Paris. However that may be, he was of the Rue du Bac school from its opening in 1690, and it is reasonable to suppose that he became the Director of the Rue Princesse community after the death of Henri L'Heureux in 1691. Later on, in 1699, when La Salle, helped by the parish priest of Saint-Hippolyte in Paris, founded a second college for teachers, it was to Vuyart that he entrusted the direction of the undertaking, showing thereby his recognition of the Brother's great pedagogical talents. As we know, the enterprise turned out badly both for the college and for Nicolas himself.

Gabriel Drolin was born at Reims (in the parish of Saint James) on 22nd July, 1664. He entered the Institute in 1684, having previously done classical studies and gone as far as receiving the tonsure. In 1685 he was sent to Laon where, the following year, he fell ill. In 1691 he must have been a member of the Rue Princesse community and was perhaps in charge of the school situated in the same place. We know that he had become the first director of the school at Calais in 1700, before being entrusted, two years later, with the arduous mission of establishing the young Institute in Rome.

We may wonder why La Salle chose these two Brothers to pronounce with him the "heroic vow" of 21st November 1691. No doubt it was because they were then the two senior members of the Institute, but also probably because of their personal and professional qualities. Anyway, they both entered into his purpose and all three pronounced the formula which we are now to read.

THE TERCENTENARY OF THE HEROIC VOW OF 21 NOVEMBER, 1691

The formula of the vow.

The formula is given in full by Blain who, no doubt, obtained it from Gabriel Drolin himself. Here it is according to his version, textual except for a simple updating of his spelling and punctuation:

«Most holy Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, prostrate with the most profound respect before thy infinite and adorable majesty, we consecrate ourselves entirely to Thee to procure with all our ability and efforts the establishment of the Society of the Christian Schools, in the manner which will seem to us most agreeable to Thee and most advantageous to the said Society.

And for this purpose, I, John Baptist de La Salle, priest; I, Nicolas Vuyart and I, Gabriel Drolin, from now on and for ever until the last surviving one of us, or unto the complete establishment of the said Society, make the vow of association and union to bring about and maintain the said establishment, without being able to withdraw from this obligation, even if only we three remained in the said Society, and if we were obliged to beg for alms and to live on bread alone.

In view of which we promise to do, all together and by common accord, everything we shall think in conscience, and regardless of any human consideration, to be for the greater good of the said Society.

Done on this 21st of November, feast of the Presentation of Our Lady, 1691. In testimony of which we have signed...» (5)

The style is certainly that of Monsieur de La Salle and one readily perceives the resemblances with the formula used in 1694 for the first perpetual vows of the principal Brothers. It is noticeable, however, that there is no explicit mention of the vow of obedience nor of the other traditional religious vows. There is question here essentially of a vow of association and of union to ensure the permanence of the enterprise. At a moment when the undertaking seemed seriously threatened three men solemnly promise before God to remain together in fidelity to the maintaining of the "establishment", even if they remained the only three members and had to live on bread they had begged. It is this last clause which, no doubt, has caused this vow to be known as "heroic" (6).

Significance of the heroic vow.

La Salle was not a man to act on the spur of the moment: his whole life shows him, on the contrary, as acting only after mature reflection and consultation. It is possible that the step he took on 21st November 1691 was inspired by the example of M. Olier and two companions who withdrew briefly from their retreat at Vaugirard and betook themselves to the sanctuary at Montmartre «to consecrate themselves to the most holy Trinity and to promise to remain united thus and to labour for the education and sanctification of the clergy...» (7). And in the formula to be used by the future sulpicians we find that they were «to unite themselves by a sacred promise never to separate nor to abandon the purpose which God had been pleased to reveal to them and even to reinforce this by various guarantees...» (7). Here, too, the accent is placed on the association and union of persons in view of a common design.

Perhaps also we may think that the Founder, having found himself at death's door a few months before, wanted to ensure the permanence of the work, even if he should be taken from it. And this he could hope to do because of two companions who agreed to join him in this lifelong commitment.

But in this gesture was, more than anything else, an act of total self-abandonment to God. As a recent biographer has written: «Three men cut the cables and launch out into the ocean of a new "opus Dei", without other sails or oars than the Providence of God». (8) Their future was to be concentrated on a single enterprise: to keep the Society of the Christian Schools in existence, and that at any cost to themselves. From now on, «they would remain bound by a special vow, staking their whole well-being, eating the bread of alms, in order to achieve the great objective. And if they should fail in this, at least it would not be due to their own negligence or cowardice. Together, all three, "until the last surviving one" of them, they would share the needs and the labour.» (9)

The fruits of the heroic vow.

Even if the vow of 21st November 1691 remained unknown to the other Brothers, it was not without effect for the future of the Institute. In the three participants themselves it certainly produced a renewed fervour and mutual trust; they found new confidence in the future of the enterprise and each could labour for its consolidation and development with a fresh sense of freedom.

It is a fact that, for the Founder himself, the subsequent years were particularly fruitful. In 1692 a real novitiate was established at Vaugirard, the first in the history of the Institute, and «it rapidly filled up with promising subjects». (10) The Paris Brothers continued to visit Vaugirard on Thursdays and Sundays, to reinvigorate themselves both physically and spiritually. According to Blain, they used to make their way there the evening before the free days and spend the night there. The Brothers of the Reims area met there each year in September for the annual retreat and, in between, they exchanged regular correspondence with Monsieur de La Salle who was thus able to guide them and strengthen them in their vocation.

Pentecost 1694 saw the first General Chapter at Vaugirard, where the twelve principal Brothers assembled with the purpose of ratifying the Rules. They concluded the Chapter by pronouncing, for the first time, perpetual vows, using a formula resembling that of 21st November 1691.

And throughout these years, whenever his direction of the novices or the Brothers and his frequent periods of prayer left him free, the Founder was composing, in addition to the Rules, the Collection, the Meditations for the Time of Retreat, the Rule for formators of the new Masters and the Memoir on the Beginnings, not to mention the first pedagogical works which he had printed: the Syllabary and the Exercices of Piety for Schools.

No doubt life at Vaugirard was austere, the food more than frugal, and the cold often piercing, but this was the second "cradle" of the Institute. No new foundation took place during this period (11) but the enterprise grew strong from within, and when it became necessary to leave Vaugirard it was because the house had become too small. It was then, in April 1698, that La Salle made the transfer to the Grand'Maison in Paris –specifically in the road which has the name of Vaugirard since it led to that village– and in doing so, he opened up a new era of expansion for the Institute. The heroic vow of 1691 had borne fruit.

RETREAT RESOLUTIONS

or «Rules which I have imposed upon myself»

(1/3)

A well-known text

The "Rules which I have imposed upon myself" are often quoted; they have been published in the form of a small booklet; and the most recent circular (N°. 429) (1) refers to them in the context of our personal programme.

Blain is the only one (2) of the first three biographers to consider these Rules of any importance. He sometimes calls them "Personal Regulations" (3); elsewhere he describes them as "General Regulations". Writing about the "Rules that I have imposed upon myself", Brother Maurice Auguste has the following to say: «The texts given us by Blain are so authentic in character that it would be unthinkable to consider them otherwise». He goes on to say: «Several of the rules are astonishingly similar in the way they are formulated to certain Considerations in the Collection which were inspired by the work of the Jesuit Hayneufve» (4).

I think that one can look at this question from another angle which is quite enlightening. According to the view expressed by Brother Maurice, although not in terms that brook no argument, the Collection was produced after Hayneufve's work and before the "Rules I have imposed upon myself".

Personally, I am inclined to say that the 20 articles written by La Salle were a direct result of his reading Hayneufve's Considerations during the course of a retreat. Our conclusion will be that we are not dealing here with a sort of "life plan" inspired by the mission he was about to undertake, which was to strengthen his new foundation. It is true, of course, that the Considerations are influenced also by the fact he has recently become a founder. There is a sort of ricochet effect.

A retreat manual

Hayneufve's Considerations are part of a larger work which bears the following title: «Meditations for the time of the exercises which are made during the eight day retreat on the 24 fundamental truths and maxims which demonstrate progress in the spiritual life and which are its perfects rule, according to the order and declaration which will be seen in the plan of this work» (5).

It is not possible to say in which year La Salle started using this work to help him with his retreat exercises, nor for how many years he did this. What is certain, however, is that he did use it. It is certain this work had an influence on the "Rules that I have imposed upon myself"; it is certain also that La Salle thought highly enough of them to adapt them for the use of his Brothers in the Collection, and to impose its reading on them during the retreat they made during the holidays.

Hayneufve had the following to say about his method of making a retreat: «The convenience of this method is that it sets out the whole plan of the exercises and of spiritual life clearly and in summary form, so that in a very short time, in the twinkling of an eye, a person can see exactly what he wants most. He sees how to begin to live spiritually, how to continue and where to stop» (6).

Hayneufve evidently considered the role played by the Considerations to be important: «(they) are the most appropriate basis for the exercises... One should also set aside some time to write down the truths, emotions and resolutions one has found striking» (7). The retreat timetable proposed by Hayneufve specifies: «at half past one: serious consideration of the subject indicated for the day». And later: «at three o'clock: write down the result of one's meditations and considerations» (8).

In the light of these facts, it would not be too far-fetched to imagine De La Salle on retreat, each day pondering the Consideration indicated for the day, making resolutions inspired by it, while bearing in mind his own particular situation.

That this was the case will become clearer if we juxtapose the text of the considerations and the practical consequences that the Founder draws from them. It will be seen that the "Rules I have imposed upon myself" are the resolutions St. La Salle made during a retreat and not a cumulative work based on the various events of his life, nor the result of his spirit of regularity, as Blain suggests, and especially not something from his own imagination.

DAY 1 OF THE RETREAT

The first thing to note is that the first article of the "Rules that I have imposed upon myself" lays down the conditions for an undisturbed retreat: it is this prerequisite for the success of the time he will spend in prayer and reflection that the Founder establishes by his first point. «I shall not go out without some good reason and without having first spent a quarter of an hour considering in the presence of God whether the need is real or only imaginary. If the need is a pressing one, I shall take at least the time of a Miserere to put some good thoughts into my head». This first point reaffirms his wish that nothing, unless there is a very serious reason for it, should disturb the time set aside for the retreat. (9) It will be useful subsequently in prolonging the spirit of the retreat.

The consideration for this first day.

It is made on a person's status in life or on whatever position he occupies.

1. After putting yourself in the presence of God and asking him for the grace to benefit from making this consideration, adore divine Providence which has created such a large variety of social ranks and positions in the Church and world, and which allocates them to each person as it thinks fit.

2. Consider your own. How did you come by it? Was there any trickery involved? Were your motives bad? Were you motivated by some natural inclinations or human respect rather than by God's order and will?

3. If something wrong was involved, retract it. If your intentions were not sufficiently pure and sincere, make them so now; and just as if you were only now taking up your position, declare solemnly that you wish to remain in it only because you believe God wants you to.

4. Declare that you are happy in your position because God wants you there, and that you do not seek your own interests, nor envy those above you nor consider yourself superior to those less important.

5. Convince yourself that it is extraordinarily important for your salvation that you be faithful in your position; and that this fidelity consists in your acting carefully, because you have received it from God and will have to render an account of it to him in all its details and circumstances (10).

Surely these first five points for consideration were such as to lead La Salle to think about the new apostolate he was undertaking: that of contributing to «the establishment and management of our community» (11)?

It is quite natural that he should be led to consider at this point the major commitment he has made to consecrate his life totally to God. The second resolution he makes would seem to be a logical consequence of these reflections.

«Every day I shall set aside some time for the quarter of an hour that I must spend renewing my consecration to the Most Holy Trinity» (12).

La Salle then reads the 6th consideration:

6. Make no distinction (13) between the activities your position involves and the question of your salvation and perfection; because you will never achieve your salvation more surely, nor acquire more perfection than by fulfilling the duties of your position, provided that you perform them with a view to following the orders of God who decides what you should do. You will also never fulfil the duties of your position better than by seeking only the service of God and your own perfection (14).

After reading this consideration, La Salle composes his third resolution which reflects a certain admiration for it.

«A good rule of thumb not to make a distinction between the activities your position involves (15) and the question of your salvation and perfection; and to be convinced (16) that you will never achieve your salvation more surely, nor acquire more perfection than by fulfilling the duties of your position, so long as you perform them with a view to following the orders of God. Must always try to have them in view.»

His resolution begins with a value judgment of Hayneufve's consideration and ends by stating the importance of following such a line of behaviour. It is clear that the use of identical words points to a copy made directly from the original. The final sentence (Must always try to have them in view) also confirms this. They are the words a person would say to himself on reading something particularly striking.

Our retreatant continues with his reading of the Considerations, and writes the resolutions they inspire. Point 7 perhaps did not strike him very much:

7. (In one's position) one should never do what is wrong, only what is good; but as there are several kinds of good, consider those entailed by your position: examine your behaviour in their light, note where faults are committed and what the remedies are.

(2) Blain, II, 318-320. Writing about these texts of the regulation, he says: «this regulation was the general one he had prescribed for himself; and he makes us wish for the loss of the private one of which he speaks». It is clear the biographer meant something different: either "wish for" should read "deplore"; or he meant to say "to wish to find the private one of which he speaks".

(3) This refers to a daily regulation: one could suppose it fitted in with the "Practice of the daily regulation" or had inspired it.

(15) La Salle keeps most of the words used by Hayneufve, but modernises the spelling before including it in the Collection. The quotation from Blain is also modernised.

ST. LA SALLE'S

RETREAT RESOLUTIONS

or «Rules which I have imposed upon myself»

(2/3)

This consideration does not seem to have led to a resolution. Later, in point 8, Hayneufve says the following: «What motives and how much interior freedom do you have when you do business?»

La Salle began thinking about the various measures he had to take. There was business he had to deal with and, according to Hayneufve, he needed to assess the extent of his interior freedom and preserve it. It is possible to see a connection also between this Consideration and Rule 4 of his programme, which runs as follows: «When I go to see someone, I shall be careful to say no more than what is necessary, not indulge in social gossip or idle conversation, and not stay more than half an hour». Such a resolution must surely have been made to preserve "interior freedom".

The second part of point 8 of this Consideration also offers a challenge to La Salle. It says: «How do you unite them (business affairs) with the actions and intentions of Jesus Christ?»

Having thought about this, La Salle writes down resolution 5: «I shall unite my actions with those of Jesus Christ at least twenty times a day, and I shall try to perform them only from a point of view and for reasons which conform with his. For this purpose I shall have a small piece of paper which I shall prick as many times as I do so; and for every time I fail to do so each day, I shall say an Our Father and kiss the floor when I do so, before going to bed».

One can see that La Salle took this recommendation seriously to unite all one's actions (business affairs) with the intentions and actions of Jesus Christ.

The next point, the 9th, reads:

> 9. «How do you behave towards the persons you have dealings with, be they superior, equals or inferiors? This is a very extensive point».

For La Salle, the «persons he has dealings with» are the Brothers, and it is with them in view that he writes resolution 6: «When my Brothers come to ask me for my advice, I shall pray to Our Lord to give it to them. If the matter is of some importance, I shall take a little time to pray about it; and at least I shall be careful to remain recollected at this time and to raise my heart to God for some time».

Next, Hayneufve asks the retreatant to think about the Rules (if he is a religious or lives in a community).

> «If you have Rules or regulations concerning your position, how do you observe them? Check on this now a little and make sure you read them in a more leisurely way during these exersises».

In the Rules that I have imposed upon myself, La Salle refers to community rules. His first reaction to Hayneufve's question is to consider the reference to the Rule in a community context. He considers the occasions when the Brothers will come to see him about their failings, at the Accusation first of all or in other circumstances. However, aware that he is himself a sinner and fallible, the following is the line of conduct he traces out for himself in resolution 7:

7. «When they (the Brothers) tell me their faults, I shall consider myself guilty before God for failing to warn them, either by giving them advice or watching over them. If I impose a penance on them, I shall impose a greater one on myself. If the failing is a considerable one, apart from performing the penance, I shall set aside some time in private, half an hour or even an hour, several days running, especially in the evening, to ask God's forgiveness for it. If I consider that I am taking the place of Our Lord in their regard, then I must accept that I must carry their sins just as Our Lord carried ours, and that this is a duty in their regard that God imposes upon me.»

One can see, then, than in this resolution La Salle assumes responsibility for infringements of the Rule. Not only does he implicitely promise to be faithful to it, but he resolves to punish himself in expiation of his community's failings.

This idea of expiation may have been present in his mind also when he stopped at point 12, having read point 11 without making a resolution. Points 11 and 12 read as follows: 11. To what extent do you show equanimity in the face of various successes and events? 12. Are you able to make virtue of necessity, accepting willingly as coming from God all that willy-nilly you have to endure?

Next La Salle stops at point 13 of the Consideration:

> 13. «In your meetings, do you have the discernment to recognise what depends on you and what does not, so as to be able to act effectively with regard to the former and to suffer the latter?»

Recognising what depended on him and what did not must have led La Salle to ask himself questions about his role as the teacher of a community and about the share of work that this function entailed for him. This must have led to his wondering to what extent the work of his salvation depended on himself, for the question of salvation is of paramount importance in Lasallian thinking. He summarises this line of thought in resolution 8 which is so full of wisdom:

8. «I shall always consider the work of my salvation and that of the establishment and running of our community as the work of God: that is why I shall abandon the care of it to him so as not to do anything in it that concerns me except by his order. I shall seek much advice about what I have to do with regard to the first or to the second (the community), and I shall often repeat the words of Habakkuk: "Domine, Opus tuum!"

It can be seen that La Salle seems to have decided that all (?) depends on God: he abandons it all to his care. As for his own role, it is to respond faithfully to God's call. This is what resolution 9 says:

9. «I must often look upon myself as an instrument which is of no use except in the hands of the craftsman: I must therefore await the orders of God's Providence in order to act (Hayneufve says "effectively"), and yet not let them pass once they are known».

La Salle's discernment cannot be improved upon in the resolutions he made in the light of Consideration 13 and 14: «When you act, do you not follow your natural inclinations rather than reason and the light of God?» In the Collection, this becomes: «In the exercises proper to your state and employment, do you not follow rather your natural inclinations and preferences than the orders and spirit of God?» (17).

La Salle does not seem to have written any other resolutions inspired by the Consideration for this first day. He must have read, thought and prayed about the last 5 points of the Consideration. We come now to day 2 of the retreat.

DAY 2 OF THE RETREAT

As is the case for all the others, the Consideration for day 2 offers 20 points for consideration by the retreatant. On this second day, the subject for reflection is «the daily timetable that you can now establish in your position, and putting time to good use».

It is obvious that not every point led La Salle to make a resolution. Here, first of all, are some points suggested by Hayneufve:

1. Put yourself in the presence of God, and ask him for the light to know his will with regard to your daily timetable.

2. Recognise how important it is to use one's time well; and that to achieve this there must be order in one's life. In order to put order into one's external actions, it is necessary to put order into one's interior dispositions and resolve to live only by reason.

3. If your position entails some order, how do you preserve it? Are you not more concerned for your own convenience than for the community? And in the common things that you do, do you do them in a very special way, a way that is spiritual and is concerned only for God and his good pleasure; or do you do them in an ordinary way, as a matter of form or through human respect?

4. Do you not still have many hours in the day which depend on you and which are not put to good use because you do not follow strictly the order you should bring to them?

There is no need to continue quoting Hayneufve. These first 4 points seem to have been sufficient to inspire La Salle to make 2 resolutions, N^os^. 10 and 11:

10. «Whatever my position, I shall always follow an order, a daily timetable, and this by the grace of Our Lord. In this matter, I put my trust in it alone, because it is something I have never been able to constrain myself to (18); and the first thing I shall do when I change my position will be to draw up a new one (timetable), and in order to do this I shall always make a day's retreat».

Resolution 11 also refers to this need to organise his time but it possibly encroaches also on a point which comes on the 3rd day which deals with prayer. The resolution reads as follows:

11. «When I have to go to the country (19), I shall make a day's retreat to prepare myself, and I shall try to make it possible for me to make at least three hours of prayer per day when I am on the road».

In the same way, resolution 12 could result from a return to the Consideration for day 1. This may sound complicated, but it is not all that unlikely, especially as the regulations for the retreat recommend the re-reading of notes. As he did so, La Salle would have seen that he could add something with regard to his attitude to people in the light of point 9 of the previous Consideration. And so he says the following in resolution 12:

12. «When people, a superior or anybody else, cause me pain and, naturally speaking, shock me by something, I shall be careful not to speak about it; and if someone else mentions it to me, I shall make excuses for them and say they were right».

The Founder then concentrated again on the Consideration for day 2 concerning the use of time and determined to practise what it said. Hayneufve's point 6 reads as follows:

6. Model your conduct on the order that is given you in these exercises. Would you not be happy to live always in the order in which you now find yourself?

Our retreatant does in fact write that he wants to live as suggested by Hayneufve: «I must be very careful about the time I have lost and never waste any. Only a long retreat can obtain for me such vigilance» (Rules I have imposed upon myself, N° 13).

La Salle continues thinking about the use of time, and pauses at a point of Hayneufve's which, once again, he copies almost word for word. The point in question is N°. 18 of the Consideration for day 2:

18. Do not let your primary concern be to know how to do what you have to do perfectly, but rather to do it as perfectly as you know how; because by faithfully doing what you know, you deserve to learn and understand more than you do at present.

La Salle is enthusiastic about this point. He shortens it a little and makes it his resolution N°. 14:

«A good rule not to be so much concerned about knowing what to do as to do perfectly what one knows».

We have here a fervent retreatant who furnishes himself with good principles by which to guide his "new life".

(18) This is an extraordinary admission on the part of the Founder about his own personality. At one and the same time he confirms the need to make this kind of resolution so as to organise his day and life better, and he makes it quite clear that this resolution is the result of reading an inspirational text on the same subject.

ST. LA SALLE'S

RETREAT RESOLUTIONS

or «Rules which I have imposed upon myself»

(3/3)

DAY 3 RESOLUTIONS

Consideration: the first action of the day, rising; then, meditation and the Consideration.

La Salle attaches most importance to point 11 of the Consideration, which reads as follows:

> 11. It is good advice to add to this review (which follows meditation) some thought about the various parts of the day, about some pressing and difficult piece of business, about a meeting at which nature will seek the upper hand if not warned, about the good works one can perform, about the wrong things one must avoid, about the intentions one should form for all one's actions, about the virtues which should characterise actions, about the fulfilment of one's duties, about one's family, and about similar subjects.

La Salle deals now with his own moment of reflection at the beginning of the day, and formulates resolution 15:

15. «Every morning I shall set aside a quarter of an hour to foresee what business I will have to do so that I can act properly, the times when I may fall so as to avoid them, and I shall take measures to guide my actions during the day.» I think that Hayneufve's inspiration is quite transparent in La Salle's words and the nature of the resolution.

La Salle does not write any more resolutions on day 3 of the retreat. Meditation already plays an important part in his life and La Salle does not need any change of direction.

DAY 4 CONSIDERATION

This is on vocal prayers whether compulsory or devotional.

La Salle reads the first 9 points of the Consideration without making any resolutions. The concrete nature of point 10 catches his eye:

> 10. There are many short prayers that you say every day without devotion, like the Hail Mary (20) at the sound of the bell at three o'clock in the afternoon, and grace before and after meals. Think of all the others and find a remedy.

As La Salle includes the Our Father among these prayers, he makes a resolution, but puts it at the end. He puts another resolution first, one that was inspired by Hayneufve's point 11: «... if you can say the rosary every day, why do you not want to?»

La Salle's resolution N°. 16 reads:

16. «In the past (21) I have often failed to say the rosary although it is a prayer of rule in our community. From now onwards, I must not go to bed till I have said it» (22).

At this point the dependence of the Rules that I have imposed upon myself on Hayneufve's Considerations becomes clearer than ever before: Rule 16 is based on point 11, as we have seen; 17 is based on point 12; 18 and 19 are based on point 13; and 20 is connected to Hayneufve's first 10 points. Let us look at this in more detail.

Hayneufve challenges:

«But above all devotions give special importance to visits to the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, which must be frequent, fervent, respectful and unaffected» (23).

La Salle's resolution 17 reads:

«Also I must not let a single day go by, except when I am in the country, without visiting the Most Blessed Sacrament. And even then, if I pass near some village church, I shall kneel down and adore the Most Blessed Sacrament, and I shall do this as many times as the opportunity occurs».

Hayneufve recommends: «Never undertake anything, never change what you are doing... do not let an hour go by without saying a prayer. Can your not do this?» (24).

In response, La Salle makes resolution 18:

«I shall make sure I raise my heart to God each time I begin some action; and whatever I undertake I shall do so only after prayer»

In same point 13 Hayneufve adds: «Do not leave the house nor even your room without saying some prayer».

La Salle includes in his Rules:

«The Rule of the community is not to enter the house or one's room without praying to God and renewing one's attention to him. I shall be careful not to fail to do this». (R. 19).

La Salle's resolutions or the Rules which I have imposed upon myself end with point 20, which refers to daily prayers which are said without attention. Hayneufve concentrated on the Our Father in ten of the points, and so La Salle makes a special resolution about this prayer:

«Every day I shall recite the Our Father with the greatest possible devotion, attention and faith, through submission to Our Lord who has taught and ordered us to recite it». (R. 20).

La Salle may have had his reasons for ending his collection of resolutions by returning to the Our Father. By doing so, he balances the mention in resolution 2 and so frames his whole series of resolutions, putting them under the complete protection of the Father to whom he has vowed his whole life.

I should like to point out also that, in conscious or unconscious imitation of Hayneufve, who follows each Consideration with 20 points, La Salle also sets out his own life programme in 20 points. This is possibly a further indication of the causal link between Hayneufve's text and that of La Salle.

Under the same heading of imitation, it is interesting to note the similarity between a well known work of La Salle on retreats and the title of Hayneufve's book:

Can we draw any conclusions from the considerable similarity of these titles? I imagine that books dealing with retreats tend to have titles of this kind, but I still suggest it is a point worth considering. And if such similarity proves to be less common than I imagine, then there could be some conclusions to be drawn.

IS IT POSSIBLE TO DATE THESE RULES?

It is not possible to date them with as much certainty as a properly authenticated document would provide. What one can do, however, is to read between the lines of La Salle's text and formulate a few hypotheses that will bear examination.

There are certain indications that this text belongs to the period of the Practice of the Daily Regulation (PR). Thus the daily recitation of the rosary is in the PR: «The Brothers who go out to teach in school leave the oratory and then the house without stopping anywhere and reciting the rosary» (CL 25, p. 98, N° 16). The resolution which refers to the accusation makes an implicit reference to the PR also: «Grace before the meal is said (at midday) after which the Brothers who are in the middle of the refectory accuse themselves of their faults to the superior, something that all the Brothers must do before dinner and supper» (CL. 25, p. 99, art. 19). On the other hand, the PR does not specify any prayer to be said on entering the exercise room. However, this practice was already established and this was confirmed subsequently in the rule: «All will kneel down to adore God whenever they enter or leave any room in the house» (CL. 25, p. 25, N° 13). The Brothers were already in the habit of making this adoration on entering their classroom (cf. Conduct 1706). We know also that they did not have rooms of their own but slept in dormitories. One could adore God on entering the dormitory but not "one's" room.

It is good to note also that it was a period of beginnings. La Salle admits that he has never been able to make himself follow a daily timetable. He still has to acquire this habit of organising his time. He has in view his journeys and visits. It is also possible that at this time there was only one house in Rheims, the one in Rue Neuve. If this is the case, then the group of first Brothers lives with the Founder and he can say: "when MY Brothers come and say to me..."

For these various reasons, I am inclined to date these resolutions as belonging to a period that goes from 1683 to 1693, more or less. A period of 10 years. Can we be more accurate? If we take into account the reference La Salle makes to his consecration, it is possible he is referring to a consecration made in 1691, without ruling out the possibility that there may have been an earlier consecration. Blain (II, 301) refers to another resolution which was possibly a part of La Salle's general regulation: «Something I must take very seriously is the renunciation of my own judgment and ideas, never following them in anything that concerns me». This text, however, seems to be less closely connected with the succession of Hayneufve's text we have been referring to. It is difficult to see why Blain did not include it with the series of 20 resolutions that La Salle imposed upon himself.

We know that the Considerations were adapted by La Salle and included in his Collection. While Hayneufve gives 20 points per Consideration, La Salle is more restrained with regard to the number of these and more practical in his ideas: he abridges and leaves out where it is sensible and appropriate.

I thought it would be useful to connect the Rules I have imposed upon myself to a particular period of the Founder's life, so as not to run the risk of presenting them as something absolute and without a temporal context, and also to provide other points of reference which would help the reader to appreciate them more. My hypothesis is not based only on intuition and guesswork. I have tried to show the close link that exists, and which careful reading makes quite clear, between a pre–1686 edition of Hayneufve's Considerations and the text of the resolution made by La Salle as he read it. Finally, basing myself on internal criticism of La Salle's text, I have ventured to suggest a date for it which is justified by reference to texts which reputable Lasallian researchers have already dated with a fair measure of confidence. (25)

As far as I am concerned, whenever I have occasion to speak of the Rules that I have imposed upon myself, I shall not hesitate to place them in an historical context in which this piece of research has shown them to belong.

Bro. Gilles Beaudet

(19) Littré remarks that the best writers would say "en campagne" where we say "à la campagne".

20) In the Collection, the Founder will put the Our Father first. Hayneufve wrote several articles about the Our Father. De La Salle also resolved to pay great attention to the recitation of the Our Father.

(21) These words clearly express the result of an examination of conscience, and confirm that the Rules that I have imposed upon myself are the result of an examination of Hayneufve's Considerations.

(22) At this point, Cahier Lasallien N°. 16, p. 102 adds the word "pas" at the end of the sentence. It is both suppletive and a mistranslation. Moreover, the text given by Blain (II.319), and Cahier Lasallien 10, p. 116, do not have this anomaly.

(23) Hayneufve, op. cit. p. 135, art. 12.

(24) Hayneufve, op. cit. p. 136, art. 13.

(25) We are forced, however, to revise and correct a certain assertion in Cahier Lasallien N°. 16, p. 100, where we read: «The comparisons we have made preclude any possibility of supposing that any editions of Hayneufve prior to 1663 were used as a basis for the Collection». This assertion, we have noticed, is based on a reading of a 1643 edition (cf. CL 16, p. 98 & 95), but is proved wrong by the 1645 edition which contains the passages which Brother Maurice Auguste thought existed only from 1663 onwards. We pointed out this detail to him in a letter dated December 31st 1976. Perhaps he was waiting for a new edition before bringing the note concerned up to date.

AN UNJUSTLY FORGOTTEN LASALLIAN BIOGRAPHY

(1/2)

To Fr. Giandomenico Mucci, S. J., spiritual adviser, with gratitude.

The biography of St. John Baptist De La Salle (1) that I mean is the one writen with love and veneration by Fr. Jean Claude Garreau (1715–?) of the Company of Jesus.

In the most recent Lasallian bibliography (2) it is listed second among the works printed about the Founder and is preceded only by that of Canon Blain (3). The other two early biographies are that of Br. Bernard d'Auge (4), which was written in 1721 and remained in manuscript form till it was finally printed in 1965; and that of Fr. François Elie Maillefer (5) O.S.B. This latter work also remained in manuscript form and in two versions, and was printed only in 1966 and in 1980.

The reason why these biographers wrote is easily explained: Blain was the confessor of the Brothers of St. Yon, and it was here that De La Salle died in 1719; Br. Bernard was a faithful disciple of the Founder and worked closely with him; Maillefer was his nephew (6).

But what reason did Fr. Garreau have to write the biography of St. La Salle with such great haste? He tells us himself in the preface to the biography (7): to simplify the text of the first biographer, which was very long and muddled in places; and to make the virtues (8) of the holy Founder of the Brothers better known. And it was the Brothers themselves who asked him to do this work, as they had Blain. Garreau did not restrict himself to shortening Blain's text: he made his own contribution. It strikes me that – si licet parva componere magnis, of course – his style is very reminiscent of that of Caesar's Commentary: concise, precise and yet very clear. Perhaps I can illustrate this by comparing extracts from the two works:

> «A deputation was sent to Caesar about this. He ordered that the wapons should be surrendered to him and the chiefs of the cities be brought to him. He set up his seat at the ditch in front of his camp. They bring the chiefs to him there; they deliver Vercingetorix to him, and throw his weapons down at his feet» (9).

Fr. Garreau's text reads as followus:

> «Brother Timothy (10) decided to send the Brother himself (11) to plead the cause of the Institute. He was a venerable old man. He arrived at Fontainebleau where the Court was (12); he presented himself. His pale face and weak appearance made an impression on all who saw him» (13) (p. 506).

Before we go any further, we should perhaps say a few words about the author concerned.

Who was this Jesuit Fr. Garreau who took such an interest in our Founder only barely 40 years after his death?

We have not been able to find a lot of information about him. He is mentioned in two bio-bibliographical dictionaries published by French-speaking Jesuits in France:

1. Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus by Augustin de Backer S. J., Liege-Paris 1890.

2. Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus by Carlos Sommervogel, a Jesuit from Strasbourg, Brussels-Paris 1892.

The two works give more or less the same information. They say that Fr. Jean Claude Garreau was born at St. Pourçain (Allier), entered the Jesuit novitiate on September 27th 1733, and taught philosophy at La Flèche (14), and theology at Tours. Information about him ends by saying he lived in Arras in 1672. Information from elsewhere says he was parish priest at Molesme, chaplain at St. Martin de Langres, and finally parish priest at Charmont. Neither the date nor the place of his death is given. The archives of the Jesuit Generalate in the Borgo Santo Spirito in Rome do not have his "elogium mortuorum" as in the case of other Jesuits. The archivist I consulted suggested that possibly he died outside the Company.

He wrote the following works: Manuel ecclésiastique des Mémoires du Clergé (15) (Paris 1778); Traité du débit et de l'action oratoire; several Sermons; a large volume in quarto, entitled Institutiones philosophicae; and two biographies: the first, La Vie de Madame la Duchesse de Montmorency, supérieure de la Visitation Sainte Marie de Moulins (Clermont Ferrand, 1769); and the second, which is of interest to us, La Vie de Monsieur (16) de La Salle, Prêtre, Docteur en Théologie, ancien Chanoine de l'Église Métropolitaine de Rheims et Instituteur des Frères des Écoles Chrétiennes" (Rouen, Laurent Dumesnil publishers, in duodecimo, LX–606 pages) in two volumes. It was re-edited in 1825, a summary of the history of the Institute was added by persons unknown, and it was published in Paris (17).

In 1829 it was translated into Italian, and in 1843 into English (18).

My analysis is based on the first edition (19) of 1760. The Life proper is preceded by several pages of introduction. This fine book, bound in maroon coloured leather with ornamentation in pure gold, opens with a Dedicatory Epistle to the Holy Child Jesus, at whose feet the author places his work which belongs to Jesus, because it is «dear Jesus who took into his hands the interests of the Lasallian undertaking».

The reason for the presence of this Epistle here is that the Holy Child of Bethlehem is by right the personal protector of the children who go to our schools. Also the Founder himself and his first disciples had a tender devotion to him, and this devotion can still be found in most parts of the Institute of the Brothers. There is nothing surprising about this Epistle if we remember that the spread of the true devotion to the Child Jesus in modern times began with our Institute. It was Bérulle (whom the Founder considered to be his spiritual master) who, at the beginning of the 17th century, drew attention, with some insistence, to the mystery of the chilhood of Jesus. And then there was a Carmelite from Beaume, Marguerite du Saint Sacrement (dec. 1648), who was given the mission of spreading devotion to the Divine Child in France and elsewhere, and of basing a spirituality on it.

Many people went to Beaume to hear her speak. These included the Oratorian Amelote, her first historian, de Renty and Olier (another acquaintance of De La Salle) who imagined seeing the Child Jesus all aflame leaving the tabernacle and entering his heart.

De La Salle, then, drank at the very source of this devotion and with it slaked the thirst of his spiritual sons. The devotion is mentioned in the first point of the Bull of Benedict XIIIth, where it says: «Founded under the protection of the Most Holy Child Jesus and the patronage of St. Joseph, the Brothers should above all devote themselves to teaching children...»

This dedication is followed by a history-cum-apologia of the Institute of the Brothers, divided into five chapters. The author wishes to show the importance of this Institute and of that of the Sisters of the Christian Schools; the service they give to the public; the need for the two Institutes, because of the necessity to teach boys and girls separately; the esteem that the Monarchy and the Church have always had for these two Institutes. The author ends by kindly offering to answer the objections that are normally made to new Institutes.

This Brother Bernard (Jean d'Auge) was of Swiss origin. He was born in Fribourg on June 24th 1667. He joined the Institute of the Brothers at the age of 16. In 1717, he met Brother Barthelemy in Grenoble. He made his final vows in 1726. From his manuscript we know that he was in Paris from 1721 to 1723 when he was transferred to Rheims. After that no more is heard of him. The FSC Catalogue mentions him as having left, without offering any explanations for this. (Cf. Letters of the Founder p. 227).

(5) F. E. Maillefer. La Vie de M. Jean-Baptiste de La Salle, Prêtre, Docteur en Théologie, ancien Chanoine de la Cathédrale de Reims, et Instituteur des Frères des Écoles Chrètiennes. This edition compares the texts of 1723 and 1740.

(6) Dom François Elie Maillefer O.S.B. was the son of John Maillefer and Marie de La Salle, younger sister of Jean Baptiste. At the age of 18, he joined the Benedictines (Congregation of St. Maur) at the Abbey of St. Faron at Meaux. He received his monastic habit on July 8th 1702 and was professed the following year. He was ordained in 1711. He lived successively in the monasteries of St. Basle, St. Jean de Laon and St. Nicaise. From 1723 to 1761, the year of his death, he lived in the Abbey of St. Remi in Rheims.

(7) The opinion that the first Brothers had of Blain's biography is still held today. He is still appreciated for the mass of information he gives but it is recognised he lacks precision and clearness.

(8) The consideration of the virtues of Fr. De La Salle take up more than 300 pages in Blain's Life, the whole of Book 4, which has for title: His spirit, his sentiments and his virtues.

(9) Julius Caesar. The Gallic War VII, 89.

(10) Brother Timothy Bransiet (1682-1752). A Parisian by birth, he made his novitiate under the direction of the Founder. In 1720 he was elected Superior General. He obtained Letters Patent from Louis XV which officially recognised the Institute of the Brothers throughout the Kingdom of France. The following year, he and the Brothers had the great joy of seeing the Institute recognised by the Church in Benedict XIII's Bull "In apostolicae dignitatis solio". The one who pulled all the strings was just an ordinary Brother. Neither Garreau nor Blain gives his name, and it was left to Rigault to tell us that it was Brother Onore (Nicolas du Moutier) who pleaded this cause before Cardinal de Rohan. In about 1707, before entering religion, this good Brother had been a servant in the household of Prince de Soubise, the father of Armand Gaston, the future Cardinal de Rohan. And so he went to visit his Eminence, accompanied by Brother Barthelemy. The Cardinal recognised him and showed a great deal of kindness to him and the Superior General. He promised he would deal with their business as soon as he got to Rome (he was going to Rome as King Louis XV's special ambassador to the Holy See). When he reached Rome, however, he found that Pope Clement XI had died. He remained there to help with the Conclave which elected Innocent XII. This latter was not able to do anything as he too died shortly after. Rohan waited, and finally the new Pontiff, Benedict XIII, promulgated perlibenter the Bull of Approbation. This happened in late January and the first snow was falling in Rome.

(11) Garreau does not give the name of the Brother mentioned here who was sent to Fontainebleau to plead the case for the purchase of the Manor of St. Yon. We know, however, that it was Brother Thomas Frappet, the "legal owner" of St. Yon. But Rigault (II. 66) who gives us this information also expresses some doubts, because this Brother who was born at the end of 1670 was barely 50 years old at the time of the journey to Fontainebleau. The age hardly fits the description given by our biographer. It is quite clear that either Blain or Garreau has mixed things up. The Court was at Fontainebleau at the time and the venerable old Brother went there.

(12) You can imagine the surprise of the courtiers when they saw this old man in his black robe and white rabat walking through the vast halls of the chateau. He was received by His Royal Highness the Duke of Orleans, Regent of the Kingdom during the minority of Louis XV. On that day, this good old Brother provided a spectacle, for at Fontainebleau as at Versailles, everything was a spectacle. On this occasion, however, it proved to be a moving one, and made a great impression on the illustrious onlookers.

(13) I should like to remind readers that all the quotations from Fr. Garreau come from the first edition and are given in the spelling of the time (French text).

(14) La Flèche, chief town in the Arrondissement of Sarthe in Anjou. In the 16th century, the Bourbon-Vendomes inherited property here and built a chateau which, renovated by Henry IV, was given to the Jesuits who turned it into a school which subsequently became famous. Its pupils included Marsenne, Descartes, Prince Eugene of Savoy and... Fr. Garreau.

(15) This Ecclesiastical Manual dealt with everything that concerned the discipline and regulations of the Church in France.

(16) In the second edition, the editor has changed Monsieur into Messire, an ancient noble title.

(17) By the publisher Mequignon Junior, bookseller to the Faculty of Theology at 9 rue des Grands Augustins, in the middle of the Latin Quarter.

(18) The frontispiece of the Italian edition reads as followus: Vita di D. Gio. Battista della Salle, tratta dal francese, opera del Padre Giovanni Claudio Garreau. Roma, 1829. 362 p. The incomplete nature of this biographical reference caused me some doubts. I contacted Brother Secondino, who said he had come across it in a work by Fr. Dante. I consulted Fr. Dante. I received his answer on June 7th 1990. He wrote: «I didn't know it had been translated into Italian». And so I began a long trek around libraries in Rome – the National, the Gregorian, the Civiltà Cattolica, the History Institute of the Company of Jesus, the archives and library of our Generalate and those of the Jesuits – and nothing: none of them had the Italian translation. Finally I consulted the two encyclopedias (Sommervogel and Baker) about the Jesuit writers, who devote a whole column to Fr. Garreau. The two French editions are mentioned and so is the English translation, but not a word about the Italian translation.

That of the English Edition reads: The Life of the Ven. J. B. De La Salle, founder of the Christian Schools, with an historical sketch of the Institute to the present time, translated from the French of Pere Garreau, S. J., and also an account of the rise and progress of the Society in Ireland. By the Christian Brothers. As can be seen on this frontispiece, the translation was made by the Irish Christian Brothers and was published in Dublin by William Powell, 68 Thomas Street, in 1843. The Christian Brothers of Ireland were founded in 1802 by Edmund Ignatius Rice, and they had opened a house in Dublin by 1818. They have close links with our Institute and St. La Salle, whose Rules inspired them.

(19) Although the approbation was given in 1753, the book was published only in 1760.

Then finally, on page XLIII, we find the Preface. It is of special interest to us, for it contains the answers to numerous questions that spring to mind, given the lack of bibliographical information about the author and his work. In the space of six pages, the author tells us that his main aim is to make known the great benefactor of youth, and that he wants to «present an accurate picture of his work and virtues». He realises his work is not perfect, but he hopes it will find its way to the shelves of the most important libraries. His only wish is to edify pious and truly Christian readers. There then follows the most interesting piece of information: «What is certain, is that it was the Brothers of the Christian Schools who asked me to write a new history of the life of their Founder...», a piece of information that is confirmed on page 573: «I hope that the accurate account I have given of the principal actions of his life is such that the careful and unbiaised reader will form the impression that he should of it».

Fr. Garrèau confesses also with honesty and sincerity his dependence on the Canon's biography «the first history of the life of M. de La Sale (sic), which in the present work is only revised and put in order a little».

Blain for him and for everyone else is a mine of precious but superabundant and jumbled information. Garreau, on the other hand, is pleasant, attractive and encourages one to linger without ever being bored. His beautiful, classical prose attracts the reader immediately. His clear and lofty style enchanted me from the very first page and I was immediately filled with admiration.

And so I disagree with the anonymous critic of the "Ami de la Religion" who baldly states that «this life was written without craft or feeling». Nothing could be further from the truth. As one of the best modern biographers (20) stated at the end of the last century, with all his authority: «This beautifully written book...»

And so I re-affirm that Garreau revised the style of Blain and put order into the chaotic mass of his interminable work, but he did not stop there: he has given us a new book which can be read now and always both easily and with interest.

The language is always clear, sentences are well-constructed and balanced, and syntax is always sure. There are many beautiful pages in the two volumes, and at the very beginning there is one that Bossuet would have been proud to call his own:

> «The Servant of God whose life I am about to write was one of those extraordinary men that the Lord gives the world in his mercy for the salvation of people and the edification of his Church». (p. 1)

As one can easily see, the musical quality of the prose is linked to a Cartesian clarity of expression.

Then there is the page that describes the young John Baptist's application to his studies:

> «With courage, he overcame all the difficulties of scholasticism. (21) He made himself familiar with all the subtle distinctions that error opposes to the unshakeable truth of Catholic dogma. To make himself completely hardened against its dangerous sophistry, he applied himself to careful reading as well as to frequent practice: when he debated, it was not with the vivacity and self-assurance born of pride and selfconceit, but with such as inspires zeal for truth» (p. 16).

The pages dealing with the adventurous life of Mme. de Maillefer are also very fine. Particularly good and marked by great economy of language are those that tell the story of her wild years of depravity followed by the years of grace and astonishing conversion:

> «Sure of the success of her charme, which she was the first to admire; convinced that they would outshine those of any other society lady who might care to challenge her; she would make her entry and with her brazen looks challenge her rivals» (p. 42).

Often, instead of describing what happened, he would dramatise it, putting words of evangelical beauty into the mouth of the Saint:

> «Men of little faith, what makes you so bold as to put limits on infinite goodness where none exist?» (p. 96).

The resignation from the canonry is told in clear and dramatic terms:

> «I no longer feel attraction for the vocation of a canon; it left me before I resigned the position. This state is no longer for me; and although I entered into it in a completely legitimate fashion, it seems to me that God is inviting me today to leave it, that he is urging me to do so» (p. 108).

Another good example of this sober and clear style can be found in the fine portrait he gives of M. Tallon (22):

> «M. Tallon was the most important man the archbishop could choose. He was highly esteemed in the diocese; and with the ability he had to speak well, he was able to create whatever effect he wanted. He gave the impression of great piety, and there was something soft and seductive about his voice» (p. 127).

Other pages marked by great liveliness and clarity tell the story of the Chevalier d'Armstadt (23), head of a famous German noble family (p. 509-516).

Pages full of drama can be found in the account of the Brothers' total refusal to accept the superior imposed upon them by the Archbishop of Paris, Cardinal de Noailles (p. 343-369).

The account of the Clement affair (24) is very moving. The author calls it «the cruellest to have ever befallen the Servant of God», and in it the Saint was tricked by two crooked opportunists, a father and his son (p. 437-443).

Everyone knows that De La Salle was always solemn and serious, and yet on one occasion he showed he could be humorous. It was in connection with the reading, during meal-times, of the Rules he had composed for Directors. Fr. Garreau writes:

«These Brothers found this practice too humiliating; he replied it was up to them to remove whatever might be shameful in it by fulfilling all their obligations faithfully».

And the author concludes:

«Such was the wisdom of the Servant of God, whom respectable but ill-informed people wanted to pass off as a man without ideas, without the ability to govern, and whose only quality was to be excessively stubborn» (p. 537-538).

The Jansenists are a group of people to whom the author makes very frequent reference. They were the most hardened enemies of our Saint. He, however, would never gave in to any of their fallacious arguments or blandishments, but rather always proclaimed himself to be a devoted and obediente son of the Pope in Rome, and liked to sign his name as De La Salle, Roman Priest.

it is really worth reading the marvellous pages describing the Saint's discussions with them in Marseille, especially page 461, one of the most dramatic:

«A man like himself would be such an important victory that it was worth the trouble to make more than one attempt. And so they came back to the charge more than once. They brought the conversation round to the Pope and the bishops and spoke of them with the utmost contempt.

The Saint shook and avenged the Lord's anointed who were being treated with such disrespect. He no longer had any doubts about the real feelings of these so-called friends of his Institute. He saw the trap they had wanted to set for him, and he broke off relations forever with these rebellious souls».

Page 553 reveals a quite unexpected characteristic of the Saint: his gentleness and love for the adolescents he met every day in the corridors and property of St. Yon.

«The young boarders were a delight for the saintly man. He gave them advice; he went to see them from time to time; he organised their little games; and then, adapting his manner to his audience, would tell them edifying stories».

There are other things I could say, but I think I have sufficiently illustrated the talent of our biographer. Having spoken of him it remains only to introduce his religious family, for the Jesuits were always the good friends of St. La Salle and his Brothers, as they are to this day.

Fr. Garreau often speaks of them and their Founder. The Founder of the Brothers owes a lot to him, and here and there, especially in the Rules and Meditations, one comes across his teachings. Young John Baptist did not have the good fortune to go to the famous Jesuit College in his native town, but instead went to an equally famous Rheims school, that of the Bons Enfants. St. La Salle was on very good terms with several Jesuits Fathers right up to the time of his death. His last confessors were two Jesuits. There was Fr. Pierre Louis Froger, a great preacher of the Exercises, "charity itself", as Fr. Rayez calls him. On the manuscript page, yellowed with age, of the Elogia Mortuorum that I was able to consult in the Jesuit archives on the Borgo Santo Spirito, it says that he was much given to "sacra contemplatio". He was the Saint's favourite confessor. When the latter died in 1717, St. La Salle turned to Fr. Paul Bodin, (dec. 1725), a 3rd year lecturer. He was a person noted for his piety and wisdom, and had a lot of experience as a spiritual adviser. It was he who was advising the Founder when he was writing the definitive version of the Rules (Blain II, 143-144).

But there were many Jesuits who appeared in the life of the Saint. Not only were they generous with their good advice, but they also helped the Institute to develop in France.

For example, there were «the Gentlemen from the Congregation of the Jesuits in Rouen who, among other good works, maintained a teacher at the school in Darnetal...»

There was Fr. Beauchamp from Alais who in 1707 sang the praises of the Brothers before the Vicar General of the diocese.

There was also the anonymous Jesuit who "gave a sermon" for the purpose of recommending «this charitable undertaking», that is, the opening of one of the first schools in Paris. And one could go on for a long time.

The Jesuit Fathers deserve our undying gratitude for the help they gave our Saint and the newly-born Institute.

To this gratitude which the Institute of the Brothers has always felt towards them, I must add my own: to Fr. Giandomenico Mucci, who was good enough to introduce my Italian translation of the Meditations; and to all the religious of the Civiltà Cattolica, who have always made me welcome in their midst and have always shown me kindness.

And my final wish? It is to see this fine biography by Garreau reprinted. It would be a further source of glorification for our Founder, for it is a glorious example of good clear French writing.

(20) This was Jean Guibert, whom Rayez does not hesitate to call «the most conscientious biographer of the century which is coming to an end». In the same year as the canonisation, he published a monumental History of St. John Baptist de La Salle. Guibert was also himself a Sulpician, and venerated the Saint as one of the most famous students of the Grand Seminaire. The following year, 1901, the second edition appeared, and it is from this edition that quotations are normally taken.

(21) In the second edition this noun has been replaced by "theology".

(22) M. Tallon was one of the Vicar Generals of the Archbishop of Rheims, Mgr. Le Tellier, and Superior of the Seminary. He was sent to the Brothers to try and convince De La Salle to pass on the position of canon to his own brother, Louis, rather than to his own choice, M. Faubert. The latter was in fact appointed canon to replace him.

(23) The Chevalier d'Armstadt fought under the imperial colours at Denain in 1717. With great difficulty he recovered from his a many wounds, and went to France with the intention of becoming a Catholic (he was a Lutheran). On October 8th 1714, he took lodgings with the Brothers in Paris, and asked La Salle to be his spiritual adviser. One day, however, his wounds reopened. He had a vision that lasted four hours. In it he saw a great many demons, in a variety of terrifying forms, who threatened to kill him if he did not immediately leave the house where he was staying. And so, he was forced to leave and thus gave up his vocation.

(24) Garreau does not give the name of the two "delinquents" but subsequent biographers tell us it was a certain M. Clement "a beneficiary", aged about 22, and his father. The young ecclesiastic came to the Founder of the Brothers suggesting he should open a seminary to train country teachers. He, the ecclesiastic, would pay – which he never did. De La Salle thought it was a praiseworthy scheme. But it was a most unfortunate affair with all the characteristics of a typical Italian imbroglio. When the young ecclesiastic found he was short of money, he disappeared, leaving the Saint in a very awkward position. At that point, the father appeared on the scene to defend the honour (?) of his son, thus adding his own wickedness to that of his son.

La Salle?
de La Salle?
de De La Salle?

As a result of an article which appeared in "Vita Nostra" a Rome District publication, I was asked to comment on the French use of the preposition "de", a topic of some importance when it comes to speaking about our Founder. Should we say La Salle? de La Salle? or De La Salle?

My apologies first of all to French-speaking Brothers especially to the philologists, for daring to invade their territory, but allow me to say with Dante:

"Vagliami 'l lungo studio e 'l grande amore" (1) which I have always had for the French language and which has encouraged me to involve myself in this discussion.

Experience and learned studies show that the particle "de" denoting nobility is always placed between the title and the surname, and that in a large number of cases, the actual title of nobility is left our:

Le Prince DE Ligne
Madame DE Maintenon
Madame (la comtesse) DE Grignon
Henri (marquis) DE Sevigne.

These examples prove, therefore, that the particle "de" is used as a link between a Christian name and a surname, between such nouns as Monsieur, Madame, Monseigneur and the surname, and between noble titles and the surname. For example, it is correct to say:

It is Alfred de Musset who says so.
Le comte de Vigny was elected.
Monsieur de Pourceaugnac often gets angry.
Le Cardinal de Retz gave a malicious description of le duc de La Rochefoucauld.

However, when these titles are left out, one should say:

It is Musset who says so.
Vigny was elected.
Pourceaugnac often gets angry.
Retz gave a malicious description of La Rochefoucauld.

To complete the picture, I would add that, according to Littre, the particle "de" should be kept in two cases only when the Christian name, noble title or any other title are omitted:

1. before a monosyllabic name, or before a disyllabic name ending in a mute final "e":

De Thou wrote well.
I saw de Seze.

2. before names beginning by a vowel or a mute "h":

The son of d'Orleans.
The armorial of l'Hozier.

That is what Littre says, and he wrote the famous "Dictionnaire de la langue française" in 7 volumes. Writers, however, and they create the language, do not always agree with him.

Proust, for example, was inclined to keep the particle under all circumstances. This is clear from one of his letters to his friend Prince Antoine de Bibesco. After some clever banter the latter agrees with his point of view:

> «Mr. Cosmo Gordon Lennox is related to the Duke of Richmond whose portrait, a work by van Dick (sic) – according to him, one should perhaps say, a portrait by Dick – was once upon a time the object of my greatest admiration...»

Princess Marthe de Bibesco, Antoine's cousin, makes the following remarks about the letter in her fine book "Au bal avec Marcel Proust" (Paris, Gallimard, 1928):

«It was from Antoine that Marcel learned that you should not say the "de" Rohan, the "de" Noailles and the "de" Guermantes. Proust did not understand this suppression of the particle. At the beginning of their great friendship, it is Antoine who advises and Marcel who makes fun of current usage, but he ends up by accepting it...»

Finally, he gives in to his friend for the sake of friendship.

There remains one last thing for me to say: if the particle is joined to a definite article (du, des, etc.), it can never be omitted:

«I used to read to myself some nice poetry de du Bellay» (A. Daudet).

«The land de des Lourdines» (A. de Chateaubriand).

* * *

Let us now turn to the name of our Saint. Taking into account what has been said above, we should say and write:

It is La Salle who says so.
La Salle is the patron of all teachers.
La Salle is the true friend of the poor.
La Salle has always been an exemple of piety.

The real name of our Saint is La Salle. "de" is only a particle, and that is why it should always be written with a small letter.

That is why it is wrong to write, and why it sounds wrong to say:

It is de La Salle who says so.
De La Salle is the patron
Le de La Salle has always been...
Let us have recourse au de La Salle.
Let us admire the spirituality of De La Salle.

I know that Americans always say and write DE LA SALLE, but it is not correct – non è giusto! to use my own language.

So, are we going to follow these simple rules once and for all?

It is not difficult. You simply have to take a little care!

«THAT THE WORD OF GOD CONTINUE TO SPREAD» (2 Thes 3:1) (1/2)

THE WORLD OF GOD IN THE LIFE OF A CHRISTIAN BROTHER

My considerable experience as a catechist has brought me to some important conclusions concerning the passage of Scripture which opens these reflections. My numerous meetings with Brothers in our communities, faculties of our schools and Lasallian groups have served to confirm them. As a result, I hear within myself the insistent echo of the questions posed by Pope Paul VI to the entire Church in the document "Evangelii Nuntiandi".

– Is the power of the Gospel really stirring the conciences of men today?

– How can the power of the Gospel truly transform mankind today?

– What methods can we use to teach the Gospel so that its power can be effective?

THE WORD SPREADS...

All of these experiences have also thrown new light on the life and the teaching of our Founder. It seems to me that we must now read some of his teachings from a different perspective, and apply his teachings to the situation that exists today in the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools and the Lasallian Family.

In the Rule of 1718 he wrote:

«In order to acquire this spirit and to live by it, the Brothers of this Society shall have a great respect for Holy Scripture. Therefore they shall always carry the New Testament with them and shall pass no day without reading some of its passages, through a sentiment of faith, respect and veneration for the Divine word contained therein, looking on it as their first and principal Rule».

In Meditation 159 for the feast of St. Bartholomew De La Salle says: «How happy you are to be able to carry the Gospel with you always... Be faithful to this practice... Fill your souls each day with the holy maxims of this Sacred Book and become familiar with them by meditating on them frequently».

Fortunately, today there are many Brothers and Lay persons who follow the advice of the Founder: «Attentively read the Word of God each day» (M 178, 3). In this way they are coming to realize the power of the Divine Word in the world today. Although the words of De La Salle were written for the Brothers, many groups of lay persons are also hearing them and following his recommendations. The result is that they are experiencing what St. Paul says «The Word of God is a power in those who believe» (1 Thes 2:13).

With the encouragement of Vatican II, many Christians are spreading the power of the Word. «Through the Sacred Scriptures, the Father comes to His children to speak with them, because He loves them. Such is His omnipotence and the power of His Word that it becomes the foundation of the Church, the firmness of the faith of its members, food for the soul and the clear and ever flowing fountain of spiritual life» (D. V. N° 21).

TO PERSONS AND INSTITUTIONS...

Truly the Word of God displays its power because the Lasallian world receives it openly, puts it into practice and allows it to effect our conversion to God.

- In school A... several groups of Lasallian teachers meet weekly, either before or after class hours, to read, share, pray and apply the Word of God to their responsibility as teachers.

- Parents B... do not leave the house in the morning before having read the Word of God and prayed. Whenever possible, the children join in...

- In school C... youth groups begin their meeting with a reading from the Word of God, followed by a discussion, sharing and prayer. The Gospel of the Sunday is the usual text.

- In school D... the Mothers' Club organizes social activities and teaches catechism. Their meetings begin with a reading, discussion and prayer, also using the Sunday Gospel.

- In school E... all meetings of the Board of Directors begin with a reading from Scripture followed by a commentary and a prayer. Thus the members inspire themselves in their own personal lives and guide themselves in the search for adequate school policies and programs.

The same can be said for Parents' Clubs, janitorial and grounds crews and the secretaries. Through them the Word of God is ever present in our schools.

I am personally convinced that the Word of God is a positive force in personal, community and institutional living when it is "free" to exert all its power and creativity. Using it we will acquire the "sentiments of faith" which are characteristic of our Institute. Two passages of the "Declaration" express this idea very clearly:

«The exercice of our authentic apostolate is the source of our spiritual growth... By listening to the needs of men we can better hear the words of God» (N° 25-2).

«The Word of God reveals the ultimate meaning and the infinite value of human existence. In turn, the mystery of man is really solved thanks to the mystery of the Incarnate Word» (N° 42-1).

These quotations were written in 1967, but are still relevant to the life of the Institute.

DE LA SALLE: A MAN OF SCRIPTURE...

His entire life as «a man of faith» is based on Scripture. The Word of God is "living and effective" (Heb 4:12-13) because it is read daily, meditated daily and accepted with joy and hope. De La Salle listened to the Word and it became his teacher and guide.

He taught it with confidence because it taught him. By meditating on it he learned its mysteries and these he then taught to his disciples. That is why he could speak to the hearts of those who listened. As presented by De La Salle, Scripture was joy and peace for his Brothers. Together they shared the Word, meditated on it, prayed it and lived it. The Lasallian Family, like the early Church is a "community of the Word" (Acts 2:42).

The Word is salvation because it is first of all conversion. Between 1679 and 1684 the first Brothers experienced the same thing which was expressed 300 years later in the Declaration: «The Word of God does not come down from on High in an abstract form to anonymous individuals, but it always comes to complete, reveal, clarify human experience» (N° 40-5).

Since De La Salle is converted to Scriptures and is converted by them, he can use the language of faith with his first Brothers as he speaks about: trust in Providence... true poverty... community life... the new approach to the school... Christian...

Following the line of thought of the Declaration we can say that the first Brothers and teachers "found the God who called them by name, not in books or in words but rather in His teaching... John Baptist de La Salle... man of Scripture... (cf. N° 40-5).

IN A CHURCH MORE SACRAMENT THAN WORD...

It was not clear for John Baptist de La Salle what «being a man of Scripture» might mean, in the light of his epoch. In his day, the Church, like the Church of Trent and Vatican I was more sacrament than Word. But within this setting, La Salle undestands that the Word must be at the basis of Christian education if it is to be solid and lasting. He had the experience of his "spiritual directors" in the Seminary of Saint Sulpice and the French School of spirituality. His love for the Word was well founded in a broad experience. He understands that Christian life must be sustained and supported by the Word –a Word which is taught, heard, shared, prayed and lived– and that the Christian teacher must first be a "man of Scripture". Thus the life of the Christian teacher formed by De La Salle gradually assumed the character of a ministry. For La Salle this is the very logic of the Church which is born of the Word and exists to teach the Word. He learns this from experience and the Epistles of St. Paul which are solidly based on Scripture: «How will they believe if they have not heard? And how will they hear if no one teaches? And who will teach if no one sends them?» (Rom 10:13-15).

De La Salle well understands discipleship and wants his Brothers to imitate him as "men of Scripture" because in their turn they are to be catechists "ministers of the Word" in the Christian schools and for the students who attend them. For De La Salle the model of the Church is "the faithful people" of the "disciples of Jesus Christ". He was foreseeing Vatican II.

IN A PERIOD OF CLERICALISM...

De La Salle distances himself from the vocation of the ministerial priesthood to form "ministers of the Word" so that this ministry could be exercised there where the Word would find a privileged place, where it could be taught, heard, meditated on, prayed and lived... in the Christian School...

For De La Salle there is no "Christian school" unless there is explicit teaching of the Word, without challenging our life with the Word...

Besides, in this age of clericalism, the Word was not always available to the faithful believers. They were not always free to read the Word, to be educated by it and to be formed by it. De La Salle saw that the "Christian School" was the ideal place to bring the Word to children because they understand it easier, because they better understand the mystery of the kingdom. (Cf. Lk 10:21).

De La Salle understands that within the Christian school the Word finds an ideal situation in which to form the heart and attitudes of ordinary people. In the Christian school the Word can be heard in the language of the people... It is the right atmosphere to meditate on it and to share it. In fact, the Christian School is a privileged place where "the Church of the Word" can grow.

Such is De La Salle's undestanding, and this is what he explains to his disciples. The Word is at the very center of every school day.

Everything starts with the "Reflection" when the whole of existence takes on new meaning by the light and power of the Word.

Then come the "maxims of the Gospel" which are prayed and meditated in order that they may later be memorized and then lived. The Christian brings the "living memory" of the Gospel into actual daily living.

Then follows the catechism on the principal mysteries which gives Christological dimension and meaning to systematic catechesis. This brings a better understanding of the presence of the mystery of Christ in daily life.

THE WORD AND THE HISTORY OF SALVATION

De La Salle is a return to the early days of the Church in which the Word had priority and taught the faithful. These were times when the Word dominated the ecclesiastical structures as well as the liturgy, preaching and catechetics...

De La Salle reads the history of the Church from the perspective of the "Ministers of the Word" – the Apostles, evangelists, Fathers and Doctors of the Church... And he does not hesitate to say to the Brothers these words which many lay teachers are applying to themselves: «You have the happiness of sharing the ministry of the apostles by daily teaching catechism to your children... instructing them in the maxims of the Gospel» (M. 159.2).

In this way, De La Salle associated the Brothers and all Christian teachers with some of the greatest teachers in the Church like Barnabas (M. 134), Augustine (M. 161), Cyprian (M. 166), Gregory (M. 109), Jerome (M. 170), John Chrysostom (M. 100).

«THAT THE WORD OF GOD CONTINUE TO SPREAD» (2 Thes 3:1) (2/2)

THE NEW EVANGELIZATION

Today, we never tire of speaking of the "new evangelization". Neither should we, today, tire in daily seeking effective instruments for that new evangelization. We must base ourselves on the Word. The Congress of Puebla (1979) said it for the Church of Latin America: «Scripture must be the soul of evangelization» (N° 374).

Before Puebla, it was Medellín (1968) that affirmed: «Our pastoral mission must first of all be based on the Word of God» (14-14). For this purpose it made some catechetical specifications: «A continuous effort is necessary in order to demonstrate that the message of salvation is today a Word of life» (8-15). Then it goes on to ask for a better preparation for native catechists and deacons as «ministers of the Word» (8-14).

For Christian teachers, the words of Paul VI in Evangelii Nuntiandi (19, 5) are still valid:

- To evangelize means that the Church must bring the Good News to all parts of the world so that its power can transform them from within and thus renew the whole of humanity... (N° 18).
- It is important to evangelize cultures... (N° 29).
- Since «the gap between the Gospel and culture is the great problem of our time... cultures must be converted by being introduced to the Gospel... But this meeting cannot take place if the Gospel is not made known» (29).

Therefore, there will be no New Evangelization without the Word, without Dialogue, without MEETING... The Rule clearly states: «Lasallian institutions are characterized by the determination to make the means of salvation available to young people through a quality education and by an explicit proclamation of Jesus Christ.» (13).

This proclamation of Christ holds priority among the Christian Brothers, a priority which extends to other activities besides those in which we are "ministers of the Word".

The Declaration says: «In no way do we neglect to proclaim Jesus Christ. We believe that the youth of today needs to hear the Gospel and is ready to listen to it» (39-4).

John Paul II has given us a general idea of the New Evangelization: «It is new in its zeal, new in its methods, new in its expression».

What does this mean for our lives, and for our schools?

NEW IN ZEAL: This means that we base our faith in the newness of God the Father. Then we will be able to show our love and our fidelity even amidst all the idols which surround us...

NEW IN METHODS: Everywhere and always present, the Word is GOOD NEWS, hope, salvation. We make it a Word which attracts, supports, corrects because it is always with us; a Word which never condemns because it always hopes; a Word to which we grow accustomed...

NEW IN ITS EXPRESSION: a dynamic Word, close to us... which enters into the lives of persons and groups, of Educational Communities... so than many can see the novelty of the impact of the Word on our lives and our institutions.

It is evident that we will not be effective agents of this "New Evangelization" until we become "men and women of the Word", "Communities of the Word"...

«MEANWHILE THE WORD SPREAD...» (Act 6:7)

This is another result which the Church sees each time it frees the Word, each time it puts the Word within reach of the faithful, each time the Word is placed in the hearts of the People of God.

It was the observation of St. La Salle. It is what the Rule means when it says: «Together they listen and meditate on the Word of God» (50). «Daily they read and meditate on the Word of God» (67).

As we familiarize ourselves with the Word, we will live what the Rule says in N° 48... (and to which we are not always able to measure up). «The distinctive character of the Brother's community is to be a community where the experience of God is shared».

As long as we are not open to the Word of God and we refuse to let ourselves be taught by it, it will be more difficult to share our faith with each other. We will continue to be shallow men and women...

Sometimes I ask myself why we seem to be afraid of the Word when our spirituality and our mission urge us to absorb it; when we are the spiritual sons of "a man of the Word"... Why do we not let it free us?

And meanwhile, our spiritual lives seem to languish as if they lacked sustenance... What should we do?

AS DISCIPLES...

We have already mentioned that "discipleship" is a given in the teaching and practice of De La Salle. «Jesus Christ has chosen us to be his co-workers in the salvation of souls. When reading the Gospel, you should study the manner and the means he used in order to bring his disciples to the practice of the truths of the Gospel» (M 196, 2).

The Gospel contains many images of the "disciple" which complement each other.

– The disciple seated at the feet of Jesus in order to hear his word (LK 10:39).

– The disciple who has an intimate experience of the Lord and therefore who can see and hear what others would or could not... (LK 10:23-24).

– The disciple who shares the interior experience of the Master (Jn 15:15). In this way the disciple becomes a friend of the Master because through his intimate experience of His person he knows the secrets of His life, that which sustains Him, that which gives Him strength, joy and hope. «Those who hear My voice are My mother and My brothers and sisters...» (LK 8:19-20 and 11:27-28).

We should not be surprised that this should be so, but rather rejoice in it. Often in our ministry we may have noticed that "Faith comes by the Word" (Rm 10:17).

FREE THE WORD...

«The word of the Lord cannot be chained» (2 Tm 2:9) says St. Paul, basing himself on his own experience. It is not always thus. We Brothers must promote, respect and insist that the Word of God remain available to all, especially in our own lives and schools. It might cost us something to have Paul's experience. We are always tempted in various way to "chain the Word" in Community and School...

– When the Religion period gets the least desirable spot in the schedule because it is not a priority.

– When we fail to help catechists prepare themselves and when we fail to support them...

– When we do not provide a good place or atmosphere for listening, meditating, praying the Word...

– When we teach the Word theoretically without showing how it truly works through living experiences.

– When we teach the Word professionally, as a subject for study and analysis rather than as the mystery of God in Christ and the Church...

– When we proclaim the Word timidly, hurriedly or without enthusiasm...

– When we get lost in technical points instead of opening hearts to the Word,... be they the hearts of persons, of communities or schools.

– When we try to "control" the Word instead of letting its influence flow powerfully and freely...

"To free the Word" according to the language and the practice of De La Salle is to hand it on, to present it simply as the reality of God; to give it wide berth so that it is not constricted by schedules, structures... or by "the letter..." and then let it move hearts to conversion. (Acts 2:37).

"To free the Word" as far as teaching Christian Brothers are concerned is to listen to it, accept it, yield to it so that it becomes our guide and our teacher...

In certain ways we are living in times in which it is not easy to proclaim the Word. The demands of the New Evangelization will make us enter more and more into the approach given by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Phillipians:

«...be innocent and genuine, perfect children of God among a deceitful and underhanded brood, and you will shine in the world like bright stars because you are offering it the word of life» (Phil 2:15-17).

For this purpose you must acquire the mentality of "the man of the Word", daily perusing the Scriptures (Acts 17:11).

IN THE POWER OF THE WORD

The Church which is Mater et Magistra teaches us discipleship. I like to point out the liturgical practice which is very realistic in its teaching. Frequently the Alleluia or the Gospel Song which introduces to Gospel reading during the Mass indicates either the attitude best suited to that reading or the power and creativity of the Word itself. Thus:

– "The Lord opened his heart to receive the Gospel" (Acts 16:14)... is a practice of the early Christian Church.

– We are always in danger of "hardening our heart" (Ps. 94, 8).

– The Lord gives us "a noble, generous and patient heart" (Lk 8:15)... in order to receive the Word.

– In us lies "the incorruptible seed of the Word" (I Pet 1:22-23).

– We are disciples like "sheep attentive to the Word" (Jn 10, 27).

– We must not allow "the Word to degenerate" (Jas. 1:18).

– Thus we can enter into the intimacy of our God (Rv 3:20).

CONCLUSION

"That the Word continue to spread" (2 Thes 3:1).

For this to happen let us enter on the road to conversion thanks to the Word. It will be good for us. We will be closer to our Lasallian origins. What must we do?

● Continue to increase "experiences of the Word" in our communities, schools, Lasallian groups...

Give more time to community meditation on the Word. Enrich our community prayer times with the experience which the Church offers us in the "Lectio Continua". Renew our community and group prayers and celebrations so that the Word of God may be more evident as the Word proclaimed, received, interiorized, shared, heard...

● Likewise, we must be promoters and animators of "Groups for the Word". Here I have in mind what is done in several Regions of the Institute with reference to efforts being made to provide biblical formation for adults (Parents, teachers, friends, neighbors...):

– Introduction to the Bible concentrating on the Sunday Gospel.
– Systematic biblical catechesis.
– Courses on the Bible stressing study and prayer.
– Groups using biblical prayers.
– Basic ecclesial communities.
– ...

In this way our communities and school will grow as "the people of the Word", "relishing the Word" (Hb 6:5), making "the Word active within them" (I Thes 2:13), because "the Word of God remains among us in all its richness" (Col 3:16).

Then, following the logic of the Acts of the Apostles each time the Word is announced and spread, the Church grows proportionally (cf. Acts 6:7; 12:24; 13:49; 19:20).

ISSUES OF EVANGELIZATION IN A CULTURE

In the film Mission one is given the "treat" of hearing Guaraní children singing European polyphony in such crystal clear voices, of seeing European art work imitated in the construction of building, and Greco-Roman concepts set forth as the vocabulary of faith. In missionary centers all over the world converts recited formulas that were the fruit of the lived faith struggles of Europeans, Byzantines, and Mediterranean local churches in the course of their respective inculturation of the Gospel. The stories of the power struggles of the first centuries of Christian communities and how these communities struggled to live out the gospel in their lives are the stuff of history. The struggles of the present day which are now a source of confusion as far as the issue of the Gospel and cultural context in which the Gospel has been presented, will become likewise the stuff of history. As other cultures and peoples dealt with their issues here and now, so must we. The end results –both past and present– of many of these struggles are and have been a disservice to the Gospel, to the world Church, and to the local churches. They have been a source of division among the believers in Jesus. Basically at the bottom of all of these horror stories –the Mission story is but representative– one finds the issue of control: who controls the language and the symbols by which the Gospel is made known. There is much that has happened in the local churches and the universal Church throughout the centuries that is not in the Spirit of the Gospel. In this article I would like to examine some of the consequences of this issue of control as far as evangelization and its cultural context are concerned.

When control becomes an unacknowledged and unadmitted issue in the events of human life, the Gospel and Gospel principles get short shrift. It seems that the power/authority issue and who is in control must be established at any price, including that of the Gospel itself. As in the Mission, when distant authority intervenes using its moral authority to establish control in ambiguous situations, the local worshiping community –the community of faith that is trying to deal with life issues in the light of the Gospel and make its decisions accordingly– is caught in a bind. Local issues and possible ambiguous solutions that are judged as inadmissible by the international governing body are perceived as sources of division. It is the local Church that has to live in faith with the consequences of any decision made. Many times these local or regional communities find the decisions made at a distance –be it physical, spiritual, psychological, emotional, or cultural– very difficult to assent to and tend to dismiss them in practice if to do so openly and institutionally would be too painful. When control becomes the prime factor of decisions at the local level, the consequences at the community of faith level are even more wrenching because there are either no alternatives or the alternatives are too painful. The fruit of all of this is to set-up different levels of "reality". There is a church triumphant level which puts the institutional church as "always having recognized what has been the best for the human race and always having promoted what has been good, noble, and beautiful." There is the historical reality which has had churchmen on the side of empire and western colonialism –cultural, economic, social, intellectual and religious. Today as yesterday ecclesiastical authority, which is consciously or unconsciously identified as coterminous with the Church, says that since it has always been on the side of right, it should be listened to. It is the present day protector of revelation. Besides, what it says comes from God who protects the church, of which it is the protector here and now. It is a no-win argument with enough truth fused with control issues that it becomes a stumbling block to many educated believers. One of the crucial issues, then, is how to make the gospel reality of power/authority in the Church live in such a way as to diminish the temptation to substitute the death-giving use of control in the process of evangelization and Church life. Perhaps the multi-cultural reality of today's Church will call forth life-giving expressions of gospel authority in Church institutions as the Gospel interacts with the different cultural understandings of power and authority.

Another issue of missionary reality is that the Gospel is presented more as a tradition than the living reality that sheds light on concrete personal and community decisions taken in faith, which is indeed the Tradition of faith and faith communities. I have asked many religious men and women in various parts of the world involved in the area of religious education, «What are the basics?» Invariably I got the 10 Commandments, the Sacraments, the prayers, Catholic Social Doctrine, etc., as the basic things to evangelize about. I found it incredible that these things would be considered the basics about the good news of the Gospel. God's unconditional love, the relationship that Jesus showed with the poor, the outcast, women, children, as well as his completely new way of looking at authority and power, the freedom of life and conscience, and the forming of community to share His Body and Blood, a sign of the covenant God is making with human beings were not even in consideration. Until these dimensions are presented in a way that will dialogue with the local culture and grow with it, the Gospel clothed in Western traditions will remain extraneous to the lived reality of the culture instead of being the leaven that transforms.

The inner freedom to grow in relationship with God –I will be your God and you will be my people (Ez. 36:27), the Spirit reveals to our Spirit that we are sons and daughters (Rom 8:16), I no longer call you servants but friends (Jn 15:15)– and the different cultural forms to express that are the issues of faith and mission practice today. Vincent Donovan in his recent book, The Church in the Midst of Creation (Orbis) develops some of Rahner's ideas about different critical times of the Church and points out that ours indeed is a critical time –passing from being basically a Church rooted and orientated in Europe to being a world Church. To be a world church asks people of faith to explore the images they use to understand their relationship with God, their operating sense of Church and community, and the sense of cultural boundaries rooted in self-knowledge and self-respect. These elements permit a culture to grow and develop while respecting the growth and development of other cultures. These are the elements that are needed to effect the kenosis in the leadership and in the communities that are the cutting edges of missionary and intercultural work today. Hopefully the serenity which is the fruit of these elements will neutralize the tendency to substitute illusory power of control for the power of the Gospel.

It is by images, conscious and unconscious that we understand things. These images are charged with emotions and values. The unconscious ones may or may not belong to the personal experience of an individual in the culture, but the emotive and value intensity can be just as strong, e.g. prejudice, national and regional stereotypes. When images are not accessible to the consciousness of the individual they are indeed more powerful because they reside in the person unackowledged. Both the power of the media in the first world and the power of storytelling in the areas of the world where technology is not accessible give credit to the power of the image. It is by powerful images that we can communicate our faith and Gospel practice. Assent requires that these images be rooted in the Spirit of Jesus and free from need to manipulate and control others.

Without a chosen pursuit of the knowledge and love of God on the part of pastoral agents it is difficult to establish an effective relationship with God that transforms life, and opens one to the Good News. Germane to this is the story of the guru, who after talking to his disciple about God and the significance of life, held the head of his disciple under water until he almost drowned; after he recovered, the disciple asked, "why?", to which the guru responded, "When you want God as bad as you wanted the air, you will have Him". It is this singleness of purpose that finds God in all human experience.

The sense of Church and Community and the images used to communicate this sense are crucial. The symbols and liturgies of personal, religious, and cultural self understanding are vital to establish a world community and a world Church that has significance on the local level as well as on the global level. The different cultural incarnations of gospel-rooted values in communion with each other, respectful of each other, calling each other to greater love, reconciliation, and fidelity need to develop as the world cultures learn how to live with each other. They will have to learn to provide and mutually share the resources of the earth for the benefit of all of the earth's inhabitants.

The sense of cultural boundaries rooted in self knowledge and self respect that permits one culture to grow and develop while respecting the growth and development of other cultures is what is needed to facilitate multi-cultural living in what is becoming a smaller and smaller world. As missionaries become aware of their own religious and cultural bounderies and are respectful of the host culture, they see that God can be found in their own heritage and in that of the host culture. Does this take away from the revelation of Jesus Christ or make it irrelevant? Of course not. Will this change the way of understanding the western Church of the past 450 years? Very much so. Just as it was, as Karl Rahner points out, when the Jewish Christian Church was supplanted by the romanization of the Gentile Church. As Church membership is less and less European, communities and local churches in communion with the world church are going to have to discern what is of the Gospel, what is of European western cultural heritage, and what in their local customs and institutions must enter into dialogue with the Gospel in order to be transformed by it. They will have to discern and choose what are the appropriate symbolic, liturgical, and cultural expressions of the Gospel and Gospel faith within a given culture. Then the Gospel will have been preached to all nations.

THE OFFICE OF POSTULATOR GENERAL OF THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS (2/2)

Brother Leone Morelli

- BROTHER ROBUSTINIEN: 1829-1917, fifth Postulator General.

Until 1877, Brother Robustinien worked in France, then on 16th October 1878, he was posted to Rome as director of the Community of San Antonio, to lighten the burdens of Brother Floride, who was now quite old and whose health was rather poor. Brother Robustinien soon learned Italian in spite of his age. The rest of his story can be learned from his obituary notice:

"Our colleague spent only a short time in his previous post, for Providence ordained that he should fill for many years a role of great importance for our Institute in Rome. Brother Floride, at the period Procurator General to the Holy See and at the same time Visitor of the French District, cum Director of the community of Madonna dei Monti, was getting old and was suffering from poor health. Brother Superior General Irlide therefore wanted to relieve him of some of his work, by appointing Brother Robustinien director of the community, with the chance also of gaining experience in the task of Procurator, with a view later of taking over from Brother Floride. Brother Robustinien made no comment on his appointment, since he was content to allow Providence to dictate affairs. So off he set for the Eternal City arriving there during the second half of October 1878. He was in his fiftieth year. The community was at the time running three separate schools, one where the community lived and two others in the same area of the town. As in the other schools where he had been headmaster, Brother Robustinien would regularly visit the classes to encourage the teachers. He also set up periodic examinations to keep the students at their work.

On the 8th January 1880, God called Brother Floride to himself and Brother Robustinien, on 23rd February, was appointed to the triple roles of Procurator General, Postulator for the cause of Venerable de La Salle and Visitor of the French District. He often used to remark how embarrassed he was to have to undertake certain tasks for which he had had inadequate preparation. However, he did not lose heart, since he had confidence that Providence would give him the help he needed. In 1885, the two Districts became one, and, as a new Visitor was appointed, Brother Robustinien was able to concentrate on the jobs of Postulator and Procurator General, posts which he filled for 33 years.

One of the constant preoccupations of Brother Robustinien was the beatification and canonisation cause of our Holy Founder. Although he had been sent to Rome eventually to succeed Brother Floride, the latter seemed likely to survive for quite some years. Therefore his collaborator took active care of the community and classes, but did not receive much training in the role of Procurator General and even less in that of how to deal with canonisation causes. Hence when, in 1880, he found himself occupying the post of Postulator General, one could say that he had to begin learning right from the beginning.

Providence, in which Brother Robustinien had great trust, had reserved for our colleague a consolation which surely is unique for Postulators, that of arranging the actual beatification and canonisation of the Founder of our Institute. Brother Robustinien spared himself no labour; no difficulty or upset discouraged him, provided it was for the "Cause" of our Founder. Recognising that he was not sufficiently informed, he began with youthful fervour to study how Causes were dealt with; he consulted lawyers and other postulators and thus gradually acquired a remarkable competence.

On 19th February 1888, he enjoyed one of the greatest days of his life. The Sovereign Pontiff beatified Venerable de La Salle, thus allowing him public veneration. The successful Postulator was overjoyed, less for the part he himself had played in bringing it about, than for the glorification itself, and the spiritual benefits which would now come to the Institute. The same motives made Brother Robustinien yearn for the day when Blessed de La Salle would have his name on the list of Saints. It seemed to Brother Robustinien that the Institute would then be confirmed as the work of a Saint, and the Brothers would be motivated to try more and more to be filled with the spirit of their father, thus solemnly honoured by the Church. He hardly dared hope to see that supreme day himself; however, he did see it, and earlier than he expected.

The canonisation of the Holy Founder marks the high point in the active career of Brother Robustinien."

On 22nd April 1903 Brother Robustinien also obtained the introduction of the cause of Brother Benildus.

Brother Robustinien died in Rome on 19th February 1917.

• BROTHER ALEXIS FRANÇOIS (1870-1938): 6th Postulator General.

He was born in the province of Oviedo, Spain, where his parents were at that time working. When they returned to France Alexis joined the Brothers' school, then, at the age of fifteen, he went to the novitiate of the Mother House in Paris.

He followed his studies in the scholasticate directed by Brother Perrin-Thomas. He requested to go as a missionary to Indochina, but his health gave way under the rigourous climate, so he returned to Europe in 1885.

When Brother Perrin-Thomas was appointed Visitor of the District of Rome, he took along with him his former student Brother Alexis, who became secretary to Brother Robustinien. In the month of March 1913, Brother Superior General, Gabriel Marie, appointed him successor to Brother Robustinien as Procurator and Postulator. It was not difficult for him to carry on the work which he was in fact already doing. By his calm dignity he impressed and attracted the good will of the Roman Congregations. A prelate of the Congregation for Saints said: "We counted him here as one of the best prepared Postulators".

He did all he could to advance the causes of Brothers Exuperien and Mutien-Marie, once they reached Rome; the same can be said of Brother Miguel's cause. In 1928 he arranged the recognition of the heroic virtues of Brother Benildus. When Pius XI expressed the wish to see a Mother House for the Brothers built in Rome, Brother Alexis was put in charge of finding a suitable piece of land, where in fact later was to rise the Mother House of 476 Via Aurelia.

Brother Alexis died on 17th May 1938 after an operation.

• BROTHER LEONE DI MARIA NAPIONE, 1892-1969: 7th Postulator General.

Brother Leone entered the novitiate in 1907 and made final vows in 1920. He did his educational work in Milan then in Turin, where he became Director of the College of San Giuseppe.

He was appointed to the Mother House in Rome as Postulator General on the 21st May 1938. At the same time, he was Italian government inspector of religious teaching in schools.

In 1956 he was elected Assistant for Italy and its colonies, whilst retaining the office of Postulator and becoming Councillor Delegate to the AEI (The Italian Educational Association). After the General Chapter of 1966, he continued as Postulator and as president of the Catechetical Commission for Italy and as Councillor Delegate to the AEI.

He died suddenly in Genoa on 26th February 1969.

As Postulator his name is linked with the beatification of Brother Benildus –4th April 1948– and with his canonisation on the 29th October 1967. To these must be added the preparatory work for the causes of Brother Miguel Febres Cordero, Brother Mutien-Marie and the French and Spanish Martyr Brothers.

• BROTHER RUGGERO DI MARIA, (Michele Morelli, 1914-1975), 8th Postulator General.

Brother Ruggero took the religious habit in Albano Laziale on the 6th October 1930. In 1934 he was appointed to the College of San Giuseppe. In 1947 he was transferred to Milan and in 1948 became director of the Istituto Leonardo da Vinci in Catania. In 1954 he went to Benevento, where he remained as director for seven years.

In 1961 he was named auxiliary visitor of the Rome District and the following year, whilst retaining the post of auxiliary visitor took over the headship of the College of San Giuseppe.

In 1965 he was made full Visitor, and the following year, at the General Chapter of 1966, he was elected Assistant for Italy, Libya and Ethiopia.

In number 400 of the Institute Circulars we read the following:

"Upon the death of Brother Leone di Maria, the Institute asked Brother Ruggero to add the post of Postulator General to those he already had. He brought to the task all his skills as well as a remarkable energy for the success of our beatification causes:

that of Brother Miguel, in which he displayed tremendous energy in face of quite a few difficulties; that of Brother Mutien-Marie, which he brought to its closing stages; and, following the appeals of the religious authorities of Reunion, that of Brother Scubilion, whose cause he asked to be reopened. These matters did not make him forget the cause of our Spanish martyrs, which was very dear to him and that of Brother Teodoreto of Turin."

The great courtesy and dignity which marked all his relations with the Roman authorities caused him to win the esteem of Cardinals and other Prelates of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints".

He died in Rome on the 1st April 1975 at the age of sixty-one. •

AN ETHOS OF FEAR

Is it possible: an «apostolic succession» of teachers who pass on the same wounds to students year after year?

A year ago I experienced one of those rare educational exchanges which, like a recurring musical theme keeps teasing the mind, will sooner or later break out for others to hear.

The setting for this meeting was an apartment on the outskirts of Madison, WI. The dramatis personae were Parker Palmer, Robert McCann, FSC, and I. Palmer, a Quaker Writer, teacher, lecturer and sociologist, introduced us to the Quaker approach to education and shared with us his strong personal insights on the art of teaching. We were impressed! Bob and I, in turn, spoke of Lasallian Christian Education which is being kept alive by Brothers and Associates in our schools today. He was impressed! We sipped herbal tea, talked of our roles in education today, and energized one another through the experiences which we shared.

Palmer spoke of his concern about the ethos of fear which pervades some classrooms today. He felt that fear weakens learning and that it should be foreign to Christian schools where "Be-Not-Afraid" Christians have gathered to learn. He wondered if in some schools there is something like an "apostolic succession" of teachers who pass on the same wounds to students year after year.

Our meeting prompted me to recall the story that the Russian writer, Anton Chekhov, once told about a man who tried to train a kitten to catch mice. Whenever the kitten refused to give chase, the man beat it. After the kitten grew up into an adult cat, it always cowered in terror in the presence of a mouse. «That man who beat that cat,» says Chekhov's character, «is the man who taught me Latin.» (1)

Fear, as described in this paper, is the straight dictionary definition –a feeling of agitation or anxiety which is caused by the perceived presence of or nearness to danger. Removing fear in the classroom does not mean removing orderliness or discipline. A healthy respect for the teacher, for fellow students, and for the whole learning process is essential to a good school. A consideration of fear does, however, have something to say about the bearing and stance of the teacher, the style and method of teaching, and the attitudes which the teacher projects to the students about their personal worth.

Anxiety and agitation may be introduced into a class in many ways. A teacher's authoritarian approach, a shouting and screaming technique, the constant "mark-book" threat held over the students, corporal punishment or the promise thereof, and that sometimes forgotten conveyor of fear, sarcasm. Sarcasm (from the Greek Sarkasmos –to tear the flesh) may, in the long run, be more hurtful to the students than a slap or two. Secure teachers will never belittle students in the process of teaching or correcting them.

It seems reasonable to assume that fear resides in every student at some time during the learning process. So why not find out why and where it exists? A very helpful method is the use of an anxiety scan sheet (sample enclosed). Brother David Delahanty introduced me to this technique years ago at one of the Huether Workshop sessions. I have been forever grateful to him and have used it in every class since that time. Its power to set the stage for real learning came quickly to my attention in a class of public school teachers in a northern Minnesota community. The course, Ethics in Education, was an elective these teachers chose as a group. By this selection they felt they were daring to add a stronger ingredient to their graduate program though they were not quite certain what this would demand of them. I credit the anxiety-scan-sheet-approach with creating a most positive teaching/learning experience.

These anxiety scan sheets should be home-made with each teacher adding his/her own personal flavor and adapting them to the class, subject, and other variables. The enclosed sheet is so drawn up that if a high rating is given to either A, D, or G, the course itself is the cause of the anxiety. If B or H received a high rating, it would mean that the teacher is perceived as the cause of the students' misgivings. A high rating to C, E, F, or I indicates that the students feel some personal inadequacy or lack of preparation for the course. In each instance the fear expressed needs to be addressed for better learning.

If the course is the culprit, it needs better sketching. Methods for studying the content will certainly be part of the correction. Fear of the teacher must be dealt with up front. The teacher must be secure enough to explain his/her teaching style, the demands of the course, and then listen in an understanding way to the students. Students need to realize however, that their growth depends upon challenges and that removing fear does not mean removing hard work. If the fear arises because of the students' personal doubt about success they will need strong affirmation and encouragement. This comes quite naturally if teachers are running classes where kids are free to make mistakes without fear of ridicule.

The school year is in progress. Is it possible to introduce this approach now? Yes, and please do! You may find that you are in tune with the class, and this is great. It is also a possibility that you have been working off your own agenda and have presumed a readiness in your students which is not there. A certain byproduct is that the students will feel honored that you consulted with them in their struggles. In this way your classroom will be an amiable place for the «BE-NOT-AFRAID» learners to gather.

CHARACTERISTICS

OF LASALLIAN EDUCATION

My role this evening is to give an introductory overview of the characteristics of Lasallian education. I would like, therefore, to offer a twofold invitation. First, I ask that, over this weekend, you affirm the many ways your experience is Lasallian. I hope that you will realize that many of the things you already do, we name them Lasallian as a way to characterize them as carrying on the living tradition that started with St. La Salle and that we hope all of us, the Brothers, our colleagues, everyone who is interested in real education, will share in.

Although the term, Lasallian Education, comes from an emphasis on a tradition, the original vision of St. La Salle and the ways that tradition has grown and adapted itself to the present, is a tradition that is shared by others, both within the Catholic tradition as well as those who really understand education. So it is a way of naming something and perhaps is a symbol for us, a way in which we can share something in common.

Secondly., the invitation is that you consciously name and join with us, the Brothers, in that participation of keeping alive St. La Salle's initial vision; keeping alive those definite and certain characteristicas of the education we provide. It is an invitation to all of you that you would incorporate the Lasallian tradition into your own tradition, way of thinking, your religious tradition and the tradition of faith from which you operate; that you would make it your own, that you would share it with us and therefore, we would keep it alive and adapt it to the students entrusted to our care.

This is an invitation and a carrying-on of the tradition that is going on throughout the world. It extends cross-culturally and to seventy-two countries. The vision or goal, finally, is to have a world in which, both on a politcal and social point of view, one will come across colleagues and students who will have heard the same invitation, who will have heard the same message, who will participate and will finally share a common set of values that we hope will make the world a better place.

We will talk, then, about two different ways in which to look at the characteristics of a Lasallian school. One will be about the school in general, the overall philosophy, the ways in which you, as belonging to a community of teachers, participate in the overall movement. The other will be to draw attention to a few specific characteristics as they apply to us as educators.

For a Lasallian school, the most important principle is it is centered on the young. It is centered around their needs, not ours. The ways in which we make decisions about curriculum and schedules, the ways in which we order our own lives is centered on what is best for them. We take into account that the young have to live in a world that keeps changing quickly and they need to be prepared to take their rightful place. Thus, the concept of quality comes out of a concern for the young and everything we do, the expenses that are involved with it, the degree to which we personally rearrange our own lives, is because we are looking forward to what their needs are and the kind of world in which they will live.

What we hope is by coming to us and being with us in elementary school, secondary school, and the collegiate world, they will not only have a better chance of taking their rightful place in the world, but they will take it with a certain set of values. They will take it with a certain set of priorities about how to use the kind of power we give them through an education. We want to give them the means of salvation through a quality education.

Their education is not solely for their own benefit, it is also for the benefit of the society in which they live. This is their salvation –to love their neighbor as themselves. This is an explicit proclamation of Jesus Christ and we need to be faithful to this message as Jesus was. The same ways in which He combatted all forms of prejudice and exclusion must be our ways.

There are implications then for us as Lasallian educators. The Rule mentions that we are invited to look upon our professional work as a ministry. It is not just a job. It is not just something for our own benefit in terms of the glory, prestige, or power we receive. It is a ministry, meaning it is ordered for others. It is for other's benefit. It is through us that our students are going to hear and experience the love of God. So, how we relate to them and how we teach them becomes as important as what we teach. We need to be attentive and available in a brotherly and sisterly companionship.

We want them to discover, appreciate, assimilate, both human and Gospel values. It is very important that we experience both these values in an integrated fashion. The best there is about being human needs to be available to them and be integrated with a set of Gospel values. Sometimes there is conflict and we need to think about it and we need to assist them to think about it and work their way through it. Compassion is often in conflict with competition, so sometimes we are going to have to make a choice. The Gospel ways of accepting people is not always going to be supported very well by the demands we see made on people in society. So there will be a conflict. By modeling and helping them think their way through to decisions, we will assist them to come to know that they are the children of God.

If we define them and ourselves as a family under God, then there is a set of implications about how we treat and relate to one another. It is an invitation, the invitation of Jesus. He does not force Himself on anyone, he just keeps offering, keeps announcing. In the same manner, so should we.

As from the beginning, our Lasallian emphasis on a concern for the poor has to be constantly present. If, for practical reasons and historical circumstances, we find ourselves committed to other groups in society, this particular characteristic still has to ring true. We have to constantly examine what is causing the problems of poverty in our society and then turn our, and our students', attention to the best ways to promote justice and human dignity.

Let me turn now to a few implications. It seems to me that what ought to be foremost in our minds, as Lasallian teachers, is: Am I teaching in such a way that I am fostering critical thinking? Am I teaching them to use authority as the least of the arguments for validity? Am I teaching them to examine several alternatives before making a choice about what seems to be best?

There is a need to insure that students see connections between areas of study, rather than learning isolated units of information. For example, at some point, the students need to see that learning Euclidian geometry is really only the beginning and the kind of physics that comes our of Euclidian geometry is very limited. If it were not for Lobachevski in geometry, we would not have the kind of physics we have today. For them to get a sense of this kind of connection is very important.

I think our discipline and our grading have to give testimony to justice. If we say that part of their responsibility is to promote and work for a just world, and if that is not their experience when with us, then there is real trouble; for there exists a real contradiction. So the ways we grade and discipline will say more to them about justice than what we say to them.

Interest and availability to individual students is an important characteristic of the Lasallian teacher. Because of their individual needs some students will need more attention from us than others. All of this must be balanced in an appropriate way with your other responsibilities. But for so many of them, the fact that we care whether they learn or not, makes all the difference in the world.

Perhaps the most important characteristic is that we pray for our students. The are things that are beyond our capability and there are things that happen to them that are beyond our way of taking credit. So, to have the habit of actually thinking about individual students in prayer and saying a prayer for them is an integral part of what it means to be a Lasallian educator. St. La Salle wanted us to make sure that we always had the best interests of the students at hand and the way we can come to that is with the help of the Holy Spirit. So, keeping them in mind, one by one, face by face, name by name, in prayer is essential.

As science teachers you are concerned about methodology being balanced against the pressure for covering content. The pressure comes from parents and the students themselves. The pressure comes, sometimes, from your own sense of how much they need to know before they go to the next level. And yet, the question of methodology is very important. Are they learning in a competitive or cooperative mode? Are they at one another's throat in lab or are they actually helping one another? Our methodology has all kinds of messages and values embedded in it and so it is imperative that we constantly review our methodology.

Fostering wonder and awe is important. To destroy the sense of wonder and awe for them is a terrible thing. Darwin wrote that he had great regret that he allowed that part of his mind and his sensitivities to be atrophied by only applying certain laws of reason and rational thought and that he no longer could respond to poetry or music in a way he had experienced in an earlier time in his life. His mind had become such that he simply took in information and ground out generalizations and he saw himself as having been much poorer.

The question of faith and science is a major concern, obviously both in our culture at this present time, as it has been throughout history. Faith experience, organized religion, and science have not always had a harmonious relationship. Yet, there are examples of the ways in which it has. D'Chardin is a marvelous testimony to the ways in which a faith life can be integrated with competence in science. So for us to read the "Divine Milieu" or the "Phenomenon of Man" and to work our way through the questions of faith and science so as to help our students is a very important responsibility.

There are moral issues that confront us either because they are in direct relationships to Church teaching or they are larger questions with which the whole society has to deal. We have a responsibility to not just shove off these questions onto the Religion Department. There may be a need to pursue ways to have a dialogue with the Religion department or the Social Studies department so that with the students a real learning experience develops for everyone.

If we really are saying the touchstone is to prepare the student for the kind of world they are going to live in, then we need to be attuned to what kind of world exists now and what kind it is becoming. Most of our students are going to live in a world where cultural differences and geographic boundaries mean nothing. So the ways in which they are to learn about and adapt to different cultures and people is a major responsibility of ours.

In conclusion, while we know that the purpose of education is, of course, the development of the mind, we Lasallian educators are equally interested in touching hearts. We wants them to be certain kinds of persons at the end of the educational experience they have with us. We accomplish that mission with an ardent zeal for the work of the Lord. We generously place at the disposal of those whom God has entrusted to us, our time, our talents, our energy. We seek to improve our competence, the quality of our relationships, the witness of our lives, and the vigor of our faith.

FAILURE IN SCHOOL

The question of failure in school is not taken sufficiently seriously by those in positions of responsibility in education. Too often, this anomaly is considered at school level as just a natural retribution which inevitably catches up with the stupid, lazy or recalcitrant pupil. And yet, any child in the hands of a good teacher is capable of making progress, showing interest and being cooperative.

This is why at the Ostia Congress in March 1990 a workshop concentrated the attention of European Lasallian headmasters on this problem. It was realised that the annual number of failures in some countries is very worrying. Figures show that Belgium has among the highest numbers in the world. This may, however, be explained by the fact that the school leaving age is 18 and education is of a very high standard.Figures for 1986, for example, show that:

* 32% of pupils are below standard on leaving primary school;

* 58% of pupils are below standard on leaving secondary school;

* 54% of pupils are 2 years or more behind in their studies on leaving secondary school.

To these figures should, of course, be added the many pupils who leave school without any qualifications or certificates. If we consider working class or immigrant children, figures show that, depending on the schools involved, 30%, 40% or 50% of pupils who leave primary school with their certificate fail in their first year of secondary school or are immediately put in for technical courses.

It is a complex problem affected by numerous factors:socio-cultural factors; difficulties involved in transferring from one type of course to another; school policy with regard to advice on choice of courses and to assessment; the way a school is organised and run, and whether, as some, it operates a strict selection procedure. The problem has, therefore, to be considered in its widest sense. First we need to say more precisely what we understand by failure in school.

The school failure is above all the pupil who fails the end of year exam and has to do the year all over again. But personally, I think that any pupil can be considered "a failure" when he is not happy at school, when he goes to school reluctantly, when he does the bare minimum, when he finds himself in a position that does not suit him, when he wastes time and disturbs the others. For older pupils, failure means plans for further studies and so on falling through. Failure can be defined as the inability of a pupil to master the knowledge and skills offered him by a course of studies. Why does failure occur?

There are innumerable reasons. Some lie with the child himself; others with the family, social background, teachers,the school system, society. It is easy enough to trace the origin of difficulties:

* the pupil:

  Did he have the ability to cope?
  Was he interested, motivated?
  Did he apply himself?
  Was he followed up and encouraged?

* the studies:

  Were they within the capability of the pupil?
  Were the teaching methods used appropriate?
  Was assimilation ensured by means of lessons, exercises and revision?

* assessment:

  Was it done properly?

These somewhat technical questions give rise to a number of more fundamental ones:

* What values does our society offer young people today? In a world where money, competition, material values and selfishness count, why should students study and for whom, when what they expect of us is an example of disinterestedness, solidarity, generosity, and respect for nature?

* What is family life like? Do mothers still exist who pick up their children after school, chat with them, make them tea and encourage them to do their homeworks? How many parents are capable of making their children stay in the house and regulating their use of the television and personal radios?

* How does the school function? Does it make allowance for the changing behavioural patterns of young people today? Does it take into account what they know already, what they can do, what they really are, what they accomplish as a group? Much of this is often quite remarkable but the school set-up cannot make use of it. The curriculum is often too general and sometimes overloaded, and this makes it hard for teachers to structure their courses and the work set for pupils. There is still much research to be done on how young people learn and organise their knowledge in a world dominated by audiovisual input, and one in which the media impart much more information than the school and are much more expert at doing so. The traditional method of teaching - the teacher standing in front of his class - is still all too frequently used, because it is easier for the teacher. It is forgotten that pupils learn by doing and by making mistakes. The social and financial status of the teacher has been devalued: he has lost his standing and has become a civil servant whose work and pay depend on the number of pupils.

Continuous assessment which checks on progress and remedies problems is still not widely practised. Final exams are often badly organised: papers are too long; questions are wide of the mark, lack balance, are sometimes illegible and different from the kind normally asked; and marking schemes are not fair. It happens also that exams are set with the express intention of sorting pupils out and settling accounts with such as have been thought difficult or awkward.

Each of the problems we have considered presents us with a challenge because, in one way or another, in each case we are all able to furnish at least a part of a solution. Failure in school can be ended under certain conditions: if pupils are put in for courses that suit them; if teachers, happy to be teachers, well-trained and better paid than at present, give interesting lessons; if parents and teachers agree to attend refresher courses, and genuinely work together; if they make use of the services of medical, psychiatric and social centres; if teachers work as part of efficient teaching teams, more concerned for the success of each individual child than for the reputation of their school; if the research that has been done on the psychology and sociology of young people, in education, on teaching methodology and on testing do not remain in the realm of theory, but lead to practical applications which can help all adults involved in education.

Failure in school is a source of suffering for the pupil;it can ruin his future; it is the source of much bad feeling in the home; and it costs the State a great deal of money.There has to be a widespread campaign against failure in school, especially in Lasallian schools. Every child is a child of God, a young prince, especially if he is in some way underprivileged. To be a Lasallian teacher means making use of the latest advances in education in one's work.

THE NEW EVANGELIZATION AND THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOL

Questions leading to a Response

The Pope has issued a call to the entire Church to undertake a new evangelization. He first mentioned it in Latin America in the context of preparing for the Fifth Centenary of the evangelization of that continent. Then the idea was extended to the whole world. The call is universal.

The Christian school, by its very nature evangelizes and therefore it must examine itself to discover its role and responsibility in the light of the call of the Vicar of Christ. Does it or does it not have something to say, something to do, in the work of evangelizing the modern world?

Both as an examination and a study, let us try to answer some questions, keeping in mind that the Pope is talking about an evangelization "new in its enthusiasm, new in its methods and new in its expression".

1. The Call of the Pope.

- A large part of the world still does now know the saving message of Christ.
- In Christianized societies there are large areas which live only on the fringes of Gospel values. Many have lost the faith or are indifferent to it.
- All Christians need to increase their faith by means of a continuous evangelization.
- The Gospel must provide answers to the questions raised by men at the present moment.
- The transmission of the message must be adapted to the needs and situations of today.

– Does the call of the Pope to undertake a new evangelization mean that the previous evangelization was inadequate or insufficient?

– Is the Gospel sufficiently proclaimed in the so-called Christian societies?

– Does this proclamation of the Gospel reach the generality of Christians or only a part of them? Which Christians do not hear the message?

– Does the Gospel reach the non-believers of "already Christianized" societies?

– Does it reach peoples who have not yet heard of Christ?

– Are Christians involved in the diffusion of the message of Christ? Or do they consider it the responsibility of others, especially the clergy and religious?

– Does the Gospel that is presented respond to the actual problems of men?

– Is the language used in proclaiming the Gospel adequate?

– In what measure are different cultures impregnated with Christian values?

– In general, is the diffusion of the Gospel message widening, stagnant or vanishing?

2. The Christian school and the New Evangelization

- The purpose of the school is to provide formation for the whole man. His person is a single, whole entity. The body, mind, attitudes, spirituality... nothing can be excluded.
- The Christian school bases its education on Christian values which are presented in such a way as to elicit a personal and positive response from the student.
- Christian education tries to form the citizen and the believer as one and the same person.
- The Christian school is both: a school because it transmits culture and knowledge; Christian because its perspective in all things is based on the Gospel.

– Is the Christian school, in general, a situation, a place and an instrument of evangelization?

– Is the Christian school a witness to lived Gospel values?

– Are there schools which are called Christian but which do not transmit the Gospel message?

– Do the structures of the school foster the presentation of Christian values or hinder them?

– Does the school as a whole evangelize or is this done only in Religion classes?

–In what measure is the entire school program evangelizing its clintele, even the secular teaching and activities?

– Does the Christian school need specific programs for religious formation? Or are these considered unnecessary?

– In the school situation as I see it conducive to the proclamation of the Gospel?

– What difficulties do I find at present which are an obstacle to the presentation of the Gospel message?

– What methods and procedures would be recommended for the proclamation of the Gospel message in the school situation today?

– What would be the difference in this school between the New Evangelization and that which is going on at present?

– How would you differentiate between a school which evangelizes and one that does not?

3. The Christian Educator and the New Evangelization

● The Christian educator is an educator, teacher, professor who teaches and forms students; but he does does it from a lived faith, from Gospel values.

● That is why he is an agent of evangelization, by means of his entire ministry, not only when he teaches Religion or when he speaks about God.

● The Christian educator not only transmits knowledge but his personal life also impresses his students as a true example of a believing man.

● The Christian educator is an agent of the pastoral ministry of the Church. His work becomes an apostolic ministry.

● In a Christian school, the Christian educator is part of the educational project of the entire community, to which he brings his life and his experience.

– In what measure is every Christian educator an evangelizer even when he is not a teacher of religion?

– What internal and personal demands fall upon the Christian educator by the fact he is an evangelizer?

– What is the role of the staff in a evangelizing school?

– What preparation is necessary so that a Christian educator can be effective not only as a teacher, but also as an evangelizer?

– How far does group commitment among the faculty go in order to achieve its evangelizing purpose.

– In other words, what must be the degree of living a community of faith for it to consider itself an evangelizing community?

4. The Student in the Christian School and the New Evangelization

● The student of a Christian School gradually discovers Gospel values. It is not just for himself, but it must be shared.

● Through the Christian values he acquires, the student grows as a believing person while accomplishing his daily duties. They reflect in his life, his school, his family, his environement.

● Christian values must bring the student to a commitment to social justice and a just order.

● It is the student of a Christian school who must be a real witness to human and evangelical values.

– Is the evangelized student capable of evangelizing?

– Does the student of the Christian school commit himself to the apostolate?

– Does the student who is evangelized feel that he possesses values which he must communicate?

– Is the student of the Christian school aware that the commitment to transform the world is a consequence of his faith?

– Does the student of the Christian school feel the need to always practise his religious formation in his daily life?

* * *

These questions can first be answered by considering the total picture, and then making specific applications to actual situations.

PRAYERS
OF A CHRISTIAN EDUCATOR (5)

GENTLENESS, PRUDENCE...

Lord,
the children we educate are persons.
We must remember that when we correct them.
Grant us, Lord,
the spirit of patience and understanding so that when we correct or scold them it will be for the good of the student rather than the relief of our frustration or to get even.

Punishment and scolding when done with love though they may hurt, are like medicines that heal.

Lord, it would be so nice to know that children and young people understand that their faults and disobedience must be corrected;
that the constraints and punishments will be determined by justice, kindness and understanding, for their own real good.

To be an apostle-educator is a sublime mission;
it also has its suffering and difficulties.

Show us, Lord,
how to correct with gentleness and charity.
Move the hearts of our students to admit their faults.
Strengthen their wills that they may change their ways.

The prophet Nathan approached David kindly when he upbraided him, and David recognized his sin and repented.

Lord, keep us from giving vent to our anger when we must correct or punish.
On the contrary,
help us to keep in mind the good of the student.

When we proceed with kindness and charity, children and youth profit more.
So did David with Nathan:
«Lord, I have sinned».

Prudent correction helps those who receive it to correct their faults.
When done with anger or passion,
the students withdraw from the teacher.
Corrections and punishments given with love and zeal are accepted and become effective.

Lord, make our hearts big enough and good enough to correct with kindness for the good of the students.

Lord,
prepare the souls of these children and young people to accept the soft sting of discipline and to help them see how it will better their lives.

Lord,
We really want the best for our students and we are willing to educate with discipline and gentleness.

A MINISTER OF SALVATION

We are your co-workers, Lord.
Children are the field You wish to cultivate through us
because You, Lord, have confided to us the ministry of education.

Search the depths of our hearts;
grant us the strength to be your ministers, grant us fortitude in the use of the talents which You have given us.
And keep us from becoming mired in routine.

Each day we pray to You.
Each day we examine who we are and what we do..
Thanks for what You have done in us, and we ask Your forgiveness for our forgetfulness.

You, Lord,
have given us numerous gifts and graces to do what is right in our mission.
Grant us the will to live our consecration fully.

Lord,
You make no distinction between the duties of our salvation and the duties of our ministry.
As we lead and guide our students we are at the same time saving our souls.

Lord,
we accept the responsibilities of education.
We also count on your help and support for the success of our efforts.
Send Your grace and Your light to make up for our ignorance and weakness.

Jesus, when You said:
«Go and teach all nations»
You sent us to instruct children and youth,
You sent us that they might learn piety.
You gave us the mission to build the Young Church.

We thank You, Lord, for giving us Your WORD – the Gospel,
and Your SACRAMENTS, which sanctify and purify our lives and which move the hearts of our students.

Children are special to You,
«Let the little children come to Me».
They are ready to receive Your grace.
Show us how to educate them to holiness that they may be in Your image, Lord Jesus.

Children are weak and fragile.
They are easily led by their peers,
by comfort...

Lord,
we will be Your hands, Your eyes, Your lips to sustain their wills to direct their lives toward You.
We rely on Your grace.

THE NEW EVANGELIZATION

AND THE LASALLIAN FAMILY (1)

«We are in a new historical era. It demands:
clarity of vision insight to analyze united action» (Medellin 1968).

1. A GRAND PASTORAL PROJECT

Pope Paul VI said that to evangelize was the «joy and vocation proper to the Church, its deepest meaning» as he presented the Church that magnificent document Evangelii Nuntiandi which after 16 years continues even today to enlighten and inspire every Christian who aware of his Baptismal commitment and his responsibility to teach the Gospel.

From the beginning of his pontificate, Pope John Paul II has called on the Church to undertake a grand pastoral project. We referred to it as the New Evangelization called it the «most important and fundamental task of our times». However, this project, in fact, does not originate with John Paul II. He, himself, says that «The Spirit has spoken to the Churches of today and His voice has been heard through the Ecumenical Council which it can rightly be said represents the foundation and commencement of the gigantic task of the evangelization of the modern world. We have reached a new turning point in the history of humanity where immensely varied and serious questions face the Church» (1).

The Pope, then, is shouldering the heritage of the Council of Vatican II and of Pope Montini as he formally announces the New Evangelization with these words: «The present time in the history of mankind requires a revivified transmision of the faith in order to announce to the men of today the perennial message of Christ, adapted to the actual conditions of living in today's world" (2).

It seems that it was on March 9, 1983, in an important speech to the assembly of CELAM in Port Au Prince (Haiti) that for the first time there was explicit and clear mention made of the New Evangelization. The talk was directed specifically to the Churches of Latin America which, numerically, will soon constitute half of the Catholic Church. It says: «The commemoration of a half millenium of evangelization will be truly significant if it is your commitment as Bishops united with your clergy and faithful, not to a re-evangelization, but to a new evangelization – new its zeal, in its methods, in its expression«.

The following year, on October 12, 1984, at the inauguration in Santo Domingo (Dominican Republic) of a novena of years in preparation for the celebration of 500 years of evangelization, the Pope presented another very important program to «the continent of hope» by making a very thorough analysis of the situation and identifying the challenges which existed in Latin America. He ended by stating: «The next centenary of the discovery and first evangelization calls us to a new evangelization of Latin America which can unfurl its energy as it did in its beginnings as

- a potential for sanctity
- a magnificent missionary effort
- a vast catechetical creativity
- a fruitful collegiality and union
- an evangelical struggle for the dignity of man in order to awaken from the heart of Latin America a future of great expectations. It has a name: the civilization of love».

However, this grand project is not limited only to Latin America. Old Europe is also questioning itself about «the best way to announce the perennial message of the Gospel effectively and courageously at this time, and to reveal to the modern mind the the inscrutable riches of the mystery of Christ.» On October 7–11, 1985, the VI Symposium of the Council of Episcopal Conferences of Europe was held in Rome. The Pope addressed to the participants the famous discourse of October 11 in which he recognized that Europe «has undergone so many and such cultural, political, social and economic transformations that the whole matter of evangelization must be considered in completely new terms. We might even say that Europe «as it has been shaped by the complex events of the last century presents the most radical challenge encountered by the history of Christianity and of the Church». Therefore, he affirms that «the work of evangelization within the situation of Europe as it is today calls for a creative new synthesis between the Gospel and life».

If we were to continue quoting the texts of the present Pope we would never end, so much has he spoken on the subject. We might conclude with a quotation from Christifideles Laici which, as a document which synthesizes a path for the Church in modern times, says with great power and precision: «A great, challenging and magnificent enterprise has been confided to the Church: a new evangelization of which the modern world has dire need» (N° 64).

2. WHY A NEW EVANGELIZATION?

The above quotations already indicate the basic reasons why the Pope is proposing to the Church a new direction for its energies and mission in our contemporary world.

Nevertheless, for me it is important to develop this aspect a bit more because from the analysis of the situation and from the presentation of the needs we will draw the outline of our apostolic labors in such a way that they may truly be a response to actual problems.

Many of the addresses of the Pope subtly contain very astute analyses of the present situation of society and the Church. He does it humbly but clearly and without flinching when the Church is involved negatively in the process. On January 13, 1986 he said to the Pontifical Council on Culture: «Yes, we are on the threshold of the gigantic work of evangelization of the modern world which must be done on different terms. The world has entered an era of profound changes due to the amazing quantity of man's creations which threaten to destroy him unless he can integrate them into a spiritual and ethical vision. We are entering a new period of human culture and Christians find themselves faced with an enormous challenge».

On the 26th of November, 1986, in Sydney (Australia), he said: «In many ways the Gospel is firmly rooted in the life of society, but it is also true that the gap between the message of the Gospel and culture requires a new evangelization, a second evangelization. Sixteen years ago, my predecessor, Paul VI came here to this very place and spoke of the temptation to "reduce everything to an earthly humanism, to forget the spiritual and moral dimension of life and have no concern for the necessary relationship of man with the Creator of all the good things he possesses, and with the Supreme Legislator for their use." This temptation is as old as life itself. But today we are being called by the Church and each of its members to come up with a new response. in many parts of the world, the most important problem is not the preaching of the Gospel to those who have not yet heard it as it was for the Apostles and for the many missionaries who have come after them. Today, the problem lies in preaching to those who have already heard it but who no longer respond to it.»

Representatives of the Catholic laity of the United States listed them in the Cathedral of San Francisco on September 18, 1987: «Every age poses new challenges and new temptations for the People of God on their pilgrimage, and our own is no exception. We face a growing secularism that tries to exclude God and religious truth from human affairs. We face an insidious relativism that undermines the absolute truth of Christ and the truths of faith, and tempts believers to think of them as merely one set of beliefs or opinions among others. We face a materialistic consumerism that offers superficially attractive but empty promises conferring material comfort at the price of inner emptiness. We face an alluring hedonism that offers a whole series of pleasures that will never satisfy the human heart».

At the Plenary Assembly of the Secretariat for Non-Believers which took place May 5, 1988, it was noted that the atheistic utopias of the Nineteenth Century were on the decline, and that the dangerous wave of secularization which was sweeping over the world had its dangers: «It reveals itself in consumer societies by hedonism, pragmatism, the search for efficiency without regard for ethical norms and by the neglect of the sacred character of life. All this leads too often to moral relativism and religious indifference.

One might think that this phenomenon exists only in the developed societies of the so-called First World. But this is not true. Even the developing countries find themselves enmeshed in this process, principally in the urbanized areas and among the intellectually cultured social classes where there is leadership from the economic, political and social sectors. And this is happening rapidly. The Pope calls attention to it in Christifideles Laici when he refers to those regions of the world which have preserved intact their traditions of piety and popular Christian spirituality, adding immediately that «this spiritual and moral patrimony today runs the risk of vanishinsg under the impact of many forces, the most outstanding among which are secularization and the growth of sects. Only a New Evangelization can assure the growth of a deep and pure faith which can make these traditions a powerful force within authentic freedom» (N° 34).

3. THE RESPONSE OF THE INSTITUTE.

Our Rule is the mature fruit of the 40th General Chapter. After 20 years of thought, experimentation and evaluation as suggested by Vatican II, the Brothers have produced a text of the Rule which is the «faithful expression of the charism of Saint John Baptist de La Salle and of the tradition of his Institute».

One of its most dynamic Articles clearly reveals what the Institute of the Brothers is determined to be. It is article 11:

«John Baptist de La Salle was deeply moved by the way in which "the children of the artisans and the poor" were abandoned and left to themselves. As a practical response to his prayerful consideration of this fact in relation to God's plan of salvation, he came to discern, in faith, what God wanted the mission of the Institute to be».

To respond in this same vein, to the same needs, the Institute is determined to be the presence of the evangelizing Church in the world today.

This solemn declaration places the mission of the Brother at the very heart of the mystery of the Church, a messianic people, sacrament of salvation, born of the evangelical life of Jesus and sent by Him to the whole universe as the light of the world and the salt of the earth.

But it is also a declaration made at a specific historic moment with its own characteristics to which we have previously referred. Therefore, the Institute takes up a specific commitment which it must implement, develop and bring to a successful conclusion. How will the Institute fulfil this determined commitment and by so doing respond to the urgent call of the Pope for a New Evangelization?

The Institute responds with a bold project of a Lasallian Family.

This grand evangelizing project would gather ideas together, stir up determination, revitalize the spirit of hundreds of Religious, seculars and priests who, within the Church, look upon themselves as spiritual followers of John Baptist de La Salle. Together they can respond with courage to the 6 needs of our times which the Brothers capitulants of 1986 clearly identified and presented as strategic challenges which the Institute should face with creativity and effectiveness for the extension of the Kingdom:

- The needs of the new generations
- The calls of the new evangelization
- The permanent calls of the poor
- The renewal of the Christian school
- The development of Christian educators
- The evangelization of culture. (Circ. 422, p. 32).

Since 1986, the Institute has committed itself to the growth and consolidation of all the members and the diverse groups which form the spiritual family of De La Salle. This was ratified with the publication of the "Letter to the Lasallian Family" of Feb 2, 1989.

Such a family is aware of its specific mission in the Church and desires to be guided by the Holy Spirit along new paths toward sanctity, apostolic commitments and witness.

True Lasallians, that is, all those who «find that we have a clear, strong and common reference point for our lives in St. John Baptist de La Salle» must say "yes" consciously, actively and responsibly to the invitation of the Church and especially the Institute, to work at the Christian education aspect of that wonderful adventure which is called "new Evangelization".

In conclusion, it is important to recall that «if abstention from commitment has always been inacceptable, our times make it even more so. It is not licit for anyone to remain idle» (3). «These are not times for fears, nor for leaving to others such difficult but sublime tasks» (4)..

«TRUE COOPERATORS WITH JESUS CHRIST»

HOMILY AT THE USA – TORONTO REGIONAL CONVOCATION II

(August 13, 1990)

Almost a year ago now as Hurricane Hugo was heading up the east coast of the United States, at the novitiate in Central New York tremendous winds preceded the storm; and I remember sitting in our glass-walled chapel on that particular Friday morning looking out at the white caps on the lake and at the leaves being torn from the surrounding trees. One of the novices was unsuccessfully attempting to secure our boat which was being pulled away from the shore, and so two of us went down and out into the water to help. All three of us working together were barely able to bring the boat to shore.

As I reflected later that morning on the experience, it suggested to me the image of so many parents today caught in the stormy conditions of our present social and cultural reality – parents finding their children being pulled away – and increasingly unable to bring their sons and daughters back to shore – parents overwhelmed and children in danger of being lost – parents in need of someone willing to accompany them into the turbulence – someone willing to assist them in the Christian guidance and formation of their children.

What also struck me on that particular Friday morning in Skaneateles was that the boat wasn't doing anything wrong; the boat was only doing what a boat does in a storm; and I believe the same can be said about the young people with whom we work today. Their behavior is most often an understandable response to the tremendous social and cultural upheaval of these final days of the twentieth century.

Far too many of these young people find themselves tossed about in a society replete with a tremendous cultural diversity and an unfortunate moral ambiguity and confusion. Too many are consumed by their own materialism and pursuit of instant gratification. For many, a tremendous peer group stress, rampant substance abuse, chronic low self-esteem, and poverty of love and affection are a daily reality. Many find themselves without sufficient or appropriate role models. Unfortunately, the time and energy of so many parents, an increasing number of whom are single, is dominated by the task of meeting the material support of their families; and so once again, as in the time of our Founder, we see parents in urgent need of our support and assistance.

Within this context, I suggest we hear again today the exhortation of John Baptist de La Salle to understand ourselves as one with Jesus Christ, the Good Shepherd of the gospel, who goes in search of the lost sheep to bring it back to the fold (MTR 4.1). In the real "poverty" and "abandonment" of North American youth today, we glimpse the awesome responsibility of our mission as true cooperators with Jesus Christ for the salvation of children (MTR 4.2).

For God so loved our world that, when we were in danger of being lost, God sent the beloved son Jesus Christ to bring us home (John 3:16 and Romans 5:1-11). De La Salle believed that God so loves these children that the Holy Spirit raised up our family in the Church and sent us out among them to help bring them home (MTR 1.3). I believe that, in the deepest center of so many individual Brothers today and in the heart of our aging and much humbled Institute, this same Holy Spirit continues to cry out and pray: Father, bring me home (Galatians 4:6) – a Spirit which cries out in the abandonment and needs of young people and their parents today – cries out among the too often fatherless urban poor, whose champions we once were – cries out from among an upwardly mobile middle class youth, so often lacking affection and spiritually abandoned by parents who know of God but too often don't know God – A Holy Spirit who cries out and prays to us from the depth of their distress: Bring me home (MSF 37).

I suggest to you tonight that with the prophet Jeremiah this Institute has in recent history – as our numbers have dropped by more than half and the entrance of new candidates has slowed to a trickle – been invited with Jeremiah to the potter's shed. «And so I (Jeremiah) went down to the potter's house, and there he was working at the wheel. And whenever the vessel he was making came out wrong, as happens with the clay handled by potters, he would start afresh and work it into another vessel, as potters do» (Jeremiah 18:1-8).

Brothers, can we any longer afford to doubt that it really is God who is acting decisively in the circumstances in which we find ourselves to recall and reclaim us to a more honest and authentic living of our own unique identity in the Church? In a world where teaching religion is like teaching a foreign language, the catechetical evangelization and re-formation of poor and abandoned youth in the lived love of God is our principal ministry. And yet, how many of us here tonight really believe the words of the Declaration that this world in which we live has more need than ever, even at the center of humanity's temporal pursuits, for a witness given by people who know and love God as a living being (11.4)? How many of us here tonight are really willing to pay the price, re-establish the priority, and allow Jesus Christ to be so wholly alive in us that everything we do gives unambiguous and irrefutable witness on behalf of the gospel... that who we are becomes a clear invitation to the people with whom we work to leave behind the glamour of worldliness and enter more fully into the glory of God's children? How many of us are willing to stand here together tonight and pray: Your kingdom come... your will be done here on earth... in my life and for these children?

In a few minutes, we stand again to renew the promises of our baptism. We stand around this table of eucharistic remembrance and pray with Jesus: Father, I remain committed – not my will but yours (Matthew 26:39). We stand with John Baptist de La Salle to re-consecrate ourselves to procure God's glory – the salvation of children – as far as we're able, without counting the cost, and in the manner required of us because we have the confidence that what we do is truly God's holy work.

And so in this moment of re-commitment, I invite you to be supported and strengthened by the very real cloud of witnesses that surrounds us on every side (Hebrews 12:1) – by our beloved Founder, by our saintly brothers (especially Benilde), surrounded by the young people for whom and with whom we toil, by the parents of our students and our Lasallian colleagues, and by the humble and very human brothers and sisters who surround us tonight and with whom we have the courage to stand tonight and continue to work and struggle, impelled by that mighty energy of Christ's which is so powerful a force within us (Colossians 1:29).

A COMMUNITY

OF FAITH AND APOSTOLATE

(University of «El Bajio», Leon, Mexico)

«God loved the world so much that he gave his only Son, so that everyone who believes in him may not be lost but may have eternal life. For God sent his Son into the world not to condemn the world, but so that through him the world might be save.» (John, 3:16-17).

The beginnings of the community

Our community began in October 1988 after two pastoral sessions directed by some married people. Among them was a professional, Ing. Jaime Palacios C. At this time, the community was composed of 14 university students majoring in Hotel Management and Tourism, Computer systems and Veterinary Medicine. The group held two meetings per week with these married people in order to prepare for entrance into pastoral work. In February 1989 it gave its first retreat.

Since it is very necessary to be well prepared and to grow in the Lord, the community itself made another retreat in May of the same year. However, this time it was a «Charismatic Initiation» session: i.e., an introduction into the movement of renewal in the Holy Spirit. Thus the group became Charismatic. From then on, the community meetings became prayer meetings and in this way adopted its own style of spiritual growth.

In June, the first Charismatic retreat took place in the University, only this time it was open to the entire student body. Earlier ones had been restricted to specific groups. 30 students attended, and decided to join our community. This enlarged group began to meet at two o'clock in the afternoon, which was the most convenient time for everyone, given the diversity of class schedules.

In October, another such retreat was made available, and this time 70 more students with a variety of majors attended. They also joined our community.

At present we have 90 members, all students of the University, and even a few alumni. It is a community of young people for young people divided into 5 ministries. It is led by three general coordinators plus a coordinator for each ministry, all under the general direction and with the support of Father Alfonso Garcia, a priest of the Order of Missionaries of the Holy Spirit.

The ministries of our community

The ministries we have at present are:

PRAYER: This supports all the activities of the community through dialogue with Our Lord and Our Mother Mary. Our special focus in this area is continuous prayer for the sick.

MUSIC: Its principal purpose is to praise the Lord. This group selects the songs for Masses at the University chapel, meetings of the community and for retreats.

LITURGY: Preparation of the liturgies are designed to make known the Liturgical Year as well as to enhance the meaning of the Mass. This group assists the priest, chooses readers, presents the petitions, and arranges for the presentation of the gifts at the Offertory of the Mass.

WELCOME AND SERVICE: This group assures a cordial reception to those attending the Mass, retreat or other University activities. They prepare the site to be used and see to its cleanliness and order.

EVANGELIZATION: This ministry gives the retreats. Its principal purpose is to "evangelize the baptized"; i.e., to bring the good news that Christ is alive! He is the Savior and Lord of all who receive Him.

Each ministry holds its own meetings, usually from 1 to 3 per week. There is a general meeting of all ministries from 2-4 p.m. on Wednesdays.

Evangelization

At this point, we will try to explain how this evangelization is carried out.

In order to decide on the time for each session, the community prays in order to discern which would be the most appropriate date. With the date set, the next step is to prepare those yet unkown whom the Lord will choose to meet. This is done by inviting individuals indirectly with expressions like: «You may be seeking, but there is also One who seeks you», etc. If the person is interested, he/she is told when the next meeting will take place. All the while, the committee for the ministry of evangelization is praying to discern who will be the ones to lead the session. The choice is made by a discernment on the part of the three general coordinators and the coordinator of the ministry committee. When the decision is announced, the chosen evangelizers begin to prepare the specific theme of the Kerygma.

The Kerygma is the first news that Christ is living, that new life is growing, that it is an experience of faith, that it is really the good news and that it is the power of the Holy Spirit at work.

It is a new life because whoever has met Christ and has felt the first thrill of liberation is not only different but totally new.

It is an experience of faith because it is by faith that God manifest Himself to us in many ways.

It is really good news because the Gospel is news. It is the joyous proclamation of the salvation of each man through the death, resurrection and glorification of Christ Jesus.

It is the power of the Holy Spirit because through Him we belong to Christ. He gives witness to Christ in our hearts and enables us to proclaim Him as our Lord. It is He who enriches the community with a variety of fruits and charisms to proclaim the Gospel with power.

The object of this presentation is to try to begin, with the power of the Holy Spirit, a kingdom of justice and love in which men, as the people of God, can live here and now with that new life given to us by Jesus.

The Kerygma comprises nine themes:
1. The love of God
2. Sin
3. Jesus Saviour of the world
4. Faith and conversion
5. The kingdom of Jesus
6. Toward a new life
7. The promise of the Father to you
8. Pentecost today: the Holy Spirit, His fruits and charisms
9. Community, the body of Christ.

Each theme is developed by two evangelizers who must also give witness by their own lives to the change the Lord has wrought in them.

The retreat lasts two days, generally on a Saturday and Sunday. During the retreat there is a renewal of Baptismal promises, renunciation of esoteric practices, astrology, etc., and a public proclamation that Jesus is the Lord of our lives. Both days, the Blessed Sacrament is exposed the whole time and the Prayer Committee (ministry) maintains a continuous vigil. There are also dynamic group sessions as well as discussion periods to clarify points of doubt and uncertainty. A prayer for interior healing is offered for all who are making the retreat. It ends with the Holy Mass and the imposition of hands as a sign of the effusion of the Holy Spirit.

Our experiences

Within our community, the Lord has manifested Himself in various ways through the different gifts and charisms with which the Lord has gifted us. For example: the gift of tongues, prophesy, visions, interior healing, prayer, and in most of us, the gift of the word of the Lord through the reading of the Bible.

Once the whole community was asked to pray for a young man who had just been diagnosed for leukemia. During two general meetings, we prayed for him, that the will of God be fulfilled in his regard, but we had complete confidence that He would hear our petition that he would get well. We had all had an experience of His wonderful love and we wanted our brother to feel it also. A week later, at our general assembly, we learned that, having completed his courses of study, the young man was completely cured. Our merciful Father had heard our prayer and performed His work of love.

Plans for the future

For this semester, we plan another retreat for initiates and also one for continuous formation. These latter retreats foster growth in our knowledge of the faith as well as closer union with God. God willing, it will be on initiation to the Scriptures.

The Prayer Ministry will begin visiting hospitals and nursing homes. As a Lasallian group, we will work in the missions of Durango and Saltillo. We are remodelling a hall which has been assigned to us as a chapel. We intend to combine Lasallianization with charismatic activities through the formation of new communities in our sister schools. We consider Evangelization as the specific apostolate of Lasallianism. In all this, we have the authorization of the Institute through the Superiors of the Congregation and the District.

40 DAYS

IN TOGO

(A Missionary Summer – 1990)

It is not easy to say a few words about an exceptionally vivid experience which lasted for 40 days. Well they know who have experienced it previously, as this gratifying venture is really not that uncommon.

For the summer of 1990, the project offered to the District of Catalonia was located in TAMI, north of Togo. Some useful information for future participants would indicate that TOGO is a Republic of Western Africa, situated between BURKINA FASO (formerly Upper Volta), GHANA (formerly THE GOLD COAST), and BENIN. Geographically it is a corridor 700 km long funnelling down to a 52 km wide strip of Atlantic seacoast. Its entire width varies from 45 to 140 km. Its surface covers 57.000 km^2. Its tropical climate varies from North to South. In the North we find the sahelian plain which is the poorest and most undeveloped area. During the dry season from October to April the scarcity of water is very acute because of the lack of springs, water-holes and dams which could hold the abundant waterfall of the rainy season from May till September.

Our Rural Formation Center is in the northern region, about 35 km from the border with BURKINA FASO. It belong to the diocese of DAPAONG and since its foundation in 1973 it has been run by the Brothers of our Institute.

This Rural Formation Center is designed to accommodate 24 families, in very simple houses. Besides these, there is a residence for the native supervisor and his family, plus the residence of the Brothers. There are classroom buildings and other provisions for the storage of products and machinery. About 120 acres of land are under cultivation and at the end of the growing season (which coincides with the rainy season) all that is produced reverts to the "students" known as "stagers". This includes cotton, peanuts, corn, rice, millet and soy beans. Because of an absolute lack of water during the dry season, all cultivation is at a standstill and the "students" return to their villages. The Brothers work at digging wells wherever that is possible, with the help of the local people.

PROJECT «TAMI 1990»

The possibility of doing something in the missions during the summer is coordinated through the District, which pays for the round trip air fare. In my case, the very efficient arrangements were made by Brother Auxiliary Visitor Juan Lluis Casanonas in conjuction with PROYDE. It is the responsibility of those in charge of the Missions in the Central District to propose projects with the advice and consent of the Council of the missionary Subdistrict.

Project «Tami – 1990» consisted in the "reforestation of a sector in the Rural Center", working and living with the Community of Brothers and with the local people, particularly the 24 families who are called "stagers" at the center.

The objective was easily attained by the target date. However the most important part of this experience for me was not so much my contribution to the labor involved, which I greatly enjoyed, but especially the personal impact of my direct contact with the difficult realities with which these people must live daily. From a distance it is impossible even to imagine... with hindsight, I can honestly say that I did not go "to give" but rather "to receive".

"The missionary experience" this summer provided two basic experiences:

The first was an experience of community in the most authentic sense of the "Lasallian Family" as we conceive of it today. In fact, the members of this group (4 Brothers and 4 laymen from La Salle in Catalunya, plus a young couple – he a teacher and she a doctor – surgeon and student of medicine) joined the Community of Brothers of Tami and shared the work and the pangs of adaptation common to missionaries everywhere. We shared daily prayer, Mass, meals, meditation and relaxation... as members of a family. Elbow to elbow , we were witnesses of the total commitment of the true missionary, the surrender of self to the reality of Africa, the simple and generous effort to live the African way, the close and easy social contacts between the various missionary communities, both male and female, and the belonging to the Church of Togo – the whole diocese of Dapaong. We worshipped with the people on Sundays, in their many villages, the African way, to the rhythm of tom-tom and dance.

Every two or three days we had a meeting to review our group living and to share our personal impressions.

This experience alone would be sufficient to consider 40 days in the missions as time well spent.

Still, an even greater benefit came to me. I had the opportunity of living close to the people of this place; i.e., to the 24 families whose homes as "stagers" were all around the Brothers' residence. The three doctors in our group had an intimate experience of the life and death of these persons as well as of the sanitation problems endemic to their situation.

As a final summary of all these thought-provoking and unforgettable experiences I can testify to:

- The extreme simplicity and poverty of this people and their way of life.
- Their capacity for suffering.
- Their humble and open approach to all of us.

Even admitting that our own values sometimes do not make much sense, we were deeply shocked to see the degradation to which the women are sometimes subjected. Unfortunately they are treated as mere slaves, as simple instruments for work and reproduction, entirely subject to the whim of the men who can buy them, sell them and even mutilate them at will...

What is the role of the Center in this context? Right off we could say that it addresses the work of elevating the human person by realistic and practical means which are bearing fruit very gradually – African style.

This Center at Tami, placed in an essentially agricultural region is arouing the awareness of the farmers to new possibilities and providing them with the means to improve. Concomitsantly, the intellectual foundation is being provided through classes in which literacy is being stimulated and a higher view of humanity, both men and women, is being acquired, which will directly influence the position of women.

All this is fundamental when coupled with the witness of a Religious community whose commitment adds the dimension of the values of God's Kingdom. Here too everything is at "the rhythm of the African way".

The diocese of Dapaong is only 3% Catholic. Preaching the Gospel is not something easily done in a region which is dominated by an ancestral religion of animism and fetiches with the added complication of an aggressive moslem infiltration.

Accordingly there is only a small number of Christian "stagers" at the Center. However, everyone respects the small Christian group with its own native catechist. These people meet weekly to devoutly offer the Sacrifice of the Mass in their own language and style with the presence of the Brothers, whose prestige among them as good and devoted men, is very apparent.

The matter of language does not make the work any easier. In Togo, with a population of 2 1/2 million, there are about 50 dialects. In the North "moba" predominates. Yet, the cultural language is French which is taught in every school.

The school holds a very important place because it is considered as the essential factor in determining the future of the country, and it is also the main instrument of evangelization. Togo is a young country because 60% of the population is under 20 years of age. The Christian Brothers have an active role in the academic development of the country, especially in Togoville and Dapaong. For some time, now, a Brother is the Director of Catholic Schools in the diocese of Dapaong, as well as the coordinator and supervisor of a considerable number of teachers of rural schools. Presently, this is Brother Enrique Cepero. His predecessors were Brothers whom we knew and respected very highly: Brother Jaume Godoy at the beginning, and later, Brother Fernando Izaguirre who died recently in Zaire.

I will close with a very sincere observation which, I am sure, is shared by all those who worked at "missionary Summer – 1990": It is very worth our while to help these good people in any way that we possibly can. They need it desperately and receive it most appreciatively.

AN AGREEABLE SURPRISE

We did not expect to find an English-speaking group in TOGO who, like ourselves, had come to contribute a summer of work. They were in the same diocese of Dapaong in the mission of Boma. We had several get-togethers with them. The group was comprised of 3 Brothers of whom 2 were from Great Britain (Bros. John Deeney and Anthony Rothwell) and 1 from Malta (Bro. Mario Zammit). They were accompanied by a lay teacher and 8 Seniors from our schools in Great Britain (4 boys and 4 girls). They worked for 5 weeks at the construction of a meeting room, 2 small sleeping rooms and a kitchen for the Parish of this mission.

THE TERCENTENARY OF A FORGOTTEN EDUCATOR

CHARLES DEMIA (1/2)

1989 was the tercentenary of the death of a priest and educator, Charles Demia, who upset the peace and quiet of Lyon by publishing a fierce little book describing the plight of the children and young people of the town and suggesting solutions for this problem.

In 1966, in a Lyon library, I had an opportunity to examine the writings and biographies of this eminent and determined educator who was a contemporary of De La Salle and 14 years his senior. I myself had written about him in my book "La Salle, Patron del Magisterio". Brother Saturnino Gallego, in his two volume work on De La Salle (published by BAC), refers to Demia on 18 separate occasions. The writings of Demia, he said, "made an enormous impression all over the country" (Vol. 1, p. 112). As a result of reading him, Canon Roland of Rheims was inspired to involve himself with education to the extent of founding a Congregation of Sisters. Shortly before his death, he entrusted this Congregation to the care of De La Salle, and it is still in existence today. It was on the threshold of these Sisters' house that there took place the historic, or rather, the providential meeting which led De La Salle progressively to devote his entire life too to education. Thus there are three links in the chain: Demia, Roland and De La Salle.

In 1687 and 1688, De La Salle wrote four times to Demia, even sending him some money for some books he wanted him to buy. It is a pity than none of these letters has been found up till now, but Demia's notes refer to an exchange of letters.

Demia was born in Bourg, to the north of Lyon, in 1637. He was educated by the Jesuits in his native town with its population of 6.000. When he was 23 and had completed his law studies he entered the seminary in Lyon. A few months later, he joined the seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris. Three years later he was ordained.

For several months he preached at Blois, Tours, Poitiers and in the surrounding area.

He finally settled down in Bourg. Here he gave proof of his great apostolic zeal by teaching children catechism, helping the poor and by organising monthly talks for the local clergy.

In 1664 he was living at Laon, a town of about 70.000 inhabitants. The archbishop, Cardinal de Neuville, Primate of all the Gauls, soon realized what an exceptional person Demia was, and gave him various responsibilities, the last of which was to be "The Promoter General of the archbishopric". This entailed having personal contact with the clergy, the parishes and the work they undertook. «It was during his visits as Promoter that he was struck by the ignorance and depravity of young people, especially among the working classes. It was then that the idea of the educational apostolate came to him, and he set to work to organise it» ("Charles Demia", Rynois, Lyon 1937, p. 31).

In 1666, he wrote his famous "Remonstrances" to the town authorities, drawing their attention to the problems involved in the education and instruction of working class children.

The Larousse definition of "remontrance" is "a reproachful remark, warning, reprimand". Formerly, "Remontrances: remarks drawn up by the Parlement of Paris to draw the King's attention to the possible disadvantages of an edict".

Demia wanted to "demonstrate" the mistake the authorities were making by neglecting the education of the poor.

Gabriel Compayre, an expert in this matter, writes as follows: «reading it, you would think it was setting out the reasons for a modern piece of primary education legislation which called for the creation of schools» (Rynois, op. cit. p. 35).

Its title is quite long, especially when you realise how short the actual work is: "Remonstrances made to the Provosts of the Merchants, municipal magistrates and leading citizens of the town of Lyon with regard to the need and usefulness of Christian schools for the instruction of poor children».

What was the result of this? In spite of the author's eloquence and the soundness of his reasoning, «there was no reaction... But if the authorities did nothing, private enterprise was moved to act... The first school... opened on January 9th 1667» ("Souvenir des fêtes du troisième centenaire", Mgr. Lavallée). «Following the reading of the "Remontrances", the Gentlemen belonging to the Company (name not given) promised to give annually the sum of 200 livres to pay the salary of a schoolmaster in the St. George district» ("Vie de M. Demia", Faillon, Rusand, Lyon 1829, p. 55).

Demia returned to the charge. He wrote another paper in 1668 explaining his reasons, this time more fully and more subtly than in his first. It is this second edition, which we think is better, that we will analyse rapidly and illustrate with some extracts so that the reader can judge its merits for himself. Demia's reasoning is still relevant for a big part, even perhaps a major part, of Brazil. The edition of the "Remontran-ces" we shall be referring to is the one contained in Faillon's biography (pp. 487-504) which we have already quoted: «This text is very important and not very well known in our days. We reproduce it in full at the end of this work» (Faillon, p. 56). Unless otherwise indicated, all quotations in this article are taken from here.

Demia begins by praising the interest shown in the town by the leading citizens: «The outstanding proofs of zeal given at all times by the Provosts of the Merchants and by the municipal magistrates of the city of Lyon to make it one of the best policed in all the Kingdom, and the piety of its leading citizens, have caused some persons to draw to the attention of the Gentlemen of the Consulate and other important people living in Lyon, that the best way of crowning the splendour and magnificence of this great city is to establish Christian schools in it, where the poor of both sexes can be instructed without payment while they are still young» (p. 487).

Next the author shows the importance of such an undertaking: «There is nothing more worthy of the attention and care of the magistrates, since on it depend happiness and public tranquillity. These can be maintained only if individuals fulfil their duties to God, their country and their family. Now, it is imposible to do this if young people are not instructed at an early age... since all they bring into this world is ignorance, sin and a great inclination to evil» (p. 487).

«Is it not remarkable», says Compayre, «that a man living in the 17th century should use the grand word "country" (patrie) which was hardly used in his days, and that on the other hand, he forgets sometimes to speak of the King and of duties to the King?» (Rynois, p. 35).

The rich have the wherewithal to become educated. «But the poor... their preoccupation with staying alive makes them forget to teach them (the children) to live well. Having been brought up badly themselves, they cannot pass on a good education they have never had» (p. 488).

A little further on, he remarks with some bitterness: «This education of the children of the poor working class is totally neglected, although it is of the highest importance for the State, since they outnumber everybody else in it; and since it is as important, and even more important, to run public schools for them rather than colleges for children of well off families» (p. 489).

What are the results for young people of such negligence? «An extraordinary ignorance of God, whom they are nevertheless obliged to know, love and serve, if they wish to share in his Kingdom. But how will they know if they have no teachers to instruct them? How will the teachers instruct them is no one supports them? Who will support them, if the city authorities, the parish priests and the churchwardens in each parish do not shoulder this cost?» (p. 489).

He then rejects what must have been a standard,objection that «young people could certainly obtain this knowledge by means of sermons and parish catechism lessons» (idem).

Why does this solution not satisfy him? The zealous champion of schools then indulges in a little exaggeration: «Since some do not go to them and those that do get no benefit from them at all, either because most of the lessons given there are beyond their grasp, or because the divine seed that is sown there is often stifled by corrupt nature and bad company...» (p. 490).

Demia, it would seem, was aware that some people did not value theological arguments very highly, and so he hastens to describe the disastrous social consequences of a lack of education. The picture he paints is a truly distressing one:

«Badly brought up young people normally become indolent. The next thing that happens is that they spend their time in the streets, they gather at crossroads and indulge most often in licentious conversation. They become rebellious, free-thinkers, gamblers, blasphemers, argumentative. They become drunk, lascivious, they steal and they rob... As the most corrupt members (of the State), they will contaminate the rest of the body if the torturer's whip, the galleys of princes or the gibbets of Justice do not rid this world of these poisonous serpents...» (p. 491).

This is a picture of childhood and youth. What about adults? «It is difficult to find trustworthy servants and good workmen... you see so many layabouts and drifters in the streets. The only thing they know how to do is to eat, drink and give birth to unhappy wretches» (p. 492). This was the truly vicious circle that the school had to break.

Demia does not forget girls, whose «good education... is no less necessary for the glory of God and the public good» (idem). Then, with great pathos, he asks the following questions: «What do you think the origin is of so much disorder and jealousy in homes, of so many houses of ill-fame, of so many abandoned children in hospitals, of so much public immorality, if not the fact that too little attention has been paid to the education of girls, who have been left in ignorance? They fall into idleness, then into deceitfulness, rebelliousness, inconstancy and finally into that wretched state which is the usual reef on which a girl's virtue normally founders» (p. 493).

And so just as «the means has been found to improve the clergy and religious houses by establishing schools called seminaries and novitiates, so there is no other way to dry up the source of so many disorders except by setting up small schools to instruct the children of the poor people» (p. 493).

THE TERCENTENARY OF A FORGOTTEN EDUCATOR

And what are the fruits of these schools? Demia becomes enthusiastic when he starts describing the society of the future made up of well educated and instructed members: «By this means, factories and workshops will be gradually filled with good apprentices who will subsequently be able to become excellent master craftsmen... It will not be difficult to rid the town of houses of ill fame, since idleness and poverty, which are the two causes of prostitution among women, will be banished from it...» (p. 494).

The author speaks also of gifts that are wasted for want of cultivation. One would discover in the ranks of the poor «people who were as much, and at times more, gifted in the arts, sciences and virtue than the rest of minkind» (p. 495). «These public schools would be also like academies of perfection for the poor children. In them the fiery passions of youth would be tamed and submitted to reason, their minds enlightened by the virtues they would be taught, their memory filled with all the good things they would hear, and their wills stimulated by the examples of virtue they would see practised there» (p. 495).

This enthusiastic educator realises that some people will stray from the path that has been traced out, but he thinks they will eventually return to it. His optimism knows no bounds with regard to the results of education: «It is absolutely certain that good habits acquired in youth are only rarely lost, and that the seed sown in their minds at an early age will bear fruit sooner or later, so much so, that, if sometimes you see them straying from their duty at a certain time, they return to it much more easily at another. One can say that they have been sanctified by the yoke of the Lord that they have been made to bear since childhood» (p. 496).

Also he sees the school as a sort of job centre or professional advisory centre. The schools «would serve also, if you like, as skill centres. Well-off people could go there and sign on someone to work in their house, or somebody else to work in their shop. Some even could be helped to continue their studies. Thus one could send out these little workers, made perfect in this academy of virtue, into the Lord's vineyard (Matt. 20), and employ them, each according to his talents and ability» (p. 495).

In his enthusiasm to prove his point, Demia advances overwhelming arguments in favour of establishing free schools for poor children, and he paints a marvellous picture of the city in which the inhabitants have been properly educated. Having let himself go for a while, Demia adds other arguments based on authority to support his point of view: «Holy Scripture and the Fathers of the Church are full of passages which confirm the need for a good education. It is enough to indicate here a few instances as in Job chap. 2, Jeremiah chap. 3, the whole of Ecclesiastes. St. Chrysostom wrote a treatise on the subject. St. Jerome wrote the epistle "Ad Letam...". The great Gerson, although chancellor of the first university in the world, had such great esteem for these small schools that he was not ashamed to be involved with them» (p. 497).

He draws attention to the recommendations of the Council of Trent, and invokes the decrees of Sovereign Pontiffs (Alexander III) and royal statutes.

Whose responsibility is it to establish these schools? It belongs to the parishes and the holders of authority, «commonly called the fathers of the people. Certainly, by establishing these schools, they would have an extra claim to this title, and would be so in a more excellent way than their natural fathers, since these latter, having given them their being, have left them only misery and vice as their inheritance in a life that often ends in everlasting death. The former, however, make up for what is lacking in means and ability on the part of the others, by providing them with instruction which procures for them a second life which is much more precious than the first, and whose conclusion can only be very happy» (p. 500).

That is why «the alms of a good education would be more profitable and worthwhile than any other» (p. 501).

With a great deal of tact, he wants to harness the good will of the «magistrates (who) worked so successfully to bring prosperity to the citizens of Lyon, making it one of the most important cities by its trade, one of the most harmonious by its building, one of the best policed by its regulations. Their vigilance extended even to the condition of the streets and the mud at crossroads. There is good reason to hope that they will not let such a favourable opportunity pass by to make their name famous for posterity, but will work for the spiritual good of this city through the good education of poor children» (p. 502).

Finally, and the tract ends in this way: «It is to be hoped also that His Lordship the Archbishop, whose zeal for the salvation of his flock is matched only by his solicitude for the good of this city... will not let this occasion pass by to give paternal signs of his piety and zeal to so many poor children who implore him by means of this crude piece of writing; and signs also of his authority in support of this work which is so important for the glory of God, the good of the State, the benefit of the individual, the advantage of the city. Having become endowed, by means of this establishment, with the crowning mark of beauty, which was seemingly the only thing lacking to make it perfect, it will be able to serve as a perfect model for the other cities of the Kingdom» (p. 504).

What repercussions followed this new offensive? «The magistrates, taking note of these remonstrances, met together on December 30th 1670, and decided to pay the sum of 200 livres each year out of public funds, to be used to establish a public school where children would be taught the principles of the Christian religion and even reading and writing» (Faillon, p. 61). The ending of this paragraph is strange, because Demia never separated secular studies and religion in the schools.

Beginnings were difficult, like the departure of a sailing boat. Once clear of the port, however, the sails fill with wind from the open sea. Demia founded 16 schoos in Lyon, and others in the surrounding area and towns: at Bourg, Saint Etienne, Villefranche, Saint Chamond...

let us now look at how the day was organised in Demia's schools (Cf. "Reglements"):

In the morning, there was class from 7.30 to 11. Prayer, catechism, lunch, reading, writing. On Mondays: arithmetic. On Tuesdays: politeness. On Saturdays: spelling.

In the afternoon, class started at 1.30 (2 in summer) and went on till 4. Same programme as in the morning.

From time to time, "debates" were organised, covering the parts of the programme that had been explained in each subject. This exercise obliged the pupils to assimilate what they were taught.

The teaching was free (the teachers were not allowed to accept either money or presents from the parents) and compulsory. Demia seems to have been the first person ever to acknowledge the State's responsibility in this matter.

He recommended methods that appealed to the imagination like, for example, teaching reading by using little cubes of wood (like dice) with letters or syllables written on them.

With regard to spelling, he suggested a form of simplification which is still being called for in France today: the elimination of letters without any phonetic value (for example, the "p" in "bapteme"), the suppression of useless or double consonants ("afaire" instead of "affaire", "aporter" instead of "apporter"), the replacement of "y" by "i" ("moien", "emploier").

One thing he insisted upon was perhaps revolutionary for his day: all pupils had to have a medical examination: «No child will be accepted without having been previously examined by a doctor or surgeon to make sure he is not suffering from a contagious disease» (Rynois, p. 45).

The training of teachers was also one of his basic concerns: «His responsibility as Director General gave him the right to inspect all schools... He found that most of the teachers (men and women) were ignorant not only of the methods of reading and writing properly, but also of the principles of religion. There were heretics among them, ungodly people, and some who had exercised vile professions» (Faillon, p. 81). Would this be the reason why «Mr. Demia did not want his schools to be run by lay people»? (idem p. 80). He trained his teachers in the community or seminary of St. Charles.

He founded a congregation of teaching Sisters, the «Sisters of St. Charles» who «are still an important and flourishing congregation to this day» (Rynois, p. 53), with a number of houses in particular in Brazil (Petropolis, Parana and S. Catarina). They have inherited the enterprising spirit and zeal of this great and dynamic apostle of popular schools in the second half of the 17th century, Fr. Charles Demia.

He died in Lyon on October 23rd 1689, at the age of 53. «The great city organised a magnificent funeral for him. The 1.600 pupils of the schools he had founded were there, with their schoolmasters and mistresses, heading a triumphal procession made up of an immense crowd and of the leading citizens» (Rynois, p. 32).

THE HEROIC VOW

or

The daring of a man of faith and obedience

When John Baptist de La Salle suggested to two of his Brothers to join him in an irrevocable commitment «to bring about with all their ability and efforts the establishment of the Society of the Christian Schools», he was, according to Blain, in a state of great perplexity.

The word "perplexity", which is used again a few pages later in connection with M. Baudrand's refusal to authorise the opening of a novitiate at Vaugirard, is at the same time strange and revealing. Blain does not use the word confusion or despondency, much less discouragement. One has the impression of almost hearing the words of the Most Holy Virgin Mary saying to the Angel: «How will this come about?» In fact De La Salle had received a mission «to establish the Society of the Christian Schools», and everything seemed to be collapsing.

Through obedience John Baptist discovers his mission

He was not yet 40 years old and for 12 years now his life had taken a direction which was quite different from what he had imagined. And it was not his doing. When he looked back on his life (Mary comes to mind again: «she pondered all this in her heart») as he did in his «Memoir on the Beginnings»: «I would never have thought of it before. It was not as if anyone had ever suggested the idea to me»; or at the end of his life in his last words: «I adore in all things the conduct of God in my regard», he was aware that it was God who had called him to establish this work. This was so much so that, when he speaks to the Lord of it, it is in terms of OPUS TUUM.

There had been in fact a whole series of unforeseen events:

1678: The death of M. Rolland and the responsibility he received from him to take care of the Sisters of the Child Jesus.

1679: The meeting with Adrien Nyel on the doorstep of the Sisters' house, and the opening of the first school.

1680: The care that he is led to take of the schoolmasters.

1681: Taking them into his own house so as to be able to follow them more closely.

1682: The move together to a house in the Rue Neuve, and the beginning of a community. They call themselves Brothers.

1683: He gives up his canonry "which leaves him".

1684: He distributes his goods to the poor after the intervention of the Brothers.

1685: The replacement of a Brother in class. By this date he has already buried at least two Brothers.

He did all this after much discernment and prayer, and consultation with spiritual counsellors and directors. He never made decisions casually.

He was convinced, therefore, that this was God's will. In Meditation 57, second point, he has the following to say: «Compare what you do purely through obedience and what you do through your own impulse, and look upon the former as the work of God...»

Is this failure?

In the early days, in Rheims, Rethel, Laon, Guise and Paris, everything went well though not without difficulties.

And then «the seminary for country schoolmasters which he had begun with such great success... disappears... The seminary for the young Brothers he had called to himself in Paris» also disappears. Of the sixteen Brothers he had left in Rheims and the surrounding region, eight had gone. «An additional source of sorrow was that for four whole years only one subject joined». What is more, Brother Henri L'Heureux had died, he himself had been seriously ill. What was happening?

In faith John Baptist reflects on his obedience

And so, what was happening? He was in the same situation as he had been when he started, or almost.

Had he not done all that was necessary? And yet, he was aware that he had done all that he could or had to. What was there still to be done? «More?» as Vincent de Paul had said before him.

He does not want failure, if failure it is, to be put down to his deficiency, negligence or his weakness.

Not that he is afraid of failure in itself, if this is God's will. But he believes the work is willed by God, and so he must do everything in his spower to ensure that the work succeeds.

He takes stock:
- some Brothers have left
- some Brothers are ill or tired
- some Brothers are weakening spiritually
- there are no more candidates

So these are the areas he will tackle with the means at his disposal.

There has to be a commitment: even if only three of us remain. Some means has to be found to enable the Brothers to rest and to nourish them spiritually.

A novitiate has to be set up.

These are the areas in which he can do something.

The rest:
Brothers leaving the death of Brother Henri L'Heureux the opposition he encounters his health problems

It all depends on God.

And so, this is what he undertakes to do and this is the enterprise in which he associates the two Brothers. It is a challenge thrown down to the Lord, if one can speaks in such terms.

A creative obedience: «Domine, Opus tuum».

At this point we can take up the 3rd point of Meditation 77: «Despite the irregularity of a community, God always has some faithful servants who maintain its true spirit. The Lord reserves to himself some men, as he told Elias, whose «knees have never bowed to Baal», that is to say, men who are on their guard against the spirit of the world and who observe their Rule and the practices of community as far as they can. They keep the fear of the Lord, and prevent God from destroying the community, as he destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah... It is to these that Jesus Christ (says) that they must avoid the company of the others in order not to share in their irregularity, and in order not to be affected by the contagion of their bad example. They must raise their mind to God in mental prayer. Pray that God may always preserve his spirit in your community, and often repeat with David: «Do not banish me from thy presence; do not take thy holy spirit from me».

This cry is full of pathos and reveals a critical situation. When did he express himself in this way? Was it at that point? And if not, what was it in connection with, or was it simply inspired by the Gospel for the 24th Sunday?

This is not the impression given by the decisions he takes. They are all very positive: they do not hark back to the past but look forward to the future. The task ahead is to ensure that this Society is established and firmly established, because «the need for it in the Church is very great».

A fortunate crisis, when all is said and done, even if all the circumstances are not completely clear. It shows us a man of God, sure of the mission entrusted to him, and who seeks by all the means he can to respond to it effectively.

A good lesson for all of us today, who tend so much, if one can say so, to fall into despair. On this third centenary of the Heroic Vow, what remains for us is one single conviction, a conviction that was re–affirmed by the last General Chapter: «God does not abandon "his work", but "it pleases him to make it bear fruit day by day"» (Rule 141).

SAINT DE LA SALLE – PATRON OF TEACHERS

When, in 1950, Pope Pius XII responded to the suggestion that teachers all over the world should have their own patron saint, one whose life and example would inspire them in their daily work among children and young people, he offered them one of the great pioneers of education, a Frenchman, Saint John Baptist de La Salle.

At the time when only privileged children, whose parents could afford to pay fees, went to school, he made it possible for boys, whose parents were struggling poor, to receive basic instruction in schools where reading, writing and arithmetic were taught, and a good Christian education provided. But, much more than this, he saw how necessary it was to have competent teachers, and spent his life providing them. In doing so, he became the father of teacher training and the founder of a teaching Order, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, now generally called De La Salle Brothers. He was not an academic theorist, but a practical organiser.

His gentleness and sensitivity came from the refined upbringing he enjoyed in the cosy atmosphere of a loving family, sufficiently well-off to be insulated from the hardships of the seventeenth century, and intensely Christian in its understanding of life. His father was a magistrate of the Presidial Court of Rheims; his mother, as can be imagined, loving and busy, with seven children to care for; she was of the Moet family, a name that evokes vineyards and champagne. They lived near Rheims Cathedral in a mansion called "La Cloche", which happily has survivied the bombings of wars.

He had the privilege of a good education during his eight years at the "College Des Bons Enfants", which might be translated "School for young Gentlemen", a short walking-distance from home. A few months before he left school, not yet sixteen, he was made a Canon of the Rheims Cathedral Chapter, with a healthy benefice to cover his training for the priesthood.

Many might be surprised to hear De La Salle called the father of teacher-training. Before his day, and even stretching back to medieval times, the idea of preparing teachers for their work had been considered. But these were simply armchair considerations, and, of course, with classical pupils in mind, not children of working-class parents. No one had given a real thought to training teachers for Charity Schools.

De La Salle saw clearly that the children who came to Charity Schools simply had to have good teachers or the whole purpose of these schools would lose its meaning. In his practical way, he started with the schoolmasters in Rheims. They were as raw as could be imagined. Blain, a writer, and friend of De La Salle, describes some of then as "illiterate men, without education, without ability to express themselves, without manners, incapable of conversing agreeably..." De La Salle rented a house for them and gave them meals in his own home. He draw up a daily timetable for them, with morning and night prayer said together. He helped them to educate themselves, gave them much of his time, joined them for meals, and encouraged them in their work. They were laymen, family men, interested in making a career out of teaching. After one year De La Salle brought a house for them and moved in himself. There he trained them to teach young children. It was a residential teaching centre. They emerged as trained teachers, prepared and able to face a class of boys, and handle them effectively.

Some of them resolved to make education in schools for the poor, not only their life's work, but their life's mission, and to set about it, not as individuals, but as a group, as a Community of Brothers, with vows and a distinctive dress. From this Community a world-wide Religious Order of teaching Brothers developed. Others sought employment on their own. Of these, De La Salle wrote: "they remain one or two years until they are taught singing, reading and writing thoroughly. They have full board and lodging and laundry. They are then placed in a village school for a period of probation, and, once they are employed they have no further connection with the community apart from friendly contact. They do not wear any special dress and so are not distinguished from other people...".

Word soon spread that De La Salle had set up a centre where men were being trained as teachers for Charity Schools, and that a Community of Teaching Brothers was available to staff them. What was interesting, was the growing idea of teachers being trained together under the guidance of a responsible person, and the concept of a number of schools having a reserve of schoolmasters to serve them. Almost certainly, they were the first group of lay people ever to be specifically trained to teach. The venture is an important landmark in the history of education, and this establishment can well claim to be the world's first teacher training institution. There were two others founded by De La Salle, some years later, both in Paris, one in the parish of St Hippolyte in 1699, the other at St Denis in 1709. Both had schools attached where the students in training could do their teaching practice under supervision. There they learned from experienced Brothers how to manage a class, the value of quiet in the classroom, how to ensure it gently, how to teach the basic subjects, how to maintain discipline and yet maintain a happy classroom atmosphere, how to teach the boys their religion and encourage them to pray, how to encourage them to be well-mannered and polite. These teaching-tips were eventually put together and published in the "Conduite des Ecoles", or School Management.

"La Conduite des Ecoles" is, and will always be, one of the great educational classics of all time. Its place among them is assured, not only by the practical topics it discusses, but because it appeared so early, in 1705, when the Charity School movement was just beginning to win sympathy and attract benefactors. The title is not easily translated into English. It is to do with running schools for boys of junior age, roughly 6 to 11, but it is not so much to do with the administrative running of schools as with practical matters of the classroom. The author is De La Salle himself. But he would be the first to admit that the content was gleaned from the thoughts of other writers and particularly from his own Brothers' experience. He wrote it, not for the general public, but for his hard-working Brothers. He was thoroughly acquainted with actual classroom conditions and the problems of teaching lively boys of varying ability, and inability. He offered practical answers to practical problems at a time when contemporary writers expounded their theories in general terms. This is what makes the book a classic.

De La Salle devoted his life to educating boys from the poorer families of France, and was personally responsible for founding around thirty schools for them up and down the country. This is an impressive record on its own. Yet, though the general demand, at the time, was for basic instruction in reading, writing, arithmetic and catechism, he went further, when the need arose. In Calais and Boulogne he set up maritime schools where seamanship was taught. In Paris, at the request of King James II of England, he started a school for the sons of Irish soldiers and friends who had followed him into exile. In Rouen, he founded a boarding school, St Yon, for the sons of the rising middle class, whose future careers were likely to be in commerce and industriy, and who therefore needed a practical form of education which the classical schools could not provide. Besides the basic subjects, the school taught geometry and architecture and draughtmanship. Later a more comprehensive curriculum evolved. In 1867, the Goverment Report to the Corps Legislatif referred to St Yon: "It is to De La Salle that France owes, if not the original idea, at least the first working establishment and a prototype of secondary technical instruction. From the first attempt there emerged a teaching which, if it had been generalised, would have advanced by a whole century, the organisation of specialised education".

School discipline at St Yon was excellent, so much so, that parents sought to solve their family problems by sending their difficult sons to board there. De La Salle met the challenge with extra supervision, even arranging for these boys to have their meals with the Community. His success impressed Camus de Pontcarre from the Municiplaity who pursuaded De La Salle to do something for delinquents. The outcome was a centre where youths, who were bound over by the magistrates, were boarded, and schooled in the basic subjects, and given a practical course in horticulture and farming.

The name De La Salle is symbolic of all that is enterprising, practical and caring in Christian education. His fame is timeless and international, his dedication and humility universally acclaimed. A teacher, a trainer of teachers, founder of a Religious Order of teachers, and now the Universal Patron Saint of Teachers.

DE LA SALLE'S SENSE OF HUMOR

What is a Sense of Humor?

«the mental faculty of discovering, expressing, or appreciating ludicrous or absurdly incongruous elements in ideas, situations, happenings, or acts.» Webster's

«the sense within us which sets up a kindly contemplation of the incongruities of life and the expression of that sense in speech, literature, or art forms of various kinds.» Arbuckle, Strategies for Growth in Religious Life

«Irony: humor, ridicule, or light sarcsm that adopts a mode of speech the intended implication of which is the opposite of the literal sense of the words (as when expressions of praise are used where blame is meant).» Webster's Humor is kind, gentle; irony is a form of humor; sarcasm also focuses on the incongruous, but it is harsh and often crude and contemptuous. See Random House Dictionary.

The hearty laugher is not always humorous, gigglers and snorters are more authentically humorous.

Some Incidents of De La Salle's Sense of Humor:

1. He played a joke on Reims when he took Nyel home with him. Nyel was planning to organize a school for poor boys which those in power would oppose. De La Salle made it appear that Nyel was only another priest staying with him. They could have chuckled, but it wasn't necessary for the humor of the situation.

2. De La Salle accepted Barré's pun, «If you found the schools (i.e., endow them), they will founder.» (les écoles fondées seraient fondues) To rely entirely on Providence is a joke.

3. It took a sense of humor (laughing at himself) for De La Salle to accept seriously the remark of the early Brothers that he could speak eloquently about Providence when he had so much guaranteed security in his wealth.

4. In 1712, when his trip to Rome was canceled at the request of the bishop of Marseilles, «he rejoined the Brothers, to whom he said, "God be blessed. Here I am back from Rome."» (CL8:94)

5. When he was retired at St. Yon De La Salle was not always treated respectfully by one of his oldest disciples. Blain recounts that on one occasion this Brother told him that he was being fed and lodged at St. Yon out of charity as a penniless priest who was no longer good for anything. «On hearing this "compliment" the Servant of God could not help laughing (ne put s'empecher de rire de ce compliment).»» (CL 8:166; Arnandez BK 3, 194)

Examples of Irony in De La Salle's Letters:'

12:17 (Hubert): «So you are ready to let the Brothers lose their vocations because you are not courageous enough to reprimand them, and you let Brother Quentin do as he pleases. Through your easygoing attitude you will bring him to the state where he will leave.»

18:5 (Drolin) «You say that you do not like being in debt. It would be nice to know if you are in debt, and how much you owe, to whom and why. That's just what you don't tell me.»

23:8 (Drolin) «Do you think I would let you starve?»

38:6 (Robert) «It seems to me that you want nothing to be lacking that will give you pleasure. Well, who wouldn't be poor under those conditions? ... Please remember that you did not join the Institute to enjoy every comfort and satisfaction, but to embrace poverty and its consequences. I say its consequences, because there is no point in loving virtue unless you love all that comes with it and gives you the means of practicing it.»

81:4 (Anonymous) «Now I see quite clearly what you want, my very dear Brother. You very much want to profess that you are a great lover of humility and that you have a great esteem for it, just as long as you can avoid humiliations as much as possible. What good will it be for you to love the virtue and refuse to practice it?»

85:5 (Anonymous) «You complain that others haven't enough charity, but you don't complain that you haven't enough humility. What good is that great desire you have for this virtue if it does not help you be more aware that you are culpable before God?»

85:6 (Anonymous) «You will tell me, perhaps, that you very much want to observe (silence), but that the situation in which you continually find yourself of having to answer those who ask you questions does not allow you to do so. What a trifling excuse! Don't you know the occasions when you should reply and those when you should remain silent?»

105:11 (Woman religious) «You commit plenty of serious faults which you will have to account for, without putting a wrong interpretation on what others do... You want others to be reprimanded for their faults, but do not wish to be reprimanded for your own... You can see the splinter in your brother's eye, but cannot see the beam in your own.»

107:7 (Woman religious) «A fine sort of religious perfection that would be, to be ready to do only what pleases you!»

120:3 (His nephew) «I am surprised you have not arranged that the chalice and the surplice be restored to you with appropriate ceremony by some officer of the court, as if recognizing in him as much right to restore to you your priestly faculties as your bishop had in bestowing them in the first place.»

126:4 (Bartholomew) «I do not think I have seen, at least for a good many years, a novitiate like this in the Community, and yet with such a situation you hope to establish new foundations!»

129 (Bartholomew) «...I did not vow obedience to do what I like...»

132 (Director of Calais) (Perhaps unintended, but pointed out by Brother Felix Paul.) De La Salle quotes St. Augustine (Rome has spoken, the case is closed) against Quesnel and the Jansenists whose primary book was Augustinus.

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE FOUNDER (1/5)

OVERALL VIEW

Gamboust's plan of Paris drawn 1649-52, includes a panoramic view of the city as might be viewed from the hill of Montmartre, then well outside the capital. Paris looks so small that Robert Mousnier calls it «an urban blob in a sea of corn.» (Paris au XVIIè siècle: Cours de Sorbonne). It still had largely the aspect of a medieval town crowded within its walls, with the spires and steeples of its many churches and monasteries marking its skyline.

The city walls

Philip Augustus from 1190 to 1210 had built a defensive wall around the little commercial town on the north bank and around the smaller university area on the south bank. Charles V had later built a new perimeter wall or dyke further our to protect new suburbs to the north, and Louis XIII had added defensive walls west and east of this, ending at the river; so that Paris north of the river had in La Salle's day the shape of a semi-circle extending from the present Place de la Concorde to the royal arsenal south of the Bastille: about two miles and a half. South of the river, i. e. on the left bank, the walls of Philip Augustus still enclosed only the Latin Quarter in an arc running only from south of the Louvre to the present Panthéon and then back to the river at the eastern end of the present Boulevard Saint-Germain.

The main arteries

Two north-south arteries, Rue Saint-Denis and Rue Saint-Martin, ended at the river, the one at the Châtelet (then a policing centre and a prison) the other by the Town Hall (today much enlarged) and the Place de Grève (now the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville). Each was continued by streets across the Île de la Cité to link up, the one with the Rue de la Harpe, now straightened and widened as the Boulevard Saint-Michel, the other with the Rue Saint-Jacques, the main thoroughfare of the Latin Quarter.

The main east-to-west artery was made up of the Rue Saint-Antoine, running from the Bastille to join up through the streets of central Paris with the Rue Saint-Honoré.

Suburbs and districts

On the south bank, west of the University area, a market-town had long since grown up around the great abbey of St Germain-des-Prés; it was by now a suburb of the capital. To south and southeast were the growing suburbs of Saint-Jacques, Saint-Marcel and Saint-Victor, while east of the Bastille lay the faubourg or suburb of St Antoine.

For city and suburbs there were thirty-four parishes – forty-two by the end of the reign. Twelve were tiny medieval ones on the central island, while some of the newer ones covered twenty times their territory. Saint Sulpice, for instance, was the only parish in the suburb of Saint-Germain.

The capital was also divided into sixteen administrative and policing districts or quarters, augmented to twenty in 1702. Traditionally Paris proper was divided into the "Ville" or Town, meaning the commercial area north of the river; the "Cité" on the main island in the river where royal administration and ecclesiastical power were concentrated; and south of it, the "University".

Dwellings

All three sections of the city had their characteristics, but all had many churches, some magnificent; religious houses with their vast domains acquired long before the town developed, charitable institutions and taverns. Squeezed among these properties and the great private residences of the nobility, were the constricted houses of merchants, craftsmen and wage-earning dependent artisans. These would live in the same building, the poorest at the top (as in the house known as Gladstone's Land in Edinburgh) Pierre Petit, in his introductory note to Gamboust's plan, writes: «There are plenty of houses of five or six stories all of them full to the roof with various families and professions, who are nothing more than barbarians, and who do not even know one another's names, just as they don't know, from one place to another and from suburb to town, anything unusual that happens; and you are just as unknown and hidden when changing quarter as if you changed province.» (Most houses, it seems, however, did not go beyond three or four stories.)

Amidst its squalor and teeming streets, Paris had seen new royal buildings and many palaces of the nobility arise earlier in the century; they were still gleaming white when La Salle first went there in 1670. John Evelyn, who visited Paris in 1642 and 1650, moving among the aristocracy, was full of admiration for the noble buldings he was shown: Paris was «one of the most gallant Cittyes in the world.» From 1661 to 1715 Paris was further embellished, mainly to glorify the king while new palaces were built by the rich in more spacious properties in the suburbs; but its inner core changed little.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE THREE DIVISIONS OF PARIS.

1. The "Town"

The central area of the "Ville", beginning from the Châtelet, was one of narrow, stinking streets of fishmongers, fruiterers, craftsmen and traders, of abbatoirs and shops of butchers who were rich and lived in good, clean well-furnished houses. In this area, opposite Notre Dame was the Place de Grève, so called because it gave on to a little strand along the river. It was the square where executions took place, and also where men without jobs congregated, hoping to be hired, even for the day or by the hour. They were said to "faire la Grève"; in time, "faire la grève", has come to mean to be idle through strike action. On the north side of the square is Place de l'Hôtel de Ville. The main food market of the capital was north of the intersection of the Rue Saint-Denis and the Rue Saint-Honoré. Here Philip Augustus had put up two great plain buildings – inmmediately called "halles" by the Parisians – as a great covered market that increased with the years, and has now been replaced by the great underground shopping complex known as the Forum des Halles.

Here was the famous "Cour des Miracles" or thieves' underworld described by Victor Hugo in "Notre-Dame de Paris" (1831). D'Argenson is said to have cleaned it up, but it was described in the eighteenth century as a great open square with a very long cul-de-sac, stinking, muddy and winding. But there were other places in Paris where the police patrols would hesitate to go.

Further northward along the Rue Saint-Denis was the better area, where cloths and silks were sold and exported, and confectionery and food obtained. Westward along the Rue Saint-Honoré were the rich haberdashers and sellers of works of art and of the finest furniture. For just beyond them, north of and around the Louvre, ministers, beginning with Richelieu, had built their palaces, followed by the many of the lords in the royal service.

The Louvre (the meaning of the term is unkown) began as a royal keep and developed into a royal residence. In La Salle's day it comprised the palace of the Louvre with a wing beginning to extend westwards towards the Palace of the Tuileries, then forming a huge facade facing the present gardens. This had been built for Catherine de Medici between 1564 and 1608 on the site of a twelfth century tile-factory, whence its name. That palace no longer exists, having been burnt down in 1871. Louis XIV moved to the palace of St Germain-en-Laye, 23 km northeast of Paris, in 1660, after the death of his mother, Anne of Austria, and finally left Paris for good to go to Versailles in 1682.

Northwest of the Louvre, on the Rue Saint-Honoré, Richelieu began in 1629 his spelendid cardinal's palace; at his death in 1642 he bequeathed it to his sovereign; Louis XIV and Anne of Austria took it over in 1643, so that it has since been known as the Palais Royal, although its present sweep of galleries and gardens came later.

At the opposite end of the "Ville", the arsenal along the river and the Bastille north of it (then a defence point comprising eight towers surrounded by a moat), marked the military area. Not far from this Henry IV provided Paris with its first public square, the Place Royale, now called Place des Vosges. It became in the first half of the century the centre of an extraordinary development of great town houses of courtiers and statesmen, their limestone fronts gleaming among the houses of the lesser bourgeoisie and the artisans. This was the origin of the very upper-class triangle known still as the Marais, «which had its greatest hours in the XVIIth and XVIIIth centuries, with the driving of coaches, the clash of swords, the hum of "salons" frequented by all the personalities owning famous literary or political names.» (Guide Bleu: Paris, p. 363) Here Madame de Sevigné wrote charmingly about the dukes and nobility of the area. The Duchess of Guise had a palace here, now part of the Archives Nationales. So did court nobles, but they began to move away with Louis XIV. In La Salle's day, the area was inhabited by the noblesse de robe and the great financiers. Nevertheless, a cross-section of the population lived in the Marais. On the eastern side of this area, in the Rue des Minimes, two streets north of the Place des Vosges, was the well-known Minims' Friary with its great church, now gone. Here Nicholas Barré spent most of his life. A gendarmerie now occupies the site. When he was called back from Rouen in 1675, he opened a school for poor girls in the crowded quartier east of the Place de Grève, and in 1678 set up a training centre for his Brothers in the Rue de la Mortellerie, now Rue de l'Hôtel de Ville, not far from the interesting old church of Saint Gervais.

The "City"

At the eastern end of the island known as the Cité, stood the cathedral of Notre--Dame, dating in its present form from the twelfth century onwards, and south of it Archbishop's house. South of the little cathedral square, along the waterfront, was the Hôtel-Dieu or hospital, extending over the bridge (Pont au Double) in a set of wards two-storey high, and then along the other bank of this little southern arm of the Seine. (The present Hôtel-Dieu, on the other side of the cathedral square, dates from 1877.) The middle of the island was a criss-cross of medieval streets; then westwards came the old royal palace, for long the Palace of Justice, an area enclosing a great number of buildings housing the various royal departments of justice and finance, including the Parlement of Paris with its six courts or chambers. In their halls and galleries moved crowds of magistrates, lawyers and other members of the legal fraternity and their clients. The western end of the island was occupied by the triangular Place Dauphine, created in 1607 in honour of the Dauphin, later Louis XIII. Across the tip of the island the Pont Neuf linked both banks of the Seine, and was the only one of the seven bridges of the Cité not to have houses several storeys high built on it. Both it and the Place Dauphine were built on two little islets made in 1601 into one fine triangular area. (On these two islands «used to be found the turbulent Irish students, both martyrs and rogues.» Guide bleu, Paris, p. 203.)

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE FOUNDER (2/5)

3. The "University"

The Université or Latin Quarter was still, at the beginning of Louis's reign, within Philip Augustus's crumbling walls. It had virtually the same aspect as in the fourteenth century, a packed area with its sixty colleges («but they in nothing approach ours in Oxford for state and order», writes John Evelyn), abbeys and churches, many of outstanding size and architecture, set in narrow streets. Richelieu's rebuilt Sorbonne chapel was resplendent in its limestone and huge dome. Apart from the necessary tradesmsen and craftsmen, a few private houses and the printing houses and bookshops along the Rue Saint-Jacques, the area was given over to studies. The Latin Quarter today, although still tightly built on, has little to remind us of how the Founder saw it. To reach the Sorbonne from the seminary of Saint Sulpice when he was a student there, he would have entered the Latin Quarter through St Michael's Gate (Porte Saint-Michel) in the walls, at a point on the present Boulevard Saint-Michel some way south of the Rue de Cujas. Of the buildings he knew then, the Revolution destroyed some and disaffected others that became the prey of demolishers and road-wideners throughout the 19th century and who have left practically nothing of the religious, architectural and artistic treasures of the area. The Jacobin, i.e. Dominican house where St Thomas wrote for some years, has gone as well as Franciscan, Carmelite, Augustinian and Bernardine houses. A lycée stands on the site of St Genevieve's abbey, rebuilt in 12th century, although its tower remains. The massive Pathéon – as it later became – was built on the orders of Louis XV as a more fitting church of St Genevieve, patron of Paris, in the abbey garden, and was unknown to La Salle. But the beautiful chuch nearby of St Etienne du Mont, so rich in history, is practically as he knew it, for it was rebuilt in the 16th century and consecrated in 1626. Several colleges have disappeared as well as eight churches. St Victor's abbey, outside the walls on the east side, where Abelard, St Bernard and St Thomas of Canterbury studied, was levelled in 1811.

There were about 30,000 students in the University which formed a religious guild of masters and students; its rector had the same rank as princes of the blood and took precedence over bishops, for the University depended only on the Pope. The Jesuits, on the Rue Saint Jacques behind the Sorbonne, excelled by their courses which drew sons of the aristocracy and even of royal blood, and attracted students away from other colleges; theirs numbered 3000. The king attended the inauguration of new extensions and allowed the name of the college to be changed from College de Clermont to College Louis-le-Grand. It was the richest college of all but never formed part of the University. The Jesuits proclaimed that «the College of Louis-le-Grand is full of boarders of the first quality, who leave only to take up the first dignities in the state, the Church, the nobility and the magistracy.» To give them the required boldness and assurance for public speaking they trained them to act in plays and ballets. Their prize-giving ceremonies were spectacular. Their success created jealousy and imitation by the other colleges.

Life in the Latin Quarter was now fairly quiet, thanks to the firm hand of the lieutenant general of police, but there were fights between colleges and the rare duel. Gates were supposed to be closed by nine o'clock, and students were not to go out without a supervisor, but day students felt free enough of regulations to frequent the many taverns around the Rue de la Harpe.

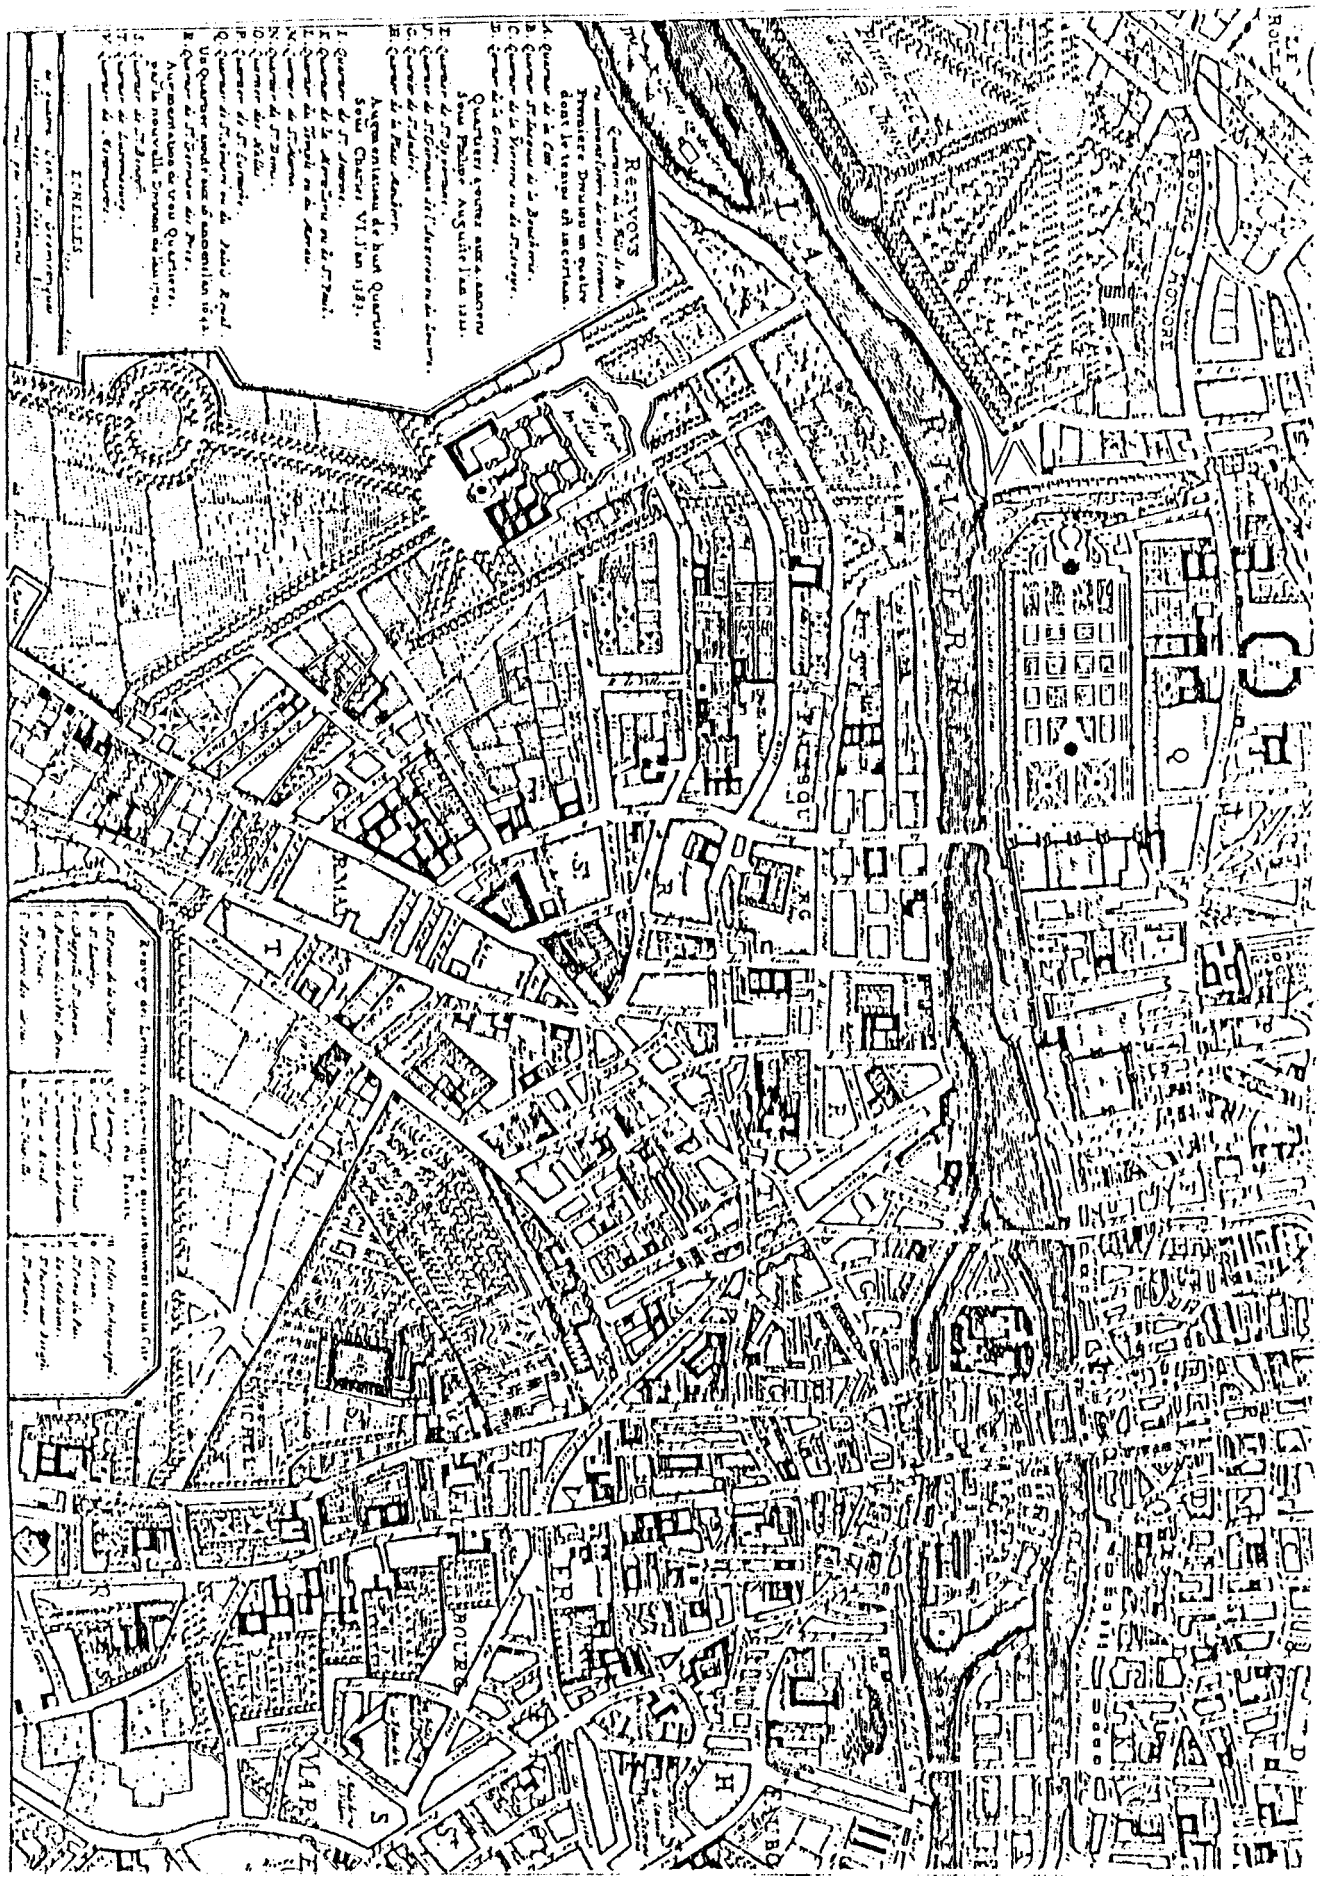
Saint Germain

The oldest by far and the most important of these was that of Saint Germain, and which interests us specially because its sole parish church was that of Saint Sulpice.

The Abbey

When La Salle and two Brothers settled in the Rue Princesse, close to the church, they were only three minutes' walk away from the great monastery of Saint Germain, of which only the great church and some abbey buildings remain. It was founded in the 6th century in open country outside Paris by Childebert, son of Clovis, king of the Franks, and became the burial place of the early Merovingian kings, which explains why it was donated with widespread gifts of land. It was destroyed by the Normans in 886 and was rebuilt throughout the Middle Ages to become one of the finest Benedictine abbeys.



It declined during the Wars of Religion, but after the council of Trent it reformed and became the centre of the new Benedictine congregation of St Maur and became the home of many scholars whose names are commemorated in streets of this quarter. Even some of the roads leading out of it have a Benedictine origin. Thus, the Rue de Vaugirard, which figures in our story, led to a village and lands owned by the monastery and named Val Girard after a twelfth century abbot; the village came to be called Vaugirard. The Rue de Sèvres, in which there is now a Lasallian Centre, ran to the village of Sèvres also owned by the abbey; along it, not far from the Brothers' house, you will meet streets named after St Romanus (Romain); the Rue de l'Abbé Gregoire, which used to be called after St Maur; and Rue St Placide.

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE FOUNDER (3/5)

In 1644 the area was open land; the Abbey had leased that year to a merchant grocer several acres of it on condition that he made two roads through it, to be called after St Maur and St Placid.

As you continue along the Rue de Sèvres towards St Sulpice's, you pass through the crossroads known as Croix Rouge (Red Cross): an abbot had a red-painted cross transferred there in 1514.

It was at no. 8 in the former Rue Saint-Maur that Fr Barré acquired the house that still stands, as the central training-house for his Sisters, who had now several schools in Paris, including one or two in the parish of Saint-Sulpice. Because of the street their training-house was in, they became known as the Sisters of St Maur.

St Germain Fair

The settlement that grew up around the abbey and in dependence on it became by the twelfth century a township administering its own justice and holding its own annual fair. It had long become one of the events of Paris life. It was held from February 3rd till Palm Sunday in a huge rectangular enclosure across the street from the north side of St Sulpice's. It contained 24 covered market halls, the passages in between being covered by a very high wooden framework. It was only a stone's throw from the Rue Princesse and was in full swing when the Brothers arrived that February 1688.

This was a high-class fair, offering silverwork and jewellery, objets d'art, lacquers, silks and porcelains from India and China,... Cafés, the boards of tightrope walkers and acrobats, groups of musicians and actors of comic opera added to the attraction. The ordinary people crowded in during the day, but the upper class preferred to come only at night, their carriages parked along all the nearby streests. For several hours elegant women and their escorts toured the stalls lit by thousands of candles, and getting away in their carriages in the bottleneck of the tiny streets took them into the early hours of the morning. Perhaps the tired Brothers slept through it all for the next few weeks. They could not but have known all about it, certainly from the boys they taught; some of whom would have had a field-day as pick-pockets.

St Sulpice

The church of Saint Sulpice that had been built in 1211 on the lines of the present St Severin's church, was being replaced by a new one, begun in 1646, as we have seen. But when La Salle saw it again in 1688 it was not much further advanced than in 1672, for the construction stopped in 1678 for lack of money and was not pursued till 1711. La Salle and the Brothers therefore only knew it as having a chancel and side-aisles, and it was not finally finished till 1788. The chancel was the only part in use, and people crowded into it for Mass.

On its northeastern corner is the small chapel of the Assumption with its curiously shaped roof; it was built for holding catechism sessions and was originally called the chapel of the Holy Child Jesus. St de La Salle often celebrated mass there for the Brothers and their pupils.

The seminary buildings were where the square and fountain in front of the church now are, with an interior garden on the south side, towards the Rue de Vaugirard.

Fashionable life in the area

Just across this road the Luxembourg Palace had been built for Catherine de Medici between 1615 and 1625, and enormous gardens had been carved out for it on what had been open ground. The Duchess of Guise owned it from 1672 to 1694, and then Louis XIV. The public were allowed to take walks in it.

The creation of a royal palace in the quarter meant that the great lords who served there found it convenient to build their great houses in the open spaces beyond it, along the Rue de Vaugirard and the Rue de Sèvres; they were built round secluded courtyards, presenting only the coach entrance to the street.

New religious and charitable institutions were founded also at this time, each in its spacious grounds. This developing quarter of St Germain also housed many high society foreigners who attended its horse-riding and fencing academies, and there were also many fashionable eating-places.

The cabaret in the 17th century was the equivalent of a restaurant; a "taverne" was a cheaper place where you could get wine and to which you brought your own food. But after 1698 the taverner could lay tables and sell cooked meats, and the tavern and cabaret now differed little. There were 1847 cabarets in Paris in 1670 and the number kept increasing. They were mostly in the suburbs. St Germain, the most elegant suburb of all, had 204 cabarets, some very high class.

Cafés, i.e. shops where ready-made coffee was sold, first appeared in 1669, and there were over 300 by 1715, providing also tea and chocolate, wine and liqueurs. They were numerous around the theatres, especially around the Comédie Française. This had moved into the area in 1688.

Many local people made a living hiring out carriages for foreign princes, lords and ambassadors. It was in the suburb of Saint-Germain that tennis (jeu de paume) in indoor courts, cards and billiards were most played. By the next century it was to become one of the favourite residential quarters of the aristocracy.

CREATING THE INSTITUTE

OF THE 21ST CENTURY (1/3)

Regional Convocation of the
Brothers of the Christian Schools
of the USA/Toronto Region
14 August 1990

Brothers, the theme of this Convocation is now well known to all of us: «In Lasallian Association for Christian Education in the 21st Century.» My contribution to development of the general theme is a presentation on our life as Brothers within the context of Lasallian Association for Christian Education.

I welcome the opportunity to reflect with you on our consecrated life and mission. Ironically, however, convinced that we cannot grasp and appreciate our own identity and mission without a sound understanding of the role of the laity in the Church today, I am going to devote considerable time to the vocation of lay Christians, with whom our mission will be shared in the 21st century.

My intention is to articulate what I think the Institute ought to look like in the future and to propose some lines of action that can help us to realize that vision. But the vision and lines of action I am going to propose will not surprise you. Their elements are already evident in Church and Institute orientations of the past twenty-five years.

The Title

«Creating the Institute of the 21st Century.» I am happy with this title because the accent is on "creating", and, consequently, on "doing". Gabriel Moran wrote more than twenty years ago that what we need is vision together with tactics for realizing that vision. We have to be men who ACT, men who participate in the creation of our future. If we fail to act, if we limit ourselves to REACTING, we forfeit the possibility of shaping our future. Our future will indeed be created, but without our collaboration.

In this process of creating our future, we have to avoid, on the one hand, longing nostalgically for the «good old days» and, on the other, day-dreaming romantically of an idealized future, all the while neglecting to live fully in the present. We must avoid also falling into the deadly "self-fulfilling prophecy" trap: predicting the future with apparent absolute certitude, then indicating with insistence what, in consequence of this "certain" future, must be changed today.

Then, too, to participate constructively in the creation of our future, we need to recognize the complex of feelings we have about the past. During the evolution of the Institute these twenty-five difficult years, some of us have experienced hurt, disillusionment, betrayal, anger, and even bitterness. Awareness of such feelings is the first step towards liberation from them. We need to be conscious also of a tendency to shield ourselves against further hurt by adopting a posture of indifference, fatalism, or a kind of Waiting for Godot passivity.

My Story

Last friday we were asked to tell our stories to one another. Brother Luke Salm traced our evolving understanding of the Lasallian charism. He helped us, I am sure, to understand better our experience during all or part of the past thirty-five years. Permit me, Brothers, to share with you some of my own experiences and to use them as points of departure for reflection.

In the year 2000, first year of the new millenium, I shall, God willing, begin my fiftieth year as a Brother of the Christian Schools. It is particularly interesting for me, therefore, to reflect on my own life as a Brother, a period which parallels to a large extent the period which has been in focus throughout this convocation.

As a grade school youngster I began to take seriously the recurrent thought that God was calling me to serve him in a special way. But as I knew nothing whatsoever about the Brothers, I was considering the priesthood. At the same time, however, I was already aware of a keen interest in teaching and in working with youth.

When I met the Brothers for the first time in the year 1947, I found exactly what I was looking for: the opportunity to give my life to God and to serve him by teaching and working with youth. My conviction that God was calling me to be a Brother grew and deepened during my four years of high school. I entered the postulancy in June, 1951, with a clear idea of what I was looking for.

I mention that initial motivation, Brothers, because it has stayed with me and has sustained me over the past thirty-nine years. I have no reason to think that motivation will have changed by the time I begin my fiftieth year in the year 2000. The vocation of the Brothers is for me a life of consecration to God, a life of educational and pastoral service of youth, and a life lived together and by assocation. These essential dimensions so beautifully described in the Declaration and in the Rule have been the constants of my thirty-nine years. Nevertheless, I am certainly aware that something has changed. What has changed is the manner in which I have lived these dimensions.

It is not my purpose, Brothers, to dwell in a comprehensive manner on the changes I have experienced in my lifetime. What I want to do is to focus on one change, the change which will impact significantly the shape of the Institute of the 21st century. That change is the new way of understandig the Church and consequentlky the vocation of the lay Christian. This change in ecclesiology is compelling us, Brothers of the Christian Schools, to rethink our vocation in the context of the call to all baptized Christians to holiness and to apostolic service.

Four Significant Decades

Nearly all of my teachers at Christian Brothers High School, Memphis, were Brothers. The exceptions were specialists in sports and in music. As a Brother myself I began teaching in the year 1955 in St. Joseph, Missouri. There were eleven Brothers and one lay teacher at the service of 340 high school boys. After three years I was transferred to De La Salle, Chicago, a high school for 1200 boys, conducted by nearly thirty-five Brothers and perhaps twenty or so lay men and women.

These three schools were truly "Brothers' Schools," that is to say, schools animated by the Brothers of the Christian Schools, with an important but secondary level of collaboration of a certain number of lay associates.

In the late fifties and earlies sixties, however, the situation changed rapidly. The demand for Catholic education was intense. Numbers of students increased significantly in existing schools and an extraordinary number of new schools were constructed, particularly in the old St. Louis District. Because of this demand for Catholic education, both the Church and the Institute began to look more favorably upon the presence of lay teachers. By the mid-sixties the percentage of lay teachers in the schools had increased dramatically. Nevertheless, our schools were still perceived as "Brothers' Schools".

Similar changes were occurring in varying degrees in other countries as well. By the time of the General Chapter of 1966-67, the percentage of lay teachers, both male and female, was very high. Nevertheless, a study of the documents of the Chapter, generally of very high quality, reveals that Brothers were still operating out of a "Brothers' School" model. The work of Lasallian education was the work of the Brothers. The lay collaborators were responsibile for important tasks in the schools, but neither they nor the Brothers questioned seriously the fact that the schools were Brothers' schools.

Years of confusion and frustration

But then the years of confusion and frustration began. An extraordinary number of men left us and the numbers of new members dropped significantly and rapidily. Among the many vivid memories I have of my service as Visitor of the St. Louis District from 1971 to 1976 was that of visiting schools and finding Brothers confused, discouraged, frustrated, and even angry. Many, of course, were disturbed by what had happened generally in the Institute and District in less than ten years. But a particular and very important focus of a rather widespread discouragement was the school. «This school is called a Brothers' School,« they said to me, «but where are the Brothers? We are six Brothers teaching with forty-five lay teachers. How can this school be called a Brothers' school?»

But the questioning was not limited to the Brothers. Lay teachers also, a number of whom were already occupying secondary positions in administration, raised similar queries.

What these Brothers and their lay colleagues were coming to realize was that the model of "Brothers' School" – that is to say, a school animated by the Brothers with a secondary level of collaboration of the laity – no longer made any sense. That model was no longer helpful in understanding the nature of the school or in shaping its character. But no other way of conceptualizing a school in the tradition of John Baptist de La Salle was available. I personally remain convinced that this crisis of identity and consequent crisis of confidence has had a profound and negative impact on the pastoral ministry of vocations.

From Brothers' Schools to Lasallian Schools

At the convocation in 1984 I described this model of Brothers' schools as a triangular model, with the Brothers at the top and their lay colleagues at the base and said that it was collapsing everywhere. This model has continued to collapse in the six years that have passed. It is gradually being replaced by a new model, that is to say, a new way of understanding Lasallian education. This model can be visualized as a circle that is parallel to the ground. On points of the circumference of the circle are the Brothers, lay associates, priests, members of other religious institutes, parents, former students themselves. This model is the "Lasallian School" model, that is to say, a school that is animated not primarily by the brothers with others in a secondary role, but by the educational community, in which the brothers make their specific contribution.

This model of Lasallian School is described vividly in the Rule:

> «The Brothers' community is ever mindful that its apostolic activity takes place within an educational community in which all the functions, including positions of responsibility, are shared... the Brothers make known to the rest of the educational community the essential elements of the Lasallian tradition. The Brothers offer to those who desire it, a more intensified sharing of Lasallian spirituality, encouraging such persons to make a more specific apostolic commitment.» (Rule, 17a, 17c)

I believe that these articles express the most significant change in our life as Brothers since the fundamental changes of 1966-67. What is implied in these articles is a new way of understanding our role as Brothers, that is to say, the manner in which we exercise our ministry. These articles express clearly the shift from a model of "Brothers' Schools" to a model of "Lasallian Schools".

CREATING THE INSTITUTE OF THE 21ST CENTURY (2/3)

Regional Convocation of the
Brothers of the Christian Schools
of the USA/Toronto Region
14 August 1990

A new understanding of Church

It is important for all of us –Brothers of the Institute and those who join us in constituting the Lasallian Family – to see our own remarkable evolution of recent years in the context of the evolution of the Church itself.

The Church today describes itself as the People of God, as the communion of all those who have been incorporated in Christ through baptism. All Christians are equal in terms of their dignity as sons and daughters of God. All are called to holiness and to participation in the mission of evangelizing the world. In the document which followed the Synod on the Laity, John Paul II insists that > «Everyone in the Church... shares in the common vocation to holiness... On equal par with all other members of the Church, the lay faithful are called to holiness.

> The call (to the mission of evangelization) is a concern not only of pastors, clergy, and men and women religious. The call is addressed to everyone... Jesus wants... all his disciples to be the salt of the earth and the light of the world.» (Christifideles Laici: 16, 2, 3)

There are, of course, different charisms, ministries, and functions among the faithful. What is of great importance is the quality of relationships that exist among the lay faithful, religious men and women, and ordained ministers. As Brothers, we are particularly concerned about the quality of our relationships with our lay colleagues. Claretian Father Jose Garcia Paredes, editor of an important publication in Spain on religious life, describes four possible relationships between religious and lay faithful:

> 1. The laity in schools or hospitals are considered "necessary evils", to be tolerated only when there is no alternative. Lay people are "used" as needs arise.
>
> I think that we have to admit that these words are a just description of the relationship which often existed between Brothers and their colleagues thirty-five or more years ago. I hope that the description is no longer applicable to any school in the Institute.
>
> 2. The laity participate substantially in the life of the institutions, but primarily because they have become so numerous. Their presence is still perceived by many religious as a threat and is, therefore, resented. There is no accepted model which permits the religious and the laity to function together meaningfully and constructively.

I suggest that this is a fair description of what existed in the sixties and seventies. Unfortunately, I am obliged to say that this attitude is far from dead among the Brothers.

> 3. The charismatic potential of the laity is recognized, ackowledged, and encouraged. But the religious do not really "let go": they remain "in charge". They feel, perhaps unconsciously, that shaping and controlling the participation of the laity in the Church belongs by right to them. They fall into the trap of paternalism, victims of an unrecognized superiority complex.

I think that paternalism is indeed a problem among us, but I am neither surprised nor discouraged by this fact. I think that with the passage of time, this difficulty will be corrected. The important thing is that we be sensitive to this tendency and work together with our lay colleagues to eradicate it.

> 4. Religious and the lay faithful stress first "what is common"; they see themselves in terms of equality, fellowship, and authentic mutual relations. Religious demand no special privileges nor recognition; they welcome the laity without any sense of superiority. The laity understand and accept the specific contribution religious are called to make in the institution.

While I readily acknowledge that we have a significant distance to travel before we can say that that paragraph is a valid description of our reality, I am very encouraged at the evident progress that has taken place in recent years.

But there is a difficulty which cannot be ignored: that of finding language that satisfactorily expresses relationships among Christians in the Church today. I am pleased that a number of participants at the synod in 1987 questioned our manner of describing the members of the Church as clergy, religious, and laity. These words of Bishop Fernando Sebastian, Secretary of the Spanish Episcopal Conference, are particularly appropriate:

> «Calling normal Christians "lay people" strikes me as using a subtly clerical language... It is better to speak simply of Christian. They are the common members of the People of God and of the Church... Priestly ordination or religious profession is what differentiates some Christians. These are the vocations which must be explained in relation to the whole Christian community rather than the other way around.» (In The Laity and the Religious, pp. 72)

This problem of language admits of no easy solution. I shall continue this morning to employ the words "laity" and "lay", but I wished to share with you my discomfort.

Summary: Communion Ecclesiology

Brothers, the following words of Cardinal Eduardo Pironio, President of the Pontifical Council on the Laity, summarize beautifully what I have been saying about mutual relations among Christians:

> «...when we speak of "communion ecclesiology", we simply mean the Church as the People of God, among whom there are various ministries, various charisms, and various functions. What seems very important to me is to know that we are all disciples of Christ... we need to overcome this separation of the Church into sectors such as the clergy, religious, and the laity, and to replace this with a more communitarian ecclesiological vision where the various charisms and ministries are integrated in the one communion of the People of God and the unique evangelizing mission of the Church.» (In The Laity and the Religious, pp. 104-105)

The Role of Religious

This understanding of the role of the laity is effectively forcing members of religious institutes, such as our own, to reflect seriously and profoundly on their own particular role. Certainly it is clear, as Jose Garcia Paredes says, that religious have no "monopoly" on the Christian vocation, holiness, or mission:

> «What is happening is that religious life is re-situating itself within the ecclesial organism. Instead of being "a single or outstanding voice", it is becoming an important voice within the symphonic choir which also includes other important voices. It is rediscovering itself as a "charism" within a Church "community of charisms".» (In The Laity and the Religious, p. 2)

But what exactly is the nature of this "voice" of consecrated religious men and women in the Church today. Brazilian Jesuit Marcello Azevedo says that "there is nothing in the Gospel that may be specific to the lay faithful, nor is there anything that may be seen in the evangelical counsels that must be realized by religious only." It seems clear also that the identity of religious men and women is not to be found in the particular services they render. After we exclude those ministries which are reserved to the ordained clergy, we can say that there is no ministry that is specific to and limited to members of religious institutes. In Christifideles Laici the Pope makes his own a synod proposition which "praises teachers and professors, now lay people for the most part, for their dedication to maintaining institutes of Catholic education." Nevertheless, he continues, "the simultaneous presence of clergy, the lay faithful, and men and women religious, offers students a vivid image of the Church." (CL 62)

It seems clear, therefore, that the nature of our identity and specificity in the Church is not be found in the particular ministries which we perform. There is no educational service that is reserved to the members of religious institutes. What then is our identity and specificity in the Church? I think that it is essential that each of us be able to answer this question. But it is not enough to have a theoretical response to the question. The important thing is that on the level of our experience we "know" who we are and what we are all about. If our vocation makes sense to us, if we find meaning in it, if we are proud of it, if we want young people to join us, then it is clear that we "own" the answer to the question I posed. If, on the contrary, we are inordinately disturbed and confused, ambivalent about the value of our life, hesitant to speak of our vocation to others, afraid to invite youth to follow us, then it is clear that we have not yet interiorized the answer to the question.

Identity and Mission

As we begin to formulate our response, we can say with no ambiguity that while our role in the Church has changed – almost before our very eyes – our fundamental identity has not. Nor has our essential mission: that mission is to make Christ's loving and saving presence a visible and effective reality among the young.

In writing of religious life within the context of apostolic vocations in the Church, Marcello Azevedo says that > «...its distinctive character is not the vocation to holiness (common to all Christians), but the public profession –recognized, legitimized, and appreciated by the Church – of the will to live the Gospel fully, radically, and coherently as the primary objective of one's life.» (Vocation for Mission, pp. 8-9)

We have consecrated ourselves totally and publicly to God. We have made the following of Christ the primary objective of our life. By profession we are "public Christians". by our very life style, if we live it authentically, we "say", so to speak, to all who observe us, "We believe. We take Jesus Christ seriously." Our vowed commitment to chastity, poverty, obedience, association for the service of the poor through education, and stability, lived in community, gives both form and visibility to our consecration.

Our vocation is apostolic in its very nature. But we evangelize first and foremost by being who we are supposed to be. As public followers of Jesus Christ, we make his loving and saving presence a visible and effective reality in the world of education. I am certainly not saying that what we do is unimportant. It is extremely important. But the specific work we do does not distinguish us. Nevertheless, it is obvious that we witness to Christ in and through the service which we render.

What is of fundamental significance is the quality of our lives. What kind of people are we? Are we earnestly striving to be the men we profess to be? We can be sure that – as individuals, as communities, and as Institute – we communicate a message. But what is that message? How do people read us? Our vocation is to be "messengers to the young to proclaim the truth that sets them free." (Rule of 1967, ch. 9) That is a succinct but accurate description of our call. How authentically are we living it?

The future

To prepare for the future, Brothers, we have to live the present as wholeheartedly as we can. We have to respond positively and enthusiastically to a certain number of challenges. The following are some of them. I say "some of them" because it is not possible to reflect on the entire Rule, all of which is pertinent to our discussion of the Institute of the 21st Century.

1. We must be men of faith

To be men of faith is to "walk with the Lord," that is to say, "to live in fellowship with him."

It is to live a relationship with the Father whose presence is real to us; a Father who loves us; a Father who has chosen us to be his sons and to be Brothers.

To be men of faith is to live a relationship with Christ – the Christ who has risen and is present to us in our everyday life; the Christ who is for us the WAY, revealing to us by his life and teaching what being human is all about; the Christ who is for us the TRUTH, revealing to us by his life and teaching who God is and what he is like; the Christ who is for us the LIFE, imbuing us with his Spirit, enabling us to live as sons of his Father and as his brother; the Christ who wants us to radiate his presence to youth.

To be men of faith is to live a relationship with the Holy Spirit, who leads us as he led Jesus and as he led our Founder; the Spirit whose gifts make ir possible for us to manifest Christ to those confided to our care; the Spirit whose presence and gifts will enable us to touch hearts.

Brothers, we have made PUBLIC PROFESSION of our faith. If we are not believers, our life is a contradiction. De La Salle said that if we are not men of faith, we are dead members. There is nothing else distinctive about our life. Following Christ, making his presence a reality today – that's it. If that element is lacking, our life makes no sense and we have no reason to exist in the 21st century.

It is obvious then that we have to be men of daily personal prayer. Furthermore, we have to take very seriously the Rule when it tells us that "The distinctive character of the Brothers' community is to be a community of faith where the experience of God is shared."

CREATING THE INSTITUTE OF THE 21ST CENTURY (3/3)

Regional Convocation of the
Brothers of the Christian Schools
of the USA/Toronto Region
14 August 1990

2. We must be BROTHERS

To be BROTHERS is our vocation: brothers to one another, brothers to those with whom we are associated, older brothers to the youth confided to our care. (Rule, 53) To be brothers we have to live interdependently. The great enemy of authentic brotherhood is individualism. In shaking loose from the patterns of dependence in our past, many of us stumbled into a spirit of independence. Our own goals of self-interest and self-fulfillment have taken precedence over all other loyalties. In the most recent issue of Review for Religious Brother William Mann writes: "The future of our Institute will rise or fall on the question of interdependence. Too many of us are trapped in an overly individualistic and independent life stance." (Review for Religious, May-June 1990, p. 376). I agree.

3. We must "be attentive"... we must "be moved"

Several times the Rule refers to a characteristic of the Founder that we Brothers urgently need as we prepare for the 21st century (Rule, 1, 11, 19). De La Salle, by God's grace, became "aware" (rendu attentif à) of the human and spiritual distress of the children of the artisan and the poor. He was "seized by" (saisi par) the way in which the children of the artisans and of the poor were abandoned and left to themselves. This experience led him to change the direction of his life. (Because it is difficult to translate the word saisi literally, the translators of the Rule rendered the expresion "deeply moved.")

Brothers, as we think of creating the Institute of the 21st century, we must be aware of the needs of our own day. We must be free enough, loving enough, creative enough to respond: «The Institute establishes, renews, and diversifies its works according to what the Kingdom of God requires.» (Rule, 11)

Six years ago I spoke of the danger of living off the creativity and boldness of our predecessors. That danger is enhanced by the fact that our numbers are declining. The tendency is to retreat and consolidate. But when this tendency becomes the governing policy, we have a formula for slow death. As paradoxical as it may seem, we need new initiatives. Of course, this policy means that we must turn over to others some of the work we are doing, either by reducing the numbers of Brothers in some schools or by withdrawing them altogether. As threatening as this sounds, it is precisely what the Church and the Institute have asked us to do. Twice the Rule makes reference to the Vatican II invitation to religious institutes to turn over some of the things they are doing and to respond to those whose needs are not being met. (Rule, 19a, 40a)

Brothers, we are exposed through television to so much human suffering. But are we really attentive? Does this constant exposure lead us to awareness? Or do we perhaps shield ourselves psychologically from really "seeing"? Do we protect ourselves from the "threat" we perceive to the status quo with which we have become quite secure and comfortable? Do we have the faith and courage to allow ourselves to be moved to the point of responding in one way or another, perhaps even by a willngess to change the current patterns of our life?

The number and quality of Brothers of the region serving the poor both at home and abroad is significant. But I think that all will agree that we have to do more. We have to be more generous with our resources. We need to continue to develop new and creative approaches to the educational needs of poor youth within the United States and Canada. In addition we need to provide Brothers for the human and Christian education of young people in poor areas of the world. The Rule insists that missionary activity is integral to our mission in the Church.

For this reason, Brothers, I encourage you to give serious consideration to a missionary commitment in any of the many areas served by the region. In a particular way I ask you to think of the new Delegation of East Africa, as well as of Ethiopia where the need for personnel is critical at the present time. I ask you to consider also service at Bethelehem University, where, unfortunately in my opinion, the number of Brothers from the United States has decreased in recent years. If there are Brothers willing to serve in other communities in the Holy Land, I can assure you that they will be welcomed.

4. We must continue the process of renewing our schools

The attention the region has given in recent years to the characteristics of Lasallian Schools has had an enormous impact. There is interest everywhere in clarifying and promoting the Catholic and Lasallian identity of our primary and high schools, of our colleges and universities, and of our specialized institutions.

Brothers, our Lasallian schools must be different – otherwise, they have no reason to exist. Our Rule says correctly that our schools are themselves a message. (Rule, 3) What is the message they communicate? How do people read them? I hope that they are perceived as unambiguously Catholic. I hope that it is clear to all that our religion, youth ministry, and service programs enjoy high priority – in choice of faculty, scheduling, and budgeting.

I am happy that a significant number of young Brothers are preparing themselves at the Master's level for the teaching of religion and that a number of other Brothers, who for one reason or another, stopped teaching religion years ago have returned to the religion class or are preparing themselves to return.

But even if we decide that teaching religion explicitly is not feasible for us, we can, with creativity and generosity, find concrete ways to make significant contributions to the religious growth of our young people. There are many possibilities: leading school prayers, participation in school liturgies, animating retreats, working with Lasallian youth groups, etc.

Brother Joseph Hendron and I were very impressed by your Christian service programs. They are effectively helping your young people to grow in sensitivity to injustice and poverty and to their responsibility to work constructively for a better society. Such programs are in no way marginal to the work of the Lasallian school: they are integral. (Rule, 14, 40)

5. We must share our Lasallian spirituality

So much has happened, Brothers, since the Convocation of 1984! The shift from Brothers' schools to Lasallian schools is occurring. The many initiatives you have taken to introduce your lay colleagues to our Lasallian heritage are having an impact. You yourselves have been pleasantly surprised at the positive response of a significant percentage of lay members of your faculties. What has been accomplished is admirable. We have to continue to give this movement high priority.

I thank God that the Lasallian Volunteer Movement has made great progress. This movement has tremendous potential for good in the Church today. It has been a joy for me to meet a number of volunteers, living and working with the Brothers "together and by association." It is my hope that this program will soon be truly regional in scope and that what you are accomplishing here will be a model for other regions.

I am encouraged also by the steadily growing interest in the Lasallian Youth Movement. We need to provide structures which will permit young people to live their faith in small communities. Boys and girls (and young men and women) who are serious about their faith need to be able to gather regularly and frequently to reflect on the Word of God, to pray together, to share apostolic experiences, and to plan future apostolic activities. The structured religion programs of the school are essential. So are the pastoral activities of the youth ministry programs. But more is necessary. Young people who really believe and are serious about living their faith need close association with other young people who are committed.

Furthermore, our world-wide experience indicates that young people are finding in the story of John Baptist de La Salle inspiration and motivation. The Lasallian Youth Movement is very alive in many sectors of the Institute and, thanks be to God, growing rapidly. We should make its development on local, national, international, and intercontinental levels a high priority.

Conclusion

Brothers, at the meeting of the Visitors of the United States/Toronto Region last April, I expressed my appreciation of the many signs of vitality which Brother Joseph and I found during our vitits. In his presentation to the LCWR/CMSM Assembly a year ago, Brother Charles Reutemann suggests that «after a careful critique of our congregational group, there might be cause to have a major celebration, a convocation or something similar, where the message would be: "We are on the right track; let us continue, though we might want to give some special consideration to such and such a strand."»

I don't know whether or not Charlie had this convocation in mind, but here we are. Brothers, I can say to you in complete honesty that I think you are indeed on the right track and I can urge you to continue. During the twelve year interval between my visit to the region as Vicar and my visit as Superior, there was evident progress in a number of areas: the personal renewal of the Brothers, the strengthening of prayer and Eucharist, the intense interest in the Founder, a number of new and well-conceived community and apostolic initiatives, the growing commitment to educational service in Africa, the concern for the Catholic dimension in your schools at all levels, the striking renewal of the religion and pastoral programs in the schools, the acceptance of the Lasallian School model, the programs for Lasallian education of your colleagues, the Lasallian Volunteer and Lasallian Youth Movements...

An area of disppointment

There is one major area, however, that is disappointing: the meager numbers in formation. On the other hand I am encouraged by the quality of the vocation and formation programs, the quantity and quality of the Brothers assigned to vocations and formation, and the quality of the candidates and young Brothers themselves. I am encouraged also by the attitude of hope and the persevering effort that is so evident. Without in any way closing my eyes to the long list of explanations of the decline in vocations, I remain convinced that one of the most important factors has been and still is our own crisis of confidence in who we are and what we are about. I am convinced that if we can "get our own act together," we shall once again radiate confidence, inner peace, and pride, sentiments that will attract young people and stimulate them to ask themselves if God might be calling them to be Brothers of the Christian Schools.

There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the evident progress in so many areas of our life and mission in the united States/Toronto Region is a strong and positive reflection on the priority the region has given over many years to developing and supporting outstanding programs of continuing formation and education. I won't attempt a list of the many programs that have been available to the Brothers during the past twenty-five years, but I do want to mention and praise one of the latest, the Buttimer Institute.

Brother Charles suggests that «we might want to give special consideration to such and such a strand.» That's what I have tried to do this morming. I am very well aware, however, that there are a number of other strands that I didn't consider. I think, for example, that we might very profitably give explicit attention to the nature and obligations of each of our five vows.

Brothers, in my reflections on "Creating the Institute of the 21st Century," I have expressed my conviction that we have to understand what being a consecrated religious and being a Brother of the Christian Schools means in an age when the Church declares that all Christians are called to holiness and to participation in the mission of evangelization. I have insisted that we do indeed have a role to play but one that is different from what we knew in the past. I can't find a better summary of this new way of viewing ourselves and our mission than article 17a:

> «The Brothers' community is ever mindful that its apostolic activity takes place within an educational community in which all the functions, including positions of responsibilities, are shared.»

Communion generates communion

This reference to the Brothers' community in relation to the entire educational community is a reminder of the mutual relations which must characterize all communities in the Church. Relations must be such that true communion is formed. "Communion generates communion," the Pope says in Christifideles Laici. That simple but profound sentence expresses succinctly but accurately a truth which is at the very heart of the mission which God through his Church has confided to our Lasallian Family today. We, members of the Institute together with all who join us in Lasallian Association, are called to communion –communion which in turn will generate communion.

When a journalist asked Cardinal Pironio what he expected from the Synod on the Laity, he responded: «Simply this: that we may learn to walk together in the Church.» My prayer is that we members of the Lasallian Family learn to walk together – walk together with the Lord and with one another. My prayer is that our life as Lasallians be really and truly an experience of communion, communion which in turn generates communion.

CARACTERISTICS OF THE LASALLIAN SCHOOL
(Regional Education Committee of The Christian Brothers U.S.A.Toronto)

The Lasallian school has 3 principal distinguishing marks:

1. Teaching is considered to be a ministry of grace.

2. Association makes it possible to attain the educational goals of the school through the collaboration of teachers who share the same outlook and Gospel values.

3. Schools have well-defined aims: they seek to provide pupils with an education that is intellectual, cultural, religious and vocational, by means of courses that are suited to their needs and which are based on Christian values.

1. THE TEACHER, A MINISTER OF GRACE

LA SALLE wrote as follows:	AIMS		Activities suggested to achieve this
«Let it be clear, then, in all your relations with the children who are entrusted to you that you look upon yourselves as ministers of God, acting with love, with a sincere and true zeal, accepting with much patience the difficulties you have to suffer...» (MTR 9, 1).	The teacher has the central position in the Lasallian school. De La Salle sees the teacher as a special minister of God's grace for the pupils, and as someone who is called to play a specific role in his providential plan for young people. The Lasallian teacher grows in sanctity by exercising his educational ministry with zeal, and by accepting his share of responsibility for the work done in the school. The Lasallian teacher sees his educational ministry as an integral part of his spiritual growth. Consequently, his personal commitment to the spiritual, academic and vocational education of his pupils is a means for him to lead a life totally directed towards God. In the Lasallian school, this educational ministry is shared by teachers, the administrative staff, the planners and the school staff as a whole.	1. To show a spirit of faith by living in the presence of God, by recognising the action of God and by responding to it under all circumstances. 2. To show a spirit of faith by seeing one's ministry as a part of one's own spiritual growth.	1. In class, share prayer with the pupils. 2. Pray, asking for the grace to answer for the pupils before God.
«Your zeal towards the children you teach would not go very far and would not have much result or much success if it limited itself only to words. To be effective, your teaching must be supported by your example» (MTR 10, 3).	De La Salle wants teachers to look upon everything with the eyes of faith. He encourages them to become aware of the constant presence of God who guides them and guides also the minds of their pupils. Faith is shown by zeal for the spiritual and temporal good of the pupils, as well as by a fervent commitment to what is seen to be best for their complete education. This zeal makes the Lasallian teacher work with love for the good of all the pupils, and to show special consideration for those most in need of it.	3. To show a spirit of zeal by a total commitment to the education of the pupils. 4. To show a spirit of zeal by a sympathetic attitude and concern for all the pupils. 5. To show a spirit of zeal by one's efforts for the education of the poor.	3. Prepare lessons carefully and enhance them with Gospel values. 4. Make an effort to get to know each pupil personally and take his needs into account. 5. Help poor pupils to grow intellectually and socially...

2. ASSOCIATION

LA SALLE wrote as follows:	AIMS		Activities suggested to achieve this
«Union in a community is truly a precious gem. For this reason Our Lord recommended it to his Apostles with insistence before his death. When this is lost, all is lost. Hence, if you wish your community to continue, preserve this virtue carefully» (Med. 91, 2).	In the Lasallian school, teachers act as the brothers and sisters of the pupils. They do this by ASSOCIATION, on the basis of commonly held Gospel values and a shared desire to make these values a part of their lives and of those of their pupils. Their work is characterised by mutual charity, that is, by tolerance, generosity, patience, good humour and humility. Lasallian teachers help to stimulate the spiritual, personal and professional develpment of each pupil. They cooperate with others to create a team spirit in the running of the school and in decision making. They bear witness publicly to their Lasallian character, and welcome those who are interested in sharing their ideals. The living expression of shared values attracts pupils and other people, inviting them to share in the life of the Lasallian school.	1. Commit oneself to a shared undertaking which conforms to New Testament ideals. 2. Live and work in a spirit of mutual charity. 3. Work for the spiritual and personal growth of each person. 4. Create a collegial approach to administration and decision making. 5. Involve parents, pupils, former students and friends in the Lasallian Family.	1. Reflect on the New Testament with the teaching staff. 2. Provide mutual support in a variety of areas, by contributing one's own talents and energy, and by doing all one can to forget mistakes and to correct them. 3. Provide the teaching staff with opportunities to update themselves spiritually and professionally. 4. Hold meeting periodically to consider common worries and the life of the school. 5. Offer parents, pupils, former students and the local community an opportunity to take part in school support programmes.

3. SCHOOL ADMINISTRATION

LA SALLE wrote as follows:	AIMS		Activities suggested to achieve this
«You must, then, look upon this work entrusted to you by pastors, by fathers and mothers, as one of the most important and most necessary services in the Church» (MTR 7, 1). «Consider that it is only too common for the working class and the poor to allow their children to live on their own, roaming all over... God has had the goodness to remedy so great a misfortune by the establishment of the Christian Schools» (MTR 2, 1). «This is also why you must have an altogether special esteem for the Christian education and teaching of children... (which) is the very foundation and support of their religion» (MTR 7, 3). «Are you thoroughly committed to their making (all these truths) a strong impression on the minds of these children?... From this moment take the steps to make it your main concern to teach perfectly the truths of the faith and the practical maxims of the holy Gospel to those who are entrusted to you» (MTR 6, 1). «You too can perform miracles... by touching the hearts of the children... by rendering your pupils obedient to and faithful in the practice of the maxims of the Gospel... and industrious in school and at home» (Med. 180, 3).	The Lasallian school is a Christian school which shares in the mission of the Catholic Church. Among its primary responsibilities one can mention: religious instruction, religious training, the education of pupils and their cultural development. Teachers provide courses that are adapted to social changes and individual needs. The Lasallian school is characterised by the importance it attaches to education, and especially to that of the working class and the poor. With energy and enthusiasm, it seeks to attract pupils from a variety of economic strata, of varying intellectual ability, and from different racial and ethnic backgrounds. Also it encourages the pupils to be tolerant, to show respect for the individual, to make a genuine commitment to work for justice and peace, as well as for the good of their fellow-pupils and that of the other members of the educational community. The Lasallian school gives priority to the Christian instruction and education of the pupils. It provides a professional course of religious instruction, and integrates Gospel values in all the subjects taught. Against the background of a traditionally Catholic religious atmosphere, it encourages apostolically inspired forms of service, personal and community prayer and liturgical celebrations. The Lasallian school strives to provide teaching of a very high quality so as to cater for the needs, the aims and the abilities of the pupils who choose to frequent it. It provides courses which enable pupils to develop their intellectual and personal potential so that they can subsequently be of benefit to society. It provides courses that bring pupils into contact with the physical and social sciences, with mathematics and the arts. The teaching methods used encourage pupils to think and discriminate. De La Salle advises his teachers to pray for the gift of touching the hearts of their pupils. In the same spirit, Lasallian association seeks to create structures which will lead young people to take up their responsibilities as pupils. By their affection and concern, teachers encourage pupils to face up constantly to their personal obligations and to the possibility of exercising a leadership role.	1. Work with the local Church and support it without, however, losing the specific identity of the Lasallian school. 2. Help to fund the education of the less well off. 3. Draw pupils from a variety of economic, cultural, racial and ethnic backgrounds. 4. Promote the following values: tolerance, sensitivity, concern for the poor, for justice, peace and responsibility. 5. Give priority to the religious instruction of the pupils in the Christian faith. 6. Create conditions which will favour a good religious education of the pupils in the Christian spirit. 7. Strive to achieve high educational standards. 8. Set up disciplinary structures which will promote the growth of the individual, the development of a sense of responsibility, and the training of leaders.	1. Motivate the pupils to take part in schemes to help the local Church. 2. Enquire about the sources of income of the poorest pupils. 3. Recruit pupils from all social strata. 4. Include in the curriculum courses dealing with justice and peace. 5. Give priority to religious instruction courses. 6. Encourage pupils to look upon the events of their lives with the eyes of faith. 7. Create courses adapted to the personal needs of pupils and suited to their intellectual ability. 8. Provide pupils with a chance to train as leaders to serve others. REMARK These activities are only suggestions to help you think of others that will suit the circumstances in your particular school.

THE CATHOLIC SCHOOL AS A PLACE FOR A LIFE OF HOLINESS

Seen from the perspective of the spirituality of Hugh of St Victor (1130-1141) and St John Baptist de la Salle (1651-1719)

Preamble

The Christian tradition is full of richness of different spiritualities. Yet, they appear in a spiral as there are nearly always certain elements in one form of Christian life which reappear in another separated in time by several centuries.

It is in the light of the above that I, as a Brother of the Christian Schools today identify with certain elements in the spirituality of the Canons of St Victor (Victorine School). Hugh of St Victor interests me for two reasons:

a. His spirituality and theological teaching are strongly that of an educator, whose rule of life has an augustinian flair such as ours has.

b. His teaching directly and explicitly provides for the full restoration of the fallen man to the dignity of the child of God through education. It also provides for a strong possibility of contemplative friendship with God.

So, by developing an aspect of the theological teaching of Hugh, I strive to:

a. Corroborate the vision of St John Baptist de La Salle with an earlier vision in the Church, for the purpose of

b. providing an impetus for the ministry of an educator today.

Hugh acclaimed by Bihlmayer as the most outstanding theologian of the 12th century, is a canon regular. He belongs to the Canons of St Victor begun about the year 1112 A. D. by William of Champeaux. The Canons adopted the rule of St Augustine and their monastery soon became an outstanding School of theology. It followed the practico-speculative method of St Augustine. Hugh's deep and lengthened study of the works of Augustine enabled him to present an Augustinian synthesis that had never before been accomplished, hence his appelation: alter Augustinus. Hugh's major work is on the Sacrament of the Christian faith which is an introduction to the understanding of the Scripture. His other works include treaties on meditations, on methods of prayer, in praise of charity, on the formation of novices. Still others include commentary on the Celestial Hierarchy of the pseudo-Dionysius and homilies on Ecclesiastes and "De Contemplatione et ejus speciebus". The latter is attributed to him but not with certainty.

It is thus evident from the above that Hugh of St Victor is a scholarly and contemplative person. This makes him attractive to me. His spirituality and the development of his theology with regard to studying as a means of contemplating God is worth examining with the hope of encouraging all involved in the establishment of Christian education, especially in our Catholic Schools today.

Hugh's Theological teaching

This will be fleshed out in what follows and used as I progress, to illustrate its relevance as applied to today's Catholic school.

Briefly stated, Hugh notes that original sin has left a disastrous effect on man, but not without traces of the memory of God. The memory of God that remains is a point of departure. This enabled him to enter into a knowledge of God in a sequential manner. The first stage is the Symbolic Knowledge. This is followed by Rational Knowledge and finally by Mystical Knowledge.

Chaos and Restlessness.

Some of the disastrous effects of original sin are chaos and restlesseness. St John Baptist de La Salle, a pioneer of modern education and Founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools observes this phenomenon in children when he writes: «God so loved the souls he created that when He saw them involved in sin and unable to free themselves, His zeal and desire for their salvation led Him to send His own Son to rescue them from their wretched condition.» (1). Poverty is another effect of sin of society and De La Salle observes that this is an indirect cause of restlesseness in children as their parents who could not afford to send them to school allow them to wander around aimlessely like vagabonds. (2) However, Michel Sauvage and Miguel Campos in their study of the Lasallian spirituality indicate that the childrens, hopeless lives would have been transformed by the concrete presence of their teachers who are for them sacrament of God's saving love. (3) The ten Black Bishops of the United States of America also recognise the chaotic condition of this world and see a hope of remedying this in the existence of the Catholic School. They write: «It (Catholic School) also represents – and this is no less important – a sign of stability in an environment of chaos and flux. It should be a source of legitimate pride that our schools are sought after by many who are not Catholics as well as Catholics because of the religious and morals values considered as part of quality education.» (4).

What then makes Catholic education capable of arresting the restlesseness of youth and the chaos of the environment? What elements in the Catholic School respond to the needs of world youth? Does the Catholic School have the potential of restoring the damaged man to the full image of Christ? These are areas I intend to examine in what follows.

As earlier stated, according to Hugh the disastrous effects of original sin leave traces of memory of God. This prompts him to explore further the concept of God through the knowledge of Arts, Scripture, philosophy and other sacred sciences. All these are to promote the mind's enlightenment about God as well as to increase the practice of virtues. Augustine had said that the whole world is a book that must be read rather than be admired. I believe, through its graded and systematic instructions, the Catholic school strives to meet this requirement of providing knowledge. In this regard, the Fathers of the Vatican Council II have this to say: «All men of whatever race, condition or age, in virtue of their dignity as human persons have an inalienable right to education. This education should be suitable to the particular destiny of the individuals, adapted to their ability, sex and national cultural conditions, and should be conducive to fraternal relations with other nations in order to promote true unity and peace in the world. True education is therefore directed towards the formation of the human person in view of his final end and the good of that society to which he belongs.» (5) This final end that education or knowledge aims at bringing about is the restoration of man to the image of Christ talked about by Hugh of St Victor.

Still talking of symbolic knowledge, I think about this also in the realm of all types of knowledge which serves man in many positive and meaningful ways. These include the physical, intellectual, moral and social as well as spiritual dimensions of man's needs. The Church Fathers write: «Due weight being given to the advances in psychological, pedagogical and intellectual sciences, children and young people should be helped to develop harmoniously their physical, moral and intellectual qualities.» (6) Corroborating this, the Black Bishops say in their pastoral letter: «The education of a people being the greatest and fundamental means of elevating it to the higher planes to which all Christian civilization tends, we pledge ourselves to aid schools in establishing wherever we are to be found, Catholic, schools embracing the primary and higher branches of knowledge.» (7)

Rational knowledge.

Man can ascend and attain the Invisible through the tangible, the visible. Hugh, in the tradition of the Fathers, believes that there must be a rational and reflective study of the Scripture and scriptural matters such that knowledge already acquired can lead to a greater understanding of God in the light of faith. The appreciation of symbolic things earlier described must be through rational knowledge. It is the stimulation of the minds of the children through appropriate teaching techniques available to the modern man that this can be achieved. Vatican II affirms that: «Children and young people have the right to be stimulated to make sound judgements based on a well found conscience and to put them into practice with a sense of personal commitment.» (8) I submit that through the practice of making consistent sound moral judgements, rational knowledge is attained. In addition, the elements of education mentioned above, namely arts and sciences, need be unified rationally such that what is learnt in one area can be meaningfully integrated within the person with what is learnt in other areas. Thus the task of making integrated human beings belong properly to the Catholic school with its dedicated staff. I believe this is very much in the mind of Pius XII when he said of the Catholic school: "Life is a synthesis".

Mystical knowledge.

Reflection on the knowledge acquired as explained above is necessary for meditation. This is especially true when the subject of reflection is the Sacred Scripture done in the light of faith. Although the Scripture is a privileged starting place to reflect about God, one does not stop there. «The reflective Catholic should be able to distinguish his religious community with its distinctive faith and cult from the outrageous failures of many of its members.» (9) This is to say he will avoid rhetorical questions such as "Has the Church a future"? and "Can one continue to accept the Church"? (10) The education of the person becomes truly reflective when it is directed towards ensuring an entry into knowledge of the mystery of salvation leading to a more deeply appreciation of the gift of faith which he has received. Thus he learns to adore God the Father in spirit and in truth.

However, according to Hugh, reflection on knowledge must not be merely speculative: it must be an understanding (intus legere) that stimulates effective love and eventually leads to contemplation, which is mystical knowledge. Mysticism, however, is an intense experience of God which is not earned, deserved or merited. I believe it is a gratuitous gift of God given by the Spirit as it wills. Still, needless to say that the person who seeks a greater understanding of knowledge can possibly, more readily appreciate the gift of contemplation than the unenlightened mind. In the words of Dermot A. Lane «God is co-experienced and co-known through the different experiences and knowledge of the human subject.» (11)

God is present to us from the outset in all our experiences. With Thomas Aquinas, we would want to hold that God is known implicitly in everything that is known. Also, Lane quotes Schillebeeks as saying: «God is the transcendent third in all our human experiences and above all in our interpersonal relationships.» (12) Still, it is important to stress the fact that God takes the initiative in all experiences involving Him and the created world. The point I am making is the need for man to do the groung work by nourishing his mind with appropriate knowledge which may better prepare him for the possibility of a mystical experience.

Models of dedication to the Ministry of Education.

None of the developments outlined above can take place in a Catholic school without the guidance of outstanding, knowledgeable and dedicated teachers, teachers who are proud of their profession and are willing to give their best. The Victorine school to which Hugh belongs, to my mind, exemplifies the attribute of exceptional dedication of staff and faculty to the cause of education. First, its founder, William de Champeaux is a professor of repute at Notre Dame in Paris (†1122). Secondly, the School produced luminaries such as Adam of St Victor (†1192) who was the poet of the school; Archard (†1171) a spiritual writer who wrote treatises on the Trinity as well as on Christology to mention a few, not to mention the illustrious and famous sons in the person of our hero, Hugh and Richard of St Victor, the latter of whom is a student of the former.

It is my contention that the role of teachers cannot be overestimated in bringing the students to a greater knowledge of God. And this is especially true of the Catholic school. For «Catholicism knows that man is so essentially social that his capacity for a human life can only be actualised through living with others and that the more rational a truly human society is, the better it will be for the individual development of any and all of his potentials including the religious.» (13)

In addition, the Fathers of the Vatican Council realise the importance of having similar calibre of men and women as teachers in the Catholic school when then say: «Priests, religious and laymen carefully chosen and prepared for their task should provide permanent centres of guidance, spiritual and intellectual for the students. Special interest should be taken in young men of outstanding abilities whether they be students of Catholic or other universities who seem to be suited to teaching or research and they should be encouraged to adopt academic careers.» (14). Other important persons in history have exalted the ministry of teachers notably amongst them is the Founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, John Baptist de La Salle. By his life he showed how important it is to spend one's life generously in the task of education of youth. (15) Not only that, he vigorously exhorts school masters, his disciples, later called "Brothers" to give all their lives to the ministry which is God's calling for them. He writes in his meditations: «God diffuses the fragrance of His knowledge throughout the world of human ministers. Just as he commanded light to shine out of darkness, so He also kindles the light to shine in the hearts of those whom He has called to announce his word to children, to enlighten them by making the glory of God known to them. Since God in His mercy has given you such a ministry, gain glory before Him by proclaiming His truth to those whom you are called to teach.» (16)

Conclusion:

The acquisition of knowledge, symbolically or otherwise, to be rationalized and internalised need the assistance of capable and generous teachers. It is then that the knowledge acquired can be used as a path towards God. This makes the Christian school relevant in the context of evangelisation today.

IMPLICATIONS

OF THE NEW PEDAGOGY

FOR TODAY'S EDUCATOR

1. Respect for the person is the basis for a proper understanding of the student.

– Promote integral and harmonious development.

– Recognize and promote originality.

– Help the student toward a rapid and progressive adaptation.

– Be optimistic, observing, understanding and discreet.

2. Encourage self-activity in the student.

– Stimulate and form attitudes and habits.

– Concern for the interior activity of the mind must be a priority.

– Avoid superficial activism.

– Foster depth, reflection, critical examination in the student.

– Avoid nervous agitation, doing for doing's sake.

– Give him/her a taste for work well done.

3. Be a guide, not a teacher.

–The title is EDUCATOR: "E-ducere" = draw out from within, stimulate, awaken, motivate...

– Pedagogue: one always present to accompany, neither in front of nor behind, but beside.

4. Begin from the keenest interests of the students.

– Have an interesting program which is adequately motivated.

– Equidistant from a pedagogy of pleasure (what I want) and the pedagogy of duty for duty's sake.

– Not the avoidance of effort, but drawing out well motivated personal effort.

5. Keep the school in contact with life.

– Establish intimate contact with the reality being lived by the student.

– Don't give ready-made what can be discovered by the student.

– Let observation and experimentation substitute for the book.

– Stimulate the development of critical examination.

6. Make the class into a true community.

– Create a family-like atmosphere of educational spontaneity.

– Encourage work in groups and teams.

TO EVANGELISE THE POOR...

TO EVANGELISE EVERYBODY

Jesus evangelised everybody

When people who are obviously inspired by the Gospel say that the Church has made "a preferential option for the poor", we feel reassured because we know that it is the poor who are called to the Kingdom of God. This was what was meant by the parable of the guests who were invited to the wedding feast but who did not come because their hearts were full and "rich" with other concerns.

And yet, when Our Lord sent his Apostles to evangelise he told them quite clearly: «All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Go, therefore, make disciples of all the nations; baptise them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teach them to observe all the commands I gave you» (Mt 28, 18-20). «Go out to the whole world; proclaim the Good News to all creation. He who believes and is baptised will be saved; he who does not believe will be condemned» (Mk 16, 15-16). «You will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you, and then you will be my witnesses not only in Jerusalem but throughout Judea and Samaria, and indeed to the ends of the earth» (Ac 1, 8).

Jesus evangelised all those he met on his way. Some had no material possessions, probably most, in fact. Others, like Zaccheus for example, had possessions. He called even one of the better off people of the time to be his Apostle – Matthew the tax collector. He evangelised the centurion who had great wealth and which he had invested profitably... And one cannot doubt that his evangelisation bore good fruit.

However, when he wanted to give John a proof of his divine mission, he said to him: «The Good News is proclaimed to the poor» (Mt 11, 5). Were not "all" evangelised?

All must be evangelised

Yes, all were evangelised; but in some the Word did not produce any fruit because they "were rich", because their hearts were already filled, occupied. «The one who received the seed in thorns is the man who hears the word, but the worries of this world and the lure of riches choke the word and so he produces nothing» (Mt 13, 22). The ones who bear fruit are the poor, those whose hearts are ready to receive the Word of God; «Go back and tell John.. the Good News is proclaimed to the poor».

And whom are we, the disciples of Jesus, to evangelise: the poor or everybody?

I think the answer is given very clearly in the Gospel: we must proclaim the Word of God to all without distinction. The fruit that God produces in the hearts of all will follow. If a person does not produce fruit, it is a sign that he is not poor and that it will be difficult for him to enter the Kingdom: «It will be hard for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven» (Mt 19, 23).

It should be quite clear, however, that riches are not only money and material goods. There are persons who have neither money nor goods, and yet they are rich in worries, desires, dreams and ambitions! In these too the Word does not grow because «the worries of this world... choke the word». On the other hand, there are people who have money and goods but whose hearts are not blinded: they are capable of receiving the Word of God, and it produces fruit. For example: Matthew, Zaccheus and the centurion.

The Christian school evangelises without discrimination

When John Baptist de La Salle founded his schools they were schools for the poor. They were free schools which provided education and evangelisation for those who could not afford to pay for the teaching they received. As for the others who had money, they already went to other schools and paid for their education.

De La Salle's free schools, however, soon became known for the quality of their education: the children in them learnt and made progress. When people became aware of this, they said to themselves: "Why spend money in fee-paying schools when you can learn the same things and even more in the Brothers' school which is free?" And so children began transferring from the fee-paying schools to the Christian schools.

This gave rise to conflict: the Brothers' school was beginning to take in pupils who were not poor and who could pay tuition fees. At school, no one was asked if he could pay or not. This meant that the fee-paying schools were losing their clientele. There were complaints.

The solution arrived at by the authorities was that pupils had to be poor to be able to attend the Brothers' school (Decision of the Grand Chantre of Paris, February 14th 1704, during the third court case against their schools). The parish priest was to provide a certificate of poverty. This solution did not satisfy De La Salle. His schools were free, of course, but they were open to all who wished to come. De La Salle did not want any discrimination. It was the court decision which imposed it, and not the Brothers.

For John Baptist, gratuity was the key principle. The Brothers of the Christian Schools conducted "free schools". They consecrated themselves to God «in order to conduct gratuitous schools, together and by association, in whatever place, even when in order to do this I were to be obliged to beg for alms and to live on bread only, or to do in the said society the work I am given...» (Formula of perpetual profession, June 6th 1694).

It is obvious that the poor will go to a free school, since they cannot go to a fee-paying school. But what is to prevent those who are not poor from going there also?

This is what happened in the Brothers' schools and what caused the writing masters of Paris to bring court cases against the Founder (1690, 1698, 1704-1706).

* * *

When gratuity is impossible...

Throughout the history of the Institute, gratuity has been a subject that has been fought about.

«The Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools is a Society in which profession is made of conducting schools gratuitously» (first Rules, ch. 1, art. 1). «The Brothers will conduct schools gratuitously everywhere, and this is essential for their Institute» (first Rules, ch. 7, art. 1).

That is the will of the Institute. Unfortunately, the social and political situation in many countries makes this unfeasible or impossible. The only schools that are free are those organised by the public authorities, using money contributed by all the citizens. Schools run by other people must be self-supporting, that is, charge tuition fees. Citizens who do not choose the State schools are aware of this and are resigned to the fact they have to pay. A few countries give equal financial support to all teaching establishments, recognising thus that they all provide the same public service.

What is the consequence of this politico-social attitude? If you want to be able to provide teaching, very often there is no other solution than to charge fees. This is against gratuity.

So this is the dilemma: give up schools or give up gratuity... If you have no schools you cannot evangelise. If you have schools without gratuity, access to them, is often barred, or very restricted, where the poor and the most needy are concerned. And if there is no gratuity, how do you put into practice the preferential option for the poor?

* * *

Contradiction or realism?

What the Institute has done in such cases throughout its history has been to get as close as possible to gratuity. Quite often this has been done by asking for a token payment only for tuition, or by making it free by means of scholarships set up by the schools themselves. However, some had to pay.

This is something of a compromise which causes problems for those who would like a radical solution: complete gratuity, «even if it were necessary to live on bread alone...»; a gratuity which would make possible total and absolute commitment to the most needy and the most poor.

Could this be possible?

Let us return to the point we started from: should we evangelise and educate only the poor, or everybody?

The answer is not complicated: everybody!

If social situations do not make it possible to do so gratuitously, at least let us not stop evangelising and educating. While waiting for these socio-political situations to change (because one day they will have to change!), we cannot indulge in discrimination as we sow the Word of God.

* * *

The preferential option for the poor

The preferential option for the poor does not mean that the "non-poor" have to be excluded from evangelisation. It means that the poor are a priority, but not that the "less poor" should be abandoned.

My "preferential" option for the poor means also finding the poor wherever I evangelise. Discovering the poor means finding those lacking something: affection, parents, intelligence, qualities, human resources... If I look for them with the eyes of faith, I will find the poor in all groups.

This is not an escape clause to tranquilise our conscience. The Declaration on the Brother of the Christian Schools in the world today says the following: «This fidelity requires in the first place a change of attitude so that we can see, for example, in our ordinary classes how many poor students there are and how we can help them or, even more importantly, how we can better direct our teaching of religion so that all our students become sensitive to the problems of the poor» (N°. 29, 2).

If this is our attitude, then the following words of De La Salle will make sense: «We are poor Brothers, forgotten by the world and esteemed of no importance. Only the poor come to us, and they have nothing to offer but their hearts prepared to receive our instructions» (Med. 86, 2).

Let us proclaim our mesage to all without discrimination as Jesus did. God will produce fruit in the poor of hearts, and we will be able to say constantly: «That is the sign of our ministry: the poor are evangelised».

TO TEACH... TO EDUCATE...

Lord,
You have called us to be ministers in the work of education
To procure your glory,
To inspire children
With the spirit of wisdom and light;
So that they may come to know You.

Our mission is:
To teach and to bear witness,
To concern ourselves with the spiritual needs of our pupils
To bring them up in the Christian faith, each according to his age,
To take more care of the poorer and less-gifted pupils.

Lord, you wish us to be True professionals in the field of education,
But above all, to be Christian educators;
To teach our subjects competently,
And give a Christian education through faith.

We will never become true Christian teachers
Till we dedicate ourselves, body and soul,
To the work of giving a complete education
To young people and children.
We need to fill ourselves with God
In order to make him known.
We need to continue our own education
In order to teach others worthily.
We need to give our time
To be able to go forward together in the faith.
Forgive us, Lord,
For all the times we have neglected
To prepare our catechisms properly;
For all the times we have sought ourselves
Instead of seeking your Kingdom; for all the times we have not shared
Our time and affectionate care
Because we were too concerned about ourselves
And our own comfort.

Lord,
Give us the strength to watch over
The conduct and behaviour of our pupils:
We are responsible for these children
For their persons and for their faith.
We must guide them
So that they live as good Christians.

Lord,
To be a Christian teacher
Is to do and say everything
For God and for the good
Of children and young people.
It is to do this without seeking
The approval or gratitude of others
But thinking only of serving God.

To be a minister of the Gospel implies:
- Zeal for teaching,
- Virtuous living and witness
- Prudence and moderation,
- Patience and affection,
- Control over one's passions,
- Good judgment
when reprimanding or punishing.

We wish to work for the extension of the Kingdom.

THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOL

Lord,
Thank you for the Christian school,
Because, thanks to its existence,
Children and young people grow in faith and piety.
Thank you, Lord,
For bestowing the gift of the Christian School
Upon your Church,
And through it, extending your Kingdom.

Lord,
Your goodness is so great,
That you have sent us as your apostles and teachers
To bring about the salvation of souls.
Our greatest prize and reward, Lord,
Is to know you and love you.
It is our joy to make others know you,
And to make children and young people follow you.
We are your servants,
But you have made us your sons.
You have sent us to work in your vineyard

To preach your Kingdom.
Give us the generosity and the dedication we need
Not to bury your talents
But to sow your seed open-handedly.

Lord,
What joy it is to see you loved
By those who have received our message.
For it is in you alone, Lord,
That we wish to glory, as the Apostle says.
We are happy to extend your Kingdom
And to preach your Gospel freely.
Count on us to instruct children and young people
In the truths of the Gospel.
Count on us, even though we know this is difficult to do.

Your work, Lord,
Cannot be completed in one day,
In a period of time:
It is a life's work.
It is not enough for us, Lord,
To proclaim the Gospel only to children:
We must work also
With young people and adults.
To persevere in piety and faith in Jesus
Needs much time:
Time to sow, to water, to hoe and to fertilize.

Teach us, Lord,
To proclaim YOUR word and not our own.
Teach us, Lord,
To speak the words of YOUR Gospel and not those of our own.
Lord,
You founded the Christian Schools
To instruct children and young people:
Send us, Lord,
New teachers and new De La Salle Brothers
So that we can pursue the work of salvation
Among the children and young people of our day.

STARS

Lord,
We are happy to be your apostles,
We are happy to work for your Kingdom.
We could never be happy to save simply ourselves.
The joy of sharing
In the education of children and young people.
Makes up for all the problems
We experience in teaching.

Our mission is to instruct and educate
Children to be pious;
Our mission is to train them in the Christian spirit;
Our mission and our glory
Is to make them know and love you,
Christ Our Lord.

Lord,
The prophet Daniel said:
«Those who instruct many people to be just
Will shine as stars for all eternity».
Our glory and our joy are not measured
By external results,
But by the children and young people
That we lead to God.

Our joy, Lord, is to proclaim your message;
Our joy, Lord, is to see children and young people Believe in you;
Our joy, Lord, is to pursue our God-given vocation;
Our joy, Lord, is to see children and young people
Going to you;
Our joy, Lord, is to share your Word.

In this life, you fill us with your joy by your presence.
How boundless will our joy be
In the glory of Heaven;
You, Lord, enter into the very depths of our soul.
Fill us, Lord, with yourself
So that we can share you with others.

Teach us to keep our pupils innocent;
Teach us to share in the salvation of their souls;
Teach us to be their guardian angels;
Teach us to work generously for their salvation.

When we die, Lord,
And find ourselves in your presence
Surrounded by those
Who reached your Kingdom before us,
We hope you will welcome us by saying:
«These men – these De La Salle Brothers,
Are the servants of the Most High.
They have worked for the Kingdom,
Proclaiming the way of Salvation».

At that decisive meeting, Lord,
You will judge us by the love we have shown:
- By our dedication to the work of education;
- By our generous sharing;
- By our willingness to announce your message;
- By our fraternity and community life;
- By the time we have devoted
To being with young people;
- By our example and the witness we have borne.

Thank you, Lord,
For my vocation as a De La Salle Brother.

NEW EVANGELISATION

(2)

At the end of our previous article (cf. 20-17–D-51), we showed how our Institute's desire to be «a presence of the evangelising Church» in the world of today had led the Brother capitulants of 1986 to launch the great worldwide plan of the Lasallian Family. They did so in response to the invitation of the Pope to enter fully into this new phase of Church history which is that of the "New Evangelisation".

1. THE PROMOTION OF THE CHRISTIAN LAITY

The Institute has understood that this New Evangelisation cannot be done without the laity. What is more, thanks to the action of the Holy Spirit, the laity will play the leading part in this Church action.

For this reason, the Institute has made a serious commitment to promote the Christian laity (cf. Rule 17). It is by means of this promotion that the Institute means to contribute to the preparation of the vineyard workers invited by the Lord, in the context of the New Evangelisation, to work for the building of the Kingdom of God (cf. AA 33; LFL 2).

In fact, promoting the Christian laity means to «accompany, sustain and educate numerous groups of Christians – above all Christian educators who wish to derive their inspiration from De La Salle in order to grow as men and women of faith, at the service of the local Church, and as people particularly committed to the field of education» (Circ. 422, p. 13).

The promotion of the Lasallian laity has thus become one of the priorities of the Institute for the final ten years of the 20th century in order:

1, to make more effective the ministry of Christian education, a mission entrusted to the Institute by the Church. «Thanks to this integration of Brothers and lay people working together in a common ministry, our schools will be better and we will be able to offer a service of greater quality to the Church» (Circ. 422, p. 13).

2. to contribute to the vitality of the Church by leading authentic Christian communities of faith made up of Lasallian lay people. «We are of the opinion that all establishments and Lasallian groups should be moving in the direction of becoming such communities of faith, each organising its own life, its own pace and its own ways of expressing itself, and working with the local Church. (Letter to the Lasallian Family, p. 24).

2. A DEEP SPIRITUAL RENEWAL

It is clear this process cannot take place unless certain requirements are fulfilled. We shall mention just two of these:

The most obvious one is that the Institute will not be able to succeed in this great enterprise without a deep spiritual renewal on the part of the Brothers. As early as 1966, the General Chapter, the Chapter of renewal, had laid down this pre-condition. We should re-read and meditate again on the marvellous section 3 of the Declaration which describes for us what spiritual renewal consists in. Rather than reproduce such a long text, we include just the first idea: «For a person to renew himself spiritually, he must first be aware that it is the Holy Spirit who brings about the renovation of men and of institutions».

That is why the 1986 General Chapter launched once again «an urgent call to conversion – a conversion which will come about through both personal renewal and through a re–founding of our mission» (Circ. 422, p. 20). The Brother capitulants noted «signs of a disturbing loss of spiritual vitality» and wondered if we should not «commit ourselves even further to our quest for God». In this connection, they recalled the words of the Founder: «You must be holy, uncommonly so».

Basically what they ask of us is to be more authentic:

* in our witness: «The first apostolate of the Brothers consists in the witness of their consecrated life» (Rule 24; cf. EN 21).

* in our community life: «The Brothers make every effort to model their community life on the relations of knowledge and love that constitute the life of the Holy Trinity» (Rule 48).

* in prayer: «Each Brother has the primary responsibility for his personal prayer. Each one and all together are responsible for community prayer» (Rule 72).

* in our apostolic commitment: «As ambassadors and ministers of Jesus Christ, the Brothers participate in the Church's mission by consecrating their lives to God in order to bring the Gospel to the educational world» (Rule 12).

Ever since his first Pastoral Letter, Brother Superior General has never ceased to insist on this most important aspect of conversion and spiritual transformation. He invites us to be truly men of faith and of prayer, zealous in our apostolate, having a preferential love for the poor, sharing our mission with lay people, sensitive to the problems of the world and allowing ourselves «to be impressed» by human suffering.

In this context, the words of Paul VI in "Evangelii Nuntiandi" (N° 8) are admirable: «There can be no new humanity if there are not first men new with the newness of baptism (cf. Rm 6, 4) and with life according to the Gospel (cf. Ep. 4, 23-24; Col 3, 9-10)».

3. NEW RELATIONS WITH LAY PEOPLE

The second requirement (implicit in what we have been saying) is a radical change in our relations with lay people.

There is no doubt that a noticeable evolution has come about with regard to this in the Institute. If certain texts are examined and comparisons made, for example, between that of the 1946 General Chapter (cf Circ. 318, p. 90) and those of the 1986 General Chapter, it will be clear that in the space of 40 years some extraordinary changes in language have occurred. That is already something, but has this been matched by a similar change in attitude towards the laity by the Brothers? In this area, progress has not really been noticeable, although we should not paint too black a picture. We could say rather that we are in the process of making continuous progress in the improvement of these relations.

Care has to be taken to formulate correctly the question of changing our relations with lay people. If we are to turn to the laity and look upon them differently, it is not principally, as some say, because there is a scarcity of vocations in certain parts of the Institute, or that the number of Brothers has decreased dramatically. These are undeniable facts which may have provided the catalyst, but they are not the fundamental reason.

The principle and basis are of a theological order. It is part of the new ecclesiology which was encouraged by Vatican II. The bishops at the 1985 Synod said the following: «The ecclesiology of communion is the central and fundamental concept of the Council... The ecclesiology of communion is also the foundation of order in the Church and above all of a correct relationship between uniformity and pluriformity in the Church» (Final Report, C, 1).

This ecclesiology of communion is then one that affirms the fundamental equality between all the members of the People of God, as well as the diversity and complementarity of vocations, states of life, ministries, charisms and responsibilities within this People (cf. LLF 20).

It is this ecclesiology that highlights the importance of the laity within the Church, and what has returned to it its important position of responsibility in the latter's mission after centuries of overwhelming and sterilising "clericalism", for which we Brothers had some responsibility.

This new vision of the Church as a communion brought about great changes in the community and government structures of religious congregations when the Chapters of renewal called for by the Council took place. It gave rise quite naturally to a new style of relationship with lay people.

I am not saying anything new when I point out that not all in the Church (bishops, priests, religious, lay people) are equally in tune with the Council documents. Many, through indifference or lack of time, have neither read nor studied thoroughly this rich Council teaching. When the 1985 Synod bishops assessed the extent to which the second Vatican Council had been accepted, they noted in all honesty «the need to accept the Council at a much deeper level. This acceptance has to pass necessarily through four successive levels: a more extensive and deep understanding of the Council, its internal assimilation, its reaffirmation in love, its translation into actions in life» (Final Report I, 5).

This surely means that we Brothers too should further deepen our theological studies of the ecclesiology of communion so as to better undestand the present-day movement of the Institute towards the laity in order to be more creative in our practical approach to the «shared mission», and towards the more enthusiastic and more convinced leaders of lay groups which form part of the Lasallian Family.

The consequence of the ecclesiology of communion for us Brothers is that in our educational communities and in the exercise of the ministry of education we are not superior to the laity. It is on the basis of equality and respect for our respective identities that we must share tasks and responsibilities with them (cf. Rule 17a), and joyfully associate them with our educational awareness of being members of the Church of Jesus Christ and of participating in his mystery of communion and his apostolic and missionary energy» (LLF 64).

THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE CHRISTIAN EDUCATOR TODAY

BASIS OF THAT SPIRITUALITY

Christocentric and Evangelical

* Christ the Son of God come to earth offers Himself as the strength and model of his disciples. His words and example are the basic criteria for all believers:

– Those who wish to participate in His Kingdom and salvation which are open to all men, for He gave Himself for all.

– Those who receive the Divine Call (vocation) to consecrate themselves without reserve to work for His Kingdom which extends throughout the whole world.

The Christian Educator should know that he is a witness and apostle of that same Christ.

* By Baptism he is incorporated into Christ. He bears within himself the commitment to announce salvation and conversion. Baptismal spirituality becomes a challenge for those who feel themselves called to the service of others.

* Christ says He is the Way, the Truth and the Life.
– As the Way, He indicates the ideal toward which we should strive.
– As the Truth, He establishes Himself as the program which guarantees integral fullness of life.
– As the Life, He offers His own supernatural riches which are His very Person.

The sense of Community within the work of Jesus.

* The Church is the work of Jesus which He left us when He returned to the Father so that it might be the guide and support of our search for truth and goodness. To live the spirit of the Church of Jesus is a necessity for the Christian Educator.

– To participate in the spirit of the Church is to be aware that we are members of the pilgrim People of God who help each other along the way. It is to know that we are members of the Mystical Body which nourishes all its parts.

– To foster life is not just to participate in it. It implies accepting the apostolic challenge and responsibility as they ought to be accepted.

* The Christian educator feels that he is responsible for the well-being of the Church because he knows that it is the work of Christ to which he should contribute his own interior riches.

– The Christian educator is aware that he is sent by the Church.
– He commits himself and accepts responsibility for the good of the Church.
– His own personal spiritual life has meaning only within the context of the Church which nourishes it.

* Love for the Hierarchy of the Church as a source of inspiration; because the true believer sees the signs of Providence in the real persons who incarnate the service of authority.

– Inspiration is sought in the Pope who has the mission of directing the Church and of confirming the faith of his brothers.
– Held in respect also are the Bishops and ministers who are most committed to the work of salvation because they are like "sacraments of God in the midst of men".

Attitude of continuous conversion and continuous improvement.

* This attitude is sustained by the loving awareness of Divine Providence which we know can be found in all the circumstances of life, even the most adverse.

* Christian Virtues are appreciated as instruments which draw us ever closer to God. These virtues become the daily strength which inspires and directs our conduct within the sphere of the educational apostolate.

* Among the virtues, those which most consciously develop the fullest expression of the radicality of the Gospel are:
– the detachment of the poor of the earth
– obedience to the designs of God for our person.
– renunciation of sensual pleasures, as a sanctifying offering.

THE SANCTITY OF THE CHRISTIAN EDUCATOR

SOURCES OF HIS INSPIRATION

1. The Word of God.

It is the light which illumines the educator because it presents him with the Divine Will in the form of the history of salvation.

God speaks of the life of mankind through His works and in them He traces a path of many generous encounters which record Divine intervention in human history.

– The Old Testament: interventions, psalms, hymns, ethical norms, bits of wisdom, prophecies, announcements, hopes.
– The New Testament: parables, discourses, miracles, travels, letters, advice, prophecies.

One who desires holiness is always in an attitude of listening for God to speak.

2. The Tradition of the Church.

It serves as a meeting place within the life of the Mystical Body and of the People of God who are growing in the likeness of Christ.
The Christian is aware that he is a protagonist in the midst of a generous and indestructible people.Therefore he is encouraged by the heroicity of the martyrs, the wisdom of confessors, the purity of virgins, the generosity of the apostles, the conversion of sinners and in the hope inspired by outstanding people.

A holiness isolated from the holiness of the members of the Church would be suspect as fictitious or as individualism.

3. The Magisterium.

The Christian feels diffident, humble and respectful toward those who come to him as the successors of the Apostles to whom Christ confided the spread of the Gospel.

That is why he has recourse to the Popes, past and present, to the Councils, Bishops and the structures of Ecclesial government. He is careful about their directives, accepts their teachings and respects their authority.

4. The Community of Believers.

To participate in the life of the Church is to live the spirit of Community of the Faithful in the firm conviction that the Holy Spirit works therein because Christ clearly promised to send Him to us.

THE CHRISTIAN EDUCATOR GIVES OF HIMSELF TOTALLY

In the name of the Father.
He is aware that he is a son of God and grows in the spirituality of the Son Whom he recognises in others who are also sons of the same Father. All inherit the same eternal destiny, loved by Him Who made all things, cares for all things and makes all things work together unto good.

In the name of the Son.
Who is Christ always present in his life and all its circumstances; Who is the courage which sustains him in all his difficulties and the source of happiness which brings him joy in the friendship of God.

In the name of the Holy Spirit.
It is the Spirit of Love Who gives meaning to his own desire for sanctity and Who bestows the richness of his wonderful Gifts and their magnificent Fruits. The Christian educator feels such a love for the grace of God that he will do anything that others may live by its glorious richness.

THE DYNAMIC ELEMENTS OF THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE CHRISTIAN EDUCATOR

INTERIOR DYNAMICS

ESSENTIAL:

- The spirit of Faith.
  It is manifested by that trust in Divine Providence which impels him to consider all things with reference to God. He is aware that God is present everywhere (Divine Presence) and he knows that all that happens in this life bears the seal of God's action (Divine Providence).

- Hope in God,
  because He has promised to help those who place their trust in His Divine action. Thus, there is no such thing as "failure" for those who trust in God. He knows everything that happens and often leaves the real results hidden while He misteriously preserves the seeds which have been sown in view of the eventual fulfillement of His designs which do not always coincide with the plans of men.

- An ardent zeal for the sons of God, which is the manner in which true charity in incarnated. The love of God in the Christian educator is manifested through his expressions of love for others, especially for those whom Providence has confided to him through his professional work.

COMPLEMENTARY:

- The prayer of the Christian educator which consists in asking that his work to promote human and spiritual values be efficacious and that his trust in God move hearts to truly spiritual results.

- A generous spirit of self-sacrifice which leads him to place no measure on his commitment or his efforts, in the form conviction that God is at work among men and that He relates spiritual results with the sacrifices of those He sends.

- Sufficient humility to recognize that there are limits to what he can do and that he needs the unseen action of Christ Who, in fact, is invisibly present in our midst.

- Disinterested and unflagging courage, which is called fortitude in those who work within the freedom of men and their constant potential for resistance to grace and to the opportunities which are offered to them,

- A clear witness, which brings the educator to speak more through what he is than with eloquent words, giving voice to his virtues, incarnating the Gospel and being the living radiation of Christ Himself.

- Union with the Church, since the educator is aware that he is sent by the Church in the name of Jesus Himself to carry out His missionary mandate to teach the Kingdom of God to all nations.

- Incarnation in his milieu, striving to avoid utopias and unrealistic projects, working to re-produce the mysterious reality of the Incarnation of Christ by his burning desire to be present to men.

- Respect for man whose dignity he contemplates as a desired ideal in each of his students, even in those in whom the image of God seems hidden by intellectual, social and especially moral limitations.

- Unshakeable perseverance composed of fortitude, prudence, order, moderation and professional responsibility, which preserves him from vanity and discouragement and which keeps the flame of his idealism burning brightly.

- Expecting no spectacular results, which is a form of necessary penance for educators, because it is not possible to have worthwhile results if these are only apparent; nor that hearts be profoundly converted to God when they are limited to exterior efforts even when they are designed to help the mind, the conscience or the will to consider the true and the good.

EXTERIOR DYNAMICS

The Christian educator uses his work in education as the basis of his own plan for holiness. He makes no difference between his tending toward holiness and his professional work, because he is convinced that God acts through our daily undertakings.

- For it a duty in conscience to be professionally prepared, generally and specifically, because he realizes that he must offer excellent teaching and education in order to have an evangelical influence on hearts and minds.

- He easily goes beyond the demands of ordinary human culture (literary, scientific, social and academic) and uses everything at his disposal, beginning with information in order to achieve the formation of free individuals, which is, after all, his principal professional objective.

- He speaks about God with simplicity and persuasion, making himself a catechist and evangelizer, convinced that in order to do this he must have God in his own heart.

- He frequently celebrates his faith with the believing community to which he belongs. He also does all he can to bring his disciples to an awareness of the sacramental dimension of Christianity. He himself focuses his spirituality on the Sacraments so that those around him will participate in these signs of grace.

- He is always striving to improve, because his inner richness redounds to the spiritual betterment of his students who imperceptibly weigh his convictions, attitudes and feelings as a committed believer.

- He acts with the community, even in developing his personal devotions, because he knows he is a member of a Church which expresses faith together. For this reason, his prayers, his practices of piety and his traditions have an apostolic radiation because he is aware of his educational influence.

- He always gives the impression of a happy, dynamic and captivating believer through the responsibility he has accepted, through the truly exciting prospect of the Gospel he teaches, and his confidence in the Divine Presence which brings peace, joy in the Spirit and happiness as far as these are possible in this life.

The spirituality of the Christian educator is out-going.

It never closes in upon itself. It is always open to providing excellent educational service to all who come into contact with his person, his life, his thought and his witness. Through his experience, he knows that one educates more by what one is than by what one says. The same thing happens in the order of faith. He communicates more spiritual life through what he personally and genuinely lives than by all the good advice and abstract presentations which he learnedly expounds.

The Christian educator is not afraid to use his personal program for holiness as possible orientations for the sanctification of others. This is merely the logical consequence of his Baptismal awareness and more especially of the marvellous profession with which God has favored him. As a response to this Divine predilection, he places his own spiritual attainments at the service of the sons of God who pass so close to him on their way through life.

SANTIAGO (CHILE)

INAUGURATION OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE SQUARE

On may 15th 1990, on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Brief "Quod ait" by which Pope Pius XII proclaimed St. John Baptist de La Salle «Principal patron before God of all teachers», the town authorities of Reina (which is part of the capital Santiago) inaugurated a square named after this French Saint who in 1680 founded the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

French also are the robes we wear, we religious of this congregation which was the first in the history of the Church to be formed of men committed by vow, but exclusively lay, to devote their lives to education seen as an apostolic service worthy to occupy the whole life of a man and to motivate a life of sanctity.

It was at the request of Mgr Rafael Valentin Valdivieso, archbishop of Santiago, that President Jose Joaquin Perez gave legal status to our congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools in 1862, authorising us to establish ourselves in Chile.

In 1877, the Brothers took over the St. Vincent de Paul Workshops house, founded in 1855 by Mgr Jose Hipolito Salas who had introduced the Society of St. Vincent de Paul to Chile and had been consecrated bishop of Conception in 1854. The members of the community were Brothers Amedee (from Paris), Theophile Justin (from Avignon) and Donatoris (from Quimper). Shortly after, the arrival of a Canadian, Brother Xavier (James Peter Davis Mulhall) strengthened its universal character which is proper to our congregation and the Church. These Brothers belonged to the District of Ecuador, the first Latin American country in which the Brothers established themselves (in 1863). The first Director of this house was Brother Jucondus (from Bordeaux).

Confirmation that the Brothers of the Christian Schools had taken root in Chile came quickly: two younsters, Juan Francisco Rivas and Luis Gonzaga Romero, entered the novitiate and took the habit in 1879. The increasing numbers of those wanting to imitate these religious educators forced the latter to open a house of formation in 1888. Located first in Providencia, it was transferred in 1916 to the countryside of Tobalaba, by the side of a minor road leading from the town to the foot-hills of the Cordillera.

Close to the place where the square, which has just been inaugurated, is located, the Brothers had bought a country house standing in its own property which included gardens and an artificial lake. Its former owner was a Frenchman, a certain M. Hippolyte Pinaud, with whom quite naturally the Brothers were on good terms. The architect Joannon, whose origins were French also and who had a great influence on the architecture of Santiago at that time, built what is now the central building of De La Salle College. Built on land which, since 1963, has been part of the town of Reina, it was intended to house the novitiate, the postulancy, the scholasticate for the professional training of the young Brothers, the residence of the Provincial of the Brothers in Chile and the infirmary for old Brothers. Building began in 1914 and the auxiliary bishop, Mgr Miguel Claro came to bless the building on March 19th 1916, the feast of St. Joseph. It was one of the first buildings in Santiago to be constructed of reinforced concrete. It was in open countryside, several kilometres from the town, a peaceful area where several congregations had come to find tranquillity, and after which a number of streets has been named: the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, the Augustinians, the Mercedarians. On the side of the square there stands the convent built by the Poor Clares, which is now a retreat centre run by Franciscan nuns.

In 1869, Mgr Rafael Valentin Valdivieso had founded the Society of the Catholic Schools of St. Thomas Aquinas which he subsequently entrusted to the Brothers of the Christian Schools along with its schools: St. Luis, San Carlos, Ruiz Tagle, Providencia, Mercedes Guzman and Juan Francisco Bravo. He died in 1878 and one of his sucessors, Mgr Mariano Casanova (responsible in his turn for this vast archdiocese which would be split up only in 1925 when Church and State were separated), entrusted to the care of the Brothers of the Christian Schools the diocesan training college which ran from 1901 to 1925, and then in 1909, the Instituto Arturo Prat de San Felipe, the Instituto Zambrano, and then the Blanco Encalada de Talca School (founded in 1912). This latter school numbered among its pupils the future Cardinal Raul Silva Henriquez, Rafael Retamal, future President of the Supreme Court, Osvaldo Iturriaga (at present the Controller General of the Republic), Sergio Molina (at present the minister in charge of the ODEPLAN). In this and other schools there studied several respected political figures like Luis Pareto (at present Mayor of Santiago), Admiral Jorge Martinez Busch (Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces), and the only chiropractor in the country, Doctor Victor Hugo Aguilera Altamira, a former student of the San Lazaro school, who did specialist studies in the United States.

The work of the Brothers founded by St. John Baptist de La Salle, inspired by the Christian spirit, concentrated in particular on gratuitous schools. And so, in 1889, there were founded the Arturo Edwards de Valparaiso School (its first Director, Brother Gagelinus, was taught for 6 years in Ecuador by Brother Miguel who was recently canonised); the San Vicente de Valparaiso School and the San Vicente de Limache Workshops, which were destroyed during the 1906 earthquake. In 1891, the first Chilean Brother, Br. Gumersindo Vasquez Alamos opened the San Luis Gonzaga School, and the following year the San Carlos de Santiago School was opened. In 1897, a former pupil of the San Vicente de Valparaido School, Brother Luciano (Jose Ismael Turriz), became the first Director of the Manuel Jose Irarrazaval de Santiago School. A former pupil of the Arturo Edwards School, Brother Simeon, taught for 37 years at the Blanco Encalada School (now De La Salle de Talca College) till his death in 1954, having greatly impressed his many former pupils.

The work of St. John Baptist de La Salle has become very well known in the country thanks to the school textbooks produced by the Brothers of the Christian Schools in the H.E.C. Series. Brother Clarence Francois (called Br. Pancho by the pupils) published some very successful arithmetic, algebra and geometry textbooks in the Series under the pseudonym "Omer Cano". The updating of successive editions has been ensured by Br. Cornelio who, at the age of 83, continues to work at the free Arturo Edwards de Valparaiso School. Br. Teodoro Soulie (who had Santiago Bruron, Rene Pienovi and Jose Miguel Silva as his pupils) produced textbooks on the history and geography of Chile in collaboration with other experienced Brothers, thus continuing a tradition that goes back to the beginning of the Institute.

To be present for this occasion, delegations have come to De La Salle College from the Francis de Temuco School (founded in 1955) and from the former Instituto San Jose (founded in 1904 and which also is now called De La Salle College). Pupils have come from Talca but also from our free schools: San Gregorio de La Granja (founded in 1983), the Instituto La Salle de La Florida (founded in 1954), and the San Lazaro de Santiago School (opened in 1955). Pupils and teachers have come who have been inspired by the example and the pedagogical and mystical teachings of St. John Baptist de La Salle. Since 1909 we have been running an agricultural school at Macul, and since 1936 another one in Las Condes, and since 1943 yet another one near Puente Alto. Urban expansion, however, has changed the unspoilt setting and teaching methods.

Brother Leopoldo Galvez Saavedra, who died in 1936, had organised Catholic teachers' associations in Valparaiso and Santiago. Since 1976, a group of lay people who joined together under the name of "Signum Fidei", have been applying to their daily lives the lay spirituality for the service of education formulated by St. John Baptist de La Salle. Our schools have begun taking in girl pupils, and already one of our former pupils has joined the Carmelite missionaries.

After the transfer of the novitiate to Cordoba (Argentina) in 1940 and that of the juniorate to La Florida, successive Directors of De La Salle College have collaborated with the municipal authorities of La Reina (founded in 1963), hence the splendid idea of naming a square in honour of St. John Baptist de La Salle. In the square, a symbolic monument has been erected, the creation of the architect Cesar Lazcano: the three columns at the centre of the monument symbolise the three pillars of the spirituality of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. These three elements they transmit to the pupils, the parents, the teachers, the members of the administrative team and their helpers. Faith is translated into consecration and prayer, the community extends its brotherhood, and their mission urges all on to render apostolic service to others.

3 / 1991

INTRODUCTION

• This issue of Lasalliana, N22, is the last one of 1991. With it, the third year of publication (second period) comes to an end. (After the first period, publication was discontinued for two years.)

• This year, the Institute is celebrating the tercentenary of the heroic vow made by St. John Baptist de La Salle and two of his companions. By it they committed themselves before God and for his greater glory, to support the young Society, and they declared themselves ready to face all sorts of sacrifices resulting from poverty and desertion. This act of generosity was blessed by God and had important consequences for the Church, for evangelisation and education. In this year's three issues we have included a certain number of articles relating to this event, treating it from an historical, spiritual and community point of view.

• This year also saw the publication of the Guide for Formation. This had been asked for by the last General Chapter and the finished product is the fruit of much hard work all over the Institute. This important document will be studied in a variety of articles in future issues of Lasalliana.

• 1991 was likewise the centenary of "Rerum Novarum", an encyclical whose pastoral influence was very great in the sphere of labour relations. Pope John Paul II commemorated the occasion by publishing another striking document, the encyclical "Centesimus annus".

In future issues, we intend to offer some considerations on this matter. Our Institute, in fact, is much involved with working people, either by training students for trades, or running youth associations based on schools or establishments offering technical and vocational teaching.

• This year began shortly after the publication of "Redemptoris Missio" (it appeared on December 7th 1990). This encyclical calls on the Church as a whole to commit itself resolutely and seriously to evangelisation in all parts of the world.

Lasallian schools have to respond to this call. There has already been a number of articles on the subject. Others are in the pipeline for future issues.

• The 42nd General Chapter has been officially announced. This means that the Institute will be preparing for this important event. We too will be considering it.

• As can be seen, all these various topics concern not only the Brothers, but also the Lasallian Family as a whole, that is, all those that belong to movements that have grown up around the Institute and who live according to Lasallian spirituality and the Lasallian charism of Christian education.

Certain Districts have asked for extra copies of Lasalliana so as to be able to supply not only communities, but also Lasallian schools, staffrooms, all kinds of Lasallian associations, affiliated members, collaborators, etc. This will be of great benefit to them. We thank them for the interest they show in this publication and we hope their example will be followed!

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE FOUNDER (4/5)

The St Sulpice's area

In the area around St Sulpice to which the Brothers came, the poor lived in the same tenements as artisans and traders. But the Brothers also became aware, as they got to know the area and walked daily to their schools, of the comfort, elegance, wealth and ostentation that others enjoyed. Even if they took their weekly walk into the country, they passed by brand new "hôtel" of the rich and noble. The domes of great new royal buildings drew their attention. Unsophisticated as most of the Brothers and later novices were, they would "stand and stare"; how more appreciated and leisurely a life these people must lead, compared with theirs.

In teaching them how to adopt the life of faith and views of faith, it is not surprising that their Founder suggested to these beginners that «if we would look upon a beautiful building with the eyes of faith, we should remember that its beauty is external; that its end is only to please the senses, and that this beauty is only a passing thing of such little stability and duration, that there shall not remain a stone upon a stone, nor any idea of it.» By his upbringing, he was sensitive to beauty and the value of things, but he had to begin where his novices were; he was also aware of the adulation and imitation of royal gloryseeking that the new buildings represented and indifference to the poor.

Other southern suburbs

The suburb of Saint Jacques, south of the Latin Quarter, had developed since the beginning of the century, for many religious houses and hospices had been built there in open country, able to be surrounded by large gardens and cultivated plots.

Half a mile south of the walls of the Latin Quarter Anne of Austria had founded in 1621, along the Rue Saint-Jacques, the Benedictine monastery of Val de Grace in fulfilment of a vow when her son Louis XIV was born. The present monastic buildings rose from 1645 to 1665, with a great dome over the chapel.

They are now part of the army training hospital. Just further on, on the other side of the road, the convent of Port-Royal was transferred here to new buildings in 1625. They are now a maternity hospital; Mother Angélique Arnauld is still buried in the chapel. Such buildings attracted the artisans and buyers and sellers of all kinds, and the poor looking for a job.

Further east was the growing suburb of Saint Marcel and north of it, on the west side of the Latin Quarter, that of Saint Victor.

Half a mile southeast of Val de Grace there still is (opposite the Metro Gobelins) the "manufacture des Gobelins", the royal factory founded by Colbert to turn out tapestries, gilt furniture and the like for the Crown instead of having to depend on foreign imports. 700 highly qualified workers were employed, many of them Flemish or Italian, and the Catholics went to the church of St Hippolyte.

This was a little to the north, between the Rue des Gobelins and the present Boulevard Arago, but disappeared in 1798. The parish grew throughout the century, and we shall see La Salle sending two Brothers to run the parish school in 1698, and even opening a training-centre for village schoolmasters. The school was originally on the Rue Broca, which crosses the Rue Saint Hippolyte.

Another half mile eastwards along the present Boulevard Saint Marcel brings you to the great hospital of La Pitié-Salpétrière, next to the Gare d'Austerlitz, and that was used, under edict from Louis XIV in 1656, to confine beggars and the homeless. In other words, it became a workhouse. Children also were confined under the Board; their policy towards the children of the poor and La Salle's were at variance.

LOUIS XIV'S MARK ON THE CAPITAL.

There had been much development in the capital, therefore, in the decades before Louis XIV's time, and that continued afterwards. But Louis also left his own mark: although he left Paris in 1682, he was interested in a capital that would reflect his greatness and maintain his prestige with the Parisians, and he had the good fortune to be served by some very great architects.

Christopher Wren who did much to rebuild London after the fire of 1666, came to Paris from 1663 to 1666; the Louvre for a time was his daily study, where (he wrote) the activities in extending it «make a school of architecture, the best probably at this day in Europe.»

The boulevards

Louis had the old walls of the capital pulled down; the ramparts or boulevards in front of them were flattened and made into long tree-lined avenues to which the name boulevard was transferred. This began for the eastern half of the northern walls in 1670, and was taken up again in 1684. The walls around the Latin quarter began to be pulled down in 1672, so that La Salle would notice this remarkable change when he returned in 1688.

But the simple bank of earth further out, no further south than the present Boulevard du Montparnasse, and that corresponded in size to the northern arc of walls, only began to be planted in 1705, and not much was completed by 1715. The Metro Duroc, in other other words, close to the present Brothers' Centre in the Rue de Sèvres, marks a southwest point on this limit; there would have been few buildings yet in the area: the hospital for incurables, now part of the Laennec Hospital (the chapel dates from 1663); further up, where the Bon Marché stores are, were the "Petites Maisons" or Little Houses, where the Poor Board catered for 500 poor old women and 300 others variously diseased, including the senile.

The new northern boulevards provided splendid walks for all classes of the town, being only a quarter of an hour's walk from its centre. In 1670 also Louis had the open space beyond the Tuileries made into a wide tree-lined avenue that has become the Champs-Elysées.

The "Invalides"

For the retired and wounded veterans of his armies he built the great Hôtel des Invalides, west of the suburb of St Germain. It was, in reality, an enforced residence in a building exalting Louis's military victories, for wounded and sick veterans to keep them off the streets. The officers, except the highest, were three or four to a room, the private soldiers to a far greater number. The hospital wards were tended by Sisters of Charity. Everything was run on monastic lines. The great gilt dome was not begun till the turn of the century.

Louis had the small circular Place des Victoires northeast of the gardens of the Palais Royal, laid out in 1685, and that year the Pont Royal, linking the Louvre to the south bank, was begun.

Because of the Pont Royal and the Hôtel des Invalides, Saint Germain came into favour, and the aristocracy moved there from Le Marais. Things were changing in this district; more people were coming in, there were more jobs of all kinds – the poor still remaining poor.

Changing character of the capital

Paris at the end of the century within its new boulevards, already planted or still projected, together with the suburb of Saint Antoine on the eastern side, and new suburbs beginning to push out from the north, was a city of perhaps half a million inhabitants; it had moved from being a medieval walled town at the beginning of the century to having the first appearance of a modern sprawling metropolis. Even though much slower than in our day, it was a time of change.

The atmosphere of public life had also changed. When La Salle took two Brothers with him to Paris in 1688, Louis XIV's period of direct rule had lasted nearly thirty years, during which he had created a system of unchanging absolute government. While his domination of western Europe was coming to an end, nothing changed in his cultivation of his personal glory and its radiation over society. The emblem of the Sun King was on the doors of his palace at Versailles, and he instituted a punctilious etiquette from his rising to his retiring that created an atmosphere of worship in which the great nobles fawned on him, and being kept at court were rendered harmless and useless.

His improvements to the royal palaces and his creation of new squares in his honour were met with adulation. When the statue to him in the Place des Victoires was erected, representing Renown placing a laurel wreath on his brow, one of his greatest flatterers went round the statue three times at the head of a regiment of guards. «He had the ridiculous idea of establishing perpetual lamps to light up the statue day and night.» (Abbé de Choisy.)

Court life

Louis loved magnificence and obliged the nobles continually to impoverish themselves buying magnificent costumes for themselves and their wives. Saint-Simon says that on one occasion it cost him 20,000 livres. Court life was artificial, boring and idle as the great nobles waited around hoping for pensions, posts and other royal favours. Yet it enchanted and dazzled contemporaries. It created a totally false atmosphere and led the aristocracy and the upper bourgeoisie to build in Paris and elsewhere palaces or town houses in keeping with their rank and wealth. The present Carnavalet Museum in Le Marais, in one of the palaces Mme de Sevigné lived in, gives an idea, through its paintings and furniture, of the status-conscious style of costume and living of the "yuppies" of the late seventeenth century, for whom, however, place in society mattered more than wealth.

The great thing was what rank of people you associated with, what salons you attended, whose notice and patronage you might get. The wage-earning poor had no part in this. New jobs would be created, paid wretchedly; manual work was despised, and so was this rabble. Yet they would envy those above them. La Salle saw his work both as lifting the poor out of their inhuman, unjust situation and yet leading them to live by Christian values, including evangelical poverty. And in a culture where status mattered and where the hard work of teaching the poor was despised, the Founder had to lead his Brothers to live by the light of faith.

In his last recommendations to them he wrote: «If you wish to persevere and die in your state of life, never have any dealings with society people; for little by little you will acquire a taste for their ways of doing, and you will be drawn into their conversation to such an extent that you will not be able, through policy to refrain from applauding what they say, very harmful though it may be. This will cause you to fall into unfaithfulness, and being no longer faithful in observing your Rules, you will lose taste for your condition and finally you will abandon it.» He had seen it happen; somehow Brothers got into conversation with people whose dress, style of life, knowledge, and experience of the world was so much better than theirs; who could often only express their regret that the Brothers were not using their talents elsewhere than in classrooms crowded with ragammuffins; who regretted their hard life or their fidelity to the Pope or their rejection of Jansenist ideas. These well-placed, well-spoken people could unsettle the Brothers. As their education improved, – a result in time of the widening educational opportunities the Brothers themselves pioneered and developed – theywould be able to place in better perspective what society believed in and answer it. But they would derive most support from their faith that their work was a ministry of basic importance to the Church and to society.

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE FOUNDER (5/5)

THE ROYAL HAND ON ADMINISTRATION AND JUSTICE IN THE CAPITAL

La Salle, having a very different experience of social life, sensed more than the Brothers the false aura of adulation of the monarchy and the cult of status. But he also soon realised – and to his cost and that of the Brothers – that since his student days in Paris the hand of the monarch over every sphere of administration had become heavier, and that people could not protest without danger of immediate imprisonment. Far more than in provincial Rheims, the power of the king was strongly felt in Paris, since nearly all the judicial and administrative departments of the kingdom were concentrated in the "Palace" on the island of Notre-Dame. The present "palais" gives little idea of the original complex, due to four ruinous fires since 1618, and demolitions under the pretext of modernisation.

Royal agencies of law and order

All posts were delegations of the king's justice; all royal office-holders were magistrates, for all forms of government of the country were seen as functions of law and order, and all the royal departments were in fact courts. All the decrees came from the king: the courts merely applied these and existing royal law. There was the Great Council (which sat at the Louvre), the high court of appeal, for the greatest cases affecting the king's rights. The next most important court was the Parlement of Paris, with a jurisdiction covering the whole of northern France except Brittany. Princes of the blood and peers lay and ecclesiastical had the right to be members. This Court registered and promulgated royal acts; it controlled all those in public functions in its area and had the overall responsibility for law and order, involving Paris and its suburbs. There were five other departments or courts: they comprised between 350 and 400 magistrates and court officials who were often seen in the streets of Paris in their robes of a strict hierarchy of colours and quality.

The Châtelet

A more immediate centre of law and order for the Paris region lay north of the Palace, the other side of the Pont au Change. It was the Châtelet, a name meaning small castle or fortress, for as such it had been built in 1190. Now it was a centre of justice under a royal provost: the Châtelet came to mean the body of courts and departments which operated there. It published royal decrees for the region; it was a court of appeal; it dealt with property leases and wages; it inspected the "Halles" and other markets and hostelries. It had a crime section and a department for highway crime. It had several lieutenants, the most important being the civil lieutenant; 48 superintendants inspected the different quarters of Paris. Its criminal court dealt savagely, according to the practice of the times, with those caught red-handed. It was normal to interrogate under torture. John Evelyn describes in his diary under March 11th, 1651, how a man accused of robbery was first racked and then had two buckets of water poured down his throat through a horn. According to the crime, a person could have his ears cut off, or be sent to the galleys, or burnt alive, or have all his bones smashed before being spread-eagled round a cartwheel laid on the floor and finally being stabbed to the heart.

The lieutenant of police

In 1667 Louis XIV eased the burden of the civil lieutenant, but also brought the function under his control, by creating two new royal posts (that had to be bought): that of civil lieutenant dealing only with civil matters, and that of lieutenant of police, seeing to general policing of the capital, which meant its security and administration generally: seeing to law and order, cleansing of streets and public places, the capital's food supply and prices. He was responsible for religious, social and economic affairs and control of public behaviour; he was the judge in final appeal of beggars and people of no fixed abode. It was in fact a ministry for Paris. Kept in touch by his 48 superintendants, their sub-officers and sergeants, and by informers and spies, the lieutenant of police always knew what was going on. The post was made effective by its having two long-serving, able incumbents: La Reynie from 1667 to 1697, and d'Argenson from 1697 to 1715.

Lettres de cachet

These two often had a hard and cruel task to perform, for thieves, crooks and hired killers acted in daylight but especially at night, and hid in the suburbs. But they softened or even avoided carrying out some of the pitiless orders coming from the king, Colbert or Louvois after him. Nevertheless, when La Salle came to Paris in 1688 he found that what was hardly organised when he was there as a seminarian, was now a well-organised, well-informed police force with powers of suppression that came from being able to employ directly the royal lettres de cachet. These bore the king's name, but it was a signature imitated by a special secretary. These letters were issued for matters in Paris by the Secretary of State and ensured a more rapid executions of royal justice and hence of administration, and were very much used. When the post of lieutenant-governor of police was created in 1667, the Secretary of State delegated to him this function. Reynie in turn had the work done by a private secretary, and gradually organised an Office of Lettres de cachet. D'Argenson developed it into a ministerial department.

There were lettres de cachet coming directly from the king, or made out by the police; but they were also asked for, especially as a request to protect family honour: to check a loose-living member of a noble family; to prevent a marriage between a good girl but of no social standing with a man higher up the social scale; even a joiner, a small stationer, might petition against disobedient daughters too free in their socialising. Important families would have their plea considered by the king in Council, but even the poor would be heard by the Secretary of State. D'Argenson, however, speeded things up by having the enquiry made by himself, drawing up the letter and having it countersigned by the Secretary of State.

Detention

The use of lettres de cachet meant that the matter did not have to go through the public courts and become common knowledge. The accused was put away for as long as the petitioner wished, with a regime, mild or severe, as he indicated. People were detained in the Bastille or in the fortress of Vincennes, a mile or so outside modern Paris. Some were sent to convents or monasteries. There were also boarding-houses for the purpose, run privately. The system interests us because of an innovation in the matter by La Salle and the Brothers later in Rouen.

For the general range of infractions, not involving lettres de cachet, there were many prisons, and they were always full. Usually you were tried next day, but a lettre de cachet required another one for the person to be set free – and he could be forgotten. Debtors had to stay till they paid up, which might mean for good. The condition of prisoners was dreadful: they were hardly fed; the jailers were often brutal, and had to be paid for every thing. But the most ominous symbol of royal despotism was the Bastille: you could be sent there by decision of the king by himself, or because you were accused of being in some way "seditious" to the royal mind. La Salle and the Brothers at one moment were close to being sent there.

The Bastille

The Bastille was the only one remaining of a number of square forts (called "bastilles") built into Philip Augustus's wall. It was seen in 17th century as the state prison that gave meaning to the lettre de cachet. Many Jansenists were kept there and many Protestants, especially between 1685 and 1700. Many preferred to die there rather than win freedom by accepting Communion from a Catholic priest.

Spies were kept there; so were noble courtiers, like the two who quarrelled in the king's drawing-room and were confined for a few days "for having lacked respect for my apartments."! Such persons could be given a spacious, heated room, good meals with two bottles of wine, and be received back at court with good grace.

Anybody who might be considered seditious or who simply spoke against the royal power could be incarcerated: taverners, women of the people, peddlars and especially gazetteers or publishers of gazettes, for journalists were considered especially dangerous. (A gazette was a news sheet or a pamphet: many could be scurrilous or satirical.) Many printers and booksellers were sent to the Bastille for publishing lampoons revealing too great an independence of mind with regard to the royal power. Anything to do with religion could be treated as dangerous: in 1681 several priests were sent to the Bastille for the clandestine publication of an attack on the character of the archbishop of Paris. A bishop found applying for a lettre de cachet a very convenient way of exiling or imprisoning a priests or a confessor who had his own way of interpreting matters for his penitents.

Blain corroborates this by telling us this story, but without any date: «One day someone came on behalf of a priest imprisoned for several years between four walls, where somehow he had heard of the great virtue of M. de La Salle, asking him to come and hear his confession.» La Salle went and found him in a deplorable condition «dressed in a cassock that was falling apart, and wearing a shirt that was torn, black, filthy and crawling with vermin.» After hearing his confession, La Salle proposed they should swap clothes, which the other priest accepted, and La Salle returned to the community "decorated", as Blain has to put it, «with the spoils of the victory over himself.» The priest died a few days later, he was told. It is surprising that Blain got away with this description, for everything was kept secret about the Bastille: those who were released had to sign an agreement not to say anything about prison life. So imagination could run riot.

One of the most important prisoners in La Salle's day was the Man in the Iron Mask who was brought there from the isolated fortress of Pignerol in Savoy in September 1698 and died there on November 19th 1703.

For La Salle and the Brothers, the threat of the Bastille from the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris was still far away. There were more immediate problems that February 1688...

THE 1691 VOW: A WELL-KEPT SECRET (1/2)

"After much thought about how to prop up a building which was threatening to collapse as it was being built, (De La Salle) was inspired to associate himself with the two Brothers whom he considered most suited to support the growing community, and to bind himself with them by an irrevocable commitment to pursue its achievement" (Blain I, 312).

A sole witness

Canon Blain's book, published in 1733, is our only source of information with regard to the vow pronounced on November 21st 1691 which we call "heroic", but whose primary characteristic could really be its secrecy.

Brothers sometimes write the to the Archives of the Generalate, asking for a photocopy of the heroic vow for an exhibition.

The Archives jealously guard the book in which are written the thirteen first perpetual vows of the Brothers of the Institute pronounced with De La Salle on the feast of the Holy Trinity in 1694. In the iconography published by Br. Rousset ten years ago, the 1694 formula of vows, written in the hand of the Founder, is prominently displayed.

There is nothing similar in the case of the 1691 vow: there is no document, no reference even except to Blain's text.

Maillefer's silence

The biography written by Maillefer in 1723 about his uncle is completely silent with regard to this vow.

"All that De La Salle had done up till then to establish his free schools was good only for a limited time. Thought had to be given as to how to ensure their survival" (54). The measures that he takes in 1691-1692 - novitiate, house at Vaugirard, annual retreat - are those described by Blain, with the exception of the heroic vow.

If he had known about this vow, Maillefer would not have hesitated to speak about it. To be convinced of this it is sufficient to read the preface of his book: "He is a holy priest whom God has led along paths that are simple but hard for nature. As he formed him in virtue, he revealed to him the true nature of good and gave him the necessary experience in order to practise it. It is in the light of this idea that I see him establishing a Christian society which owes its existence solely to his great trust in God" (1).

When he returned to his work in 1740, Maillefer did not dare include a mention of the 1691 vow in his text: this would would have been to acknowledge a debt to Blain whom he had accused of copying certain passages of his work word for word without any reference to him (V).

The Memoir on the Beginnings

Between 1721 and 1723, Brother Bernard had composed the "Admirable Conduct of Divine Providence in the person of the Venerable Servant of God John Baptist de La Salle". His complete manuscript was submitted to the brother of the Founder, Jean Louis de La Salle, who never returned it to him. This text is doubtlessly Maillefer's principal source.

All we have is a copy of a draft Bernard made in 1721 and which stopped in 1688. Among the memoirs that had been passed on to him to do this work there was one "written in the hand of the Servant of God" and which we call the "Memoir on the Beginnings". Bernard tells us that "It is from this manuscript that we will draw all that we will say up to the fourteenth year of his institution, because he did not go beyond this point in his account. We will add only what his humility made him omit" (22,23).

What point marks the beginning of the Institute of the Christian Schools? 1679, the opening of the first school by A. Nyel? 1682, when the Founder went to live with his teachers? Whichever it is, the 14 years covered by this Memoir bring us to 1693 or 1696.

If therefore Bernard did not mention the 1691 Heroic Vow, it was because the humility of the Founder made him keep silent about this important commitment when he wrote his Memoir on the Beginnings, and because no other memoirs mentioned it.

The Brothers were ignorant of the existence of this vow

It is clear that the Brothers were unaware of the very existence of the vow pronounced on November 21st 1691: John Baptist de La Salle jealously guarded the secret of the commitment he made that day with his two companions.

Blain expected the Brothers to be astonished on discovering in the book certain events which had taken place possibly during their lifetime. "The Brothers themselves are warned not to be astonished at seeing here several things of which they were unaware. Only those were aware who had a closer relationship with the holy Founder and in whom he had the greatest confidence or who were involved with him in dealing with certain affairs" (I,115).

And so Blain could have received the text of the Heroic Vow only from one of the two Brothers who pronounced it with the Founder.

The pillars of the Institute

"The commitment of these two Brothers whom De La Salle considered as the two pillars of his Institute was the only resource on which he founded his hopes at that time. In case death came before he could consolidate it, he entrusted the task of completing what he had started to the zeal of his two principal disciples.

"He was mistaken in his choice, because one of them subsequently became a Judas, as people called him. Forgetting the vow he had made and the Father to whom he owed obedience, he broke off from the Society and abandoned it" (Blain I, 312).

A few chapters later, the biographer describes the beginnings of the Seminary for Country Teachers which lasted five or six years in the parish of Saint Hippolyte in Paris. Without naming him, he points to Nicolas Vuyart (or Wiart) as the Director of the establishment who, at the time of the trial instigated by the writing masters in 1704, broke away from De La Salle and the other Brothers and then appropriated for himself the house the parish priest of St. Hippolyte had bequeathed to him.

"This Brother was one of the two that the pious Founder considered to be his two arms and whom he had chosen to be the solid pillars of his Community. This Brother with De La Salle and Brother Gabriel Drolin composed the Triumvirate which had obliged itself by vow never to leave the Institute and to procure its progress till the death of all his strength, as we have seen above" (Blain I,336).

Nicolas Vuyart's move brought about the ruin of the establishment that had been entrusted to him. Brother Gervais, who had consented in court to the withdrawal of the Seminary from the establishments under the control of De La Salle, did not follow Vuyart in his schism.

The latter remained alone in the parish of St. Hippolyte and earned his living for about twenty years by running a primary school the Brothers had had to leave. "For some time after, he sought to rejoin the body he had so shamefully left. De la Salle, always full of charity, welcomed him with open arms, but was dissuaded from accepting him back by the advice of wise and prudent persons" (Maillefer 1723,101).

And Blain, who also mentions this vain attempt, tells of the sad death of Vuyart, five months after that of De La Salle. He did not obtain the formula of the 1691 vow from the Judas, because he would have made the most of such a discovery to make the circumstances appear in an even worse light.

THE 1691 VOW: A WELL-KEPT SECRET (2/2)

Brother Gabriel Drolin, the last survivor

It has to be Brother Gabriel Drolin who made the vow of November 21st 1691 a part of history. After 1719, he was the only survivor of the three who pronounced it.

From 1702 onwards he was in Rome and alone after the return of his travelling companion to France. He remained alone till 1727.

He must have heard of the desertion of Nicolas Vuyart, because De La Salle wrote to him on April 27th 1705: "I know you are far from doing what Brother Nicolas did, and that is why I have put so much trust in you" (Letter 17, 12).

Blain shows Brother Gabriel as the exact opposite of Vuyart: "faithful to his promise, fixed in his vocation, inseparably united to his virtuous Superior, nothing in the world could tear him away from his holy state" (I, 313).

"This good Brother, older than everybody else and their doyen, now almost 72 years' old and back from Rome where he has been sent and spent 26 years on the orders of De La Salle, is now living in Avignon" (I, 314).

The vows according to the Bull of Approbation

In 1728, Brother Timothee, Superior General since 1720, began a "register of vows" in which the formulas of vows of the Brothers of the southern province were written down. On page 90, dated September 21st 1728, the formula is signed "Brother Gabriel, in the world Gabriel Drolin". Like his fellow Brothers at St. Yon in 1725, he pronounced his vows "in conformity to the Bull of Approbation of our Institute given by our Holy Father Pope Benedict XIII" (Rigualt II, 115 and 184).

Brother Gabriel finished his days in Auxonne, where he died on January 11th 1733, just at the time when the printing of Blain's book was beginning (the agreement with the printer is dated the 17th).

Among his papers there was discovered the precious collection of 19 letters which the Founder had written to him during his stay in Rome. "Blain knew of their existence, since he speaks of a letter which the doyen of the Institute kept in his pocket, but he could not have used them because several of the things he says about Brother Gabriel are contradicted by these autographed letters of the Saint" (Circ. 335, 183).

Only then did the Brothers know

Unlike the Letters, Blain did have the 1691 formula of vows signed by Gabriel Drolin. This was the original and not a copy, otherwise the original would be in the Archives. A copy could not have been made as it was not foreseen that all the documents made available to Blain would vanish completely.

It is not unreasonable to think that when Brother Gabriel met Brother Timothee in 1728 he informed him about the existence of the Heroic Vow and gave him the text he always kept in his possession. Doubtlessly, with the promulgation of the Bull of Approbation, there had come about "the total completion of the establishment" of the Institute, an expression which for him always went together with "till the last survivor" of the three who pronounced the vow in 1691. The secret that had been kept for so long now came into the possession of another Brother who happened to be the Superior General.

It is from him that Blain was able to hear about this text and reproduce it in his biography of the Founder (Blain says "Institutor") of the Brothers. Only then did the Brothers know that at a critical moment at the beginning of their Institute, De La Salle and two Brothers chosen by him committed themselves irrevocably and in the greatest secrecy "to do unanimously and with common consent all that (they believe) in conscience and without any human considerations to be for the greater good of the said Society".

This pact is one of association, of a union recognised before God as a sacred obligation:"we vow association and union to procure and maintain the said establishment without being able to leave it, even if there remained only the three of us in the said Society, and we were obliged to beg for alms and live on bread alone".

The heroic aspect of this commitment is the expression of a mystical dialogue with God who wills that all children be evangelised by the ministry of the Christian Schools: "We consecrate ourselves entirely to you to procure with all our power and all our efforts the establishment of the Society of the Christian Schools in the way which will seem TO US to be the most agreeable TO YOU and be of the greatest advantage to the said Society" (Blain I, 313).

The reason for silence

It is easy to understand the reason for silence in 1691. To broadcast publicly such a decision would have shown everybody how critical the situation was. Not only had half the Brothers just left the Institute, but by choosing two Brothers, the Founder seemed to lack confidence in the others. This could have shaken the less solid ones and worried the others.

Human prudence? Not only. To commit oneself irrevocably like this, when De La Salle had refused up till then to allow the Brothers to make final vows, was not simply to realise very clearly the indispensable role of the Christian Schools for the salvation of children and of the Society of the Brothers in order to give stability to the teachers. It was also to have discovered that one is called oneself to play a key role in the establishment of this Society.

There are various personal charisms: it was necessary to discern who were called to be the "solid pillars" of the Institute. A few years earlier, the choice of the Founder and of the assembled Brothers had fallen on Brother Henri L'Heureux. Here it is no longer the case of the providential person suited to become the Superior of the Community, but the embryo of a "Community of Government" formed of persons with complementary qualities.

In 1694, when twelve Brothers (including Vuyart and Drolin) were preparing to make perpetual vows, Blain notes: "perpetual vows are being introduced into the Brothers" (I, 341). No allusion to the 1691 precedent. It was not for De La Salle to speak of it since he was considering giving up his position as Superior. To make known the special situation of two of the twelve would have been dangerous for the coming election. Perhaps also, neither of the two had the charism for such government.

And so, once this chance to speak about the 1691 vow had passed, it became impossible for the Founder to speak of it later. In 1705 it would have meant crushing Brother Nicolas. In 1717, it would have been attracting attention to himself at a time when he was managing to get Brother Barthelemy elected as the first Superior General. There was nothing left to do but to leave this secret with God.

Our thanks are due to Brother Gabriel for taking us into his confidence in his twilight years and revealing to us the existence of the Heroic Vow.

THE MEDITATIONS OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE – I – (1/2)

PREFACE

These introductory remarks are directed especially to those readers who take up this book of Meditations of St. John Baptist de La Salle translated into italian with little or no knowledge of the author, his work, his spiritual doctrine, the historical period in which he lived nor of his other written works.

Given that we have here an author who is not writing for a vast public, but rather a Founder who has in view a specific formation for his spiritual sons, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, a few clarifications are necessary for those who are not Christian Brothers. Instead of stressing the difficulties which some readers may have, it would be more advantageous to offer some information which would make it easier and more profitable to peruse these Meditations which were written three hundred years ago, for a well-defined audience, with a clear intent toward the formation of a young religious family dedicated to the apostolate of Christian Schools within the historical framework of France in the 17th and 18th centuries...

This background should be kept in mind by those who, today, desire to know the perennially valid teaching of the Founder of the Christian Schools, to touch the essence of a spiritual experience which preserves its freshness and its creative, apostolic inspiration in the pages of these Meditations. Of course, on some pages this may be somewhat obscured by the dust of time and a style proper to a period now long past. But it is not difficult to wipe it away and restore the brilliance of a treasure of experience and doctrine which the Meditations offer and which is still extraordinarily relevant today.

The pages that follow are an introduction to a personal reading of the Meditations and therefore the techniques of scholarship were avoided as far as possible.

Omitted also is the listing of editions because they are already in the Italian translation. Likewise omitted are all the scholarly notes which go beyond the scope of this presentation.

1. AN OPERA IN THREE ACTS

As far as subject matter is concerned, the Meditations of St. John Baptist de La Salle form three distinct series:

a/ Meditations for the Sundays of the Liturgical Year (1–77).

b/ Meditations for the Principal Feasts of the Year (78–192).

c/ Meditations for the Time of Retreat (193–208).

The difference between the three series arises not only from the general source of inspiration of the meditations; i. e., the Gospel of the Sunday Mass for the Sunday series; the lives of the Saints or the religious theme of the anniversary for the series on the Feasts; the ministry of education in the Catholic School for the Retreat series.

There are more important differences to be considered by the reader who seeks to profit from reading these works.

A very astute observation was made by one who has studied the Founder in depth: «It is best not try to read the Meditations in the order in which they are presented, and certainly not to start off with N° 1. Perhaps it might be a good idea to begin with the series on the Saints» (Saturnino Gallego, San Juan Bautista de La Salle, Vol. II, p. 286. Madrid, 1986).

What are the reasons for such practical advise to a reader who is not a member of the Congregation of De La Salle?

They may be summarized as follows.

a) The Meditations for Sundays, by and large, take up themes which refer to the personal and community lives of the Religious addressed, in this case the Brothers of the Christian Schools. They are often a continuous series of thoughts on the same topic; for example, that of obedience (Med. 7–15), difficulties in the spiritual life (30–36), prayer (36–39), religious and community life (57–60 and 62–77), etc.

Even though the «ministry of education» is always present in the background since the persons addressed are all educators, this aspect is not particularly stressed except occasionally (Med 33, 37, 56, 61...). Therefore, at first glance, this series would seem to have less interest for the majority of non-Religious readers.

b) Meditations for Feast Days, on the other hand, and in particular in reference to the lives of the Saints, lend themselves more easily to practical applications in a spiritual and apostolic life dedicated to the educational ministry with all its demands and circumstances.

Of the 115 Meditations in this series, at least 90 refer to the teaching of children. Consequently, they are closer to the experiences and the spiritual needs of a wider circle of readers.

Although they were composed for the Brothers of the Christian Schools and have specific reference to the Religious State, still they are well suited to guide and foster a spirituality for Christians dedicated to the ministry of teaching.

«The meditations on the saints inspire admiration for the creative power of the Holy Spirit in God's people and invite the Brothers to increase their zeal during their daily contact with the students they teach...» (Sauvage–Campos, To announce the Gospel to the poor. Paris, 1977, p. 283).

c) A precious jewel apart are the 16 Meditations for the Time of Retreat. In contradistinction to the two previous collections in which each meditation is complete in itself, here we have an extended and systematic development of the theme of education with a clearly unified structure and a very original balance between a serious theology of education and practical suggestions for the development of the Christian teaching profession.

These meditations represent the most immediate and direct way for educators, lay or not, to approach Lasallian spirituality. In this case, from the very beginning, it was stated that the author had in mind an audience far beyond the Brothers: «For the use of persons dedicated to the education of youth and in particular, for the retreat which the Brothers make during the time of vacation» is the sub-title for the first printed edition.

As far as those for whom De La Salle destined his works are concerned, the observation of Saturnino Gallego is pertinent: «Does De La Salle address himself to all Christian educators or only to the Brothers? Let us make a clarification. For the Founder of the Christian Schools, the Brother is the "analogatum princeps" of the Christian teacher. He writes first of all for him, not as a consecrated Religious, but as a Brother; i. e., as a consecrated teacher. Therefore, all that he writes is valid also for the Christian lay teacher who can read and apply to himself this doctrine which, without doubt, was directly thought through in view of a particular educator, the Brother.» (Gallego, Op. cit. p. 24).

After this brief introduction, we can now suggest an approach to the actual texts of the Meditations of De La Salle by those readers who wish to read them more carefully.

2. The Structure of the Meditations.

The purpose of the Meditations is to suggest ideas for personal or community mental prayer.

They present fundamental truths for reflection and prayer. Originally they were designed to serve as an introduction to the period of mental prayer which the Brothers made each morning. One of the Brothers read the meditation aloud for the whole community. Therefore, it is clear that the book was not destined for personal reading.

Even when read very slowly, the reading of one meditation only took about five minutes and the rest of the time was spent in personal prayer acording to the "method" taught by the Founder in another of his works. «The Explanation of the Mathod of mental Prayer» (Cahiers Lasalliens N° 4 and 50).

The structure of the meditations is uniform throughout. Each meditation is divided into three points. Saturnino Gallego explains, «The style is original –one fact from the Sunday's Gospel or from the biography of the Saint whose feast is being commemorated (in this case each point focuses on one of his virtues); a brief reflection on this fact: then a practical application to the life of the Brother who is directly addressed as "you" in a very pointed question. Given De La Salle's temperament which was practical rather than imaginative, we find scarcely any paragons of virtue or heroes. Rarely do we find exclamations and still more rarely any emoting. There is a heavy predominance of indicatives, imperatives and interrogations» (Gallego, Op. cit., p. 286).

As far as the Meditations for Feast Days is concerned, «De La Salle has proceeded in the same fashion». Each point is developed in reference to the well-specified theme stated at the beginning. In the case of the Saints, he stresses a particular virtue, or he shows how the cause of God or of the Church was championed within his sphere of influence. From this, De La Salle makes an application relative to the spiritual lives of his disciples or the way they should act in their profession. Frequently there is a brief exhortation, inserted among the examples given, together with a recommendation to do in like manner. (J. G. Rodrigue, Cahier Lasallien 47, p. 26).

In spite of their limited theme, even the Meditations for the Time of Retreat which were the first to be composed, follow the same pattern of three points and the same internal development of each.

THE MEDITATIONS OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE – I – (2/2)

3. SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF THE LASALLIAN STYLE.

A few remarks are in order, here, concerning the characteristic style of the Meditations. A few were given above, but they call for further development.

We must repeat that De La Salle is not a professional writer nor a literary figure seeking recognition. Each of his works has a precise practical purpose to which his writing is adapted, at least to a certain extent.

Certainly Lasallian works such as Devoirs d'un chrétien (a catechetical treatise with questions and answers, Cahier Lasallien 20) or the Rules of Christian Politeness (a treatise on courtesy, Cahier Lasallien 19), which were written for a wider audience gave him quite a reputation because about a hundred editions appeared. They have a more accurate composition and a more literary turn of phrase. As for the Meditations, probably the Founder did not even plan to have them printed.

However, the basic style, which reflects the man and his character, especially when he writes with no literary pretentions and no intention of going into print remains recognizably constant in all his works.

In particular with regard to the Meditations, we can point out the following principal characteristics:

Brevity

His style straightforword, with no trace of grandiloquence. J. G. Rodrigue remarks: «Brevity seems to be the outstanding characteristic of the writings of this Saint, especially in his Meditations. Basically, it flows from his very personality. Nothing in De La Salle even hints at his being inclined to oratoRy, apologetics or bantering (Op. Cit. p. 27).

Compa ctness

This is the co-relative of brevity and flows from his profound and personal understanding of those for whom he wrote the Meditations, as well as the circumstances of their life. He knows that there is no need to establish background before discussing anything with them. Their experiences together are reflected in the Meditations which often evoke them without the need to describe or explain them. Of course, many expressions were better appreciated by the first Brothers than they are by modern readers who are not familiar with the events lived during the first 40 years of the Institute. I will come back later to the importance of reading the Meditations in the light of the lived biographical experience of the Founder and the spiritual reality of the founding of the Christian Schools in order to appreciate all the richness which is buried in some of the texts of the meditations. The full resonance of certain texts will then achieve their true vibrancy.

Discretion and balance

These result from a judicious use of adjectives, and carefulness to avoid exaggerations; i. e., in qualifying the actions of people or in expressing admiration, etc.

De La Salle is also very prudent about qualifying as "miraculous" those happenings which are difficult to explain from a merely human point of view. The calm and prudent consideration he gives to important matters according to his biographers, is reflected in the pages of his meditations.

Decisiveness and realism

These stand out in a special way in the examinations of conscience which he proposes and in the manner of applying the results of a meditation to daily life.

The decisive and realistic tone is achieved especially by his constant use of "you" (it appears at least in 95% of the points for meditation). This turns the reader in upon himself as he feels himself personally involved in what he is reading or hearing.

Incontrovertibility

The theme is presented as incontrovertible, an absolute. De La Salle strongly identifies himself with the aspect of the spiritual life he is dealing with in the meditation, especially if it deals with a virtue or an attitude which is essential and very important for his disciples. «He loves to stress very strongly the idea he is developing, but without losing his eloquent balance» (Gallego, Op. cit. p. 5).

Some expressions, like "the most important...", "the first...", "the principal...", "the fundamental...", which appear from time to time concerning certain topics (poverty, mental prayer, piety, penance, obedience, regularity, Spirit of Faith, humility...) may bother some readers who are overly concentrated on the literal text.

Actually, De La Salle is merely trying to stress the importance of the matter, rather than establish fixed priorities oR hierarchies.

Syntax

Finally, a word about the syntax. This is sometimes complicated because of the excessive use of subordinate clauses and quotations from the Scriptures and the Fathers of the Church (1) which make certain sentences too long and complicated.

This is more of a problem in the original French editions. The translations try to make the thought clearer by a freer use of punctuation.

These and other stylistic elements are better observed and discovered by a direct experience with the texts themselves.

4. THE MEDITATIONS REFLECT THE EXPERIENCES OF THE AUTHOR.

I have already stressed the fact that in order to really understand the Meditations it is necessary to read them against the background of the life of the author and the events which brought into existence the religious family of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, composed entirely of lay Religious who are totally committed to the ministry of Christian Education. It is the key to a very interesting and profitable reading experience because it is these Meditations which best reflect the autobiography of the Founder. On many pages, besides the objective development of the theme, we can sense the strong stirrings of life in a man and the coursing of events in the special vocation which was his.

The Meditations are not so much the result of study and sporadic thought done at the table in his room, but rather they are a faithful mirror of situations and states of soul, of experiences which constitute the Providentially planned spiritual paths of the Founder and the life of Faith by which he discerned them.

Sauvage–Campos (op. cit. p. 31) insist on this autobiographical element and even include events which preceded the work of founding the Christian Schools: «As we try to unveil the intimacy of his relations with God, the only facts we have are all posterior to his definitive commitment to the work of the Schools. However, many passages from the meditations on the Saints lead us to believe that his youth, his education, his priestly vocation contained a rather precocious experience of God as a compelling presence and an invitation to give himself entirely to Him.» They cite as examples Med. 122.1, 177.1, 180.2, 98.1, 186.1...

However, the evidence of an on-going experience is very clear in the happenings which characterize his work as a Founder and his day by day relationships with others and with the realities of life, of virtue, of spiritual values, etc.

Only by reading carefully from this point of view can we come to realize the continual interplay between spiritual teachings and daily experiences. Bookishness and theoretical considerations are very rare.

A few examples may help to clarify all this. Consider the teachings and advice of the Founder in the following areas which were very much a part of the way he experienced life.

- An unwavering fidelity to God in difficult situations and persecutions.
- seeing all things from the point of view of Faith.
- The importance of seeking counsel and a personal examination of the issues before taking a decision.
- love of solitude and uneasiness concerning honors.
- Intense prayer life.
- Personal poverty and a tender love for the poor.
- Austerity and the practice of penance.
- Absolute submission to the Church.
- Kindness toward his Brothers.
- Zeal for the instruction and salvation of students.

The list could continue...

The list of themes might be of some help in discovering this path throughout the 208 meditations.

There is so much of the man woven into his meditations that I feel there is no exaggeration in saying that the Meditations are really his spiritual autobiography.

This is the first key to understanding the real meaning of the text. The second, which is just as important, is to understand and be aware of the basic outline of his main spiritual ideas, in order to identify and appreciate the individual teachings as they occur in the course of the Meditations.

This must be the backdrop against which the multiplicity of comments on Gospel passages and the lives of the Saints must be seen to appreciate their unity, because of themselves they appear episodic and unrelated.

DE LA SALLE AND SCHOOL ADMINISTRATION:

What De La Salle Expected from the School «Principal»

When Lasallian school principals and others who speak about De La Salle and school administration make no reference to the Inspector of Schools, they ignore the person whom De La Salle established as the on-site school administrator.

In contrast to most schools of De La Salle's time in which the teacher confronting school problems was isolated and without resources, De La Salle's schools administered to the teachers' needs, and to that end he had established the position of Inspector of Schools.

To highlight the thesis that this important Lasallian administrative position is equivalent to that of school principal today, this article substitutes "principal" for the title Inspector of Schools.

The job description of the "principal" was spelled out originally in the manuscript copies of the Conduct of Schools. However, when the book went to press, that section dealing directly with the duties of the "principal" was left out. The reason for the deletion, as suggested in the Foreword Letter, was that the need did not apply to teachers and, therefore, did not warrant the expense involved.

That unfortunate decision to print a truncated version of the Conduct of Schools had three disastrous results for our understanding of the Lasallian "principal."

1) Without the section on the duties of the "principal" the Conduct of Schools became a teacher training manual in which the function of the "principal" in Lasallian teacher formation was not clear.

2) Unfortunately the obsolete manuscript copies of the Conduct of Schools were destroyed or eventually lost. The loss was compounded by the fact that there is very little significant description of the duties of the school "principal" in the other pedagogical writings of De La Salle. As a consequence of this loss and the lack of other references early historians of Lasallian education labeled the position "mysterious."

3) When a manuscript copy of the Conduct of Schools was discovered in the mid-twentieth century, the section on the duties of the "principal" was not read by many American Brothers for two unfortunate reasons. First, the unedited section mistakenly appeared to be redundant, merely repeating what was written in prior sections. Second, the newly found, pedagogical treasure was not translated into English.

Despite the disappointing history of our knowledge of the "principal," it is well established that in the early Institute the position of "principal" was a major appointment as seen from outside the school as well as inside. Outside the school the "principal" had to be astute and diplomatic in dealing with the strained relations with diocesan school authorities and pastors, and with the litigious relations with the teachers' union and the writing masters who crudely spied upon the school. Within the school the "principal" had to be respected by the teachers as a master teacher of sound and sensitive judgment.

The "principal" held a full-time position in middle management. Responsible for the operation of two or more schools, the "principal" alternated spending the full day at one school or the other. He performed all his duties under the immediate authority of the Director of the community, except when only one school was involved, for then the Director was also the "principal." The relationship of the "principal" to the Director can be compared to the relationship of today's principal to the Superintendent.

The "principal" was in charge of the in-service development of his teachers. As such, he was a member of a teacher-formation team composed of the Director of the community, the Director of novices, and the teacher-training "Formateur." The Conduct of Schools focuses upon the role of the "principal" as mentor and model not only in classroom instruction and management but also in program and curriculum development.

Fortunately the historical reality of the role of the "principal" is spelled out in detail in the restored section of the Conduct of Schools which divides the duties of the "principal" into three broad areas:

1) to exercise vigilance over the schools, the teachers, and the students;
2) to assign the students to their classrooms and assign the lessons they are to be taught; and
3) to promote the students from one lesson to another when it is observed that they are capable of doing more advanced work.

However, these duties are given clearer coverage today if they are regrouped under six specific headings: maintenance and supplies; enrollment and registration; examinations and promotions; scheduling and student placement; teacher supervision and support; and public relations. Of course these headings do not add to the duties of the "principal"; rather, they just make explicit duties implied in the three areas, referred to throughout the Conduct of Schools, and demanded by historical reality. The following paragraphs amplify these six headings.

MAINTENANCE AND SUPPLIES: The "principal" was responsible for obtaining needed instructional materials and building supplies, and for seeing that the custodial equipment was purchased and kept in the proper place and in good condition. It is not surprising, therefore, that the section on the duties of the "principal" emphasizes directives dealing with school cleanliness; for example, preventing paper, quill shavings and fruit pits from being deposited on the floor, and keeping the toilet facilities clean and decent, to mention two. The chapter on classroom furnishings, which was added to the Conduct of Schools at its first printing, is also an entry indicative of administrative concern.

REGISTRATION AND ENROLLMENT: The "principal" conducted a thorough process of registration and enrollment of all new students. In the registration interview he gathered in writing detailed personal and family information, for example, the state of the child's health, sleeping arrangements for the children, and parental expectations and plans for their son's future. He made certain that the parents understood, and accepted, the school regulations regarding, for example, daily attendance, appropriate behavior and dress, school meals, and attendance at Mass and catechism lessons. He granted special considerations and conditions of acceptance due to family need. The "principal" implemented the school policy on the acceptance of transfer students, for example, judging the reason for leaving the school, and verifying that tuition due had been paid in full. He conducted diagnostic testing of the child's level of achievement in reading, writing, and arithmetic to insure proper academic placement. De La Salle regarded the student placement by the "principal" as his most important effort to maximize teacher instruction.

CURRICULUM AND SCHEDULING: It was the duty of the "principal" to balance the sizes of the classes, and to see that the intermediate sections had the largest number of students over those of the advanced and beginning sections. He also determined in consultation with the teacher the amount of material to be covered, and the length of time to be spent on each lesson. He was responsible to see that all the classes began and ended at the same time, even on variable-schedule days. He had expert familiarity and facility with the organization and proficiencies of the reading and writing academic programs. The Conduct of Schools gives several remarkables examples illustrating how he figured out flexible schedules and complex configurations of teaching curriculum. There can be no doubt that De La Salle expected the "principal" to be the instructional leader of the school.

EXAMINATIONS AND PROMOTIONS: The "principal" and the classroom teacher worked together as a team regarding the monthly examination and promotion. Prior to the examination he and the classroom teacher agreed to submit only those students who could pass. The examination conducted by the "principal" demonstrated not only his mastery of the academic program, but also his sense of justice and fairness. As much as possible he examined for mastery and judgment not only memory, and he took into account the quality of the student's daily effort. He always made his final decision regarding promotion in consultation with the teacher.

TEACHER SUPERVISION AND SUPPORT: As was said above, De La Salle set up a strong system of teacher formation, and in that system the "principal" was responsible for the in-service supervision and support of teachers. In that regard the section brings our how the "principal" needed to be sensitive to the feelings of the teacher, especially the beginning teacher, by making his suggestions and corrections in private. On the other hand the methods of teaching reading and writing, described earlier in the Conduct of Schools for the teacher, are selectively complemented and reinforced when they are described for the "principal" as teacher supervisor. For example, the "principal" gives more emphasis to items such as adjusting to approved variations in the daily schedule, beginning and ending the lesson on time, sticking to school regulations and policy on absence.

PUBLIC RELATIONS: Although public relations is not an explicitly designated duty of the "principal," his responsibility for public relations is obvious in his concerns about the consequences imprudent, improper, and indecorous behavior by the teacher or the students have upon the parents, the pastors, the neighbors, and the public in general. Examples of teacher behavior about which the "principal" was concerned for the effect on public relations include: keeping to the published time table; accepting gifts; handling irate parents; dealing with callers to the school. Examples of student behavior about which the "principal" was concerned include: noisy gathering in front of school; vandalism and mischievous behavior going and coming to school; urinating in public; and fighting. Clearly De La Salle was sensitive to the importance of good public relations for the success of the schools, and he entrusted the on-site responsibility for the public image of the school to the "principal."

Happily the new translation and edition of the Conduct of Schools soon to be published by St. Mary's Press reinstates the section on the "principal" in which De La Salle addresses himself directly to the tasks of school administration. That restored section is written from an original, Lasallian, administrative viewpoint, and in a prescriptive style, typical of "administrative talk." Also, the operation of the school program, as reviewed from the administrative perspective, is described with new details, nuances, and emphases important to the "principal." The section on the duties of the "principal" is definitely not redundant, and worthwhile reading.

The expectations De La Salle had of the position of "principal" can furnish guidance to a Lasallian school principal today. A principal can gain comfort in learning that De La Salle recognized the need for on-site school administration; that he understood the difficulties faced by the "principal" in fulfilling that need; and what the duties were which De La Salle legislated for the "principal" as he saw him "at grips with his time." The school principal can identify with the inspector of Schools and enjoy the precious administrative insights offered in the new edition of the Conduct of Schools.

COMMENTS:

* This is not the place to spend much time considering in detail the kind of person for whom De La Salle wrote Duties 1. His readers fall into one of the following categories: the Brothers, pupils' parents, the pupils themselves, and the faithful in general.

* If we judge this work according to internal criteria, we could say that he had the latter category in mind. However, in the course of history, it was the pupils who drew most benefit from it. This is what this present article aims to show.

* The 1703 edition, considered at present to be the first edition, and those that followed it up to the year 1773 contained the original text without additions. Subsequent editions had a variety of additions, which preceded or followed the original text, and which described current daily classroom practice.

* The nature of the additions leads one to suppose that Duties 1 was a text used every day in class by all or by the majority of pupils.

1. In the first place and generally speaking, Duties 1 was used as a reading text in the classroom. As its use by pupils became more widespread, additions were made consisting of texts which contributed to the spiritual life of the pupils. One can be certain that these additions were of benefit also to the pupils' families and the faithful in general. It would not therefore be too presumptuous to attribute a Christianising role to Duties 1.

2. In a certain way, these additions turned Duties 1 into a manual on the theory and practice of the duties of a Christian.

3. The tables show us that certain Christian practices were maintained over the years and continued to be included in new editions and reprints. Other practices, on the other hand, came and went easily. This helps us to judge the relative importance of all these practices.

4. It would be interesting to make a study of the additions made to the text of Duties 1, taking into account the editors involved, the place and the year of publication. This would be a valuable contribution to the study of the history of this work.

CALLS ADDRESSED TO THE INSTITUTE AND THE RESPONSE OF THE BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

(From the review «Comunicação» of the District of Porto Alegre, N° 100)

Many are the calls made to us today by the Church. The "urgent calls" vary according to the point of view which they reflect. We are referring to the important calls from the Conciliar and Post-Conciliar Church.

1. The call for the evangelization of nations.

The call made by Vatican II:
a/ Necessity for evangelization:
– for the unbelievers: «But they will not ask his help unless they believe in him, and they will not believe in him unless they have heard of him and they will not hear of him unless they get a preacher, and they will never have a preacher unless one is sent» (Rom 10: 14-15).

– believers must continually hear about faith and repentance; they must be prepared for the sacraments; they must be taught how to fulfill all that Christ commands» (SC n. 9)

b/ Evangelization must reach everyone.
«Since the local Church must mirror the universal Church as far as it is able, it must have a keen realization that it, too, has been sent to those who do not believe in Christ and who dwell in the same region, to guide them to Christ through the witness of the lives of each of the faithful as well as that of the entire community» (AG 20).

c/ The apostolate of the laity is the only way to reach many people:
«...The laity are perfectly capable of exercising their apostolate with their peers. They complete the witness of their lives by the witness of their word. In the area of labor, professions, studies, living, leisure or social life the laity have the opportunity to help their brothers... This apostolate must be extended to all the people they contact and it must include any spiritual or material assistance they can offer them... Many cannot hear the Gospel or know Christ except through the laity, their neighbors» (AA. N° 133).

d/ A call repeated in Puebla (N° 777, 778, 800) and in Evangelii Nuntiandi (N° 68, 69, 70).

2. A call for the involvement of the laity.

In these two documents, the Dogmatic Constitution Lumen Gentium, Ch IV, and in the decree Apostolicam Actuositatem, Vatican II speaks of the apostolate of the laity. See also the orientations and insistence of John XXIII and Paul VI on what concerns the opening up of the "Ministries".

3. A call for respect and development of the human person.

In its pastoral Constitution Gaudium et Spes, Vatican II speaks of this call: respect for the human person (N° 27); the equality of all men (N° 29); the value of human activity (N° 34); the defense, promotion and protection of the family (N° 47, 48, 49, 52).

4. The call to social justice and the development of peoples.

Vatican II speaks about this in chapter III of the pastoral Constitution Gaudium et Spes when it deals with the Church in the modern world.
The encyclicals Mater et magistra and Populorum Progressio recall and bring up to date the social doctrine of the Church. The encyclical Solicitudo rei Socialis of John Paul II is the latest word on the subject.

5. A call to openness and docility to the Holy Spirit.

a/ An intense and continual life of prayer.
b/ prayer centers, prayer encounters, prayer retreats.
c/ Writings on the Holy Spirit and prayer...
d/ The encyclical of John Paul II "Dominum et Vivificantem" on the Holy Spirit in the life of the Church and the worl.

(5/18/1986).

The Response of the Brothers of the Christian Schools to the call of the Church Today.

The Brothers of the Christian Schools are a Congregation of Brothers, lay Religious, founded by St. John Baptist de La Salle for the Christian education of youth, especially the poor. This purpose which is still valid today, determines the manner in which the Congregation responds to some aspects of those calls from the Church of today.

1. With regard to the call to Evangelization, there is a concerted effort that in our schools:

– there will be a truly Christian atmosphere.
– catechesis be active, youth groups encouraged, leaders be formed, workshops be organized, Eucharistic celebrations be held in honor, and active participation in the life of the parish be advocated.
– Service for Religious Education (SER) give orientations and supervise Religion teachers as well as stimulate and promote Christian living.
– besides the weekly catechesis, there will be a daily "Reflection to raise consciousness of Gospel values" based on some significant Christian idea taken from the Agenda which has been given to the students.
– Our District has a Central Catechetical Team which evaluates schools, supports teachers, especially the catechists, by providing them with all manner of catechetical materials.
– The Brother of the Christian Schools is aware that he is not only a professional, but a man sent by God, by Christ and by the Church to teach the Gospel to youth (GE 2).

– He offers his students a mature love which unites firm guidance with the requirements of affection and respect as would be expected in one who is called to union with God (GE 9).

2. With regard to the promotion of the Laity, it has mounted a serious effort to develop excellence in the teachers who work in our shools:

– Delegation of responsibilities among the teachers of our schools according to the principle "awareness, freedom and participation".
– Formation of catechists.
– Development of Parent-Teachers associations, and encouragin their participation in the school.
– Encouraging the creation of educational communities through co-responsibility among Brothers, teachers, parents and alumni.

3. With regard to human development:

– development of the person, development of the mind.
– an atmosphere of respect and dialog between teachers and students.
– social integration: presence of rich and poor, white and black...
– an effort to know each student individually, the reality with which he lives, awareness of his capabilities.

4. With regard to justice and the development of peoples.

– The school as agent for the development of peoples (R 13a).
– «Through the promotion of justice and peace they cooperate in the building up of the kingdom of God» (R 7).
– «The Brothers are entrusted with their mission by the Institute, a mission especially to the poor. As a community they become increasingly conscious of the reasons for the poverty that surrounds them and so become earnestly involved in the promotion of justice and human dignity through the educational service they provide» (R 14).
– The Brothers have always in view the promotion of justice in the light of the gospel and either the direct or indirect service of the poor as the preferred aspect of their ministry of education.» (R 40)

– «In conformity with the spirit of the Institute, the Brothers cooperate closely with those in the Church or in society who are involved in education, ministry to the young, the cultivation of a sense of justice, the use of mass media, or the integration of young people into social and professional life» (R 17d).
– «The Brother Visitor ensures that the requirements of canon law and civil law are complied with in what concerns the goods of the District and the patrimonial goods of the Brothers. The same applies to social justice as it affects the personnel employed by the communities» (R 132d).
– «Educational Foundation La Salle: This is destined to help maintain works for the poor, poor students in the schools, and to the perpetuation of the Fund itself» (District Chapter V, N° 51).
– «To send as least 10% of the Brothers to the Missions after providing for their adequate preparation» (District Chapter V, N° 55).
– «To participate... by joining in on various projects and in the missionary effort of the Institute, as well as by contributing to the Sharing Fund» (District Chapter v, n° 54-54B).

5. With regard to openness and docility to the action of the Holy Spirit and prayer:

– «The Brothers provide opportunities for their students to encounter God more frequently» (R 15a).
– «Pray the Master of the harvest to send workers into his vineyard» invite the Brothers to realize that prayer is fundamental in order to initiate and to develop a pastoral ministry for vocation. (R 84).
– «The Founder gives this recommendation "Ask God that he will be pleased to make your Institute grow and bear fruit day by day". This stimulates the Brothers to organize prayers for vocations in their communities...» (R 84).
– «prayer, filial devotion to St. John Baptist de La Salle, love for the community and dedication to the work of the apostolate help to assure stability and fidelity to the Institute» (R 42b).
– «The oratory where the Blessed Sacrament is reserved provides the ideal setting for community prayer.» (R 70b).
– «Each Brother has the primary responsibility for his personal prayer. Each one and all together are jointly responsible for community prayer» (R 72).
– «Ordinarily the Brothers give to God at least two hours of each day in meditation, the Eucharist, community vocal prayer, spiritual reading and personal prayer» (R 73).
– «The fidelity of the Brothers is achieved by their daily response to different stituations, by getting to know more fully persons and the milieu in which they live and work, and by their determination to find new strength in frequent prayer» (R 145).
– «The Brothers are faithful to their mission in the measure in which they perceive and accept the calls which come to them from their ministry, and in which they go to God as apostles who are responsible for the salvation of those confided to them» (Dist. Ch. V, 14).
– «It is our duty to re-establish this charism in all its purity with the adaptations which are necessary for our times and then to transmit its renewed form to new generations» (Dist. Ch. V, 15).
– «We will be men of God through the renewal of our spirituality:
  – Know, assimilate and live the Rule.
  – Renew the practice of meditation.
  – Design and accept the Personal Program» (Dist. Ch. V, 17).
– Besides their annual retreat, the Brothers follow specific courses for their continued formation: CIL, CREL, Más Vida, Año de Renovación, formation programs organized by the local Church or other entities such as CERNE, CETESP, etc, the CNBB or CRB.

«That through our lives together as Brothers, we show the unity with which we pursue our common goal and celebrate it as a Community in the liturgy, especially on the occasion of important dates designated by the Church and the Institute» (Dist. Ch. V, N° 4).

PLACES WHERE THERE IS A SPECIAL EXPERIENCE OF THE PRESENCE OF GOD FOR LASALLIANS

To some of you this title may appear somewhat strange.

God is everywhere. He can reveal his presence as he sees fit.

As for us, we can discover him or find him in favourable times and places. St John Baptist de La Salle put it well when he was reflecting on the experience of Saint Teresa: «And so, as she found everything in finding God, she had the happiness of finding God everywhere: whatever her situation and wherever she happened to be, God was her guide» (Med 177, 3).

However, it requires an effort to grasp this truth. To the extent that Brothers and their lay colleagues concern themselves with De La Salle's teaching, the need arises to grasp at a deeper level what we might call the "originality of Lasallian spirituality".

As Christian educators make more frequent references to La Salle in carrying out their "ministry", the necessity is felt for deeper consideration, from an educational viewpoint, of the peculiar weighting of such Lasallian terms as: mission, ministry, spirit of faith and zeal... That shouldn't surprise us. We know that every spiritual experience has its roots in two realities always to be found in the Bible from the epoch of Abraham right up to the coming of Jesus of Nazareth. The experience of faith is, at the same time a theological and a human experience.

In the Bible, the spiritual experience is centred on a relationship with the God of the Covenant. And this relationship with the God of the Covenant brings with it a new way of understanding reality. And so there arises a movement "of contemplation and of communion". For we can contemplate God through all the events of our life and through these events enter into "comunion" with them without turning away from the real living exprience. This contemplation/communion means that our a whole life is transformed: we enter into a whole new mode of perceiving, evaluating and owning our being.

And so, we find ourselves at the very heart of the life of faith as it is presented to us by De La Salle. The eyes –the eyes of faith– are focused on the experience, for it is precisly there that the God of history reveals himself. The experience, therefore, is that special place where God is revealed, the God of salvation, the God Father who has assumed in his son Jesus, our every day actions and who offers us his love.

Very often, too, we speak of meeting God at the very core of life. Pope Paul VI would say "at those points when now and the yet-to-come interact" (Octogesima Adveniens, n° 51).

This concept is present in every "spirituality". Always, at their centre, emerges a dynamic principle of Christian faith, which gives to existence a new Gospel identity. By way of verification, all that is needed, is a rapid survey of the fruitful history of the Gospel, as incarnated in the Founders (Foundresses) the "Mothers or Fathers of our spiritual Families".

Saint John Baptist de La Salle raised up in the Community of the Church a striking new way of living out the spirit of the Gospel. The Gospel journey followed by De La Salle brought forth a "new model" of the Christian life specially appropriate for groups of Christians who identify with him and who feel bonded to him in a special way, those particulary who commit themselves to the field of education and culture.

But it often happens, that in Lasallian schools, some men and women of faith feel they rather "disciples" of St Teresa, of St Augustine, of St Francis of Assisi rather than of John Baptist de La Salle. There are also more who belong to modern spiritual groups (Focolari, Charismatics, New catechumens) or who are active members of Catholic Action groups or of Christ Cursillos. Coming from faith groups having their roots in other "spiritual families", some Lasallians fail to appreciate the originality of our Lasallian Spiritual Family.

Something even more fundamental sometime happens. Some Brothers seem to have experienced in their year of formation an initiation into the spirituality of Benedict or Ignatius rather than into that of De La Salle. As a result of this at a later period, it is difficult in practice, for them to live as "Disciples of De La Salle". This situation, also makes difficult dialogue and sharing within a Lasallian educational Community.

I would like to cite, by way of example, the experience of spirituality shared with some educators from Lasallian schools who belong to the "spiritual family" of Charles de Foucauld.

With the limitations imposed by the comparison of two texts (the expression of two spiritual experiences) and aware of the danger of reductionism and distortion I take the risk of offering this twofold reading.

WHERE DOES THE DISCIPLE OF CHARLES DE FOUCAULD FIND GOD?

Here is a text in support of our point of view.

«Every place is good for you; the countryside, the highway, the roads are delightful; Jesus is there with you, in you, around you, you possess him, he possesses you, he penetrates you, he enfolds you, he is in you and you are in him. Oh! how happy you are, on the way, at rest, in solitude, as you journey along, everywhere, always. You feel yourself in Jesus, with Jesus, you have him with you, you contemplate him, you adore him, you lose yourself in him and you are lost in him..». (Considerations on the feasts of the year, page 367, Ed. Nouvelle Cité).

In the life of a man or woman who feels himself called to live a contemplative life at the heart of the story of man, all life's moments are transformed into the Place of an encounter with Jesus, their Lord. This way of understanding and of taking up one's life, is profoundly influenced by the God who is present. It is a presence that one contemplates and with which one enters into "communion". Let us underline the most significant effects of this spirituality: the believer is, in a certain sense, impregnated, moved, shaken, amazed by his God, because he is a witness to the rality of his Word: "And I am with you all days, even to the end of time" (Mt 28, 20).

WHERE DOES THE DISCIPLE OF ST JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE FIND GOD?

The Lasallian texts that can be cited are numerous and they are consistent. For now, let me linger on one only.

«St. Ignatius was so filled with the spirit of Jesus Christ and His holy love that the sacred name of Jesus was constantly on his lips. By this means he communicated this divine love to those whom he instructed, as well as to those with whom he conversed. As he himself was wholly devoted to Christ and consecrated to Him for preaching the gospel, so he wished his disciples to be specially attached to Jesus and to labour for Him alone.

If you are a true lover of Christ you will take every possible means to instil His holy love in the hearts of your children whom you train to be His disciples, and your aim will be that they think often of Jesus, their good and only Master; that they speak frequently of Jesus, that they aspire only after Jesus, and that they live for Him alone.» (Med. 102, 2)

This text is a good "key" for interpreting the Lasallian experience of God. We find a similar "key" in the Meditations for the Times of Retreat as also in Meditations 90, 91 and 92 concerning the examination (the reading) which the Brother makes at the end of the year of his experience of God at the centre of his life.

Although the meditations for the end of the year are addressed to the Brothers there is no doubt that their purpose is of value for Christian educators in general. This is more obvious in the Meditations for the Times of Retreat and the text cited above.

We can say, therefore, that it is in the depths of his being and in the fulfilment of his ministry that the Lasallian experiences the God that saves.

In my opinion, therefore, the Lasallian has an exceptional experience of faith in the following three areas: community, school, the Word of God.

In this article for Lasallian, I would want to emphasize the second of these "Places": The school, in its fullest sense, that is to say in so much as it is the "field of God" where the Lasallian carries out "the work of God".

The school, in effect represents for La Salle a profound and authentic spiritual reality. By following his teaching we can affirm that the Lasallian school is indeed a "Godly place". God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the God who wants all of his sons and daughters to be saved, is present at the heart of the school and he offers us the possibility of transforming it into the place of his saving action. The Lasallian schools «are characterised by the determination to make the means of salvation available to young people through a quality education and by an explicit proclamation of Jesus Christ» (Rule, 13).

This is to say that a Christian educator, a true disciple of De La Salle will find God at the heart of the school and will live out his faith as an act of communion with the plan of a loving God who wills that education be an instrument of salvation.

– The educational process, that is to say the organization of the school,
– relationship within the school,
– the quality of teaching and of the students' work,
– the planning and putting into operation of the "Education Plan,
– the integration of the Educational Community,
– the nature of the dialogue within the educational process,

– the formation of persons,
– the work of interiorization, personalization, socialization,
– the proclamation of the Word of Jesus,
– the introduction to prayer,
– the opening-up to society and the Church...

In all of these realities the Lasallian is exposed to the possibility of experiencing his (her) identity as a man or woman of faith and of faith community. If one bears this in mind, one can doubtless understand better this text – short but significant – of the Rule: «The Brothers live their faith as a gift received for the ministry of Christian education» (N° 20).

Thus by living out faith and zeal at the heart of the school, the Lasallian educator transforms his "work" into a true "ministry" (cf. Rule, n° 13). It is in this way, in my view, that the Lasallian experience of faith is accomplished.

«LET US REMEMBER

THAT WE ARE IN THE HOLY PRESENCE OF GOD»

«LET US ADORE HIM»

There are certain memories of our family or friends that we always treasure. They speak to our hearts and renew within us the secret sources of mutual esteem and appreciation.

Among the De La Salle Brothers, the memory OF THE HOLY PRESENCE OF GOD is one of these. The Founder left it to us as a community and school practice.

Many of those who have attended our schools keep this memory alive and recall it with great benefit.

This intense moment of silence and introspection is of great educational value for it is God himself who becomes our teacher.

LET US REMEMBER

We say: "Let us remember". This is not something imposed upon us by duty. It is rather a need we feel, an act of love which we renew.

Do not those who love each other often think of each other?

"For nothing proves so forcibly that we love someone than being unable to prevent ourselves from thinking of him" says De La Salle in Meditation 70, 3.

We are before God, his presence fills us, his mystery surrounds us:

* the God who consecrates us and who inflames our heart with zeal.
* the God through whom all has life, for he is eternal life.
* God is the silent atmosphere in which our whole life resounds like an echo of eternal love.

Why delay recalling this "memory" which brings us so many benefits?

THAT WE ARE IN THE HOLY PRESENCE OF GOD

It is easier to define by making comparisons. There are things present in our world which are special, like the sun and air, among others.

– the sun which is at the same time light, heat and energy. The light which surrounds us as a cloak, the heat which invigorates us and the energy which transforms us.

– the air which supports the bird and which is a vital element for our organism.

They are so familiar to us that we do not speak of them, we are in their midst. Although we do not see them their absence would cause our death.

In our lives too, God is a welcoming silence which is felt rather than a word which is heard; he is an interior joy which appears and remains rather than a vision that satisfies the senses.

Because we possess God in our hearts as a Grace, we can recognise and "see him" in all that surrounds us. We can exclaim with the psalmist:

> "If I climb the heavens, you are there,
> there too, if I lie in Sheol.
> If I flew to the point of sunrise, or westward across the sea, > your hand would still be guiding me," (Ps. 139, 8-10)

With St. Paul, we recognise that in the presence of God we live and move and have our being.

Let us say finally with Isaiah:

> "And yet, Yahweh, you are our Father;
> we the clay, you the potter,
> we are all the work of your hand." (Is. 64, 7-8)

LET US ADORE HIM

Not with our lips but with our hearts we say to you like Samuel: "Speak, Lord, your servant is listening."

Your Word will be a lamp for our feet, a light on our way.

Helped by your Spirit who is holy, we will fulfil your desires and your will which we adore in all things.

WE WILL CONTINUE TO DO ALL OUR ACTIONS FOR LOVE OF YOU

AMEN

THIS MINISTRY OF OURS (1/2)

Presentation to Faculty/Staff of La Salle High School, Pasadena. September, 1990

INTRODUCTION

There is a real difference between a public school, a Catholic School, and a Catholic school in the Lasallian tradition. My gradutate level training in teaching methodology, management, and content was most excellent and thorough and I went out to teach in public schools well-prepared for the job. I was a product of these schools and a proponent of the system. I liked teaching – I loved teaching, and I felt good about the fact that the business courses I taught gave the students useful skills. Ten years later, I taught for the first time in a Catholic school. I knew that God had led me there. I was struck by the caring, nurturing ways of the sisters who ran the school, but after all, they were supposed to be that way because they were religious, and I was just a lay teacher of a secular subject.

Seven years later, I met St. La Salle. In studying his life, and the educational and spiritual dimensions of the Lasallian tradition, I really realized that I was a part of something overwhelmingly awesome. I have been called to represent Jesus to the students; they, in turn, bring Him to me. St. La Salle's words, «Domine Opus Tuum,» Lord this work is yours, ring true for me. We truly are on hallowed ground in this holy work, this ministry of ours.

WHY ARE WE HERE?

Aware of our diversity of background, talent, personalities, we come together to consider how we can affect a better understanding, acceptance, and appreciation of ourselves as persons and as community and how we can work together to make this a most successful year. Our commonality is a lifestyle patterned after Christ. That doesn't mean that we all have to be Christians but rather we are called to live generously, compassionately, justly, and charitably. We have all been called to minister to the students of La Salle High School and to one another. Our common goal is to educate our students in the context of an atmosphere of faith. All of us are at a point of a new beginning, the '90-91 school year. Our school and our community are dynamic. To know this, one need only step foot on the campus, look at our documents, talk to anyone on our staff. Today, we share with one another our prayers, our food, our good will, and our mission; we are a community of faith.

FAITH COMMUNITY – THE GOOD, THE BAD, AND THE UGLY

The term, «faith community,» supposes a unity that requires a commitment. For some of us, it sends up warning signs and caution lights. How can I be one in yet another community without being divided? «I Wanna Be Me» and this self-identity is continually challenged by the presence of others. In whatever our lifestyle – single, married, religious – people call to us through their needs, fears, hopes, and deeds. This takes our time and energy in responding to them and sometimes we can sense a loss of control over our own preferences. And many times our particular assignements create isolation – we are in our classroom, our lab, our office, the gym. The demands of our schedule, which include preparing, presenting, evaluating, moderating, leave little time or desire to acknowledge, let along appreciate, the work of others. But we do hold a shared vision – the vision of La Salle High School. Do we have a common understanding of the Mission? (We will have a chance to explore that this morning.) We derive support from others based on this shared vision even though our backgrounds differ. The idea of faith community involves a sense of belonging to one another and to God. It takes such little effort and the rewards are high. Let's work together to remove from our community any uglies – loneliness, apathy, alienation and negativism, and make it our task to build, to plant, to nourish and to care, so that those who work with us will find the support they need to do the work that they are capable of doing so that we, as a school community, become a truly living faith community.

A SPECIAL GIFT FOR ALL

Teaching in a Catholic school is more than a vision; it is a vocation, a special calling from God. It is a gift of the Holy Spirit, entrusted to the entire faith community of the Catholic school. The non-Catholic teacher also shares in this unique gift from God through identification with the Church's ministry of teaching. Every adult in a Catholic school is called to witness to the Christian values present in the life and practice of the Church and the philosophy of the school.

A Catholic school is not simply a place where lessons are taught and information transmitted. It is a center of formation as well as instruction. Students are guided toward that integration of faith with culture which is the hallmark of the Christian life. The Catholic school is governed by an operative philosophy that is attentive to the needs of today's students and illumined by the Gospel message. Not only do the courses of instruction inform students, but the entire environment and climate of the school plays a major role in their formation. This responsibility for Christian Formation belongs not only to the Brothers and religious studies teachers, it belongs to the entire faculty and staff to whom these students are entrusted. A recent Church document, «The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School,» makes a bold statement about the nature of the Catholic School. From the first moment that a student sets foot in a Catholic school, everyone should be aware of the living presence of Jesus who is with us in our journey through life as the Master Teacher. The inspiration of Jesus must be translated from the ideal into the real. The Gospel spirit should be evident in a Christian way of thought and life which permeates all facets of the educational climate. Prime responsibility for creating this unique Christian school climate rests with us, gathered here.

The American Bishops' Document, «Teach Them,» concurs. There has been an increased recognition that all share in the educational ministry, not just those specifically assigned to teach religion. Consequently, the faith witness of every adult in the school becomes vital to that school's success. Students should see in their teachers the Christian attitude and behavior that is often so conspicuously absent from the secular atmosphere in which they live. Without this witness, living in such an atmosphere, they may begin to regard Christian behavior as an impossible ideal. The image of the Catholic school has long been embodied in the presence and the person of the Brother, Sister, or Priest. The commitment of these religious men and women to the ideals of the Church and the welfare of their students has served not only to attract young people to seek fulfillment in religious life, but has served as a constant reminder to all their students that there are spiritual values beyond those lived by society in general.

The joyfully committed religious will always have a recognized influence on the atmosphere and life of the Catholic school, much as the religious community will always have the primary influence in shaping the philosophy and education practice of the schools they staff. It is the special task of lay teachers to offer their students a concrete example of the fact that people deeply involved in the world can find their truest identity and strength of character in the values and faith that Jesus taught. Students will share in this life more readily when they have concrete examples, when they see the importance that this life has for believers. Just as it is important that the religion teachers not be the only teachers identified as believers. Students need to find in their coaches and teachers of the so-called secular subjects, examples of adults who believe and practice their faith. Everyone is an important facet of the environment. Staff contributions extend beyond formal tasks and assigned duties. All have become significant adult others for students by providing caring hearts, listening ears, and affirming gestures. I have often observed that the first people our returning grads want to see are those in the office – the ones who had to deal with them when they were late, or had a problem in class, or were frightened or unsure.

THIS MINISTRY OF OURS
(2/2)
Presentation to Faculty/Staff of La Salle High School, Pasadena. September, 1990

WHAT IS THE CATHOLIC SCHOOL?

In «To Teach as Jesus Did,» the purpose of the Catholic school is the integration of religious truth and values with the rest of life. This is accomplished not only by its unique curriculum, but more importantly, by the presence of teachers who express an integrated approach to learning and living in their private and professional lives. The Catholic school accepts as its specific duty the comprehensive Christian formation of its students. Its mission is a critical systematic transmission of culture in the light of faith and the integration of culture with faith, and faith with daily living. Prayer and religion must permeate the entire curriculum – co-curricular as well, so that students do not see religion as a neat little package – liturgy, church, religion class – but rather as life itself. One way we can be God's instruments of salvation is to give students quality education and skills necessary for their temporal life. Our mission is to proclaim the Gospel to our students. God will give them the message, if we announce it, model it, and train them with the tools to discern it.

The Vatican II Declaration on Christian Education proclaims:

> Catholic Education is a form of education which promotes the development of the whole person – body, mind, spirit – and fosters the entire development of human life. The example and teachings of Jesus Christ provide the inspiration and the course of Catholic Education. As a life-long process, Catholic Education is a socio-religious activity which enables a person to become a responsible member of the human family and willing to contribute to the well being of the global community.

WHAT ADDS THE LASALLIAN DIMENSION?

The Lasallian Charism adds a special dimension... From the very beginning, De La Salle wanted his Brothers to be ministers of God and channels of his truths. He wanted them to teach poor children and to teach them in Christian schools. In our day, Lasallian schools are run by both Brothers and lay people. De La Salle's thinking has lost none of its astonishing relevance. Its influence extends beyond the Brothers' communities; it reaches out to all who wish to work, guided by his inspiration. (Brother John Johnston, F.S.C.) The purpose of the Brothers' institute is the Lasallian way of expressing the basic message of the Gospel: proclaim Jesus Christ. Therefore, a Lasallian school should be characterized by the fact that it makes its students actively responsible for their own development. They have to learn how to be involved in their own education and develop social responsibility. To achieve this, they should be given an active role to play in class. The pupil is not an object which receives; rather he is the one who thinks, who searches, who discovers, who creates. All this implies a certain teacher-taught relationship. It is not one between someone who knows everything and badly misunderstands the idea of authority, and other person who knows nothing. Rather it is a relationship of communion and brotherhood and sisterhood. This importance of knowing and living the philosophy takes us to this morning's activity.

With regard to what is taught, a Lasallian school takes care to prepare its students to take their place in present-day society and in that of the future. This implies constant adaptation to society as it evolves but without losing a critical spirit. Moreover, what is taught is not simply a body of knowledge, but also and perhaps principally, values that are the foundation of the education of the whole person. In Lasallian schools, pupils are taught to be active agents not only in their own education, but also in social transformation. De La Salle himself challenged the society of his day by actions which appeared revolutionary at the time. The Lasallian school is a school whose whole life, at every moment of the day, should consist in living out the teachings of the Good News in the presence of Jesus. And this Good News is that we are all certainly saved and risen with him, and that its key word is love.

St. La Salle instructs his teachers to look upon themselves as ministers of God and the administrators of his mysteries. He reminds them that they have been called by God to this ministry and given the grace of teaching and the gift of exhortation for the sake of those entrusted to their care. He says fulfill your ministry with all the affection of your heart. You are co-workers with God in his work.

It is the mission of the Lasallian teacher to teach the students to love authentically, to proclaim what we believe and practice what we teach; to be patient, taking time to develop with our students a community of knowledge and faith; to be kind – gentle with the slow learner and the problem student. Learning and maturity are encouraged more by patient guidance than by stern demands. The teacher must be truthful. The teaching must be hopeful, seeking to inspire the students with a desire for knowledge and the conviction that God has given them personal talents to be developed. The teacher must inspire the students to develop uniquely the potential which each possesses.

THE IMPORTANCE OF KNOWING AND OWNING THE PHILOSOPHY

The unique vehicle for accomplishing these tasks is the thoughtfully prepared and reflectively integrated philosophy of the school. On this written statement of philosophy, goals, and objectives hinges the success or failure of the entire education effort. Therefore, it is essential that each member of the faculty understand, profess, and implement the school's statement of philosophy. It is also essential, if for no other reason than a unity in teaching, that each member of the community, albeit with differing degrees of awareness, adopts a common vision based on adherence to a scale of values in which he/she believes.

Every teacher in a Catholic school conveys both a content and an attitude about religion. In every discipline and course, religious values are lived and communicatted. It is important that all of us understand how a message related to faith is explicitly or implicitly transmited. As stated in the Catholic School Document of the Church, «it is the task of the whole faculty and staff, to ensure that a distinctive Christian educational environment is maintained in practice.» We have been selected to be here because we have demonstrated that we are qualified and committed to the mission of La Salle High School. We want to grow in faith, integrate that faith into our work, and help to create a genuine community of belief and service. In the Second Vatican Council's Declaration on Christian Education, it states: let teachers realize that to the greatest possible extent they determine whether the Catholic school can bring its goals and understandings to fruition. Bound by charity to one another and to their students and penetrated by an apostolic spirit, let them give witness to Christ, the Master Teacher, by their lives as well as by their teachings.

I ASKED FOR WONDER – ABRAHAM HESCHELL:

«Everything depends on the person who stands in front of the classroom. The teacher is not an automatic fountain from which intellectual beverages may be obtained. He is either witness or stranger. To guide a pupil into the promised lands, the teacher must have been there himself. When asking: Do I stand for what I teach? Do I believe what I say? he must be able to answer in the affirmative. What we need more than anything else is not textbooks, but textpeople. It is the personality of the teacher which is the text that the pupils read; the text they will never forget.»

TOWARDS A BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF THE LASALLIAN FAMILY

1. WHAT IS THE LASALLIAN FAMILY?

The Lasallian Family is a spiritual entity born of the communion between persons and groups "who wish to derive their inspiration from De La Salle in order to grow as men and women of faith, at the service of the local Church, and as people particularly committed to the field of education" (Circ. 422, p.13).

"When we speak of the Lasallian Family we refer to that body of persons who make up those movements and groups all of which have been forming according to the spiritual and pedagogical experience of St. John Baptist de La Salle" (Message of the 41st General Chapter to the members of the Lasallian Family, p.29).

2. WHERE DOES THE LASALLIAN FAMILY EXIST?

The Lasallian Family normally exists within the framework of a District. Why in a District ?

1. Because it is a clear and well-defined geographical sector of the Institute which already has all the elements, structures, means and organisation to ensure the unity and communion that are indispensable if we are to speak in terms of a family.

"The District, as the ordinary communion existing among its communities and Brothers, is more than a structure of government" (Rule 124).

2. Because it has a head, the Brother Visitor, "the guarantor of the unity and vitality of the District" (Rule 132).

3. Because normally a District has a District Plan. This Plan states in general terms what the District plans to do for a given period of time with regard to the religious life of the Brothers and its ministry of Christian education, a mission entrusted to the Institute by the Church. This Plan is implemented by means of clearly structured programmes.

4. Because each District has structures of government, organisation and evaluation such as District Chapters, District Councils, specialised permanent commissions, ad hoc commissions, etc. whose work is complementary, interdependent and unified by common criteria, approach to work and planning of activities.

5. Because in a District is to be found the concrete reality in which the apostolate of the Institute is pursued through formal education (schools, colleges, intitutions) or informal (youth groups, Old Boys, social work groups, voluntary work groups, summer activities, married women catechists, Signum Fidei...). This is the context in which the District Plan is implemented.

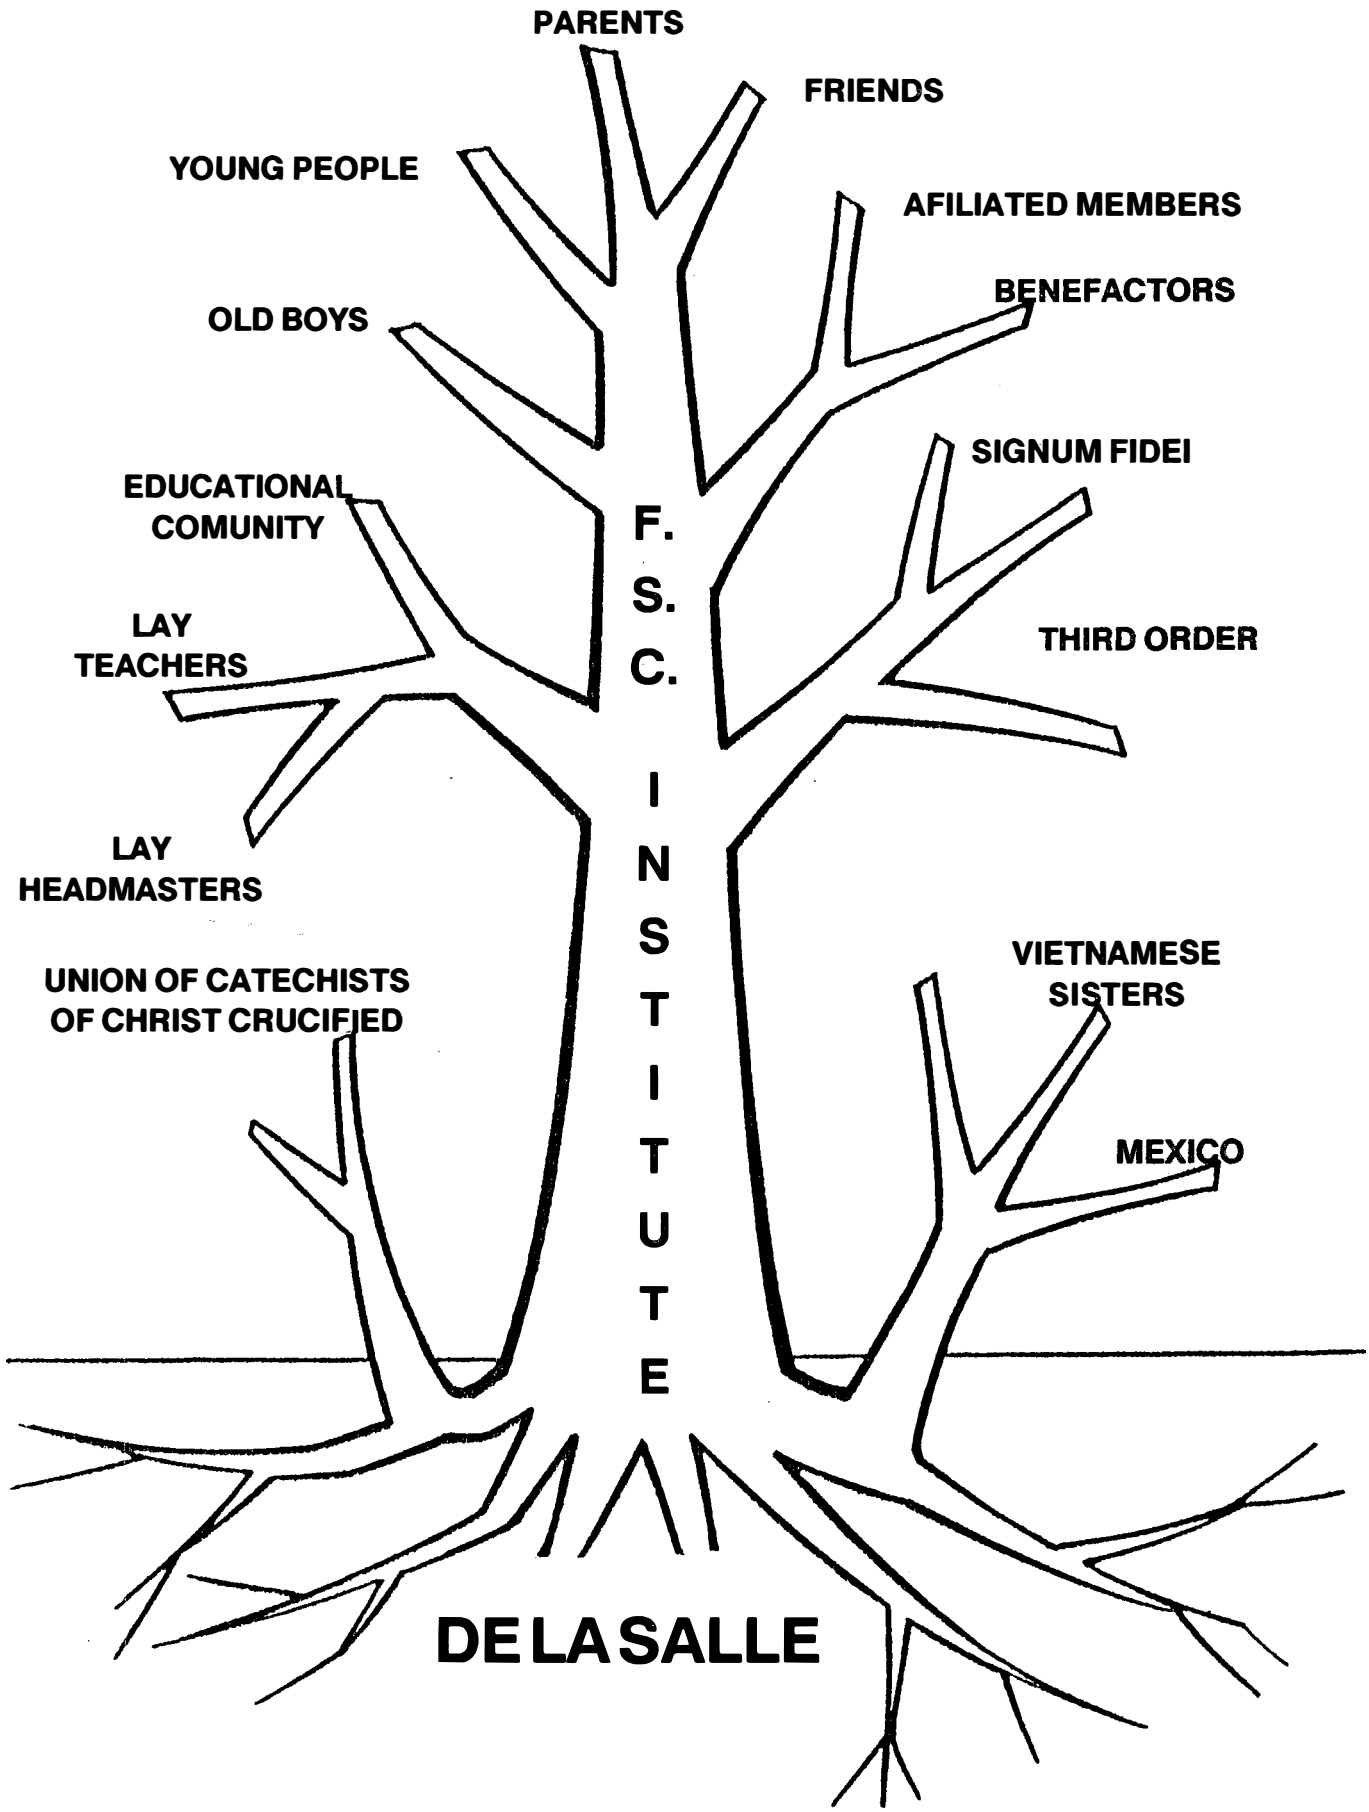
All these advantages make the District the ideal framework for the birth, growth and consolidation of the Lasallian Family.

3. THE DISTRICT: A GREAT COMMUNITY OF COMMUNITIES

The District, which is a place of communion and participation, is made up of small groups of persons which we call communities.

1. In the first place there are the communities of Brothers whose identity is clearly defined in the Rule.

2. There are groups of lay people, the majority of which have sprung up recently or are still being trained, whose aim and ideal are to become faith communities. These alone can guarantee the authentic fulfilment of the baptismal covenant and the missionary commitment which is the consequence of this covenant.



It is within a District that Brothers' communities and the various lay groups, whether they are part of educational communities or not, work in a complementary manner to achieve the same aim: to fulfil the District Plan. Seen as a plan for all the communities of Brothers and lay people, it can equally be called The District Lasallian Family Plan.

THE IDENTITY OF THE RELIGIOUS AND OF THE LAY PERSON IN THE SHARED MISSION

The basic question

For some time now, there has been much thinking, and much has been said and written about our "shared mission" with the lay people who work with us in the ministry of Christian education.

On various occasions I have heard a difficulty brought up and a question put that deserves a very serious and judicious response if we are not to run the risk of changing the nature of the identity of the persons (religious and lay) who exercise this ministry, especially where the identity of the religious is concerned.

This question can be phrased in various ways, but it can be summarised as follows: "If it is true that the lay person working with us in our school accomplishes the same mission as the Brothers and fulfils the same ministry with the same professional and apostolic efficiency (and even better) why is there still a need for the Brothers ? So what is now the meaning of his vocation and his consecration ?

The conclusions we draw will depend on the answer we give to this question: either the vocation of the Brother of the Christian Schools is no longer necessary for the Church since lay people can do as much; or his vocation and life still have now as before a special significance.

* * *

1. "Our shared mission"

– What mission are we talking about ?

We are talking about the mission that God confided to the Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools through the foundation made by St. John Baptist de La Salle which was later recognised and confirmed by the Church which gave it its approbation. It is the mission which consists in evangelising children and young people by means of Christian education given in schools.

– Who is the depositary of this mission ?

The Institute as a body, as a religious family established and recognised by the Church.

Consequently, all the Brothers collectively, and each one of them as a member of the Institute, are the depositary of this ecclesial mission.

– How is this mission of evangelisation by means of Christian education accomplished ?

By means of work which is transformed into an apostolic ministry because it is directed to the accomplishment of the apostolic mission.

It cannot be said that all work accomplished by a Christian is a "ministry", given that such a characteristic derives from a "mandate" or an ecclesial "sending" for an apostolic end.

On the other hand, the Brother is an "envoy", an "apostle", a "missionary". His whole life, his whole existence consist in being an envoy, apostle and missionary. Consequently, his whole being, his whole person is permeated by "his ministry", by "his work", including the time when he is not actually actively pursuing them.

– With whom is this mission shared ?

The Institute, the depositary of the mission, and the Brothers who form it offer the lay people who work with them in the work of Christian education the possibility of "taking part", of participating in their ecclesial mission.

The lay people who "work" with the Institute can "share" this mission. Where this is so their "work" likewise is transformed into an "apostolic ministry" because it is directed to the mission.

Logically speaking, if the Institute did not exist it could not be the depositary of a mission; and a non-existent mission could not be shared with anyone. This of course does not exclude the possibility of the Church recognising other groups of the faithful exercising a similar mission. But in that case, it would not be "the mission of our Institute".

– What conditions are required for sharing the mission ?

It is necessary first of all to be related to the Institute.

Next, it is necessary to accept and be willing to collaborate in pursuing the apostolic aims of the Institute.

In addition, it is necessary to accomplish the work in question with the aim of achieving these aims: Christian education.

It seems logical to state that simply the fact of materially working in a Christian educational establishment does not necessarily mean that a person shares in the mission or exercises an apostolic mission. It is obvious that some people look upon their work as a means of earning their living and nothing more, leaving aside all transcendental or religious motivation. In a case such as this, it would be difficult to say that such a person shared in an apostolic mission or exercised an apostolic "ministry".

– What means make it possible to share an apostolic ministry?

Before all, to know this mission and be conscious of it. Hence the necessity to think carefully about this mission in the light of the Word of God, and to assess systematically one's response to it.

Secondly, one has to commit one's life for, since a mission of evangelisation is involved here, one has to carry the message of the Gospel within oneself and try to live according to it.

Thirdly, one has to exercise the ministry in communion with the Institute, as a response to the mandate received from it.

Finally, one must become a part of the "educational community" responsible for the implementation in a specific place of the educational plan corresponding to the mission. Educators at a Christian school form a "community". No one can work on his own, for his own ends, nor can he dissociate himself from the others or the common plan.

* * *

2. The same ministry but a distinct identity

1. From what has been said, one can conclude that in practice lay people can exercise the same apostolic ministry as the Brother. A ministry which derives from a mission.

2. It should be noted that the Brother is the depositary of this mission. As for the lay person, he shares in the mission of the Brother.

3. Both commit themselves to Christian education through schools, as a mission from the Church, but the nature of their commitment is different.

● The lay person commits his work, his strength, his enthusiasm and his zeal to ensure that the school achieves its aims.

However, his life, because he is a lay person, imposes on him other obligations and other forms of devotedness, for example, with regards to his family and whatever concerns the future of his children.

● The Brother, for his part, commits his whole existence, with all that this implies:

TO MAINTAIN THE SCHOOLS
TOGETHER AND BY ASSOCIATION WITH THE OTHER BROTHERS.

* This commitment presupposes
CONSECRATION TO GOD

* with the acceptance of
A SPECIFIC WAY
OF LIVING THE GOSPEL, that is to say,

– adopting consecrated celibacy for the sake of the Kingdom by giving up the possibility of having a family by consecrating all his strength and love (fraternity: love for children, for Brothers and the adults with whom he comes into contact) for the sake of spreading the Gospel.

– practising consecrated poverty, which presupposes working gratuitously without reward; putting all his personal wealth (talents, time, etc.)
at the disposal of others;
not having personal material goods and sharing with others what he has;
living modestly.

– sacrificing his own will by accepting all destinations and jobs which the Institute considers opportune in the pursuit of the aims of the mission.

4. The Brother is, consequently, a person who has chosen "to consecrate himself" to God by vows of consecrated celibacy, poverty and obedience in order to commit himself to the maintenance of the Christian schools together and by association with the other Brothers.

These elements, expressed clearly in the Brothers' formula of vows, confer on us an identity which is different from that of lay people who exercise the same ministry. Our commitment to maintain the Christian Schools is of a different order. It is also more radical, more profound. It embraces very important aspects of our life, which is not so in the case of the lay person: celibacy, acquisition and use of goods, willingness to go anywhere and take on any employment, community life, stability in an associated commitment, responsibility in the apostolic mission of the Institute.

* * *

I think that what makes religious different from lay people is not that they make public profession of living the Gospel fully, radically and consistently. All Christians in fact should do so and should of course live the Gospel publicly as it is and without restrictions. There is only one Gospel, and it is the same Gospel for all of us. It is by living the Gospel according to our own situation that we respond to our vocation to holiness. This is common to all the faithful, whether religious or lay.

What makes us different basically is that in order to achieve some precise aims relating to the extension of the Kingdom of God, in our particular case, the maintenance of the Christian schools, we have chosen an appropriate way of living the Gospel: living together and by association, in consecrated celibacy, poverty and obedience.

Our road to sanctity consists in being consistent with the way of living the Gospel which we have chosen: consecrated by vows to God to fulfil a mission which he has entrusted to us. In the same way, for the lay person, the road to sanctity consists in being consistent with the way of living the Gospel required by his lifestyle.

In summary: whether we are Brothers or lay people, we can exercise the same apostolic ministry by responding to the ministry of Christian education. Both Brothers and lay people can sanctify themselves by exercising this ministry but by different ways of living the Gospel, because of their different commitments with regard to the mission of maintaining the Christian schools. These differences of commitment confer on them a distinct identity: the Brother has added to his state as a believer the choice of consecration for the Kingdom for the service of a mission.

If there were no Brothers, there would be no Institute. If there were no Institute, its mission would not exist either. If a lay person has the possibility of sharing the mission, it is therefore because the Brother exists as a person who possesses a specific identity: that of a consecrated man.

SHARED MISSION

AND LASALLIAN PHILOSOPHY

(1/2)

INTRODUCTION

IN SEARCH OF A NEW VOCABULARY ?

During our meetings and gatherings, we often use a vocabulary which we could describe as sociological or functional. We use words such as stream of consciousness, project, co-administration, co-participation, or expressions as interdependence, together and by association, shared mission, etc.

However, what connection is there between this vocabulary and the efficiency of our life? This sociological or functional vocabulary is perhaps only an echo. We spend our time repeating words which are not our own or which we do not manage to make part of our lives. It is a very up-to-date vocabulary but perhaps it does not make us efficient.

To achieve that we would have to try to make the words we take from this vocabulary more human, more community-linked, more committed. For example, we need all the participatory structures that exist, but if none of them touches what is really the heart of the school, vocabulary of this sort is of little use.

Let us not fool ourselves: if our heart is not up-to-date our vocabulary will be so in vain. It will remain old, in the negative sense of the word.

The new expression "shared mission", coined by the Rule of the Brothers of the Christian Schools in constitution N 17, has about it a good deal of creativity implying the existence of a risk, but a fruitful one. A risk because it involves facing a situation with an unknown outcome. In fact the risk involved is not one of repetition, but of undertaking something new.

Fruitfulness means the creation of another being who is not a simple repetition of ourselves. Our professions of faith, our plans could possibly be simply the repetition or copies of previous ones. If our ideal tomorrow is a repetition of yesterday, there is no fruitfulness. True fruitfulness contains an element of surprise.

By the expression "shared mission" we do not understand first and foremost the participatory structures, professions of faith, nor even plans or theoretical foundations. What we are referring to is our joy at living out our personal or institutional charism today as the 20th century comes to an end and strains towards the 21st.

Consequently the shared mission cannot consist in an oscillation between "the aspiration to be oneself" and "the resignation to be what one is". No! The needle on the scales shows that we Brothers and Lasallian lay people are uniting and organising ourselves in a union of responsibilities, commitments, spirit and style of action.

"To resign oneself to what one is" is a sign of old age, There are some people who are old at 20. The person that resigns himself creates nothing and is not happy. On the other hand, the person who has both attitudes is happy because he creates. He lives according to the spirituality of De La Salle and guarantees the Christian character of the Lasallian school.

* * *

PART ONE:

THREE FUNDAMENTAL ASPECTS OF ALL EDUCATIONAL PHILOSOPHIES

1.° "The ultimate aim of education is the complete development of the one we educate" (J. Dewey).

* By harnessing his potential through an individual process.

* By introducing him to culture by a social process. These two aims are achieved progressively by means of the assimilation of cultural values.

2.° "Every philosophy of education must be based on the educational fact which in its turn is based on experience and not only on reflection".

3.° "The philosophy of education is the result of the work of constructive criticism":

* In its critical phase: reflection about experience must lead to the formulation of certain fundamental guiding principles (Educational profession of faith).

* In its constructive phase: this involves promoting aims and values which must be related to active implementation (Educational plan).

SECOND PART:

THE LASALLIAN PHILOSOPHY OF EDUCATION

The Lasallian philosophy of education is to be found implicitly in the fundamental attitudes which guide our approach to education. This has been so now for three centuries the world over and a hundred years in Colombia.

These fundamental attitudes have always been: daily commitment and personal reflection. Both of these constantly respond to the serious questions posed by the reality one is involved in and committed to and are accompanied by an aspiration to unity in the midst of great diversity. This is the synthesis that is sought.

1.° DAILY COMMITMENT

* "The purpose of this Institute is to give a human and Christian education to the young, especially the poor, according to the ministry which the Church has entrusted to it."

John Baptist de La Salle gave a new meaning to the school by making it accessible to the poor and offering it to all as a sign of the Kingdom and as a means of salvation.

The Christian school, which has always to be given new vitality, is the preferred field for the activity of the Brothers. The Institute also explores other possibilities for teaching and education more adapted to the needs of time and place" (Rule 3).

● The daily commitment has to be seen always in a context all of whose aspects are clearly pragmatic: process, intentions, improvement, managing to be...These terms, and others, are fully reflected in the advances of contemporary philosophy relating to the theory of human action, and these have a great influence in the field of education.

● The Lasallian daily commitment is always a human action, in this case, an educational action, which is localised in space and time. In fact, our educational action is not generic, but is based on individualisation ("principia individuationis"). It achieves a creative value to the extent of producing a "body" (in this case a "community", which is why we speak of a "shared mission").

2.° PERSONAL REFLECTION

● Ryle writes as follows: "The logical geography of concepts in the field of education has not yet been mapped out, because the field itself in which education takes place depends on transactional mechanisms between individuals (plans, programmes) and in general the active and influential environment, both sociological and theological. These mechanisms always express the dynamic mode of being in the world, which enables us to speak of "cosmic education".

● The influence of these factors, phenomena and elements of the world (cosmos) - understood in their widest sense in order to include all that surrounds the individual - affects the person we educate and fashions him. This reality has to be approached by the human mind, intelligence (intus-legere), and reflection (re-flexo), otherwise the educational act will be inconsistent, asystematic, amethodical.

● That is why reflection on the Lasallian philosophy of education has been linked "ab initio" with two positions: the ethical-philosophical question and the pedagogical- philosophical question, which are always involved in reflection on methodology and ideology. This is borne out by terms such as: simultaneous, group, functional, linguistic, utopian, personalising, dialectic, liberalising, technological, interdisciplinary, globalised, vital (to learn to live), etc.

● With regard to the Lasallian philosophy of education (active for three centuries in the world in general and a century in Colombia), personal reflection has centred on equifinality (that is, on the relationship existing between the master and the disciple) and leading to isomorphism which is the harmony or equilibrium between the profile of the master and that of the disciple. In this regard, the Lasallian philosophy of education expresses itself clearly and with great vigour. (Cf. The Conduct of Schools, the Meditations for the Time of Retreat, the General Chapters ("The Brother of the Christian Schools in the World Today"), regional seminars (on education), national pedagogical congresses, gatherings, meetings, etc. A very extensive bibliography relating to this could easily be drawn up).

3.° THREE MAJOR QUESTIONS

In the Lasallian philosophy of education, this daily commitment and personal reflection have always had as points of departure the following three major questions:

* The question of man. The vital environment of the person being educated is the school community. It should be the family environment, but in our days it is so often called into question and reproached that many responses are both sought and found in the school environment.

At the present time, this question has to be resolved in the framework of the shared mission.

* The question of the world. The rational environment of the person being educated is the cosmos in which there are no "Maginot lines". Pupils come to the knowledge of this cosmos through the knowledge communicated to them not only by formal teaching in school, but also by the mass media (of which the most accessible is television).

At the present time, this question has to be resolved in the framework of the shared mission.

* The question of God. The spiritual environment of the person being educated is that of transcendental values.

"Every culture needs to be evangelised. The Brothers make every effort to get to know, to respect and to assimilate the positive values of the cultural heritage of the people where they are located and whom they are called to serve. With joy and hope the Brothers discover there the signs of the presence of the Spirit. They ensure that the ferment of the Gospel renews and enriches this cultural heritage. This effort at inculturation is equally necessary and applies as well to youth culture as to the rapidly evolving culture of contemporary society" (Rule 18).

At the present time, this question has to be resolved in the framework of the shared mission.

4.°. UNITY IN DIVERSITY, motivation of the educational task

When unity in diversity is spoken about, the stress is put on the content. This is the reason for the urgent need for committed attitudes: a Lasallian philosophy of education committed to the service of Latin America, of Colombia, of our school or educational establishment, of our immediate neighbours, of others, either near, far or still to come.

For K. Lewin, "the totality of the contemporary situation is the absolute cause of conduct". This is equivalent to saying that the conduct of an individual at a given moment is entirely a function of his personality, his vital space or field of action.

Autoeducation (represented here by unity) within heteroeducation (represented here by diversity) cannot be anything else except the simple process of maturation or of development, or the resultant of the transactions which the pupil himself establishes in a more or less spontaneous fashion with the environment. It is at this point that there appears the factor which in the Lasallian philosophy of education is known today as the "shared mission".

SHARED MISSION

(2/2)

THIRD PART:

THIS LASALLIAN PHILOSOPHY OF EDUCATION IS MORE AND BETTER APPLICABLE TODAY THANKS TO THE SHARED MISSION.

The philosophy of education which permeates an educational establishment is what defines the pedagogical act.

The pedagogical act, in so far as it is an action springing from an act of knowledge and love, needs philosophical language.

Philosophical language is what describes the existence and the situation of man in the world.

The existence of man in the world cannot be understood except as a relational existence. In his work entitled "Theory and Metatheory of Education", Antoni J. Colom Canellas states that "education could very well be reduced to a relational phenomenon" (p. 56).

Lasallian vocabulary furnishes us a new expression: the "shared mission", with the meaning of "relationships between teachers".

The dual position which has been linked "ab initio" with reflection on the Lasallian philosophy of education (cf. 2nd part, 2.0) : the ethical-philosophical and the pedagogical- philosophical questions have now become within, and as a consequence of, the shared mission, a causality and a process.

1.° A CAUSALITY

The study of educational causality forms a part of educational etiology (from the Greek "aitia": cause, foundation) and educational anthropology. Etiology as a term is reserved for research into the why and how of the educational process.

Educational causality describes therefore the deliberate intention of a person or a group of persons to bring about the education of another person or group of persons.

"Education" presupposes the conversion of a person by a process intended to bring about the internal transformation of the person.

In order that this phenomenon can come about, there has to exist a causal relationship between the educator(s) and the educated (one or more), without there necessarily being any conditioning of behaviour, alienation or absorption of one or other of the persons involved in the relationship.

Such conditioning must likewise be avoided by those who guide the educational process. "Hodogetics" (from the Greek "odos": way, "egein": guide, lead) demands not only that a "hodogogue" should be free from conditioning, but that likewise his "accompaniment" (from the Latin "cum": with, and "panis": bread) should be beyond reproach, so that the pedagogical act (from the Greek "paidos": child and "egein: to lead) can respond to the following questions: Is it possible for one man to lead another man ? Is such a guide necessary ? And in the case of an affirmative answer: What are his limits ? since it is a question here of something as delicate as the human person.

Let us reply that this not only possible but also necessary. The importance and value of such actions are all the greater when it is a group of persons ("shared mission") involved in directing the process.

(IN PARENTHESIS)

Nevertheless St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa, question 117, a.1) denies that anyone can cause the education of another: the educator cannot influence a pupil directly because he is only an external factor. The only thing an educator can do is to propose values, experiences, possibilities; explain science, culture...and the pupil will assimilate them or not, according to his own capacity to cause his own education. St. Thomas uses the example of a doctor who does not cure the patient: it is the patient that cures himself by taking the medecine provided by the doctor.

St. Augustine, for his part, uses as his thesis that of illumination to explain that it is only by this means, through a special intervention of God, that the educator can teach a pupil because God is the only true teacher.

After a certain time the following balanced conclusion was reached: the educator can transmit only the "humanising" elements he possesses but not the "humanised" elements of his person, even though the "humanised" aspect of the educator is clearly perceived by the pupil and can influence the pupil as a "humanising" factor.

The more the educator is highly "hominised" (and not only "humanised"), the greater his influence in the humanisation process of the personality.

"Hominisation" is more substantial to the extent that its source and origin are more "hominised". This educational "hominisation" has its roots firmly embedded in the founding act of John Baptist de La Salle and continues to draw strength today thanks to the shared mission though the union of "hominised" forces.

2.° AS AN EDUCATIONAL PROCESS

The educational process is the product of the dialectical integration between perfectibility and intentionality.

- Perfectibility can be:

– natural: evolution of nature, without any reference or finality outside of natural evolution.

– artificial : the regulating principle is an artifice (education is a work of art).

The educational process is not the work of the artist alone, nor of nature alone. A balance has to be sought, since no system should do violence to the nature of the subject. Were this to happen it would bring about the loss of the idea of improvement which it must necessarily include.

- Intentionality, which must be based on two principles:

– intrinsic: the nature of the pupil.

– extrinsic: (with an active element and a passive element): it is I the educator/educated who educate the pupil who, however, should not be in any way subjected to conditioning.

Causality and process are two elements of the pedagogical act which must be inspired by the philosophy of education. This involves not only a horizontal and synchronic movement, but has always, and will always, include a vertical and diachronic constant (specifically historical and evolutive) in harmony with the direction and rhythmn adopted by society.

GENERAL CONCLUSION

With regard to Lasallian lay people, the Lasallian Community does not dissociate mission from spirituality. It presupposes the union of these two aspects and proposes to its associates the following two conditions:

1. The desire to tend to evangelical perfection in their lay state.

2. The desire to observe the spirit proper to the Community, the spirit of faith.

They need therefore:

– to know what this spirit consists in.
– to strive to acquire it.

Today, the Lasallian Province of Medellin, faithful to the charism of the holy Founder and to the signs of the times discerned at the 41st General Chapter (1986) and condensed in the Rule of 1987, exhorts Lasallian lay people, in the framework of the shared mission, to dedicate their lives together with us as "school ministers" in preparation for the year 2,000, in the following two areas:

1. The commitment to teaching values, with the awareness that personal witness and the relational atmosphere of the educational community are important factors in causality and the process of "autodidaxis" and "heterodidaxis".

2. Opening up teaching to the spiritual dimension.
This is the evangelical option of the person who considers his life to be a vocation to serve humanity. In fact, only the person who accepts to be part of the interdependent world of gratuity and dedication can truly say that he is accomplishing "the ministry God has confided to him".

SOME INDIVIDUAL LASALLIAN APOSTOLATES

One apparent development in the Institute, at least here in the United States, probably elsewhere as well, seems to be an increase in the number of Brothers who, as Rule 16b says, «are called upon to work outside the establishments conducted by the Institute.» How much of this is actually an increase, or something new in the history of the Institute, probably needs further study. Perhaps also it is only a transitory phenomenon, but again it may be a significant facet of the evolution that our Institute is going through at this time. As Rule 3 says, «The Institute also explores other possibilities (than schools) for teaching and educating more adapted to the needs of time and place.» In any case, it seems worth while to publicize some examples of great work that some individual Brothers are doing «outside the establishments conducted by the Institute.» Two such examples are given in this presentation.

The first is Brother Jeffrey Gros of the St. Louis District who lives in the Good Shepherd parish elementary school community of our Brothers in New York City and is a full-time Assistant General Secretary of the National Council of Churches of Christ/USA. He is Director of the Commission on Faith and Order, a counterpart of that Commission of the World Council of Churches, and has held that office since 1981.

As stated in the current Standing Rules of the Council, the purpose of the Commission on Faith and Order is «To enable communions to proclaim the oneness of the Church of Jesus Christ and to call the churches to the goals of visible unity in one faith and one eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and in the common life in Christ, that the world may believe.» (Currently the Council is undergoing some reorganization, which may change the titles and the assignments of its commissions.)

Brother Jeffrey became interested in ecumenism in 1963 while studying the Decreee on Ecumenism of Vatican II and teaching the subject to his high school religion class in Memphis, Tennessee. In this city the Brothers' schools always welcomed Protestant and Jewish students, a policy that grew into an ecumenical commitment following the Council. On the advice of the Brother Visitor Brother Jeffrey took courses in Protestant theology and later earned a doctorate in systematic theology from the School of Theology at Fordham, the Jesuit University in New York City. He has been twice reelected for three-year terms to his position in the Council. As Director of the Faith and Order Commission he has organized and supervised the work of the Commission which is composed of fifty representatives of the different churches that hold the belief that Jesus is Savior and Lord. Members are nominated by their churches, ratified by the Council's Nominating Committee, and elected by the Governing Board. The Commission meets twice a year. An Executive Committee, composed of twelve members of the Commission, selected in the same manner as Commission members, meets in between meetings of the Commission, or more often as needed.

Besides exercising leadership of the work of the Commission, Brother Jeffrey among other duties organizes a program of studies in ecumenism, is a frequent speaker at the councils of the different churches, edits studies on ecumenical issues, plans various seminars, and writes articles for theological journals and periodicals.

Clearly his work is Christian education, but not limited to a classroom in a single school, college, or university. He is reaching out to a much more diversified and extensive population, one that is at the cutting edge of the growth of Christianity in the world today. Reflecting on his experience in ecumenism over the past 25 years, Brother Jeffrey says, «We are only just beginning to realize the impact on the commitments of the Council in our own Roman Catholic ecclesial life and spiritual development. Our ecumenical partners have the same burden of educational, relational, and renewal tasks before them. ...Many personal enrichments and spiritual graces have come from prayer, from caring people, and from study in the ecumenical movement. But the greatest sign of the Holy Spirit's presence these years is the renewal that has been wrought in the Church, and that is promised among the churches – a dirct result of the call to unity in Christ.»

Another example of special apostolic work by an individual Brother «outside the establishments conducted by the Institute» is the work of Brother Gerard Frendreis. In one sense he is part of an Institute work established in 1981 by the eight Districts of the United States, the Christian Brothers Investment Services, Inc. (CBIS). This agency manages the financial resources of religious communities, dioceses, and educational institutions. The President of CBIS is also a Brother, Michael W. O'Hern, of the Chicago District. Currently CBIS is managing over $600 million. The primary purpose of the management is to safeguard and promote the funds of various religious institutions. Closely related to this purpose is making sure that the investment of these funds conforms to the ideals of Christian social justice.

Brother Gerard is a member of the Baltimore District and lives in the Hudson Catholic High School Brothers' Community in Jersey City, New Jersey. His office is located in New York City where he works with the other nine staff members of CBIS, including Brother Michael. He is the one who is responsible to see to it that the $600 million are invested in accord with Christian principles of social justice and concern for the poor. To assist him in this work Brother Gerard represents CBIS as a member of the Interfaith Center as Corporate Responsibility (ICCR), and among other things, as a subscriber to the Investment Responsibility research Center (IRRC). Incidentally, the ICCR is a part of the National Council of Churches of Christ where Brother Jeffrey carries out his ecumenical work. Brother Gerard's job is to keep informed of how the investment of the CBIS funds is actually being used. To do this he must continually study the reports of ICCR and IRRC, attend their meetings, represent CBIS at meetings of the corporate stockholders of corporations in which CBIS funds are invested, know what these corporations are actually doing, and speak up and vote at these meetings, in order to represent the Christian values of CBIS; he also goes directly to the executive board meetings of these corporations to explain and request appropriate action on particular issues.

Some of these issues are: raising money for housing, for small businesses, credit unions; promoting fair employment, product safety, quality, and equitable marketing; monitoring and championing environmental concerns; taking action on behalf of South Africa and third world countries (e.g., debt reduction and human dignity); speaking up on life ethics (e.g., control of genetic engineering, birth, life maintenance, death, and other medical issues), etc., etc.

Brother Gerard holds an MS degree in Mathematics Education from Duquesne University, an MA degree in Applied Economics from the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, and has completed all the courses and comprehensive examinations for the doctorate in Finance at the Wharton School. He was an instructor at the Wharton School and at La Salle University before becoming the Financial Advisor and "Social Activist" for CBIS. In this position he is a member of a three-person team that is responsible for all the decisions related to the investment of the funds that are managed by CBIS. He is also Editor of Principles, a "Letter of Socially Responsible Investing" that is published for the clients of CBIS about eight times a year, explaining all the action taken by CBIS on behalf of social justice in the management of their funds.

The Pope's encyclical Solicitudo Rei Socialis speaks of the "structures of sin" (§'s 36, 37), and in particular «the all-consuming desire for profit» and «the thirst for power»... «at any price» which adversely affects the development of the poor of the world. Often well-intentioned Christians feel powerless to do anything about these structures, e.g., action of nations, economic cartels, multi-national corporations, etc. CBIS has adquired a level of power, especially in cooperation with the Interfaith Center on Corporate responsibility that gives it the opportunity to work ecumenically, to direct some of the action in these structures. Brother Gerard has the training and the enthusiasm, as well as the pedagogical skills to guide the exercise of this power as a work of Christian education.

There are at least a score of other individual Brothers in the United States who are exercising similar educational apostolates. They are exploring and creating «other possibilites for teaching and educating» that are «adapted to the needs of time and place.» They seem to be a sign of the vitality of the Institute in our world today. If there is an interest, maybe their work and similar work from all the countries of the world should be presented in the future.

INTRODUCTION

● With the the present issue, the 23rd, LASALLIANA begins its fourth year of existence (stage 2). The number of readers is growing with the increase in orders for our publication. The number of our contributors is increasing also: numerous and excellent articles are reaching us from all over the world. They will all be published, and we are grateful for the interest shown by all those who wish to share their ideas, their thinking, their research and their concerns with the other members of the Lasallian Family.

● The Bibliographia lasalliana booklet which is included in each issue of Lasalliana is also very much appreciated. Booklet N° 8 was included with issue N° 22. It gave a list of educational books published by the Brothers in Colombia.

Several Districts have decided to follow their example and are preparing a list of their own publications. These will be published in time.

● Starting with this year, we will be offering something extra to readers of Lasalliana. Each year, subscribers will receive a special issue free. This means that there will continue to be three normal issues a year to which will be added a fourth, unnumbered, which will normally be devoted to a single topic. We are able to do this at no extra cost to readers because the number of subscriptions from Districts has been steadily rising.

The 1992 special issue is enclosed with the present issue of Lasalliana, the 23rd. It contains the pictures of our Brothers who have been canonised, beatified, or whose causes are at present under consideration. On the back of each picture is a short biography of the Brother concerned. We have arranged things so that pictures can be framed.

● Subscriptions to Lasalliana are usually arranged through the District. We receive many orders from communities, schools and even individuals who wish to receive Lasalliana directly. Except in special cases, would-be subscribers are asked to contact their Visitor who will be happy to adjust the number of copies needed by his District each time the need arises.

MEDITATIONS OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE – II – (1/2)

Brother Mario Presciuttini

5. The central themes of Lasallian teaching

This article sets out to summarise the basic themes of the spiritual teaching of De La Salle, as contained in his works as a whole and in particular in his Meditations. It is based broadly on a summary of the Saint's teaching drawn up by Saturnino Gallego (op.cit. pp.17-57).

1. The underlying principle: THE SPIRIT OF FAITH

This is the central core and the underlying principle governing the thinking and lifestyle presented to us by De La Salle in his Meditations.

The "spirit of faith" means, first and foremost, trust and self-abandonment into the hands of God, as expressed by De La Salle on his deathbed: "I adore in all things the will of God in my regard." This is the permanent attitude of the person who lives and walks in the presence of God, and who looks upon reality in terms of its relationship to God. It is the internal and supernatural principle behind every thought, judgment and action.

For De La Salle, the spirit of faith does not mean so much an intellectual act of acceptance of truths, as a faith that is lived intensely and in which the whole person is involved. "But let us remember that it will profit us little to have received the light of faith if we do not live according to the spirit of Christianity, and if we do not observe the maxims of the Gospel. The chief aim to be realised by our faith is the practice of what we believe" (Med. 175, 2; cf. also 84, 3; 139, 3; 197, 2; etc.).

The following consequences follow quite naturally from this basic principle:

1.1 Discerning the will of God

For De La Salle this is the first effect of the spirit of faith: a person undertakes to listen for the calls and the plans of the Father who loves, saves and sends.

There are three basic ways in which we can listen and which involve discernment:

(a) Holy Scripture

While statements about the central position occupied by this source of discernment are frequently repeated in the Meditations, it is the practical example of how one should set about this listening to the Scriptures that is even more frequently illustrated: references to the Word of God are part of the very texture of all the Meditations; explicit quotations and allusions reflect the permanent dialogue of the author with the God who speaks and calls, and is a practical spiritual example for the reader.

"May this reading fill you with God's divine spirit that you may do all these things with ease" (Med. 192, 1). One could say that this summarises what is meant by this means which is recommended so frequently.

(b) The guidance of the Holy Spirit

A characteristic recommendation of De La Salle is that one should think and act "under the impulse of the Spirit" (cf. Med. 43, 2; 44; 79, 1; etc.). He is the interior guide who enlivens the spirit of faith and with his gifts (De La Salle stresses in particular wisdom, piety and fortitude) guides discernment and stimulates and accompanies action.

(c) In community

This is an easy form of discernment in particular for religious, but not only for them. To seek the will of God together in faith is a way open to all Christians, especially if they are involved in apostolic work undertaken as part of a community.

"When choosing Mathias to replace Judas, the Apostles not only prayed but they also conferred among themselves in order not to settle anything without taking counsel...It is thus that God wishes you to act in all that pertains to your conduct and your ministry" (Med. 107, 2).

1.2 To follow the will of God

This is the second effect of the spirit of faith: the faith that served to guide the listening and discernment also guides and sustains the implementation of God's known will.

That is why De La Salle insists in his Meditations on the practical expression of faith by acts. The words of St. James' epistle are constantly quoted: "Faith is like that: if good works do not go with it, it is quite dead" (Jm 2, 17; cf. Med. 84, 3; 175, 2; 197, 2; 200, 3...).

All the Meditations, therefore, offer a practical way of implementing this faith each day both in the personal spiritual life as well as in the apostolic or professional work of the Christian educator.

1.3 The principal devotions

The spirit of faith is increased and deepened by means of a number of well-tried and recognised devotions.

De La Salle does not involve himself in special and passing "devotions". Taking as his point of departure the Word of God and the light of the Holy Spirit, he suggests the following basic devotions:

(a) The person of Jesus as a model seen especially in the three principal "mysteries" of his life:

* childhood (cf. Med. 85; 86; 93; 96;...)

* the passion: (cf. Med. 23-28; 104; 121; 129; 145; 152; 165; 195, 1).

* the Eucharist: (cf. Med. 26; 47-55; many passing references)

(b) The person of Mary as a model. The use of "The most Blessed Virgin" by De La Salle. Many Meditations treat of this devotion which was so very much a part of his life and which he taught so vigorously to his spiritual sons (cf. Med. 82; 83; 88, 3; 112; 146; 151...). Very specially recommended is the use of the rosary (cf. Med. 150, 3; 151, 3).

(c) In connection with Mary, St. Joseph is given special prominence as an example of the spirit of faith, of openness to the will of God and, in particular, as a model for the Christian educator (Med. 110).

MEDITATIONS OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE – II – (2/2)

Brother Mario Presciuttini

2. The means of nourishing the spirit of faith: MEDITATION IN THE PRESENCE OF GOD.

For De La Salle, this particular form of prayer called mental prayer or meditation is the indispensable source of nourishment and support for the spirit of faith.

Closely related to it is the idea of the presence of God, that is, living, thinking and making choices always with reference to God in the midst of everyday life.

The presence of God is a characteristic of Lasallian spirituality. The Meditations for Sundays and Feasts constantly recall its importance and benefits: habitual attention to the holy presence of God "gives a foretaste of eternal bliss" (Med. 179, 3) because it enables one "to enjoy God by anticipation" (Med. 177, 3) and "because it is so useful to you in your employment. As your work relates to God and the salvation of souls, it is most important not to lose sight of God while performing it" (Med. 179, 3; Sauvage/Campos op.cit. p.151).

It is in mental prayer or meditation that this contact and union take place, and during it that one can learn the will of God (cf. Med. 37, 2; 62, 2/3; 42, 3; 181, 3...) and dispose oneself to fulfil it through love (cf. Med. 36, 2; 177, 3...).

Lasallian meditation is characterised not only by the presence of God but also by some basic elements revealed by its structure: it is

(a) Christocentric: De La Salle considers Jesus especially in the mystery of his incarnation and in his redeeming mission: the work of the Christian teacher who shares in the same salvific mission is constantly linked with the work of Jesus himself (cf. Med. 33; 39, 2; 61, 3; 70, 2; 86, 3; 106, 3; 193, 3; 195; 196, 2...).

(b) Biblical: All the models for meditation offered by De La Salle are centred on the Bible; there is a constant recurrence of Biblical passages containing "maxims" or "mysteries" on which to build one's spiritual life; Suggestions of this nature are frequent and forceful: "It is from this sacred book that you must draw the knowledge which you should daily offer to your pupils. Thus they will imbibe the true Christian spirit. But it is necessary that you, in the first place, should nourish your soul with the holy truths contained in this precious book, and that you should let them sink into your mind by frequently meditating thereon" (Med. 159, 1; cf. Med. 170, 1; 192).

(c) Ministerial: It is so first of all in the sense that meditation nourishes and prepares for the fulfilment of one's educational ministry: "It is your duty to go up to God every day by mental prayer to learn from him all that you must teach your children, and then come down to them by accommodating yourself to their level in order to teach them what God has communicated to you for them - as much in your mental prayer as in the holy scriptures which furnish you with the truths of religion and the practical maxims of the holy gospel" (Med. 198, 1). The Meditations for the Time of Retreat go so far as to make the educational apostolate the exclusive object of mental prayer!

It is so also in the sense that it is a prayer for those being educated; a prayer of intercession, a prayer for sufficient light to guide them (cf. in this connection, Secondino Scaglione, "Preghiera ministeriale nelle Meditazioni di S.G.B. de La Salle", Rivista Lasalliana, 4/1971).

3. A view of life through the eyes of faith: ONENESS OF SPIRITUAL LIFE AND APOSTOLATE

This is the foundation of apostolic work and the practical way in which the spirit of faith finally expresses itself.

The spirit of faith makes it possible to do away with the dichotomy that is often found between the religious (Mass, devotions, prayer, sacraments, catechism...) and the secular (studies, teaching, work, entertainment, material needs...).

For De La Salle, this dichotomy is overcome by the view of faith which looks upon every action in life as part of God's plan and one that is carried out with a view to its accomplishment.

In accordance with a principle which he states in his personal rule of life, and which he constantly repeats in various writings, "one must not make a distinction between the duties of one's state and the question of one's personal sanctification and salvation."

Life must be united around a single central point which draws it to itself and from which it radiates. Sauvage/Campos (op. cit. p.138) make this point: "To act in view of God means to make the unconditional consecration of one's whole life to God part of everyday life." There are many Meditations in which De La Salle stresses the power of a commitment which ends only with the sacrifice of oneself for God. "To commit it only to him means really to sacrifice one's life for him." For a Brother, this fundamental commitment is translated into zeal to work for the good of the pupils. In order to fulfil his duty properly, he must "consecrate himself entirely and give his life". An interior fire such as this is all-devouring: it enables the Brother to direct all his actions to God, to give him all his time, all his thoughts, his whole heart. (cf. Med. 58, 1; 70, 2; 104, 2; 114, 3; 135, 2...). And this happens whatever the activity involved even when it is apparently "secular". The zeal of which De La Salle often speaks is none other than faith translated into action.

3.1 The theology of education

This strongly unitary view of life is the basis of De La Salle's whole theology of education developed in his Meditations, especially in those for the Time of Retreat.

According to it, "The Christian educator, imbued with the spirit of faith and guided by the Holy Spirit, contemplates in his meditation the mystery of Christ, God's only plan, God who reveals himself in life and who wishes to save all mankind in Christ. In it he becomes aware of the needs of young people, communicates with the salvific will of God, offers himself to the Father in the Spirit and in Christ, in order to contribute to the "salvation" of these young people: to help them to live according to the Christian spirit in every single moment of their lives" (S.Gallego, op.cit. p.33).

The main points of this theology of education can be briefly summarised as follows:

(a) God takes the initiative

Either in the foundation of the Christian Schools (cf. Med. 193), or in the call of the Christian educator to the mission (cf. Med. 131; 140, 2; 146, 2; 177, 1; 197, 3...).

(b) The purpose of the Christian school is complete salvation

This consists either in human growth through instruction, or personal spiritual growth through the teaching of the truth and apprenticeship in Christian life, or social growth through initiation into ecclesial and secular life.

(c) The Christian educator is a collaborator of God

* he is called and prepared by God; * he is entrusted with an ecclesial ministry; * he becomes an instrument of grace by his witness and work; * he is at the service of all the pupils, in particular of those who are poor and weak; * he takes care over his initial and continuing formation; * he always acts as an active member of an educational community. (These topics are treated in the following section devoted to the Meditations for the Time of Retreat).

(d) The education offered by the Christian school:

* is directed to the development of the whole person (cf. Med. 160, 3); * is characterised by tender attention to each pupil (cf. Med. 33); * takes place in an atmosphere of solidarity, responsibility, commitment which includes vigorous evangelising action.

* * *

This process, which is based on the spirit of faith and affects the whole life of a person, including the smallest pedagogical indications, can be followed throughout the length of the Meditations.

Some topics are certainly developed more fully and in greater detail in other works of De La Salle, but they can all be found in the Meditations, if only by allusion, and all are linked to a Gospel text, to the example of a saint, or to a systematic consideration of the educational apostolate of the school.

As has already been said several times, the Meditations for the Time of Retreat are concerned exclusively with this last point, and now I should like to treat them in some detail.

ST.JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE AND CATECHISM IN THE LIGHT OF «THE CONDUCT OF SCHOOLS»

Brother Jean Paul Chastel

We all know what great importance St.La Salle attaches to catechism. He uses the word "catechism" 191 times in his writings, and of these, 93 are to be found in The Conduct of the Christian Schools.

At the very beginning of the Common Rule where he sets out the aims of the Institute and speaks of the need for it, the Founder says that "the aim of this Institute is to give a Christian education to children...by teaching them the mysteries of our religion" (Common Rule I,3). Further on, in Chapter VII, he says: "They will take care above all to teach their pupils their prayers and catechism" (Common Rule VII, 5).

In the Conduct of the Christian Schools, he mentions five important areas with regard to which pupils ought to be reproved - the word he uses is "corrected". One of the areas is catechism. These five areas are highlighted by apposite sayings "posted up in various parts of the classroom". For catechism the saying goes as follows: "Pay attention during the catechism lesson" (CL.24, pp.130-131).

How does St.La Salle envisage catechism in his Conduct of the Christian Schools?

1. Link with the diocese

There are several instances where he speaks of a "diocesan catechism".

Among the books provided for the poor free of charge there is the diocesan catechism manual:

«The poor can be given hymn books, school prayers, the diocesan catechism and other books used in the Christian Schools, which will not be provided free of charge to those who can afford them» (CL. p.139, No 9).

For the others, "In each class there should be one or several copies of the diocesan catechism".

With regard to testing, "a note will be kept of all the times he did not know his diocesan catechism" (p.137).

With regard to the pupils themselves, "they will question one another, by twos, on the diocesan catechism" (p.108).

Elsewhere, when speaking about the teacher, St.La Salle says that "he will not say anything in his catechism lessons which he has not read in some well-approved book" (CL. p.103, No.10).

There is no freedom to improvise.

2. The material taught

There is no freedom to improvise. Each week, the Brother Director announces the topic to be taught during catechism lessons. "On Sunday, the Brother Director will announce the topic to be spoken about in catechism lessons during the following week, beginning with Monday" (p.99, No.16).

Catechism is linked to the liturgical year. St.La Salle writes: "On the vigil of feastdays...catechism will last an hour...The topic will be that of the feast celebrated by the Church the following day" (p.98, No.10).

In general, catechism will centre on "the principal mysteries of our religion". This is an expression which is to be found in the Common Rule which we quoted in our introduction. It is a subject also on which "the teacher will question pupils both singly and in groups at different times; and at different times he will ask one or several questions on the Mysteries" (p.100, No.9).

Sacraments are another subject to be treated in catechism every week. The sacraments of penance and eucharist receive special mention. The teacher "will ask one or several questions on the sacrament of penance, and then about the eucharist" (p.101).

What should be noted also is the importance St.La Salle attaches to Holy Mass in the Conduct of Schools. He mentions especially pupils "who cannot read" and who are to be given a rosary. On the other hand "pupils who can read should be given a book containing the prayers of the Holy Mass for the use of the Christian Schools, which they should use during this time" (p.89-90).

When catechism lasts a long time, St.La Salle advises the teacher to find a story "to embellish his lesson". On Sundays and feastdays, when catechism lessons are three times longer than on other days, "he should find a story which his pupils can appreciate and tell it in such a way that they will enjoy it and their attention will be renewed. He should do this with sufficient details to prevent them from becoming bored" (p.103, No.9).

3. The pedagogical aspect

There should be variety during catechism lessons, as is amply clear from what has already been said.

The way a teacher speaks should be different from that of a preacher. The pupils are not there to hear authoritive statements which demand no response. On the contrary, "the teacher will not speak to his pupils during catechism as if he were preaching".

Vocabulary too should be simple and easily understood by all. "When asking questions he should use only simple expressions and easily understandable words which need no explanation, if that is possible. He should make his questions and answers as short as he possibly can" (p.101, No.10).

Catechism should be linked to everyday life. "Every lesson, the teacher makes a point of suggesting a few practices to his pupils, and giving them as thorough a grounding as he can in matters related to morals and behaviour that are needed if one is to live as a true Christian" (p.102, No.5).

In addition to not speaking as if he were preaching, the teacher should likewise be very brief in his remarks. St.La Salle gives priority to pupils when it comes to speaking: "He will make sure he speaks very little and asks a lot of questions" (p.102, No.2).

4. The attitude of the teacher

Like any other teacher, he has to take means to ensure that all the pupils follow his lesson and pay attention. If the need arises, he should question pupils who seem distracted and bring their attention back to the subject being treated. "Each day he should question all the pupils, even several times if he can. From time to time he should change the order in which he questions pupils during the catechism lesson so as to question pupils he has noticed not paying attention" (p.100, No.6).

«One of the chief areas of concern of a teacher during a catechism lesson must be to ensure that all the pupils pay great attention» (p.102, No.1).

Above all, teachers must be "so concerned about teaching their pupils well that they will not allow a single one to remain ignorant of at least the things that a Christian is obliged to know with regard to doctrine and practice" (p.104, No.15).

The teacher must be convinced of what he is teaching. This must be obvious from the way he speaks. "He must be careful not to speak in a vague way which could lead to a loss of interest" (p.102, No.5). If sometimes pupils are just "impossible", the teacher must not punish them. If necessary, he should stop and think so as not to act through anger. "He should be careful not to disturb the catechism lesson with inopportune rebukes and punishments; and if it happens that a pupil deserves a punishment, it should be postponed till the following day" (p.103, No.7).

Pupils should not be rebuffed or confused "by what one says or does when they are unable to answer a question put to them" (p.105).

St.La Salle recommends great respect for pupils. With regard to those experiencing difficulties, the teacher will make sure he asks questions "which can be understood not only by the brightest and sharpest pupils, but by the weaker ones also, so that most of the pupils in the class can answer the questions put to them" (p.104).

With regard to giving rewards from time to time, the teacher should sometimes give them "to the weakest pupils who have tried the hardest to learn" (p.105).

Respect for the pupils makes a teacher refrain from acting as a judge or criticising their actions. "He will never say that such and such thing is a venial or mortal sin. All he should say is 'It's a big offence against God, it's a sin to be avoided at all costs'" (p.103).

St.Paul, in his letter to the Corinthians, wrote the following: "Brothers, I myself was unable to speak to you as people of the Spirit: I treated you as sensual men, still infants in Christ. What I fed you with was milk, not solid food, for you were not ready for it" (1 Cor. 3,1-2).

He offered his new Christians the "milk" of catechism rather than the "solid food" of the purely dogmatic teaching of a master to his disciple. Can we achieve in our schools the kind of care St.Paul had for his catechumens or that shown by St.La Salle?

* * *

Two one-day meetings

This fresh look at the Conduct of Schools from the catechist's point of view was the topic for consideration at two one-day meetings held at Fonseranes on October 7th and 14th. The first meeting was attended by 26 persons from Avignon La Salle, Castres, Cavaillon, Beziers, Marseille, Nimes and Perpignan. Six hours sped quickly by in talks and discussion. As someone who attended said: "I came with questions to ask and I am going home with answers. Not all problems have been solved, but we have been enabled to realise that we are not the only ones with problems"

In spite of the small number taking part - about ten - the second meeting was very enriching for those who came. Everyone found the sharing of views very valuable but too short. It was also felt by all that these meetings should have one central topic like Confirmation, or "How to celebrate with young people", or "Encountering young people" (psychological aspects). Such a meeting should be held again, once a year, so as not to overload already existing diocesan programmes of meetings.

These meetings have enabled us to realise that no one has all the answers, and that more or less everywhere there are sources of enrichment. There is one question, though: "How do we get people moving, especially our colleagues, the lay teachers?" One Brother in a post of responsibility said: "Just by putting up my posters and providing my colleagues with information I become a catechist..." And so, let's get on with it! Let's bear fruit wherever we've been planted! Looking forward to seeing you soon. We'll have to do this again!

LASALLIAN WAY OF THE CROSS

(GOOD FRIDAY 1991)

The texts are taken from the Meditations of St. John Baptist de La Salle for Holy Week, by Br. Umberto Marcato. (M. 22-28).

1. Jesus is condemned by Pontius Pilate to death on the cross.

We adore you, O Christ...

Jesus Christ came on earth, says St. Augustine, not to govern nations, to exact tribute, to raise armies, or to combat his enemies in a visible manner, since he assures us himself "My kingdom does not belong to this world", but he came to establish his reign in souls, according to the expression he uses in the gospel "the kingdom of God is here, within you". (M.22, 1)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

2. Jesus sets off for Calvary carrying his cross.

We adore you, O Christ...

Adore these different dispositions in Our Lord, conformable to the designs which God had over him. As Jesus said himself: "My meat is to do the will of him who sent me", that is to say, it was the rule and the very soul of his conduct. In imitation of your divine Saviour, study to desire only what God wishes, when he wishes, and how he wishes. (M.24, 1)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

3. Jesus falls for the first time under the weight of the cross.

We adore you, O Christ...

It is thus that the Son of God abandoned himself to the will of his Father to suffer and to die when and as it pleased him. When he prepared for his Passion, praying in the Garden of Olives, he declared to his Father, that notwithstanding the repugnance he felt for the sufferings and death which he saw near at hand, he did not wish to do his own will, but that of the Father, to which he abandoned himself completely, as he had always done during his life. (M.24, 3)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

4. Jesus meets his mother on the way to Calvary.

We adore you, O Christ...

O amiable abandonment of the human will of Jesus, submissive in all to the divine, and directed in both life and in death , and as regards the time and the nature of the tortures in which he was to expire, by the decisions of the Eternal Father. Endeavour to become a disciple of Jesus in this respect by having no other will than that of God's good pleasure. (M.24, 3)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

5. Jesus is helped to carry the cross by Simon of Cyrene.

We adore you, O Christ...

Our Lord Jesus Christ having descended from heaven only that he might secure the salvation of men, and knowing that this design was to be accomplished only by suffering much and by dying upon a cross, offered himself to his Eternal Father...to suffer all that he would be required to satisfy for our sins. Adore the holy dispositions of our divine Saviour in entering the world: dispositions which he continued ever afterwards to have, of suffering and dying for your sins and for those of all mankind. Thank him for such goodness, and endeavour to render yourself worthy of participating in the fruits by sharing in his sufferings. (M.25, 1)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

6. Veronica wipes the face of Jesus

We adore you, O Christ...

* The tender love which Jesus felt for sinners not only disposed him to suffer and die for us, but even gave him an ardent desire to do so. Hence, in speaking of his wish that sin should be extirpated he says: "It is fire that I have come to spread over the earth, and what better wish can I have than that it should be kindled?" (M.25, 2)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

7. Jesus falls for the second time on the way to Calvary

We adore you, O Christ...

Not content with having a life-long desire to die for us, Our Lord testifies his joy at the approach of the hour of sacrifice. This caused him to say to his Apostles, when he celebrated the Pasch with them: "I have longed and longed to share this paschal meal with you", because he knew that this was to be the last action of his mortal life, and the final repast he would take with his Apostles before suffering and dying for us, which was his greatest desire. All that remains now, as St. Paul says, is "to pay off the debt which the afflictions of Christ still leave to be paid", which is the application that must be made of his merits to ourselves through our participation in his sufferings. Render yourself worthy of such a grace. (M.25, 3)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

8. Jesus meets the women disciples on the way to Calvary

We adore you, O Christ...

Wishing to give us a mark of his affection and goodness, he left to his Apostles, and in their person to the whole Church, his body and blood before dying, to be for all time a precious token of his tender love. Receive this present today with all due respect and thanksgiving. Render Jesus love for love in acknowledgement of so great a gift, and let your love for him and your desire to be united with him, lead you to have an ardent longing to receive holy communion frequently. (M.26, 3)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

9. Jesus falls for the third time on the way to Calvary

We adore you, O Christ...

None can conceive how great were the sufferings of Our Lord during his Passion. He suffered in every part of his body and his soul was so overwhelmed with sadness that he could only express it by saying "it is ready to die with sorrow". Such was the effect upon him that it caused a sweat of blood and he fell into such extreme weakness that his Eternal Father had to send an angel to sustain and strengthen him, that he might be in a condition to endure the tortures of his Passion to the end. (M.27, 1)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

10. Jesus is stripped of his clothing on Calvary

We adore you, O Christ...

What crime had Jesus committed to be thus treated? Even after all these tortures inflicted upon him, the Jews were not satisfied, says St. Bernard. How is it possible that he who had studied only to do good to men could be so dealt with? (M.27, 2)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

11. Jesus is nailed to the cross

We adore you, O Christ...

Jesus suffered from all classes of persons. One of his Apostles betrayed him, another denied him, and the rest took flight abandoning him to his enemies. The Chief Priests sent a body of soldiers to sieze him, and these outraged him. He was mocked by the people and a King insulted him and sent him away as though he were a fool. The Governor of Judea condemned him to death; all the Jews looked upon him as a malefactor, and the passers-by blasphemed him. (M.27, 3)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

12. Jesus dies on the cross

We adore you, O Christ...

Can we possibly contemplate the Man-God in so pitiable a state without conceiving a lively horror for sin, and heartfelt sorrow for those we have committed? For it is our iniquities which have caused his death and his untold sufferings. Not to wish to cease sinning is not to desire that Christ's sufferings should end. The more we sin the more he has to suffer, for, as St. Paul says: "Would they crucify the Son of God a second time, hold him up to mockery a second time for their own ends?" This is for Jesus a kind of death more painful and more difficult to endure than the first. (M.27, 3)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

13. The body of Jesus is taken down from the cross

We adore you, O Christ...

These adorable wounds not only honour the sacred body of Our Lord, but teach us, as St. Peter says, that "Christ suffered for our sakes, and left you his own example: you were to follow in his footsteps. On the cross his own body took the weight of our sins; we were to become dead to our sins, and to live for holiness; it was his wounds that healed you". (M.28, 2)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

14. The body of Jesus is placed in the sepulchre

We adore you, O Christ...

These sacred wounds may likewise procure us the advantage of animating us with a love of suffering, through the remembrance of what Jesus suffered for us. Our divine Lord has preserved the marks of the wounds in his glorious body as ornaments and signs of honour, hence as members of Christ we should likewise esteem it an honour to suffer something for him. After the example of St. Paul we should exclaim: "God forbid that I should make a display of anything, except the cross of Our Lord Jesus Christ." (M.28, 3)

A pause for silent prayer Glory be...

Final adoration

We adore you, O Christ...

Prostrate yourself frequently before the divine wounds of Our Saviour, looking upon them as the source of your salvation. Place your hand with St. Thomas in the wound of the side, not so much to strengthen your faith as to penetrate, if possible, right to the Heart of Jesus, in order to draw from thence into your own sentiments of Christian patience, entire resignation, and perfect conformity to the will of God, as also to take courage sufficient to lead you to seek occasions of suffering. (M.28, 3)

Let us pray for the intentions of our holy father the Pope, our Institute and for all the members of the Lasallian Family:

Our Father, Hail Mary, Glory be.

Live Jesus in our hearts! Forever!

GUIDE FOR FORMATION

DEVELOPMENTS IN INSTITUTE FORMATION

Brother Joseph Hendron

The publication of the Institute Guide for Formation this year (1991) is an appropriate occasion to reflect on the evolution in Institute Formation programmes over, say, the last 50 years. This is an arbitrary time span. There are still many Brothers in the Institute who were formed before this period; but the style and content of their Formation would not have differed significantly from the Formation programmes in use up until the mid 1960s.

The first session of the second Vatican Council began on 11, October 1962 and the final session ended on 8, December 1964. The Motu Proprio "Ecclesiae Sanctae", which gave the norms for the up-to-date renewal of Religious Life according to the mind of the Council, was published on 6, August 1966. The 39th General Chapter, which took place in 1966, was extended to a second Session in 1967, in order to comply with the demands of the Council for a "Special Chapter". This Special Chapter had for purpose "to put renewal and adaptation into effect" (Ecclesiae Sanctae 3). The Council and Chapter had profound implications for all of us: in our Community Life, in our Mission, in Formation. "Perfectae Caritatis" (28, October 1965) said of the up-to-date Renewal of Religious Life that "it comprises both a constant return to the sources of the whole of the Christian Life and to the primitive inspiration of the institute, and their adaptation to the changed conditions of our times." (PC 2). The 39th General Chapter expressed the challenge of renewal, as it affected us, in the draft Rule, and "A Declaration: The Brother of the Christian Schools in the world today."

Formation before 1966:

The upheaval of the 1960s shattered the Formation structures that had been in existence for a number of decades before. These decades in Formation were marked by confidence and clarity in objectives and means. Personnel and candidates alike knew exactly what was expected of them at every stage of Formation. The programmes were uniform throughout the Institute. A candidate entering would find the same time-table, prayers, conferences, spiritual reading material as in any other formation house in the Institute. With small variations the stages from juniorate to scholasticate were uniform in duration and age of candidates. Planning was in view of the smooth functioning of the group and the formation of Brothers in a certain uniform style, rather than to answer to the developmental needs of the individual. There was a high degree of centralisation; directives on formation from the Centre of the Institute and from the Church were precise, detailed and mandatory.

This is not said by way of a blanket criticism of this type of Formation. Later I will show that some aspects of this formation method have been retained or recovered in today's formation programmes. It should be said also that changes in formation, or at least in the thinking about formation, pre-dated Vatican II and the 1966 General Chapter. The General Chapter of 1956, for example, launched the programme of Lasallian research, and also initiated a revision of the Rule. These had for aim a critical study of the life of our Founder and his charism, and a up-dating of the Rule. These decisions were prophetic. They were part of that "constant return to the primitive inspiration of the institute", described by "Perfectae Caritatis" nearly ten years later. The studies on our origins and the life the Founder are now an important element in formation and they began before 1966.

Formation after 1966 (1):

The years after 1966 until the present time may be divided into two periods; but two periods which overlap. The first begins at the end of the 60s. This period was marked by a collapse of the structures noted above. Responsibility for planning formation moved from the Centre to the Districts. A restructuring of formation in all its aspects began. The former certainties were replaced by uncertainty and by a search for new plans for formation. There was divided opinion about the way to proceed; plans became more diverse and experimental throughout the Institute. Age of entry and duration of formation varied from District to District. The number of candidates fell dramatically. In part because of this the traditional locations for houses of formation were abandoned, and many variations on location, size of groups, apostolic engagement during formation were tried. It became increasingly difficult for each District to maintain its own houses of Formation and staff them adequately.

It must be said that the quality varied as greatly as the programmes. Some programmes retained the best elements of the former structures and blended these successfully with the new ideas coming from the Council and the General Chapters. Others tried, unsuccessfully, to retain the old structures more or less unchanged. A third group offered a superficial and inadequate programme lacking appreciation of the old or new approaches to formation.

Formation after 1966 (2):

This situation continued for some years; but little by little the independent approach by sectors to planning formation was replaced by a process of dialogue; dialogue between Districts and dialogue between the Districts and the Centre of the Institute. Co-operation and sharing increased. Dialogue took many forms: a number of Circulars were published. The General Council consulted with an international group of Formators in the writing of Circular 418. A number of CIL Sessions were held to prepare Formators and study the problems of Formation today. The Inter-Capitular and Regional meetings of Visitors with the General Council always included a consideration of Formation. Then in 1985 the Formation Secretariat was established. This was to be an instrument of dialogue between the Centre and the Regions and Districts. Initially there was one Brother in the secretariat. A second was appointed in 1986.

Our Rule, which was revised in consultation with all the Brothers of the Institute, received its final draft from the General Chapter of 1986 and was approved by the Church in 1987. The approved Rule gave clear guidelines for formation. The 1986 Chapter also asked that a fuller document on formation be provided which would expand on the Rules and Constitutions. This document, which was given the title "Guide for Formation" and went through five drafts before publication, was the outcome of a consultation between the Centre of the Institute and the Districts and Regions. Now we have a number of instruments of dialogue which were not available immediately after the Chapter of 1966-67: the Rule, the secretariat for Formation, the Guide for Formation, the Declaration, various Circulars on formation, periodic sessions of Cil or other meetings to help Brothers working in formation.

So the dialogue continues, and with it an increased Interdependence in formation. Now most houses of Formation are the shared responsibility of a number of Districts or a Region. The staffs are often international and made up of experts in different disciplines: scripture, Lasallian studies, theology, etc. In November 1991 all the Directors of novices of the Institute will assemble at the Generalate for a four week Session - to continue and deepen the dialogue between Centre and sectors. The old uniformity may have disappeared; but unity is very evident. Now there is greater clarity and certainty about what constitutes Lasallian formation today, and greater confidence in putting it into practice. We think that the Institute is in a postion to implement the statement of "Perfectae Caritatis": "The up-to-date renewal of institutes depends very much on the training of members" (PC. 18, 28 October 1965). We need more personnel, well trained and willing to carry out this vital Institute apostolate, and in some sectors we must find the candidates who can benefit from the new richness of formation programmes, and become in their turn Christian formators of young people.

"SOME INTRODUCTORY COMMENTS TO ASSIST IN A BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF THE INSTITUTE'S GUIDE FOR FORMATION"

Brother William Mann

The Guide for Formation is intended as an instrument to assist in an ongoing dialogue between the various Districts and the Center of the Institute. It is not my intention here to provide an analysis of the content of the Guide. Probably, a careful reading and study of the document by the Brothers themselves is its best introduction. Rather, I would like to share with you some ideas or principles which form the document's fundamental orientation. Hopefully, this will make for a more informed reading and a more clear understanding on the part of all concerned.

1. Ours is fundamentally a gospel-based and apostolically oriented spirituality. The gospel is at the center of our formation programs. The integration of ministry and prayer is essential in every stage of formation. Of course, however, formation needs to have a Lasallian flavor.

2. Initial formation is to our vocation and our identity in the Church and not just to some generic model or to some privately determined model of religious life, as though all religious families in the Church were homogenized or the same (as has sometimes mistakenly been the case in recent history).

3. Ours is clearly a formation in the tradition and spirit of Vatican II. Fundamental to understanding formation today is the principle that:

– a. Vocation is understood as something that happens to a person within his own personal history; therefore, no two young Brothers are exactly the same. God calls a person as a unique individual.

– b. Secondly, "vocations" do not happen in a vacuum. It is in the concrete events and needs of the people of today that God's Spirit evokes, calls forth, and raises up Brothers of the Christian Schools to do God's work.

– c. Therefore, formation must always remain sensitive to the unique individuality of each Brother and must never be divorced from the concrete events and needs of the people of today.

4. This perspective has required a basic shift in the manner in which formation is attempted. For example, – a. The environment in which formation takes place is the marketplace instead of the monastery.

– b. The approach to the individual in formation is more concerned with the person than with the program.

– c. The nature of formation programs involves a process of progressive incorporation into religious life and not a procedure to be completed and certainly not a trial to be endured once and for all. It involves a formation of the "heart" that affects the attitudes and preferences by which the Brother sets priorities and makes decisions.

– d. Formation involves discernment of the workings of God within the life of an individual and is not just the matter of simple decision making. The pace of individuals is variable; vocation is an evolving reality within the human development of a person. Formation takes a lifetime (hence, the fifth chapter of the Guide on "Continuing Formation"). All of this is the context for why the question of the accompaniment of the young Brothers is such a major concern today.

I would also like to highlight the key aspect of vocation promotion programs as presented in the second chapter of the Guide on "The Pastoral Ministry of Vocations."

5. The Guide addresses the issue of where the ministry of vocation promotion fits into the larger question of each District's pastoral ministry to youth. The essential question here concerns the work we do in the Church and how we see vocation promotion as an integral and inseparable dimension of every aspect of true Christian education. The Guide suggests that nothing less than a rather courageous and bold reexamination of the very nature of the Christian ministry we perform is capable of addressing the question of our declining numbers and work for the promotion of vocations.

6. The question of "mission" is the key to vocation promotion. "What is our mission in the 1990s"? Who and what is determining our mission at the present time? Is it being determined by local governments, by our predecessors and their success, by our "old boys," by our paralysis, fear, and insecurity, by the real abilities and desires of the young Brothers who are going to be carrying these commitments into the future, or by the gospel and the needs of the young, the poor, and their families today? This question of mission is the key to the work of vocation promotion and initial formation. To what do we invite? For what do we form?

7. The question is not one of "getting" new Brothers; the primary question is the nurturing of faith among the young within the cultures where we minister. The Guide proposes that this is the context in which authentic vocation promotion makes sense and gathers life and momentum. The re-vitalization of our vocation promotion programs requires nothing less than a complete re-animation of our ministry.

GUIDE FOR FORMATION – 3 –

THE FORMATION GUIDE

A STUDY AID

Br. Bernardo Villar

A NEW APPROACH

The 1986 General Chapter established a new policy in the Institute with regard to initial formation. This is defined in the 1987 Rule. It is left to Districts and Regions, in consultation with the Centre of the Institute, to draw up formation programmes.

As part of this new approach, there came into existence the Secretariat for Formation, as a consultative body, and the Guide for Formation, which provides a framework containing basic principles and general outlines to serve as guidelines.

HOW THE GUIDE FOR FORMATION CAME INTO EXISTENCE

The 1966 General Chapter asked for a number of Directories to be drawn up to complement the new Rule, and the Guide for Formation was included among these. In October 1988, Brother Superior and his Council asked the Secretariat for Formation to begin this work. The work of producing this text involved the following process:

– The Secretariat prepared a first draft which was sent to the whole Institute. With a view to stimulating reactions from the Institute, the text was in the form of an enquiry covering a great variety of areas related to initial formation.

Reactions were numerous and valuable, coming from both individual Brothers and Formation Commissions and District Councils. Some even expressed the feelings of certain Regions as a whole.

– A second draft was based on these reactions which had to reach Rome by the end of February 1989. It was submitted to an international commission appointed by Brother Superior, comprising Brothers Raymundo Suplido (Philippines), Dominique Samne (Burkina Faso), Paul Etienne (France), Jose Antonio Urrutia (Spain), Guilebaldo Orozco (Mexico) and Timothy Wentworth (United States). Between them, the Secretariat for Formation and this commission drew up a third draft which was then submitted to Brother Superior and his Council.

– A new draft was drawn up which now included the input of the Council. The 49 members of the CIL session on formation (held in Rome from September to December 1989) were asked to study it. The work they did on the document and the recommendations they made were very valuable because most of these Brothers were directly involved in the formation programmes of their respective Districts.

– With the help of the input from CIL, the Secretariat for Formation produced a new draft which was submitted to Brother Superior and his Council. The text was finally approved in September 1990.

We went into the history of how the text was produced, because it is an important factor if the text is to be understood. A great effort was made to ensure that the dialogue stressed by the last General Chapter took place. This, indeed, was the Founder's approach when he and the first Brothers produced such key documents as the first Rule and the Conduct of Schools.

The Guide was not produced in a laboratory nor in an office. It reflects the living experience of the Institute. Since we wanted it to be a framework for the dialogue we have to pursue, it was important it should be itself the fruit of dialogue. We should read the Guide with the attitude that it reflects what is richest in the present-day life of the Institute, listening constantly for the Spirit (R.37) who speaks and reveals himself through the Brothers.

WHAT IS THE GUIDE FOR FORMATION ?

Let us first of all say what the Guide is not. The Guide is not a formation programme. If the Guide were interpreted as an attempt to draw up in Rome a formation programme intended for the whole Institute, it would represent a return to pre- Council days, and nothing could be further from the mind of the General Chapter.

Formation programmes continue to be drawn up by individual Districts. It is only by looking closely at the very rich and varied life of the Institute that it is possible to adjust to the needs that come to light in various places and circumstances. The Guide is intended to be a source of help for Districts and Regions as they draw up their own formation programmes, but it is each District that has to discover how to adapt the guidelines and recommendations of the Guide to the concrete reality of its own situation.

For this reason it is important that the Guide be fully assimilated by Districts and that the programmes and structures of the various stages of initial formation should be revised and re-organised in the light of this new document. What the publication of the Guide asks us to do as a first step is to study and reflect on it at all levels: individual, community, formation commission and District Council.

The second step will involve revising structures and programmes, consultation with the Centre of the Institute, making decisions leading to the establishment of a District or Regional initial formation programme. The Guide is a means made available to Districts and Regions to help them draw up their formation programme.

FOR WHOM IS THE GUIDE FOR FORMATION INTENDED ?

As Brother Superior says in the introduction, the Guide is addressed to all the Brothers. Why should this be? For various reasons:

– Its content: It is not simply a Guide for Formation, as it might seem at first sight: it is concerned also with continuing formation.

– It is true that the subject of initial formation is of more direct concern to the formation teams and formation commissions of each District. And yet, the subject of initial formation concerns all of us. In the final analysis, we are the members of the communities which look after the young men who come to us in the course of their formation process. Our communities are a point of reference for our young men in formation. While there are formation teams that serve in the ministry of formation for our benefit, this does not do away at all with our own responsibility in this matter.

– Initial formation makes sense in the context of continuing formatiom which should follow on logically. The process which our young men in formation begin and which they pursue through the successive stages of initial formation leads logically to a process of gradual maturation in the communities of our Districts. What communities hosting young Brothers are asked to do, therefore, is to ensure that, because of their lifestyle and their way of living out the spiritual, community and apostolic guidelines of the Rule, these Brothers find, on joining them, an atmosphere which will enable to continue to grow and complete the process they have begun.

– Finally, the topics treated in chapter 1 (our religious identity) and chapter 2 (the pastoral ministry of vocations) are areas that affect all of us.

STUDYING THE GUIDE

We offer here one possible way of studying the Guide in community. This could be done by dividing the material into three parts:

(1) Chapters 1 and 5 help us to see our identity and our fidelity to our vocation in the context of our present stage in life.

(2) Chapter 2: The pastoral ministry of vocations is a priority which affects us all as individuals and as communities.

(3) Chapters 3 and 4: The nature of the formation process and the stages of formation. They are more directly the concern of formation staff, but they help us all to understand the process our young men are undergoing. Communities hosting young Brothers with temporary vows will find these chapters particularly useful.

Method

The Guide must always be studied side-by-side with the Rule. The Rule and the Guide are inseparable. The margin references to the Rule in the Guide show that the Rule is a constant factor.

Whatever sections we choose for reading, discussion, study or community prayer, they must always be considered from the double point of view of the Guide and the Rule.

BROTHER EXUPERIEN AND CHRISTIAN TRADE UNIONS IN THE CONTEXT OF «RERUM NOVARUM» (1/2)

Br. Yves Poutet

The excellent Positio super virtutibus (Rome, 1984) which the Congregation for the Causes of Saints devoted to Adrien Mas, known in religion as Brother Exuperien (1829-1905), was quite right in attributing to this Brother of the Christian Schools an important role in the rise of the Christian trade union movement and in the process leading to Rerum Novarum. Adrien Mas was educated at the Pensionnat de l'Immaculee Conception run by the Brothers at Beziers. Filled with enthusiasm by their example, he joined their novitiate in Toulouse. After the novitiate, he returned to Beziers and remained ten years there, training the pupils "in piety and knowledge", putting "his whole heart" into this work. He then became novice master, and his fellow-Brothers appointed him Assistant to the Superior General who was living at the time in Paris at 27 rue Oudinot, a building now occupied by the Ministry for Overseas Departments and Territories. He remained in this job for 32 years. During this period, his zeal for spiritual retreats and pious associations was equalled only by his concern for social justice as a source of peace. This he pursued by means of various schemes and associations for workers and people in employment. "L'Oeuvre des Apprentis", created in 1843 by Vicount Armand of Melun and Brother Philippe, was transformed by the energy of Brother Exuperien who made it part of a larger group called "Oeuvres de Jeunesse". Its spirit was kept alive by a newsletter. In 1882, the spiritual elite of parish youth clubs joined Brother Assistant, Fr. Chaumont and the chaplain of the Incurables in forming the Saint Labre Society which was dedicated to evangelical poverty and devotion to the Eucharist. Not long afterwards, the Employees' Trade Union was born there.

In the meantime, in 1873, Albert de Mun started up Catholic Workers' Clubs which were open to employers. This was the very opposite of the class struggle. Eleven years later, a minister, Waldeck Rousseau, authorised the creation of "professional trade unions" with the following proviso: employers and workers were to have separate unions. It would be a long time before bridges were rebuilt to any degree. There was another legal restriction: these trade unions were to be totally free of religion, politics or ideology. In 1885, La Tour du Pin, a pilgrim to the Holy See in a group led by Leon Harmel, was received in audience by the Pope. This is how he described the occasion:

"On the fifth day after my arrival...I was admitted into the presence of the Sovereign Pontiff and knelt at his feet, alone with him in a small room...His Holiness began to speak about the apostolate of the clubs...He added: "It's very good, but keep your simple name of Apostolate of Catholic Workers' Clubs as it is." He smiled when he heard of the accusations of socialism that were being levelled at our way of doing things. "But it isn't socialism, it's Christianity." When I informed him that the very value of the expression 'Christian social order' was being questioned, he said with feeling: "They don't know what Christian social order is. But don't worry. Wait for my next encyclical. The Pope will speak. He will say that there is a Christian social order." Then softening his tone and resuming his expression of ineffable goodness, he added: "You asked me for a cardinal to oversee and, where necessary, direct your work. Well, I'll give you two. I'll set up a commission for social studies, and like that you'll find in Rome all that your faith has led you to seek there." (A. Murat, "Le catholicisme social en France" Bordeaux, 1980, p.84)

The following year there appeared Immortale Dei on the Christian constitution of states.

Around 1887, Brother Hieron started up a union in Paris for shop and industrial employees. Brother Exuperien gave him his full support. By Lasallian tradition, the Brothers ran vocational schools, apprenticeship centres, extra Sunday courses because they wished to serve all "the artisans and the poor" without exception. The students who followed these courses found themselves mixed in with a variety of social classes. In their schools, pupils joined not because they were poor or rich but because of vocational reasons. To a great extent, the social and religious attitude of the Brothers of the time was due to the work of Brother Exuperien. This is borne out by the words of Michel Launay, a university historian:

"Let us remember straightaway that their intention is to train not only minds but also characters...The pupils of the Brothers are not only taught. After school they are followed up...This is the spirituality of the Congregation. The Brother lives completely in community, totally, without any chance of taking refuge in a touchy reserve, with no possibility of evading common responsibilities, with no refuge in a secret garden. Meals taken in common are an opportunity for expressing joy, for making cutting remarks about others, for public exhortations to work hard and to have a burning faith. The Congregation is permeated with an atmosphere of genuine brotherhood, of astonishing spiritual health." (M. Launay. "La C.F.T.C., origines et developpement", Paris, Sorbonne, 1986.)

On September 13th 1887, 18 young men, inspired by the leadership of Br. Hieron and the President of the Union of Parish Commercial Youth Clubs, started up the Trade Union of Shop and Industrial Employees (S.E.C.I.), taking as their patrons Saint Labre and the Archangel Michael, as a sign of the religious character they wished to give their undertaking. On November 15th 1890, the first issue of their newsletter L'Employe came out. The second issue appeared on March 15th 1891, two months before the publication of Rerum Novarum. When the leaders and main inspirers of the S.E.C.I., and these included Brothers Hieron and Exuperien, realised that almost all its members would always remain wage earners, they gave up their initial ideal which was to promote workers and employees to positions of administrative responsibility by means of in-service training. Their aims became more modest and more suited to an often hostile social environment: to help workers defend their rights once they had firmly established them; to remedy inequalities created by the social situation of their parents, the power of money, and the difficulties which militated against secure jobs...Ever aware of the benefits of friendly relations with Christian employers and lawyers, L'Employe began a series in 1896 entitled "Views of a proletarian". In the meantime, two encyclicals had appeared: Rerum Novarum, on social questions, and Au milieu des sollicitudes de l'Eglise universelle (February 16th 1892) which preached support for the Republic. More than ever before, Brother Joseph, Superior General, and his Assistants of whom Brother Exuperien was the chief, called upon the Brothers and all their pupils or disciples to show perfect submission to the Sovereign Pontiff in imitation of their Founder John Baptist de La Salle who had been beatified in 1888. Relations with Leo XIII had been close since the March 1885 private audience. Informed about the recruitment of the Brothers, their religious and professional training, and the variety of their work, he traced out a way forward for them: they should organise themselves, fight, train regiments of well-disciplined apprentices, workers and students; snatch souls away from the dangers of isolation, "give back to the Christian masses the feeling of brotherly solidarity" (G. Rigault, "Histoire generale de l'Institut des Freres des ecoles chretiennes", vol.VII, p.415). In his Circular dated December 18th 1892, Brother Joseph, helped by his Council, writes:

"In the midst of the sadness and tribulations of the present time...we acclaim (on the 50th anniversary of his consecration as bishop) Leo XIII, Vicar of Jesus Christ, Infallible Guardian of the Faith, Father and King of our souls; we glorify in him the Incomparable Doctor who continues to enlighten the world by his Immortal Encyclicals...the defender of the poor and working classes, the one who has been justly named the Pope of the workers. May Heaven grant him to see crowned with success so much work for the prosperity of the Church, for the good of society and for that of the working class in particular."

The Circular dated January 1st 1893 rejoices at the work that has been accomplished: "Youth organisations have been set up in great numbers (and not only in Paris, far from that): an effort has been made to turn these into true centres of Christian life, where the frequentation of the sacraments, monthly recollections, and annual retreats and practices of piety have kept our former pupils faithful to their duties and in many cases have made them, in their parishes, the collaborators of their parish priest, the supporters or even the organisers of works of zeal and charity."

BROTHER EXUPERIEN AND CHRISTIAN TRADE UNIONS IN THE CONTEXT OF «RERUM NOVARUM» (2/2)

Br. Yves Poutet

When Brother Gabriel Marie succeeded Brother Joseph as Superior General in 1897, Brother Exuperien remained the chief Assistant. He was responsible for the former students' associations in France which numbered 31,200 young people. At the time of the World Fair of 1900, there were 35,572 of them spread over 350 parish youth clubs (G. Rigault, op. cit. VII, p.417). Brother Exuperien always remained involved in this work as one of the leading organisers of all these Lasallian undertakings. This was not only in Paris and the departement of the Seine, but also in Lille, Rouen, Boulogne, Calais, Saint Omer, Orleans, Nantes, Beauvais, Laon, Lyon, Bordeaux and finally in nearly all the departments of France, putting into practice the words of Leo XIII to Brother Joseph: "Each school establishment should be matched, except when absolutely impossible, by a youth club."

This widespread influence among young adults, complemented by that of Old Boys associations which also were permeated with the same spirit of understanding between employers and employees and commitment to the preferential service of the less privileged, owes much to the religious life developed by Brother Exuperien among the Brothers and their friends. The main meetings, recollections, and annual spiritual retreats of the St. Labre Association were held in the retirement home of the Brothers at Athis Mons, near the present-day Orly Airport, in an area which was particularly tranquil and lightly wooded at the time. It was from the St. Labre group that the Employees' trade union took most of its most dynamic organisers. Daily family prayers and inter-social class discussions on the basis of pontifical pronouncements found constant nourishment there. The collaboration of fervent and devoted priests like Fr. Paguelle of Follenay and Canon Peuportier reflect the common desire to work as a Church, with priests and non-consecrated lay people working together with the Brothers who were canonically defined as lay religious. There is no better description of the situation than the one found in Michel Launay's doctoral thesis based on extensive and scientific research:

"All those who at the end of the 19th and at the beginning of the 20th century became leaders of or held positions of responsibility in Christian trade unions in France were all, in their youth, energetic members of St. Labre and conscious of belonging to an elite...One must constantly bear in mind that the Christian trade union movement in France came directly from the congregation of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, and that in this way a whole range of ideas, concerns, reflexes, thoughts were transmitted, at least at management level, through this trade union movement." (op. cit. p.12).

It is important to add at this point that the talks, private conversations, the exchange of correspondence of Brother Exuperien were, up to the year of his death, 1905, the golden thread that bound strongly together the spiritual and the temporal, secular, social and economic training on the one hand and religious studies on the other. In this connection we must mention the important part played by the chief Assistant of the Superior in the preparation and publication of a series of doctrinal works intended for the paratheological formation of the young Brothers. There were three volumes of about 500 pages each, entitled Dogma, Moral, Worship, the work of "a seminary lecturer". The volume on Moral does not omit to speak of the workers. The table of contents refers to pages 329-332: "Situation of workers in our days brought about by the abandonment of faith and corruption of morals; duties imposed by justice which they should practise; institutions through which the Church works to remedy their situation; duties of the State with regard to what concerns the situation of the workers." The really essential message would have been missing if the following were not also included relating to employers: "Teachings of the Church intended for the rich; duties imposed by justice which employers should practise; justice must be complemented by charity." The chapter in question is entitled: "Duties of workers and employers" with two sub-headings: "Causes of conflict between workers and employers" and "Remedy for social antagonism". A long quotation from the encyclical Rerum Novarum is studied by questions and answers. This approach makes it easier to explain and memorise each separate section of the quotation. The first edition appeared in 1894. This work served as the basis for the formation of the Brothers, their pupils and disciples up to the middle of the 20th century.

Because of the links established by the Brothers in France with the world of technology and industry, the members of the 1901 General Chapter were sufficiently conditioned to greet enthusiastically the creation of the Istituto De Merode in Rome, founded by the Pope accepted from him by the Superior General and his Assistants. Here is what the Superior said on this occasion:

"On the initiative of our Holy Father the Pope, we have been offered the direction of the Pontifical Technical Institute, known as the Istituto De Merode. This is a kind of small university which aims to prepare young people for the liberal technical professions such as those of engineer, architect, science teachers. It prepares also for entry into military and naval academies. This establishment could be called the crowning glory of our vocational and technical schools" (Athis, Circular, October 25th 1901, p.75).

The Christian trade union movement has a debt of gratitude to several eminent laymen trained in the spirit of Brothers Hieron and Exuperien. One such person is Jules Zirnheld, born in 1876 in Alsace, taught by the Brothers in Paris, an accountant at 15, a member of the St. Labre Association and of the S.E.C.I. of which he became the president in 1892. Another is Charles Viennet, a Parisian born in 1878, a pupil of the Brothers, a business legal secretary, attending regularly the talks given by the Comte de Segur at the youth club attached to the school on rue St. Dominique. He, like Zirnheld, was totally overwhelmed by Rerum Novarum which they both read in their study group. He joined the S.E.C.I. and became its general secretary. Like the Brothers, and as the Pope had urged, he rallied to the defence of the Republic. He fulfilled his patriotic duty by joining up in 1914 and died the following year on the field of battle. Gaston Tessier, born in Paris in 1887, began to earn his living as soon as he left the Brothers' school. He continued his studies thanks to courses for adults and joined the St. Labre Association and the S.E.C.I. For the latter he wrote an article which was taken up by many other publications. In the article, entitled "The future of the employee", the future of the white-collar worker is shown to be brighter than that of the manual worker. He had established his reputation: henceforth the power and wisdom of his thinking were recognised. Soon after, he was called upon to take over as president of the union. This led to the foundation of the C.F.T.C. (French Confederation of Christian Workers). However, this happened after the death of Brother Exuperien in 1905. This story is sufficient to illustrate even now how a small seed sown at the time of Rerum Novarum was able to influence a whole area of personal relationships in the working world.

THE EVERYDAY REPETITION OF ACTIONS AND TRANSPARENCY IN THE LASALLIAN MINISTRY OF EDUCATION (1/2)

Br. Alfredo A. Morales

"Pray to him (God) fervently too, that he will be pleased to make your Institute grow and bear fruit day by day" (MTR 207,3; cf. R 141).

Introduction

The expression "every day" is often used by the Founder in his writings: it can be found in the Conduct of Schools, in his Letters, in the 1718 Common Rules, in his catechisms...

The Lasallian Vocabulary (Volume 4) indicates that the expression "every day" is used 232 times and "each day" 16 times.

Let us try to discover the significance of this repeated use.

Many of the instances quoted refer simply to chronological listing or indicate the frequency of activities.

There are others, however, that have a deeper meaning and which reflect a specific plan. They imply a fundamental message the meaning of which is completed by sentences that follow. For example:

"The end of this Institute is to give a Christian education to children; it is for this purpose that schools exist, so that the children being under the care of the masters from morning until evening..." (RC 1,3)

This is what provides an answer to and counterbalances the day spent in working which, as the Founder and the first Brothers noted, made it impossible for "the working class and the poor...occupied all day in gaining a livelihood for themselves and their children...(to) give their children the needed instruction and a good and Christian education" (RC 1,4).

The every-day nature of the apostolate - which we will call the quotidian ministry - is what determined the lifestyle, the spirituality and apostolate of the Brothers of De La Salle who constantly invited them to see in their daily lives the transcendence, the unexplainable, the mystery of salvation in action.

1. THEOLOGICAL JUSTIFICATION FOR THE QUOTIDIAN MINISTRY OF THE BROTHERS

The theological reflections of St. John Baptist de La Salle in his Meditations for the Time of Retreat (193 to 208) can be considered as an analysis of the nature and of the ways of fulfilling the Lasallian ministry of education day after day, hour after hour.

The Founder saw clearly the importance of this every-day nature of the ministry and wished to pass it on to his Brothers as a precious spiritual bequest meant not only for them but also "for the use of all persons who are engaged in the education of youth" (subtitle of the MTR).

But it is in one of his Meditations (MTR 200) that De La Salle stresses particularly and repeatedly this quotidian ministry.

He takes as his point of departure some quotations from the Acts of the Apostles:

"They preached every day...and the proclamation of the Good News of Christ Jesus was never interrupted" (Ac 5,42).

"Day by day the Lord added to their community those destined to be saved" (Ac 2, 47)

The logic of De La Salle's explanations is impressive:

What the Apostles did was to simply imitate Jesus Christ who..."taught in the Temple every day" (Lk 19, 47) and who "would spend the night on the hill called the Mount of Olives" (Lk 21, 37).

The conclusion follows logically:

"You are successors to the Apostles in their task of catechising and teaching the poor...you must teach catechism every day...In this way you will be following the example of the Apostles and of Jesus Christ himself, who devoted himself daily to this ministry" (MTR 200, 1).

What are the results of the Brother's quotidian ministry?

The fulfilment of the plan of salvation which God has entrusted to the Brother and to the community to which he belongs.

The result of this is that the quotidian ministry becomes "sacramental" because of the outlook of faith which enables the Brother to see the will of God in all that he does, however simple it may be, and which in its turn transfigures him, conferring on him spiritual greatness and a power to reveal: a "transparency" perceived by all who benefit from the Brothers' ministry of education.

This faith dimension in the daily work of education makes the charism of the Brother visible and tangible, and enables him to make it operative: it makes it effective from a pastoral point of view.

According to De La Salle, to discover this spiritual greatness and this sacramental transparency in the work of every day constitutes a grace from the Spirit. The Brother must ask for it with great insistence, otherwise the "terrible quotidien" will crush and devour him.

2.. THE EVERYDAY REPETITION OF ACTIONS IN PRACTICE

This is what Saint John Baptist de La Salle writes in his Letters:

"One of your main preoccupations, my very dear Brother, should be to apply yourself to prayer and to your classwork, for these are your two principal occupations" (Letter to Br. Hubert, May 5th 1702).

He says the same thing eight years later:

"Your spiritual exercises and your school require all your care" (October 2nd 1710).

He writes to the unstable Br. Mathias:

"You must carry out not only your class duties, but also the other exercises, for classwork without the spiritual exercises will not do" (April 13th 1708).

These quotations reflect what we read in Meditation 198 and show the total coherence of De La Salle's spiritual experience, as well as the pendulum-like movement of the Brothers' life: "to go up to God every day...then come down to them (the children)" (MTR 198, 1).

In practice, the repetitive aspect of the Brother's life is lived on two levels:

1. On the level of his spiritual and community life:

"All the exercises will be made in common from morning till evening" (RC III, 1).

"We ought frequently, and even daily, to thank God" (M 126, 1).

"Thank God for it every day" (M 182, 1; cf. M 89, 1).

"You should renew this donation every day" (M 104, 2).

"Read it (the Word of God) carefully every day" (M)

"The Brothers should love the holy exercise of mental prayer very much and they must look upon it as the first and principal of their daily exercises...They will be careful to make it every day" (RC IV, 1).

2. On the level of his educational, human and Christian activities

"You are obliged by your duty of state to teach the truths of the Gospel every day" (M 138, 3).

"the words of salvation you address them each day" (M 39, 2).

"a letter...which you write every day in their hearts" (MTR 195, 2).

"You must teach catechism every day...Jesus Christ...devoted himself daily to this practice" (MTR 200, 1).

"You must, of course, teach catechism to your students every day" (Letter to Gabriel Drolin, May 12th 1710).

"The teacher must visit all the writers every day" (Conduct 60).

Who benefits from this repetitive activity?

1. The Brothers themselves:

"the ordinary everyday actions which you perform in common with your Brothers" (M 69, 2)

"...because one is not satisfied with the conversation one has every day with one's Brothers" (R 58, 9).

2. The pupils:

"You are daily with the poor" (M 189, 1).

"It is your daily duty to instruct the poor" (M 166, 2).

3. The community surrounding the Brother:

"When you are outside the house, let your conduct be such as to be an example to all and a source of edification. This is all the more necessary as you are called to save others, and should therefore begin by giving good example in order to attract souls to God" (M 92, 2).

3. THE PITFALLS OF DAILY REPEATED ACTIONS

Routine and monotony are a risk when actions are repeated in an apparently identical manner over a long period of time. It is certain that De La Salle foresaw this pitfall and warned his Brothers about it by a variety of means, encouraging them always to provide high quality service. This is what he does when he urges them constantly to have an "ardent zeal" in the exercise of their ministry as teachers.

In his correspondence with his Brothers, he speaks to them of fervour, of fidelity:

"Be careful not to fall into negligence, for God gives few graces to those who are negligent. They have little success in what they do" (Letter 79 to a Brother Director, August 23rd).

"Nothing will draw down on you the blessings of God so much as fidelity in carrying out small matters" (Letter 4 to Br. Denis, July 8th 1708)

And here are some fine words straight from the heart:

"It is a great consolation to me, my very dear Brother, to know that you are wholeheartedly in love with your vocation. I bless God for this" (Letter 85 to a Brother).

He warned his Brothers of the low esteem in which teachers were held by the society of the time:

"We are poor Brothers, forgotten by the world and esteemed of no consequence. Only the poor come to us" (M 86, 2).

"Your work enjoys little consideration in the eyes of men, but in the eyes of God it does, for it contributes to extend his Kingdom" (M 143, 3).

"How often it happens that occupations that men consider lowly produce more fruit than those which are more exalted. Look upon your work as one of the most important and excellent in the Church" (M 155, 1).

The spirit of faith was the great spiritual means that De La Salle bequeathed to his Brothers and to his spiritual family as a spiritual incentive in order to overcome the danger of the shortsightedness of actions repeated daily, mechanically and without soul:

"Not to look upon anything but with the eyes of faith, not to do anything but in view of God, and to attribute all to God" (RC II, 2).

This is the "Lasallian magic wand" that can transform the Brothers' most ordinary actions. It has led many Brothers to high levels of anonymous heroism and sanctity recognised by the Church: "Do ordinary things with extraordinary fervour".

On numerous occasions in his writings, De La Salle shows his concern for the "daily fervour" of his Brothers. As an example of this we can quote the Collection:

- Collection of things about which the Brothers will converse during recreations:

– About daily actions and the fervour with which they should be done; about the ease with which one can save oneself in the Society by doing them with a spirit of faith and religion and without doing anything else (XX).

– About the failings against which they must most guard themselves, like...negligence in the house and school exercises (XXVI).

– About the obligation the Brothers of the Society have to acquit themselves well of their duty in school...and about the way to fulfil it well (XXVIII).

- With regard to the use of time:

– Do you do ordinary actions in a spiritual manner, only in view of God and his pleasure? (III).

– Do you do all your actions as perfectly as you know they ought to be done? (VIII).

– Be satisfied with what you can do, as God is satisfied with this. But do not spare yourself with regard to what you can do with grace. You must believe that, provided you are willing, you can do more with the grace of God than you think (X).

Not to be able to fathom out the mystery of his constantly repeated actions can be a source of great frustration and discouragement for a Lasallian educator. It can even lead him to mediocrity in his ministry since he does not put all his heart and soul into what he does.

The Founder's advice is impressive:

"Never be sad with the bad kind of sadness to be found in the world which comes from a lack of mortification and from displeasure at having what one does not want, or not having what one would like to have" (Collection: With regard to the exercises and actions of the day, XIV).

4. THE EVERYDAY REPETITION OF ACTIONS AND ESCHATOLOGY

"By the words of salvation which (he must) address them each day" (M 39, 2), he has made the plan of salvation of Jesus Christ a reality for each of the children and has presented them thus redeemed to the Father:

"That perfect man who is Christ come to full stature...as part of the structure of the Church, built by your care into a temple to become the dwelling place for God in the Spirit" (MTR 205, 3)

He will have known "how to strengthen (his) disciples in the Christian spirit" (MTR 207, 3).

He will be able to say to the Lord that he has truly fulfilled his ministry (MTR 205, 3).

The conclusion of the Founder's theological considerations on the educational mission of the Brother is really moving. Abandoning his austere style, he becomes lyrical:

"Oh, how fortunate you ought to consider yourselves, to be working in the field of the Lord!...Devote yourselves, then, with zeal and affection to your work" (MTR 207, 1).

"With joy, then, say as he (St. Paul) does, that the greatest cause of your consolation in this life is to announce the Gospel free of charge" (MTR 207, 2).

"Ah, what a thrill of joy you will get when you hear the voices of those whom you have led almost by the hand into heaven!" (MTR 208, 3).

CONCLUSION

"The Brother is invited to be open each day to the presence of the living God in such a way that he discovers it, and lives it in his mission, his consecration and his community life" (R 100).

"That by their very lives the Brothers give testimony to the presence of God among people, to the liberating force of his Spirit, and to the tenderness of his love" (R 85).

"The entire life of the Brothers is transformed by the presence of the Lord who calls, consecrates, sends and saves" (R 21).

"Our lives should speak 'God' to all we contact" (Br. John Johnston, Superior General, Pastoral Letter January 1st 1987, p. 31)

VOCATION MINISTRY:

A HIGH SCHOOL MODEL

Brother Robert Shea

Mike is given a choice of what high school to attend by his parents, as his brothers were. It is not a difficult decision for him to make. Most of his friends are going to La Salle High and he wants to join them.

During his Freshman Orientation Program, Mike is given the usual information about his class schedule, the school regulations, bookstore hours, available student activities and sports. He is also given an introduction to the men who are charged with the administration of the school and who are on the teaching staff – The Christian Brothers. He finds the Brothers a curious group especially since he had been so used to having primarily women as teachers in elementary school. He listens attentively as the Brother Principal speaks about St. La Salle and how the Brothers managed to land in the USA and how they came to his city and high school.

His first year at La Salle is full of new experiences. Having the usual freshman jitters, Mike gets lost a couple of times, loses a few books, finds he is swamped with homework and lives for the weekend football games! Mike finds high school is very different from grade school and he loves it! His religion class is different, too. Once every eight weeks or so, the topic covered in class has to do with choosing a vocation. This year Mike learns that as Christians we are all «Called to Faith». This same topic is used for a Day of Reflection conducted by the Campus Ministry Staff which is held in the Brothers' Residence. This is Mike's first look inside the community where the Brothers live and he is surprised to find how much it seems like a regular house. When the first issue of the school newspaper is published Mike can hardly wait to get home to show it to his parents. His name is mentioned in the sports section for an outstanding touchdown he made for the Frosh Football Team. Mike also notices an article about the recent graduates who have joined a program sponsored by the Brothers called Aspirancy. In May Mike feels very much at home in his new surroundings so when a school Liturgy is scheduled he knows exactly where his class sits in the Gym and what the procedure is for the reception of communion. This Mass is a bit different from the others that he has attended because it is in honor of the founder of the Brothers. He is told that the graduates sitting with the Brothers are considering the option of Brotherhood and are known as Aspirants. The Aspirants sing a song in French with the Brothers at the end of Mass. Mike has no idea what the tune is about, but he is impressed with the gusto with which it is sung!

Sophomore year is full of idealism and a great deal more comfortability for Mike. He now knows his way around the school and he enjoys being able to help the new freshmen find their classes. Mike has Brother John for English and likes the way he teaches. In fact, he admires all of the Brothers that he has met. He finds them friendly and willing to help. He even sees them at games and dances. One day, Brother John invites Mike and a few of his friends over to the house for a Coke and Oreo cookies after intramurals. Because of the Days of Reflection, Mike already feels at home in the house. Mike kids Brother John about having it «so nice» and Brother John fires back with a smile, «You'll enjoy it one day!» Mike laughs at the suggestion, but knows in his heart that the idea of considering the Brotherhood is not so far fetched. This year in his religion class the vocation theme is that we are all «Called to be Church». Once again Mike finds the theme being carried over into the annual Day of Reflection for his homeroom. The school newspaper once again has an article about recent graduates who have joined the Aspirancy and several who have actually joined the community and moved to a place called Jersey House, which is described as a House of Studies for the young Brothers. Mike is struck by the fact that he actually knows some of the recent graduates who have joined the Aspirancy Program. He had no idea that they were interested in exploring the possibility of Brotherhood. From the list of graduates in the paper, Mike concludes that there is not a special «type» of person who considers religious life. He wonders who will be listed in the paper next year when he is a Junior. This May Mike is aware of how proud the Brothers are of their Founder and he looks forward to hearing them sing «their song» again. Once again, he notices that a number of graduates have joined the Brothers for the Liturgy and they all seem to know that song sung in French!

Junior year begins with the realization that high school is already half over! Mike realizes that he is beginning the process of thinking about colleges and what he is going to do with his life. He is concerned about the PSAT's and the SAT's in the spring. He hopes to do well. He would like to go to college but has no firm idea of what he would like to study. Perhaps it will be pre-law; maybe business. His friend, Brother John, sees him one day when they both have a break and asks him how he is doing. Mike shares with him his confusion about the direction of his life beyond high school. «Ever consider the Brotherhood as a possibility?» The question really doesn't surprise Mike, but he acts starled and says «Well, sure, I guess – but I don't think that I could make that sort of commitment!» Brother John says that he understands and explains the nature of the Aspirancy Program. «Just stay open to the idea and we'll talk again» he concludes. Mike is very pleased that Brother John thought enough of him to suggest that he had the potential to consider the Brothers as an option. He puts the idea in the back of his head. Every time that he goes to the house for a Day of Reflection or just for a visit he now thinks, «Maybe I will be here one day myself.» The annual St. La Salle Liturgy is especially meaningful this year. The young Aspirants with the Brothers are becoming more and more familiar as he gets closer to them in age. Mike wonders if he will be there one day singing with the Brothers. The periodic theme in religion class this year is that we are all «Called to Discipleship». The discussions help Mike focus on the possibilities of service to others and what that might mean for his life, no matter what vocation he chooses.

Mike can hardly believe that his senior year has begun. Where did the time go? He experiences all of the normal anxieties of «senioritis» regarding SAT scores and colleges applications, intended majors, financial considerations, etc. Brother John sees him in the early fall and talks to him again about the Aspirancy Program. Brother suggests that Mike sign up for an interview when the Vocation Director visits the school in November. Mike is open to learning more about the option of religious life so he agrees to the suggestion. After his chat with the Vocation Director Mike is invited to attend a January DISCOVERY retreat at the Brothers' Spiritual Center a few hours away from La Salle. Between the interview and the retreat Mike has several religion classes devoted to the theme «We are Called to Ministry». During a visit to his school, Mike is introduced to several Aspirants from a different city and he begins a correspondence with them. They are just a year older than he is and he finds that he enjoys their company. The DISCOVERY retreat was a special experience for him and Mike feels as though he would like to give the Aspirancy a try. In the very early spring Mike participates in the Candidate Assessment Program with several others from his class. His parents have been contacted by the Vocation office and by the Brothers of his high school so that they are included in the process of helping Mike determine what his future may be. After Mike hears from the Vocation Director that his personality profile fits that of a person who would find religious life growthful, he accepts the offered application for the Aspirancy and promises to return the papers to Brother John as soon as he has a chance.

In May, Mike receives word through Brother John that he has been accepted into the Aspirancy Program. A few days later he receives a letter from the Provincial «officially» welcoming him into the Initial Formation program. Mike is very pleased that all has worked out so well for him, as are his parents. The entire family is invited along with the families of the other Aspirants from La Salle High to a Liturgy and dinner with the Brothers in their community in the late spring. Everyone is made to feel very much at home and Mike is even convinced that he made the right choice in applying to the program. At graduation time, Mike receives a card signed by all of the Brothers from his high school which he displays prominently on the mantel above the fireplace at home.

In August, after having met with his Aspirancy Coordinator twice, Mike is driven to the Christian Brothers' Spiritual Center with other young men he knows from his school and from neighboring schools. Some of the new Aspirants he had met already on the Discovery Retreat the previous January or at the cookout sponsored by the Brothers of the city a few weeks ago. During the first few days of the retreat for new Aspirants, Mike and the others are taught the French song that he has heard so often at school Liturgies. He is pleased that he finally knows, «Honneur a Toi». As he sings it at the closing liturgy of his retreat he hopes that he will be able to remember the words for the Mass at La Salle next spring when he will be invited back to sit with the Brothers and sing the song during the Founder's Celebration. Something tells him that he will remember and that he will be proud to be counted among those known as Aspirants.

MANAGEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOL (1/2)

Bro. Robert McCann

It is good to be here with you at this First Lasallian Workshop of the Baltimore Dictrict. I congratulate Brother Joseph Mahon and all of you here present since what you are doing these days is something very important for each of your schools. We are in the process of developing in each of our schools that "spirit" which we can identify as Lasallian. At the last General Chapter of the Brothers, it was suggested that we begin to develop this Lasallian spirit in our schools. You might ask the question, "Why now?". This certainly is a legitimate question. The answer stems from Vatican II which asked each religious community to reexamine their traditions and to return to the spirit of their founders and foundresses. Over the years there had been a straying away from traditions and now we were being called back. For the Christian Brothers, we have spent the last several years in this search, in a sense refounding the Institute by reexamining who de La Salle was and looking at ways to make him alive today in our lives and in our schools. As far as our schools are concerned, we refer to this new development as the Lasallianization of our schools. This does not mean to return to the school of the 17th century, but rather to look at de La Salle's directions and to make them applicable today. As far as we in the United States are concerned, we began this process with the Huether Workshop of 1984 when we developed the "Characteristics of a Lasallian School". This booklet has been the cornerstone for your work these days as it has been for schools and faculties in other districts of the United States and Canada.

My part in your management program is the topic of Management. You have already covered the topics of Teacher as Minister and Association. When we look at the word Management, we ask two questions: 1. what does it mean, and 2. why are we using this particular word today?

First, Webster defines Management as:
– the act or art of managing – the conducting or supervising of something such as a business
– the judicious use of means to accomplish an end
– the collective body of those who manage or direct an enterprise.

We have here two concepts: one is an action... the conducting, supervising, controlling, directing... and the other, the person or persons who do the conducting, supervising, direction, and controlling. I am going to use both of these concepts in my talk. I will talk about activities of managing a school and the people who do it.

The second thing we needed to examine was how we, as Lasallians, were using the word management. This is the historical part of the talk and brings us back to the time of De La Salle. Briefly, when de La Salle started his Christian schools, he put all his efforts into the teachers. He believed strongly in the concept that good teachers make good schools. You must remember that there was no such educational program as a teacher training school. Teachers of the 17th century can best be classified as hand-me-downs. If one couldn't do anything else, you taught. Many were seminarians who did not complete studies for the priesthood. Others were just do-gooders who wanted to help children. Some were money seekers. These were people who had a little education, especially in the area of writing who called themselves Writing Masters. They would do tutoring for money. I don't want this aspect to sound bad, but it was how they did it that was bad. It was an exploitation rather than a profession. Along comes de La Salle who sees the need for the Christian School. He saw a problem and responded to it. What was the problem? Boys running around wild in the streets getting into trouble. Boys with no goals or values. Boys who did not know Christ or the tenets of their religion. Boys whose futures were bleak. De La Salle wanted to do something for these boys to change their lives. Christian Education was the answer de La Salle came up with and Christian Education was what de La Salle began to deliver to them. Since he could not do it himself, he literally goes out to the streets and gets some men who in some way believe in his dream and are willing to join him. Here de La Salle begins the process of training teachers. This was the start of the Teacher Training School and the professional beginning of the Christian Schools. As a side, since this was not mentioned by previous speakers, de La Salle had not the intention of starting a religious community. His plan was to train teachers to teach in the Christian Schools. It was only later that the idea of a religious community arose. It is also good to remember that de La Salle's schools were called Christian Schools. The two words were always used together. When he did form his religious community, he gave his teachers the title of Brother, not from a religious context that we know today, but rather from the fact that he wanted them to be like older brothers to their students. This led to the name of the community, the Brothers of the Christian Schools. In his training of the teachers/Brothers, he used his own experience as well as what he learned in the Christian Schools. He himself was in a learning mode. Slowly he began to see what worked and what did not work. Over a period of time, he established an order and system for use in the Christian school and the classroom. This strict order was needed since his teacher/Brothers were not well educated and certainly had no teaching experience. He had to make things very simple but orderly. In the later years of his life, he called his chief Brothers together and together they wrote the Management / Conduct of Schools. The word Conduct comes from the French word conduite which is the noun form of the word conduire to conduct or guide. Given the context of this book, it is clear that conduite denotes the manner in which something is done, executed, carried out, or conducted. As such and in context, it might well be translated as "management". Now we have the latest research, and it seems that the word conduct is a better translation. The word conduct follows the example of the orchestra leader conducting the orchestra. We will let the experts decide whether the word should be conduct or management. Going back to the book on Management written by de La Salle and his Brothers, the title of the book (in French) is La Conduite des ecoles chretiennes. I bring to your attention again the use of the words Christian Schools... always used together. This book became the Bible for the de La Salle Christian Schools. It is very detailed as to the duties of the teacher and the duties of the students. It is so full of goodies that I hesitate to even mention some since in your excitement about this book that you will be running out to get a copy of it. However, just to whet your appetite, let me quote a few ideas.

a. Getting to know your students...

1. At the time of enrollment the Brother shall ask the person who presents him for the student's name and surname, the names of his father and mother, or the person in charge of him, the latter's occupation, dwelling with the street address and the name of the parish to which he belongs. Also the child's age, whether he has made his first communion and been confirmed. Whether he was in school before, and if so, where and under whom; why he left this school –wehether it was for misbehavior or because he was punished... He should ask about the child's good and bad habits, whether he suffers from any physical defect or illness, especially whether he has scrofula, the itch, epilepsy or some other infirmity which might be communicable... the Brother shall also inquire how long it has been since the child went to confession, and whether he goes frequently; whether he consorts with dubious characters; he shall also ask the child whether he sleeps alone, or with someone else, and if so, with whom...

2. One thing that can contribute much to the maintenance of order in the schools is that there be well kept registers. Each teacher will have a register in the form of a book containing twenty-four leaves, two for each month, upon which will be inscribed the names of the pupils of his class, according to the section of each grade in which they are...

(This knowledge of each student is to allow the teacher to better understand the student and hence to better prepare his lessons. De La Salle in his Meditations for Time of Retreat refers to Good Shepherd as a model for the Brother/teacher since a good shepherd knows his sheep and his sheep know him.)

b. Jobs for the students

1. The reciter of prayers
2. The keeper of Rosaries
3. The bell ringer
4. The distributor and collector of papers
5. The doorkeeper
6. The keeper of the key

The keeper of the key will be at the door of the school punctually every day before half past seven in the morning and before one o'clock in the afternoon. He will not give the key to any other pupil without the permission of the Brother who is in charge of this school... He should be chosen from among those who are the most assiduous at school and who never miss.

c. Asking questions

In order to make them understand what he is teaching them, he will ask several pupils, one after another, the same question. Sometimes he will ask it of seven or eight... He will question the pupils according to the order of the benches. If, however, he remarks that several, one after another, cannot answer the question or do not do so well, he may call upon one or several out of the regular order and in different parts of the class... He will question all his pupils each day, several times, even, if he is able to do so. However, from time to time, he will interrupt the regular order and the sequence to question those whom he observed to be inattentive, or even the more ignorant.

These are a few examples of how explicit the book is and how little details are important. It certainly speaks loud and clear to the concept of the needs of each child. Getting to know them, rewarding with jobs and teaching responsibility and trying to get all the students involved in the lessons. Remember this book was written nearly 300 years ago.

Let us now turn our attention to the present day Lasallian school and look at the two concepts of management... the action and the actor... the program and the programer...

In the booklet the "Characteristics of a Lasallian School" the second on Management has four areas of concern:

a. The teaching mission of the Church and the giving of Christian instruction
b. Quality education... academic excellence
c. School environment
d. Teaching the poor... concern for the poor.

We who are Christian Catholic Educators in a Christian Catholic School share in the teaching mission of the Church. We do not teach in isolation. We are not islands unto ourselves. We are part of the Church. We are part of the local Church. As such, we teach with the permission and the support of the Bishop and for those who teach in a parish school, you teach with the permission and support of the local pastor. As sharers in the teaching mission of the Church, we profess to be Catholic/Christian, both in our classroom intruction and in our management of the school. This is important to look at and digest since there is much being written today about the value of our Catholic school system. People are asking the question as to why we are in existence. Right now I want to say something, that if you don't remember anything else I say tonight, you will remember this... there is no reason for your school to be in existence today, if it is not catholic... I repeat there is no reason for your school to be in existence today if it is not Catholic. Our schools must be an alternative educational system from the public school system. I feel strongly that we do not have a choice in this. This is a given. The document entitled, "The Religious Dimension of Education in a Catholic School" issued by the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education of April 7, 1988, the feast of St. de La Salle states:

> ... the distinguishing characteristic of a Catholic school is «The Catholic school pursues cultural goals and the natural development of youth to the same degree as any other school. What makes the Catholic school distinctive is its attempt to generate a community climate in the school that is permeated by the Gospel spirit of freedom and love. It tries to guide the adolescents in such a way that personality development goes hand in hand with the development of the "new creature" that each one has become through Baptism. It tries to relate all of human culture to the good news of salvation so that the light of faith will illumine everything that the students will gradually come to learn about the world, about life and about the human person.»

It is the Christian spirit that permeates the school that makes it the special place it should be.

MANAGEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOL (2/2)

Brother Robert McCann

It is the Christian spirit that permeates the school that makes it the special place it should be.

If you ever get the opportunity to visit other schools on a middle states review, etc., do it. It is a great learning experience. From the moment you put your foot into the school, you get a feel for the school. It does not take long to know if there is a Christian atmosphere in the school. Let me give you two examples that I experienced in visiting a school, not in the Baltimore province. I arrived at the school just as school was beginning, and I went to the office. I was greeted by a joyful secretary, who first of all, knew I was coming, and secondly, welcomed me graciously. She indicated that the principal was with some parents, and would I like to take a seat as he would be with me as soon as he finished. In the meantime, would I like a cup of coffee, and here is our yearbook from last year. It will give you a good picture of the school. She could not do enough for me. I felt very welcomed and that feeling came through during the day in many other ways. The second example is I arrived at a school around one o'clock in the afternoon. I walked into the lobby of the administration area, and to my left was an opening with a secretary, sitting with her back to the opening, typing away. Straight ahead was another secretary also typing. Sitting around were a few students. I stood there awhile and finally the secretary in front looked up and saw me. I was dressed in my Brothers black suit and white collar. I introduced myself and asked for the Principal. The answer I received was, I don't know where he is. He was here a few minutes ago. End of conversation. Thank God, the Principal came along, because I don't know what I would have done. I hope the two examples speak for themselves. The Christian atmosphere must exist in the entire school, and it must be exhibited by all, from the Principal to the people who work in the cafeteria. (I'm not putting these people at the bottom of the ladder, but only using them as an example.)

There are two types of religious intruction that takes place in the school. The first is the classroom lesson. Another of my strong convictions, is that Religion should be taught an equal amount of time as the other major subjects. The classroom instruction should be professional and theological. Where there is area for discussion and interpretation that is fine, but where there is dogma, it is set. The classroom instruction should clear up confusion and not make for more.

The second area of instruction is the Campus Ministry program, or the action arm of the classroom instruction. A strong viable campus ministry program with appropriate liturgical services, spiritual direction, sacramental availability, and outreach service programs is vital to the Christian atmosphere of the school. In these types of programs, the students are learning by doing and observing. A very valued form of education.

De La Salle always wanted to be part of the Church. He had a great loyalty to the Church. So much so that he sent one of his closest advisors and most trusted Brothers, Brother Gabriel Drolin, to open a school in Rome as a measure of his attachment for the Holy Father.

A Lasallian School is Catholic quality education and academic excellence going hand in hand together. Anything short of this is unprofessional, and in a sense, unjust. I am not talking about having a school only for the academically talented. I am talking about having an excellent school that is meeting the needs of its students. The academic program in a school should be developed for all students. Each student should be educated to the best of his/her ability, and if college is in the future for the student, then he/she should be prepared for it. If the world of work is in the future for the student, then the student should be prepared for it. Our students should experience success... this means they should be pushed as far as they can go... but they should be successful at whatever level they are performing. This is not easy when you have a two or three track system, and a teacher that is teaching on all tracks. It is not easy to shift gears from one period to the next. But let us put it in the area of justice. Are not all students, the gifted and the normal, the 140 IQ and the 95 IQ, paying the same tuition? Therefore, each should be taught in the best possible way. Listen to what de La Salle said in the 17th century. "The directors of each house or the Inspector of Schools must keep a very exact vigilance over all their teachers... and make sure that they carefully apply themselves to teach their students, that they neglect none of them, and that their concern be equal toward all, even greater toward the slowest and most neglected". What makes this especially Lasallian... isn't this what every school should be doing. Sure every school should be doing it, but the question is, do they? If you want to be a Lasallian School you have no choice but to do it. De La Salle's concern for the individual student is part and parcel for the existence of the school. The role of management, the administration, the guidance department, is to know the school population and program wisely. The role of the teacher is to prepare well and be concerned for each and every student. To reach out to the one in need. To touch the hearts of your students. This is Lasallian. Closely associated with the concept of academic excellence is the school environment. Without a positive school environment academic excellence cannot be achieved. What is this positive environment? I believe it is one whereby the students can grow academically, socially, and spiritually. It is one where there is order, discipline, concern, and love. A place where responsible behavior is not only encouraged but expected. It is a happy place, a place where the students want to be. De La Salle reminded his teachers that they had a grave responsibility of making the school attractive. He pointed out that if the children were learning and liked their classes, they themselves would put pressure on their parents to keep them in school. This would often be successful, he said, because, "parents desire only what their children desire, so it will be enough that the children desire to come to school for their parents to be satisfied to send them there". Did you ever stop and think how much of a teenager's life is spent in school or at school activities each day, each week, each year? It can range from 7 hours a day to over 12 hours for those involved in sports or plays, etc. Add to this the time spent doing homework and then add the 8 hours they should be sleeping and you can see that there is very little "other" time left in their daily or weekly lives. If a student is not happy, then life is a bore, it is dull, it is a drag. What is left except drugs, alcohol, and even suicide. On the other hand if a student is happy and excited then life is worth living and the future can be bright. A Lasallian school is alive.

The final area I wish to address in this section is the concern for the poor, both the academically poor and the financially poor. Again there are two parts to this section, one is the education of the poor and the other is the education to understand the poor. The reason that de La Salle started his mission in the Church was for the poor. the financially poor. the neglected. the academically poor or the uneducated. He was conscious of the large number of boys roaming the streets and getting into trouble. He knew that one way to change this social disorder was through education... Christian education. He was in the true sense a social innovator. If he were alive today he would be in the category of Mother Theresa and Martin Luther King. Jr. He did things that no others wanted to do and he did it well. Can we carry on the same tradition in our schools? True. populations change. cultures change. but we still have the poor with us. Lasallian schools should reach out to the poor wherever possible. Lasallian schools should become creative in developing new ways to reach the poor. Equally important to the teaching of the poor is the teaching of social justice and developing programs whereby the students can reach out and touch the poor. Our students who come from families that are financially well off must be brought to the undestanding of those who have less and to learn what they can do to assist them. Most of our schools have programs that allow the students to touch the poor. I don't have to explain them to you. But I do want to emphasize the importance of these programs for a truly Lasallian school. Needless to say it is the role of the management to assure that these programs are in place. for a truly Lasallian school is concerned for the poor.

As we conclude the section on management as action I now want to address the concept of management as people... in a sense the actor. the doer. the administrator. the teacher. Remember in the definition of management it included the people who do the managing. I think this is a common use of the term since we refer to the people at the top as management. I sense that in a school setting there are several levels of management. In the eyes of the faculty. it is the principal. In the eyes of the students. it is the teacher and the dean of students. In the eyes of the parents it could be the guidance counsellors. Here. however. I want to look at the chief administrator and his/her team as management. I want to again refer to the book of de La Salle. The Conduct of Schools. In the preface written by Brother Timothy it states. "this method has been prepared and put in order only after a great number of conferences between him (de La Salle) and the oldest and most capable teachers among the Brothers of the Institute. and after several years of experience. Nothing has been added that has not been thoroughly deliberated and well tested and of which the advantages and disadvantages have not been weighed and is so far as possible the good and bad consequences have not been foreseen". This example of de La Salle of calling together those who had lived the experience of teaching. to assist in the writing of the book gives us the model to work from. School administrators should call forth the expertise that is present within the faculty to assist in the developing of new policies and procedures. This is what we refer to today as collegiality. a working together. When the chief administrator reaches out to the faculty and staff and invites them to participate in decision making. the faculty usually responds by accepting the decision and implementing it.

Collegiality also can take place in other levels of the school such as the department chairpersons and the departments. the athletic director and the coaches. the academic and student affairs counsels and the students. even the parents' organizations and the chief administrators. Collegiality helps to make a "happy" school.

Collegiality. however. does not take away from the role of the chief administrator. De La Salle was very strong about the role of the principal and his authority. He was the one to supervise the teachers and to control what was taking place in the school. So as we look at the concept of collegiality in a school we must also look at the role of the principal in supervising the teachers. Of all de La Salle did and said. nothing was more important than making sure that the teachers are professional and well trained and do their special ministry to the best of their ability. In each school the principal. or if he could not do it. then there was the Inspector of Schools or the Master Teacher who worked with the teachers. The schools were very structured. The students knew what they had to do. The teachers knew what they had to do. The principals knew what they had to do. It was like a well-oiled machine when all parts worked well.

There were good reasons for this structure. The students came from an unstructured existence. The teachers/Brothers were untrained and new. The structure was needed to carry the program and in the process the students learned. The role of the principal was to see that this structure was carried out. This is the prime example of the maxim that de La Salle believed in. good teachers make good schools. If there is any weakness that I have found lately in our schools. it is in the area of teacher supervision. and teacher development. Yearly we have new teachers coming into our schools and these and inexperienced teachers need the support and assistance from masters. Too often we expect the new teacher to walk into the classroom and take over and do all things right. Generally we even give them Freshmen homerooms and classes and together they can go down the tubes. Many of our new teachers today are coming from college programs that are not teaching oriented. They know their academic material but they have had no experience as teachers. They do not know the simple classroom management techniques. Why am I saying all of this? If our schools are to be truly Lasallian then we are looking at well trained teachers. Management in a school. the chief administrators must give time and energy to the development of the teachers. I would like to see today in our schools a Master Teacher. someone like the old Inspector of Schools. whose only responsibility is assisting teachers in their own development. This is what a Lasallian school should be. This is a responsibility of management.

So as we look at the management of schools. in particular Lasallian schools. we look at the two sides of the word management... the action... the actor. We saw the conducting of Christian, professional schools. where academic excellence is striven for, where the environment is conducive to the development of happy and healthy adolescents. where the concerns of the poor are addressed. as the ideal. If de La Salle were alive today would he feel at home in your school? We saw the chief administrators, the assistant administrators. the teachers. the staff. and the students forming a Christian community whereby each is concerned for and respectful of each other. The core of Christian Schools (Lasallian) is the teacher. The role of the teacher is to touch the hearts of the students. by this we mean we have to make a difference in their lives. In a recently completed study of the schools of the Archdiocese of St. Louis. Sister Mary Ann Eckhoff states. «One key finding is that "parents value and believe their children benefit from strong academic programs. a caring and disciplined learning atmosphere. religious faith development. positive role models for educators and a school/community family orientation". The integration of religion into the entire school day is highly valued by parents even if it is not often explicitly stated».

The above could be a definition of a Lasallian school. All Catholic schools have similar philosophies. but it is in the carrying out of the philosophy where we should be Number 1. We should give the example as to how it is done. Why... simply because we are the daughters and sons of de La Salle. We are Lasallian. He is our Founder. He is the Founder of the Christian Schools. He is the Patron of Teachers. He achieved his sanctity in the school setting as did Brother Miguel and Brother Benilde... we can too.

THE THREE PROFESSIONAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE LASALLIAN EDUCATOR

KNOWLEDGE, TEACHING SKILLS PASTORAL CONCERN

Br. Jose Maria Valladolid

In order to be able to exercise his ministry as a Christian educator fulfilling faithfully the will of God, the Lasallian educator must possess a certain kind of spirit: in simple terms, the spirit of Christianity, that is to say, faith. Faith, however, is revealed in charity, or in other words, through love. The love of the Christian educator is zeal for the salvation of the souls of children. To fulfil their ministry, Brothers make a commitment to live and to run schools "together and by association", and this community dimension complements the faith and zeal of the Brother.

From a professional point of view, the ministry in its turn requires the Christian educator to combine three characteristics: knowledge, teaching skills and pastoral concern.

1. At the beginning of the Institute

John Baptist de La Salle and his first teachers (who soon became Brothers), through a process of personal and shared reflection, discovered progressively what the characteristics should be of an educator in a Christian school.

They came to understand that their work was a "mission" entrusted to them by the Church and to which God called them. They realised also that their work in school was a "ministry" because it served to extend the Kingdom of God. And they discovered that the Christian school demanded of them a total commitment and that to devote themselves to it they had to consecrate their whole life to God.

They understood likewise that as teachers they had to combine in their persons three inseparable characteristics. They had to:

1.– possess knowledge in order to pass it on to children;
2.– be competent teachers in order to teach well and ensure each child made progress;
3.– be filled with a burning zeal in order to guide them in the spirit of Christianity.

They had, therefore, to have knowledge, know how to teach and be apostles. All three things together.

These three elements characterised the Brother as an educator. It would have been unthinkable for a Brother not to have a thorough grasp of the material he was teaching. Nor would it have been conceivable for a Brother not to use the methods devised and and adopted by everyone, which were contained in the Conduct of Schools, and which thus had become the "rule" where teaching was concerned. In the same way, it would have been impossible to imagine a Brother incapable of educating his pupils in the Gospel values.

In the beginning, the knowledge required of a teacher by the Christian school was quite elementary: reading, writing, arithmetic, singing (Gregorian chant), politeness, Christian doctrine...none of which called for extensive studies.

Very soon, however, standards rose, and the teacher needed to know more and be more skilful. At the first Seminary for teachers which De La Salle set up at Rheims, the young men spent several months there or even "several years till they were completely trained as much in piety as in the requirements of their work...They were taught to sing, read and write perfectly" (Memoir on the Habit).

These young men were not due to become Brothers, but lay teachers in village schools. It is logical to suppose that Brothers also were trained in piety, teaching methods and in the subjects they would have to teach.

Very soon, and already in the lifetime of the Founder, certain Brothers had to undergo more thorough training in order to teach at more advanced levels or other subjects. For example, there were those who ran the Seminary for teachers, those who looked after the Irish nobles, or who had to teach crafts at the Rue Princesse and St. Yon. These too had to possess these three characteristics: knowledge, teaching skills and apostolic zeal.

2. Historical evolution

As time went on, the Institute had constantly to adapt its ministry to the needs of the times. It extended its teaching over the whole educational range from schools for very young pupils to post-secondary and university establishments. The subjects or disciplines children and young people had to study increased greatly in number as did the level of knowledge.

In our times, whatever the school, teachers need a great deal of training in order to master the special subject they will be teaching. They have to restrict themselves to a single subject or at the very best to one or two closely related subjects. Competence in a specialised field calls for constant updating on the part of the teacher if he does not want to find himself out of his depth.

And so in our days, one can no longer imagine a teacher teaching all subjects except at a very elementary level. Very often, being a teacher implies specialisation in one subject.

In his work, a teacher cannot separate his knowledge from his teaching skills. While it is important to know one's subject thoroughly, it is equally important to be an expert in the art of teaching. This is really the second specialised subject of every teacher. To know many things but not be able to communicate them might be a reasonable position for a scientist or a researcher, but not for a teacher.

The two characteristics already described are necessary for all teachers. But for a Christian teacher, and above all for a teacher in a Lasallian educational centre, a third characteristic is absolutely necessary: that of being an apostle.

Quite a widespread attitude in some places is to concentrate on the areas of knowledge and teaching skills and to leave apostolic considerations to one side. Some members of educational communities think there should be a diversity of functions. They say: "I concentrate on my specialised subject. As for the apostolate and religious training, that's the job of the person responsible for pastoral care or for teaching religion. The same person cannot at one and the same time specialise in everything."

The reasoning seems to be quite convincing, but it is based on a false principle. It ignores the fact that the "Christian teacher", at whatever level he teaches, is a single person who combines at the same time knowledge, teaching skills and commitment to the apostolate. If this last characteristic is missing, he is merely a teacher (a most commendable profession, certainly), but he is not a "Christian educator".

3. Education in the faith and the pastoral ministry of education

In the Christian school, every teacher is called to be a "Christian educator", even if he does not teach religion. To educate children and young people in a Christian way means to help them assimilate Gospel values.

In the Christian school, there is no single person specifically responsible for communicating these values: it is the whole teaching body collectively and as individuals that is responsible for this mission. Consequently, every teacher, whether he specialises in science, the arts or technology, is also at the same time a teacher of the faith for his pupils.

Teaching the faith to a young person does not consist above all in teaching him the contents of religion, but rather helping him live in relation to God, his fellow men, nature, in accordance with human and Christian values. This is valid for all Christians even if their knowledge of their faith is very restricted.

It is logical for a pupil in a Christian school, who fills his head with knowledge, to get to know his own faith to the same degree and to grow in it. The intellectual content of religion may be the area of competence of the teacher of religion, but he is not the only one who educates in the faith: this is the responsibility of the whole teaching staff.

Quite often nowadays, for a person to become a religion teacher he has to specialise in theology and catechetics. But to be an educator in the faith requires also expertise in the pastoral ministry of education. We are speaking here of the two quite distinct but related dimensions of the Christian training of the child and young person: that of religious knowledge, and that of practising the faith.

The religion teacher is responsible for the first dimension, but no teacher should neglect the second, the pastoral ministry of education, which embraces much more than " religious" training or religion lessons. The pastoral ministry of education is a part of everything the Christian teacher does in a Christian school. It is present in the classroom, through the atmosphere he creates, the values he communicates, the criteria which govern what he teaches; through his attitude towards science, the world and children; through his relations with pupils and other teachers; through his approachability and closeness to pupils; through his "tender love" for the children and young people entrusted to him; by the advice and help he gives; by his willingness to come to the help of those most in need; by his spiritual life centred on his ministry and the souls of children.

All this, and many other things, is what constitutes the pastoral ministry of a Christian school. To this can be added school and extracurricular activities whose aim is to help children and young people live their faith more intensely and communicate it to others by apostolic activities suited to their age: religious events, prayer groups, meetings and retreats, catechist groups, help for the needy, activities offering help on a human and Christian level...

4. Suitable training for the teacher

The training of a Lasallian teacher must, therefore, include these three elements. Normally, most attention is given to acquisition of knowledge, less to teaching skills, and much less to pastoral concern.

With regard to pedagogical skills, the first Brothers were able to "compose together" the Conduct of Schools. It contained norms based on experience and adapted according to what experience showed to be necessary. There came a time when, because situations had become so diverse, the Conduct was relegated to the archives and the Lasallian style of education came to consist in what each individual thought was the best way to achieve certain specific results. What a pity! How many schools are there where teachers have come together and agreed upon a common approach to methodology and pedagogy?

It is true that much has been done to draw up "school educational programmes". But this is only the first step. What still needs to be done is to study, formulate and assimilate the Lasallian style of education by making it an active and living factor in each educational community.

As far as the pastoral ministry of education is concerned, to what extent is each Brother and each lay teacher in a Christian school involved in it? Quite probably, when we examine ourselves on this point, we feel an urgent need to start or update our training in the spiritual, pastoral and apostolic field. The kind of training needed by each Brother and each Lasallian teacher is one that enables him to be a real expert in the pastoral ministry of education just as he is in the subject he teaches and in the methods he uses to teach it.

The basis of this pastoral training must be an intense spiritual life centred on the charism of Christian education; a spirituality permeated with the "spirit" of faith and zeal, lived and communicated within the context of the educational community. The primary source of nourishment for this spiritual formation is without doubt the meditations St. John Baptist de La Salle wrote for us, and especially those written for the Time of Retreat. These contain a synthesis of a profound theology of education which he intended not only for teaching religious but for all Christian teachers.

WHAT IS DEMANDED OF US BY OUR ASSOCIATION (1/2)

«Juntos», n° 89
District of Central America

1. "Together and by association" (R 47)

- Inspired and sustained by the experience of the Founder (R 47).

47. John Baptist de La Salle was led to found a community of men who, enlightened by God and sharing in his plan of salvation, associated together to respond to the needs of young people who were poor and far from salvation. Even today, each of the Brothers' communities finds in this event a fundamental source of inspiration.

- We make a VOW of
  - Association FOR...
  - Association WITH...

42. By this vow they commit themselves to remain in the Institute in order to accomplish its specific mission and to live in fraternal and apostolic communion with their Brothers, faithful to the Institute and to its spirit, to their Brothers and to those they serve in their ministry.

39. By the vow of association for the service of the poor hrough education, the Brothers commit themselves, as their Founder did, to conduct as a community schools or other centres of Christian education accessible to the poor. They develop educational methods that promote above all the social betterment of ordinary classes of people.

39a. The solidarity among the Brothers that results from their vow of association for the service of the poor through education gives support to the apostolic activity of the Institute.

- "Having EVERYTHING IN COMMON" (R 32)

32. By their poverty lived according to the Gospel, the Brothers become poor in order to follow Christ who was poor and in order to serve better all persons as their brothers, especially those most in need.

They are convinced that if they were to fill their hearts with the goods of this earth, they would close themselves off from God and become as strangers to the poor.

The spiritual journey of John Baptist de La Salle, their Father, as well as their solidarity with with people today and the needs of the Church, motivate the Brothers to cultivate within themselves the disposition of a poor person. By such a conversion, they witness to the fact that God is their only wealth.

The Brothers live simply as persons of ordinary means, having everything in common. They provide for the livelihood of the community through their work. They decide together the guidelines for the best use of their resources.

For this

- "Together and by association...in the Apostolate (R 16)

16. From the beginning of the Institute, the Brothers have fulfilled their mission "together and by association". Each Brother exercises his apostolate as a member of a community by whom he knows he is accepted, supported and entrusted with his mission.

The Brothers are in solidarity with their community, with their District and with the Institute as a whole. In fulfilling their ministry, whatever their individual assignment may be, they are contributing as a community to the unique mission of the Institute within the Church.

- "Together and by association...in the Congregation (R 25)

25. For this purpose, I...promise to unite myself and to remain in society with the Brothers of the Christian Schools who are associated to conduct, together and by association, schools for the service of the poor...wherever I may be sent and to do whatever I may be assigned by the body of the Society or its superiors.

- "Together and by association...in Community (R 48)

48. The distinctive character of the Brothers' community is to be a community where the experience of God is shared.

2. "In and for a project"

- What the Rule requires:

– From the central government (R 117a)

117a. At the beginning of their mandate, the Brother Superior and his Councillors draw up a comprehensive programme which enables them to respond to what they discern to be the call of the Spirit or the needs of youth, and also to the decisions taken by the General Chapter.

This programme will distinguish between those responsibilities that are to be shared by the entire General Council and the specific duties to be assigned to each Councillor.

– For the Regional Government (R 127e)

127e. The Regional Coordinator fosters communication among the Brother Visitors of the Region, and supports them in their mission. He ensures that the Region remains in contact with the Brother Superior General. He follows up the application of decisions and programmes adopted for the Region as a whole. He also encourages cooperation and interdependence between it and the other Regions of the Institute.

The details of the Brother Regional Coordinator's functions are specified in each Region by the Conference of Brother Visitors or possibly by a Regional Assembly with the approval of the Brother Superior.

– For the government of the District (R 136 & 128)

136. The mission of the District Council is to promote the unity of the District and to assist the Brother Visitor in the exercise of his duties. Together they make plans for the progress of the District and they study how to face the problems that arise. Each year, the Brother Visitor undertakes with his Council, a fraternal evaluation of his own work and of the state of the District.

128. As an assembly of a pastoral and administrative nature, the District Chapter manifests the profound unity existing among the Brothers and permits their active participation, either directly or through their delegates, in the structures of reflection and decision in the District.

The District Chapter is convoked by the Brother Visitor. It evaluates the life of the District in all its aspects. It takes into account the local situation and it establishes a schedule of precise programmes for renewal, adaptation or growth to be implemented in the near future. The process of evaluation and of establishing new programmes is carried out according to the guidelines set by the Church and by the Institute.

Everything set down concerning the District Chapter applies equally to sub-Districts and Delegations according to the arrangements determined in their statutes.

- To be more realistic and effective (R 58, 11 & 40a)

58. The community provides the time and the means necessary to study how to apply the Rule to the actual circumstances in which it lives. It determines the decisions to be taken in response to questions concerning either the life of the community or its mission.

Exchanging views on these matters gives everyone the opportunity to express his thoughts and so to arrive at a unity of viewpoint and action.

11. John Baptist de La Salle was deeply moved by the way in which "the children of the artisans and the poor" were abandoned and left to themselves. As a practical response to his prayerful consideration of this fact in relation to God's plan of salvation, he came to discern in faith what God wanted the mission of the Institute to be.

In order to respond to this plan and to similar situations of distress the Institute desires to be present in the world of today as part of the Church's work in spreading the Gospel.

In its primary concern for the educational needs of the poor as they strive to become aware of their dignity and to be recognised as human beings and children of God, the Institute establishes, renews and diversifies its works according to what the kingdom of God requires.

40. The Brothers have always in view the promotion of justice in the light of the Gospel and the direct or indirect service of the poor as the preferred aspect of their ministry of education.

They work directly for the poor by providing an education for the economically deprived, victims of social injustice, delinquents and those neglected by the rest of society.

When the Brothers work with students from families that are more or less well off, they teach them their duties and responsibilities with regard to social justice and charity towards everyone.

The Brothers give special attention to their pupils who have difficulties at school, at home, or problems adjusting to society.

WHAT IS DEMANDED OF US BY OUR ASSOCIATION (2/2)

«Juntos», n° 89
District of Central America

- To see to the Formation:

– of the Brothers (R 96a, 32, & 101a)

96a2. The first years in an active community, when there should be a plan designed either by the District or by the community to guide and accompany the Brother as he tries to become responsible for his own formation.

101a. Each Brother is invited to develop a personal formation programme. He has the primary responsibility for his own formation; thus he will live out more fully his vocation with his Brothers to the benefit of the educational mission he shares with them.

The need for continuing formation extends throughout the entire lifetime and to every aspect of the life of the Brother.

– of the Community (R 101b)

101b. The community is responsible for establishing an effective and ongoing programme for its own formation as a group. The evaluation of this plan forms part of the community's annual programme.

– in the District (R 101d & 88b)

101d. The Brother Visitor and his Council establish a comprehensive plan of continuing formation which caters for the particular needs of specific groups of Brothers within the District. They provide the Brothers who are reaching retiring age with the means to investigate new possibilities and acquire new skills. In this way, these Brothers are helped to continue doing apostolic work in a way that is consistent with their vocation.

The superiors take the necessary means to ensure that competent Brothers are put in charge of continuing formation in the District.

The Brothers in charge periodically evaluate the programmes and other projects established in the communities of the District. They ascertain as well the extent of active participation of each Brother in the work of renewal.

88b. Both initial and continuing formation are related to the overall programme of the District, thereby favouring the unity of the Brothers.

– In the Institute (R 101g)

101g. The Brother Superior and his Council are careful to promote programmes of continuing formation in the Institute, especially those designed to prepare Brothers to work in formation.

They ensure that the Brothers from the poorest Districts are enabled to participate regularly in the programmes of renewal established in the Institute.

- And accompaniment...(R 96a)

96a. The period of temporary vows must be closely supervised by the Brother Visitor and the Commission for Formation. Three stages merit special attention:

1. the time immediately after the novitiate when the Brother is preparing to exercise his mission as a teacher and an educator;

2. the first years in an active community when there should be a plan designed either by the District or by the community to guide and accompany the Brother as he tries to become responsible for his own formation;

3. the time immediately leading up to perpetual profession.

- As an educational community of Brothers (R 58a & 16a)

58a. At the beginning of each year and in a spirit of discernment, the Brothers establish or revise their annual community programme.

Everything that forms part of the life of the community is taken into account in making up this programme: its life of prayer and its apostolic commitments, its brotherhood, its relationships with outsiders and its internal organisation, its provision for continuing formation and its recreational activities.

This community programme takes into account the guidelines and directives already laid down by the District Chapter.

Once the programme is agreed upon and submitted to the Brother Visitor for approval, the Brothers are then committed to it. It serves during the year as the basis for both personal and community evaluation, especially on the occasion of the Brother Visitor's official visit to the community.

16a. The Brothers submit their plans for new forms of apostolate to the discernment of the community in communion with the superiors and the Brothers of the District, in order to be sure that these initiatives are in conformity with the purpose of the Institute.

- As an educational community (R 13d, 17b & 17c)

13d In order to fulfil their mission, the Brothers, together with those who work with them, undertake a periodic evaluation and revision of their educational programmes. Both groups provide as well for their personal and continuing formation.

17b To achieve the purposes of a school, the Brothers foster a spirit of collaboration and mutual enrichment among all the members of the educational community. They help each one to fulfil his or her specific role: students, parents, teachers, priests, former students and friends.

17c The Brothers' community makes known to the rest of the educational community the essential elements of the Lasallian tradition. The Brothers offer to those that desire it, a more intensified sharing of Lasallian spirituality, encouraging such persons to make a more specific apostolic commitment. The Brothers join in the formation of faith communities which are witnessing to the truth of what the Brothers profess.

How can we understand and live, here and now, the following inspiring words uttered by our first Brothers in their own here and now?

* * *

The obligations of the vows for the Brothers of the Christian Schools

The vows oblige the Brothers to do four things:

1. To conduct schools by association, with those who have become associated with the Society and with those who will associate themselves subsequently, wherever they are sent and to do whatever the superiors assign them to do.

2. To remain in the said Society for all the time they have committed themselves to, with being able to leave it of their own will, for whatever reason.

3. If it happens that the Society becomes destitute, never to leave it for this reason, but to resolve rather to beg alms and live on bread only rather than abandon the said Society and the schools.

4. To obey in the first place the superior of the Society who has been chosen and the one or those that will subsequently be chosen; secondly, the particular directors who are or will be appointed by the superior of the Society; thirdly, the body of this Society, whether the said body is represented by either superiors or others assembled in its name. Brothers are obliged to obey all the above on pain of mortal sin, every time they command in virtue of the vows.

To understand and appreciate the "founding language" of the 1691 and 1694 formulas of vows.

1691 formula	1694 formula
We consecrate ourselves to entirely to you	I consecrate myself wholly to you to procure	to procure with all our ability and all our efforts the establishment of the Society of the Christian Schools	your glory in the manner that is most pleasing to you and of the greatest benefit to the said Society.	as far as I am able and as you will require of me

Some ways to help me to assess my life

- Together and by association, the basis for an apostolic project

* The Rule tells us..."together and by association"...
– in the exercise of the Ministry (16)
– doing God's Work (20)
– as a community of consecrated persons (25)

* To what extent am I conscious of being a Brother with the Brothers of the District?

* To what degree do I take part in: the District Plan? the Community Programme? the Educational and Pastoral plan?

* Do I speak of my Personal programme with: the Brother Visitor? the Brothers of my community? the Brothers I am closer to or who are my friends?

* What do I do to understand and practise my association with my Brothers? in the District, as the "body of the Society of the Brothers of the Christian Schools" in Central America?

* We live by association and with stability... in order to.. respond more effectively, as a stable community, to needs of evangelisation and education that are always present and ever renewed among the poor, families and teachers.

Do I support District Plans? Do I not tend to restrict myself rather to my own plans more or less tied in with those of the District? Do I realise the harm done to it by serving one's own interests?

Association and stability require a process of continuing formation in the following areas:

- professional competence
- quality of relationships
- witness of one's life
- the vigour of one's faith....(cf. Rule 21)

Do you take this into account in your personal life and with regard to your community?

BROTHER WRITERS OF COLOMBIA

Br. Juan Vargas Muñoz

On March 19th 1991, the centenary year commemorating the arrival of the Brothers in Colombia came to an end.

The occasion was marked by an exhibition of textbooks written by Brothers in Colombia, organised by the National Library of Bogota.

During the opening ceremony, Br. Juan Vargas Munoz, Rector of De La Salle University, Bogota, spoke of the principal authors of these books. This article reproduces some of what he said.

During this same ceremony, Professor Hector Lopez' new book, entitled "Historia de la Universidad De La Salle", was on show.

* * *

The influence of the Brothers of the Christian Schools in the field of publication extends to a great many areas: education, culture, science, pedagogy, religion, politics, social questions and sport. In this the Brothers have walked in the footsteps of their Father and Founder, Saint John Baptist de La Salle, who wrote 26 works: 6 works on asceticism or spirituality which urge us to live the experience of God more intensely ; 14 educational works inspired by the Gospel, which aim to make schools efficient from a secular point of view, while offering at the same time the means of salvation to children and young people, especially to the poorest among them; a collection of 5 short treatises, and thousands of letters. Fr. Mouchard was right when he said: "It is he who showed you the way along which your rivals follow some distance behind."

For a certain time, the Brothers based their own works exclusively on those of the Founder, and then they began to produce their own works. In 1785, Brother Agathon, Superior General, wrote "The 12 virtues of a good teacher". A few years later, he began a work on accounting. During this period, works appeared on arithmetic, French grammar, navigation, practical geometry applied to linear design, summaries of geography, the history of France and Christian politeness, etc.

In 1880, the the Brothers' Institute Writers' Committee came into existence. Its president was none other than Br. Gabriel Marie Brunhes who later would become Superior General. The Spanish form of his surmame gave rise to the name BRUNO which subsequently appeared on innumerable textbooks for schools and colleges, as well as on works of a more general nature. The name "BRUNO" was usually preceded by his initials G and M, and that is why a whole group of textebooks was called the G.M. Bruno Series. Much of the G.M. Bruno Series was adopted in Latin America. The Brothers in Colombia added the La Salle Series to it.

The first Colombian Brother to publish educational works was Br. Luis Gonzaga (d.1916) who under the pen name-name of Pacifico Coral wrote two excellent works: "Extracts from Literature" and "Colombian Ephemerides". He was followed by Br. Idinael Enrique (d.1963), known as "an eminent author of didactic works", whose books became very widely known. These included, for example: "Introduction to the Botanical and Zoological Sciences" and the whole Castellano Progressivo Series which revolutionised the teaching of Spanish in Colombia. Together with Br. Fulgencio, he wote also reading, writing and mathematical textbooks, as well as model lessons for the teaching of literacy to adults through Radio Sutatenza.

For more than half a century, Br. Justo Ramon was the best known Lasallian on account of his geography and history textbooks. Because of his expertise in methodology and teaching, he had few rivals in his specialised field. The value of his works lay in their contents and the way they were adapted to all ages, in his own unequalled knowledge of science, in his clear language and his literary genius. He published a "Geography of Colombia by natural regions", a "Universal Geography", a "Geography of America" and an "Advanced Geography of Colombia". In addition to this work he gave highly-rated courses on pre-history and the history of Colombia. He was also Bolivar Professor.

Br. Alfredo Tomas accompanied Br. Justo Ramon on his scientific expeditions and shared in his research. Other Brothers, too, made a considerable contribution to this field. We can be proud of such Brothers as Estanilao Luis, Florencio Rafael, Gonzalo Manuel and Ulberto Miguel, who are already dead; Brothers Jaime Gutierrez and Tomas Alberto (geography); Brothers Antonio Manuel, Claudio Marcos, Eugenio Leon, Estanilao Leon, Sebastian Felix and Florencio Rafael (R.I.P.), as well as Brothers Martin Carlos and Ramiro Pinzon (history and civic education).

Exceptional for their skill in handling the Spanish language are Brother Benildo Matias, author of an authoritative work on Spanish literature, which Br. Ramiro Pinzon (Rodulfo Eloy) later very skilfully adapted for use in the first three classes of secondary school. He followed this up by producing his own books for the three following years. Exceptional also were Brothers Estanislao Luis, Claudio Marcos, Gonzalo Manuel, Sebastian Felix (R.I.P.), Andres Romero and Andres Bernardo.

If we turn to mathematics, we find many works which are particularly valuable on account of their contents, methodology and teaching approach. There are textbooks on arithmetic, algebra, calculus, geometry, trigonometry, modern mathematics, accounting, physics problems.

The names of authors that come to mind especially in this connection are Brothers Agustin Alfonso, Ramiro Pinzon, Nestor Suarez, Horacio Tobon, Mauricio Torres, Gustavo Cruz, Nestor Barrera, Miguel Amaya Cadena, Julio Chavez and Juvenal Rios.

We must give a special mention to the works on mineral and organic chemistry (including sets of related problems) by Br. Claudio Felix.

In the field of philosophy, the leading exponents are Brothers Alfonso Norberto, Gilberto Fabian, Alvaro Llano, Jose Penagos and Martin Carlos. The latter has turned his attention also to sociology in a recently published book on poverty in Colombia.

Other branches of knowledge have been explored with a view to making them accessible to pupils: English language, civics and politeness, religion, singing, linear design, pedagogy and psychology as applied to education. These publications are the work especially of Brothers Ramiro Pinzon, Andres Rosero, Octavio Sanchez, Ruben Angel, Pedro Garcia, Jose Arturo Penagos, Luis Alejandro Ruiz, Oliverio Rodriguez, Isidoro Honore and Aranio Gallego.

The contribution of the Brothers to the field of the natural sciences and ecology deserves special mention. We recall with admiration and veneration Brothers Apolinar Maria, Niceforo Maria and Daniel Gonzalez Patino (R.I.P.) who, like new Mutis, successfully completed a second botanical expedition and were acclaimed as the great wise Lasallians. There followed in their footsteps Brothers Ariste Jose, Idinael Enrique, Claudio Marcos, Antonio Camilo, Octavio Martinez (the present Rector of the Lasallian University Corporation of Medellin), Antonio Serna, Ramon Guevara, Luis Zamudio, Alfonso Enrique and Roque Casallas.

There is no doubt that Lasallian publications have been extremely influential in Colombian culture. Many of our fellow countrymen cannot do otherwise than express their heartfelt gratitude to the Brothers whose textbooks have enabled them to begin exploring the world of science and have given them the means to extend the frontiers of knowledge.

For a De La Salle Brother, to publish a textbook or a book on some area of culture in general was a special form of apostolate, of evangelisation of culture, an extension of his classroom teaching, enabling him to communicate his message to a multitude of children and young people he did not know and whom he would probably never know. These textbooks were in use throughout the country. They were inspired by criteria which were scientific, professional, and pedagogical. They were intended to instil an ethical and moral sense into the intelligence and hearts of the pupils. These textbooks were low in price so as to make them accessible to the majority of children and young people.

We have to admit, however, that competition from national and multinational companies have driven us out of the leading position we occupied for so long.

Developments in the sciences, technology and modern pedagogy are so numerous and exciting that we feel they hold new secrets in store for us and new channels through which to transmit our scientific, patriotic and Christian message to the young people in our schools, colleges and universities. We have to struggle as our predecessors struggled, but God will light up the way of the Lasallian Community and will strengthen its determination to seek ways of serving mankind through the spoken and the written word. The future expects new and creative initiatives of us.

A PERSONAL ACCOUNT BY THE LAY HEADMASTER OF A LASALLIAN SCHOOL

P.M. Deleersnyder

When Brother Visitor and I were discussing what we should do on this half day during your District Chapter, I suggested this personal account, showing how, in concrete terms, we laymen try to further the work of St.John Baptist de La Salle, and keep alive and perpetuate Lasallian values. How can an academic secondary school (lycee classique), located in a well-off district, catering for pupils whose parents are keen on good exam results - they include among their number university lecturers, engineers, research workers, managing directors - how can such a school live according to the Lasallian spirit? To give you some idea of how this comes about, I shall concentrate on four aspects of the life of my school:

- social awareness at home and abroad
- individual attention to pupils
- staff team-work
- religious education

First of all I should like to say a few words about myself as this will help you to understand my first point. My name is Pierre Marie DELEERSNYDER, I am 40 years old, I am married with 4 children, two boys and two girls, their ages ranging from 4 to 15. My first job was teaching French and Latin in a private College and Lycee in Marcq en Baroeul. Among other responsibilities, I was in charge of organising the teaching of religion, compulsory in those days, in the 7 classes of the 5th year secondary. These were divided up into about 30 groups, and they had two hours religious instruction per fortnight. During these lessons I came into contact with youngsters from well-off families. I took great pleasure in teaching them because they were intelligent and cultured and responded well. I made a point of stretching them, trying to help them give the best of themselves, because most of them were intelligent and many of them would end up in positions of considerable responsibility. During my 9th year in Marcq, the Diocese asked me to prepare myself for the job of headmaster which they wanted me to take up as soon as possible. I was appointed headmaster of a small school called St.Joseph's in the St.Andre suburb of Lille, which was administered jointly with two primary schools, numbering about 650 pupils in all. Here I discovered a different kind of Catholic school, less pleasant, but doing good work in a different way. The pupils there came from families of modest means, and some from poor families with nothing at all. These were the victims of unemployment brought about by the closure or reorganisation of the major local firms like Massey Ferguson, Caby, the Grands Moulins de Paris, and so on. I realised that there were different kinds of Catholic education. It could one kind or another, it could be Marcq or it could be St.Andre. After being headmaster for 3 years at St.Andre, I was asked by Brother Visitor Eugene Bodel to take over as headmaster from Brother Robert Ferrain, who was seriously ill. I was somewhat surprised to be chosen for this post and sorry to have to cause disappointment by leaving the team at St.Andre so soon. I accepted the appointment as headmaster of the St.Adrien Lycee, and as coordinator of the school complex which included the School, the Lycee and the College. At the time I hardly knew the Brothers of the Christian Schools, so I set about discovering who they were. The process was speeded up because as early as my first year there I was invited to join the Tutelle Council and to come to your District Chapter held 4 years ago. According to the decisions made by the Regional Chapter of the time, one consequence of the partnership between Brothers and lay people was that headmasters had to take part in the work of this Tutelle Council. I wondered whether, seeing that I knew so little about the Brothers, I could be of any use let alone be efficient. I was persuaded to accept. And now after 4 years at St.Adrien's, I am glad I accepted the job, and that I have come to discover the Lasallian approach. If I have spoken to you about Marcq and St.Andre, it is because, after the experience of my years there, St.Adrien's represents for me a sort of synthesis of both of those places: our intake covers a broad social spectrum.

And so I come to my first point: at St.Adrien's, social awareness is important. It is shown, for example, by the very extensive sliding scale we have for fees, the most extensive actually of all the Catholic schools in the north; also by not charging the poorest pupils or the children of itinerants anything. And this is the case also for remedial classes in the primary school. This kind of approach is to be found in other Catholic schools too. In our classes, however, there is a also a more discreet approach which consists of mixing children from different backgrounds. Of course, as you are well aware, many of the families are well-off, this is what happens if your school is near a "nice" area; but our intake includes also, and increasingly so. children and young people from other areas. In our classes, children from poor families sit side by side with children from those that are better off. This creates problems, of course, as when the children start comparing notes about clothes, leisure activities and where they go for their holidays. But this contact is good and necessary; and it is an good opportunity for learning, so long as the teachers have their wits about them and are prepared to take advantage of it. We make no distinctions in our dealings with these young people, rather like De La Salle, you recall, Brothers, who sought to help not only the poorest children out in the country and in towns, but also the socially better off youngsters, as in the school for the young Irish noblemen, or those in the boarding school at St.Yon, near Rouen. One could say that school is an apprenticeship for life in society, a chance to see others and the world. While this social awareness is practised in our classes, we try to extend it further afield, to the world outside, both near and far away. The near outside world, for example, is the Marc Sautelet Centre for the paralysed which is right next to our school. Once again this year, our Lycee pupils have volunteered to help the children in wheel-chairs to take part in group catechism lessons, to draw, to think, pray and join in celebrations. In this way they continue the work of the Brother scholastics and of Brother Deparis. The far away outside world is, for example, Madagascar. A teacher who once lived in a community of Malagasy Brothers leads a vigorous campaign through the school Third World Club to make pupils aware of the problems of the country. This goes on all year long, but also, as recently, on special Third World Days and Weeks. Also we regularly send material help to the Malagasy Brothers. This can take the form of a tractor, a container load of agricultural material, spare parts, medicines, school textbooks, and so on. A Lasallian school helping an overseas Lasallian school - what a marvellous way for youngsters to learn the meaning of real solidarity!

But how can we ever hope to achieve this international solidarity if we are not first of all close to each one of our pupils, close in particular to those with most problems? This is my second point: individual attention to pupils. In spite of the number of pupils, we want each one to have as much chance as possible. It is better to lose 2 or 3 points in the all-important Baccalaureat statistical tables than to sacrifice the future of one or more youngsters. It is better to get rid of a clearly brilliant teacher whose personal plans do not fit in with the Lasallian spirit, even if this is painful and causes a stir.

Individual attention to pupils cannot work in an atmosphere of savage elitism. This concern for the pupil, shared by most of the teachers, shows itself, for example, in meetings of the the board that decides which pupils are promoted at the end of the year. Pupil and parent delegates do not attend: they take part. When it comes to the final year of secondary school, the pupils are personally involved in the assessment of their term's work by filling in a form with the heading "Assess yourself, be your own promotion board". These forms are then studied by pupil delegates and the form master. A meeting of the board in October/November to tackle problems of the new school year makes it possible to pinpoint pupils' early difficulties and to provide specific advice. In this way, difficulties can be resolved and catastrophic end of term results avoided. For pupils who find the work difficult, what with the shortage of teaching periods that is now our lot, we provide extra tuition in 5th year maths and 6th year French. For 6th form scientists, 3 classes share the same timetable for maths, and this makes it possible to stream students and thus give separate tuition to the good, the mediocre and the weak pupils. When it becomes necessary for a pupil to change his course or repeat a year, we interview the pupil and try to reach our conclusion with him, pointing out to him the advantages of this arrangement. With so many options available in the 5th and 6th year, we try to involve students as far as possible in their own education. Year masters keep track of every pupil and are there to listen and help: they coordinate the work of the teachers in their year and, with respect for their pupils, deal with day to day problems.

These year masters have an important role to play vis-a-vis their teaching colleagues. Their role is crucial in an area which we consider to be special - staff team work. Teaching, it is true, is evolving in this direction. There was a time when teachers worked alone in their ivory towers. Now more and more they work with other teachers: things are changing fast with regard to the needs of pupils, curricula, textbooks and teaching aids. And then, team teaching has a reassuring effect on pupils: they see a group of teachers all working together for a common purpose, and they see the same kind of progress in all their lessons. As far as working together is concerned, the way new teachers and replacements are given a warm welcome is a good example. Some have expressed their surprise to me at having been given the address of the teacher they are replacing. This is something we do at St.Adrien's: you phone and arrange to meet either at home or school, and you compare notes. It often produces results. Another example: school staff meetings. In my first year, I noticed that my teaching colleagues needed time to discuss, to speak of their problems and be listened to. For two years now, we have had a staff meeting once a month, and this has helped to knit our team of teachers together. The meeting is in particular for year masters and form tutors, but it is open to all teachers. A form is posted up in the staffroom with the heading "Staff Meeting Memo", and teachers write down the subjects they would like discussed - organisation, teaching methods, general topics. During such meetings, people say what is going wrong, make suggestions or requests, state their needs...At the beginning of the school year, the staff decides on its aims for the year, and these are regularly assessed. Last year, the aim was: "Look upon everybody, pupils and staff alike, with a positive attitude without preconditions": an ambitious and challenging programme! This year, it is "Create an atmosphere of trust, so that pupils and staff alike can give of their best and accept their responsibilities". Quite apart from meeting a need for a friendly atmosphere, team work is necessary if we are to be efficient. It is often true that, if the school is to function properly, as St.La Salle said, the two have to go together.

Another area which we consider particularly important is that of religious education. I shall try to treat this point more rapidly as I fear I am taking too much of your time. I hope your questions and the discussion that is to follow will make up for this. As in all your schools, we want the children and young people entrusted to us to come to know Jesus Christ and to grow in that knowledge. We know that the Good News has the power to give life and energy to their young lives, and later, to their adult years. And so we offer them a wide range of options, which are so many different ways the Lord can use, if he so wishes, to seek a welcome from them. In the 5th year, a course in religious culture is offered. It is taught by six teachers. Four other teachers and some parents run Christian study groups. Other parents run the chaplaincy. The religious education of the youngest pupils is partly in the hands of volunteers from the 6th year. Confirmation, in line with local practice, is suggested to pupils who are committed to some form of Church activity, like the scout troop, the Youth Eucharistic Movement (M.E.J.), study groups, etc. Periodically, special activities are organised. At present there is a group of our pupils at Taize, learning about community life and prayer. In January, another group of 6th formers will go for a weekend recollection at the Hautmont house in Mouvaux, etc. On a school level, the members of the Pastoral Council are brave enough to tackle such questions as the following: How to spread the Gospel in our Catholic school? How to create and run a true Christian community? Of course, things are not perfect, and I fear I may have painted too idyllic a picture: for we would like to see more parents and teachers involved in pastoral work; we would like to see our day to day life in the school more shot through with Gospel values; and it is not easy to get children, and in particular adolescents, to come together to pray.

There are other areas I could have mentioned where our work is inspired by the Lasallian spirit. There are our two mobile classrooms for the children of itinerants. These we run in liaison with the Brothers and lay people who are involved in similar work in Nantes, Paris and Grenoble. There are our remedial classes in the primary school, or the scheme to spread the work of years 1 and 2 of the secondary school over 3 years. I could have spoken to you about the document which sets out the philosophy and aims of the school. This document we consider somewhat special, because it is the result of more than a year's work, and teachers, parents of pupils and senior pupils took part in it. You would have recognised its typically Lasallian aims. Instead, however, I chose to restrict myself to the Lycee and give you some specific examples. To conclude, one could say that the road we are following has many Lasallian signposts like "together", "by association" "in the Church", "so that the school may function properly", "attentive to the needs of the young", "considering each pupil as an individual", "in a friendly atmosphere".

RELIGIOUS - FOR WHICH EUROPE? EDUCATION

Br. Alain Cusin

1967: LIke all good stories, everything began very simply. For years the school had been organising youth camps. Since German was being studied as a second language, it was thought a good idea to organise this camp in Germany and include morning sessions for studying German. Annecy was twinned with Bayreuth, Wagner's city, and so it was to this town that we turned and in 1968 our first camp was held in Bavaria.

In 1969, the group that was staying in Germany was keen on sport. Football matches were organised and in this way contact was made with a secondary school in a small town called Pegnitz, some 30 kilometres from Bayreuth. Friendly links were established and annual meetings were established: the Germans coming over at Whitsun, and the French in the summer.

In 1972, a new stage was reached: holiday visits became school exchanges.

Since 1969 without a break, we have been exchanging our classes studying either German or French.

As the number of students studying German was increasing, which is no longer the case, a second agreement was signed with another secondary school 30 kilometres from the first in the town of Grafenberg. Both these schools are State schools.

In 1976 we began an exchange with the Catholic Spin di Romano school in Veneto for our students studying Italian.

In 1989, a first step was taken in the direction of Spain at Figueras.

1989: 20 years during which there was a continuous coming and going of exchange students between Pegnitz and Pringy and Pringy and Pegnitz. Overall, if our statistics are correct, 800 young Germans and 1,000 young French people took part at least once if not more in this sometimes difficult but always enriching and exciting experience of a different style of home and school life.

Teams from different schools understood that Europe could not be restricted to a big market and could not be built only on an economic basis. Our common history as Europeans was so full of hatred, love, vengeance, political and economic domination that first we had to create Europe in the heart before considering one of merchants and politicians. This is what we understood together 20 years ago. Leaving the union of interests to the politicians and businessmen, we tried to work towards creating a union of hearts without an iron curtain or wall, without frontiers, so that no longer would one hear the words "foreigner, ausland", so un-Christian, but rather "friend" and even better "Brother", since we are all sons of the same Father who is in Heaven.

Aim of these exchanges

It is multiple:

– to make all our young people aware that our future community as Europeans cannot live without the ability to talk to one another, hence encourage learning other languages;

– create opportunities for first-hand experience of real life in other European countries;

– create closer links between the world of education and that of work;

– help our young students to see how cultures are nourished and enriched by contributions from different national cultures. This is I think what led us to widen the scope of our twinning and exchanges: the triangle of friendship Pegnitz-Pringy-Spin di Romano (Bassano) first of all, and then to Spain. A diversity of exchanges which demonstrate the cultural unity of Europe without wishing to deny the diversity of cultural traditions proper to each of our countries: riches to be respected and safeguarded.

I. In what do these exchanges consist?

For all our exchanges (Germany, Italy, France, Spain) the principle is the same:

1. From 8.0 am to 1.0 pm (because in Germany and Italy, school ends at 1.0 pm or 1.30 pm).

Lessons by the teachers from the host school: normally 4 or 5 sessions on the language studied (vocabulary, grammar, reading, conversation). The 2 or 3 other sessions, always run by the German or Italian teachers, are lessons in history, geography, science, music, sports, all given, of course, in the language studied.

2. From 1.0 pm or 2.0 pm: The young people go back to their host family (all stay with families). For them this is a way of discovering a new way of living, a new family. Afternoons are spent also exploring the area, visiting certain factories, and in sports activities.

Weekends (Saturday and Sunday) are spent with the family. Teachers are lodged with their colleagues. Sunday Mass.

3. The various town authorities in which the schools are located organise an official reception each year for these youngsters, thus showing them the interest and appreciation they have for these exchanges.

4. We point out that the school exchange with Grafenberg led to the twinning of Pringy with Grafenberg at a solemn signing ceremony 3 years ago.

II. Advantages and disadvantages

For the young people: learning languages

Progress is made during the two weeks spent abroad.

In France they have 3 hours of language study per week (5 to 6 in Germany). During the exchanges, they have 6 hours per day, that is, a minimum of 60 hours per week, the equivalent of 5 months in school. I am not including the hours spent with their exchange partner at home, during which they are obliged to speak German or Italian.

They understand the necessity of learning languages.

All are required to keep a written record of their stay. They get to know a different school, with its different way of working, its special timetable, its spacious and well equipped premises, especially in Germany.

Educational ideas: for the 2nd year now, we are experiencing having lessons lasting 45 minutes.

In Italy, they discover the difficulties experienced by Catholic schools to live and keep going, because they receive no help from either the State or the Church and depend entirely on the financial sacrifices of families and religious congregations.

Getting to know a family

When students arrive in Italy or Germany, there is a certain amount of apprehension.

What is my host family like? Will it be friendly? Will I manage to make myself understood? make friends? adapt?

This demands an effort from the students, because they have to adapt to a new style of life, to the food, to family customs.

Getting to know the area with its riches, its customs.

During this month of December 1989, the young people experienced history in the making. They met East Germans, saw the opening of the frontiers...

Discovering Christian life in Veneto and Bavaria. A prayer is said at the beginning of the school day, before meals. Students took part in prayer meetings, ecumenical services.

In Italy, family life is rediscovered, celebrations in which all take part...joy shared by the neighbourhood, joy that is noisy even, because in Italy children (bambini) are kings.

FOR THE SCHOOL

Extra work to organise these exchanges:
- their preparation
- contacting families
- replacing teachers accompanying the groups
- giving lessons to the students who come:

* in January 1991: an extra class for the Italians,
* in February: an extra class for the Germans from Pegnitz,
* in May: an extra class for the Germans from Grafenberg.

Teachers have to be found who will give lessons free of charge or for a fee. This is not always easy.

Organisation of outings: skiing in winter, visits, etc...

FOR THE FAMILIES

Make families accept exchanges. It is now accepted that there is a language exchange in the 4th year of secondary school.

On the part of these families, an effort is called for:

- to take in the exchange partner without knowing his language,
- to make him fit in,
- to show him around the area.

This demands a certain openness on the part of the families!

It is not rare for families to keep up contact subsequently, inviting one another during the holidays.

FOR THE RELIGIOUS COMMUNITY

It is the key factor in these exchanges.

German and Italian teachers:

- are lodged in the school
- eat with the community
- sometimes share their prayers and celebrations
- in any case, exchange views about teaching, catechesis.

Germany has on several occasions sent teachers of religion. These were occasions for very interesting and deep discussions.

With regard to Italy, members of the same Congregation accompany the students, and so community life is shared with all the different nuances and originality.

In Germany, it is an occasion for us to discover Protestant and ecumenical celebrations.

My German colleague, a Protestant, asked:

* to read the life of St. John Baptist de La Salle
* to learn about the Lasallian approach to education.

Last September, German and Italian teachers went home with copies of the booklet "Lasallian Educational Project".

At our own level we try to bring about what our ancestors were not able or did not want to: understanding among our countries.

Together, we have understood that Europe could not limit itself to being a big market, nor be built simply on an economic basis.

We have understood that our history as Europeans was too full of hatred, love, vengeance and political domination, and that we had to create Europe in the heart before considering one of merchants and politicians.

We try to work with young people and for them, in order to bring about a union of hearts,

* so that they can come to know one another,
* value one another,
* love one another,

through mutual respect, not denying the diversity of cultural traditions proper to each, so as to avoid the destructive divisions of the past. Europe is not behind us: it is ahead of us.

INTRODUCTION

● Number 24 of LASALLIANA, which you now have in your hands, is the second issue of 1992. We are pleased to be able to point out that the number of subscriptions to our publication has increased, and we are particularly glad that the number of those sending in articles has grown. Of course this is a great satisfaction to us for it shows that our publication is proving helpful in communities and other centres.

● What we produce in LASALLIANA is, as usual, available to all members of the Lasallian Family, so that we can have the kind of collaboration needed to achieve the aims of our publication, which are to spread awareness of Lasallian issues of whatever nature, and to help our readers to gain a greater understanding of them. Any material on the life, spirituality and work of St. de La Salle is welcome to these pages, as well as reflexions on real life situations, our mission, ministry, lasallian educational themes, actual teaching, the apostolate, pastoral work in schools, vocations and formation,community life, news of the institute, experiences and witness of individuals.

● It is precisely because the reading matter of LASALLIANA is so varied that it should not be limited in readership to the Brothers' communities. It should be available to the whole Lasallian Family, and especially to the teachers who share the Brothers' apostolate in Lasallian institutions. We should also like to invite the Brothers to share the actual spiritual and educational experiences which we are trying to express in these pages.

● Our next issue, number 25, will be a milestone in the short history of LASALLIANA. We intend printing an index, by subject matter and author, of all the articles so far published. We hope that this index will prove a useful reference to our first 500 articles.

● Quite a number of Institute publications reproduce individual articles taken from LASALLIANA. We are quite honoured to see our work thus appreciated, however,we would be very grateful, when you do this, if you mentioned the name of the author and the name of the publication the article is taken from; please also indicate the reference number of the article you reproduce.

BLESSED EDOARDO GIUSEPPE ROSAZ: A LASALLIAN BISHOP

Br. Secondino Scaglione

To call him a Lasallian bishop is no exaggeration. Blessed Edoardo Giuseppe Rosaz was not simply a great benefactor of the Brothers. He also admired and valued their work and had a profound devotion to St. John Baptist de La Salle, as this short article will try to show.

A holy priest

July 14th 1991 was a memorable day in Susa, a little Alpine diocese near the French border: Pope John Paul II beatified Mgr Edoardo Giuseppe Rosaz, a former bishop of the diocese.

He was born in Susa in 1830, and it was in the familiar setting of his native town that his vocation to the priesthood matured, and his pastoral ministry as a priest, founder and bishop was exercised. And finally he was beatified in his much loved Susa. In brief, that was his life. As his biographers point out, he was a person who would have preferred to lead a hidden life, as the Gospel recommends. Providence, however, wished to honour him in a special way. His beatification adds another name to the already long list of "social saints" and charities that characterised Turin and Piedmont in the second half of the 1800's: John Bosco, Benedetto Cottolengo, Giuseppe Cafasso and Leonardo Murialdo.

On August 15th 1856, the young priest Edoardo Rosaz founded the "Ritiro" with 4 orphan girls and a pious lady. This charitable foundation was run first by the girls themselves and then, when the Franciscan Third Order of Sisters founded by him replaced them, it gradually developed. The reason for Rosaz' commitment was the dramatic realisation of an urgent need: to look after those that no one cared for; to look after the boys and girls who could not be left to roam the streets.

The Brothers in Susa

In 1842, the Brothers opened a little school in Susa for the children of the mountain dwellers. It was called the Charity School and was completely free. The Brothers lived totally on charity: they gave and they received. It was Mgr Rosaz who drew up a statute to ensure the survival of the Brothers. The Brothers' school continued to be constantly in the thoughts of the bishop, and all the biographers stress the help he gave the Brothers and his joy on seeing the number of Brothers increase in Susa. This is reflected in a letter sent by him to the Visitor of Turin:

"Dear Sir, I accept with gratitude the gift you have been good enough to make to our town, by sending another Brother at your expense to work in the 4th form and to help the Brother Director. I undertake to pay 300 lire in addition to the 600 lire paid as a fee to the Brother in the 1st form. God only knows the good the Brothers are doing with their teaching of religion. To a great extent, it is to them that we owe the maintenance of the faith in our region. I bless you and express my profound esteem for you. Yours most affectionately in Christ, Edoardo G. Rosaz."

The holy bishop was convinced that the mission of the Christian school to educate and evangelise was very valuable. This is shown clearly by the fact that 4 of the pastoral letters he sent to the diocese of Susa were devoted to the question of the Christian education of youth. The first pastoral letter is entitled "The Christian education of youth", and was followed some time later by a second one on the same theme. One would think, on reading them carefully, that he had paraphrased the educational teachings of De La Salle. The other two letters are entitled "The study of catechism". These feel as if they were inspired by the Lasallian approach to catechesis.

Among the printed works of the holy bishop we find a treatise on good manners with the title "Rules of politeness for young ladies" (Turin, 1901) inspired by De La Salle's "Regles de la bienseance".

Admiration for St. La Salle and devotion to him

In his own pastoral ministry of education to young people, and in the formulation of the constitutions of the religious institute founded by him, Rosaz drew abundantly on his daily contact with the Brothers in Susa, on his familiarity with the works of De La Salle acquired by his frequentation of the Brothers, and on his reading of the works of the Saint which he had in his library.

Blessed Rosaz was a fervent and enthusiastic devotee of St. La Salle. He took part in the celebrations surrounding his beatification (1888) and canonisation (1900) in Susa, Turin and even Rome, and had ample opportunity to express his devotion to the Saint and his admiration for the Brothers.

However, what most clearly expressed his devotion for De La Salle and his gratitude to the Brothers was his visit on September 1st and 2nd 1901 to Thermignon in Savoy, the place of origin of his family. The occasion was the unveiling of a statue of De La Salle in the main aisle of the parish church. Blessed Rosaz presided over all the ceremonies, delivered a panegyric in honour of the Saint, and expressed to the Brothers of the small community at Thermignon his affection and admiration for the work done for poor children.

A permanent guest of the Brothers

Whenever the "vagrant" bishop, as he was nicknamed, came on a pastoral visit to a town where there were Brothers, he always found time to visit them and share a frugal meal, never failing to encourage them and express his admiration. And so he met the Brothers in Susa, Turin, Piacenza, Genoa and even Rome. Many of the Brothers were long standing friends of his. They returned his affection and stood by him in difficult and painful circumstances, especially at the time when the "Ritiro" foundation was being consolidated. His familiarity with the Brothers of Susa and Turin enabled the Brothers to reciprocate in the best of ways. The biographers of the Saint note that he would come to Turin almost every week on pastoral or administrative business and would stay at the Collegio S. Giuseppe. Here he was particularly friendly with the bursar who lent him money in order to meet urgent needs. He was helped very willingly, and more than once, the Director of S.Giuseppe refused to accept repayment of the debt. At the College also he came to know Br. Solenne, a clever and gifted architect, whom he recruited to plan and build the church and bell tower of the "Ritiro", which can still be admired today as a typical example of the neo-Gothic style. Br. Solenne, all the while respecting Lasallian gratuity, continued to make his services available to the bishop, and over a number of years was involved in drawing up plans and renovating many of the buildings in his charge.

In Rome also, Mgr Rosaz was very much at home with the "very dear" Brothers as he loved to call them. On his ad limina visits, he would stay with the Brothers at Piazza Poli or Piazza di Spagna. It was a great pleasure for him to greet the Visitor Br. Casimiro whom he had known and appreciated in Turin. He would have recourse to the Visitor on occasions to expedite the processing of documents, some of them of a delicate nature, by the Roman Congregations. He asked his help also to obtain the relics of St. Callista for the "Ritiro" church, and to ask the Congregation of Rites for a liturgy for the feast of Our Lady of Intercession.

The Visitor of Turin, Br. Genuino, who greatly admired Mgr Rosaz, found in him a prudent and wise counsellor. It was he who, at a time when vocations were scarce, advised him to open a juniorate at Grulisco. Vocations came immediately and the Superior was able to satisfy the numerous requests for Brothers. In 1888, Mgr Rosaz was affiliated to the Institute.

On May 5th 1903, at the funeral of Blessed Rosaz, the pupils of the Charity School of Susa and the Brothers had the honour of heading the funeral procession and accompanying him for the last time. And it was right they did so, for the were the favourite sons of the holy bishop. Moreover, the Brothers remembered how often Rosaz had written to say: "I would rather sell my ring and pectoral cross than allow the Brothers' schools to close. We need them too much in Susa and they serve also the surrounding area".

CATECHESIS TODAY AND CATECHISM ACCORDING TO CHAPTER IX OF THE CONDUCT

Brother Manuel F. Magaz

● De La Salle became thoroughly conversant with the method of St. Sulpice and used it when he was a student there. In later years, he borrowed this method and adapted it for use in his own schools: teaching methods suitable for parish catechism are different from those needed in a classroom.

● It would be somewhat anachronistic and ill-judged to try to apply to the teaching of religion today the methods explained by De La Salle in Chapter IX of the Conduct. If we read between the lines, however, we see that there are certain underlying concepts which are still valid today for the teaching of religion.

WHY READ THE RULES OF CHRISTIAN DECORUM AND POLITENESS (1/2)

Brother Gregory Wright

As part of its ongoing program of making available the Complete Works of Saint John Baptist de La Salle, in late 1990 the Regional Conference of the Christian Brothers of the United States and Toronto published the first English edition of the Founder's Règles de la Bienséance et de la Civilité chrétienne – The Rules of Christian Decorum and Civility, a translation of the original edition (1703). Also, since the appearance of Cahier lasallien n. 19 in 1964, a very readable version of this edition of the work has been available in French. So now a large number of Brothers around the world have ready access to this work.

However, the appearance of the first English edition of this work might lead some to ask why anyone would publish a book of politeness that is nearly three hundred years old, or why they should read this particular work of St. John Baptist de La Salle. One answer to these questions might be that this volume is as relevant to us today as it was to the Christian educators of the Splendid Century. For in it the Founder showed certain characteristics of himself as a person which exemplify a spirit we should try to imitate and convey a message we should take to heart. Among other things, what he had to say and his manner of saying it show De La Salle to have been keenly aware of the milieu in which he lived and in which he sought to apply Christian principles to the situations he encountered so as to be a gentleman in the practical and the best sense of this term. Now, what are some examples of this?

French society in the days of Louis XIV comprised very definite and distinct classes in which each individual had his place, inferior to some, superior to others, and equal to still others. Fully aware of this situation, the Founder accepted it along with its implications regarding decorum and civility. (48, 49, 105) Also, he perceived how members of the same class could be quite different, some acting "properly", others "improperly," as far as he was concerned. For intance, he noted that some decorated their hair with feathers or flowers and their ears with earrings. Others wore wigs, as was the custom at the time, but wigs more suitable for women than for men. He showed his disapproval of such things. (11, 14) At the same time, he perceived that customs, acceptable or otherwise, could change, but the fashions based on them were still important aspects of human living at any given time. (49) Likewise he saw that many people needed to get together so that gatherings for various purposes could not be avoided. (98) Once again, in the Age of Louis XIV, French was still very much of a living and a developing language. In this situation he saw real advantages to associating and conversing only with those who spoke clearly and correctly so that one could learn to comunicate effectively as well as in a polite manner. Choosing one's friends and acquaintances was a matter of great importance as far as he was concerned. (27, 28) However, he also recognized that a group gathering, particularly when it included or centered on a meal, could present practical problems. For serving those present would require respecting the different ranks and tastes of the guests. In his own way, De La Salle tried to suggest some simple solutions to these problems. (66 - 67)

The Founder also accepted both the necessity and the advantages of relaxation and recreation of the proper kind. (84) Still he recognized that activities of this sort were not without their dangers. What were termed relaxing and friendly conversations could hurt our neighbors because of the thoughtlessness of the speakers as regards their choice of subjects. Or they could offend God when what some called efforts to entertain others led to the use of vulgar language or even to attacks on Christian virtues and values. (113 - 116) Great care, he said, was required in these matters. Likewise, he noted, a friendly game of cards could lead to displays of anger and avarice rather than help the players to relax. (89 – 90) In another area, games intended to provide bodily exercice could offend against decorum, he said, if the players became too intense or did not remained properly attired while participating in them. (91) Likewise, popular or "mass" entertainment such as that provided in the theatre or more so on the streets could be very much opposed to decorum. A polite person would find little relaxation in such improper activities. (95 – 96) All these things had to be kept in mind, said he, and suitable precautions taken even when trying to satisfy a real human need.

At the same time, he noted, that when people come together some individuals can show their bad side, knowingly, intentionally, or otherwise. One can become almost childish by neglecting the more important things and becoming lost in details. (134) Another can become a busybody, prying into everyone else's affairs in a way that does no good for himself or others and which is certain to give offense. (99) A third person still can show himself to be excessively self-centered by trying to make himself the only subject of conversation. (119) Or the person who can sing or play an instrument might not know when to stop. Then, whatever his intentions, he no longer provides entertainment for others. (93) So, as De La Salle clearly indicated, people are people. And whenever they come together for whatever purpose, great care must be taken by all concerned to make their gatherings a success.

Lastly, while much of what has just been said seems to refer only to those who were "better off" or even doing quite well in life, the Founder was not unaware of what in seventeenth century France was called "The Base of the Pyramid." He knew there were families which lacked adequate bedding so that children of both sexes and all ages, at times in large numbers, had to share the same bed – something of which he strongly disapproved. (45) And he recognized that there were poor people who to keep warm had to cover themselves with their clothing when they went to bed at night. (47) Whatever his backgroung and family situation, John Baptist de La Salle knew much about his contemporaries in seventeenth century France. The Caracteres of Jean La Bruyère is not the only work that gives us good insights into the people of the Splendid Century. Our own Founder adds to our knowledge of this subject in his writings, perhaps more so in Christian Civility than anywhere else.

Having described people as they are or can be, warts and all, De La Salle also accepts the fact that life as it is requires encounters with them as well as more or less extensive contacts of various types. Since these cannot be avoided, he calls upon his readers to make the best of them. Doing this, he suggests, requires first and foremost a Christian perspective. This he sees as the basis for "that wise and well-regulated conduct which governs what we do and say" and which should be "practiced toward our neighbor..." (4) Neither of these should be looked upon "as merely human and worldly qualities" but rather "as virtues that have reference to God, to their neighbor, and to themselves." Likewise, parents and teachers should teach children to observe these rule of decorum "only through purely Christian motives, which concern the glory of God and one's own salvation." (3) And this last suggestion he repeats frequently in connection with many different situations.

Respect for one's body, he asserts, should be the basis for decorum and the civility that follows from it. And a Christian respects his body, he adds, because it is the living temple of God and the chosen tabernacle of Jesus Christ. (36) An awareness of the honors conferred on him helps the individual to decide what to do and not to do, so as to maintain the dignity he enjoys. (39) At the same time, though, the Christian knows he is inclined to sin, which he does commit from time to time. This leads him to accept certain limits on his conduct and to impose others when necessary. (46) And as a Child of God, he strives to put his soul and spiritual things before the body and material things. (50) This attitude will have some practical effects on his life and will influence his actions, even some of which are most common and ordinary.

Eating and drinking are basic human necessities which De La Salle accepts as part of life. At the same time he says they can provide many occasions of acting in an unchristian as well as an impolite manner. (57) In his efforts to avoid offenses of one type or the other, the Christian will set the tone for the meal by the blessing which precedes it. As circumstances require, he will join in the blessing or even lead it on occasion. (60) Then in both how he eats and drinks and how he relates to the others at table with him, he will try to act and react as a Christian should. (58) Among other things, a meal shared with others can provide an opportunity for conversations. Truth, sincerity. prudence and discretion should characterize the speech of the Christian. Also, it will be distinguished by the charity it shows for the neighbor along with respect for God and the things of God. (109) A Christian, then, will see the need to initiate those gatherings which bring people together as well as to respond to some invitations he might receive. (97) In each instance he is neither anti-social nor unsocial. Rather he can be the perfect host or guest because of the principles which inspire his relations with others.

WHY READ THE RULES OF CHRISTIAN DECORUM AND POLITENESS (2/2)

Brother Gregory Wright

What also might make his company attractive and desirable is what he does and does not do. Respect for his dignity as a Child of God and a desire to honor his Baptismal commitment will influence his choice of topics of conversation. Desiring not to dishonor his soul, the words he uses will show both great control and much discretion on his part. (85, 116) Thus he will find it easy to avoid contradicting others and disputing over trifling matters, actions which offend against politeness while discrediting a man and more so a Christian. (125 – 26) Though conscious of his position and the respect which is his due, and while trying not to offend others in any way, he himself will suffer injuries and avoid taking offense, all in keeping with the Spirit of the Gospel. (55) Sociable as he is, though, the Christian will know when not to go along with what is being done. Just as he avoids using certain language or discussing certain topics, he also avoids improprieties such as songs which "might lead to impiety,... glorify loose living, or ... contain expressions and words suggesting it is an honor and a great pleasure to drink to excess." (92 He has the courage to practice Christian decorum and civility no matter what the occasion or what some might think or say about him.

Aware of current customs and fashions as well as of the requirements of living with others, the Christian will try to conform to the former and to fulfill the latter without in any way offending against religion and its teachings. By doing this he will also become and show himself a "gentleman" in the fullest and best sense of this term. For consciously or otherwise he will be living up to the standard set by De La Salle, that we should "never take pleasure in anything that might cause pain to anybody." (85) Long before Cardinal Newman said it, the Founder seemed to have the idea that "It is almost a definition of a gentleman to say that he is one who never inflicts pain." (The Idea of a University) At the same time, he seemed to agree with the seventeenth century ideal that a gentleman is one who "pleases others in order to please one self." Against this background it is easy to understand why the Founder placed so much emphasis on things the gentleman would not do as well as things he would do.

In this relations with individuals and groups the gentleman would correctly perceive and accept his place. He would not put himself forward by trying to claim, much less demand, a place higher than that due him. If anything, he would gracefully accept what some might think is a place lower than what he deserves. (60 – 61, 130) In his conversations he would avoid saying anything which might mislead his listeners or give the idea he is speaking for the benefit of one or a few of his audience while concealing something from the others. While speaking clearly and frankly, he will not be disturbed or show anger if anyone refuses to accept the accuracy of his statements. (111) Much less would he try to amuse himself at the expense of others, by causing them pain through what he says, or by taking pleasure in the misfortunes of those present or absent. (85 – 86) And as a guest at a meal in the house of another, he would never think of finding fault with what was served or how it was served. (69) In brief, on such an occasion he would act so as to make things as pleasant as possible for all who might be with him.

On the positive side, De La Salle seems to suggest that it is certain unusual situations that arise which can be the real test of the gentleman. No matter how carefully people plan, embarrasing situations can arise which cause particular difficulties for the host or the one responsible for the gathering. He says that the gentleman who perceives the situation will take suitable means to deal with it while trying to attract as little attention as possible to what has happened. (30) Likewise, when someone is ill it can be necessary to discuss his condition in some detail so that the proper remedies can be found. However, this should be done only to the extent it is necessary, with as few people as possible, and in as accurate and refined language as possible. (39) In everything, then, what the gentleman says and does will be calculated to avoid offending anyone while making things as agreeable as they can be under the circumstances.

Whenever a group of people come together someone has to take the lead and see that things get done. In such instances, in what are essentially indifferent matters the gentleman should graciously conform to the wishes of others. (105) If circumstances force him to assume the leadership, he should try to make suggestions rather than give orders to others. (53) His purpose should be to find ways of indirectly leading people to do what is appropriate for the occasion. For instances, if large amounts of food have been prepared for a repast, he might encourage other guests to help themselves to generous portions and to enjoy the good meal their host has provided for them. (63) Contributing in such ways to the success of a social event can please others while making it pleasant and enjoyable for the gentleman himself.

To please others while not offending them in any way seems to require a basic respect for those who are present in a particular situation. De La Salle emphasized the necessity and the importance of this respect as well as how it can be shown in practice. (144) For instance, he suggests the host himself should take care of his guests, doing various things for them and not calling on his servants or allowing them to perform certain services for them. (134) Likewise, when speaking to or communicating with people with whom he has regular or frequent contact, such as his parents, the gentleman will not forget the respect he owes them. This respect will always be shown in how he speaks to them whatever the occasion or how he addresses them in any written communication. (124, 139) When anything is done regularly or repeatedly, or if we encounter the same individuals almost on a day-to-day basis, it is easy to forget our manners. Familiarity might not breed contempt, but it can lead to real carelessness on the part of an individual. De La Salle sees the gentleman as one who does not offend against civility in these situations.

Encounters with others can create situations in which it is both normal and necessary to praise others and to receive compliments from them. De La Salle sees doing both as providing occasions for showing our respect for those with whom we have such exchanges. When he is praised by someone of a higher social rank than he, the gentleman might show his respect for this individual by silently accepting the compliment. A few appropriate words of response rather than silence might be more suitable when one receives praise from a person who is his equal. (121) Complimenting another whatever the occasion might be is as difficult as receiving the compliments of others and responding to them in the proper way. In any case, what the gentleman says and how he says it will both show that he speaks sincerely and from the heart. (122, 129) Also, when someone else is praised in his presence, the gentleman will find some way to show he shares the sentiments that have been expressed. And certainly he would never act in such a way as to suggest he doubts that the compliment is deserved. (122) In all this as in so many other things the gentleman will show himself to be a sociable person. He will be seen as one who knows how to please others, one who goes out of his way to be agreeable and pleasant to those with whom he associates.

A careful reading of Christian Civility would quickly show that these are not the only characteristics of its author or the most important ones manifested in this work. Rather they are some that are easily perceived and which can be discussed at some length. But more important than showing some characteristics of its author, this work expresses a "spirit" or conveys a "message" which permeates it. Both of these are worthy of some consideration.

In his meditation for the Feast of St. Louis (25 August), the Founder asserts: «Your mission requires you to labor for the good of... your country. Your pupils are already members of the State, and will soon be endowed with full citizenship...» (M 160: 3) Perhaps these words addressed to Lasallian educators are more true today than they were when the Saint first wrote them. However, working for the good of a society requires among other things as complete a knowledge as possible of that milieu, its customs and fashions, its good and bad aspects, as well as its ways of doing things. De La Salle had and showed such a knowledge of the Splendid Century. His effectiveness as an educationist and an educator as well as the popularity long enjoyed by this "best-seller" of his might owe much to this fact. Now, some three centuries later, the Saint might be telling us that we need to become knowledgeable about our milieu. No more than he are we to approve of it entirely or adopt all its fads, but we should see this as a means of becoming more effective apostles in the time and place in which we are working «... since all our actions should be holy, there are none which should not be done through purely Christian motives,» wrote De La Salle in the "Preface" to Christian Civility. (3) A modern reader, particularly one who has studied the Scriptures as they are presented today, might find some of this volume's Biblical references a bit strained, or some of the Scriptural arguments he uses to support certain things either inappropriate or unconvincing. But to do so might be to miss the more important point. As Christian we are called to follow the teachings of Jesus and to conform our lives to his maxims. De La Salle shows this is as possible and practical for us today as it was for him during the Age of Louis XIV. Wherever we are and whatever we are doing, we can take a Christian perspective and be guided by Christian motives. As much as the Meditations, the Collection or what are usually termed the "spiritual writings" of the Saint, Christian Civility calls us to do this while suggesting how it can be done.

«Since you are ambassadors and ministers of Jesus Christ in the work that you do, you must act as representing Jesus Christ himself,» insists the Founder in his Retreat Meditations. (MTR 3:2) Again, perhaps more than ever this is required of today's Lasallian educator. However, even one who is most successful as a teacher might ask if the Saint has not set too high a standard, one almost beyond human reach. For his part, De La Salle reaffirmed this notion countless times in various ways and without underestimating the difficulty of achieving this ideal. Still a Lasallian educator aware of the people with whom he is working and the setting in which he and they live, enlightened and guided by Christian motives based on the Scriptures, and striving to be a gentleman –one who causes no pain and pleases himself by pleasing others– will be taking a big step toward representing Jesus Christ as his ambassador and minister. Listening to the message and acquiring the spirit of Christian Civility can help us do these things. And then we will become more effective apostles in our classrooms. At the same time we will witness to Jesus and attract others to him. And lastly we will inspire young men to join us so as to share our ministry and help continue the work of Lasallian education. Yes, reading this work, pondering it, and taking it to heart can be of great value to us as well as to the work of God which we are doing.
